Jacques Thibaud, the great French violinist, who has recently returned from France for a tour of America, will make an introductory appearance as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the second concert of the Brooklyn season, to take place in the Academy of Music to-night. Thibaud, who is called the greatest violinst of France, and one of the finest virtuosos of western Europe, is said to lend new beauty to the concerto of Mozart in E flat major, in which he is to be heard at this concert.

Pierre Monteux will also present the following numbers: Berlioz' overture "The Roman Carnival," Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor, Gliere' symphonic poem "The Sirens," and th Polovtsian Dances from Borodin opera "Prince Igor."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

- 1924

MUSIC

Thibaud Soloist at Academy With Boston Orchestra

A programme of rococco order was that of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, for its second Brooklyn concert of the season, held last night in the opera house of the Academy of Music, under auspices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences. The audience was large and responsive with its applause.

The concert was devoted to Berlioz's "The Roman Carnival" overture, Schumann's D minor symphony (No. 4, opus 120), Gliere's symphonic poem, "The Sirens," Mozart's E flat major concerto for violin (Koechel edition, No. 268), with Jacques Thibaud as solo artist, and the Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor."

In the Mozart concerto, Jacques Thibaud, eminent French violinist (his first appearance in Brooklyn as soloist with the B. S. O.), revealed artistry of an exceptionally high order, combining a limpid tone with spiritual ethereal purity raised to the nth degree of beauty. Mr. Thibaud played Mozart as Mozart should be played. He brought to his task a high endeavor backed by years of scholarly study and a reverent regard for the work. Thibaud is today the foremost representative of the French school of violin playing.

Schumann's D minor symphony revives memories of Boston concerts under Gericke, Tuck and Fiedler. For sentimental association (on the part of older music-lovers) the work commands affection. To younger ears this symphony as a whole lacks much of Schumann's accustomed and inspired "outlook," as in the first period compositions. In fact, there are spots rather dull and prosaic. Nor does the thematic material seem to be so vitally co-related or coordinated between the four movements as to make necessary playing without pause for more than half an hour (per the composer's directions).

Gliere's "The Sirens" is new to Brooklyn though heard several times in Manhattan. It is an early opus of a modern Russian composer. The opening passages are built on the Wagnerian idiom but the development and climax are more in the modern school, employing whole-tone scale effects with wailing chromatic glissando passages in the strings and woodwind. The "programme" of Gliere's symphonic poem deals with the fabulous creatures of Greek mythology who lived on an enchanted isle in the middle of the sea. By their alluring songs they enticed the sailors of passing ships, who, captivated by the irresistible music, steered toward the isle of the treacherous siren's, where their vessels were wrecked upon hidden rocks. The composition is divided into five clearly recognizable parts, namely, "The Sea," "The Isle of the Sirens," "Approach of the Vessel," "The Song of the Sirens," The Shipwreck."

Debussy preceded Gliere, it may be recalled, with the same subject in the third of his Nocturnes for orchestra, "Siren's." But the French composer, more literal than Gliere of Russia, permitted the song of his sirens to be hummed by sixteen sopranos and mezzo-sopranos. And more alluring the effect.

The playing of the orchestra in this number was of the virtuoso order. Mr. Monteux brought to the surface all the salient points in

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BROOKLYN
NEW YORK
EAGLE

JAN6 - 1924

An Interesting New Singer.

Making his first American tour, Roland Hayes, the negro tenor, will give a recital in the Academy of Music on Saturday evening, Jan. 19.

The singer worked his way up from humble surroundings in the South and won an education and vocal development through his own efforts. The success of his preliminary public appearances encouraged him to try his fortunes in Europe three years ago. He first went to London, where he quickly gained recognition and where he sang by special command for King George in Buckingham Palace. This enthusiasm and popularity was repeated in Paris, and again in Vienna. Mr. Hayes has appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and has given recitals in New York, Boston, Chicago, and other cities of the South and West.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

JAN6 _ 1924

Henry Hadley Here With Philharmonic

This afternoon at the Academy of Music, Mr. Hadley will conduct the Philharmonic Orchestra, presenting Felix Borowski's "Youth," which had its first New York performance recently under Mr. Hadley's direction, for the first time in Brooklyn. Harold Bauer will be soloist, playing Brahms' B flat Concerto. The Gretry-Mottl ballet music from "Cephale and Procris" and Tchaikovsky's "Nutcracker" suite also will be played.

The last of the three new works which Henry Hadley has selected for his concerts with the Philharmonic Orchestra is "Blue Flower," a tone poem by Carl McKinley, an American composer. "Blue Flower" will have its first hearing at the Metropolitan Opera House on Tuesday evening. Mr. McKinley is at present associated with the musical staff of the Capitol Theatre in New York, and this is his first orchestral work to be heard locally. Harold Bauer will be the soloist, playing Brahms' B flat Concerto. Beethoven's Leonore Overture, No. 3, the prelude and Love Death from "Tristan and Isolde" and Liszt's "The Preuldes," complete the program.

On Thursday evening, at Carnegie Hall, Willem Van Hoogstraten will resume the direction of the Philharmonic Orchestra. The program will consist of Brahms' Fourth Symphony, the Rhapsodie Espagnol by Ravel and Dukas' "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." The program will be repeated in Carnegie Hall, on Friday afternoon.

Mr. Hadley has been invited to be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at that organization's concerts on Feb. 22 and 23, in Boston. Mr. Hadley will appear both as conductor and composer on this occasion.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Pierre Monteux will present Handel's "Concerto Grosso," No. 6; Gliere's symphonic poem, "The Sirens," and Henry F. Gilbert's "Negro Rhapsody," both of which pieces are to have their first performance at these concerts.

The soloist will be Robert Schmitz, French virtuoso, who will play the piano part in D'Indy's "Symphony on a French Mountain Air."

MONDAY SYMPHONY

The Boston debut of Cecilia Hansen, the famous Russian violinist, will add importance to the second Monday Symphony concert on January 14. This remarkable young woman will play Bruch's Concerto in G minor, Tschaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, Smetana's symphonic poem, "The Moldau," and Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture will be conducted by

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

LAWRENCE
MASS.

DEC = 1923

MONTEAUX AND SYMPHONY

How Famous Leader Deals With His Orchestra and His Public Coming Here January 20.

Some orchestral leaders have the reputation of tyrants of controlling the musicians under them by being abusive, and of "educating" reluctant audiences by defiantly hurling unwelcome scores at their heads.

Pierre Monteux, the great conductor who is now fulfilling his fifth season as leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is not of this sort; his method is rather that of quiet persistency. At rehearsals his criticism is unfailingly courteous, if unsparing. He knows precisely what he wants, makes his desire clear, and patiently insists until that effect is obtained to a hair's breadth of exactitude. The players under him perpetually marvel at his wonderfully accurate ear. If a single one of the hundred instruments plays too sharp or too flat the erring musician is politely but firmly called to task.

His audiences Mr. Monteux strives to please with programs which are well ordered and balanced, interesting and eventful in their variety of nationality and period. He has accordingly made himself popular above all others as a compiler of programmes and in this he has always directly moulded public taste toward the best even while pleasing it. This is particularly noticeable in his courageous championship of rising and unrecognized genius.

alizing that the daring music of day and tomorrow is apt to sou strange at first, Mr. Monteux h made it famous by making it miliar. His "Concerts Monteux" Paris Casino became generally no for pioneer performances—alm notorious. It was here that M Monteux conducted the first pe formance, now historical of "Rites of Spring" by Stravinsk then considered merely wild lawless, but now universally teemed. The music caused a riot the audience; eggs and all mann of vegetables wer thrown. The po of vegetables were thrown. The p managed to escape, although his hat did not. The public had heard the music, and therefore Monteux repeated it the follow week.

These innovations are not alw popular at the time, but later when the music becomes underst and appreciated Mr. Monteux thanked for his efforts. In his pr ent post, while always giving standard favorites of the orche repertory their due predomina he has revealed his evident inst
for singling out new genius, American and foreign.

Symphony orchestra will be he at the Colonial theatre here Sund afternoon, January 20.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK
TIMES

Music Notes

FOLLOWING its statem in the program book scribers who have cover its annual deficit, Symphony Orchestra publishe cial record for the last thr
From this it appears that the reduced from $121,000 in 192
$83,000 in 1923

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK
TIMES

The Boston Orchestra presented Stuart Mason's new suite, conducted by the composer. His present work is a complete contrast to his "Rhapsodie on a Persian Air," for piano and orchestra, in which he employed the modern idiom. His suite is written in the eighteenth century manner and his score is said to "borrow the charm of Mozart and Rameau without slavish imitation."

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK
AMERICAN

JAN6 - 1924

Boston Orchest in a Hodge Po of Old-time M

By GRENA BENNET

Yesterday afternoon'
gramme of Boston Sy Orchestra in Carnegie H a hodge-podge of good ioned music, charmin melodies, and the ravi modern cacophonist.

In the first class wer with his magnificent overture superbly and Mozart's E flat
featuring Jacques Thibaud and his beautiful violin artistry.

Ravel's excerpts from "Daphnis et Chloe," like delicate rhymes intoned with grace, constituted the poetic part of the programme.

But the feature was Bliss's so-called "Color" symphony, which was introduced locally at yesterday's event. The British composer may, as the programme stated, have found inspiration in different tints, but it cannot be said that his hearers discovered any distinguishing colors in the various sections of his symphony. With the same futile result he might have entitled the movements North, South, East and West, or even Spring, Summer, Autumn and Winter and reached.

His "Purple" first movement contained fragments of Irish folk song throttled in clangour. The "Red" section was a veritable anarchy of clashing instruments with occasional passages suggesting the wailing oboe and staccato drum taps of the midway plaisaunce.

BEST BY ATTEST

Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK
TIMES

Henry Hadley has been invited to be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at that organization's concerts on Feb. 22 and 23 in Boston. Mr. Hadley will appear both as conductor and composer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 4 - 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second evening concert in Carnegie Hall last night. The program consisted of Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute," the "Symphonia Domestica," by Richard Strauss; Gliere's symphonic poem, "The Sirens," and Liszt's "Tasso: Lament and Triumph."

Altogether, the orchestra under Pierre Monteux's baton gave excellent renditions, particularly in the Strauss compositions.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

- 1924

Excellent Concert By Boston Orchestra

Jacques Thibaud gave an outstanding performance of violin playing last night the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in their series at the Academy of Music. The French virtuos brought out the passionate beauty of the Mozart Concerto in E flat major (Koechel No. 268) which is ordinarily played in a frigid pyrotechic style.

Monteux again showed his Catholic tendencies in the choice of the program. The first number was the well known "Roman Carnival" overture by Berlioz, played with the vigor that the opus demands. The Symphony No. 4 in D Minor by Schumann followed. The four movements were played without a pause, lending an added effect to the work which otherwise would have lacked in continuity.

One of the most beautiful interpretations of the season was heard when the orchestra played Gliere's symphonic poem "The Sirens." Following the Gliere piece, Thibaud played the concerto with the orchestra. The program closed with the Polovtsian Dances from the opera "Prince Igor," by Borodin.

These dances are in no sense waltzes or minutes. At times the syncopation was terrific. Borodin almost exhausted the possibilities of orchestration in creating the effects in the dances, which were as colorful as a painting by Bekst.

The performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was exceptional and the excellence of the program will remain a pleasurable memory in the minds of the audience.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

SPRINGFIELD
MASS.
UNION

JAN 6 _ 1924

Mrs. Joseph Mackey.

SYMPHONY HERE TODAY

Director Monteux Will Give Up Conductorship Soon

Pierre Monteux's appearance as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Auditorium this afternoon will be his last in Springfield and probably his last in America also, for at the end of this season he will relinquish his baton to Serve Koussevitsky, who is coming from his scenes of triumph in London and Paris to take his place.

Beethoven's Symphony in A major, No. 7, Op. 92, opens the program today. According to Thayer, Beethoven began the composition of the Seventh Symphony in the spring of 1812.

The Seventh and Eighth Symphonies were probably played over for the first time at the Archduke Rudolph's in Vienna, April 20, 1813. Beethoven in the same month vainly endeavored to produce them at a concert.

The first performance of the Seventh was at Vienna, in the large hall of the university, on Dec. 8, 1813.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

JAN 4 - 1924

Thibaud to Play With Boston Symphony To-Night

Jacques Thibaud, the great French violinist, who has recently returned from France for a tour of America, will make an introductory appearance as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the second concert of the Brooklyn season, to take place in the Academy of Music to-night. Thibaud, who is called the greatest violinst of France, and one of the finest virtuosos of western Europe, is said to lend new beauty to the concerto of Mozart in E flat major, in which he is to be heard at this concert.

Pierre Monteux will also present the following numbers: Berlioz' overture "The Roman Carnival," Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor, Gliere' symphonic poem "The Sirens," and th Polovtsian Dances from Borodin opera "Prince Igor."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

5 - 1924

MUSIC

Thibaud Soloist at Academy With Boston Orchestra

A programme of rococco order was that of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, for its second Brooklyn concert of the season, held last night in the opera house of the Academy of Music, under auspices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences. The audience was large and responsive with its applause.

The concert was devoted to Berlioz's "The Roman Carnival" overture, Schumann's D minor symphony (No. 4, opus 120), Gliere's symphonic poem, "The Sirens," Mozart's E flat major concerto for violin (Koechel edition, No. 268), with Jacques Thibaud as solo artist, and the Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor."

In the Mozart concerto, Jacques Thibaud, eminent French violinist (his first appearance in Brooklyn as soloist with the B. S. O.), revealed artistry of an exceptionally high order, combining a limpid tone with spiritual ethereal purity raised to the nth degree of beauty. Mr. Thibaud played Mozart as Mozart should be played. He brought to his task a high endeavor backed by years of scholarly study and a reverent regard for the work. Thibaud is today the foremost representative of the French school of violin playing.

Schumann's D minor symphony revives memories of Boston concerts under Gericke, Tuck and Fiedler. For sentimental association (on the part of older music-lovers) the work commands affection. To younger ears this symphony as a whole lacks much of Schumann's accustomed and inspired "outlook," as in the first period compositions. In fact, there are spots rather dull and prosaic. Nor does the thematic material seem to be so vitally co-related or coordinated between the four movements as to make necessary playing without pause for more than half an hour (per the composer's directions).

Gliere's "The Sirens" is new to Brooklyn though heard several times in Manhattan. It is an early opus of a modern Russian composer. The opening passages are built on the Wagnerian idiom but the development and climax are more in the modern school, employing whole-tone scale effects with wailing chromatic glissando passages in the strings and woodwind. The "programme" of Gliere's symphonic poem deals with the fabulous creatures of Greek mythology who lived on an enchanted isle in the middle of the sea. By their alluring songs they enticed the sailors of passing ships, who, captivated by the irresistible music, steered toward the isle of the treacherous siren's, where their vessels were wrecked upon hidden rocks. The composition is divided into five clearly recognizable parts, namely, "The Sea," "The Isle of the Sirens," "Approach of the Vessel," "The Song of the Sirens," The Shipwreck."

Debussy preceded Gliere, it may be recalled, with the same subject, in the third of his Nocturnes for orchestra, "Siren's." But the French composer, more literal than Gliere of Russia, permitted the song of his sirens to be hummed by sixteen sopranos and mezzo-sopranos. And more alluring the effect.

The playing of the orchestra in this number was of the virtuoso order. Mr. Monteux brought to the surface all the salient points in

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BROOKLYN
NEW YORK
EAGLE

JAN 6 - 1924

An Interesting New Singer.

Making his first American tour, Roland Hayes, the negro tenor, will give a recital in the Academy of Music on Saturday evening, Jan. 19.

The singer worked his way up from humble surroundings in the South and won an education and vocal development through his own efforts. The success of his preliminary public appearances encouraged him to try his fortunes in Europe three years ago. He first went to London, where he quickly gained recognition and where he sang by special command for King George in Buckingham Palace. This enthusiasm and popularity was repeated in Paris, and again in Vienna. Mr. Hayes has appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and has given recitals in New York, Boston, Chicago, and other cities of the South and West.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

JAN 6 _ 1924

Henry Hadley Here With Philharmonic

This afternoon at the Academy of Music, Mr. Hadley will conduct the Philharmonic Orchestra, presenting Felix Borowski's "Youth," which had its first New York performance recently under Mr. Hadley's direction, for the first time in Brooklyn. Harold Bauer will be soloist, playing Brahms' B flat Concerto. The Gretry-Mottl ballet music from "Cephale and Procris" and Tchaikovsky's "Nutcracker" suite also will be played.

The last of the three new works which Henry Hadley has selected for his concerts with the Philharmonic Orchestra is "Blue Flower," a tone poem by Carl McKinley, an American composer. "Blue Flower" will have its first hearing at the Metropolitan Opera House on Tuesday evening. Mr. McKinley is at present associated with the musical staff of the Capitol Theatre in New York, and this is his first orchestral work to be heard locally. Harold Bauer will be the soloist, playing Brahms' B flat Concerto. Beethoven's Leonore Overture, No. 3, the prelude and Love Death from "Tristan and Isolde" and Liszt's "The Preuldes," complete the program.

On Thursday evening, at Carnegie Hall, Willem Van Hoogstraten will resume the direction of the Philharmonic Orchestra. The program will consist of Brahms' Fourth Symphony, the Rhapsodie Espagnol by Ravel and Dukas' "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." The program will be repeated in Carnegie Hall, on Friday afternoon.

Mr. Hadley has been invited to be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at that organization's concerts on Feb. 22 and 23, in Boston. Mr. Hadley will appear both as conductor and composer on this occasion.

Ob. Jan 6

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Pierre Monteux will present Handel's "Concerto Grosso," No. 6; Gliere's symphonic poem, "The Sirens," and Henry F. Gilbert's "Negro Rhapsody," both of which pieces are to have their first performance at these concerts.

The soloist will be Robert Schmitz, French virtuoso, who will play the piano part in D'Indy's "Symphony on a French Mountain Air."

Ob. Jan 6

MONDAY SYMPHONY

The Boston debut of Cecilia Hansen, the famous Russian violinist, will add importance to the second Monday Symphony concert on January 14. This remarkable young woman will play Bruch's Concerto in G minor, Tschaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, Smetana's symphonic poem, "The Moldau," and Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture will be conducted by

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

LAWRENCE
MASS. Tribune

DEC - 1923

MONTEAUX AND SYMPHONY

How Famous Leader Deals With His Orchestra and Public Coming Here January 20.

Some orchestral leaders have the reputation of tyrants of controlling the musicians under them by being abusive, and of "educating" reluctant audiences by defiantly hurling unwelcome scores at their heads.

Pierre Monteux, the great conductor who is now fulfilling his fifth season as leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is not of this sort; his method is rather that of quiet persistency. At rehearsals his criticism is unfailingly courteous, if unsparing. He knows precisely what he wants, makes his desire clear, and patiently insists until that effect is obtained to a hair's breadth of exactitude. The players under him perpetually marvel at his wonderfully accurate ear. If a single one of the hundred instruments plays too sharp or too flat the erring musician is politely but firmly called to task.

His audiences Mr. Monteux strives to please with programs which are well ordered and balanced, interesting and eventful in their variety of nationality and period. He has accordingly made himself popular above all others as a compiler of programmes and in this he has always directly moulded public taste toward the best even while pleasing it. This is particularly noticeable in his courageous championship of rising and unrecognized genius, alizing that the daring music o day and tomorrow is apt to strange at first, Mr. Monteux made it famous by making it miliar. His "Concerts Monteux" Paris Casino became generally no for pioneer performances—alm notorious. It was here that Monteux conducted the first formance, now historical of "Rites of Spring" by Stravins then considered merely wild lawless, but now universally teemed. The music caused a riot the audience; eggs and all mann of vegetables wer thrown. The po of vegetables were thrown. The po managed to escape, although his hat did not. The public had heard the music, and therefore Monteux repeated it the follo week.

These innovations are not alw popular at the time, but later when the music becomes underst and appreciated Mr. Monteux thanked for his efforts. In his pr ent post, while always giving standard favorites of the orches repertory their due predomina he has revealed his evident ins for singling out new genius, American and foreign.

Symphony orchestra will be he at the Colonial theatre here Sund afternoon, January 20.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK
TIMES

Music Notes Afield

FOLLOWING its statement published in the program book of the subscribers who have been helping cover its annual deficit, the Boston Symphony Orchestra publishes its financial record for the last three seasons. From this it appears that the deficit was reduced from $121,000 in 1921 to $97,000 in 1922 and $83,000 in 1923, which an endowment fund reduces a little below those figures. At the same time the salaries paid have risen from $299,000 to $303,000. The gross income from concerts has risen from $407,000 in 1922 to $423,000 in 1923. The trustees say that they are informed that "among the American orchestras of the first grade, none of which are self-supporting, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is burdened with the smallest operating deficit." The public is appealed to to give "this Boston institution" its firmest support at the present time.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK
TIMES

Daphnis like delicate rhymes intoned with grace, constituted the poetic part of the programme.

But the feature was Bliss's so-called "Color" symphony, which was introduced locally at yesterday's event. The British composer may, as the programme stated, have found inspiration in different tints, but it cannot be said that his hearers discovered any distinguishing colors in the various sections of his symphony. With the same futile result he might have entitled the movements North, South, East and West, or even Spring, Summer, Autumn and Winter and reached.

His "Purple" first movement contained fragments of Irish folk song throttled in clangour. The "Red" section was a veritable anarchy of clashing instruments with occasional passages suggesting the wailing oboe and staccato drum taps of the midway plaisaunce.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 4 - 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second evening concert in Carnegie Hall last night. The program consisted of Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute," the "Symphonia Domestica," by Richard Strauss; Gliere's symphonic poem, "The Sirens," and Liszt's "Tasso: Lament and Triumph."

Altogether, the orchestra under Pierre Monteux's baton gave excellent renditions, particularly in the Strauss compositions.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

- 1924

Excellent Concert By Boston Orchestra

Jacques Thibaud gave an outstanding performance of violin playing last night the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in their series at the Academy of Music. The French virtuos brought out the passionate beauty of the Mozart Concerto in E flat major (Koechel No. 268) which is ordinarily played in a frigid pyrotechic style.

Monteux again showed his Catholic tendencies in the choice of the program. The first number was the well known "Roman Carnival" overture by Berlioz, played with the vigor that the opus demands. The Symphony No. 4 in D Minor by Schumann followed. The four movements were played without a pause, lending an added effect to the work which otherwise would have lacked in continuity.

One of the most beautiful interpretations of the season was heard when the orchestra played Gliere's symphonic poem "The Sirens." Following the Gliere piece, Thibaud played the concerto with the orchestra. The program closed with the Polovtsian Dances from the opera "Prince Igor," by Borodin.

These dances are in no sense waltzes or minutes. At times the syncopation was terrific. Borodin almost exhausted the possibilities of orchestration in creating the effects in the dances, which were as colorful as a painting by Bekst.

The performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was exceptional and the excellence of the program will remain a pleasurable memory in the minds of the audience.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

SPRINGFIELD
MASS.
UNION

JAN 6 _ 1924

SYMPHONY HERE TODAY

Director Monteux Will Give Up Conductorship Soon

Pierre Monteux's appearance as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Auditorium this afternoon will be his last in Springfield and probably his last in America also, for at the end of this season he will relinquish his baton to Serve Koussevitsky, who is coming from his scenes of triumph in London and Paris to take his place.

Beethoven's Symphony in A major, No. 7, Op. 92, opens the program today. According to Thayer, Beethoven began the composition of the Seventh Symphony in the spring of 1812.

The Seventh and Eighth Symphonies were probably played over for the first time at the Archduke Rudolph's in Vienna, April 20, 1813. Beethoven in the same month vainly endeavored to produce them at a concert.

The first performance of the Seventh was at Vienna, in the large hall of the university, on Dec. 8, 1813.

[169]

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

JAN 4 - 1924

Thibaud to Play With Boston Symphony To-Night

Jacques Thibaud, the great French violinist, who has recently returned from France for a tour of America, will make an introductory appearance as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the second concert of the Brooklyn season, to take place in the Academy of Music to-night. Thibaud, who is called the greatest violinst of France, and one of the finest virtuosos of western Europe, is said to lend new beauty to the concerto of Mozart in E flat major, in which he is to be heard at this concert.

Pierre Monteux will also present the following numbers: Berlioz' overture "The Roman Carnival," Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor, Gliere' symphonic poem "The Sirens," and th Polovtsian Dances from Borodin' opera "Prince Igor."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

- 1924

MUSIC

Thibaud Soloist at Academy With Boston Orchestra

A programme of rococco order was that of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, for its second Brooklyn concert of the season, held last night in the opera house of the Academy of Music, under auspices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences. The audience was large and responsive with its applause.

The concert was devoted to Berlioz's "The Roman Carnival" overture, Schumann's D minor symphony (No. 4, opus 120), Gliere's symphonic poem, "The Sirens," Mozart's E flat major concerto for violin (Koechel edition, No. 268), with Jacques Thibaud as solo artist, and the Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor."

In the Mozart concerto, Jacques Thibaud, eminent French violinist (his first appearance in Brooklyn as soloist with the B. S. O.), revealed artistry of an exceptionally high order, combining a limpid tone with spiritual ethereal purity raised to the nth degree of beauty. Mr. Thibaud played Mozart as Mozart should be played. He brought to his task a high endeavor backed by years of scholarly study and a reverent regard for the work. Thibaud is today the foremost representative of the French school of violin playing.

Schumann's D minor symphony revives memories of Boston concerts under Gericke, Tuck and Fiedler. For sentimental association (on the part of older music-lovers) the work commands affection. To younger ears this symphony as a whole lacks much of Schumann's accustomed and inspired "outlook," as in the first period compositions. In fact, there are spots rather dull and prosaic. Nor does the thematic material seem to be so vitally co-related or coordinated between the four movements as to make necessary playing without pause for more than half an hour (per the composer's directions).

Gliere's "The Sirens" is new to Brooklyn though heard several times in Manhattan. It is an early opus of a modern Russian composer. The opening passages are built on the Wagnerian idiom but the development and climax are more in the modern school, employing whole-tone scale effects with wailing chromatic glissando passages in the strings and woodwind. The "programme" of Gliere's symphonic poem deals with the fabulous creatures of Greek mythology who lived on an enchanted isle in the middle of the sea. By their alluring songs they enticed the sailors of passing ships, who, captivated by the irresistible music, steared toward the isle of the treacherous siren's, where their vessels were wrecked upon hidden rocks. The composition is divided into five clearly recognizable parts, namely, "The Sea," "The Isle of the Sirens," "Approach of the Vessel," "The Song of the Sirens," The Shipwreck."

Debussy preceded Gliere, it may be recalled, with the same subject, in the third of his Nocturnes for orchestra, "Siren's." But the French composer, more literal than Gliere of Russia, permitted the song of his sirens to be hummed by sixteen sopranos and mezzo-sopranos. And more alluring the effect.

The playing of the orchestra in this number was of the virtuoso order. Mr. Monteux brought to the surface all the salient points in

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BROOKLYN
NEW YORK
EAGLE

JAN 6 - 1924

An Interesting New Singer.

Making his first American tour, Roland Hayes, the negro tenor, will give a recital in the Academy of Music on Saturday evening, Jan. 19.

The singer worked his way up from humble surroundings in the South and won an education and vocal development through his own efforts. The success of his preliminary public appearances encouraged him to try his fortunes in Europe three years ago. He first went to London, where he quickly gained recognition and where he sang by special command for King George in Buckingham Palace. This enthusiasm and popularity was repeated in Paris, and again in Vienna. Mr. Hayes has appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and has given recitals in New York, Boston, Chicago, and other cities of the South and West.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

JAN 6 _ 1924

Henry Hadley Here With Philharmonic

This afternoon at the Academy of Music, Mr. Hadley will conduct the Philharmonic Orchestra, presenting Felix Borowski's "Youth," which had its first New York performance recently under Mr. Hadley's direction, for the first time in Brooklyn. Harold Bauer will be soloist, playing Brahms' B flat Concerto. The Gretry-Mottl ballet music from "Cephale and Procris" and Tchaikovsky's "Nutcracker" suite also will be played.

The last of the three new works which Henry Hadley has selected for his concerts with the Philharmonic Orchestra is "Blue Flower," a tone poem by Carl McKinley, an American composer. "Blue Flower" will have its first hearing at the Metropolitan Opera House on Tuesday evening. Mr. McKinley is at present associated with the musical staff of the Capitol Theatre in New York, and this is his first orchestral work to be heard locally. Harold Bauer will be the soloist, playing Brahms' B flat Concerto. Beethoven's Leonore Overture, No. 3, the prelude and Love Death from "Tristan and Isolde" and Liszt's "The Preuldes," complete the program.

On Thursday evening, at Carnegie Hall, Willem Van Hoogstraten will resume the direction of the Philharmonic Orchestra. The program will consist of Brahms' Fourth Symphony, the Rhapsodie Espagnol by Ravel and Dukas' "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." The program will be repeated in Carnegie Hall, on Friday afternoon.

Mr. Hadley has been invited to be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at that organization's concerts on Feb. 22 and 23, in Boston. Mr. Hadley will appear both as conductor and composer on this occasion.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Pierre Monteux will present Handel's "Concerto Grosso," No. 6; Gliere's symphonic poem, "The Sirens," and Henry F. Gilbert's "Negro Rhapsody," both of which pieces are to have their first performance at these concerts.

The soloist will be Robert Schmitz, French virtuoso, who will play the piano part in D'Indy's "Symphony on a French Mountain Air."

MONDAY SYMPHONY

The Boston debut of Cecilia Hansen, the famous Russian violinist, will add importance to the second Monday Symphony concert on January 14. This remarkable young woman will play Bruch's Concerto in G minor, Tschaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, Smetana's symphonic poem, "The Moldau," and Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture will be conducted by

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

LAWRENCE
MASS. Tribun

DEC - 1923

MONTEAUX AND SYMPHONY

How Famous Leader Deals With His Orchestra and Public Coming Here January 20.

Some orchestral leaders have the reputation of tyrants of controlling the musicians under them by being abusive, and of "educating" reluctant audiences by defiantly hurling unwelcome scores at their heads.

Pierre Monteux, the great conductor who is now fulfilling his fifth season as leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is not of this sort; his method is rather that of quiet persistency. At rehearsals his criticism is unfailingly courteous, if unsparing. He knows precisely what he wants, makes his desire clear, and patiently insists until that effect is obtained to a hair's breadth of exactitude. The players under him perpetually marvel at his wonderfully accurate ear. If a single one of the hundred instruments plays too sharp or too flat the erring musician is politely but firmly called to task.

His audiences Mr. Monteux strives to please with programs which are well ordered and balanced, interesting and eventful in their variety of nationality and period. He has accordingly made himself popular above all others as a compiler of programmes and in this he has always directly moulded public taste toward the best even while pleasing it. This is particularly noticeable in his courageous championship of rising and unrecognized genius, alizing that the daring music of day and tomorrow is apt to strange at first, Mr. Monteux made it famous by making it miliar. His "Concerts Monteux" Paris Casino became generally for pioneer performances—notorious. It was here that Monteux conducted the first formance, now historical of "Rites of Spring" by Stravinsky then considered merely wild lawless, but now universally teemed. The music caused a riot the audience; eggs and all man of vegetables wer thrown. The poli of vegetables were thrown. The poli managed to escape, although his hat did not. The public had heard the music, and therefore Monteux repeated it the following week.

These innovations are not always popular at the time, but later when the music becomes understood and appreciated Mr. Monteux thanked for his efforts. In his present post, while always giving standard favorites of the orchestral repertory their due predominance, he has revealed his evident instinct for singling out new genius, American and foreign.

Symphony orchestra will be here at the Colonial theatre here Sunday afternoon, January 20.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK
TIMES

Music Notes Afield

FOLLOWING its statement published in the program book of the subscribers who have been helping cover its annual deficit, the Boston Symphony Orchestra publishes its financial record for the last three seasons. From this it appears that the deficit was reduced from $121,000 in 1921 to $97,000 and $83,000 in 1923, which an little below

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK
TIMES

- 1924

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK
AMERICAN

JAN 6 - 1924

Boston Orchestra in a Hodge Podge of Old-time Music

By GRENA BENNETT.

Yesterday afternoon's programme of Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall was a hodge-podge of good old-fashioned music, charming, poetic melodies, and the ravings of a modern cacophonist.

In the first class were Brahms with his magnificent "Tragic" overture superbly interpreted, and Mozart's E flat Concerto featuring Jacques Thibaud and his beautiful violin artistry.

Ravel's excerpts from "Daphnis et Chloe," like delicate rhymes intoned with grace, constituted the poetic part of the programme.

But the feature was Bliss's so-called "Color" symphony, which was introduced locally at yesterday's event. The British composer may, as the programme stated, have found inspiration in different tints, but it cannot be said that his hearers discovered any distinguishing colors in the various sections of his symphony. With the same futile result he might have entitled the movements North, South, East and West, or even Spring, Summer, Autumn and Winter and reached.

His "Purple" first movement contained fragments of Irish folk song throttled in clangour. The "Red" section was a veritable anarchy of clashing instruments with occasional passages suggesting the wailing oboe and staccato drum taps of the midway plaisaunce.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

SYMPHONY
.. His Orchestra and His
..anuary 20.

..and unrecognized genius ..
.. that the daring music of ..
..nd tomorrow is apt to sou..
.. at first, Mr. Monteux ..
..t famous by making it ..
His "Concerts Monteux" ..
Casino became generally no..
..pioneer performances—alm..
..ous. It was here that ..
..ux conducted the first p..
..nce, now historical of ..
.. of Spring" by Stravinsk..
considered merely wild ..
.., but now universally ..
.. The music caused a riot ..
..udience; eggs and all mann..
..getables wer thrown. The poli..
..etables were thrown. The poli..
..ged to escape, although his ..
..id not. The public had ..
.. the music, and therefore M..
..ux repeated it the followin..

..e innovations are not alway..
.. at the time, but later ..
..the music becomes understoo..
..ppreciated Mr. Monteux ..
.. for his efforts. In his pres..
.. while always giving the..
.. favorites of the orchestral..
.. their due predominance,..
..evealed his evident instinct..
..ing out new genius, both ..
.. and foreign.
..ony orchestra will be heard..
..olonial theatre here Sunday..
.. January 20.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK
TIMES

..N6 - 1924

.. Orchestra presented Stuart ..
.. suite, conducted by the ..
..s present work is a com..
.. to his "Rhapsodie on a ..
.. for piano and orchestra,..
..ployed the modern idiom.
..written in the eighteenth ..
..r and his score is said to ..
.. charm of Mozart and ..
..ut slavish imitation."

..Y LATEST
.. Romeike
..LIPPINGS
..ST., NEW YORK
..ea 8860

..G FROM
..ORK
..S ..924

.. to be ..
.. Sym-
..anization's
.. Boston.
.. as con-

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK
HERALD

JAN 6 1924

New Operas and All-Hofmann Recital Shared the Interest

Arthur Bliss's Color Symphony Played and Stransky Led the State Symphony, but the Lion of the Day Was Scotti.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

THE last week was one of the most interesting of the musical season. It was crowded with incidents of no small importance and leave.. upon the mind an impression of whirling confusion. Four ne.. operas were produced. Mr. Scotti's twenty-fifth year with the Metropolita.. was commemorated in festal manner with music and banquet, a whol.. concert was devoted to the works of Josef Hofmann, the Boston Symphon.. Orchestra revealed to us Arthur Bliss's color symphony and Mr. Stransk.. led the State Symphonists into the promised land of the Parisian Six.

With all these contributions to the intellectual welfare of the com.. munity the chroniclers of musical doings found their attention burdene.. and their descriptive powers taxed. And now that the hour of retrospe.. is here the outstanding incident is the celebration of the unwearied bar.. tone, who for twenty-five years has (to recall Spartacus) met upon th.. arena every form of tenor or soprano that the broad empire of Rom.. could furnish and has never yet flinched.

Supercilious comment might be made with facility on the futility .. offering great art works in rivalry to a great operatic impersonator. Th.. four new operas caused less of a stir in the town than the Scotti celebra.. tion. But a candid consideration of the circumstances forbids the utte.. ance of words of regret. The human interest story is always a good stor.. Operas may come and operas do go but Scotti has gone on for twenty-fiv.. years. It was not a jest that .. ..ed him an institution.

..diction Fulfilled..

..SEVENTH AVE.
NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From
TELEGRAM
New York City
JAN 7 1924

Boston Symphony in "Color" Symphony

Colors have always attracted the musical experimenter. Many a composer has tried to find some means of suggesting color by means of sound, but Arthur Bliss, whose "Color" symphony was played for the first time here yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has succeeded as little as his predecessors. Judging from Mr. Bliss' music, there is absolutely no connection between color and sound. His first movement was called "Purple." Then followed "Red," "Blue" and "Green." One was as expressive as the other, and as colorful. Because Mr. Bliss failed to make "Purple" anything but a rather agreeable combination of tones, is no reflection on his work, judged as music. His symphony is a cleverly conceived musical work. He is a modern, but he has not lost all hold on the past. He orchestrates skilfully. In fact the "Color" symphony, to use its British title, is rather a good composition. It was brilliantly played by the men from Boston under the leadership of Pierre Monteux. The soloist yesterday was Jacques Phubaud, whose beautifully refined playing was heard at its best in Mozart's violin concerto in E flat (K. 268). Other orchestral selections were Brahms' Tragic Overture and the first "Daphnis and Cloe" suite of Ravel.

Ignaz Friedman, a pianist with a scintillating technique, gave a recital of Chopin's music yesterday afternoon in Aeolian Hall. The B minor sonata was played superbly. And many of the smaller pieces were charming as he interpreted them.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK
TELEGRAPH

JAN 6 - 1924

MUSIC

By ESTHER SAYLES ROOT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Pierre Monteux with Jacques Thibaud as soloist presented one of the richest programs of the season yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. If it were possible to reproduce in words the effect of fine orchestral playing, if "sonorit.." and "thrilling crescendo" can conve.. even approach the aesthetic deligh.. certain moments yesterday after.. then the thousands might save themse.. the trouble of going to the concert .. and let some writer do the business .. them, retire to his fireside and write .. monograph.

But such a translation of sound .. words is at best a poor thing. Let it .. said of the Brahms "Tragic Overture" which opened the program, that it wa.. given a stirring performance. The fact that the strings and horns were not always perfectly together is data, if that is what's wanted. The greater fact remains that Mr. Monteux induced from the orchestra a beautiful reading of the work.

The "Color Symphony" of Arthur Bliss was the novelty of the occasion. This admits of more comment, for the translation of color into sound, however emotionally derived, is intellectually achieved. The music itself, like the Brahms and the Mozart and Ravel which followed, uses its own language, but the idea of asking the audience to shut its eyes and open its ears to the rainbow encourages discussion.

Purple was the first color. The music set out in straightforward march time with a weird melody in the horns, supported frequently by pizzicati in the strings. It was rather lively for purple, but dark strands of sound braiding and unbraiding below the brighter gaiety of brass and woodwind made a balance that in its climax took on a regal splendor.

Red was the next—a scherzo movement—"the color of rubies, wine, revelry, furnaces, courage and magic." This was the most exciting, both in its riotous rhythm and its piquant instrumentation which used harp, piccolo, triangle and cymbals with an effect of real brightness. The slow red of dawn was not forgotten in a lovely interlude given to the strings. The movement ended with a bang-bang on the base drum, and the full orchestra blaring out a dissonance.

Then came blue, now sombre, now wistful, borne along on a wave-like motion, reminiscent of Debussy's "Nuages." One device used with great effect by Mr. Bliss is to give the melody to the horns who leap away from the undercurrent of the orchestra and, by strange intervals, reach a high note and hold it until the mass marches up in a series of harmonic progressions until it finds the same ground.

The last movement, green—"the color of emeralds, hope, spring and victory"—is given a large contrapuntal treatment which grows into a climax of such extent that all the elements of the spectrum seem to be fighting a polyphonic battle for first place. It seemed overweighted and monotonous toward the end, but eminently successful in that the best phrase for it is "full of color."

The concepts which the composer has endeavored to portray are the world concepts of the colors. They appeal to subconscious associations and, therefore, are likely to satisfy, in the main, the individual. The music is serious and compelling and the titles are valuable chiefly because each one includes a group of ideas which could not otherwise be expressed with such brevity or such personal appeal.

The audience was wild with enthusiasm and called Mr. Bliss again and again to the stage to receive an ovation, of which Mr. Monteux and the orchestra had their share.

The Mozart Concerto (Koechel No. 268) was played by Mr. Thibaud with a poetry which could not be surpassed. The adagio movement was of such heavenly perfection that when it was finished the audience groaned with delight before it started to applaud.

The program closed with Ravel's "Orchestral Fragments."

..8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK
TRIBUNE

JAN 6 - 1924

"Sacre du Printemps," New to New York, To Be Played Here

Stravinsky's Famous Work on Forthcoming Programs of Two Orchestras; A Description of the Music and the Original Ballet

By Lawrence Gilman

THE announcement that both Mr. Mengelberg, with the Philharmonic, and Mr. Monteux, with the Boston Symphony, are to exhibit to us before long Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" revives in us an old perplexity. We have often thought that it would be difficult to explain to an inquiring guest critic from Mars why it is that one of the most famous scores of our time has never been heard in New York. The concert version of "Le Sacre du Printemps" has been repeatedly performed abroad by Pierre Monteux, Sergei Koussevitzky, Eugène Goossens and others. In London, indeed, the work is almost as old a story as the C minor Symphony of Brahms; but New York, the most backward of musical capitals, has yet to hear it. The sleepless Mr. Stokowski, who lets few things escape him, performed "Le Sacre du Printemps" in Philadelphia, for the first time in America, two seasons ago (March 3, 1922); but, for reasons best known to himself, he did not disclose it to New York. There are doubtless good reasons why Mr. Damrosch, Mr. Mengelberg, Mr. Stransky, Mr. Monteux and our other orchestral providers have withheld the work from their respective publics, though we are unable to guess what those reasons may be. Our alert conductors cannot have felt any doubt as to the artistic importance of the work. For even musicians who do not belong to the Extreme Left have frankly recognized the extraordinary power and originality of the music.

In view of the approaching performances of the work, it may not be amiss to take a look at it in this place, since no detailed description of it has ever been made generally available for American music-lovers. The orchestral score is published, and may be had in the convenient pocket ..dition issued by the Russische Musik Verlag.

* * *

..Stravinsky's unprecedented work, .. its original incarnation as a ballet, ..s designated by its sub-title as "Ta..ux of Pagan Russia, in Two Parts." ..as produced for the first time by ..aghileff at the Théâtre des Champs ..ysées, Paris, on May 29, 1913, with ..cenario by Nicholas Roerich and ..eography by Nijinsky. Stravinsky ..posed the music in 1912-'13, shortly ..re he finished "Le Rossignol." Its ..ption at Paris was uproarious, with ..obligato of hissing, cat-calls and ..uffs, and counter demonstrations ..e well disposed. The ballet was .. in London durin.. ..and thereafter..

..ding and tearing, not in ..estroy, but in order to .. is not the sound of death ..down and in, but of life ..hewing and tearing apart .. birth may issue out."

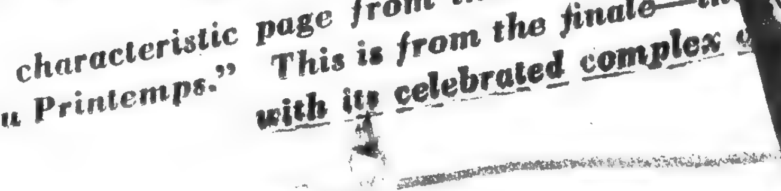
..s preferred to find in Stravinsky's ballet, behind the outward pretext of a Rite, the deeper thought of "the marvelous power inherent in all nature to grow, to develop, and to assume new forms. This power is so great that it affects nature herself with a tremor, expressing itself in uneasiness at the critical period of adolescence in all living things. It is that tremor, that inner disturbance, which is the underlying thought of 'Le Sacre du Printemps.'"

* * *

The work is in ..



A characteristic page from the orchestral .. du Printemps." This is from the finale—th.. with its celebrated complex ..

..FENWICK
..ONEL ..
..LLABY
.. WEEK AND
..THE SEASON'S
..ATIONAL HIT!
..D HEALTH FOR 1924

..ORK
..Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK
HERALD

JAN 6 1924

MUSIC

By W. J. HENDERSON.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The second afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday in Carnegie Hall. The program comprised Brahms's "Tragic Overture," Arthur Bliss's "Color Symphony," Mozart's E flat violin concerto and the first series of orchestral fragments from the "Daphnis and Chloe" of Maurice Ravel. The violinist was Jacques Thibaud, the distinguished French artist, long and favorably known to this public.

The novelty of the concert was Mr. Bliss's composition, which was first performed at a festival of the Three Choirs at Gloucester, England, on September 7, 1922. It is not a red, white and blue symphony. The composer has made no attempt to translate the painter's palette into terms of tone. He has done just what any sane musician might be expected to do, namely, to give his fancy free rein amid the suggestions offered by the things colors are supposed to represent.

The first movement unfolds itself from the associations of purple, "the color of amethysts, pageantry, royalty and death." The second movement treats of red, "the color of rubies, wine, revelry, furnaces, courage and magic"—a "tall order" as a British commentator remarked on the purpose of "Also sprach Zarathustra." The third or scherzo represents blue, "the color of sapphires, deep water, skies, loyalty and melancholy," and the finale deals with green, the color of "emeralds, hope, joy, youth, spring and victory."

Several things may be said for Mr. Bliss. The most important is that although he is modern the diatonic scale has no terrors for him nor is he in the least perturbed in the presence of a tune.

His symphony is melodious through.. ..nd there is among his thematic .. finely drawn kinship which .. four movements a family ..ance. We should say that the ..e from Ireland, that the .. on the heather somewhere .. Bog of Allen, the red on .. of the Mournes, the blue in ..es of the colleens and the green .. the emerald all over the country. ..e composition has originality which ..trays no sign of painful effort. The ..elodic idiom is apparently natural .. the man, and his spontaneous and ..affected use of modern harmonies .. delightful.

There is no profundity of development, although there is a burst of jocund counterpoint in the wood wind in the second subject of the finale. But on the whole Mr. Bliss sings his way quite irresponsibly through the compositions, ignoring the authority of the fathers and the appetites of the concert goers with equal self-assurance.

It is always pleasant to behold a young man who apes no one and carries himself with a fine air of confidence, yet holds something in his soul that clamors for utterance and can be uttered without offense except to the aged who dislike the disturbing sounds of progress and wish only to be left alone with their memories. Mr. Bliss has not overset the seven hills nor has he created an epoch, but he has written an interesting and stimulating symphony quite worth hearing and capable of stirring up the smoldering embers of a damply burning season. The work was very well performed by the gentlemen of Boston under the careful guidance of Mr. Monteux.

Mr. Thibaud played Mozart as if he enjoyed the task. Many artists play him as if it were a sacred duty they owed to their art. Mr. Thibaud's tone was ravishing in its purity and crystalline quality. His bowing was clean and elastic and his intonation unerring. He read the concerto with taste and without any attempt to pu..

ne..
tle. wine into the beautiful old bottle. It was a very pretty delivery and ..de the hearers happy.

[redacted]

SYMPHONY
His Orchestra and His January 20.

and unrecognized genius,
that the daring music of nd tomorrow is apt to so e at first, Mr. Monteux
it famous by making it
His "Concerts Monteux"
Casino became generally no
pioneer performances—alm
ous. It was here that ux conducted the first nce, now historical, of
of Spring" by Stravinsk
considered merely wild s, but now universally
d. The music caused a riot
udience; eggs and all mann
getables were thrown. The poli
ed to escape, although his id not. The public had
the music, and therefore M
ux repeated it the followin

innovations are not alway
at the time, but later
the music becomes understoo
ppreciated Mr. Monteux
ed for his efforts. In his pre ost, while always giving the
rd favorites of the orchestral ry their due predominance, revealed his evident instinct gling out new genius, both n and foreign.
hony orchestra will be heard Colonial theatre here Sunday
n, January 20.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES

JAN 6 - 1924

n Orchestra presented Stuart
suite, conducted by the
his present work is a com-
to his "Rhapsodie on a
for piano and orchestra,
employed the modern idiom.
written in the eighteenth ser and his score is said to charm of Mozart and
out slavish imitation."

Romeike
CLIPPINGS
H ST., NEW YORK
Chelsea 8860

PING FROM YORK
ES

1924 to be Boston Symrganization's

Boston.
oth as con-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD

JAN 6 1924

New Operas and All-Hofmann Recital Shared the Interest

Arthur Bliss's Color Symphony Played and Stransky Led the State Symphony, but the Lion of the Day Was Scotti.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

THE last week was one of the most interesting of the musical season It was crowded with incidents of no small importance and leave upon the mind an impression of whirling confusion. Four ne operas were produced. Mr. Scotti's twenty-fifth year with the Metropolita was commemorated in festal manner with music and banquet, a whol concert was devoted to the works of Josef Hofmann, the Boston Sympho Orchestra revealed to us Arthur Bliss's color symphony and Mr. Strans led the State Symphonists into the promised land of the Parisian Six.

With all these contributions to the intellectual welfare of the com munity the chroniclers of musical doings found their attention burdene and their descriptive powers taxed. And now that the hour of retrosp is here the outstanding incident is the celebration of the unwearied bar tone, who for twenty-five years has (to recall Spartacus) met upon t arena every form of tenor or soprano that the broad empire of Rom could furnish and has never yet flinched.

Supercilious comment might be made with facility on the futility offering great art works in rivalry to a great operatic impersonator. Th four new operas caused less of a stir in the town than the Scotti celebra tion. But a candid consideration of the circumstances forbids the utte ance of words of regret. The human interest story is always a good stor Operas may come and operas do go but Scotti has gone on for twenty-fiv years. It was not a jest that ed him an institution.

ediction Fulfilled.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TRIBUNE

JAN 6 - 1924

"Sacre du Printemps," New to New York, To Be Played Here

Stravinsky's Famous Work on Forthcoming Programs of Two Orchestras; A Description of the Music and the Original Ballet

By Lawrence Gilman

THE announcement that both Mr. Mengelberg, with the Philharmonic, and Mr. Monteux, with the Boston Symphony, are to exhibit to us before long Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" revives in us an old perplexity. We have often thought that it would be difficult to explain to an inquiring guest critic from Mars why it is that one of the most famous scores of our time has never been heard in New York. The concert version of "Le Sacre du Printemps" has been repeatedly performed abroad by Pierre Monteux, Sergei Koussevitzky, Eugène Goossens and others. In London, indeed, the work is almost as old a story as the C minor Symphony of Brahms; but New York, the most backward of musical capitals, has yet to hear it. The sleepless Mr. Stokowski, who lets few things escape him, performed "Le Sacre du Printemps" in Philadelphia, for the first time in America, two seasons ago (March 3, 1922); but, for reasons best known to himself, he did not disclose it to New York. There are doubtless good reasons why Mr. Damrosch, Mr. Mengelberg, Mr. Stransky, Mr. Monteux and our other orchestral providers have withheld the work from their respective publics, though we are unable to guess what those reasons may be. Our alert conductors cannot have felt any doubt as to the artistic importance of the work. For even musicians who do not belong to the Extreme Left have frankly recognized the extraordinary power and originality of the music.

In view of the approaching performances of the work, it may not be amiss to take a look at it in this place, since no detailed description of it has ever been made generally available for American music-lovers. The orchestral score is published, and may be had in the convenient pocket dition issued by the Russische Musik Verlag.

* * *

Stravinsky's unprecedented work, its original incarnation as a ballet, as designated by its sub-title as "Tableaux of Pagan Russia, in Two Parts." was produced for the first time by Diaghileff at the Théâtre des Champs Elysées, Paris, on May 29, 1913, with scenario by Nicholas Roerich and choreography by Nijinsky. Stravinsky composed the music in 1912-'13, shortly re he finished "Le Rossignol." Its ption at Paris was uproarious, with bbligato of hissing, cat-calls and uffs, and counter demonstrations e well disposed. The ballet was in London during the summer of and there was a concert performof the music the following year ris, under Pierre Monteux. On , 1921, Eugène Goossens produced rk in concert form at Queen's ondon, for the first time in causing extraordinary pubment and a cloud of critical, and dialectical dust the like ad not been known since the gotten days when Richard Zarathustra" and "Helden- "Don Quixote" were new ping of the visible and through movement." unseen forces, said an- ator at the time of the rformances, "but also all isible things in nature, aspects of animal, vege- neral life participate in ite. Stravinsky's genius istruments of their usual sentimental associations them instead expressions ce from which they spring. es the significance of their the world of nature and ble that conflict which is ding and tearing, not in estroy, but in order to is not the sound of death down and in, but of life hewing and tearing apart birth may issue out."

* * *

ans preferred to find in Stravinsky's ballet, behind the outward pretext of a Rite, the deeper thought of "the marvelous power inherent in all nature to grow, to develop, and to assume new forms. This power is so great that it affects nature herself with a tremor, expressing itself in uneasiness at the critical period of adolescence in all living things. It is that tremor, that inner disturbance, which is the underlying thought of 'Le Sacre du Printemps.'"

* * *

The work is in two parts. The subject of the first part is the fertility of the earth; that of the second part is concerned with the sacrifice.

There is first an Introduction, a section of seventy-five bars in slow tempo, designed to suggest "the mystery of the physical world in spring." The orchestral color here is derived chiefly from the woodwind, for Stravinsky is said to mistrust the strings because of their "facile expressiveness," and to prefer the "dryness" of the woodwind as conveying a "more austere" variety of truth. Some, hearing certain passages in this Introduction, will conclude that there were fauns and naiads in prehistoric Rus-strings, horns and woodwind, later for the full orchestra. The harmonization at the start is in no degree suggestive of the procedures of the ungodly, although the tonal atmosphere becomes increasingly acrid. Another ceremonial follows, a sort of community contest ("Jeux des Cités Rivals": molto allegro, in rapidly changing rhythms); the principal motif is a phrase harmonized for the most part in blameless thirds.

Then appears, with processional solemnity, the Sage, the most venerable member of the tribe. He is the Celebrant, whose function it is to consecrate the soil for its coming renewal. Announced by four tubas, bass drums, timpani, tam-tam, low strings, horns and woodwind, he enters imposingly, bearded to his feet, his white locks brushing his elbows. He prostrates himself, blesses the soil and invokes its rejuvenation. A "Dance de la Terre" (Prestissimo) carries the first part of the ballet to a tumultuous and abrupt conclusion.

* * *

The second part opens with an Introduction (Largo) to which Stravinsky is the title, "The pets.

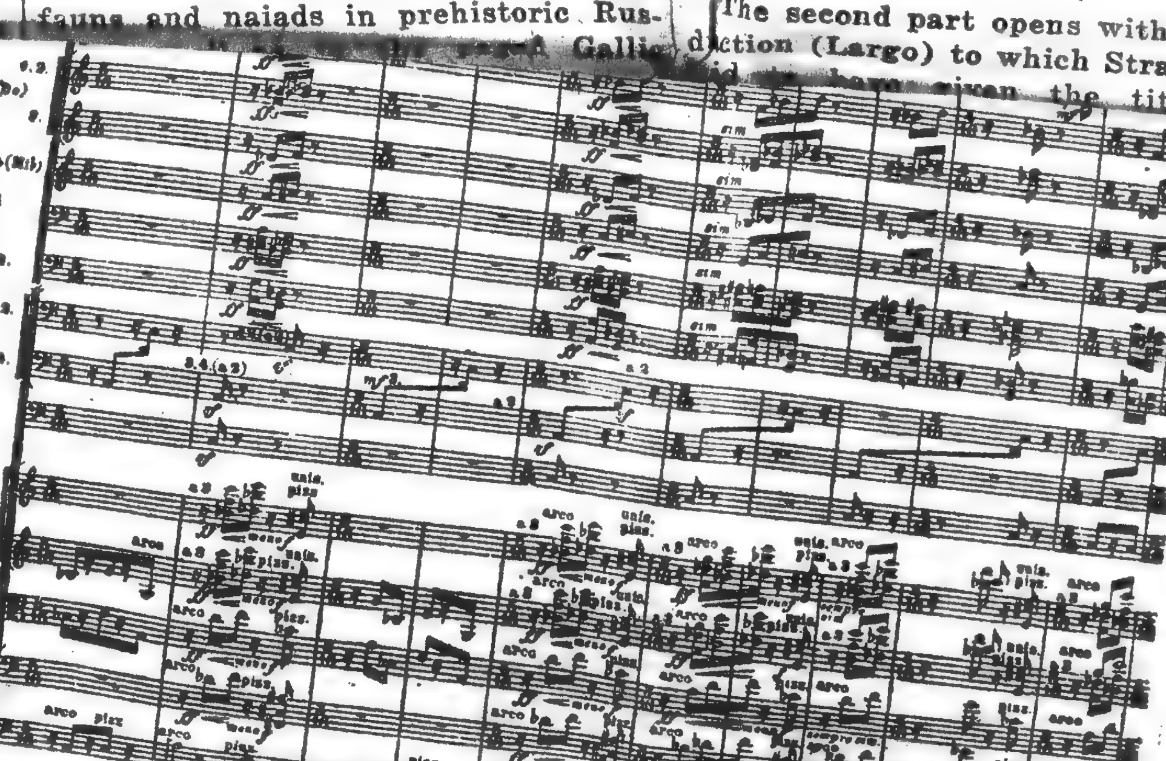
Now the elected victim, who far remained motionless throughout these activities, begins her sacrifice; for the final act of propitiation has been demanded and she must dance herself to death. This she proceeds to do, while the music expresses the mystical rapture of this invocation of vernal fertility in rhythms that attain an overwhelming climax of paroxysmal frenzy. There is nothing in music like this stupendous Finale of "Le Sacre du Printemps," with its audacious and indescribably exciting alternations of meter—bars of 5-16, 3-16, 2-16, 4-16—and its delirious culmination as the victim falls dead.

* *

Stravinsky's score is often (despite its reputation) surprisingly simple, and it is almost throughout superb in the power and mastery with which it handles this new counterpoint of timbres and rhythms and tonalities



A characteristic page from the orchestral score of Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps." This is from the finale—the sacrificial dance of death, with its celebrated complex of rhythms.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD

JAN 6 1924

MUSIC

By W. J. HENDERSON.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The second afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday in Carnegie Hall. The program comprised Brahms's "Tragic Overture," Arthur Bliss's "Color Symphony," Mozart's E flat violin concerto and the first series of orchestral fragments from the "Daphnis and Chloe" of Maurice Ravel. The violinist was Jacques Thibaud, the distinguished French artist, long and favorably known to this public.

The novelty of the concert was Mr. Bliss's composition, which was first performed at a festival of the Three Choirs at Gloucester, England, on September 7, 1922. It is not a red, white and blue symphony. The composer has made no attempt to translate the painter's palette into terms of tone. He has done just what any sane musician might be expected to do, namely, to give his fancy free rein amid the suggestions offered by the things colors are supposed to represent.

The first movement unfolds itself from the associations of purple, "the color of amethysts, pageantry, royalty and death." The second movement treats of red, "the color of rubies, wine, revelry, furnaces, courage and m new tle. wine into the beautiful old bottle. It was a very pretty delivery and the hearers happy.

SEVENTH AVE.
NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From TELEGRAM JAN 7 1924
New York City

Boston Symphony in "Color" Symphony

Colors have always attracted the musical experimenter. Many a composer has tried to find some means of suggesting color by means of sound, but Arthur Bliss, whose "Color" symphony was played for the first time here yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has succeeded as little as his predecessors. Judging from Mr. Bliss' music, there is absolutely no connection between color and sound. His first movement was called "Purple." Then followed "Red," "Blue" and "Green." One was as expressive as the other, and as colorful Because Mr. Bliss failed to make "Purple" anything but a rather agreeable combination of tones, is no reflection on his work, judged as music. His symphony is a cleverly conceived musical work. He is a modern, but he has not lost all hold on the past. He orchestrates skilfully. In fact the "Color" symphony, to use its British title, is rather a good composition. It was brilliantly played by the men from Boston under the leadership of Pierre Monteux. The soloist yesterday was Jacques Phubaud, whose beautifully refined playing was heard at its best in Mozart's violin concerto in E flat (K. 268). Other orchestral selections were Brahms' Tragic Overture and the first "Daphnis and Cloe" suite of Ravel.

Ignaz Friedman, a pianist with a scintillating technique, gave a recital of Chopin's music yesterday afternoon in Aeolian Hall. The B minor sonata was played superbly. And many of the smaller pieces were charming as he interpreted them.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TELEGRAPH

JAN 6 - 1924

MUSIC

By ESTHER SAYLES ROOT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Pierre Monteux with Jacques Thibaud as soloist presented one of the richest programs of the season yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. If it were possible to reproduce in words the effect of fine orchestral playing, if "sonority" and "thrilling crescendo" can convey or even approach the aesthetic delight of certain moments yesterday afternoon, then the thousands might save themselves the trouble of going to the concert hall, and let some writer do the business for them, retire to his fireside and write a monograph.

But such a translation of sound words is at best a poor thing. Let it said of the Brahms "Tragic Overture which opened the program, that it wa given a stirring performance. The fa that the strings and horns were not ways perfectly together is data, if t is what's wanted. The greater fact mains that Mr. Monteux induced f the orchestra a beautiful reading of work.

The "Color Symphony" of Arthur was the novelty of the occasion. admits of more comment, for the t lation of color into sound, however tionally derived, is intellectually achi The music itself, like the Brahms the Mozart and Ravel which foll uses its own language, but the ide asking the audience to shut its eyes open its ears to the rainbow encou discussion.

Purple was the first color. The set out in straightforward march with a weird melody in the horns, ported frequently by pizzicati in strings. It was rather lively for pu but dark strands of sound braiding unbraiding below the brighter gaiet brass and woodwind made a bal that in its climax took on a regal sp dor.

Red was the next—a scherzo m ment—"the color of rubies, win elry, furnaces, courage and magic," was the most exciting, both in its ous rhythm and its piquant instrume tion which used harp, piccolo, triangle and cymbals with an effect of real brightness. The slow red of dawn was not forgotten in a lovely interlude given to the strings. The movement ended with a bang-bang on the base drum, and the full orchestra blaring out a dissonance.

Then came blue, now sombre, now wistful, borne along on a wave-like motion, reminiscent of Debussy's "Nuages." One device used with great effect by Mr. Bliss is to give the melody to the horns who leap away from the undercurrent of the orchestra and, by strange intervals, reach a high note and hold it until the mass marches up in a series of harmon is given a large contrapuntal which grows into a climax of such extent that all the elements of the spectrum seem to be fighting a polyphonic battle for first place. It seemed overweighted and monotonous toward the end, but eminently successful in that the best phrase for it is "full of color."

The concepts which the composer has endeavored to portray are the world concepts of the colors. They appeal to subconscious associations and, therefore, are likely to satisfy, in the main, the individual. The music is serious and compelling and the titles are valuable chiefly because each one includes a group of ideas which could not otherwise be expressed with such brevity or such personal appeal.

The audience was wild with enthusiasm and called Mr. Bliss again and again to the stage to receive an ovation, of which Mr. Monteux and the orchestra had their share.

The Mozart Concerto (Koechel No. 268) was played by Mr. Thibaud with a poetry which could not be surpassed. The adagio movement was of such heavenly perfection that when it was finished the audience groaned with delight before it started to applaud.

The program closed with Ravel's "Orchestral Fragments."

[170]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

SYMPHONY
His Orchestra and His January 20.

g and unrecognized genius.
ng that the daring music of
and tomorrow is apt to sco
ge at first, Mr. Monteux
it famous by making it
r. His "Concerts Monteux" Casino became generally no
pioneer performances—alm
ious. It was here that eux conducted the first p
ance, now historical ,of t
s of Spring" by Stravinsk considered merely wild a ss, but now universally
d. The music caused a riot
udience; eggs and all mann
getables wer thrown. The poli
etables were thrown. The poli ged to escape, although his t id not. The public had n
the music, and therefore M
ux repeated it the followin

se innovations are not alway
r at the time, but later o
the music becomes understoo
ppreciated Mr. Monteux
ed for his efforts. In his pres
ost, while always giving the
rd favorites of the orchestral
ory their due predominance,
revealed his evident instinct ngling out new genius, both
can and foreign.
phony orchestra will be heard Colonial theatre here Sunday
on, January 20.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES

6 - 1924

on Orchestra presented Stuart
ew suite, conducted by the
His present work is a com-ast to his "Rhapsodie on a r," for piano and orchestra,
employed the modern idiom.
s written in the eighteenth nner and his score is said to e charm of Mozart and thout slavish imitation."

ST BY ATTEST

nal Romeike
S CLIPPINGS
9TH ST., NEW YORK
Chelsea 8860

LIPPING FROM V YORK
IMES

- 1924

been invited to be
the Boston Sym-hat organization's nd 28 in Boston.
ar both as con-

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK
HERALD

JAN 6 1924

New Operas and All-Hofmann Recital Shared the Interest

Arthur Bliss's Color Symphony Played and Stransky Led the State Symphony, but the Lion of the Day Was Scotti.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

THE last week was one of the most interesting of the musical season It was crowded with incidents of no small importance and leave upon the mind an impression of whirling confusion. Four ne operas were produced. Mr. Scotti's twenty-fifth year with the Metropolita was commemorated in festal manner with music and banquet, a whol concert was devoted to the works of Josef Hofmann, the Boston Symphon Orchestra revealed to us Arthur Bliss's color symphony and Mr. Stransk led the State Symphonists into the promised land of the Parisian Six.

With all these contributions to the intellectual welfare of the com munity the chroniclers of musical doings found their attention burdene and their descriptive powers taxed. And now that the hour of retrospe is here the outstanding incident is the celebration of the unwearied bar tone, who for twenty-five years has (to recall Spartacus) met upon th arena every form of tenor or soprano that the broad empire of Rom could furnish and has never yet flinched.

Supercilious comment might be made with facility on the futility offering great art works in rivalry to a great operatic impersonator. Th four new operas caused less of a stir in the town than the Scotti celebra tion. But a candid consideration of the circumstances forbids the utte ance of words of regret. The human interest story is always a good stor Operas may come and operas do go but Scotti has gone on for twenty-fiv years. It was not a jest that ed him an institution.

ediction Fulfilled.

SEVENTH AVE.
NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From TELEGRAM JAN 7 1924
New York City

Boston Symphony in "Color" Symphony

Colors have always attracted the musical experimenter. Many a composer has tried to find some means of suggesting color by means of sound, but Arthur Bliss, whose "Color" symphony was played for the first time here yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has succeeded as little as his predecessors. Judging from Mr. Bliss' music, there is absolutely no connection between color and sound. His first movement was called "Purple." Then followed "Red," "Blue" and "Green." One was as expressive as the other, and as colorful Because Mr. Bliss failed to make "Purple" anything but a rather agreeable combination of tones, is no reflection on his work, judged as music. His symphony is a cleverly conceived musical work. He is a modern, but he has not lost all hold on the past. He orchestrates skilfully. In fact the "Color" symphony, to use its British title, is rather a good composition. It was brilliantly played by the men from Boston under the leadership of Pierre Monteux. The soloist yesterday was Jacques Phubaud, whose beautifully refined playing was heard at its best in Mozart's violin concerto in E flat (K. 268). Other orchestral selections were Brahms' Tragic Overture and the first "Daphnis and Cloe" suite of Ravel.

Ignaz Friedman, a pianist with a scintillating technique, gave a recital of Chopin's music yesterday afternoon in Aeolian Hall. The B minor sonata was played superbly. And many of the smaller pieces were charming as he interpreted them.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TELEGRAPH

JAN 6 - 1924

MUSIC

By ESTHER SAYLES ROOT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, ducted by Pierre Monteux with Jacq Thibaud as soloist presented one of richest programs of the season yester afternoon at Carnegie Hall. If it possible to reproduce in words the ef of fine orchestral playing, if "sonor and "thrilling crescendo" can convey even approach the aesthetic delight certain moments yesterday afterno then the thousands might save themse the trouble of going to the concert h and let some writer do the business them, retire to his fireside and write monograph.

But such a translation of sound i words is at best a poor thing. Let it said of the Brahms "Tragic Overture, which opened the program, that it wa given a stirring performance. The fact that the strings and horns were not always perfectly together is data, if that is what's wanted. The greater fact remains that Mr. Monteux induced from the orchestra a beautiful reading of the work.

The "Color Symphony" of Arthur Bliss was the novelty of the occasion. This admits of more comment, for the translation of color into sound, however emotionally derived, is intellectually achieved. The music itself, like the Brahms and the Mozart and Ravel which followed, uses its own language, but the idea of asking the audience to shut its eyes and open its ears to the rainbow encourages discussion.

Purple was the first color. The music set out in straightforward march time with a weird melody in the horns, supported frequently by pizzicati in the strings. It was rather lively for purple, but dark strands of sound braiding and unbraiding below the brighter gaiety of brass and woodwind made a balance that in its climax took on a regal splendor.

Red was the next—a scherzo movement—"the color of rubies, wine, revelry, furnaces, courage and magic." This was the most exciting, both in its riotous rhythm and its piquant instrumentation which used harp, piccolo, triangle and cymbals with an effect of real brightness. The slow red of dawn was not forgotten in a lovely interlude given to the strings. The movement ended with a bang-bang on the base drum, and the full orchestra blaring out a dissonance.

Then came blue, now sombre, now wistful, borne along on a wave-like motion, reminiscent of Debussy's "Nuages." One device used with great effect by Mr. Bliss is to give the melody to the horns who leap away from the undercurrent of the orchestra and, by strange intervals, reach a high note and hold it until the mass marches up in a series of harmonic progressions until it finds the same ground.

The last movement, green—"the color of emeralds, hope, spring and victory"—is given a large contrapuntal treatment which grows into a climax of such extent that all the elements of the spectrum seem to be fighting a polyphonic battle for first place. It seemed overweighted and monotonous toward the end, but eminently successful in that the best phrase for it is "full of color."

The concepts which the composer has endeavored to portray are the world concepts of the colors. They appeal to subconscious associations and, therefore, are likely to satisfy, in the main, the individual. The music is serious and compelling and the titles are valuable chiefly because each one includes a group of ideas which could not otherwise be expressed with such brevity or such personal appeal.

The audience was wild with enthusiasm and called Mr. Bliss again and again to the stage to receive an ovation, of which Mr. Monteux and the orchestra had their share.

The Mozart Concerto (Koechel No. 268) was played by Mr. Thibaud with a poetry which could not be surpassed. The adagio movement was of such heavenly perfection that when it was finished the audience groaned with delight before it started to applaud.

The program closed with Ravel's "Orchestral Fragments."

8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK
TRIBUNE

JAN 6 - 1924

"Sacre du Printemps," New to New York, To Be Played Here

Stravinsky's Famous Work on Forthcoming Programs of Two Orchestras; A Description of the Music and the Original Ballet

By Lawrence Gilman

THE announcement that both Mr. Mengelberg, with the Philharmonic, and Mr. Monteux, with the Boston Symphony, are to exhibit to us before long Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" revives in us an old perplexity. We have often thought that it would be difficult to explain to an inquiring guest critic from Mars why it is that one of the most famous scores of our time has never been heard in New York. The concert version of "Le Sacre du Printemps" has been repeatedly performed abroad by Pierre Monteux, Sergei Koussevitzky, Eugène Goossens and others. In London, indeed, the work is almost as old a story as the C minor Symphony of Brahms; but New York, the most backward of musical capitals, has yet to hear it. The sleepless Mr. Stokowski, who lets few things escape him, performed "Le Sacre du Printemps" in Philadelphia, for the first time in America, two seasons ago (March 3, 1922); but, for reasons best known to himself, he did not disclose it to New York. There are doubtless good reasons why Mr. Damrosch, Mr. Mengelberg, Mr. Stransky, Mr. Monteux and our other orchestral providers have withheld the work from their respective publics, though we are unable to guess what those reasons may be. Our alert conductors cannot have felt any doubt as to the artistic importance of the work. For even musicians who do not belong to the Extreme Left have frankly recognized the extraordinary power and originality of the music.

In view of the approaching performances of the work, it may not be amiss to take a look at it in this place, since no detailed description of it has ever been made generally available for American music-lovers. The orchestral score is published, and may be had in the convenient pocket edition issued by the Russische Musik Verlag.

* * *

Stravinsky's unprecedented work is a new theme for music w the elected victim, who has thus remained motionless throughout activities, begins her sacrifice; the final act of propitiation has demanded and she must dance elf to death. This she proceeds to hile the music expresses the mysrapture of this invocation of verrtility in rhythms that attain an helming climax of paroxysmal ay. There is nothing in music like tupendous Finale of "Le Sacre du temps," with its audacious and in-ribably exciting alternations of r—bars of 5-16, 3-16, 2-16, 4-16—its delirious culmination as the n falls dead.

* * *

ravinsky's score is often (deits reputation) surprisingly simand it is almost throughout superb he power and mastery with which andles this new counterpoint of es and rhythms and tonalities

GLOBE B'way, 46 St. Mats. Wed. Evenings
1,000,000 P
HAV
FRED STONE
in 'STEPPING STONES'
with DOROTHY STONE
They're Lucky!
Music by Jerome Kern
Book by Anne Caldwell & R. H. Burnside

KNICKERBOCKER B'way and 38th St. Evenings 8.20
Matinees Wednesday and Saturday, 2:20.
FLORENCE REED
in Edward Knoblock's Great Play
"THE LULLABY"
SIXTEENTH WEEK AND STILL THE SEASON'S SENSATIONAL HIT!

Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK
HERALD

JAN 6 1924

MUSIC

By W. J. HENDERSON.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The second afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday in Carnegie Hall. The program comprised Brahms's "Tragic Overture," Arthur Bliss's "Color Symphony," Mozart's E flat violin concerto and the first series of orchestral fragments from the "Daphnis and Chloe" of Maurice Ravel. The violinist was Jacques Thibaud, the distinguished French artist, long and favorably known to this public.

The novelty of the concert was Mr. Bliss's composition, which was first performed at a festival of the Three Choirs at Gloucester, England, on September 7, 1922. It is not a red, white and blue symphony. The composer has made no attempt to translate the painter's palette into terms of tone. He has done just what any sane musician might be expected to do, namely, to give his fancy free rein amid the suggestions offered by the things colors are supposed to represent.

The first movement unfolds itself from the associations of purple, "the color of amethysts, pageantry, royalty and death." The second movement treats of red, "the color of rubies, wine, revelry, furnaces, courage and magic"—a "tall order" as a British commentator remarked on the purpose of "Also sprach Zarathustra." The third or scherzo represents blue, "the color of sapphires, deep water, skies, loyalty and melancholy," and the finale deals with green, the color of "emeralds, hope, joy, youth, spring and victory."

Several things may be said for Mr. Bliss. The most important is that although he is modern the diatonic scale has no terrors for him nor is he in the least perturbed in the presence of a tune.

His symphony is melodious throughout and there is among his thematic ideas a finely drawn kinship which gives his four movements a family resemblance. We should say that the family came from Ireland, that the purple was on the heather somewhere around the Bog of Allen, the red on the peaks of the Mournes, the blue in the eyes of the colleens and the green in the emerald all over the country. The composition has originality which betrays no sign of painful effort. The melodic idiom is apparently natural to the man, and his spontaneous and unaffected use of modern harmonies is delightful.

There is no profundity of development, although there is a burst of jocund counterpoint in the wood wind in the second subject of the finale. But on the whole Mr. Bliss sings his way quite irresponsibly through the compositions, ignoring the authority of the fathers and the appetites of the concert goers with equal self-assurance.

It is always pleasant to behold a young man who apes no one and carries himself with a fine air of confidence, yet holds something in his soul that clamors for utterance and can be uttered without offense except to the aged who dislike the disturbing sounds of progress and wish only to be left alone with their memories. Mr. Bliss has not overset the seven hills nor has he created an epoch, but he has written an interesting and stimulating symphony quite worth hearing and capable of stirring up the smoldering embers of a damply burning season. The work was very well performed by the gentlemen of Boston under the careful guidance of Mr. Monteux.

Mr. Thibaud played Mozart as if he enjoyed the task. Many artists play him as if it were a sacred duty they owed to their art. Mr. Thibaud's tone was ravishing in its purity and crystalline quality. His bowing was clean and elastic and his intonation unerring. He read the concerto with taste and without any attempt to pu new wine into the beautiful old bottle. It was a very pretty delivery and made the hearers happy.

[170]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

SYMPHONY
His Orchestra and His January 20.

g and unrecognized genius.
ng that the daring music of
and tomorrow is apt to se
ge at first, Mr. Monteux
e it famous by making it
r. His "Concerts Monteux"
Casino became generally no
pioneer performances—alm
ious. It was here that eux conducted the first p
ance, now historical of t
s of Spring" by Stravinsk
considered merely wild a ss, but now universally
ed. The music caused a riot
udience; eggs and all mann
getables were thrown. The poli
ged to escape, although his id not. The public had
the music, and therefore M ux repeated it the followi

se innovations are not alway
ar at the time, but later o
the music becomes understoo
ppreciated Mr. Monteux
ed for his efforts. In his pres
ost, while always giving the ard favorites of the orchestral
ory their due predominance,
s revealed his evident instinct ngling out new genius, both
can and foreign.
phony orchestra will be heard Colonial theatre here Sunday
oon, January 20.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES

6 - 1924

on Orchestra presented Stuart
ew suite, conducted by the
His present work is a com-
ast to his "Rhapsodie on a
r," for piano and orchestra,
employed the modern idiom.
s written in the eighteenth
nner and his score is said to
e charm of Mozart and
thout slavish imitation."

ST BY ATTEST

nal Romeike
S CLIPPINGS
9TH ST., NEW YORK
Chelsea 8860

LIPPING FROM W YORK
IMES

- 1924

been invited to be f the Boston Symthat organization's and 28 in Boston.
ppear both as con-
r.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD

JAN 6 1924

New Operas and All-Hofmann Recital Shared the Interest

Arthur Bliss's Color Symphony Played and Stransky Led the State Symphony, but the Lion of the Day Was Scotti.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

THE last week was one of the most interesting of the musical seasor It was crowded with incidents of no small importance and leave upon the mind an impression of whirling confusion. Four ne operas were produced. Mr. Scotti's twenty-fifth year with the Metropolita was commemorated in festal manner with music and banquet, a whol concert was devoted to the works of Josef Hofmann, the Boston Symphon Orchestra revealed to us Arthur Bliss's color symphony and Mr. Stransk led the State Symphonists into the promised land of the Parisian Six.

With all these contributions to the intellectual welfare of the com munity the chroniclers of musical doings found their attention burdene and their descriptive powers taxed. And now that the hour of retrospe is here the outstanding incident is the celebration of the unwearied bar tone, who for twenty-five years has (to recall Spartacus) met upon th arena every form of tenor or soprano that the broad empire of Rom could furnish and has never yet flinched.

Supercilious comment might be made with facility on the futility offering great art works in rivalry to a great operatic impersonator. Th four new operas caused less of a stir in the town than the Scotti celebra tion. But a candid consideration of the circumstances forbids the utte ance of words of regret. The human interest story is always a good stor Operas may come and operas do go but Scotti has gone on for twenty-fiv years. It was not a jest that ced him an institution.

ediction Fulfilled.

SEVENTH AVE.
NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From
TELEGRAM
New York City

JAN 7 1924

Boston Symphony in "Color" Symphony

Colors have always attracted the musical experimenter. Many a composer has tried to find some means of suggesting color by means of sound, but Arthur Bliss, whose "Color" symphony was played for the first time here yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has succeeded as little as his predecessors. Judging from Mr. Bliss' music, there is absolutely no connection between color and sound. His first movement was called "Purple." Then followed "Red," "Blue" and "Green." One was as expressive as the other, and as colorful Because Mr. Bliss failed to make "Purple" anything but a rather agreeable combination of tones, is no reflection on his work, judged as music. His symphony is a cleverly conceived musical work. He is a modern, but he has not lost all hold on the past. He orchestrates skilfully. In fact the "Color" symphony, to use its British title, is rather a good composition. It was brilliantly played by the men from Boston under the leadership of Pierre Monteux. The soloist yesterday was Jacques Phubaud, whose beautifully refined playing was heard at its best in Mozart's violin concerto in E flat (K. 268). Other orchestral selections were Brahms' Tragic Overture and the first "Daphnis and Cloe" suite of Ravel.

Ignaz Friedman, a pianist with a scintillating technique, gave a recital of Chopin's music yesterday afternoon in Aeolian Hall. The B minor sonata was played superbly. And many of the smaller pieces were charming as he interpreted them.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TELEGRAPH

JAN 6 - 1924

MUSIC

By ESTHER SAYLES ROOT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Pierre Monteux with Jacques Thibaud as soloist presented one of the richest programs of the season yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. If it were possible to reproduce in words the effect of fine orchestral playing, if "sonority" and "thrilling crescendo" can convey or even approach the aesthetic delight of certain moments yesterday afternoon, then the thousands might save themselves the trouble of going to the concert hall, and let some writer do the business for them, retire to his fireside and write a monograph.

But such a translation of sound in words is at best a poor thing. Let it b said of the Brahms "Tragic Overture, which opened the program, that it was given a stirring performance. The fact that the strings and horns were not always perfectly together is data, if that is what's wanted. The greater fact remains that Mr. Monteux induced from the orchestra a beautiful reading of the work.

The "Color Symphony" of Arthur Bliss was the novelty of the occasion. This admits of more comment, for the translation of color into sound, however emotionally derived, is intellectually achieved. The music itself, like the Brahms and the Mozart and Ravel which followed, uses its own language, but the idea of asking the audience to shut its eyes and open its ears to the rainbow encourages discussion.

Purple was the first color. The music set out in straightforward march time with a weird melody in the horns, supported frequently by pizzicati in the strings. It was rather lively for purple, but dark strands of sound braiding and unbraiding below the brighter gaiety of brass and woodwind made a balance that in its climax took on a regal splendor.

Red was the next—a scherzo movement—"the color of rubies, wine, revelry, furnaces, courage and magic." This was the most exciting, both in its riotous rhythm and its piquant instrumentation which used harp, piccolo, triangle and cymbals with an effect of real brightness. The slow red of dawn was not forgotten in a lovely interlude given to the strings. The movement ended with a bang-bang on the base drum, and the full orchestra blaring out a dissonance.

Then came blue, now sombre, now wistful, borne along on a wave-like motion, reminiscent of Debussy's "Nuages." One device used with great effect by Mr. Bliss is to give the melody to the horns who leap away from the undercurrent of the orchestra and, by strange intervals, reach a high note and hold it until the mass marches up in a series of harmonic progressions until it finds the same ground.

The last movement, green—"the color of emeralds, hope, spring and victory"—is given a large contrapuntal treatment which grows into a climax of such extent that all the elements of the spectrum seem to be fighting a polyphonic battle for first place. It seemed overweighted and monotonous toward the end, but eminently successful in that the best phrase for it is "full of color."

The concepts which the composer has endeavored to portray are the world concepts of the colors. They appeal to subconscious associations and, therefore, are likely to satisfy, in the main, the individual. The music is serious and compelling and the titles are valuable chiefly because each one includes a group of ideas which could not otherwise be expressed with such brevity or such personal appeal.

The audience was wild with enthusiasm and called Mr. Bliss again and again to the stage to receive an ovation, of which Mr. Monteux and the orchestra had their share.

The Mozart Concerto (Koechel No. 268) was played by Mr. Thibaud with a poetry which could not be surpassed. The adagio movement was of such heavenly perfection that when it was finished the audience groaned with delight before it started to applaud.

The program closed with Ravel's "Orchestral Fragments."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TRIBUNE

JAN 6 - 1924

"Sacre du Printemps," New to New York, To Be Played Here

Stravinsky's Famous Work on Forthcoming Programs of Two Orchestras; A Description of the Music and the Original Ballet

By Lawrence Gilman

THE announcement that both Mr. Mengelberg, with the Philharmonic, and Mr. Monteux, with the Boston Symphony, are to exhibit to us before long Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" revives in us an old perplexity. We have often thought that it would be difficult to explain to an inquiring guest critic from Mars why it is that one of the most famous scores of our time has never been heard in New York. The concert version of "Le Sacre du Printemps" has been repeatedly performed abroad by Pierre Monteux, Sergei Koussevitzky, Eugène Goossens and others. In London, indeed, the work is almost as old a story as the C minor Symphony of Brahms; but New York, the most backward of musical capitals, has yet to hear it. The sleepless Mr. Stokowski, who lets few things escape him, performed "Le Sacre du Printemps" in Philadelphia, for the first time in America, two seasons ago (March 3, 1922); but, for reasons best known to himself, he did not disclose it to New York. There are doubtless good reasons why Mr. Damrosch, Mr. Mengelberg, Mr. Stransky, Mr. Monteux and our other orchestral providers have withheld the work from their respective publics, though we are unable to guess what those reasons may be. Our alert conductors cannot have felt any doubt as to the artistic importance of the work. For even musicians who do not belong to the Extreme Left have frankly recognized the extraordinary power and originality of the music.

In view of the approaching performances of the work, it may not be ss to take a look at it in this place, since no detailed description of it ever been made generally available for American music-lovers. The estral score is published, and may be had in the convenient pocket ion issued by the Russische Musik Verlag.

* * *

ravinsky's
s original inc designated by

GLOBE B'way, 46 St. Evgs. 8:2
Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2:25
1,000,000 PEOPLE
HAVE SEEN
FRED STON
in 'STEPPING STONES'
with DOROTHY STONE
They're Lucky!
Music by Jerome Kern
Book by Anne Caldwell & R. H. Burns

KNICKERBOCKER B'way and 38th S
Evenings 8.20
Matinees Wednesday and Saturday, 2:20.
FLORENCE REE
in Edward Knoblock's Great Play
"THE LULLABY"
SIXTEENTH WEEK AND
STILL THE SEASON'S
SENSATIONAL HIT!

Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD

JAN 6 1924

MUSIC

By W. J. HENDERSON.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The second afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday in Carnegie Hall. The program comprised Brahms's "Tragic Overture," Arthur Bliss's "Color Symphony," Mozart's E flat violin concerto and the first series of orchestral fragments from the "Daphnis and Chloe" of Maurice Ravel. The violinist was Jacques Thibaud, the distinguished French artist, long and favorably known to this public.

The novelty of the concert was Mr. Bliss's composition, which was first performed at a festival of the Three Choirs at Gloucester, England, on September 7, 1922. It is not a red, white and blue symphony. The composer has made no attempt to translate the painter's palette into terms of tone. He has done just what any sane musician might be expected to do, namely, to give his fancy free rein amid the suggestions offered by the things colors are supposed to represent.

The first movement unfolds itself from the associations of purple, "the color of amethysts, pageantry, royalty and death." The second movement treats of red, "the color of rubies, wine, revelry, furnaces, courage and magic"—a "tall order" as a British commentator remarked on the pur "Also sprach Zarathustra." third or scherzo represents blue, color of sapphires, deep water, loyalty and melancholy," and finale deals with green, the color emeralds, hope, joy, youth, spring victory."

Several things may be said for Mr. Bliss. The most important is that although he is modern the diatonic scale has no terrors for him nor is he in the least perturbed in the presence of a tune.

His symphony is melodious throughout and there is among his thematic ideas a finely drawn kinship which gives his four movements a family resemblance. We should say that the family came from Ireland, that the purple was on the heather somewhere around the Bog of Allen, the red on the peaks of the Mournes, the blue in the eyes of the colleens and the green the emerald all over the country. The composition has originality which betrays no sign of painful effort. The melodic idiom is apparently natural the man, and his spontaneous and affected use of modern harmonies delightful.

There is no profundity of development, although there is a burst of jocund counterpoint in the wood wind in the second subject of the finale. But on the whole Mr. Bliss sings his way quite irresponsibly through the compositions, ignoring the authority of the fathers and the appetites of the concert goers with equal self-assurance.

It is always pleasant to behold a young man who apes no one and carries himself with a fine air of confidence, yet holds something in his soul that clamors for utterance and can be uttered without offense except to the aged who dislike the disturbing sounds of progress and wish only to be left alone with their memories. Mr. Bliss has not overset the seven hills nor has he created an epoch, but he has written an interesting and stimulating symphony quite worth hearing and capable of stirring up the smoldering embers of a damply burning season. The work was very well performed by the gentlemen of Boston under the careful guidance of Mr. Monteux.

Mr. Thibaud played Mozart as if he enjoyed the task. Many artists play him as if it were a sacred duty they owed to their art. Mr. Thibaud's tone was ravishing in its purity and crystalline quality. His bowing was clean and elastic and his intonation unerring. He read the concerto with taste and without any attempt to pu new wine into the beautiful old bottle. It was a very pretty delivery and made the hearers happy.

[170]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

SYMPHONY

h His Orchestra and His January 20.

ng and unrecognised genius.
ing that the daring music of and tomorrow is apt to sou nge at first, Mr. Monteux
e it famous by making it
ar. His "Concerts Monteux" s Casino became generally no
pioneer performances—alm rious. It was here that teux conducted the first p nance, now historical, of t es of Spring" by Stravinsk considered merely wild a ess, but now universally
ed. The music caused a riot audience; eggs and all mann
getables wer thrown. The poli
getables were thrown. The poli
ged to escape, although his uld not. The public had the music, and therefore M
eux repeated it the followi

se innovations are not alway
ar at the time, but later o
the music becomes understoo
appreciated Mr. Monteux
ed for his efforts. In his pres
ost, while always giving the
ard favorites of the orchestral
ory their due predominance,
s revealed his evident instinct
ngling out new genius, both
can and foreign.
phony orchestra will be heard Colonial theatre here Sunday
oon, January 20.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES

6 - 1924

on Orchestra presented Stuart new suite, conducted by the
His present work is a com-
ast to his "Rhapsodie on a
r," for piano and orchestra,
employed the modern idiom.
s written in the eighteenth
nner and his score is said to
e charm of Mozart and
thout slavish imitation."

ST BY ATTEST

nal Romeike
S CLIPPINGS
TH ST., NEW YORK
Chelsea 8860

LIPPING FROM
Y YORK
MES

- 1924

been invited to be
the Boston Sym-
that organization's and Boston.
pear both as con-
r.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD

JAN 6 1924

New Operas and All-Hofmann Recital Shared the Interest

Arthur Bliss's Color Symphony Played and Stransky Led the State Symphony, but the Lion of the Day Was Scotti.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

THE last week was one of the most interesting of the musical season. It was crowded with incidents of no small importance and leave upon the mind an impression of whirling confusion. Four ne operas were produced. Mr. Scotti's twenty-fifth year with the Metropolita was commemorated in festal manner with music and banquet, a whol concert was devoted to the works of Josef Hofmann, the Boston Symphon Orchestra revealed to us Arthur Bliss's color symphony and Mr. Stransk led the State Symphonists into the promised land of the Parisian Six.

With all these contributions to the intellectual welfare of the com munity the chroniclers of musical doings found their attention burdene and their descriptive powers taxed. And now that the hour of retrospe is here the outstanding incident is the celebration of the unwearied bar tone, who for twenty-five years has (to recall Spartacus) met upon th arena every form of tenor or soprano that the broad empire of Ron could furnish and has never yet flinched.

Supercilious comment might be made with facility on the futility offering great art works in rivalry to a great operatic impersonator. Th four new operas caused less of a stir in the town than the Scotti celebra tion. But a candid consideration of the circumstances forbids the utte ance of words of regret. The human interest story is always a good stor Operas may come and operas do go but Scotti has gone on for twenty-fiv years. It was not a jest that pronounced him an institution.

TO SEVENTH Reszke's Prediction Fulfilled.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From TELEGRAM JAN 1924
New York City

Boston Symphony in "Color" Symphony

Colors have always attracted the musical experimenter. Many a composer has tried to find some means of suggesting color by means of sound, but Arthur Bliss, whose "Color" symphony was played for the first time here yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has succeeded as little as his predecessors. Judging from Mr. Bliss' music, there is absolutely no connection between color and sound. His first movement was called "Purple." Then followed "Red," "Blue" and "Green." One was as expressive as the other, and as colorful Because Mr. Bliss failed to make "Purple" anything but a rather agreeable combination of tones, is no reflection on his work, judged as music. His symphony is a cleverly conceived musical work. He is a modern, but he has not lost all hold on the past. He orchestrates skilfully. In fact the "Color" symphony, to use its British title, is rather a good composition. It was brilliantly played by the men from Boston under the leadership of Pierre Monteux. The soloist yesterday was Jacques Phubaud, whose beautifully refined playing was heard at its best in Mozart's violin concerto in E flat (K. 268). Other orchestral selections were Brahms' Tragic Overture and the first "Daphnis and Cloe" suite of Ravel.

Ignaz Friedman, a pianist with a scintillating technique, gave a recital of Chopin's music yesterday afternoon in Aeolian Hall. The B minor sonata was played superbly. And many of the smaller pieces were charming as he interpreted them.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TELEGRAPH

JAN 6 - 1924

MUSIC

By ESTHER SAYLES ROOT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, co ducted by Pierre Monteux with Jacq Thibaud as soloist presented one of richest programs of the season yester afternoon at Carnegie Hall. If it w possible to reproduce in words the eff of fine orchestral playing, if "sonorit and "thrilling crescendo" can convey even approach the aesthetic delight certain moments yesterday afternoo then the thousands might save themselv the trouble of going to the concert ha and let some writer do the business f them, retire to his fireside and write monograph.

But such a translation of sound in words is at best a poor thing. Let it b said of the Brahms "Tragic Overture, which opened the program, that it wa given a stirring performance. The fact that the strings and horns were not always perfectly together is data, if that is what's wanted. The greater fact remains that Mr. Monteux induced from the orchestra a beautiful reading of the work.

The "Color Symphony" of Arthur Bliss was the novelty of the occasion. This admits of more comment, for the translation of color into sound, however emotionally derived, is intellectually achieved. The music itself, like the Brahms and the Mozart and Ravel which followed, uses its own language, but the idea of asking the audience to shut its eyes and open its ears to the rainbow encourages discussion.

Purple was the first color. The music set out in straightforward march time with a weird melody in the horns, supported frequently by pizzicati in the strings. It was rather lively for purple, but dark strands of sound braiding and unbraiding below the brighter gaiety of brass and woodwind made a balance that in its climax took on a regal splendor.

Red was the next—a scherzo movement—"the color, of rubies, wine, revelry, furnaces, courage and magic." This was the most exciting, both in its riotous rhythm and its piquant instrumentation which used harp, piccolo, triangle and cymbals with an effect of real brightness. The slow red of dawn was not forgotten in a lovely interlude given to the strings. The movement ended with a bang-bang on the base drum, and the full orchestra blaring out a dissonance.

Then came blue, now sombre, now wistful, borne along on a wave-like motion, reminiscent of Debussy's "Nuages." One device used with great effect by Mr. Bliss is to give the melody to the horns who leap away from the undercurrent of the orchestra and, by strange intervals, reach a high note and hold it until the mass marches up in a series of harmonic progressions until it finds the same ground.

The last movement, green—"the color of emeralds, hope, spring and victory"—is given a large contrapuntal treatment which grows into a climax of such extent that all the elements of the spectrum seem to be fighting a polyphonic battle for first place. It seemed overweighted and monotonous toward the end, but eminently successful in that the best phrase for it is "full of color."

The concepts which the composer has endeavored to portray are the world concepts of the colors. They appeal to subconscious associations and, therefore, are likely to satisfy, in the main, the individual. The music is serious and compelling and the titles are valuable chiefly because each one includes a group of ideas which could not otherwise be expressed with such brevity or such personal appeal.

The audience was wild with enthusiasm and called Mr. Bliss again and again to the stage to receive an ovation, of which Mr. Monteux and the orchestra had their share.

The Mozart Concerto (Koechel No. 268) was played by Mr. Thibaud with a poetry which could not be surpassed. The adagio movement was of such heavenly perfection that when it was finished the audience groaned with delight before it started to applaud.

The program closed with Ravel's "Orchestral Fragments."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TRIBUNE

JAN 6 - 1924

"Sacre du Printemps," New to New York, To Be Played Here

Stravinsky's Famous Work on Forthcoming Programs of Two Orchestras; A Description of the Music and the Original Ballet

By Lawrence Gilman

THE announcement that both Mr. Mengelberg, with the Philharmonic, and Mr. Monteux, with the Boston Symphony, are to exhibit to us before long Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" revives in us an old perplexity. We have often thought that it would be difficult to explain to an inquiring guest critic from Mars why it is that one of the most famous scores of our time has never been heard in New York. The concert version of "Le Sacre du Printemps" has been repeatedly performed abroad by Pierre Monteux, Sergei Koussevitzky, Eugène Goossens and others. In London, indeed, the work is almost as old a story as the C minor Symphony of Brahms; but New York, the most backward of musical capitals, has yet to hear it. The sleepless Mr. Stokowski, who lets few things escape him, performed "Le Sacre du Printemps" in Philadelphia, for the first time in America, two seasons ago (March 3, 1922); but, for reasons best known to himself, he did not disclose it to New York. There are doubtless good reasons why Mr. Damrosch, Mr. Mengelberg, Mr. Stransky, Mr. Monteux and our other orchestral providers have withheld the work from their respective publics, though we are unable to guess what those reasons may be. Our alert conductors cannot have felt any doubt as to the artistic importance of the work. For even musicians who do not belong to the Extreme Left have frankly recognized the extraordinary power and originality of the music.

In view of the approaching performances of the work, it may not be s to take a look at it in this place, since no detailed description of it ever been made generally available for American music-lovers. The estral score is published, and may be had in the convenient pocket ion issued by the Russische Musik Verlag.

ravinsky's unprecedented work

GLOBE B'way, 46 St. Evgs. 8:2
Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2:25
1,000,000 PEOPLE
HAVE SEEN
FRED STON
in 'STEPPING STONES'
with DOROTHY STONE
They're Lucky!
Music by Jerome Kern
Book by Anne Caldwell & R. H. Burns

KNICKERBOCKER B'way and 38th S
Evenings 8.20
Matinees Wednesday and Saturday, 2:20.
FLORENCE REE
in Edward Knoblock's Great Play
"THE LULLABY"
SIXTEENTH WEEK AND
STILL THE SEASON'S
SENSATIONAL HIT!

Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD

JAN 6 1924

MUSIC

By W. J. HENDERSON.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The second afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday in Carnegie Hall. The program comprised Brahms's "Tragic Overture," Arthur Bliss's "Color Symphony," Mozart's E flat violin concerto and the first series of orchestral fragments from the "Daphnis and Chloe" of Maurice Ravel. The violinist was Jacques Thibaud, the distinguished French artist, long and favorably known to this public.

The novelty of the concert was Mr. Bliss's composition, which was first performed at a festival of the Three Choirs at Gloucester, England, on September 7, 1922. It is not a red, white and blue symphony. The composer has made no attempt to translate the painter's palette into terms of tone. He has done just what any sane musician might be expected to do, namely, to give his fancy free rein amid the suggestions offered by the things colors are supposed to represent.

The first movement unfolds itself from the associations of purple, "the color of amethysts, pageantry, royalty and death." The second movement treats of red, "the color of rubies, wine, revelry, furnaces, courage and magic"—a "tall order" as a British commentator remarked on the pur se of "Also sprach Zarathustra." third or scherzo represents blue, color of sapphires, deep water, loyalty and melancholy," and finale deals with green, the color emeralds, hope, joy, youth, spring and victory."

Several things may be said for Mr. Bliss. The most important is that although he is modern the diatonic scale has no terrors for him nor is he in the least perturbed in the presence of a tune.

His symphony is melodious throughout and there is among his thematic ideas a finely drawn kinship which gives his four movements a family resemblance. We should say that the family came from Ireland, that the purple was on the heather somewhere around the Bog of Allen, the red on the peaks of the Mournes, the blue in the eyes of the colleens and the green the emerald all over the country. The composition has originality which always no sign of painful effort. The melodic idiom is apparently natural the man, and his spontaneous and unaffected use of modern harmonies delightful.

There is no profundity of development, although there is a burst of jocund counterpoint in the wood wind in the second subject of the finale. But on the whole Mr. Bliss sings his way quite irresponsibly through the compositions, ignoring the authority of the fathers and the appetites of the concert goers with equal self-assurance.

It is always pleasant to behold a young man who apes no one and carries himself with a fine air of confidence, yet holds something in his soul that clamors for utterance and can be uttered without offense except to the aged who dislike the disturbing sounds of progress and wish only to be left alone with their memories. Mr. Bliss has not overset the seven hills nor has he created an epoch, but he has written an interesting and stimulating symphony quite worth hearing and capable of stirring up the smoldering embers of a damply burning season. The work was very well performed by the gentlemen of Boston under the careful guidance of Mr. Monteux.

Mr. Thibaud played Mozart as if he enjoyed the task. Many artists play him as if it were a sacred duty they owed to their art. Mr. Thibaud's tone was ravishing in its purity and crystalline quality. His bowing was clear and elastic and his intonation unerring. He read the concerto with taste and without any attempt to pu new wine into the beautiful old bottle. It was a very pretty delivery and made the hearers happy.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

Post

NEW YORK

JAN 7 - 1924

BLISS'S COLOR SYMPHONY PLAYED

Boston Orchestra Presents an English Novelty at Carnegie Hall

A SPECIMEN OF "FUTURISM"

By HENRY T. FINCK

There is a man in this country who knows everything. His name is Philip Hale. Though he lives in Boston he knows—what I, a New Yorker, do not know, or remember—that on October 28, 1902, a novel experiment was made in this city at the Carnegie Lyceum. He quotes from the program: "A newly invented apparatus to spread perfumes in large halls and theatres in the shortest possible space of time will be tested, and an original Fantasy entitled 'A Trip to Japan in Sixteen Minutes' conveyed to the audience by a succession of Odors." This was the "First experimental Perfume Concert in America." The "Trip to Japan" was also described as "A Melody in Odors assisted by two Geishas and a Solo Dancer."

On listening to the "Color Symphony" by the young English composer Arthur Bliss, played in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, I could not but think how much more appropriate an odor program would have been than the color scheme used. It consisted of four words: I. Purple. II. Red III Blue. IV. Green. Only these and nothing more.

Hen, Fox, Hyena, Salmon

Now, there was absolutely nothing in the music of the four sections to show why these colors should not have been changed about at will. The thing was simply silly, childish. No reason why the four movements could not have been quite as appropriately called Hen, Fox, Hyena, Salmon, or Knife, Fork, Spoon, and Fingerbowl. A good deal of pseudo-æsthetic rot has been written about hearing colors, or the association of certain colors with certain sounds; but there is no such thing in normal minds not addicted to occultism.

It is said that Mr. Bliss did not write this work with any color associations in his imagination but adopted the title at the suggestion of a friend. If he had come to me for suggestions I would—after hearing the composition—have said, "call it the Malodorous Symphony.' Bear in mind that it would be impossible to find any colors as hideous as the sounds you often produce, but in the realms of odors it's the easiest thing in the world to do so. I suggest as appropriate heads for your four movements: I Rotten Potatoes. II Sulphuretted Hydrogen. III B flats (cimex lectularius). V Quintessence of Skunk.'

Hastening the Death of Music

In giving such advice I would not have wished to be discourteous or flippant, but simply desirous to make it clear that such cacophonic noises as Mr. Bliss preferably makes in his symphony affect normal ears just as disagreeably as the stinks named distress the nose. For an orchestral conductor to offer such malodorous music to an audience accustomed to fragrant music is—well, what would happen to the owner of a perfumery store if he sold to his customers bottles of that sort of thing in place of the fragrant flower essences from the Riviera or Roumania? How long would his business last?

Repeatedly I have expressed my opinion that music is a dying art. The cacophonists are doing their best to increase the number of empty benches in our concert halls which is already disquietingly large. They should not be allowed to force their way into subscription concerts. Of course, its all right when they and their friends get together for a dissonantal pow-wow in a small theatre, as some of them did last night to hear pieces by Bax, Bartok Schoenberg and Berners. I imagine they really enjoyed their exclusive menu of Yarmouth bloaters, paprika and live limburger royally. They had some fine artists to serve the dishes: Yolanda Mero, Ruth Rodgers, Clarence and Joseph Adler and Albert Stoessel.

Thibaud Plays Mozart

To come back for a moment to the Bliss symphony and Monteux's concert. There were fragrant moments in the symphony which indicate that if the composer got over his "futuristic [illegible] there might be a [illegible]ration of taste [illegible] was [illegible] for him. Very

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK TIMES

JAN 6 - 1924

'Color Symphony' Played.

By OLIN DOWNES.

Arthur Bliss's "Color Symphony" was played for the first time in New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. Jacques Thibaud was the soloist at this concert, playing the Mozart violin concerto in E-flat. The program opened with Brahms's "Tragic" overture and came to an end with the first set of orchestral excerpts from Maurice Ravel's music for the ballet "Daphnis et Cloe," mounted by the Ballet Russe in Paris in 1912.

We have been told that when Mr. Bliss composed this symphony it had not a title. An intimate friend, however, believed that he should give a work, apparently of a highly subjective character, some name that would provide a more individual designation than symphony number this or that. Questioned, Mr. Bliss admitted that there had been strongly present in his mind, while writing the symphony, impressions, or feelings, associated with color. Hence the "Color Symphony"—and there is a good deal in a name.

It so happened that, owing to those admirable arrangements by which one cannot obtain within the auditorium of Carnegie Hall a Boston Symphony program book with the invaluable notes of Mr. Philip Hale, THE TIMES reviewer listened to the "Color Symphony" with as much innocence of the composer's intentions as he hopes he w without prejudice concerning his wor This was the case in spite of the f that the reviewer had heard the "Col Symphony" when it was performed Boston. On that occasion he had has ened into the concert hall without tim to read about Mr. Bliss and his i and had only glimpses of the descript titles of the four movements of symphony as he sat down. These tit are "Purple," "Red," "Blue," "Green Yesterday memory became confus Lacking any program at the mome there was the belief, amounting to co viction, that the first movement w "Red" and that the second was "Blue About the other colors the review was vague, and, besides, he is somewhat color blind!

Has he, then, any right to record critical estimate of this interesting sy phony? Mr. Bliss might say no. Nev theless, color blind or not, the writ never hears any piece of music with a color impression. Thus the color the key of C major is synymous to hi with white, although the blazing major chord at the opening of Strauss's tone poem, "Also Sprach Zarathustra," is to him of blinding gold. In thes cases, why? Because (1) the key of major on the piano has not black notes, and as a child presented to him heaven of uncomplicated whiteness whe he had to finger Czerny exercises, an (2) because the opening of Strauss tone poem, avowed and achieved, is superb evocation of golden sunrise. He heard as a child Rubinstein's melody in F played by a solo violin against an organ accomaniment, and that melody seemed to him gold—gold coming down through a radiant mist in the skies. Not that he feels that way today about it. Schubert's "Unfinished Sycphony" seemed a thing of blues, reds and greens.

The point is that most people see color when they hear music, but there is great doubt if many see the same color, or whether, if they saw a given color, they would immediately think of a certain kind of music. Something else is important. Is not color emotionally suggestive, principally through the operation of contrast? Is it not the relation between color and color just as it is the relation between chord and chord, rather than colors and chords in themselves, which gives the emotion of color?

If the "Color Symphony" is discussed as music itself, irrespective of its title, it is a composition of considerable interest. It is, at least, the exciting expression of a temperament youthful, nervous, vivid, of today. Mr. Bliss writes brilliantly, if at too great length. Sometimes he achieves passages of exceptional beauty—though these are seldom unindebted to other modern composers —and more than once he evolves a passage of counterpoint or harmonic dissonance which makes one wish to stop the orchestra and hear that over again.

It is true that the "Color Symphony" would not be what it is if it were not for Igor Stravinsky. And then there is Maurice Ravel. Ravel and Stravinsky are difficult, ofcourse, for any modern to avoid. At one moment we thought we were at the fair of Petrouchka. But the double fugue at the end is a rousing piece of music. The voice of a solo oboe in one movement—in a symphony as yet so uncharted one can be little more exact than that—passages of harmonic pungency that befall in the scherzo-like movement that we now know meant "red"—these things make the listener sit up and ask "What next?" The "color symphony" now appears as the work of a young man of vigorous talent, searching, without fear, for that which is himself.

Mr. Thibaud played the Mozart concerto with a purity of a style which was never cold or merely objective, and with a feeling that lifted the hearer with the music to the skies, and Mr. Monteux collaborated admirably with the modest and disinguished master of his instrument. There was a sound and virile reading of the Brahms overture, which has indeed passages that might accompany a tragedy of Sophocles, and there was the virtuoso performance by a superb orchestra and the leader who has made it what it is of a virtuoso composition—the music to "Daphnis and Cloe." A score which is to us far more of a color symphony than the work of Mr. Bliss. It seems partly music and partly a blend of music and an im- essionistic pictorial art, on the borland between that of the composer he painter. Without the complete anding and the authority of Mr. this singular music might far short of comprehension.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

SPRINGFIELD

MASS.

UNION

JAN 7 - 1924

4500 PACK HALL TO HEAR BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAY

Pierre Monteux Gives Brilliant Reading of Beethoven's Seventh, Wagner and Ravel.

Everyone who possibly could crowd into the Auditorium turned out yesterday to hear the annual concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, given under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A. It was estimated that about 4500 persons heard the concert and Secretary Hoover announced from the stage that it had been necessary to close the doors on 500. The Mahogany Room and the foyer were filled and as many stood at the rear and side of the Auditorium as were allowed to do so. Rev. Thomas Tyrie read the Scriptures.

The concert marked the last appearance of Mr. Monteux in Springfield for he is scheduled to leave the Boston Symphony at the end of this season. To him belongs much praise for he has succeeded in bringing back the Boston Symphony Orchestra to its pre-ware brillance.

The program began with Beethoven's "Symphony in A major, No. 755 perhaps the noblest and most poetic of all his symphonies. Much could be written about this symphony but to everyone it must have an individual message. Wagner calls it the "apotheosis of the dance." The first performance of the symphony was in Vienna, Dec. 8, 1813.

Pre-Prohibition Dance.

Monteux gave it a virile reading bringing a wealth of poetry to the first movement (a poco sustenuto and vivace) and a real crispness to the allegretto and presto movements. It remained, however, for the last movement to stir the imagination to an almost hysterical pitch. One might close his eyes and imagine the New Year's celebrations before the advent of the 18th Amendment. It was played with utter abandon that could only be achieved by an organization so firm and so nearly perfect as the Boston Symphony.

Smetana's symphonic cycle, "Vltava," "My Country," is a conventional tone poem. In it the composer has endeavored to make his country, Czechoslavakia familiar to the world through his cycle of symphonic poems the second of which is "The Moldau," which the orchestra played.

In sharp contrast was the brilliant "Waltz," by Havel. It is modern in construction for the score was published in 1921. The music suggests a whirling mass of dancers. As the dance progresses the score grows wilder and wilder ,a steady pizzicati of double basses indicating the growing frenzy. It was sketched during the war, which may account for much of the spirit of orgy in it. Beneath the superficial gaiety there is a phase almost repulsive, emphasized by the repeated combinations in which the strings grate against the brass.

"Lohengrin" and "Tannhauser."

The last two numbers included the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the overture to "Tannhauser." There are few conductors who can make Wagner live the way Monteux can. The prelude especially must appeal to every lover of music. The vision of an angel host bearing in its midst the Holy Grail and the thrilling climax when the Grail is revealed in all its glory was magnificently portrayed by the conductor and his men. The overture is full of climaxes familiar to all, but ever new and interesting.

The Y. M. C. A. in bringing the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Springfield each year deserves the united thanks of all music lovers for Springfield would be singularly barren of orchestral music were it not for this yearly appearance, an appearance which makes it possible for hundreds of young people to hear the finest orchestra at no expense to themselves.

WILLARD M. CLARK.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

SPRINGFIELD

MASS.

UNION

JAN 9 - 1924

"Y" CONCERT TICKETS.

Fail to Benefit Holders Attendi Auditorium, One Complains.

To the Editor of The Union.

Sir: Sunday, I attended the conce given in the Auditorium by the Bo ton Symphony Orchestra under auspices of the Springfield Y. M. C. The crowd was a mammoth one, ma festing the high regard in which Boston Symphony Orchestra is and denoting the interest, apprecia and confidence Springfield gives local Y. M. C. A. for making it sible to witness such magnificent formances.

However, I'd like to say a wo passant regarding the distributi tickets. It doesn't seem quite that those who have no tickets s be given the same privileges as who have taken the care to pr them. I have always unders heretofore, that those with ti were given the precedence; and ways I have undertaken to see t had my little card ready to hand attendant at the door. Yet, I seen numbers without this partic requisite, entering before and sometimes aside of those who have shown themselves interested, enthusiastic and appreciative enough to get their tickets beforehand. The Y. M. C. A. may as well desist from printing and distributing the tickets for all the good they amount to.

MARIE A. DUPRE.

Springfield, Jan. 8, 1924.

SUNDAY CONCERT SEATS.

Trans Jan 10

MIAMI AND MIAMI BEACH

Better Anchorage Arrangements Yachts Which Arrive in Numbers— England Visitors

Special to the Transcript:

Miami, Fla., Jan. 10—With the approach of the opening date of the Nautilus Hotel arrangements are being made for uninterrupted water transportation between the new hotel and the Flamingo Hotel, both on Biscayne Bay. Scheduled runs will be made between the two hotels.

With winter visitors now arriving regularly at Miami beach the Flamingo docks are becoming busier each day. The yacht Mariette, owned by Jacob Brown, of Boston; the Pilgrim, chartered by Louis Sherry of New York, and the Winsor and Charmer are now at the Flamingo, the first two being recent arrivals.

Additional conveniences for lovers of water sports will be found at the Flamingo docks this season. Yacht owners will find that their craft are being moored to anchor moorings arranged with uniformity. Captain Gordon Haggerty, dockmaster, has announced that Captain Sam Welch of the Seafarer will care for all fishing parties from the Flamingo Hotel while at the

---

10

"White and Gold"

Cecilia Hansen

Blond, Slender and Grave

New Violinist of the Year, to Be Heard in Boston Next Monda

THIS CLIPPING FROM
Post
NEW YORK

JAN 7 - 1924

BLISS'S COLOR SYMPHONY PLAYED

Boston Orchestra Presents an English Novelty at Carnegie Hall

A SPECIMEN OF "FUTURISM"

By HENRY T. FINCK

There is a man in this country who knows everything. His name is Philip Hale. Though he lives in Boston he knows—what I, a New Yorker, do not know, or remember—that on October 28, 1902, a novel experiment was made in this city at the Carnegie Lyceum. He quotes from the program: "A newly invented apparatus to spread perfumes in large halls and theatres in the shortest possible space of time will be tested, and an original Fantasy entitled 'A Trip to Japan in Sixteen Minutes' conveyed to the audience by a succession of Odors." This was the "First experimental Perfume Concert in America." The "Trip to Japan" was also described as "A Melody in Odors assisted by two Geishas and a Solo Dancer."

On listening to the "Color Symphony" by the young English composer Arthur Bliss, played in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, I could not but think how much more appropriate an odor program would have been than the color scheme used. It consisted of four words: I. Purple. II. Red III Blue. IV. Green. Only these and nothing more.

Hen, Fox, Hyena, Salmon

Now, there was absolutely nothing in the music of the four sections to show why these colors should not have been changed about at will. The thing was simply silly, childish. No reason why the four movements could not have been quite as appropriately called Hen, Fox, Hyena, Salmon, or Knife, Fork, Spoon, and Fingerbowl. A good deal of pseudo-æsthetic rot has been written about hearing colors, or the association of certain colors with certain sounds; but there is no such thing in normal minds not addicted to occultism.

It is said that Mr. Bliss did not write this work with any color associations in his imagination but adopted the title at the suggestion of a friend. If he had come to me for suggestions I would—after hearing the composition—have said, "call it the Malodorous Symphony.' Bear in mind that it would be impossible to find any colors as hideous as the sounds you often produce, but in the realms of odors it's the easiest thing in the world to do so. I suggest as appropriate heads for your four movements: I Rotten Potatoes. II Sulphuretted Hydrogen. III B flats (cimex lectularius). V Quintessence of Skunk.'

Hastening the Death of Music

In giving such advice I would not have wished to be discourteous or flippant, but simply desirous to make it clear that such cacophonic noises as Mr. Bliss preferably makes in his symphony affect normal ears just as disagreeably as the stinks named distress the nose. For an orchestral conductor to offer such malodorous music to an audience accustomed to fragrant music is—well, what would happen to the owner of a perfumery store if he sold to his customers bottles of that sort of thing in place of the fragrant flower essences from the Riviera or Roumania? How long would his business last?

Repeatedly I have expressed my opinion that music is a dying art. The cacophonists are doing their best to increase the number of empty benches in our concert halls which is already disquietingly large. They should not be allowed to force their way into subscription concerts. Of course, its all right when they and their friends get together for a dissonantal pow-wow in a small theatre, as some of them did last night to hear pieces by Bax, Bartok Schoenberg and Berners. I imagine they really enjoyed their exclusive menu of Yarmouth bloaters, paprika and live limburger royally. They had some fine artists to serve the dishes: Yolanda Mero, Ruth Rodgers, Clarence and Joseph Adler and Albert Stoessel.

Thibaud Plays Mozart

To come back for a moment to the Bliss symphony and Monteux's concert. There were fragrant moments in the symphony which indicate that if the composer got over his "futuristic" [illegible] aberration of taste there might be [illegible] for him. Very [illegible] was [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES

JAN 6 - 1924

'Color Symphony' Played.

By OLIN DOWNES.

Arthur Bliss's "Color Symphony" was played for the first time in New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. Jacques Thibaud was the soloist at this concert, playing the Mozart violin concerto in E-flat. The program opened with Brahms's "Tragic" overture and came to an end with the first set of orchestral excerpts from Maurice Ravel's music for the ballet "Daphnis et Cloe," mounted by the Ballet Russe in Paris in 1912.

We have been told that when Mr. Bliss composed this symphony it had not a title. An intimate friend, however, believed that he should give a work, apparently of a highly subjective character, some name that would provide a more individual designation than symphony number this or that. Questioned, Mr. Bliss admitted that there had been strongly present in his mind, while writing the symphony, impressions, or feelings, associated with color. Hence the "Color Symphony"—and there is a good deal in a name.

It so happened that, owing to those admirable arrangements by which one cannot obtain within the auditorium of Carnegie Hall a Boston Symphony program book with the invaluable notes of Mr. Philip Hale, THE TIMES reviewer listened to the "Color Symphony" with as much innocence of the composer's intentions as he hopes he w[illegible] without prejudice concerning his work. This was the case in spite of the fact that the reviewer had heard the "Color Symphony" when it was performed in Boston. On that occasion he had hastened into the concert hall without time to read about Mr. Bliss and his ideas and had only glimpses of the description titles of the four movements of the symphony as he sat down. These titles are "Purple," "Red," "Blue," "Green." Yesterday memory became confused. Lacking any program at the moment there was the belief, amounting to conviction, that the first movement was "Red" and that the second was "Blue." About the other colors the reviewer was vague, and, besides, he is somewhat color blind!

Has he, then, any right to record a critical estimate of this interesting symphony? Mr. Bliss might say no. Nevertheless, color blind or not, the writer never hears any piece of music without a color impression. Thus the color of the key of C major is synymous to him with white, although the blazing C major chord at the opening of Strauss's tone poem, "Also Sprach Zarathustra," is to him of blinding gold. In these cases, why? Because (1) the key of C major on the piano has not black notes, and as a child presented to him a heaven of uncomplicated whiteness when he had to finger Czerny exercises, and (2) because the opening of Strauss's tone poem, avowed and achieved, is a superb evocation of golden sunrise. He heard as a child Rubinstein's melody in F played by a solo violin against an organ accomanimant, and that melody seemed to him gold—gold coming down through a radiant mist in the skies. Not that he feels that way today about it. Schubert's "Unfinished Sycphony" seemed a thing of blues, reds and greens.

The point is that most people see color when they hear music, but there is great doubt if many see the same color, or whether, if they saw a given color, they would immediately think of a certain kind of music. Something else is important. Is not color emotionally suggestive, principally through the operation of contrast? Is it not the relation between color and color just as it is the relation between chord and chord, rather than colors and chords in themselves, which gives the emotion of color?

If the "Color Symphony" is discussed as music itself, irrespective of its title, it is a composition of considerable interest. It is, at least, the exciting expression of a temperament youthful, nervous, vivid, of today. Mr. Bliss writes brilliantly, if at too great length. Sometimes he achieves passages of exceptional beauty—though these are seldom unindebted to other modern composers—and more than once he evolves a passage of counterpoint or harmonic dissonance which makes one wish to stop the orchestra and hear that over again.

It is true that the "Color Symphony" would not be what it is if it were not for Igor Stravinsky. And then there is Maurice Ravel. Ravel and Stravinsky are difficult, ofcourse, for any modern to avoid. At one moment we thought we were at the fair of Petrouchka. But the double fugue at the end is a rousing piece of music. The voice of a solo oboe in one movement—in a symphony as yet so uncharted one can be little more exact than that—passages of harmonic pungency that befall in the scherzo-like movement that we now know meant "red"—these things make the listener sit up and ask "What next?" The "color symphony" now appears as the work of a young man of vigorous talent, searching, without fear, for that which is himself.

Mr. Thibaud played the Mozart concerto with a purity of a style which was never cold or merely objective, and with a feeling that lifted the hearer with the music to the skies, and Mr. Monteux collaborated admirably with the modest and disinguished master of his instrument. There was a sound and virile reading of the Brahms overture, which has indeed passages that might accompany a tragedy of Sophocles, and there was the virtuoso performance by a superb orchestra and the leader who has made it what it is of a virtuoso composition—the music to "Daphnis and Cloe." A score which is to us far more of a color symphony than the work of Mr. Bliss. It seems partly music and partly a blend of music and an impressionistic pictorial art, on the borderland between that of the composer and the painter. Without the complete [illegible]anding and the authority of Mr. [illegible] this singular music might [illegible] far short of comprehension.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
SPRINGFIELD
MASS.
UNION

JAN 7 - 1924

4500 PACK HALL TO HEAR BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAY

Pierre Monteux Gives Brilliant Reading of Beethoven's Seventh, Wagner and Ravel.

Everyone who possibly could crowd into the Auditorium turned out yesterday to hear the annual concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, given under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A. It was estimated that about 4500 persons heard the concert and Secretary Hoover announced from the stage that it had been necessary to close the doors on 500. The Mahogany Room and the foyer were filled and as many stood at the rear and side of the Auditorium as were allowed to do so. Rev. Thomas Tyrie read the Scriptures.

The concert marked the last appearance of Mr. Monteux in Springfield for he is scheduled to leave the Boston Symphony at the end of this season. To him belongs much praise for he has succeeded in bringing back the Boston Symphony Orchestra to its pre-ware brillance.

The program began with Beethoven's "Symphony in A major, No. 755 perhaps the noblest and most poetic of all his symphonies. Much could be written about this symphony but to everyone it must have an individual message. Wagner calls it the "apotheosis of the dance." The first performance of the symphony was in Vienna, Dec. 8, 1813.

Pre-Prohibition Dance.

Monteux gave it a virile reading bringing a wealth of poetry to the first movement (a poco sustenuto and vivace) and a real crispness to the allegretto and presto movements. It remained, however, for the last movement to stir the imagination to an almost hysterical pitch. One might close his eyes and imagine the New Year's celebrations before the advent of the 18th Amendment. It was played with utter abandon that could only be achieved by an organization so firm and so nearly perfect as the Boston Symphony.

Smetana's symphonic cycle, "Vltava," "My Country," is a conventional tone poem. In it the composer has endeavored to make his country, Czechoslavakia familiar to the world through his cycle of symphonic poems the second of which is "The Moldau," which the orchestra played.

In sharp contrast was the brilliant "Waltz," by Havel. It is modern in construction for the score was published in 1921. The music suggests a whirling mass of dancers. As the dance progresses the score grows wilder and wilder ,a steady pizzicati of double basses indicating the growing frenzy. It was sketched during the war, which may account for much of the spirit of orgy in it. Beneath the superficial gaiety there is a phase almost repulsive, emphasized by the repeated combinations in which the strings grate against the brass.

"Lohengrin" and "Tannhauser."

The last two numbers included the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the overture to "Tannhauser." There are few conductors who can make Wagner live the way Monteux can. The prelude especially must appeal to every lover of music. The vision of an angel host bearing in its midst the Holy Grail and the thrilling climax when the Grail is revealed in all its glory was magnificently portrayed by the conductor and his men. The overture is full of climaxes familiar to all, but ever new and interesting.

The Y. M. C. A. in bringing the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Springfield each year deserves the united thanks of all music lovers for Springfield would be singularly barren of orchestral music were it not for this yearly appearance, an appearance which makes it possible for hundreds of young people to hear the finest orchestra at no expense to themselves.

WILLARD M. CLARK.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE SPRINGFIELD
MASS.
UNION

JAN 9 - 1924

"Y" CONCERT TICKETS.

Fail to Benefit Holders Attendi[ng] Auditorium, One Complains.

To the Editor of The Union.

Sir: Sunday, I attended the conc[ert] given in the Auditorium by the Bo[s]ton Symphony Orchestra under [the] auspices of the Springfield Y. M. C. [A.] The crowd was a mammoth one, ma[ni]festing the high regard in which th[e] Boston Symphony Orchestra is hel[d] and denoting the interest, appreciation and confidence Springfield gives the local Y. M. C. A. for making it possible to witness such magnificent performances.

However, I'd like to say a word en passant regarding the distribution of tickets. It doesn't seem quite fair that those who have no tickets should be given the same privileges as those who have taken the care to procure them. I have always understood, heretofore, that those with tickets were given the precedence; and always I have undertaken to see that I had my little card ready to hand the attendant at the door. Yet, I have seen numbers without this particular requisite, entering before and sometimes aside of those who have shown themselves interested, enthusiastic and appreciative enough to get their tickets beforehand. The Y. M. C. A. may as well desist from printing and distributing the tickets for all the good they amount to.

MARIE A. DUPRE.
Springfield, Jan. 8, 1924.

SUNDAY CONCERT SEATS.

Trans Jan 10

MIAMI AND MIAMI BEACH

Better Anchorage Arrangements Yachts Which Arrive in Numbers— England Visitors

Special to the Transcript
Miami, Fla., Jan. 10—With the approach of the opening date of the Nautilus Hotel arrangements are being made for uninter[ru]pted water transportation between the hotel and the Flamingo Hotel, both Biscayne Bay. Scheduled runs will be between the two hotels.

winter visitors now arriving regu- Miami beach the Flamingo docks ing busier each day. The yacht owned by Jacob Brown, of Bos- grim, chartered by Louis Sher- York, and the Winsor and ow at the Flamingo, the first t arrivals.

veniences for lovers of e found at the Flamingo Yacht owners will find being moored to an- ged with uniformity. erty, dockmaster, has tain Sam Welch of the are for all fishing parties lamingo Hotel while at the ll be a new fishing e et of the to hich true hid- ing." Rhap- erflui- there detail. usic is ntal or as been estration ell as in the soul ion to his W. S. S.

"White and Gold"

Cecilia Hansen
Blond, Slender and Grave
New Violinist of the Year, to Be Heard in Boston Next Monda

[171]

10

MIAMI BEACH

horage Arrangements for ich Arrive in Numbers—New sitors

Transcript
Jan. 10—With the approach date of the Nautilus Hote are being made for uninter transportation between the the Flamingo Hotel, both
ay. Scheduled runs will be the two hotels.
visitors now arriving regubeach the Flamingo docks busier each day. The yacht ed by Jacob Brown, of Bosim, chartered by Louis Sher-York, and the Winsor and ow at the Flamingo, the first ent arrivals.
conveniences for lovers of will be found at the Flamingo son. Yacht owners will find ft are being moored to an-arranged with uniformity.
n Haggerty, dockmaster, has Captain Sam Welch of the for all fishing parties mingo Hotel while at the ll be a new fishing

old"

Next Monda

Jan 11

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN 11TH CONCERT

Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 6 in G Minor Is Given

By PHILIP HALE

The 11th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: d'Indy, Symphony on a French Mountain Air (E. Robert Schmitz, pianist); Gliere, "The Sirens," symphonic poem (first time in Boston); Gilbert, Negro Rhapsody ("Shout"), first time in Boston.

Handel's concerto not only showed the splendor of the string section; it gave pleasure by its solemn majesty and by the freshness of the lively movements. How was it that Handel, writing apparently in simplest manner and with a few chords, could give in slow measure an impression of dignity approaching awe, and incite the hearer to profound contemplation of things not earthly? Hearing this music, one could understand Beethoven's admiration for the master. Our modern composers are like Hannibal, pretty fellows in their day, but with all the resources of a huge orchestra they cannot so move the soul. The strings played superbly and Mr. Theodorowicz, concert master in the absence of Mr. Burgin, played brilliantly and with full rich tone the solo passages.

D'Indy's Symphony on a French Mountain Air was first played 37 years ago. It must be ranked among his triumphant works. For of this symphony one cannot say that it is purely "cerebral," "intellectual," reproaches that have been made, sometimes justly, sometimes unjustly against his later works. In this symphony his invention never flags. There is no pedantic treatment of his theme; there is not the austerity to be found in some of his later compositions, no austerity that is dangerously near dryness. Here he lets himself go without too constant thought of Cesar Franck. Here he is wholly human and not afraid of speaking frankly to his audience. His technical mastery serves only beauty and eloquence. He demands for the performance a virtuoso orchestra and a virtuoso pianist; above all, a conductor who is intelligently sympathetic. The symphony does not call for any marked emotional display on the part of the pianist, who is an instrument in the ensemble; it does require a pianist who is a musician as well as a virtuoso, and Mr. Schmitz answers this description. The result was a memorable performance, one that electrified the audience.

Gliere in his "Sirens" set for himself a difficult task. To suggest the sea, its calm, its swelling billows, its rage, is not beyond the limits of descriptive music. Debussy and Rimsky-Korsakov have shown this, but to sing the song of the sirens, there's the rub. Sir Thomas Browne said that this song was not beyond all conjecture, but Gliere has not re-sung it. Anyone with a poetic imagination can hear the sirens sing more ravishing strains than any composer has yet put in their mouths. The symphonic poem as a whole was disappointing; rather conventional in expression, rather monotonous in its repetitions of phrases not skilfully varied. The one imaginative touch is at the very end when the sinking of the ship is suggested, with its descent to the ocean depths. This is well contrived, and the diminuendo is singularly effective. Yet such is the baleful influence of association of ideas that, hearing these final measures, we could not help thinking of the old song: "Down Went McGinty to the Bottom of the Sea."

Mr. Gilbert's Rhapsody is founded on two negro spirituals: "Where do you think I found my soul?" and "You may bury me in the East." It is intended to be a tonal picture of a negro "Shout," a religious nocturnal meeting where there is wild singing and delirious dancing. The Rhapsody suffers from an abuse of the brass choir. To be sure, the spiritual says that the singer will hear the trumpet, but the audience heard all the brass too often. Mr. Gilbert has written more interesting and more effective compositions. The portion of the Rhapsody that is the most musical is the introduction with the first treatment of the second spiritual.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Dvorak, Overture "Carnival"; Brahms, Concerto for violin (Mr. Burgin) and 'cello (Mr. Bedetti); Debussy, Symphonic Excerpts from "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian" (first time at these concerts); Liszt, Mephisto Waltz.

New and Notable

Auer prepared the way when he wrote of her in his book of memories "as one of the most talented of his pupils." He recalled her in particular, "as a charming little girl of eleven or twelve, who came to me one day with tears in her eyes and told me that she wished above all things to keep on attending my class; but that rebellious students of the university had threatened to throw vitriol in her face if she dared to show herself there." Mr. Gilman smoothed her path when, after her first concert in New York, he pictured her as "blonde, slender and grave—a Whistlerian study in white and gold." With the other reviewers he wrote large her praises as violinist. And so it is that Cecelia Hansen, Dane out of Petrograd, virtuosa out of Berlin, "a quiet girl not far within her twenties," comes to play next Monday with the Symphony Orchestra. Obviously she is good to see while by such report, she is also good to hear. Her tone is her distinctive merit, "large, mellow and opulent with a dark beauty that rejoices the ear." She has "sensibility, intelligence and musical feeling." A touch of the "grand manner" even haunts her playing. For the while she is not youth eager and aglow, but youth calm, cool, taking serious and conscious pains, less daring the risks than dreading the penalties. From Heifetz onward, so walks this brood of Auer.

H. T. P.

Jan 12

Recurrence in Interest will amount to $35,000

SYMPHONY PROGRAM PLEASES AUDIENCE

Handel, d'Indy, Gilbert and Gliere Heard

If volume of applause is any test, yesterday's Symphony program gave the audience unsuals pleasure. After d'Indy's "Symphony on a Mountain Air," E Robert Schmitz, who had played the piano solo part, was recalled many times, and finally Mr Monteux came out with him and bade the orchestra rise. After Handel's Concerto Grosse for strings, Julius Theodorowicz, who had played the violin solos in the absence of Richard Burgin, was singled out by conductor and audience for a special round of applause.

Gliere's rhapsody, "The Sirens," was so well received that the orchestra had to rise and bow. Mr Gilbert was called to the stage several times at the close of the concert to acknowledge the applause given his "Negro Rhapsody."

There was no familiar classic and no disturbing modern piece on the program. Handel's Concerto Grosse in G minor was last heard here in 1895. Although the other composers represented are all living, none of them is to be numbered among the musical radicals like Honegger, Bliss, and Schoenberg, whose music is received at these concerts in pained silence punctuated by a few feebly daring hisses and a few more fervent but isolated handclappings.

Mr Monteaux has never shown greater sympathy for the 18th century than he showed yesterday in the first larghetto of Handel's concerto. Indeed, save for over strong accentuation and occasionally muddled phrasing, the performance of this Handel piece was one of the best of the season, and quite able to stand comparison with the golden age before the war which still sets the standard of some frequenters of these concerts.

D'Indy's music dates from the 1880's when he was trying unsuccessfully not to write like Wagner. It is akin in mood to Franck when he is being exuberant and letting one forget his much advertised mysticism, as in "Le Chasseur Maudit." This music is lively, sometimes rather vulgar, suggesting to one listener Offenbach using a different idiom. It is based on a single theme, with that French passion for superficial logic which has stultified so much modern French music, including not a little of d'Indy's own. The lack of austerity alone saves this piece from dullness. The performance was eloquent, and the soloist's share in it competent.

Gliere did not make one feel that he had ever heard the sirens sing, though there was little doubt that he had heard and profited by Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scherezade." Debussy has imagined the sirens once and for all in the third of his "Nocturnes" for orchestra. Gliere succeeded in a few pages near the beginning in suggesting the sea with exceptional vividness by means of an astonishingly clever use of familiar orchestral effects. But beyond that passage his music lacked imagination.

Mr Gilbert's "Negro Rhapsody" dates from a decade ago, when he was endeavoring to evolve a distinctively American music which should employ negro idioms and themes. It is a rather long-winded pot-pourri of negro songs and dances, far less vivid than his "Dance in the Place Congo." He has written later and better music than this, some of it already heard here.

His is a genuine and great talent, which has never, if one may judge from the works heard here in the past decade, quite found itself. Yet his music is always worth at least one hearing, often worth many. If he were, say, a Frenchman, there are those in this city who would pay more attention to his work. Like the proverbial prophet, the local composer does not always get his due in a provincial capital.

Next week Messrs Burgin and Bedetti will play Brahms' Double Concerto for violin and violoncello with the orchestra. Dvorak's "Carnival" overture, some unfamiliar excerpts from Debussy's music for d'Annunzio's "Martyrdom of St Sebastian" and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz" [illegible] numbers announ[illegible]

R.

Trans Jan 12

A "PATHETIC" TRIUMPHAL

Mr. Monteux Guides Chaikowsky's Beleaguered Symphony to Torrential Climax—The Piece Prevailing Undeniably —Miss Hansen Fluently

If there be any who still harbor the belief that Mr. Monteux is an unemotional, "uninspired" conductor, a hearing of the performance of Chaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony at Symphony Hall last evening would have undeceived them. Without wringing from the music its ultimate tear-drop and without goading it to maniacal frenzies—he is too much the artist for that—Mr. Monteux yet contrived to keep it everywhere vital, throbbing, alive, and a more vived, exciting performance of the Scherzo has not been heard here in many a day. With unflagging rhythm Mr. Monteux here piled climax upon climax, plied voice against voice, timbre against timbre, until at the end the music flamed, cut the ear like a sword. Small wonder that the men of the orchestra must rise from their chairs before the Symphony could proceed. Not the torrential Safonov himself might have given this amazing movement a more thrilling progress. And after such breath-taking, pulse-quickening excitements the Finale came for once as the only fitting sequence. Not as hysterical caterwauling or as unmanly whining does Mr. Monteux conceive this thenody. In his version of it is not so much the thought of unconsolable grief as of a sorrowful submission to the inevitable, a half-despairing resignation. From the depths the "Pathetic" Symphony rises; to the depths it returns. The circle is complete. Last night it seemed that not otherwise could Chaikovsky have wrought it. Indeed in a performance so free of theatricalism and sentimental excess, yet withal so pervadingly eloquent, so persistently moving, the "Pathetic" became, not the wailings of a "neurasthenic Jeremiah with a faculty for orchestration" nor even the expression of a wholly personal grief, but rather the voice of cosmic sorrow, a universal hopelessness. . . . Not the accepted estimate of Chaikovsky's music is this. But was the man so small, so pitifully self-centred as commonly he is supposed to have been? Introspective he was, beyond a doubt, and often tormented by his own consciousness. Yet this Symphony that, despite snubs and sneers and carping criticism, continues to fire conductors and players and to enthrall audiences is too vast a thing to be the mere voicing of any individual woe. Chaikovsky spoke here not only for himself, but for all humanity as well. Admittedly the "Pathetic" is tragic music. Then let Chaikovsky be placed, as he deserves, with the makers of tragedy. Not altogether is he the subjective, self-tortured Slav. There is in the progress and cumulation of the "Pathetic" Symphony something of Greek inevitableness and epic breadth.

As to the precise nature of the emotional content of the "Pathetic" Symphony there will no doubt long be many opinions. But recently Ernest Newman dismissed it as pathological, a thing from which any sound man would turn shuddering. Yet the architectural solidity of this music, its firmness of texture, its freedom from padding, its masterly instrumentation, these things are incontestable. It w[illegible] perilous to affirm that the "Pathetic" Symphony will not in the end take place among the classics of the fo[illegible] among the monuments of music. Who [illegible] point to another among the symphon[illegible] since Beethoven at once so markedly [illegible]dividual, so continuously inspired, and finely wrought?

For the rest the story of last evening concert may soon be told. As "assi[illegible] artist" Cecilia Hansen, a violinist ne[illegible] Boston, played Bruch's smug and [illegible]tudinous Concerto in G minor. [illegible] blonde and beautiful, Miss Hansen a[illegible] the concert-platform by her physical [illegible]ence and within its limitations her playing delights the ear. Her tone is full, vibrant, rich or sweet as the music may demand. Her bowing is free, her fingers sure. No doubt Miss Hansen played this shop-worn Concerto quite as well as it deserved to be played. But she did not glorify or illumine it as a violinist of the fullest stature might have done. She played it gracefully, fluently, broadly or songfully, and at times brilliantly. And that was all. A pity then that she did not set herself a more grateful, more rewarding task.

Between Symphony and Concerto came last evening Smetana's pictorial "The Moldau," heard last week at Cambridge and as in Sanders Theatre Thursday, so in Symphony Hall Monday Wagner's puissant Overture to the "Flying Dutchman" also had place on the programme. Since the performances of both tone-poem and Overture have but lately been reviewed here, suffice it to say that last evening these pieces were once more eloquently played. From Chaikovsky's groaning bassoon to Wagner's radiant final chord conductor and orchestra were throughout the evening on their mettle.

W. S. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

SPRINGFIELD
MASS.
REPUBLICAN

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA GIVES SPLENDID CONCERT

Pierre Monteux Conducts Satisfying Program in Auditorium Before Large and Appreciative Audience

By FRANCIS REGAL

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave its 30th concert in Springfield yesterday afternoon in the Auditorium for the crowning feature of the season of Young Men's Christian association entertainments. As always, the demand for places exceeded the supply; not all could get in, many who could not find seats, stood unwearied through a long, but stimulating, program.

Of the 30 concerts which this famous orchestra has given here in something like 30 years, this was one of the best, and it was pleasant to have the last concert in the city which Pierre Monteux is to conduct, so satisfying in every respect. As a conducter, during the past four years, he has had trying experiences, due to circumstances over which he had no control, and has come through with honor and distinction. There were times when it seemed a question whether Boston's glorious orchestra would survive, and it was a great relief to music lovers when it was at last seen to be regaining its old place. It is not the old orchestra; the changes of personnel and of leadership could not fail to modify its character profoundly, but it is a very fine orchestra indeed, and its performance yesterday was in most respects highly finished and quite exceptionally interesting.

The program was all that a program for such an occasion should be—fresh and vital, with no dead spots and no music that is better than it sounds; it made room for a great classic, for several great favorites and for an interesting novelty. First came Beethoven's seventh symphony, the majestic power and exhilarating rhythms of which set the key for this afternoon. After the intermission, the orchestra played Smetana's symphonic tone poem, "The Moldan," Ravel's "La Valse," and two Wagner numbers, the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the overture to "Tannhauser."

Such a performance as was given of the A major symphony would in itself make the fortune of a concert. In the interpretation there was nothing novel or sensational, and in technical excellence it would be impossible to surpass some performances of the past. Nor did Mr Monteux make the slightest visible effort to stir the players to an extraordinary effort; indeed the modest simplicity and quietness of his manner is one of the attractive qualities of his conducting. There are conductors who try, perhaps with unconscious egotism, to make the audience think they are pulling every melody by main force out of the sulky and reluctant instruments; of this charlatanism Mr Monteux has not a trace. He and the orchestra work together and work together very well; his successor will have to work hard to surpass yesterday's performance.

Something may have been due to the occasion. To the Boston Symphony orchestra in its 43d season the seventh symphony is a very old story indeed, but it is an unusual experience to play it in a fine and acoustically perfect auditorium to an audience of over 4000 people, to the majority of whom it is quite fresh. Something of this freshness seemed to communicate itself to the players, and from the very opening the performance was full of life. In popularity this ranks second only to the fifth, and rivals that in geniality if not in concentrated power. If it ever seems heavy and dull it is because musicians or auditors, or both, are for the moment not keyed up to the bubbling vivacity of the dance rhythms out of which this great symphonic structure is built. Yesterday everyone was in the mood, the keen bright day gave snap and brilliance to the strings, and every note was inspiring.

There was no falling off in the beau-

(Continued From First Page)

tiful symphonic poem by Smetana, a Bohemian composer, who carries heavier metal than his gifted and better-known compatriot, Dvorak. Not less thoroughly Czech, Smetana is even more original and has a streak of genius of almost the highest order, which developed somewhat roughly and carelessly, yet produced a few masterpieces, among which this symphonic poem from the set called "My Country" must certainly be ranked; in its own kind of poetic charm it has few rivals. In this much depends on the first violins, and it was pleasing to see to what extent this section, for which the orchestra used to be specially famous, has recovered its old standing. The quality of its pianissimo was always lovely, though one had the feeling that many of the players were going through the motions and letting the specially beautiful soft tones of Mr Burgin color the whole.

The novelty of the afternoon and an interesting one, was Ravel's "choreographic poem," "The Waltz." Ravel is put among the fashionable rather than the popular composers, and is known chiefly by rather advanced chamber music at which the classicists still shake their heads. But "The Waltz" is capital jazz, including

---

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE FEBRUARY 12

Worcester Gaz (?)

Will Be Local Farewell to Pierre Monteux, Conductor

Jan 13

A visit of paramount importance in the musical season here will be a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Mechanics Hall on Tuesday evening, Feb. 12.

This concert bears double interest because it comes after three years' absence from this city, and because it will be in the nature of a farewell to Pierre Monteux who completes this season his five year term as conductor of the orchestra. Much to the regret of his large American public, the noted French leader intends to return to Paris in the spring.

Pierre Monteux appeared here at the head of the orchestra in his first two seasons, 1920 and 1921. Now in his fifth year at this post he is generally said to have brought the quality of the performance to the highest degree of marvelous perfection.

He first came to America at the head of Diaghileff's Ballet Russe, having won much fame in the old world as conductor of the principal orchestras of Paris and in the larger opera houses of Europe. He was particularly noted for the concerts Monteux at the Paris Casino, and likewise for his conducting of the Ballet Russe, with which he toured Europe before coming here. Previous to his present post, he was the French conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York.

A program of particular interest is being planned by Mr. Monteux, which will be at once directly enjoyable to the layman and contain the greatest achievements in orchestral repertory.

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT MECHANICS

JAN 13 1924

After an absence of three years, the Boston Symphony orchestra is to return to Worcester to give a concert in Mechanics hall, Tuesday evening, Feb. 12. The event will be one of the most important in the Worcester season, not only on account of the orchestra, which is considered one of the very finest of its kind in the world, but because this is the farewell season of Pierre Monteux as its conductor.

Pierre Monteux appeared here at the head of the orchestra in his first two seasons—1920 and 1921. Now completing his five-year term, he is generally said to have brought the quality of the performances to the highest degree of marvelous perfection, rivaling its eloquence in any past season of its long and illustrious history. There is considerable regret at the pending departure of this most distinguished of French conductors.

He first came to America at the head of Diaghileff's Ballet Russe, having won much fame in the Old World as conductor of the principal orchestras of Paris and in the larger opera houses of Europe. He was particularly noted for the Concerts Monteux at the Paris Casino, and likewise for his conducting of the Ballet Russe, with which he toured Europe before coming here. Previous to his present post, he was the French conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York.

It is as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, however, that he is considered to have reached the highest degree of his executive and interpretative genius. The program which Pierre Monteux is preparing for Worcester will be of the highest beauty and brilliance and likewise have popular appeal.

Worcester Times (?)

MAKE CHANGE AT

[172]

10

AND MIAMI BEACH

chorage Arrangements fo ich Arrive in Numbers—New sitors

Transcript

, Jan. 10—With the approach g date of the Nautilus Hote are being made for uninter transportation between the d the Flamingo Hotel, both Bay. Scheduled runs will be n the two hotels.

r visitors now arriving regu beach the Flamingo docks busier each day. The yacht ed by Jacob Brown, of Bos im, chartered by Louis Sher York, and the Winsor and ow at the Flamingo, the first ent arrivals.

conveniences for lovers of ill be found at the Flamingo son. Yacht owners will find ft are being moored to an arranged with uniformity. n Haggerty, dockmaster, has Captain Sam Welch of the care for all fishing parties mingo Hotel while at the ill be a new fishing old"

Next Monda

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN 11TH CONCERT

Herald Jan 11

Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 6 in G Minor Is Given

By PHILIP HALE

The 11th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: d'Indy, Symphony on a French Mountain Air (E. Robert Schmitz, pianist); Gliere, "The Sirens," symphonic poem (first time in Boston); Gilbert, Negro Rhapsody ("Shout"), first time in Boston.

Handel's concerto not only showed the splendor of the string section, it gave pleasure by its solemn majesty and by the freshness of the lively movements. How was it that Handel, writing apparently in simplest manner and with a few chords, could give in slow measure an impression of dignity approaching awe, and incite the hearer to profound contemplation of things not earthly? Hearing this music, one could understand Beethoven's admiration for the master. Our modern composers are like Hannibal, pretty fellows in their day, but with all the resources of a huge orchestra they cannot so move the soul. The strings played superbly and Mr. Theodorowicz, concert master in the absence of Mr. Burgin, played brilliantly and with full rich tone the solo passages.

D'Indy's Symphony on a French Mountain Air was first played 37 years ago. It must be ranked among his triumphant works. For of this symphony one cannot say that it is purely "cerebral," "intellectual," reproaches that have been made, sometimes justly, sometimes unjustly against his later works. In this symphony his invention never flags. There is no pedantic treatment of his theme; there is not the austerity to be found in some of his later compositions, no austerity that is dangerously near dryness. Here he lets himself go without too constant thought of Cesar Franck. Here he is wholly human and not afraid of speaking frankly to his audience. His technical mastery serves only beauty and eloquence. He demands for the performance a virtuoso orchestra and a virtuoso pianist; above all, a conductor who is intelligently sympathetic. The symphony does not call for any marked emotional display on the part of the pianist, who is an instrument in the ensemble; it does require a pianist who is a musician as well as a virtuoso, and Mr. Schmitz answers this description. The result was a memorable performance, one that electrified the audience.

Gliere in his "Sirens" set for himself a difficult task. To suggest the sea, its calm, its swelling billows, its rage, is not beyond the limits of descriptive music. Debussy and Rimsky-Korsakov have shown this, but to sing the song of the sirens, there's the rub. Sir Thomas Browne said that this song was not beyond all conjecture, but Gliere has not re-sung it. Anyone with a poetic imagination can hear the sirens sing more ravishing strains than any composer has yet put in their mouths. The symphonic poem as a whole was disappointing; rather conventional in expression, rather monotonous in its repetitions of phrases not skilfully varied. The one imaginative touch is at the very end when the sinking of the ship is suggested, with its descent to the ocean depths. This is well contrived, and the diminuendo is singularly effective. Yet such is the baleful influence of association of ideas that, hearing these final measures, we could not help thinking of the old song: "Down Went McGinty to the Bottom of the Sea."

Mr. Gilbert's Rhapsody is founded on two negro spirituals: "Where do you think I found my soul?" and "You may bury me in the East." It is intended to be a tonal picture of a negro "Shout," a religious nocturnal meeting where there is wild singing and delirious dancing. The Rhapsody suffers from an abuse of the brass choir. To be sure, the spiritual says that the singer will hear the trumpet, but the audience heard all the brass too often. Mr. Gilbert has written more interesting and more effective compositions. The portion of the Rhapsody that is the most musical is the introduction with the first treatment of the second spiritual.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Dvorak, Overture "Carnival"; Brahms, Concerto for violin (Mr. Burgin) and 'cello (Mr. Bedetti); Debussy, Symphonic Excerpts from "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian" (first time at these concerts); Liszt, Mephisto Waltz.

New and Notable

Auer prepared the way when he wrote of her in his book of memories "as one of the most talented of his pupils." He recalled her in particular, "as a charming little girl of eleven or twelve, who came to me one day with tears in her eyes and told me that she wished above all things to keep on attending my class; but that rebellious students of the university had threatened to throw vitriol in her face if she dared to show herself there." Mr. Gilman smoothed her path when, after her first concert in New York, he pictured her as "blonde, slender and grave—a Whistlerian study in white and gold." With the other reviewers he wrote large her praises as violinist. And so it is that Cecelia Hansen, Dane out of Petrograd, virtuosa out of Berlin, "a quiet girl not far within her twenties," comes to play next Monday with the Symphony Orchestra. Obviously she is good to see while by such report, she is also good to hear. Her tone is her distinctive merit, "large, mellow and opulent with a dark beauty that rejoices the ear." She has "sensibility, intelligence and musical feeling." A touch of the "grand manner" even haunts her playing. For the while she is not youth eager and aglow, but youth calm, cool, taking serious and conscious pains, less daring the risks than dreading the penalties. From Heifetz onward, so walks this brood of Auer.

H. T. P.

Globe Jan 12

ifference in interest will amount to $35,000.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM PLEASES AUDIENCE

Handel, d'Indy, Gilbert and Gliere Heard

If volume of applause is any test, yesterday's Symphony program gave the audience unusuals pleasure. After d'Indy's "Symphony on a Mountain Air," E Robert Schmitz, who had played the piano solo part, was recalled many times, and finally Mr Monteux came out with him and bade the orchestra rise. After Handel's Concerto Grosse for strings, Julius Theodorowicz, who had played the violin solos in the absence of Richard Burgin, was singled out by conductor and audience for a special round of applause.

Gliere's rhapsody, "The Sirens," was so well received that the orchestra had to rise and bow. Mr Gilbert was called to the stage several times at the close of the concert to acknowledge the applause given his "Negro Rhapsody."

There was no familiar classic and no disturbing modern piece on the program. Handel's Concerto Grosse in G minor was last heard here in 1895. Although the other composers represented are all living, none of them is to be numbered among the musical radicals like Honegger, Bliss, and Schoenberg, whose music is received at these concerts in pained silence punctuated by a few feebly daring hisses and a few more fervent but isolated handclappings.

Mr Monteaux has never shown greater sympathy for the 18th century than he showed yesterday in the first larghetto of Handel's concerto. Indeed, save for over strong accentuation and occasionally muddled phrasing, the performance of this Handel piece was one of the best of the season, and quite able to stand comparison with the golden age before the war which still sets the standard of some frequenters of these concerts.

D'Indy's music dates from the 1880's when he was trying unsuccessfully not to write like Wagner. It is akin in mood to Franck when he is being exuberant and letting one forget his much advertised mysticism, as in "Le Chasseur Maudit." This music is lively, sometimes rather vulgar, suggesting to one listener Offenbach using a different idiom. It is based on a single theme, with that French passion for superficial logic which has stultified so much modern French music, including not a little of d'Indy's own. The lack of austerity alone saves this piece from dullness. The performance was eloquent, and the soloist's share in it competent.

Gliere did not make one feel that he had ever heard the sirens sing, though there was little doubt that he had heard and profited by Rimsky-Korsakov's "Schererezade." Debussy has imagined the sirens once and for all in the third of his "Nocturnes" for orchestra. Gliere succeeded in a few pages near the beginning in suggesting the sea with exceptional vividness by means of an astonishingly clever use of familiar orchestral effects. But beyond that passage his music lacked imagination.

Mr Gilbert's "Negro Rhapsody" dates from a decade ago, when he was endeavoring to evolve a distinctively American music which should employ negro idioms and themes. It is a rather long-winded pot-pourri of negro songs and dances, far less vivid than his "Dance in the Place Congo." He has written later and better music than this, some of it already heard here.

His is a genuine and great talent, which has never, if one may judge from the works heard here in the past decade, quite found itself. Yet his music is always worth at least one hearing, often worth many. If he were, say, a Frenchman, there are those in this city who would pay more attention to his work. Like the proverbial prophet, the local composer does not always get his due in a provincial capital.

Next week Messrs Burgin and Bedetti will play Brahms' Double Concerto for violin and violoncello with the orchesra. Dvorak's "Carnival" overture, ome unfamiliar excerpts from Debussy's music for d'Annunzio's "Martyrom of St Sebastian" and Liszt's "Mehisto Waltz" numbers nnoun

R.

Trans Jan 12

A "PATHETIC" TRIUMPHAL

Mr. Monteux Guides Chaikowsky's Beleaguered Symphony to Torrential Climax—The Piece Prevailing Undeniably —Miss Hansen Fluently

If there be any who still harbor the belief that Mr. Monteux is an unemotional, "uninspired" conductor, a hearing of the performance of Chaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony at Symphony Hall last evening would have undeceived them. Without wringing from the music its ultimate tear-drop and without goading it to maniacal frenzies—he is too much the artist for that—Mr. Monteux yet contrived to keep it everywhere vital, throbbing, alive, and a more vived, exciting performance of the Scherzo has not been heard here in many a day. With unflagging rhythm Mr. Monteux here piled climax upon climax, plied voice against voice, timbre against timbre, until at the end the music flamed, cut the ear like a sword. Small wonder that the men of the orchestra must rise from their chairs before the Symphony could proceed. Not the torrential Safonov himself might have given this amazing movement a more thrilling progress. And after such breath-taking, pulse-quickening excitements the Finale came for once as the only fitting sequence. Not as hysterical caterwauling or as unmanly whining does Mr. Monteux conceive this thenody. In his version of it is not so much the thought of unconsolable grief as of a sorrowful submission to the inevitable, a half-despairing resignation. From the depths the "Pathetic" Symphony rises; to the depths it returns. The circle is complete. Last night it seemed that not otherwise could Chaikovsky have wrought it. Indeed in a performance so free of theatricalism and sentimental excess, yet withal so pervadingly eloquent, so persistently moving, the "Pathetic" became, not the wailings of a "neurasthenic Jeremiah with a faculty for orchestration" nor even the expression of a wholly personal grief, but rather the voice of cosmic sorrow, a universal hopelessness. . . . Not the accepted estimate of Chaikovsky's music is this. But was the man so small, so pitifully self-centred as commonly he is supposed to have been? Introspective he was, beyond a doubt, and often tormented by his own consciousness. Yet this Symphony that, despite snubs and sneers and carping criticism, continues to fire conductors and players and to enthrall audiences is too vast a thing to be the mere voicing of any individual woe. Chaikovsky spoke here not only for himself, but for all humanity as well. Admittedly the "Pathetic" is tragic music. Then let Chaikovsky be placed, as he deserves, with the makers of tragedy. Not altogether is he the subjective, self-tortured Slav. There is in the progress and cumulation of the "Pathetic" Symphony something of Greek inevitableness and epic breadth.

As to the precise nature of the emo ional content of the "Pathetic" Symphon here will no doubt long be many opinion But recently Ernest Newman dismisse t as pathological, a thing from whi any sound man would turn shudderin Yet the architectural solidity of this mus its firmness of texture, its freedom fr padding, its masterly instrumentati these things are incontestable. It w perilous to affirm that the "Pathet Symphony will not in the end take place among the classics of the fo among the monuments of music. Who point to another among the sympho since Beethoven at once so markedly dividual, so continuously inspired, and finely wrought?

For the rest the story of last even concert may soon be told. As "assis artist" Cecilia Hansen, a violinist ne Boston, played Bruch's smug and itudinous Concerto in G minor. blonde and beautiful, Miss Hansen a the concert-platform by her physical ence and within its limitations her playing delights the ear. Her tone is full, vibrant rich or sweet as the music may demand. Her bowing is free, her fingers sure. No doubt Miss Hansen played this shop-worn Concerto quite as well as it deserved to be played. But she did not glorify or illumine it as a violinist of the fullest stature might have done. She played it gracefully, fluently, broadly or songfully, and at times brilliantly. And that was all. A pity then that she did not set herself a more grateful, more rewarding task.

Between Symphony and Concerto came last evening Smetana's pictorial "The Moldau," heard last week at Cambridge and as in Sanders Theatre Thursday, so in Symphony Hall Monday Wagner's puissant Overture to the "Flying Dutchman" also had place on the programme. Since the performances of both tone-poem and Overture have but lately been reviewed here, suffice it to say that last evening these pieces were once more eloquently played. From Chaikovsky's groaning bassoon to Wagner's radiant final chord conductor and orchestra were throughout the evening on their mettle.

W. S. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

SPRINGFIELD
MASS.
REPUBLICAN

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA GIVES SPLENDID CONCERT

Pierre Monteux Conducts Satisfying Program in Auditorium Before Large and Appreciative Audience

By FRANCIS REGAL

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave its 30th concert in Springfield yesterday afternoon in the Auditorium for the crowning feature of the season of Young Men's Christian association entertainments. As always, the demand for places exceeded the supply; not all could get in, many who could not find seats, stood unwearied through a long, but stimulating, program.

Of the 30 concerts which this famous orchestra has given here in something like 30 years, this was one of the best, and it was pleasant to have the last concert in the city which Pierre Monteux is to conduct, so satisfying in every respect. As a conducter, during the past four years, he has had trying experiences, due to circumstances over which he had no control, and has come through with honor and distinction. There were times when it seemed a question whether Boston's glorious orchestra would survive, and it was a great relief to music lovers when it was at last seen to be regaining its old place. It is not the old orchestra; the changes of personnel and of leadership could not fail to modify its character profoundly, but it is a very fine orchestra indeed, and its performance yesterday was in most respects highly finished and quite exceptionally interesting.

The program was all that a program for such an occasion should be—fresh and vital, with no dead spots and no music that is better than it sounds; it made room for a great classic, for several great favorites and for an interesting novelty. First came Beethoven's seventh symphony, the majestic power and exhilarating rhythms of which set the key for this afternoon. After the intermission, the orchestra played Smetana's symphonic tone poem, "The Moldan," Ravel's "La Valse," and two Wagner numbers, the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the overture to "Tannhauser."

Such a performance as was given of the A major symphony would in itself make the fortune of a concert. In the interpretation there was nothing novel or sensational, and in technical excellence it would be impossible to surpass some performances of the past. Nor did Mr Monteux make the slightest visible effort to stir the players to an extraordinary effort; indeed the modest simplicity and quietness of his manner is one of the attractive qualities of his conducting. There are conductors who try, perhaps with unconscious egotism, to make the audience think they are pulling every melody by main force out of the sulky and reluctant instruments; of this charlatanism Mr Monteux has not a trace. He and the orchestra work together and work together very well; his successor will have to work hard to surpass yesterday's performance.

Something may have been due to the occasion. To the Boston Symphony orchestra in its 43d season the seventh symphony is a very old story indeed, but it is an unusual experience to play it in a fine and acoustically perfect auditorium to an audience of over 4000 people, to the majority of whom it is quite fresh. Something of this freshness seemed to communicate itself to the players, and from the very opening the performance was full of life. In popularity this ranks second only to the fifth, and rivals that in geniality if not in concentrated power. If it ever seems heavy and dull it is because musicians or auditors, or both, are for the moment not keyed up to the bubbling vivacity of the dance rhythms out of which this great symphonic structure is built. Yesterday everyone was in the mood, the keen bright day gave snap and brilliance to the strings, and every note was inspiring.

There was no falling off in the beau-

(Continued From First Page)

tiful symphonic poem by Smetana, a Bohemian composer, who carries heavier metal than his gifted and better-known compatriot, Dvorak. Not less thoroughly Czech, Smetana is even more original and has a streak of genius of almost the highest order, which developed somewhat roughly and carelessly, yet produced a few masterpieces, among which this symphonic poem from the set called "My Country" must certainly be ranked; in its own kind of poetic charm it has few rivals. In this much depends on the first violins, and it was pleasing to see to what extent this section, for which the orchestra used to be specially famous, has recovered its old standing. The quality of its pianissimo was always lovely, though one had the feeling that many of the players were going through the motions and letting the specially beautiful soft tones of Mr Burgin color the whole.

The novelty of the afternoon and an interesting one, was Ravel's "choreographic poem," "The Waltz." Ravel is put among the fashionable rather than the popular composers, and is known chiefly by rather advanced chamber music at which the classicists still shake their heads. But "The Waltz" is capital jazz, including

---

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE FEBRUARY 12

Worcester Gaz(?)

Will Be 'Local Farewell' to Pierre Monteux, Conductor

Jan 13

A visit of paramount importance in the musical season here will be a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Mechanics Hall on Tuesday evening, Feb. 12.

This concert bears double interest because it comes after three years' absence from this city, and because it will be in the nature of a farewell to Pierre Monteux who completes this season his five year term as conductor of the orchestra. Much to the regret of his large American public, the noted French leader intends to return to Paris in the spring.

Pierre Monteux appeared here at the head of the orchestra in his first two seasons, 1920 and 1921. Now in his fifth year at this post he is generally said to have brought the quality of the performance to the highest degree of marvelous perfection.

He first came to America at the head of Diaghileff's Ballet Russe, having won much fame in the old world as conductor of the principal orchestras of Paris and in the larger opera houses of Europe. He was particularly noted for the concerts Monteux at the Paris Casino, and likewise for his conducting of the Ballet Russe, with which he toured Europe before coming here. Previous to his present post, he was the French conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York.

A program of particular interest is being planned by Mr. Monteux, which will be at once directly enjoyable to the layman and contain the greatest achievements in orchestral repertory.

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT MECHANICS

JAN 13

After an absence of three years, the Boston Symphony orchestra is to return to Worcester to give a concert in Mechanics hall, Tuesday evening, Feb. 12. The event will be one of the most important in the Worcester season, not only on account of the orchestra, which is considered one of the very finest of its kind in the world, but because this is the farewell season of Pierre Monteux as its conductor.

Pierre Monteux appeared here at the head of the orchestra in his first two seasons—1920 and 1921. Now completing his five-year term, he is generally said to have brought the quality of the performances to the highest degree of marvelous perfection, rivaling its eloquence in any past season of its long and illustrious history. There is considerable regret at the pending departure of this most distinguished of French conductors.

He first came to America at the head of Diaghileff's Ballet Russe, having won much fame in the Old World as conductor of the principal orchestras of Paris and in the larger opera houses of Europe. He was particularly noted for the Concerts Monteux at the Paris Casino, and likewise for his conducting of the Ballet Russe, with which he toured Europe before coming here. Previous to his present post, he was the French conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York.

It is as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, however, that he is considered to have reached the highest degree of his executive and interpretative genius. The program which Pierre Monteux is preparing for Worcester will be of the highest beauty and brilliance and likewise have popular appeal.

Worcester Times(?)

MAKE CHANGE AT

[172]

MIAMI BEACH

Arrangements for ve in Numbers—New ripts

0—With the approach of the Nautilus Hotel
ng made for uninter rtation between the lamingo Hotel, both heduled runs will be hotels.
now arriving regu
the Flamingo docks ch day. The yacht cob Brown, of Bos
ered by Louis Sher
d the Winsor and Flamingo, the first ls.
ces for lovers of nd at the Flamingo
t owners will find ng moored to an
with uniformity.
y, dockmaster, has Sam Welch of the ll fishing parties
tel while at the ha a new fishing

STON SYMPHONY N 11TH CONCERT

del's Concerto Grosso No. 6 in G Minor Is Given

By PHILIP HALE

The 11th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: d'Indy, Symphony on a French Mountain Air (E. Robert Schmitz, pianist); Gliere, "The Sirens," symphonic poem (first time in Boston); Gilbert, Negro Rhapsody ("Shout"), first time in Boston.

Handel's concerto not only showed the splendor of the string section, it gave pleasure by its solemn majesty and by the freshness of the lively movements. How was it that Handel, writing apparently in simplest manner and with a few chords, could give in slow measure an impression of dignity approaching awe, and incite the hearer to profound contemplation of things not earthly? Hearing this music, one could understand Beethoven's admiration for the master. Our modern composers are like Hannibal, pretty fellows in their day, but with all the resources of a huge orchestra they cannot so move the soul. The strings played superbly and Mr. Theodorowicz, concert master in the absence of Mr. Burgin, played brilliantly and with full rich tone the solo passages.

D'Indy's Symphony on a French Mountain Air was first played 37 years ago. It must be ranked among his triumphant works. For of this symphony one cannot say that it is purely "cerebral," "intellectual," reproaches that have been made, sometimes justly, sometimes unjustly against his later works. In this symphony his invention never flags. There is no pedantic treatment of his theme; there is not the austerity to be found in some of his later compositions, no austerity that is dangerously near dryness. Here he lets himself go without too constant thought of Cesar Franck. Here he is wholly human and not afraid of speaking frankly to his audience. His technical mastery serves only beauty and eloquence. He demands for the performance a virtuoso orchestra and a virtuoso pianist; above all, a conductor who is intelligently sympathetic. The symphony does not call for any marked emotional display on the part of the pianist, who is an instrument in the ensemble; it does require a pianist who is a musician as well as a virtuoso, and Mr. Schmitz answers this description. The result was a memorable performance, one that electrified the audience.

Gliere in his "Sirens" set for himself a difficult task. To suggest the sea, its calm, its swelling billows, its rage, is not beyond the limits of descriptive music. Debussy and Rimsky-Korsakov have shown this, but to sing the song of the sirens, there's the rub. Sir Thomas Browne said that this song was not beyond all conjecture, but Gliere has not re-sung it. Anyone with a poetic imagination can hear the sirens sing more ravishing strains than any composer has yet put in their mouths. The symphonic poem as a whole was disappointing; rather conventional in expression, rather monotonous in its repetitions of phrases not skilfully varied. The one imaginative touch is at the very end when the sinking of the ship is suggested, with its descent to the ocean depths. This is well contrived, and the diminuendo is singularly effective. Yet such is the baleful influence of association of ideas that, hearing these final measures, we could not help thinking of the old song: "Down Went McGinty to the Bottom of the Sea."

Mr. Gilbert's Rhapsody is founded on two negro spirituals: "Where do you think I found my soul?" and "You may bury me in the East." It is intended to be a tonal picture of a negro "Shout," a religious nocturnal meeting where there is wild singing and delirious dancing. The Rhapsody suffers from an abuse of the brass choir. To be sure, the spiritual says that the singer will hear the trumpet, but the audience heard all the brass too often. Mr. Gilbert has written less interesting and more effective compositions. The portion of the Rhapsody that is the most musical is the introduction with the first treatment of the second spiritual.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Dvorak, Overture "Carnival"; Brahms, Concerto for violin (Mr. Burgin) and 'cello (Mr. Bedetti); Debussy, Symphonic Excerpts from "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian" (first time at these concerts); Liszt, Mephisto Waltz.

New and Notable

Auer prepared the way when he wrote of her in his book of memories "as one of the most talented of his pupils." He recalled her in particular, "as a charming little girl of eleven or twelve, who came to me one day with tears in her eyes and told me that she wished above all things to keep on attending my class; but that rebellious students of the university had threatened to throw vitriol in her face if she dared to show herself there." Mr. Gilman smoothed her path when, after her first concert in New York, he pictured her as "blonde, slender and grave—a Whistlerian study in white and gold." With the other reviewers he wrote large her praises as violinist. And so it is that Cecelia Hansen, Dane out of Petrograd, virtuosa out of Berlin, "a quiet girl not far within her twenties," comes to play next Monday with the Symphony Orchestra. Obviously she is good to see while by such report, she is also good to hear. Her tone is her distinctive merit, "large, mellow and opulent with a dark beauty that rejoices the ear." She has "sensibility, intelligence and musical feeling." A touch of the "grand manner" even haunts her playing. For the while she is not youth eager and aglow but youth calm, cool, taking serious and conscious pains, less daring the risks than dreading the penalties. From Heifetz onward, so walks this brood of Auer.

H. T. P.

Herald Jan 12

ifference in interest will amount to $35,000

SYMPHONY PROGRAM PLEASES AUDIENCE

Handel, d'Indy, Gilbert and Gliere Heard

If volume of applause is any test, yesterday's Symphony program gave the audience unusuals pleasure. After d'Indy's "Symphony on a Mountain Air," E Robert Schmitz, who had played the piano solo part, was recalled many times, and finally Mr Monteux came out with him and bade the orchestra rise. After Handel's Concerto Grosse for strings, Julius Theodorowicz, who had played the violin solos in the absence of Richard Burgin, was singled out by conductor and audience for a special round of applause.

Gliere's rhapsody, "The Sirens," was so well received that the orchestra had to rise and bow. Mr Gilbert was called to the stage several times at the close of the concert to acknowledge the applause given his "Negro Rhapsody."

There was no familiar classic and no disturbing modern piece on the program. Handel's Concerto Grosse in G minor was last heard here in 1895. Although the other composers represented are all living, none of them is to be numbered among the musical radicals like Honegger, Bliss, and Schoenberg, whose music is received at these concerts in pained silence punctuated by a few feebly daring hisses and a few more fervent but isolated handclappings.

Mr Monteaux has never shown greater sympathy for the 18th century than he showed yesterday in the first larghetto of Handel's concerto. Indeed, save for over strong accentuation and occasionally muddled phrasing, the performance of this Handel piece was one of the best of the season, and quite able to stand comparison with the golden age before the war which still sets the standard of some frequenters of these concerts.

D'Indy's music dates from the 1880's when he was trying unsuccessfully not to write like Wagner. It is akin in mood to Franck when he is being exuberant and letting one forget his much advertised mysticism, as in "Le Chasseur Maudit." This music is lively, sometimes rather vulgar, suggesting to one listener Offenbach using a different idiom. It is based on a single theme, with that French passion for superficial logic which has stultified so much modern French music including not a little of d'Indy's own. The lack of austerity alone saves this piece from dullness. The performance was eloquent, and the soloist's share in it competent.

Gliere did not make one feel that he had ever heard the sirens sing, though there was little doubt that he had heard and profited by Rimsky-Korsakov's "Schererezade." Debussy has imagined the sirens once and for all in the third of his "Nocturnes" for orchestra. Gliere succeeded in a few pages near the beginning in suggesting the sea with exceptional vividness by means of an astonishingly clever use of familiar orchestral effects. But beyond that passage his music lacked imagination.

Mr Gilbert's "Negro Rhapsody" dates from a decade ago, when he was endeavoring to evolve a distinctively American music which should employ negro idioms and themes. It is a rather long-winded pot-pourri of negro songs and dances, far less vivid than his "Dance in the Place Congo." He has written later and better music than this, some of it already heard here.

His is a genuine and great talent, which has never, if one may judge from the works heard here in the past decade, quite found itself. Yet his music is always worth at least one hearing, often worth many. If he were, say, a Frenchman, there are those in this city who would pay more attention to his work. Like the proverbial prophet, the local composer does not always get his due in a provincial capital.

Next week Messrs Burgin and Bedetti will play Brahms' Double Concerto for violin and violoncello with the orchestra. Dvorak's "Carnival" overture, some unfamiliar excerpts from Debussy's music for d'Annunzio's "Martyrdom of St Sebastian" and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz" numbers

P. R.

Trans Jan 12

A "PATHETIC" TRIUMPHAL

Mr. Monteux Guides Chaikowsky's Beleaguered Symphony to Torrential Climax—The Piece Prevailing Undeniably—Miss Hansen Fluently

If there be any who still harbor the belief that Mr. Monteux is an unemotional, "uninspired" conductor, a hearing of the performance of Chaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony at Symphony Hall last evening would have undeceived them. Without wringing from the music its ultimate tear-drop and without goading it to maniacal frenzies—he is too much the artist for that—Mr. Monteux yet contrived to keep it everywhere vital, throbbing, alive, and a more vived, exciting performance of the Scherzo has not been heard here in many a day. With unflagging rhythm Mr. Monteux here piled climax upon climax, plied voice against voice, timbre against timbre, until at the end the music flamed, cut the ear like a sword. Small wonder that the men of the orchestra must rise from their chairs before the Symphony could proceed. Not the torrential Safonov himself might have given this amazing movement a more thrilling progress. And after such breath-taking, pulse-quickening excitements the Finale came for once as the only fitting sequence. Not as hysterical caterwauling or as unmanly whining does Mr. Monteux conceive this thenody. In his version of it is not so much the thought of unconsolable grief as of a sorrowful submission to the inevitable, a half-despairing resignation. From the depths the "Pathetic" Symphony rises; to the depths it returns. The circle is complete. Last night it seemed that not otherwise could Chaikovsky have wrought it. Indeed in a performance so free of theatricalism and sentimental excess, yet withal so pervadingly eloquent, so persistently moving, the "Pathetic" became, not the wailings of a "neurasthenic Jeremiah with a faculty for orchestration" nor even the expression of a wholly personal grief, but rather the voice of cosmic sorrow, a universal hopelessness. . . . Not the accepted estimate of Chaikovsky's music is this. But was the man so small, so pitifully self-centred as commonly he is supposed to have been? Introspective he was, beyond a doubt, and often tormented by his own consciousness. Yet this Symphony that, despite snubs and sneers and carping criticism, continues to fire conductors and players and to enthrall audiences is too vast a thing to be the mere voicing of any individual woe. Chaikovsky spoke here not only for himself, but for all humanity as well. Admittedly the "Pathetic" is tragic music. Then let Chaikovsky be placed, as he deserves, with the makers of tragedy. Not altogether is he the subjective, self-tortured Slav. There is in the progress and cumulation of the "Pathetic" Symphony something of Greek inevitableness and epic breadth.

As to the precise nature of the emotional content of the "Pathetic" Symphony there will no doubt long be many opinions. But recently Ernest Newman dismissed it as pathological, a thing from which any sound man would turn shuddering. Yet the architectural solidity of this music, its firmness of texture, its freedom from padding, its masterly instrumentation, these things are incontestable. It were perilous to affirm that the "Pathetic" Symphony will not in the end take its place among the classics of the form, among the monuments of music. Who can point to another among the symphonies since Beethoven at once so markedly individual, so continuously inspired, and so finely wrought?

For the rest the story of last evening's concert may soon be told. As "assisting artist" Cecilia Hansen, a violinist new to Boston, played Bruch's smug and platitudinous Concerto in G minor. Both blonde and beautiful, Miss Hansen adorns the concert-platform by her physical presence and within its limitations her playing delights the ear. Her tone is full, vibrant, rich or sweet as the music may demand. Her bowing is free, her fingers sure. No doubt Miss Hansen played this shop-worn Concerto quite as well as it deserved to be played. But she did not glorify or illumine it as a violinist of the fullest stature might have done. She played it gracefully, fluently, broadly or songfully, and at times brilliantly. And that was all. A pity then that she did not set herself a more grateful, more rewarding task.

Between Symphony and Concerto came last evening Smetana's pictorial "The Moldau," heard last week at Cambridge and as in Sanders Theatre Thursday, so in Symphony Hall Monday Wagner's puissant Overture to the "Flying Dutchman" also had place on the programme. Since the performances of both tone-poem and Overture have but lately been reviewed here, suffice it to say that last evening these pieces were once more eloquently played. From Chaikovsky's groaning bassoon to Wagner's radiant final chord conductor and orchestra were throughout the evening on their mettle.

W. S. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

SPRINGFIELD
MASS.
REPUBLICAN

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA GIVES SPLENDID CONCERT

Pierre Monteux Conducts Satisfying Program in Auditorium Before Large and Appreciative Audience

By FRANCIS REGAL

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave its 30th concert in Springfield yesterday afternoon in the Auditorium for the crowning feature of the season of Young Men's Christian association entertainments. As always, the demand for places exceeded the supply; not all could get in, many who could not find seats, stood unwearied through a long, but stimulating, program.

Of the 30 concerts which this famous orchestra has given here in something like 30 years, this was one of the best, and it was pleasant to have the last concert in the city which Pierre Monteux is to conduct, so satisfying in every respect. As a conducter, during the past four years, he has had trying experiences, due to circumstances over which he had no control, and has come through with honor and distinction. There were times when it seemed a question whether Boston's glorious orchestra would survive, and it was a great relief to music lovers when it was at last seen to be regaining its old place. It is not the old orchestra; the changes of personnel and of leadership could not fail to modify its character profoundly, but it is a very fine orchestra indeed, and its performance yesterday was in most respects highly finished and quite exceptionally interesting.

The program was all that a program for such an occasion should be—fresh and vital, with no dead spots and no music that is better than it sounds; it made room for a great classic, for several great favorites and for an interesting novelty. First came Beethoven's seventh symphony, the majestic power and exhilarating rhythms of which set the key for this afternoon. After the intermission, the orchestra played Smetana's symphonic tone poem, "The Moldau," Ravel's "La Valse," and two Wagner numbers, the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the overture to "Tannhauser."

Such a performance as was given of the A major symphony would in itself make the fortune of a concert. In the interpretation there was nothing novel or sensational, and in technical excellence it would be impossible to surpass some performances of the past. Nor did Mr Monteux make the slightest visible effort to stir the players to an extraordinary effort; indeed the modest simplicity and quietness of his manner is one of the attractive qualities of his conducting. There are conductors who try, perhaps with unconscious egotism, to make the audience think they are pulling every melody by main force out of the sulky and reluctant instruments; of this charlatanism Mr Monteux has not a trace. He and the orchestra work together and work together very well; his successor will have to work hard to surpass yesterday's performance.

Something may have been due to the occasion. To the Boston Symphony orchestra in its 43d season the seventh symphony is a very old story indeed, but it is an unusual experience to play it in a fine and acoustically perfect auditorium to an audience of over 4000 people, to the majority of whom it is quite fresh. Something of this freshness seemed to communicate itself to the players, and from the very opening the performance was full of life. In popularity this ranks second only to the fifth, and rivals that in geniality if not in concentrated power. If it ever seems heavy and dull it is because musicians or auditors, or both, are for the moment not keyed up to the bubbling vivacity of the dance rhythms out of which this great symphonic structure is built. Yesterday everyone was in the mood, the keen bright day gave snap and brilliance to the strings, and every note was inspiring.

There was no falling off in the beau-

(Continued From First Page)

tiful symphonic poem by Smetana, a Bohemian composer, who carries heavier metal than his gifted and better-known compatriot, Dvorak. Not less thoroughly Czech, Smetana is even more original and has a streak of genius of almost the highest order, which developed somewhat roughly and carelessly, yet produced a few masterpieces, among which this symphonic poem from the set called "My Country" must certainly be ranked; in its own kind of poetic charm it has few rivals. In this much depends on the first violins, and it was pleasing to see to what extent this section, for which the orchestra used to be specially famous, has recovered its old standing. The quality of its pianissimo was always lovely, though one had the feeling that many of the players were going through the motions and letting the specially beautiful soft tones of Mr Burgin color the whole.

The novelty of the afternoon and an interesting one, was Ravel's "choreographic poem," "The Waltz." Ravel is put among the fashionable rather than the popular composers, and is known chiefly by rather advanced chamber music at which the classicists still shake their heads. But "The Waltz" is capital jazz, including

---

OSTON SYMPHONY HERE FEBRUARY 12

Worcester Gaz(?)

Will Be Local Farewell to Pierre Monteux, Conductor

Jan 13

A visit of paramount importance in the musical season here will be a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Mechanics Hall on Tuesday evening, Feb. 12.

This concert bears double interest because it comes after three years' absence from this city, and because it will be in the nature of a farewell to Pierre Monteux who completes this season his five year term as conductor of the orchestra. Much to the regret of his large American public, the noted French leader intends to return to Paris in the spring.

Pierre Monteux appeared here at the head of the orchestra in his first two seasons, 1920 and 1921. Now in his fifth year at this post he is generally said to have brought the quality of the performance to the highest degree of marvelous perfection.

He first came to America at the head of Diaghileff's Ballet Russe, having won much fame in the old world as conductor of the principal orchestras of Paris and in the larger opera houses of Europe. He was particularly noted for the concerts Monteux at the Paris Casino, and likewise for his conducting of the Ballet Russe, with which he toured Europe before coming here. Previous to his present post, he was the French conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York.

A program of particular interest is being planned by Mr. Monteux, which will be at once directly enjoyable to the layman and contain the greatest achievements in orchestral repertory.

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT MECHANICS

JAN 13 1924

After an absence of three years, the Boston Symphony orchestra is to return to Worcester to give a concert in Mechanics hall, Tuesday evening, Feb. 12. The event will be one of the most important in the Worcester season, not only on account of the orchestra, which is considered one of the very finest of its kind in the world, but because this is the farewell season of Pierre Monteux as its conductor.

Pierre Monteux appeared here at the head of the orchestra in his first two seasons—1920 and 1921. Now completing his five-year term, he is generally said to have brought the quality of the performances to the highest degree of marvelous perfection, rivaling its eloquence in any past season of its long and illustrious history. There is considerable regret at the pending departure of this most distinguished of French conductors.

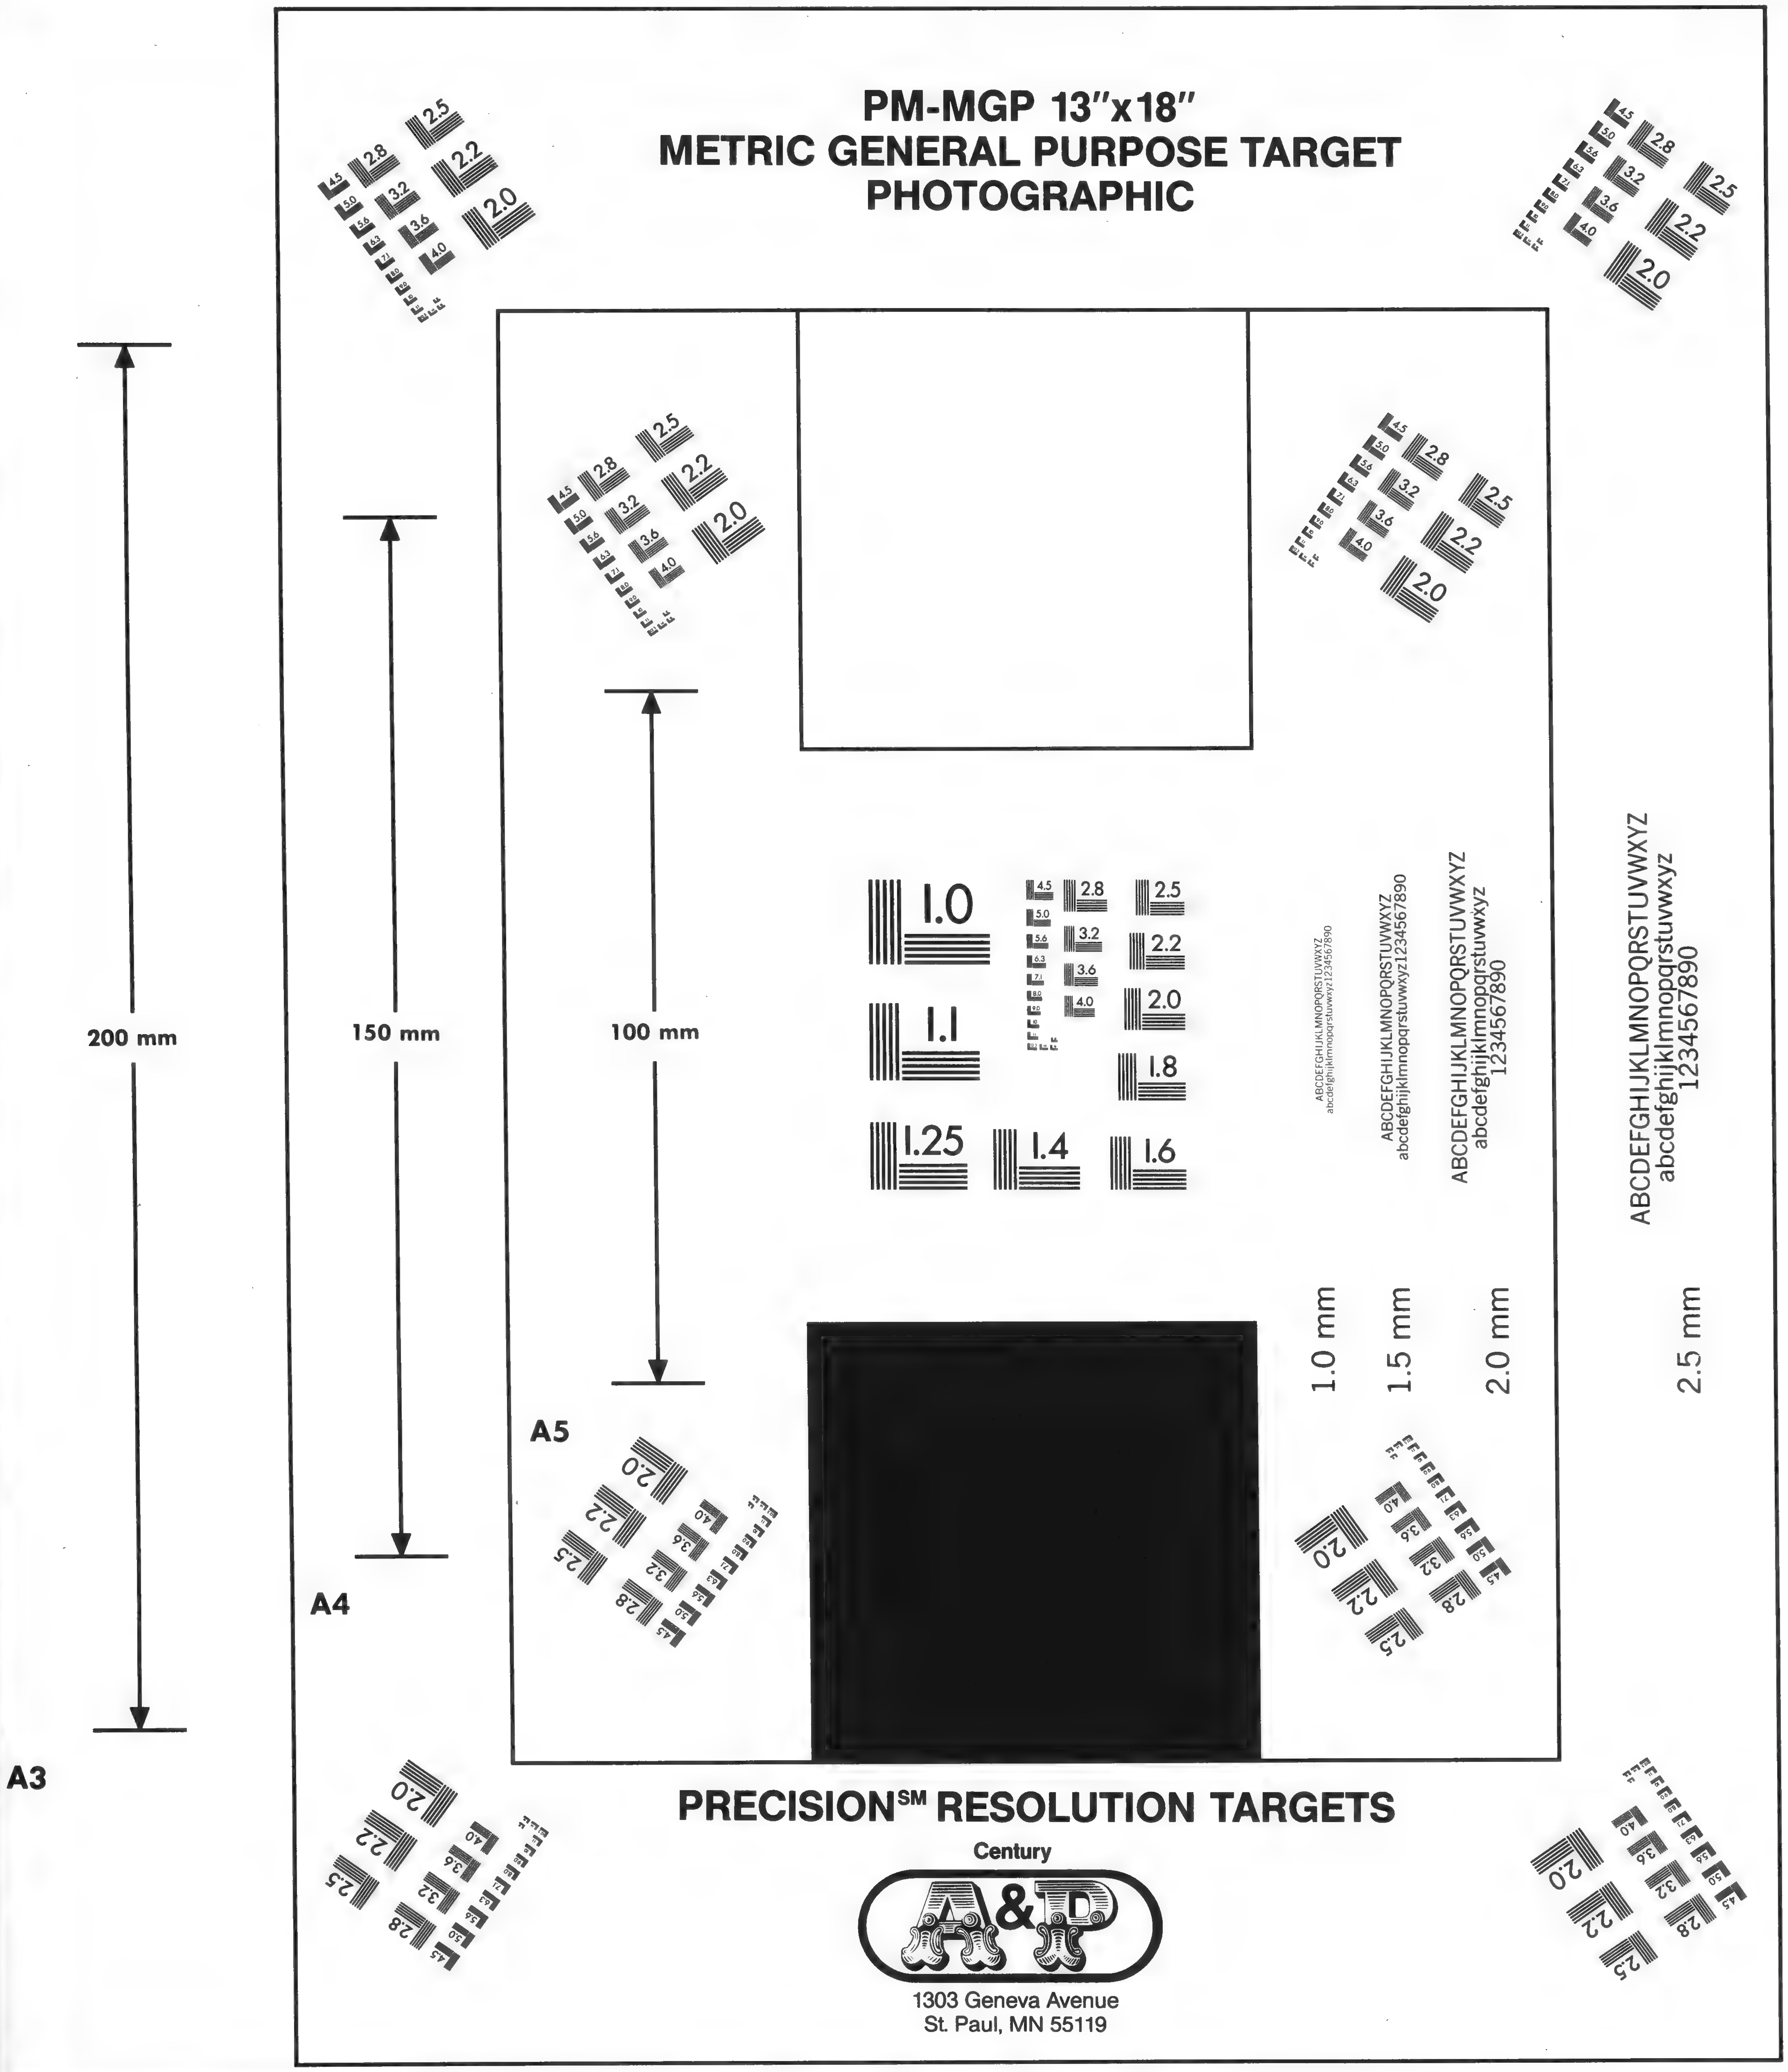
He first came to America at the head of Diaghileff's Ballet Russe, having won much fame in the Old World as conductor of the principal orchestras of Paris and in the larger opera houses of Europe. He was particularly noted for the Concerts Monteux at the Paris Casino, and likewise for his conducting of the Ballet Russe, with which he toured Europe before coming here. Previous to his present post, he was the French conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York.

It is as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, however, that he is considered to have reached the highest degree of his executive and interpretative genius. The program which Pierre Monteux is preparing for Worcester will be of the highest beauty and brilliance and likewise have popular appeal.

Worcester Times(?)

MAKE CHANGE AT

REDUCTION
RATIO
13x



200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A5
A4
A3
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

Tran Jan 17

Tran Jan 17

DLY COMES NOVEL MUSIC OF DEBUSSY'S PRIME

AGMENTS FROM D'ANNUNZIO'S "SAINT SEBASTIAN"

he Pieces to Be Played at the Next ymphony Concerts—A Singular Drama nd Notable Numbers—Paganism and hristianity, Decadence and Exaltation Contrasted—Ecstasies and Visions

N these days a "new" piece by Debussy is novelty indeed. Scarcely a capital of music the world over has not heard practically every composi- n of his, great or small. Yet among his re considerable achievements there is e that, through force of circumstance, is ll unknown to many concert-goers. In y of 1911 there was produced at the âtelet in Paris Gabriele d'Annunzio's -called mystery—"The Martyrdom of int Sebastian"—a play in five acts. For Debussy wrote an elaborate and extene incidental music, enlisting the services a chorus, solo-voices and orchestra. By is "Mystery" the Parisian public was not eply impressed, and after a dozen or so rformances it vanished from the stage. 1922 it was revived, but these later perrmances, given without sufficient preparon, were a sad failure, to the grievous appointment and chagrin of those who ew and admired the music of Debussy. Although closely wedded to the play, agments of Debussy's score have been ested from it and presented apart from eech, action and setting. In March of 12, certain of these fragments, both orestral and choral, were heard, under the rection of Mr. Caplet, at the Boston era House—the sole performance hither- in Boston of any of this music. At the mphony Concerts of this week, however, r. Monteux purposes playing four exrpts that, save in two instances, are not e ones chosen by Mr. Caplet.

"The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian" ns in octosyllabic verse interspersed with ndels and villanelles, all written, accordg to d'Annunzio's own statement, in rchaic" French, with no word that has t a pedigree of at least three centuries. ncerning the merits of this text there s been much difference of opinion. One tic sarcastically suggested that, though ery word in it might be found in the tionary, the text was not thereby French quality; while another declared it of miraculous character, possessing a supertural force, a secret." On the ground at the play was "blasphemous," the oman Church inveighed against it and, hen its efforts to prevent performances me to naught, the Archbishop of Paris joined the faithful to remain away.

D'Annunzio has divided his drama into e "Mansions," the name given to the s of mediæval mystery-plays. The first these Mansions is the court of the palace the Emperor Diocletian—in d'Annunzio's rase, "The Court of the Annunciation lies." In the original production the enery, costumes and trappings were the rk of Leon Bakst and the setting of s first scene has been described as a tticelli-like picture in tones of blues, eens, blacks and whites, wherein Marcus d Marcellinus writhe in agony against e ropes that bind them to the alabaster lumns; while Sebastian, chief of the chers, clad in golden armor, stands near prefect who has condemned them to ath for their Christian faith. The conrsion of Sebastian ensues, and he dances s ecstatic dance, barefoot, upon live coals. anwhile, the Annunciation Lilies, transmed into angels, chant melodious hymns adoration.

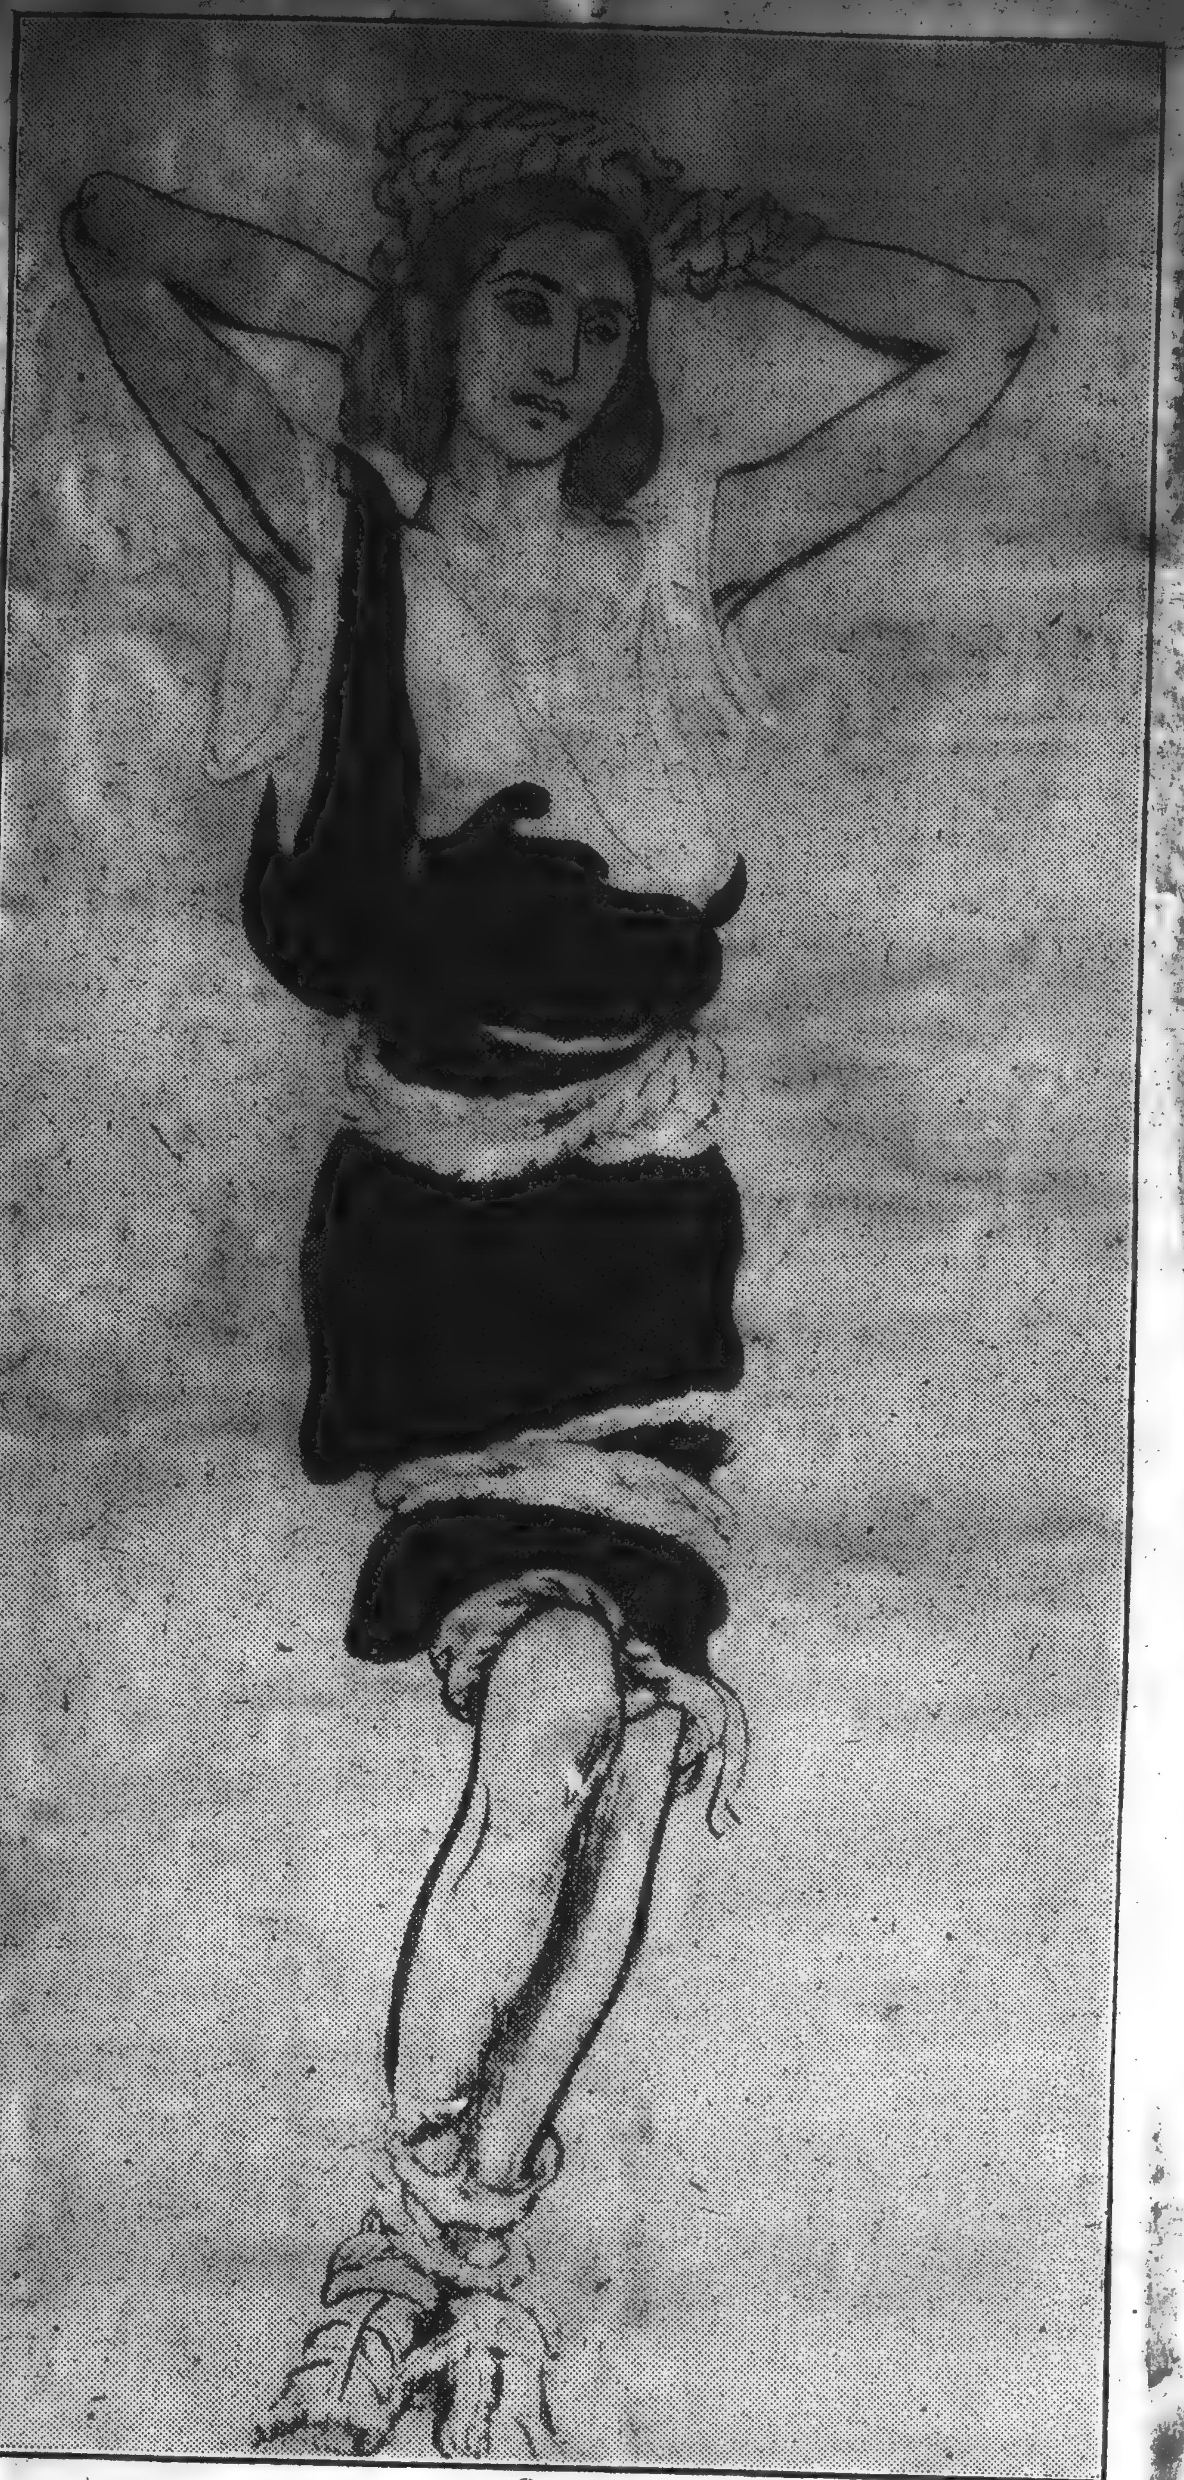
The second Mansion reveals a temple dicated to pagan mysteries. The zeals Sebastian would destroy all the paraernalia of these mystic rites. He hamers upon the great bronze door; it opens disclose two revolving wheels bearing signs of the zodiac. In the face of ese symbols of paganism Sebastian upts the Cross; the light of the new Chrisn faith streams in; the song of the unen Madonna mounts. The music is an ostrophe to sunlight and radiance.

In the third Mansion Sebastian is brought fore the Emperor Diocletian as he sits in ajesty upon his throne. Sebastian, afming his conversion, throws down the mbols of Roman power and insults the ds of the Roman Empire. At each fresh trage the Emperor, about to order him t to death, yet refrains. "How beautiful is!" he cries instead. "He shall be a t; he shall be an emperor; he shall be god, and temples will be built and burnt erings made to him!" In the end Diotian loses patience and would have Sestian smothered under rose petals. But m this death his archers rescue him. e Emperor then decrees that Sebastian all be bound to a laurel tree in the grove Apollo, and that these same archers all pierce him with arrows.

This grove of Apollo is the scene of the rth act, for a martyrdom depicted by ny a painter of the Renaissance. "Who es me best shoots straightest. Your arws, giving me death, give me life! Every rt, striking me with anguish, brings me avenly bliss!" So cries the sainted mar-, and his weeping archers shoot their ed captain dead. But as they are reving his body a miracle ensues. The rows vanish from the flesh and remain the tree, shedding an unearthly radiance, the doors of Paradise are opened and soul of Saint Sebastian enters therein. e stage is empty of human beings. Only immense circle of light, with concenrays, descends, covering all the back. As complement to this radiance, last act consists of no spoken words. re is only the music of the orchestra, h various antiphonal choruses from un- singers.

Debussy, as to d'Annunzio, this legend [illegible]

Martyred Saint

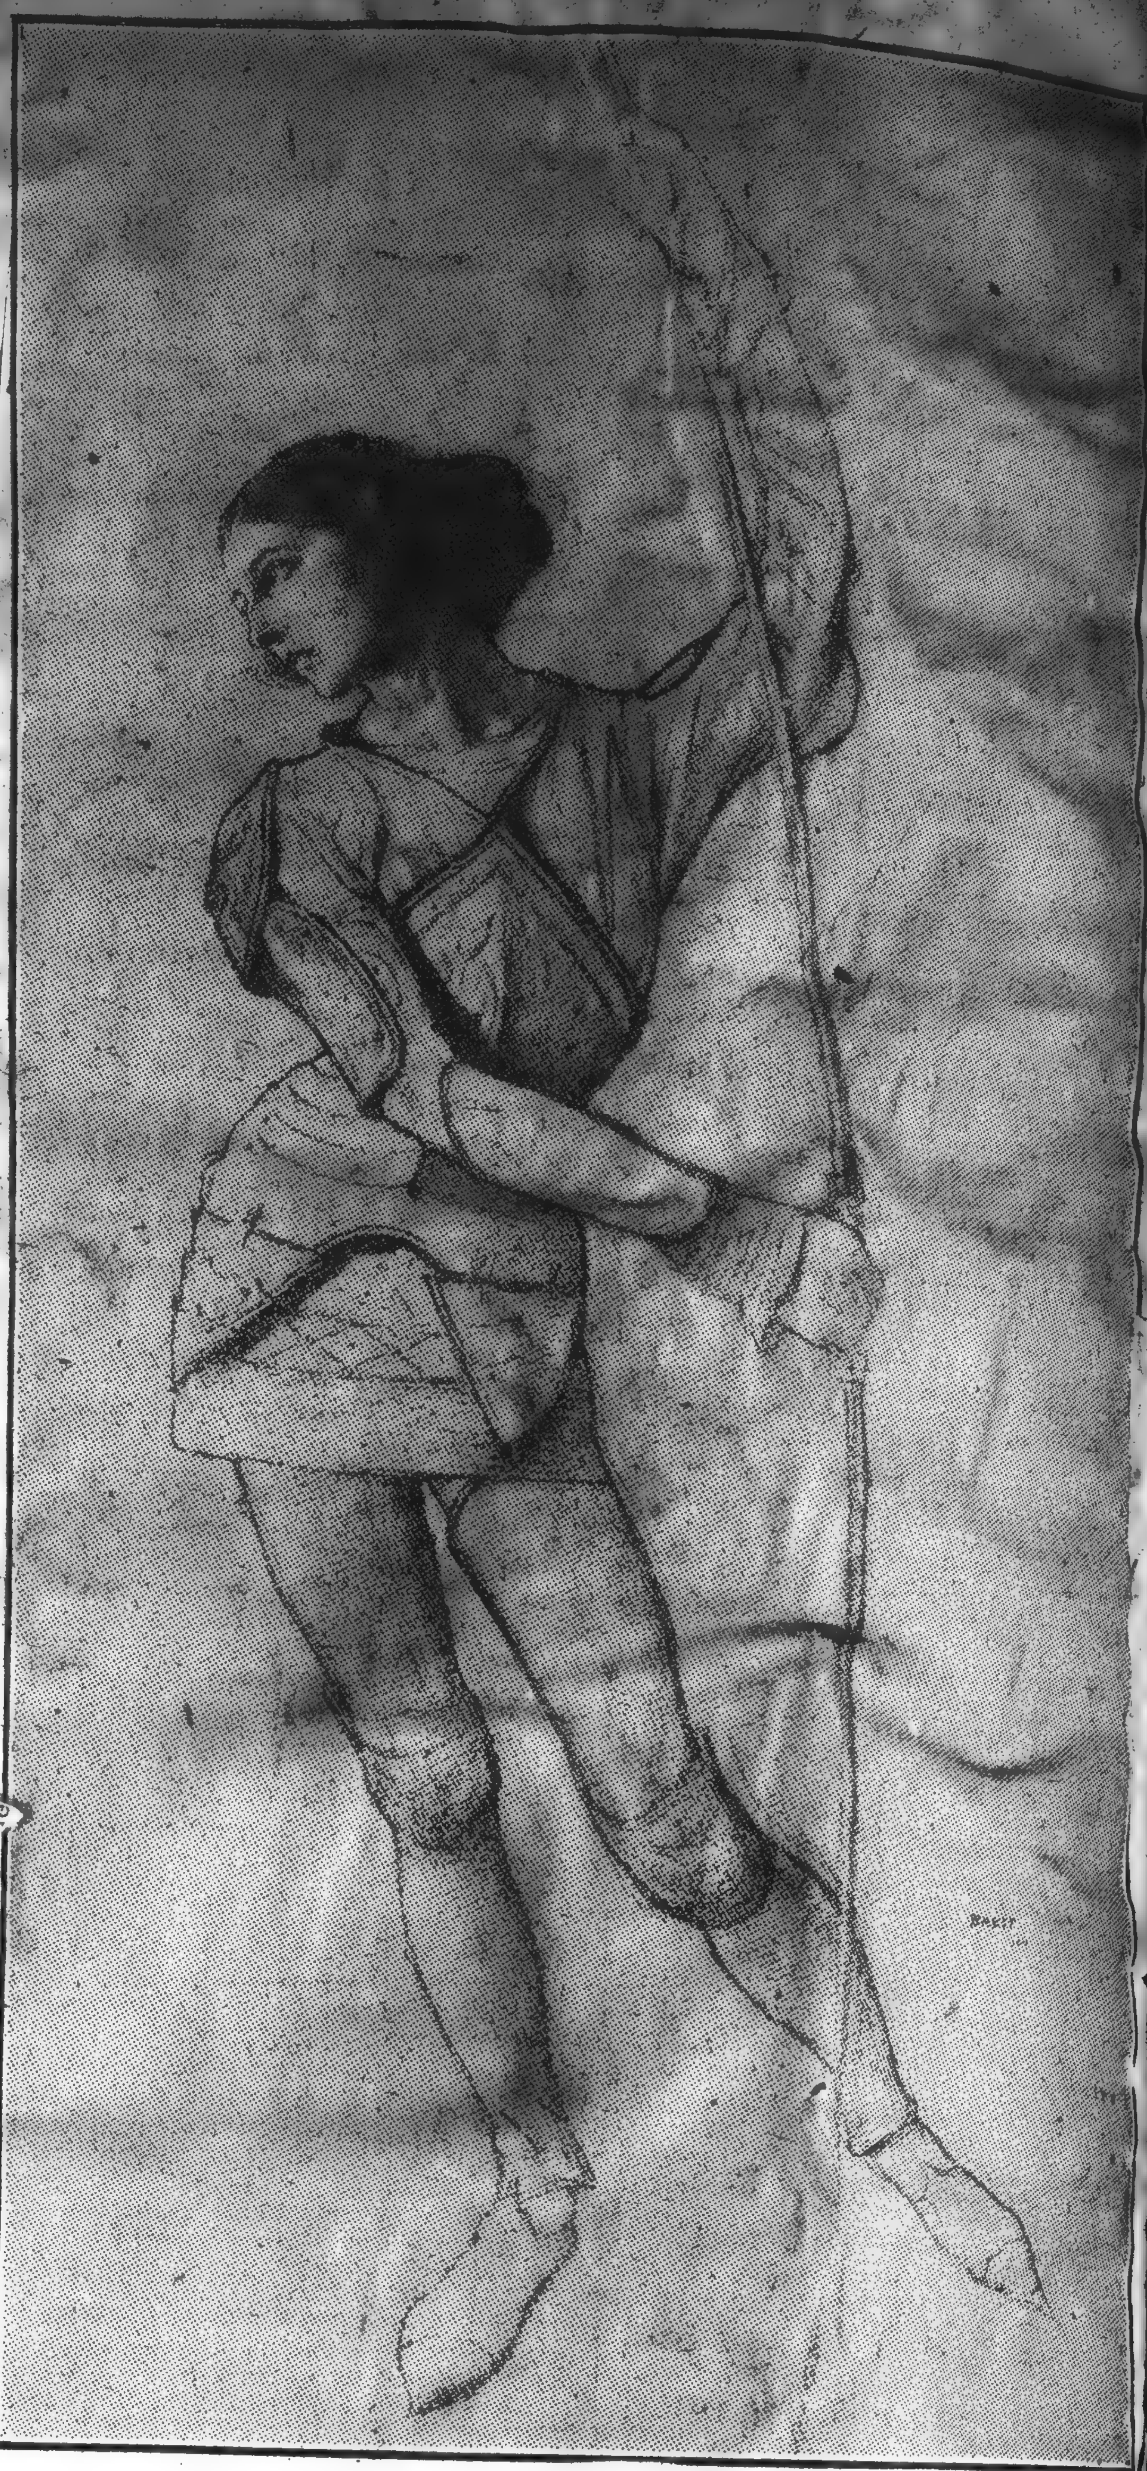


Ida Rubinstein

As Sebastian in d'Annunzio's "Mystery-Play" to Debussy's Music

(The Sketch by Bakst)

Visioning Archer



Ida Rubinstein

As Sebastian in d'Annunzio's "Mystery-Play" to Debussy's Music

(The Sketch by Bakst)

cetic fervor of early Christianity, was rich in opportunity. Upon the musician lavished all his art, and in it he achieved at times a complexity of texture of which the score of "Pelléas" gives little hint. For once he was persuaded from his usual reticence and economy in the matter of orchestral elaboration, and here makes use of a third pair of horns and a fourth flute. By the unsympathetic this music has been declared to be compounded of hard and cruel harmonies, little likely to give an impression of celestial happiness and the joy of the blessed—"except perhaps to those whose ears are peculiarly constructed." On the other hand, at least one reviewer has found it "very seductive, by the means habitual to the composer of 'Pelléas', but of greater amplitude, of more sumptuous symphonic developments in fuller, more sonorous orchestration," while the choruses are said to be in the style of Palestrina, though very "personal" in their melodic line. In the crowning finale that describes the entrance of the saint's soul into Paradise, the music enters the field of opera and here, as nowhere else in the whole range of his pieces, has Debussy availed himself of up-piled orchestral and choral sonorities.

For purposes of local color; Debussy has utilized certain themes of Eastern origin. When fragments of this music were sung in New York in 1912 by Kurt Schindler's MacDowell Chorus, Mr. Schindler acted as spokesman for it in a preliminary lecture. Regarding Debussy's use of these Eastern melodies he said:

> That which will sound discordant is only strange to us because we have not followed the connecting link in the evolution of this kind of music. Oriental melodies, which are not conceived in the major and minor scales on which our whole harmonic system is based, do not admit of harmonization according to our usual methods. It shows Debussy's rare artistic instinct that instead of crushing or warping these melodies into set harmonies, he has merely placed behind them an atmosphere of sound, a floating background of blurred and blending tone-colors, against which the original melody stands out with its own strange outline, having lost none of its characteristics.

The four excerpts chosen by Mr. Monteux for performance here are entitled "The Court of the Lilies"; the "Dance of

---

PROGRAMMES IN PROSPECT

Stravinsky's "Sacre" and Mme. Freund—More Concerts for Young People—Mr Copeland's Second Return—Mr. Hayes's Next Pieces—Sunday Evenings at the Copley-Plaza

At the Symphony Concerts of next week Mr. Monteux will fulfill his long-cherished purpose—to play as tone-poem, for the first times in Boston and for the first times in America outside Philadelphia, Stravinsky's mimodrama, "The Rite of Spring," or, by French title, "Le Sacre du Printemps." It was he who conducted in it at the performances of the Russian Ballet in Paris in 1913, when the contending tumults of friends and foes made the orchestra nearly inaudible. It was he also who first played it as self-contained tone-poem. At the moment, there is no need to dwell upon a music that, by common consent through ten years, is a modernist masterpiece; epitome as well of Stravinsky's manifold and more individual powers. From it, indeed, many subsequent pages from his own and from other pens have been born. In all his term in Boston Mr. Monteux has undertaken no more remarkable or exacting music of our time. Now he would have the end crown the work.

"Le Sacre," as the everyday talk of musicians names it, will be the final piece at the two concerts. Immediately before it, Mme. Marya Freund, a notable new singer from Paris, will be heard in an air from Monteverde, earliest composer, at the beginning of the seventeenth century, of music-drama, and in three songs, with orchestra, from Mahler. In such music her intelligence, imagination, command of diction and tonal color, praise her. Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony" will be prelude at a signal pair of concerts.

Two more concerts by the Symphony Orchestra for young people are also announced—on the afternoons of Monday and Tuesday, Jan. 28 and 29, at Symphony Hall. The programmes will be identical, traversing Humperdinck's Prelude to his opera, "Hansel and Gretel"; the Minuet and Finale from Mozart's S lists slide their fingers rapidly up and down the strings in grotesque portamento. Musically it may cause more head shaking than the chamber music, but as a feat of virtuosity in orchestration it commands the admiration of the most classical. If it is trashy there is at hand the plausible excuse that it does not depict the tawdry splendor of the empire of Napoleon II with the waltz craze taken as a symbol. Will composers of the future be able to do as well with the 20th century and the fox trot? The work was played with great zest, and was hugely enjoyed, the printed moral compiled by Philip Hale making its Bacchanalian revelry perfectly correct for a Sunday afternoon.

---

With the two Wagner numbers we were back on familiar ground, and both of the overtures were finely played. Possibly a pair of overtures is not an ideal ending, but these are sufficiently different in form as in everything else to make such an objection rather hypercritical. When he composed "Tannhaeuser" Wagner had not yet evolved his theory applied in "Lohengrin," that it is illogical to make the overture a kind of musical compendium of a music drama which the audience is not yet supposed to know. If there is not so much in the theory as he thought at the time it at any rate sharply differentiates the prelude to "Lohengrin" from the conventional overture. Does it stand wear and tear as well? Sometimes it seems to have gone stale, yet yesterday this [illegible]

MUSIC.

Boston Symphony Programme January 5.

Programmes of especial interest will be presented by Pierre Monteux at the Boston Symphony concert, to be given in Carnegie Hall next Saturday afternoon, January 5, at 2:30.

Jacques Thibaud, the great French violinist will appear as soloist at the concert matinee in Mozart's Concerto in E flat major. Pierre Monteux will introduce Arthur Bliss's "Color Symphony," of which the movements are—Purple; Red; Blue; Green. He will open the programme with Brahms' Tragic Overture and close it with Ravel's first suite from "Daphnis and Chloe" (Nocturne, Interlude and War Dance.)

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS

Having made extensive plans for the coming season of Boston Symphony concerts which will open a week from next Friday and Saturday, Oct. 8 and 9, Pierre Monteux will start rehearsals with the orchestra next week.

[173]

Trans Jan 17

ATEDLY COMES NOVEL MUSIC OF DEBUSSY'S PRIME

RAGMENTS FROM D'ANNUNZIO'S "SAINT SEBASTIAN"

he Pieces to Be Played at the Next ymphony Concerts—A Singular Drama nd Notable Numbers — Paganism and Christianity, Decadence and Exaltation Contrasted—Ecstasies and Visions

N these days a "new" piece by Debussy is novelty indeed. Scarcely a capital of music the world over has not heard practically every composition of his, great or small. Yet among his more considerable achievements there is one that, through force of circumstance, is still unknown to many concert-goers. In May of 1911 there was produced at the hatelet in Paris Gabriele d'Annunzio's -called mystery—"The Martyrdom of int Sebastian"—a play in five acts. For Debussy wrote an elaborate and exten- e incidental music, enlisting the services a chorus, solo-voices and orchestra. By is "Mystery" the Parisian public was not eply impressed, and after a dozen or so rformances it vanished from the stage. 1922 it was revived, but these later perrmances, given without sufficient preparon, were a sad failure, to the grievous appointment and chagrin of those who ew and admired the music of Debussy. Although closely wedded to the play, agments of Debussy's score have been ested from it and presented apart from eech, action and setting. In March of 12, certain of these fragments, both orestral and choral, were heard, under the ection of Mr. Caplet, at the Boston era House—the sole performance hitherin Boston of any of this music. At the mphony Concerts of this week, however, r. Monteux purposes playing four exrpts that, save in two instances, are not e ones chosen by Mr. Caplet.

"The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian" ns in octosyllabic verse interspersed with ndels and villanelles, all written, according to d'Annunzio's own statement, in rchaic" French, with no word that has t a pedigree of at least three centuries. ncerning the merits of this text there s been much difference of opinion. One tic sarcastically suggested that, though ery word in it might be found in the tionary, the text was not thereby French quality; while another declared it of iraculous character, possessing a superatural force, a secret." On the ground at the play was "blasphemous," the oman Church inveighed against it and, hen its efforts to prevent performances me to naught, the Archbishop of Paris joined the faithful to remain away.

D'Annunzio has divided his drama into e "Mansions," the name given to the s of mediæval mystery-plays. The first these Mansions is the court of the palace the Emperor Diocletian—in d'Annunzio's rase, "The Court of the Annunciation lies." In the original production the enery, costumes and trappings were the rk of Leon Bakst and the setting of is first scene has been described as a tticelli-like picture in tones of blues, eens, blacks and whites, wherein Marcus d Marcellinus writhe in agony against e ropes that bind them to the alabaster lumns; while Sebastian, chief of the chers, clad in golden armor, stands near prefect who has condemned them to ath for their Christian faith. The conrsion of Sebastian ensues, and he dances s ecstatic dance, barefoot, upon live coals. anwhile, the Annunciation Lilies, transmed into angels, chant melodious hymns adoration.

The second Mansion reveals a temple dicated to pagan mysteries. The zeals Sebastian would destroy all the paraernalia of these mystic rites. He hamers upon the great bronze door; it opens disclose two revolving wheels bearing e signs of the zodiac. In the face of ese symbols of paganism Sebastian upts the Cross; the light of the new Chrisan faith streams in; the song of the unen Madonna mounts. The music is an ostrophe to sunlight and radiance.

In the third Mansion Sebastian is brought fore the Emperor Diocletian as he sits in ajesty upon his throne. Sebastian, afming his conversion, throws down the mbols of Roman power and insults the ds of the Roman Empire. At each fresh trage the Emperor, about to order him t to death, yet refrains. "How beautiful is!" he cries instead. "He shall be a t; he shall be an emperor; he shall be god, and temples will be built and burnt erings made to him!" In the end Diotian loses patience and would have Sestian smothered under rose petals. But om this death his archers rescue him. e Emperor then decrees that Sebastian all be bound to a laurel tree in the grove Apollo, and that these same archers all pierce him with arrows.

This grove of Apollo is the scene of the rth act, for a martyrdom depicted by any a painter of the Renaissance. "Who es me best shoots straightest. Your arws, giving me death, give me life! Every rt, striking me with anguish, brings me avenly bliss!" So cries the sainted mar, and his weeping archers shoot their ed captain dead. But as they are reving his body a miracle ensues. The rows vanish from the flesh and remain the tree, shedding an unearthly radiance, the doors of Paradise are opened and soul of Saint Sebastian enters therein. e stage is empty of human beings. Only immense circle of light, with concenc rays, descends, covering all the backth. As complement to this radiance, e last act consists of no spoken words. ere is only the music of the orchestra, h various antiphonal choruses from unen singers.

To Debussy, as to d'Annunzio, this legend

luxurious

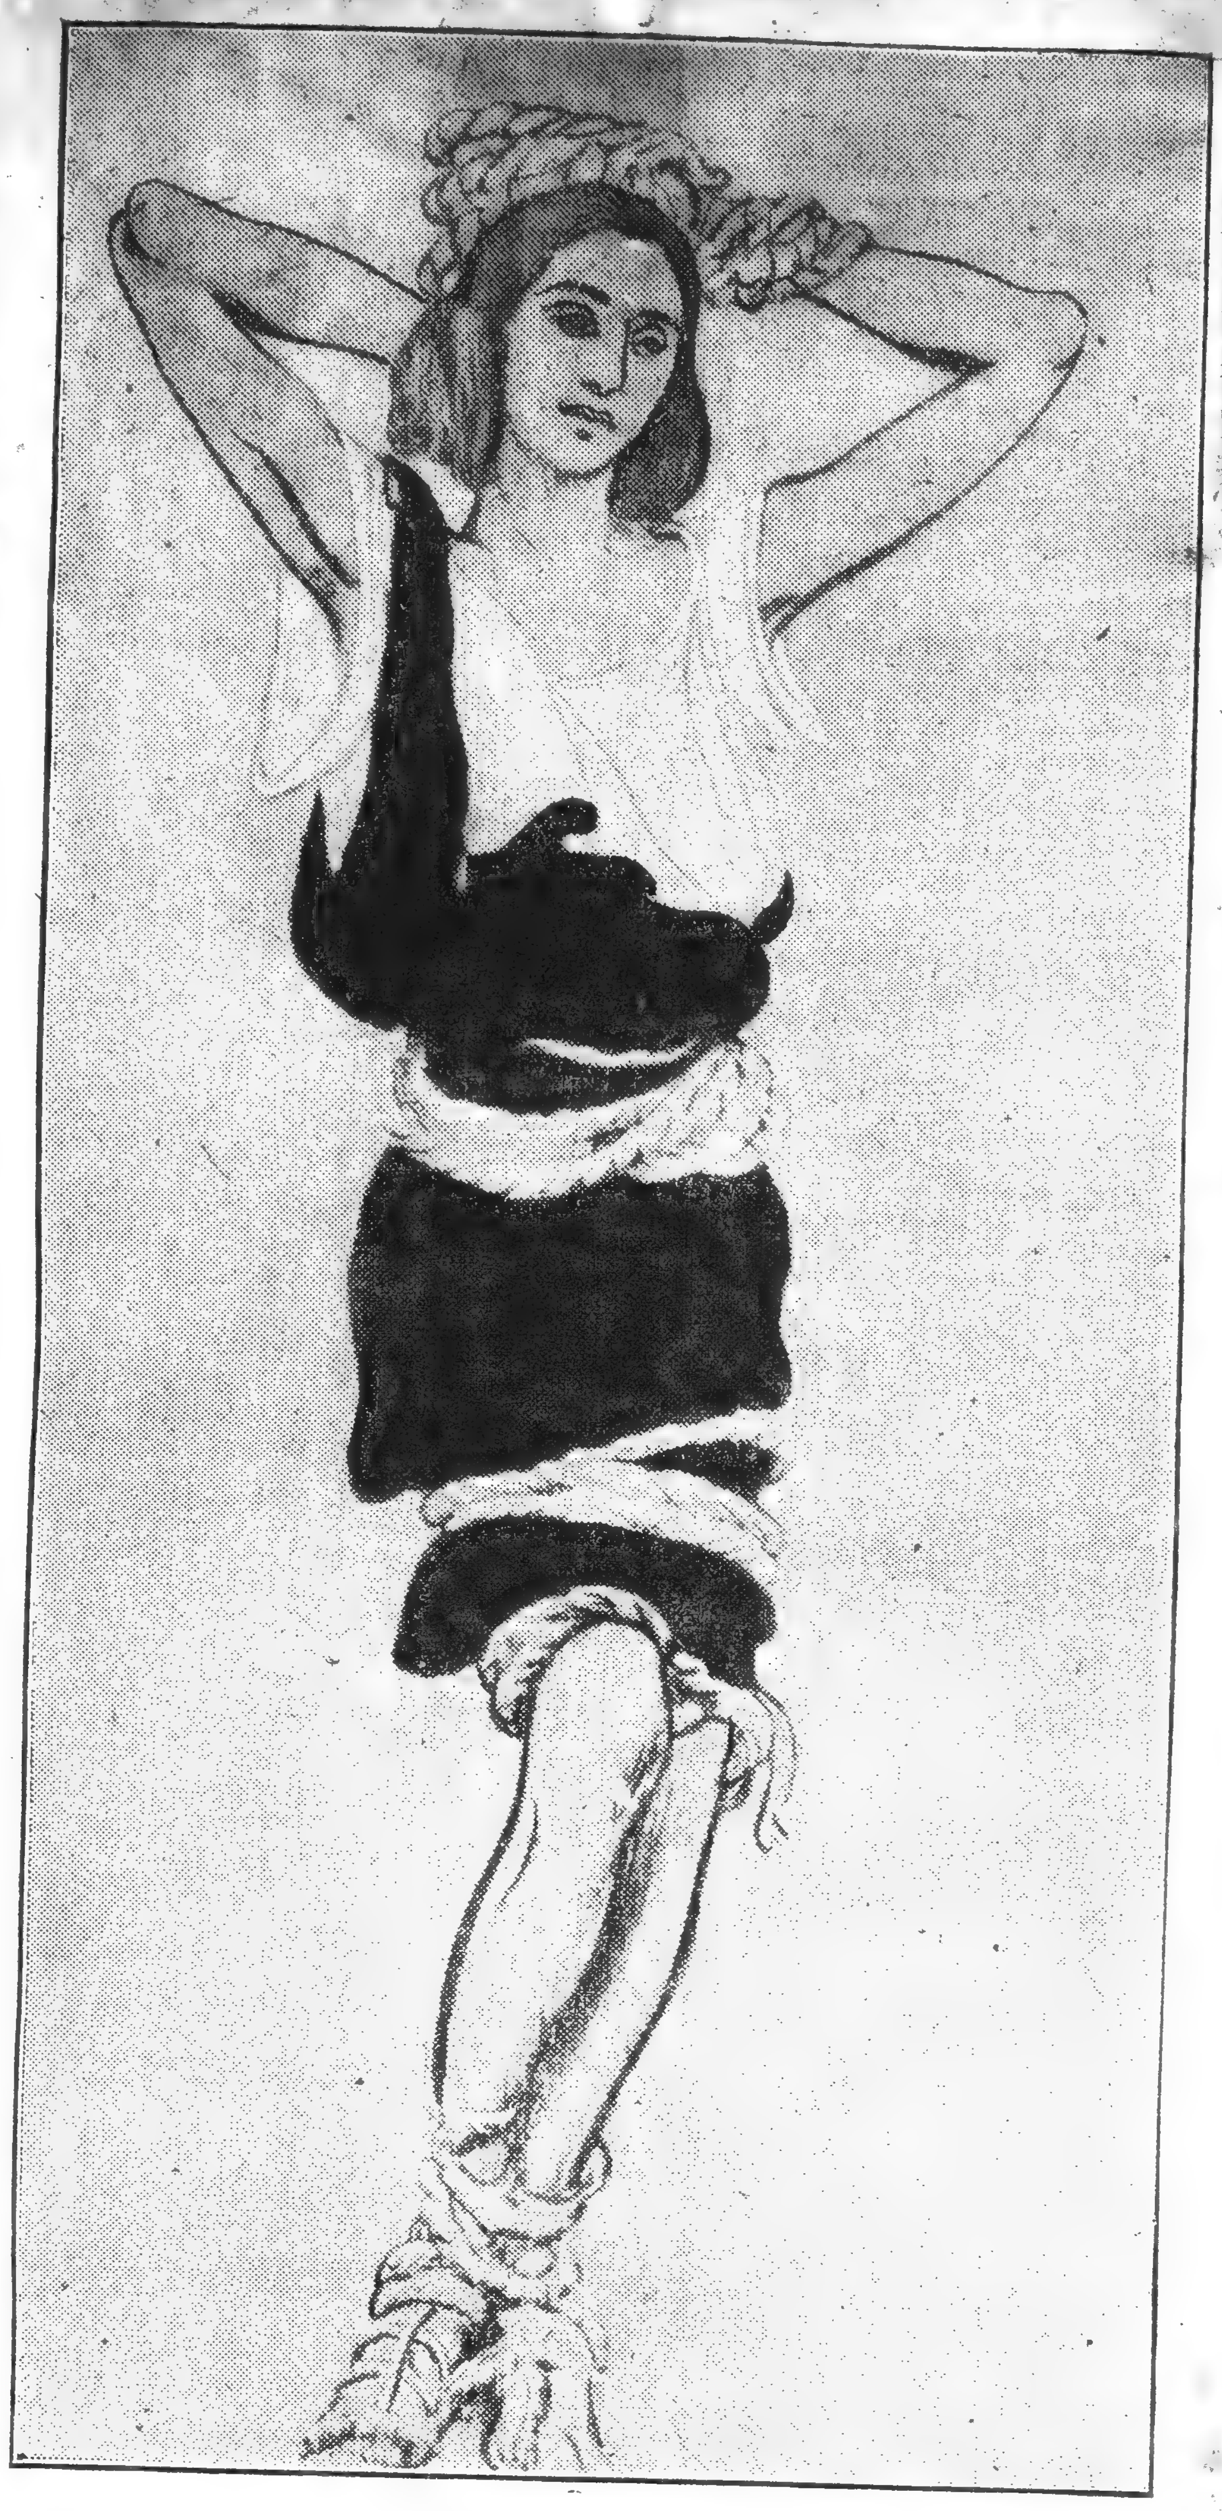
cetic fervor of early Christianity, was rich in opportunity. Upon the musician lavished all his art, and in it he achieved at times a complexity of texture of which the score of "Pelléas" gives little hint. For once he was persuaded from his usual reticence and economy in the matter of orchestral elaboration, and here makes use of a third pair of horns and a fourth flute. By the unsympathetic this music has been declared to be compounded of hard and cruel harmonies, little likely to give an impression of celestial happiness and the joy of the blessed—"except perhaps to those whose ears are peculiarly constructed." On the other hand, at least one reviewer has found it "very seductive, by the means habitual to the composer of 'Pelléas', but of greater amplitude, of more sumptuous symphonic developments in fuller, more sonorous orchestration," while the choruses are said to be in the style of Palestrina, though very "personal" in their melodic line. In the crowning finale that describes the entrance of the saint's soul into Paradise, the music enters the field of opera and here, as nowhere else in the whole range of his pieces, has Debussy availed himself of up-piled orchestral and choral sonorities.

For purposes of local color; Debussy has utilized certain themes of Eastern origin. When fragments of this music were sung in New York in 1912 by Kurt Schindler's MacDowell Chorus, Mr. Schindler acted as spokesman for it in a preliminary lecture. Regarding Debussy's use of these Eastern melodies he said:

> That which will sound discordant is only strange to us because we have not followed the connecting link in the evolution of this kind of music. Oriental melodies, which are not conceived in the major and minor scales on which our whole harmonic system is based, do not admit of harmonization according to our usual methods. It shows Debussy's rare artistic instinct that instead of crushing or warping these melodies into set harmonies, he has merely placed behind them an atmosphere of sound, a floating background of blurred and blending tone-colors, against which the original melody stands out with its own strange outline, having lost none of its characteristics.

The four excerpts chosen by Mr. Monteux for performance here are entitled "The Court of the Lilies"; the "Dance of

Martyred Saint



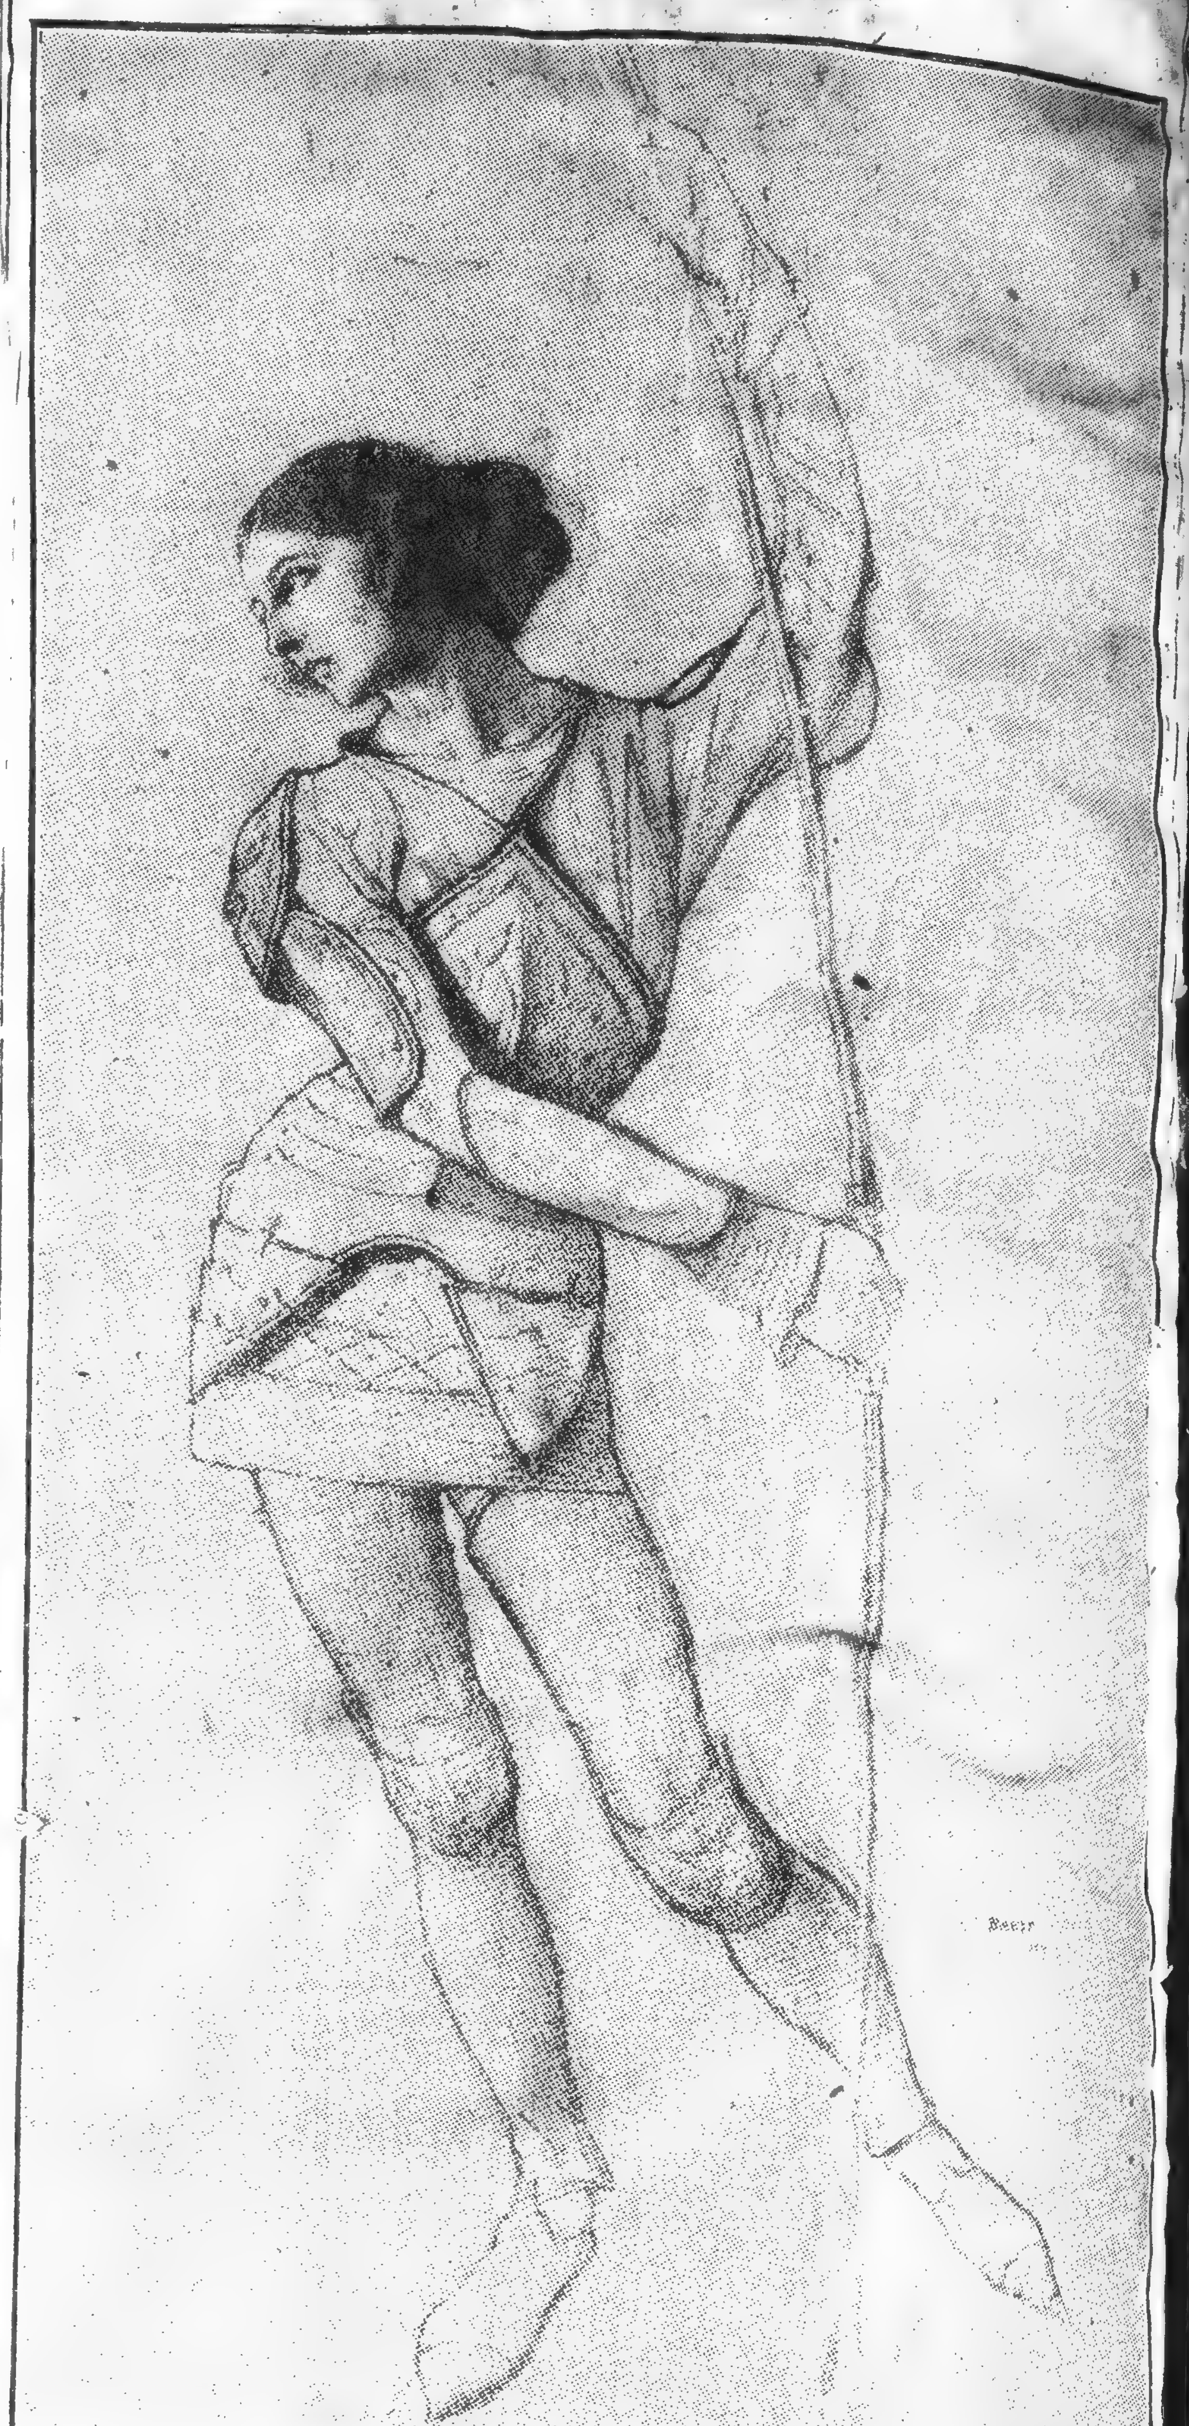
Ida Rubinstein

As Sebastian in d'Annunzio's "Mystery-Play" to Debussy's Music

(The Sketch by Bakst)

Trans Jan 17

Visioning Archer



Ida Rubinstein

As Sebastian in d'Annunzio's "Mystery-Play" to Debussy's Music

(The Sketch by Bakst)

PROGRAMMES IN PROSPECT

Stravinsky's "Sacre" and Mme. Freund—More Concerts for Young People—Mr Copeland's Second Return—Mr. Hayes's Next Pieces—Sunday Evenings at the Copley-Plaza

AT the Symphony Concerts of next week Mr. Monteux will fulfill his long-cherished purpose—to play as tone-poem, for the first times in Boston and for the first times in America outside Philadelphia, Stravinsky's mimodrama, "The Rite of Spring," or, by French title, "Le Sacre du Printemps." It was he who conducted in it at the performances of the Russian Ballet in Paris in 1913, when the contending tumults of friends and foes made the orchestra nearly inaudible. It was he also who first played it as self-contained tone-poem. At the moment, there is no need to dwell upon a music that, by common consent through ten years, is a modernist masterpiece; epitome as well of Stravinsky's manifold and more individual powers. From it, indeed, many subsequent pages from his own and from other pens have been born. In all his term in Boston Mr. Monteux has undertaken no more remarkable or exacting music of our time. Now he would have the end crown the work.

"Le Sacre," as the everyday talk of musicians names it, will be the final piece at the two concerts. Immediately before it, Mme. Marya Freund, a notable new singer from Paris, will be heard in an air from Monteverde, earliest composer, at the beginning of the seventeenth century, of music-drama, and in three songs, with orchestra, from Mahler. In such music her intelligence, imagination, command of diction and tonal color, praise her. Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony" will be prelude at a signal pair of concerts.

Two more concerts by the Symphony Orchestra for young people are also announced—on the afternoons of Monday and Tuesday, Jan. 28 and 29, at Symphony Hall. The programmes will be identical, traversing Humperdinck's Prelude to his opera, "Hansel and Gretel"; the Minuet and Finale from Mozart's S lists slide their fingers rapidly up and down the strings in grotesque portamento. Musically it may cause more head shaking than the chamber music, but as a feat of virtuosity in orchestration it commands the admiration of the most classical. If it is trashy there is at hand the plausible excuse that it does not depict the tawdry splendor of the empire of Napoleon II with the waltz craze taken as a symbol. Will composers of the future be able to do as well with the 20th century and the fox trot? The work was played with great zest, and was hugely enjoyed, the printed moral compiled by Philip Hale making its Bacchanalian revelry perfectly correct for a Sunday afternoon.

---

With the two Wagner numbers we were back on familiar ground, and both of the overtures were finely played. Possibly a pair of overtures is not an ideal ending, but these are sufficiently different in form as in everything else to make such an objection rather hypercritical. When he composed "Tannhaeuser" Wagner had not yet evolved his theory applied in "Lohengrin," that it is illogical to make the overture a kind of musical compendium of a music drama which the audience is not yet supposed to know. If there is not so much in the theory as he thought at the time it at any rate sharply differentiates the prelude to "Lohengrin" from the conventional overture. Does it stand wear and tear as well? Sometimes it seems to have gone stale, yet yesterday this, too, had much of its old freshness—partly, no doubt, because of the great force of strings which is indispensable for the slow and massive building up to a climax which is the raison d'etre composition. And of course in

---

MUSIC.

Boston Symphony Programme January 5.

Programmes of especial interest will be pre sented by Pierre Monteux at the Boston Sym phony concert, to be given in Carnegie Hall nex Saturday afternoon, January 5, at 2:30.

Jacques Thibaud, the great French violinist will appear as soloist at the concert matinee in Mozart's Concerto in E flat major. Pierre Monteux will introduce Arthur Bliss's "Color Symphony," of which the movements are—Purple; Red; Blue; Green. He will open the programme with Brahms' Tragic Overture and close it with Ravel's first suite from "Daphnis and Chloe"

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS

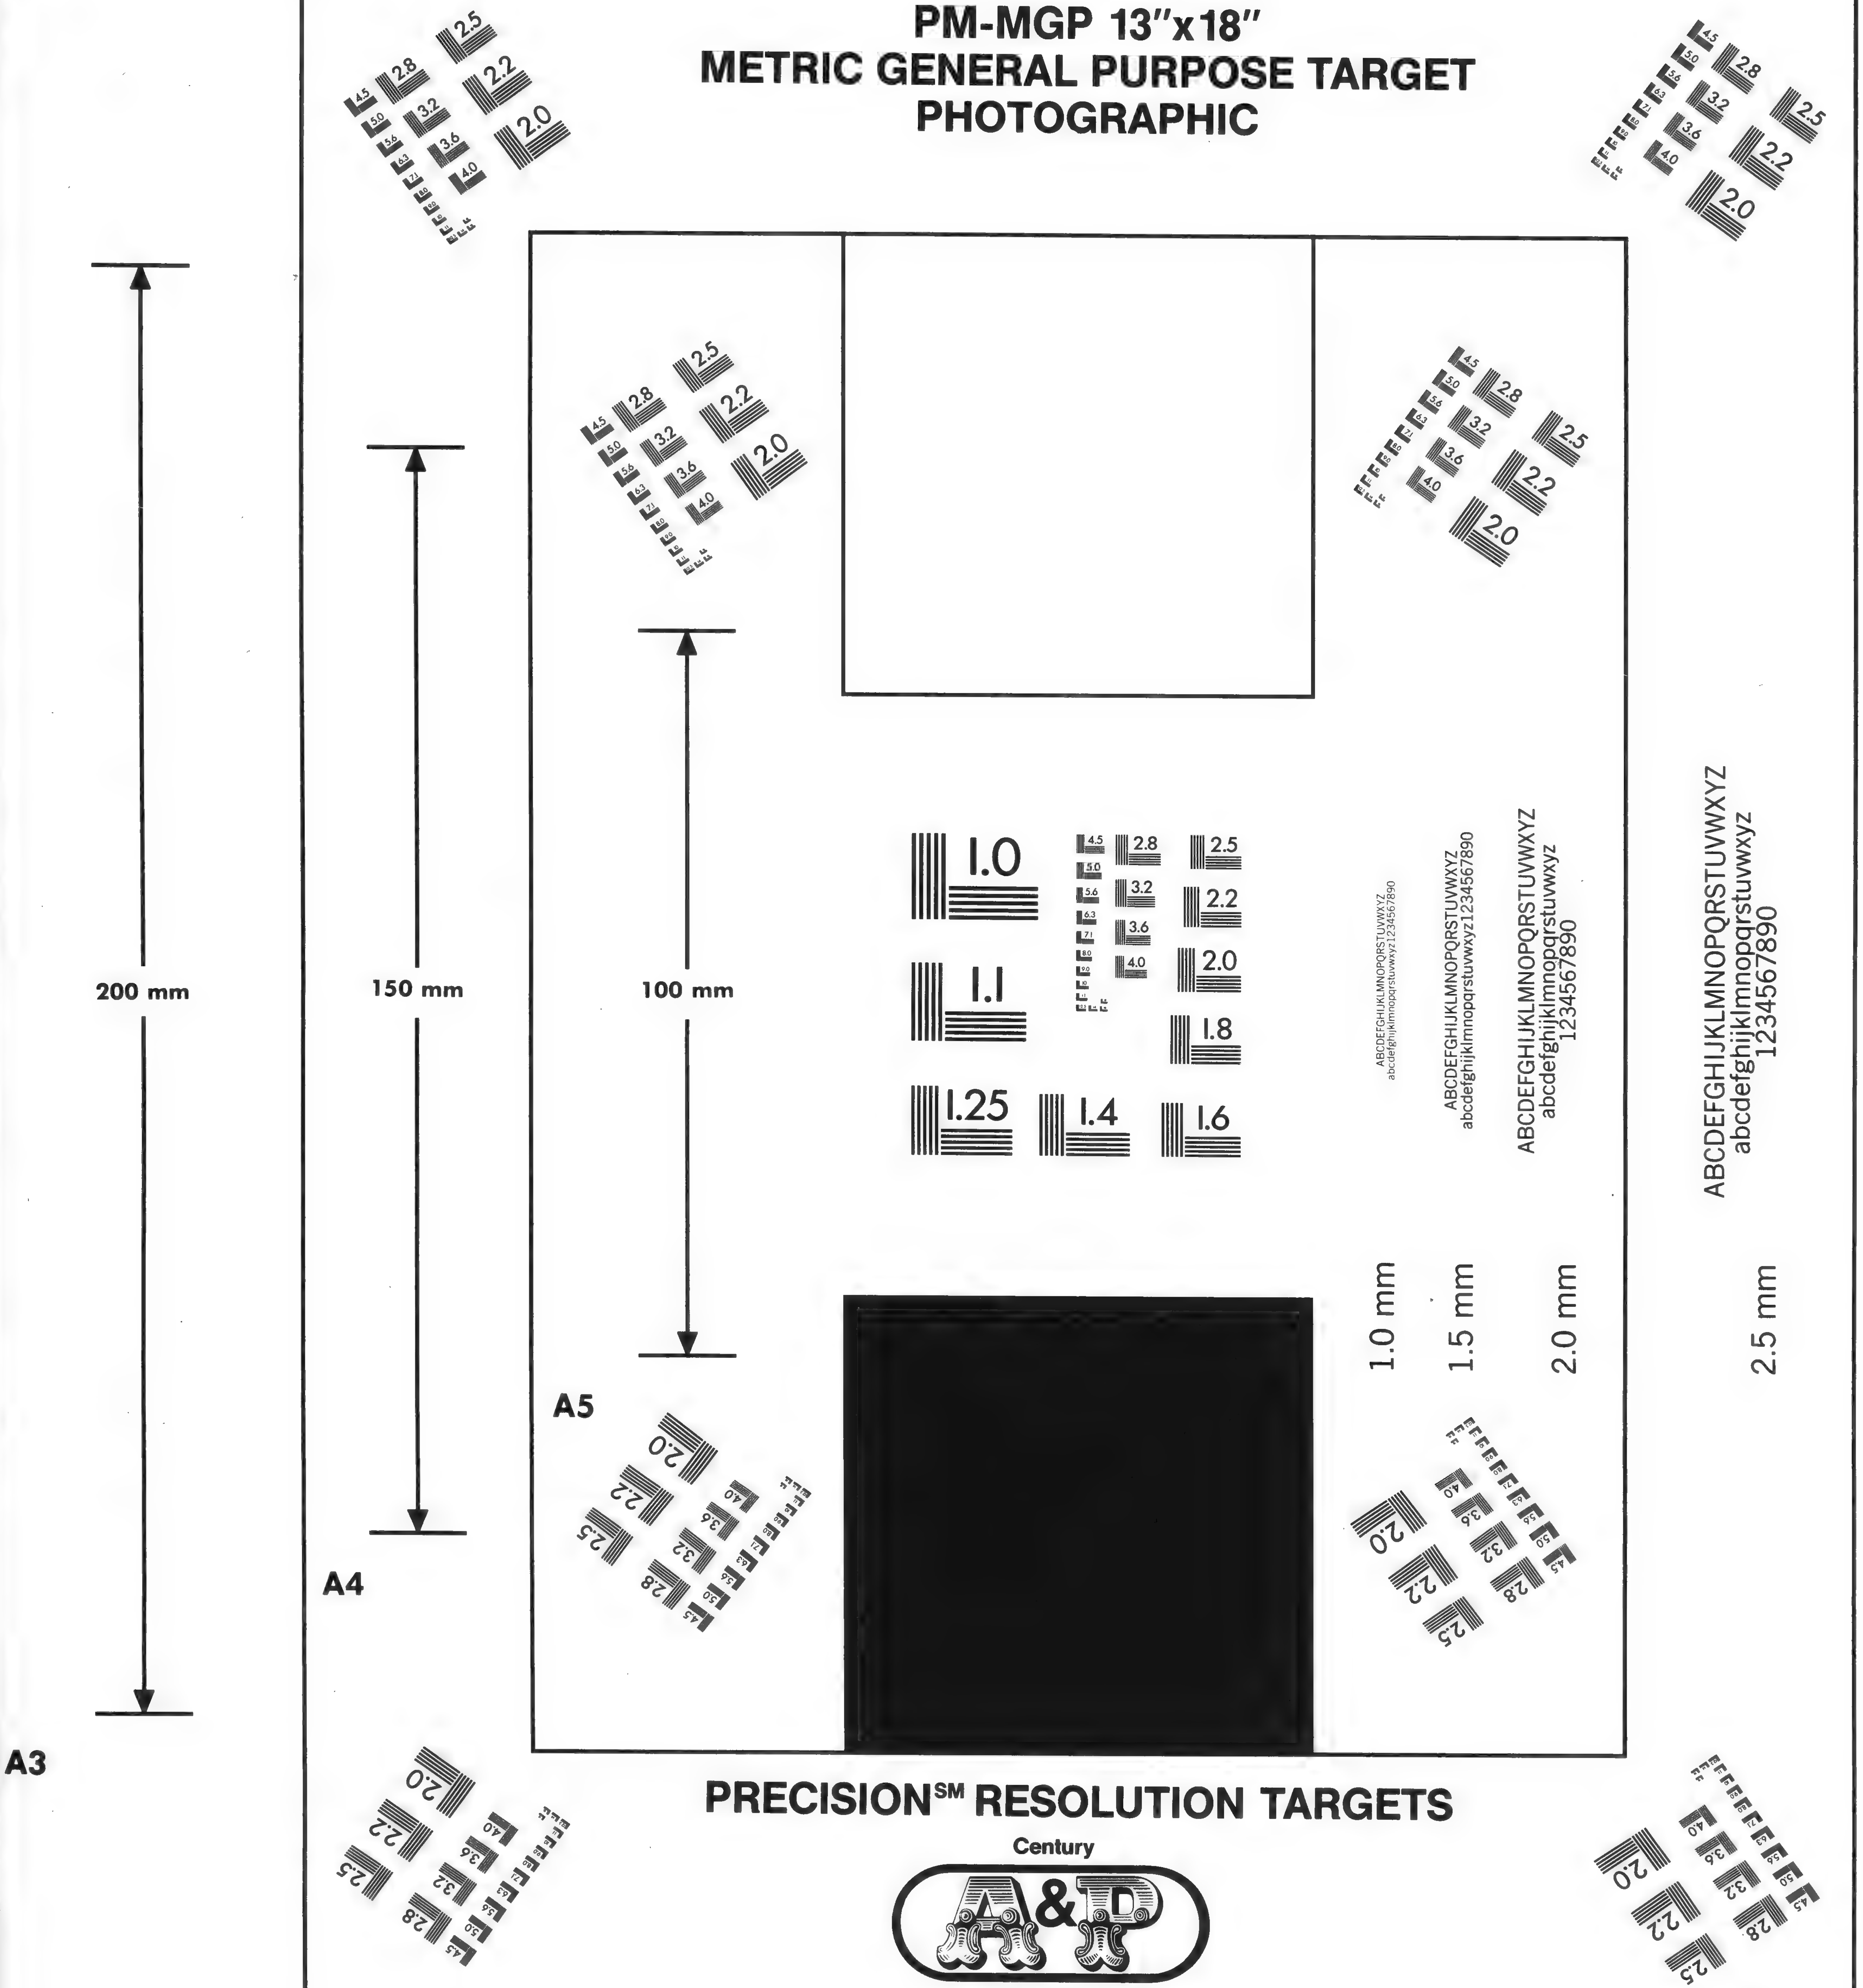
Having made extensive plans for the coming season of Boston Symphony concerts which will open a week from next Friday and Saturday, Oct. 8 and 9, Pierre Monteux will start rehearsals with the orchestra next week.

REDUCTION

RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
8.0
9.0
200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A3
A4
A5
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

Trans Jan 19

MISS JANIS IN FULL FETTLE

ain Intimate Entertainment Over Too Ample Spaces—Character-Songs and Imitations in Old and New Quality—Instant and Pungent Powers Variously Plied

SYMPHONY HALL is not too fortunate a container for Miss Janis. A discoverable part of the public that she long since won on the vaudeville stage or in the musical plays approaches shyly that temple of the serious arts, is not too comfortable once within it. The audience that she gathered last evening, seemed sparse in the great room; yet it would have filled the fitter Jordan Hall and looked considerable—say at a special matinée or two—in one or another of our theatres. The frame for the stage and Miss Janis's own silken settings, as in a corner of some black-and-gold drawing-room, do reduce a far-spreading platform to congenial dimensions. Yet she has still to overcome the tunnel-like spaces of the long, high, rectangular auditorium. To the best of her ability she does; but the roving eye quickly perceived that response was readiest and warmest in those clustered near the stage.

Miss Janis's assistants—a baritone and a violinist—sing or play salon-pieces in a salon-manner. She herself must carry to the audience her songs, sketches, imitations and characterizations by the play of her voice, countenance, hands; by the quick, communicating quality of all her talents and all her "personality" that is the acme of every entertainer. In the phrase of the hour Miss Janis gives "intimate" pleasure and Symphony Hall does not exactly encourage any sort of intimacy. True, she there gains a different and desirable audience, and in her new ambition to be single-handed entertainer after the manner, say, of Miss Draper, cuts loose from a theatrical and vaudevillian past. Yet somehow that troublesome jade, memory will put her back into her earlier surroundings.

The peculiar ability, moreover, by which Miss Janis holds fast her new public even as she did her old, is the crowning vaudevillian virtue. She chats for an introductory moment to the audience, and it is pleased to meet her. She begins a "character-song," and on the instant it sees and hears, illuded, the personage she would project; yields as summarily to the mood she would convey. As soon as she chooses, cheerfully it meets Miss Janis again. She begins an imitation, and there before us Fanny Brice or Sam Bernard or George Cohan (as he used to be) lives, moves and has stage-being. Even so would each assure the audience of a lack of bananas today. Three, four, minutes more and Miss Janis snaps the illusion to become her silvery, scintillant self through a whirling little dance. This instantaneousness—to use a clumsy, ugly word for a keen-edged, pleasurable power—is half the means to Miss Janis's sway over her audiences. On the vaudeville stage, in the hodge-podge of musical plays, she ripened and sharpened the innate instinct.

The other half may be divided and subdivided into various springs of pleasure. By this time, Miss Janis is mistress of piteous, humorous, pictorial, parodying or playful characterization. When she told us spectators that she usually did an amusing sidelong strut at home, and not in public, we believed her delightedly our young friend with a knack for such comic travesty. When she passed to a Parisian version of "Shoo-fle Along," she gave no less pleasure as expert and pungent parodist of the theatre. Her delineating warmth from the roses in her hair through the pulse of her tones and the swaying of her body animated the Italian girl of the piazze. The humor of dread, mistrust and wonder looked out of her eyes, spoke from her lips, when she sang, negro-wise, of "Nothing." She passed to the Cockney girl, "wot's married to a guy wot beats her,"—and the pity of the devotion that loves and dreads, endures and longs, strains, quivers, but will not break, cried tearless out of her tones and her whole being. And these tones are still that "croaking" voice, yet

Continued on Following Page

Her Jan 17

12TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Dvorak's Carnival Overture Shows Composer at His Best

SOLOISTS PROMINENT IN BRAHMS CONCERTO

By PHILIP HALE

The 12th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Dvorak, Overture, "Carnival"; Brahms, Concerto for violin and violoncello (Messrs. Burgin and Bedetti); Dubussy, Symphonic Excerpts from "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian" (first time at these concerts); Liszt, Mephisto Waltz.

Dvorak's brilliant overture is in his best manner. Here his keen sense of rhythm and gorgeous color had full play. Here he let himself go, and did not take himself too seriously. He was a child of nature. It was a pity that misguided persons insisted at times on arraying him in professional roles and begged him to be dignified.

This overture was written before he came to the United States. It is curious to note in it certain passages that in melody, rhythm and color, even with particular orchestral effects, might well be in his "New World" symphony, supposed to be inspired by negro tunes. If they were in the symphony, the wiseacres wiuld joyfully shout: "Aha! Pure negro!" Not without reason do Czech music critics find the symphony "Bohemian."

There are golden passags in Brahms's concerto; there is also much clay, so that the gold stands out in bolder relief. There is coarse as there is fine instrumentation. There are conventional, ordinary, dull pages, and now and then in the first and third movements are charming measures of quiet emotion. As for the second movement it gives an excuse for the performance of the whole work, otherwise two virtuosos would sacrifice themselves on the altar of St. Johannes. It is needless to say that the solo measures were played most artisfically by Messrs. Burgin and Bedetti, and that the orchestra gave excellent support.

Debussy, asked by D'Annunzio to write music for the Italian's Mystery play, gladly set himself to work. Indeed, he has been quoted as saying that of all his compositions he liked this one the best. Perhaps he did not make that statement. Composers, like poets, novelists, painters, dramatists, are not always the best judges of their own works. Thus Milton preferred "Paradise Regained" to "Paradise Lost." Parents have a weakness for their naughtiest children.

The Mystery with Debussy's music was produced in Paris in 1911. Caplet, who then conducted, led a performance at the Boston Opera House in March, 1912. This performance was inadequate. There had been insufficient rehearsal, and there were other reasons why it was impossible to gain a just idea of the work.

Is it wise to perform music written for D'Annunzio's Mystery play in a concert hall? We seriously doubt the wisdom. As purely orchestral music without thought of the play the first movement, "The Court of Lilies," is beautiful in itself. The ending of the second movement is impressive, but what is the "Dance of Ectasy" without the incident as depicted on the playhouse stage? And so the other movements, "The Passion" and "The Good Shepherd," as pure music, detached from the play, are by no means suited to the concert hall. In spite of a few agreeable or singular, and not agreeable, passages, they seemed purposeless, not to say insignificant, though finely performed. Some one may say, "But we cannot hear this music except in this way." The answer is: "Fair sir, you do not hear it." If "The Martyrdom of Saint-Sebastian were to be filmed, then this music might assume importance played with the unfolding of the tragedy.

The concert ended with the gloriously sensuous "Mephisto Waltz" of Liszt's, Whether it would have been composed so brilliantly if it had not been for Hector Berlioz's supreme orchestral art is a question that it is not necessary to discuss. Liszt, taking his inspiration from Lenau's poem, treated his subject con amore. He did not make the mistake of attempting an interlinear translation, nor for full enjoyment is there need of knowing Lenau's poem. in its way it is a masterpiece, though some persons, easily shocked, called the way "devilish," forgetting that the Prince of Darkness has not always been a gentleman.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week's concerts is as follows: Beethovens' "Pastoral" Symphony, Stravinsky's 'Sacre du Printemps," and these songs sung by Marya Freund: Monteverdi's Lament of Ariadne and Mahler's "Primal Light," "Earthly Life" and "Who Thought Out the Little Song?"

Globe Jan 19

DOUBLE CONCERTO AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Brahms, Debussy, Liszt and Dvorak Heard

Brahms' "Double Concerto" for violin, violoncello, and orchestra, in which the solo parts were played by Richard Burgin and Jean Bedetti, was substituted for the customary symphony on yesterday's Symphony concert program. Mr Monteux' one serious defect as a program maker is a tendency to avoid the great classic symphonies for the performance of which these concerts were founded and are perpetuated.

This double concerto is primarily a show piece, though it contains more melody and rhythm than yesterday's performance brought out. Mr Burgin and Mr Bedetti played competently, but not brilliantly. The orchestral accompaniment was ill-rehearsed and unpardonably ineffective. Even a superlative performance of this minor work of Brahms, however, could not replace for many hearers the great symphony by Mozart, Beethoven, or Brahms of which it may have deprived them. And a great classic will stand an inferior performance better than such an occasional piece as this concerto can.

Mr Monteaux is to be thanked for letting the audience hear the fragments from Debussy's "Martyrdom of St Sabastian" music, composed for D'Annunzio's mystery play at his request. If these excerpts are fair samples, this music is Debussy's masterpiece, except for "Pelleas." Here he has attained the depth and power of emotion which he elsewhere eschews. The music is so poignant and so original that it is a great pity the work cannot often be heard in its original form. The performance was eloquent. Those who dismiss Debussy as a mere miniaturist should hear these excerpts.

Dvorak's "Carnival" overture is spirited light music with rather more use of conventional tricks of the composer's trade and less of that inexhaustible flow of melody which is Dvorak's great merit than are to be found in his better known works. The performance was more vigorous than clear. It had both the virtues and a share of the defects of the interpretations given by the average brass band.

Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz from his episodes from Lenau's "Faust" was the concluding number. It is a virtuoso piece, hollow, void of feeling and of melody, effective only when theatrically played. Mr Monteux is not good at aping or getting the orchestra to ape emotions which he does not understand. One cannot, however, make diabolism in music merely respectable.

Yesterday's was a dull concert, on the whole. Neither the music nor the performance, except in the Debussy number, were or appeared thrilling. But a certain amount of routine perfunctory work is to be expected in a long and crowded season.

Next week what will probably prove one of the chief musical sensations of the season is to be produced for the first time here. Stravinsky has written few things likely to rouse more controversy than "The Rites of Spring." The symphony is Beethoven's "Pastoral." Mme Marya Freund, making her Boston debut, will sing Monteverde's "Lament of Ariadne" and three songs by Mahler, with the orchestra.

P. R.

Post Jan 19

YMPHONY USES OWN SOLOISTS

Burgin and Bedetti Play Brahm's Double Concerto

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, gave its 12th Friday afternoon concert in Symphony Hall yesterday, with the following programme: Dvorak's "Carnival" overture; Brahms" concerto for violin and violoncello; excerpts from Debussy's music to D'Annunzio's mystery play, "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian"; Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz." Richard Burgin, concertmaster, and Jean Bedetti, first cellist, were the soloists.

DEBUSSY'S GENIUS

The Debussy excerpts were played for the first time in Symphony Hall, and this music had been heard in Boston but once before, when the play was produced under the direction of Mr. Caplet at the Boston Opera House a dozen years ago. Mr. Monteux had evidently prepared the excerpts with the greatest care and he interpreted them con amore. His enterprise and Debussy's music deserved a better reception than a brief flutter of applause, barely enough to justify the conductor in bowing.

It may be said that this music is more effective when heard with the play it is designed to interpret. Very likely, but how often is it to be heard so in Boston? Besides, it is difficult to see how anybody with the slightest knowledge of the story could fail to be impressed by the revelatory effectiveness of this score. And for some of us, without regard to the play, the music is of itself surpassingly lovely and bears the touch of genius in its economy of means.

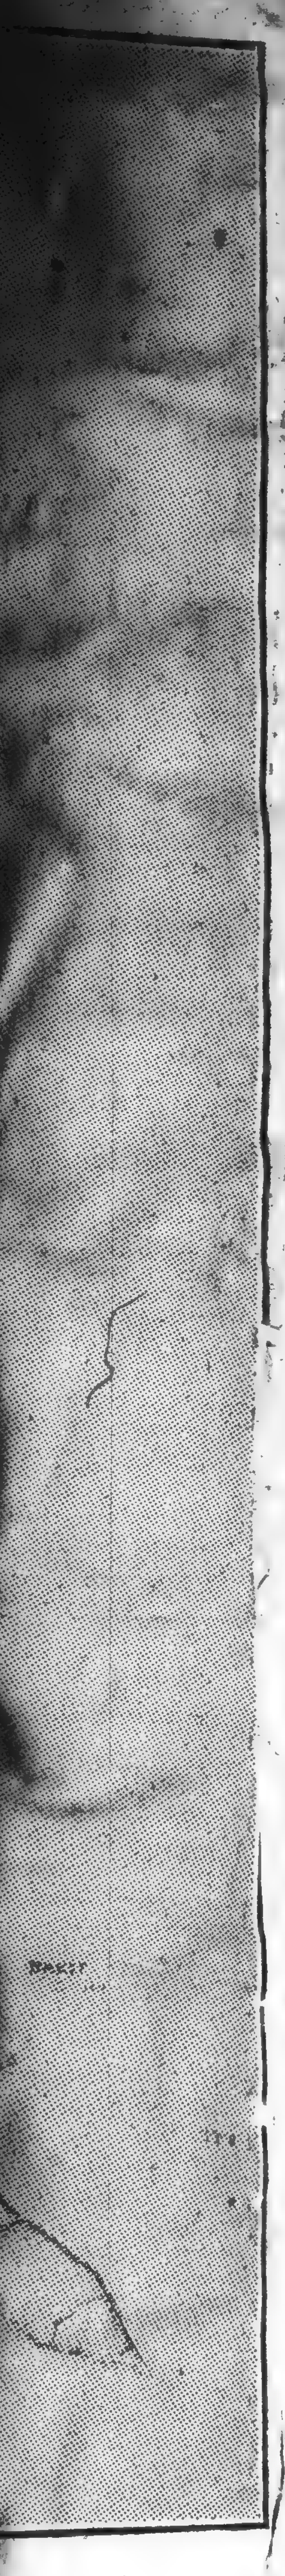
"Court of the Lilies"

How exquisitely the atmosphere is established by the sparing use of woodwind and harps in "The Court of the Lilies." Then observe the restraint in the "Dance of Ecstasy," and shudder to think what Liszt might have done with the opportunity. Cries from wind and higher strings answer one another above a shivering murmur from the lower strings as the saint cavorts on the hot coals. All this is accomplished with a minimum of instrumental sound. Then, when Debussy wants a climax, he achieves it, not by calling for the sum total of the muscular power of 1[illegible] men, but by giving rein a little to the forces that have before been held back it is like the stories of Chopin playing one of his own sonatas.

Similarly "The Passion," as enacted by Sebastian, is delineated, not by screams and fury, but with moving reticence. Here is grief, profound and infinite, but no hysterics. Finally "The Good Shepherd," prelude to the fourth act of the play, suggests with tender reverence the comforting of the martyr by Jesus, and stirring chords at the close may be taken to indicate the ultimate reception into Paradise. And all these things are conveyed by shimmering waves of sound swaying like colorful thought-clouds over the orchestra. Great music, gloriously played.

Brahms' double concerto served well to display the dexterity of two of the orchestra's virtuosi. Mr. Burgin and Mr. Bedetti were remarkably unanimous in purpose and in execution. Unfortunately, it seemed to one hearer, the technical demands were too great to permit, save in a few passages, of breadth or warmth of tone in either instrument. Plenty of fireworks, but little beauty, except in the accompaniment.

Dvorak's overture, full of melodious life and gayety, received a splendid performance, and the Liszt was so well done as to make it seem almost worth doing.



ebussy's Music

[174]

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE FALL RIVER
MASS.
HERALD

DEC 28 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

An event of prime importance will be the coming visit of the internationally celebrated Boston Symphony orchestra of 100 musicians, which is to give a concert at the Empire on next Sunday in the Woman's club concert series.

This orchestra has been for years considered one of the most remarkable organizations of its kind in the world. Its name stands for the utmost perfection in musical performance. These supreme qualities are the outcome of more than 40 years of endeavor.

The history of the orchestra makes a fine record of high purpose, administrative wisdom and munificence on the part of its founder. Every effort was directed toward artistic supremacy. One after another of the world's greatest conductors devoted their best towards the further refinement of the ensemble. Nothing was spared to bring the first musicians of Europe to make up the ranks.

Hence the ensemble, in glow of tone, in clear cut unanimity and delicate balance of choirs, is the envy of all orchestras. It requires a remarkable leader to shape this ensemble and to evoke from it a wondrously eloquent performance.

Such a leader is Pierre Monteux. This, his fifth season as conductor, will also be his last, and promises to be one of the finest, artistically speaking, of them all. The Boston Symphony concerts have never been more widely popular, nor the schedule more crowded.

NEW YORK
N. Y.
E. POST

9 1923

Boston Symphony Programmes

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Carnegie Hall programme next Thursday evening will include Richard Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica," Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture, Glière's symphonic poem "The Sirens," and Liszt's "Tasso."

Jacques Thibaud, the great French violinist, will appear as soloist at the matinée next Saturday in Mozart's concerto in E flat major. Pierre Monteux will introduce Arthur Bliss's "Color Symphony," of which the movements are purple, red, blue, green. He will open the programme with Brahms's tragic overture and close it with Ravel's first suite from "Daphnis and Chloe" (nocturne, interlude, and war dance).

THE
NEW YORK
N. Y.
EVENING JOURNAL

29 1923

Orchestral Novelties.

Next week will be one of many orchestral novelties—indeed, an unusual number of orchestral concerts. The Boston Orchestra, at its Saturday matinee at Carnegie Hall, will introduce here Arthur Bliss's "Color" symphony. Jacques Thibaud will be the soloist in a Mozart violin concerto. At the Thursday evening concert Richard Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica" will be the chief number.

The Philadelphia Orchestra, Wednesday evening [illegible] will provide [illegible] made up of [illegible]

OHIO
BILLBOARD

DEC 29 1923

[illegible]

According to a recent program announcement, the subscriptions to meet the current musical year's deficit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are now $60,976 out of the necessary $95,000. The treasurer, E. B. Dane, further reports the accumulated Endowment Fund as $145,825.52.

The Marmeins, Miriam, Irene and Phyllis,

VA.
NEWS LEADER

DEC 29 1923

"COLOR SYMPHONY" OF BLISS IS PRODUCED

Color in music is a matter evaded or expressed in as many ways as the abstract properties of color are conceived by composers. Attempts to shed light on "color symphonies" merely of optical illusion have hitherto proved freaks or failures. A different and wholly musical expression is the so-called "Color Symphony" of Arthur Bliss, which the Boston Symphony orchestra produced in its home city this week. The work is in four movements, a prologue and the episodes "Red," Blue," "Green."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TELEGRAPH

30 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Orchestra to Be Heard Thursday Evening and Saturday Afternoon.

The second pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall will take place next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon.

This feature of the Thursday programs will be Richard Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica," which important score had its only performance in New Yo in a number of seasons at the hands of the composer The other numbers will be Mozart's Overture to "The Magic Flute," Gliere's symphonic poem, "The Sirens," and Liszt's "Tasso: Lamento e Trionfo."

At the Saturday matinee Jacques Thibaud will appear as soloist in Mozart's Concerto in E flat, K. No. 268. Pierre Monteux, at this concert, will give Arthur Bliss's "Color Symphony" its first performance here. The movements of this score are listed: "Purple; Blue; Red; Green." The concert will open with Brahms's Tragic Oventure and close with the first suite arranged by Ravel from his "Daphne and Chloe" (Nocturne—Interlude—Ward Dance).

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

DEC 30 1923

Jacques Thibaud Soloist With the Boston Orchestra

With Jacques Thibaud as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its second visit to Brooklyn this season for a concert in the Academy of Music next Friday evening

Pierre Monteux will present the Fourth Symphony of Schumann in D minor, one of the romantic composer's finest and most lyrically beautiful scores. This will be introduced by Berlioz' popular overture 'The Roman Carnival."

The novelty of the evening will be the symphonic poem, 'The Sirens", by Gliere, the noted Russian composer. The evening will close with Borodin'e Polovtsian Dances from his opera 'Prince Igor."

Thibaud will be heard with the Orchestra in Mozart's concerto in E flat major, the performance of which is one of this virtuoso's finest achievements. The great French violinist has recently returned to America for his season's tour, of which his coming appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra will serve as an introduction.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD

DEC 30 1923

The second pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall will take place Thursday evening, January 3, at 8:15, and Saturday afternoon, January 5, at 2:30.

The feature of the Thursday program will be Richard Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica," which important score has had its only performance in New York in a number of seasons at the hands of the composer. The other numbers will be Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute," Gliere's symphonic poem "The Sirens," and Liszt's "Tasso: Lamento e Trionfo."

CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TRIBUNE

DEC 30 1923

Marya Freund, the Polish soprano, will sing Mahler's "Kindertotenlieder" with the Boston Symphony at its Boston concerts of January 25 and 26.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES

JAN 1 - 1924

Jacques Thibaud will be the violin soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Friday evening.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BROOKLYN
N. Y.
TIMES

DEC 30 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE.

With Jacques Thibaud as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its second visit to Brooklyn this season for a concert in the Academy of Music Friday evening, January 4. Pierre Monteux will present the fourth Symphony of Schumann in D minor. The novelty of the evening will be the symphonic poem, "The Sirens," by Gliere, the Russian composer. The evening will close with Borodin's Polovtsian Dances from his opera "Prince Igor."

BROOKLYN
NEW YORK
EAGLE

DEC 30 1923

Boston Symphony.

With Jacques Thibaud as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its second Brooklyn appearance this season in the Academy of Music, next Friday evening. The novelty of the evening will be the symphonic poem, "The Sirens," by Gliere, and the evening will close with Borodin's Polotskian dances from "Prince Igor." Thibaud will be heard with the orchestra in Mozart's concerto in E flat major.

Paul Gundlach has engaged the Brooklyn Academy of Music and a

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
WORCESTER
MASS.
POST

2 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA COMING

First Local Appearance Since 1921 to Be Feb. 12

The Boston Symphony Orchestra of 104 musicians under the direction of Pierre Monteux, who is called the greatest conductor France has produced, will give a concert in Worcester, Feb. 12. This will be of particular interest inasmuch as this orchestra has not played here since 1921. In the last three seasons Mr. Monteux has added new laurels and beauties to the orchestra under his command. It is due to his efforts and skill that the orchestra has attained its present ensemble. He is planning a program of unusual interest and beauty for Worcester, a program that will have popular appeal and yet represent the highest achievement in symphonic music in different nations and periods.

FROM THE
WORCESTER
MASS.
TELEGRAM

JAN 1924

SYMPHONY TO PLAY IN CITY

Famous Boston Orchestra To Give Concert Feb. 12 At Mechanics Hall

After an absence of three years, the Boston Symphony orchestra of 104 musicians will visit Worcester this season, it was announced yesterday from the Boston offices of the organizations. The concert will be given in Mechanics hall on Tuesday evening, Feb. 12.

This will be the last time that Worcester music lovers will have the opportunity of hearing the Boston Symphony under the direction of Pierre Monteaux, the famous French conductor who has been in charge for the past five years, and under whose regime the orchestra has reached the zenith of its success. At the close of the present season M. Monteaux will return to France.

The present season has been the most successful in its history, representatives of the management say. For 40 years the Boston Symphony has made a remarkable record, but this year, the celebrated conductor has gathered a combination of artists whose work eclipses all previous efforts.

M. Monteaux came to America eight years ago as director of the Metropolitan orchestra, coming from that organization to his present position

ve years ago. He is recognized e ne of the foremost authorities o rench opera in the world.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LAWRENCE
MASS.

JAN 1924

SYMPHONY PLANS SPLENDID PROGRAM

An unusually fine program has been compiled by Pierre Monteux, the illustrious conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, for the pending concert in Lawrence by this famous organization, which will take place in the Colonial Theatre on Sunday afternoon, January 20.

This will probably be the farewell appearance of this foremost of French conductors here, since he is now completing his fifth and last season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and will at its conclusion return to France.

The principal number on the program will be Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A major, one of the most impressive and rhythmically captivating of orchestral scores. A taste of the French school will be afforded in Debussy's Two Nocturnes "Clouds' and 'Festivals,' descriptive sketches in tones in the impressionistic style. The concert will close with Tschaikovsky's battle piece, the "1812" Overture, one of the most thunderous and exciting of musical compositions.

Raymond Havens, as the distinguished soloist of the afternoon, will appear with the Orchestra in Schumann's Concerto in A minor. This Piano virtuoso, who has made such a splendid name for himself recently, has appeared with this Orchestra previously in Lawrence and other cities.

Seats are on sale now at the theatre box office.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE SPRINGFIELD
MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JAN 2 - 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO PLAY HERE SUNDAY

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give its annual concert under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian association Sunday afternoon at the Auditorium. This event of the musical season is always eagerly anticipated by the music-lovers of Springfield. The full orchestra of 100 pieces, with Pierce Moneux, conductor, will play Sunday afternoon, starting promptly at 3.

The side doors will be open soon after 2, and the front doors at 2.45. Tickets either subscription or free, can be obtained at the Y. M. C. A. or at the principal music stores of the city.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

FALL RIVER
MASS.
HERALD

DEC 28 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

An event of prime importance will be the coming visit of the internationally celebrated Boston Symphony orchestra of 100 musicians, which is to give a concert at the Empire on next Sunday in the Woman's club concert series.

This orchestra has been for years considered one of the most remarkable organizations of its kind in the world. Its name stands for the utmost perfection in musical performance. These supreme qualities are the outcome of more than 40 years of endeavor.

The history of the orchestra makes a fine record of high purpose, administrative wisdom and munificence on the part of its founder. Every effort was directed toward artistic supremacy. One after another of the world's greatest conductors devoted their best towards the further refinement of the ensemble. Nothing was spared to bring the first musicians of Europe to make up the ranks.

Hence the ensemble, in glow of tone, in clear cut unanimity and delicate balance of choirs, is the envy of all orchestras. It requires a remarkable leader to shape this ensemble and to evoke from it a wondrously eloquent performance.

Such a leader is Pierre Monteux. This, his fifth season as conductor, will also be his last, and promises to be one of the finest, artistically speaking, of them all. The Boston Symphony concerts have never been more widely popular, nor the schedule more crowded.

NEW YORK
N. Y.
E. POST

9 1923

Boston Symphony Programmes

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Carnegie Hall programme next Thursday evening will include Richard Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica," Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture, Glière's symphonic poem "The Sirens," and Liszt's "Tasso."

Jacques Thibaud, the great French violinist, will appear as soloist at the matinée next Saturday in Mozart's concerto in E flat major. Pierre Monteux will introduce Arthur Bliss's "Color Symphony," of which the movements are purple, red, blue, green. He will open the programme with Brahms's tragic overture and close it with Ravel's first suite from "Daphnis and Chloe" (nocturne, interlude, and war dance).

NEW YORK
N. Y.
EVENING JOURNAL

29 1923

Orchestral Novelties.

Next week will be one of many orchestral novelties—indeed, an unusual number of orchestral concerts. The Boston Orchestra, at its Saturday matinee at Carnegie Hall, will introduce here Arthur Bliss's "Color" symphony. Jacques Thibaud will be the soloist in a Mozart violin concerto. At the Thursday evening concert Richard Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica" will be the chief number.

The Philadelphia Orchestra, Wednesday evening [illegible] will provide [illegible] made up of [illegible]

OHIO
BILLBOARD

DEC 29 1923

full tour thru Canada.

According to a recent program announcement, the subscriptions to meet the current musical year's deficit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are now $60,976 out of the necessary $95,000. The treasurer, E. B. Dane, further reports the accumulated Endowment Fund as $145,825.52.

The Marmeins, Miriam, Irene and Phyllis,

VA.
NEWS LEADER

DEC 29 1923

"COLOR SYMPHONY" OF BLISS IS PRODUCED

Color in music is a matter evaded or expressed in as many ways as the abstract properties of color are conceived by composers. Attempts to shed light on "color symphonies" merely of optical illusion have hitherto proved freaks or failures. A different and wholly musical expression is the so-called "Color Symphony" of Arthur Bliss, which the Boston Symphony orchestra produced in its home city this week. The work is in four movements, a prologue and the episodes "Red," Blue," "Green."

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK
TELEGRAPH

0 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Orchestra to Be Heard Thursday Evening and Saturday Afternoon.

The second pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall will take place next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon.

This feature of the Thursday programs will be Richard Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica," which important score had its only performance in New York in a number of seasons at the hands of the composer The other numbers will be Mozart's Overture to "The Magic Flute," Gliere's symphonic poem, "The Sirens," and Liszt's "Tasso: Lamento e Trionfo."

At the Saturday matinee Jacques Thibaud will appear as soloist in Mozart's Concerto in E flat, K. No. 268. Pierre Monteux, at this concert, will give Arthur Bliss's "Color Symphony" its first performance here. The movements of this score are listed: "Purple; Blue; Red; Green." The concert will open with Brahms's Tragic Oventure and close with the first suite arranged by Ravel from his "Daphne and Chloe" (Nocturne—Interlude—Ward Dance).

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

DEC 30 1923

Jacques Thibaud Soloist With the Boston Orchestra

With Jacques Thibaud as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its second visit to Brooklyn this season for a concert in the Academy of Music next Friday evening

Pierre Monteux will present the Fourth Symphony of Schumann in D minor, one of the romantic composer's finest and most lyrically beautiful scores. This will be introduced by Berlioz' popular overture 'The Roman Carnival."

The novelty of the evening will be the symphonic poem, 'The Sirens", by Gliere, the noted Russian composer. The evening will close with Borodin'e Polovtsian Dances from his opera 'Prince Igor."

Thibaud will be heard with the Orchestra in Mozart's concerto in E flat major, the performance of which is one of this virtuoso's finest achievements. The great French violinist has recently returned to America for his season's tour, of which his coming appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra will serve as an introduction.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK
HERALD

DEC 30 1923

The second pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall will take place Thursday evening, January 3, at 8:15, and Saturday afternoon, January 5, at 2:30.

The feature of the Thursday program will be Richard Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica," which important score has had its only performance in New York in a number of seasons at the hands of the composer. The other numbers will be Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute," Gliere's symphonic poem "The Sirens," and Liszt's "Tasso: Lamento e Trionfo."

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK
TRIBUNE

DEC 30 1923

Marya Freund, the Polish soprano, will sing Mahler's "Kindertotenlieder" with the Boston Symphony at its Boston concerts of January 25 and 26.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK
TIMES

JAN 1 - 1924

Jacques Thibaud will be the violin soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Friday evening.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
TIMES

DEC 30 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE.

With Jacques Thibaud as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its second visit to Brooklyn this season for a concert in the Academy of Music Friday evening, January 4. Pierre Monteux will present the fourth Symphony of Schumann in D minor. The novelty of the evening will be the symphonic poem, "The Sirens," by Gliere, the Russian composer. The evening will close with Borodin's Polovtsian Dances from his opera "Prince Igor."

BROOKLYN
NEW YORK
EAGLE

DEC 30 1923

Boston Symphony.

With Jacques Thibaud as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its second Brooklyn appearance this season in the Academy of Music, next Friday evening. The novelty of the evening will be the symphonic poem, "The Sirens," by Gliere, and the evening will close with Borodin's Polotskian dances from "Prince Igor." Thibaud will be heard with the orchestra in Mozart's concerto in E flat major.

Paul Gundlach has engaged the Brooklyn Academy of Music and a

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

WORCESTER
MASS.
POST

1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA COMING

First Local Appearance Since 1921 to Be Feb. 12

The Boston Symphony Orchestra of 104 musicians under the direction of Pierre Monteux, who is called the greatest conductor France has produced, will give a concert in Worcester, Feb. 12. This will be of particular interest inasmuch as this orchestra has not played here since 1921. In the last three seasons Mr. Monteux has added new laurels and beauties to the orchestra under his command. It is due to his efforts and skill that the orchestra has attained its present ensemble. He is planning a program of unusual interest and beauty for Worcester, a program that will have popular appeal and yet represent the highest achievement in symphonic music in different nations and periods.

FROM THE

WORCESTER
MASS.
TELEGRAM

JAN 1924

SYMPHONY TO PLAY IN CITY

Famous Boston Orchestra To Give Concert Feb. 12 At Mechanics Hall

After an absence of three years, the Boston Symphony orchestra of 104 musicians will visit Worcester this season, it was announced yesterday from the Boston offices of the organizations. The concert will be given in Mechanics hall on Tuesday evening, Feb. 12.

This will be the last time that Worcester music lovers will have the opportunity of hearing the Boston Symphony under the direction of Pierre Monteaux, the famous French conductor who has been in charge for the past five years, and under whose regime the orchestra has reached the zenith of its success. At the close of the present season M. Monteaux will return to France.

The present season has been the most successful in its history, representatives of the management say. For 40 years the Boston Symphony has made a remarkable record, but this year, the celebrated conductor has gathered a combination of artists whose work eclipses all previous efforts.

M. Monteaux came to America eight years ago as director of the Metropolitan orchestra, coming from that organization to his present position

ve years ago. He is recognized ne of the foremost authorities
rench opera in the world.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

LAWRENCE
MASS.

JAN 1924

SYMPHONY PLANS SPLENDID PROGRAM

An unusually fine program has been compiled by Pierre Monteux, the illustrious conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, for the pending concert in Lawrence by this famous organization, which will take place in the Colonial Theatre on Sunday afternoon, January 20.

This will probably be the farewell appearance of this foremost of French conductors here, since he is now completing his fifth and last season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and will at its conclusion return to France.

The principal number on the program will be Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A major, one of the most impressive and rhythmically captivating of orchestral scores. A taste of the French school will be afforded in Debussy's Two Nocturnes "Clouds' and 'Festivals,' descriptive sketches in tones in the impressionistic style. The concert will close with Tschaikovsky's battle piece, the "1812" Overture, one of the most thunderous and exciting of musical compositions.

Raymond Havens, as the distinguished soloist of the afternoon, will appear with the Orchestra in Schumann's Concerto in A minor. This Piano virtuoso, who has made such a splendid name for himself recently, has appeared with this Orchestra previously in Lawrence and other cities.

Seats are on sale now at the theatre box office.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

SPRINGFIELD
MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JAN - 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO PLAY HERE SUNDAY

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give its annual concert under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian association Sunday afternoon at the Auditorium. This event of the musical season is always eagerly anticipated by the music-lovers of Springfield. The full orchestra of 100 pieces, with Pierce Moneux, conductor, will play Sunday afternoon, starting promptly at 3.

The side doors will be open soon after 2, and the front doors at 2.45. Tickets either subscription or free, can be obtained at the Y. M. C. A. or at the principal music stores of the city.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE FALL RIVER
MASS.
HERALD

DEC 28 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

An event of prime importance will be the coming visit of the internationally celebrated Boston Symphony orchestra of 100 musicians, which is to give a concert at the Empire on next Sunday in the Woman's club concert series.

This orchestra has been for years considered one of the most remarkable organizations of its kind in the world. Its name stands for the utmost perfection in musical performance. These supreme qualities are the outcome of more than 40 years of endeavor.

The history of the orchestra makes a fine record of high purpose, administrative wisdom and munificence on the part of its founder. Every effort was directed toward artistic supremacy. One after another of the world's greatest conductors devoted their best towards the further refinement of the ensemble. Nothing was spared to bring the first musicians of Europe to make up the ranks.

Hence the ensemble, in glow of tone, in clear cut unanimity and delicate balance of choirs, is the envy of all orchestras. It requires a remarkable leader to shape this ensemble and to evoke from it a wondrously eloquent performance.

Such a leader is Pierre Monteux. This, his fifth season as conductor, will also be his last, and promises to be one of the finest, artistically speaking, of them all. The Boston Symphony concerts have never been more widely popular, nor the schedule more crowded.

NEW YORK
N. Y.
[illegible] E. POST

DEC 29 1923

Boston Symphony Programmes

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Carnegie Hall programme next Thursday evening will include Richard Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica," Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture, Glière's symphonic poem "The Sirens," and Liszt's "Tasso."

Jacques Thibaud, the great French violinist, will appear as soloist at the matinée next Saturday in Mozart's concerto in E flat major. Pierre Monteux will introduce Arthur Bliss's "Color Symphony," of which the movements are purple, red, blue, green. He will open the programme with Brahms's tragic overture and close it with Ravel's first suite from "Daphnis and Chloe" (nocturne, interlude, and war dance).

NEW YORK
N. Y.
EVENING JOURNAL

DEC 29 1923

Orchestral Novelties.

Next week will be one of many orchestral novelties—indeed, an unusual number of orchestral concerts. The Boston Orchestra, at its Saturday matinee at Carnegie Hall, will introduce here Arthur Bliss's "Color" symphony. Jacques Thibaud will be the soloist in a Mozart violin concerto. At the Thursday evening concert Richard Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica" will be the chief number.

The Philadelphia Orchestra. Wednesday evening [illegible] H[illegible] will provide [illegible] made up of [illegible]

OHIO
BILLBOARD

DEC 29 1923

[illegible] tour thru Canada.

According to a recent program announcement, the subscriptions to meet the current musical year's deficit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are now $60,976 out of the necessary $95,000. The treasurer, E. B. Dane, further reports the accumulated Endowment Fund as $145,825.52.

The Marmeins, Miriam, Irene and Phyllis,

VA.
NEWS LEADER

DEC 29 1923

"COLOR SYMPHONY" OF BLISS IS PRODUCED

Color in music is a matter evaded or expressed in as many ways as the abstract properties of color are conceived by composers. Attempts to shed light on "color symphonies" merely of optical illusion have hitherto proved freaks or failures. A different and wholly musical expression is the so-called "Color Symphony" of Arthur Bliss, which the Boston Symphony orchestra produced in its home city this week. The work is in four movements, a prologue and the episodes "Red," Blue," "Green."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TELEGRAPH

[illegible] 30 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

[illegible]hestra to Be Heard Thursday [illegible]vening and Saturday Afternoon.

[illegible]e second pair of concerts by the [illegible]n Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie [illegible] will take place next Thursday even[illegible]d Saturday afternoon.

[illegible] feature of the Thursday programs [illegible]e Richard Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica," which important score had its only performance in New Yo[illegible] in a number of seasons at the hands of the composer The other numbers will be Mozart's Overture to "The Magic Flute," Gliere's symphonic poem, "The Sirens," and Liszt's "Tasso: Lamento e Trionfo."

At the Saturday matinee Jacques Thibaud will appear as soloist in Mozart's Concerto in E flat, K. No. 268. Pierre Monteux, at this concert, will give Arthur Bliss's "Color Symphony" its first performance here. The movements of this score are listed: "Purple; Blue; Red; Green." The concert will open with Brahms's Tragic Oventure and close with the first suite arranged by Ravel from his "Daphne and Chloe" (Nocturne—Interlude—Ward Dance).

THIS CL[illegible]NG FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

DEC 30 1923

Jacques Thibaud Soloist With the Boston Orchestra

With Jacques Thibaud as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its second visit to Brooklyn this season for a concert in the Academy of Music next Friday evening

Pierre Monteux will present the Fourth Symphony of Schumann in D minor, one of the romantic composer's finest and most lyrically beautiful scores. This will be introduced by Berlioz' popular overture 'The Roman Carnival."

The novelty of the evening will be the symphonic poem, 'The Sirens", by Gliere, the noted Russian composer. The evening will close with Borodin'e Polovtsian Dances from his opera 'Prince Igor."

Thibaud will be heard with the Orchestra in Mozart's concerto in E flat major, the performance of which is one of this virtuoso's finest achievements. The great French violinist has recently returned to America for his season's tour, of which his coming appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra will serve as an introduction.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD

DEC 30 1923

The second pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall will take place Thursday evening, January 3, at 8:15, and Saturday afternoon, January 5, at 2:30.

The feature of the Thursday program will be Richard Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica," which important score has had its only performance in New York in a number of seasons at the hands of the composer. The other numbers will be Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute," Gliere's symphonic poem "The Sirens," and Liszt's "Tasso: Lamento e Trionfo."

[illegible] CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TRIBUNE

DEC 30 1923

Marya Freund, the Polish soprano, will sing Mahler's "Kindertotenlieder" with the Boston Symphony at its Boston concerts of January 25 and 26.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES

JAN 1 - 1924

Jacques Thibaud will be the violin soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Friday evening.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BROOKLYN
N. Y.
TIMES

DEC 30 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE.

With Jacques Thibaud as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its second visit to Brooklyn this season for a concert in the Academy of Music Friday evening, January 4. Pierre Monteux will present the fourth Symphony of Schumann in D minor. The novelty of the evening will be the symphonic poem, "The Sirens," by Gliere, the Russian composer. The evening will close with Borodin's Polovtsian Dances from his opera "Prince Igor."

BROOKLYN
NEW YORK
EAGLE

DEC 30 1923

Boston Symphony.

With Jacques Thibaud as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its second Brooklyn appearance this season in the Academy of Music, next Friday evening. The novelty of the evening will be the symphonic poem, "The Sirens," by Gliere, and the evening will close with Borodin's Polotskian dances from "Prince Igor." Thibaud will be heard with the orchestra in Mozart's concerto in E flat major.

Paul Gundlach has engaged the Brooklyn Academy of Music and a

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
WORCESTER
MASS.
POST

[illegible] 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA COMING

First Local Appearance Since 1921 to Be Feb. 12

The Boston Symphony Orchestra of 104 musicians under the direction of Pierre Monteux, who is called the greatest conductor France has produced, will give a concert in Worcester, Feb. 12. This will be of particular interest inasmuch as this orchestra has not played here since 1921. In the last three seasons Mr. Monteux has added new laurels and beauties to the orchestra under his command. It is due to his efforts and [illegible] that the orchestra has attained [illegible] ensemble. He is planning [illegible] of unusual interest and [illegible]rcester, a program that [illegible]ular appeal and yet rep[illegible] highest achievement in [illegible] music in different nations [illegible]s.

[illegible] FROM THE
WORCESTER
MASS.
TELEGRAM

JAN 1924

SYMPHONY TO PLAY IN CITY

Famous Boston Orchestra To Give Concert Feb. 12 At Mechanics Hall

After an absence of three years, the Boston Symphony orchestra of 104 musicians will visit Worcester this season, it was announced yesterday from the Boston offices of the organizations. The concert will be given in Mechanics hall on Tuesday evening, Feb. 12.

This will be the last time that Worcester music lovers will have the opportunity of hearing the Boston Symphony under the direction of Pierre Monteaux, the famous French conductor who has been in charge for the past five years, and under whose regime the orchestra has reached the zenith of its success. At the close of the present season M. Monteaux will return to France.

The present season has been the most successful in its history, representatives of the management say. For 40 years the Boston Symphony has made a remarkable record, but this year, the celebrated conductor has gathered a combination of artists whose work eclipses all previous efforts.

M. Monteaux came to America eight years ago as director of the Metropolitan orchestra, coming from that organization to his present position [illegible]e years ago. He is recognized [illegible] [illegible]e of the foremost authorities o[illegible] [illegible]rench opera in the world.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LAWRENCE
MASS.

JAN 1924

SYMPHONY PLANS SPLENDID PROGRAM

An unusually fine program has been compiled by Pierre Monteux, the illustrious conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, for the pending concert in Lawrence by this famous organization, which will take place in the Colonial Theatre on Sunday afternoon, January 20.

This will probably be the farewell appearance of this foremost of French conductors here, since he is now completing his fifth and last season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and will at its conclusion return to France.

The principal number on the program will be Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A major, one of the most impressive and rhythmically captivating of orchestral scores. A taste of the French school will be afforded in Debussy's Two Nocturnes "Clouds' and 'Festivals,' descriptive sketches in tones in the impressionistic style. The concert will close with Tschaikovsky's battle piece, the "1812" Overture, one of the most thunderous and exciting of musical compositions.

Raymond Havens, as the distinguished soloist of the afternoon, will appear with the Orchestra in Schumann's Concerto in A minor. This Piano virtuoso, who has made such a splendid name for himself recently, has appeared with this Orchestra previously in Lawrence and other cities.

Seats are on sale now at the theatre box office.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE SPRINGFIELD
MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JAN [illegible]

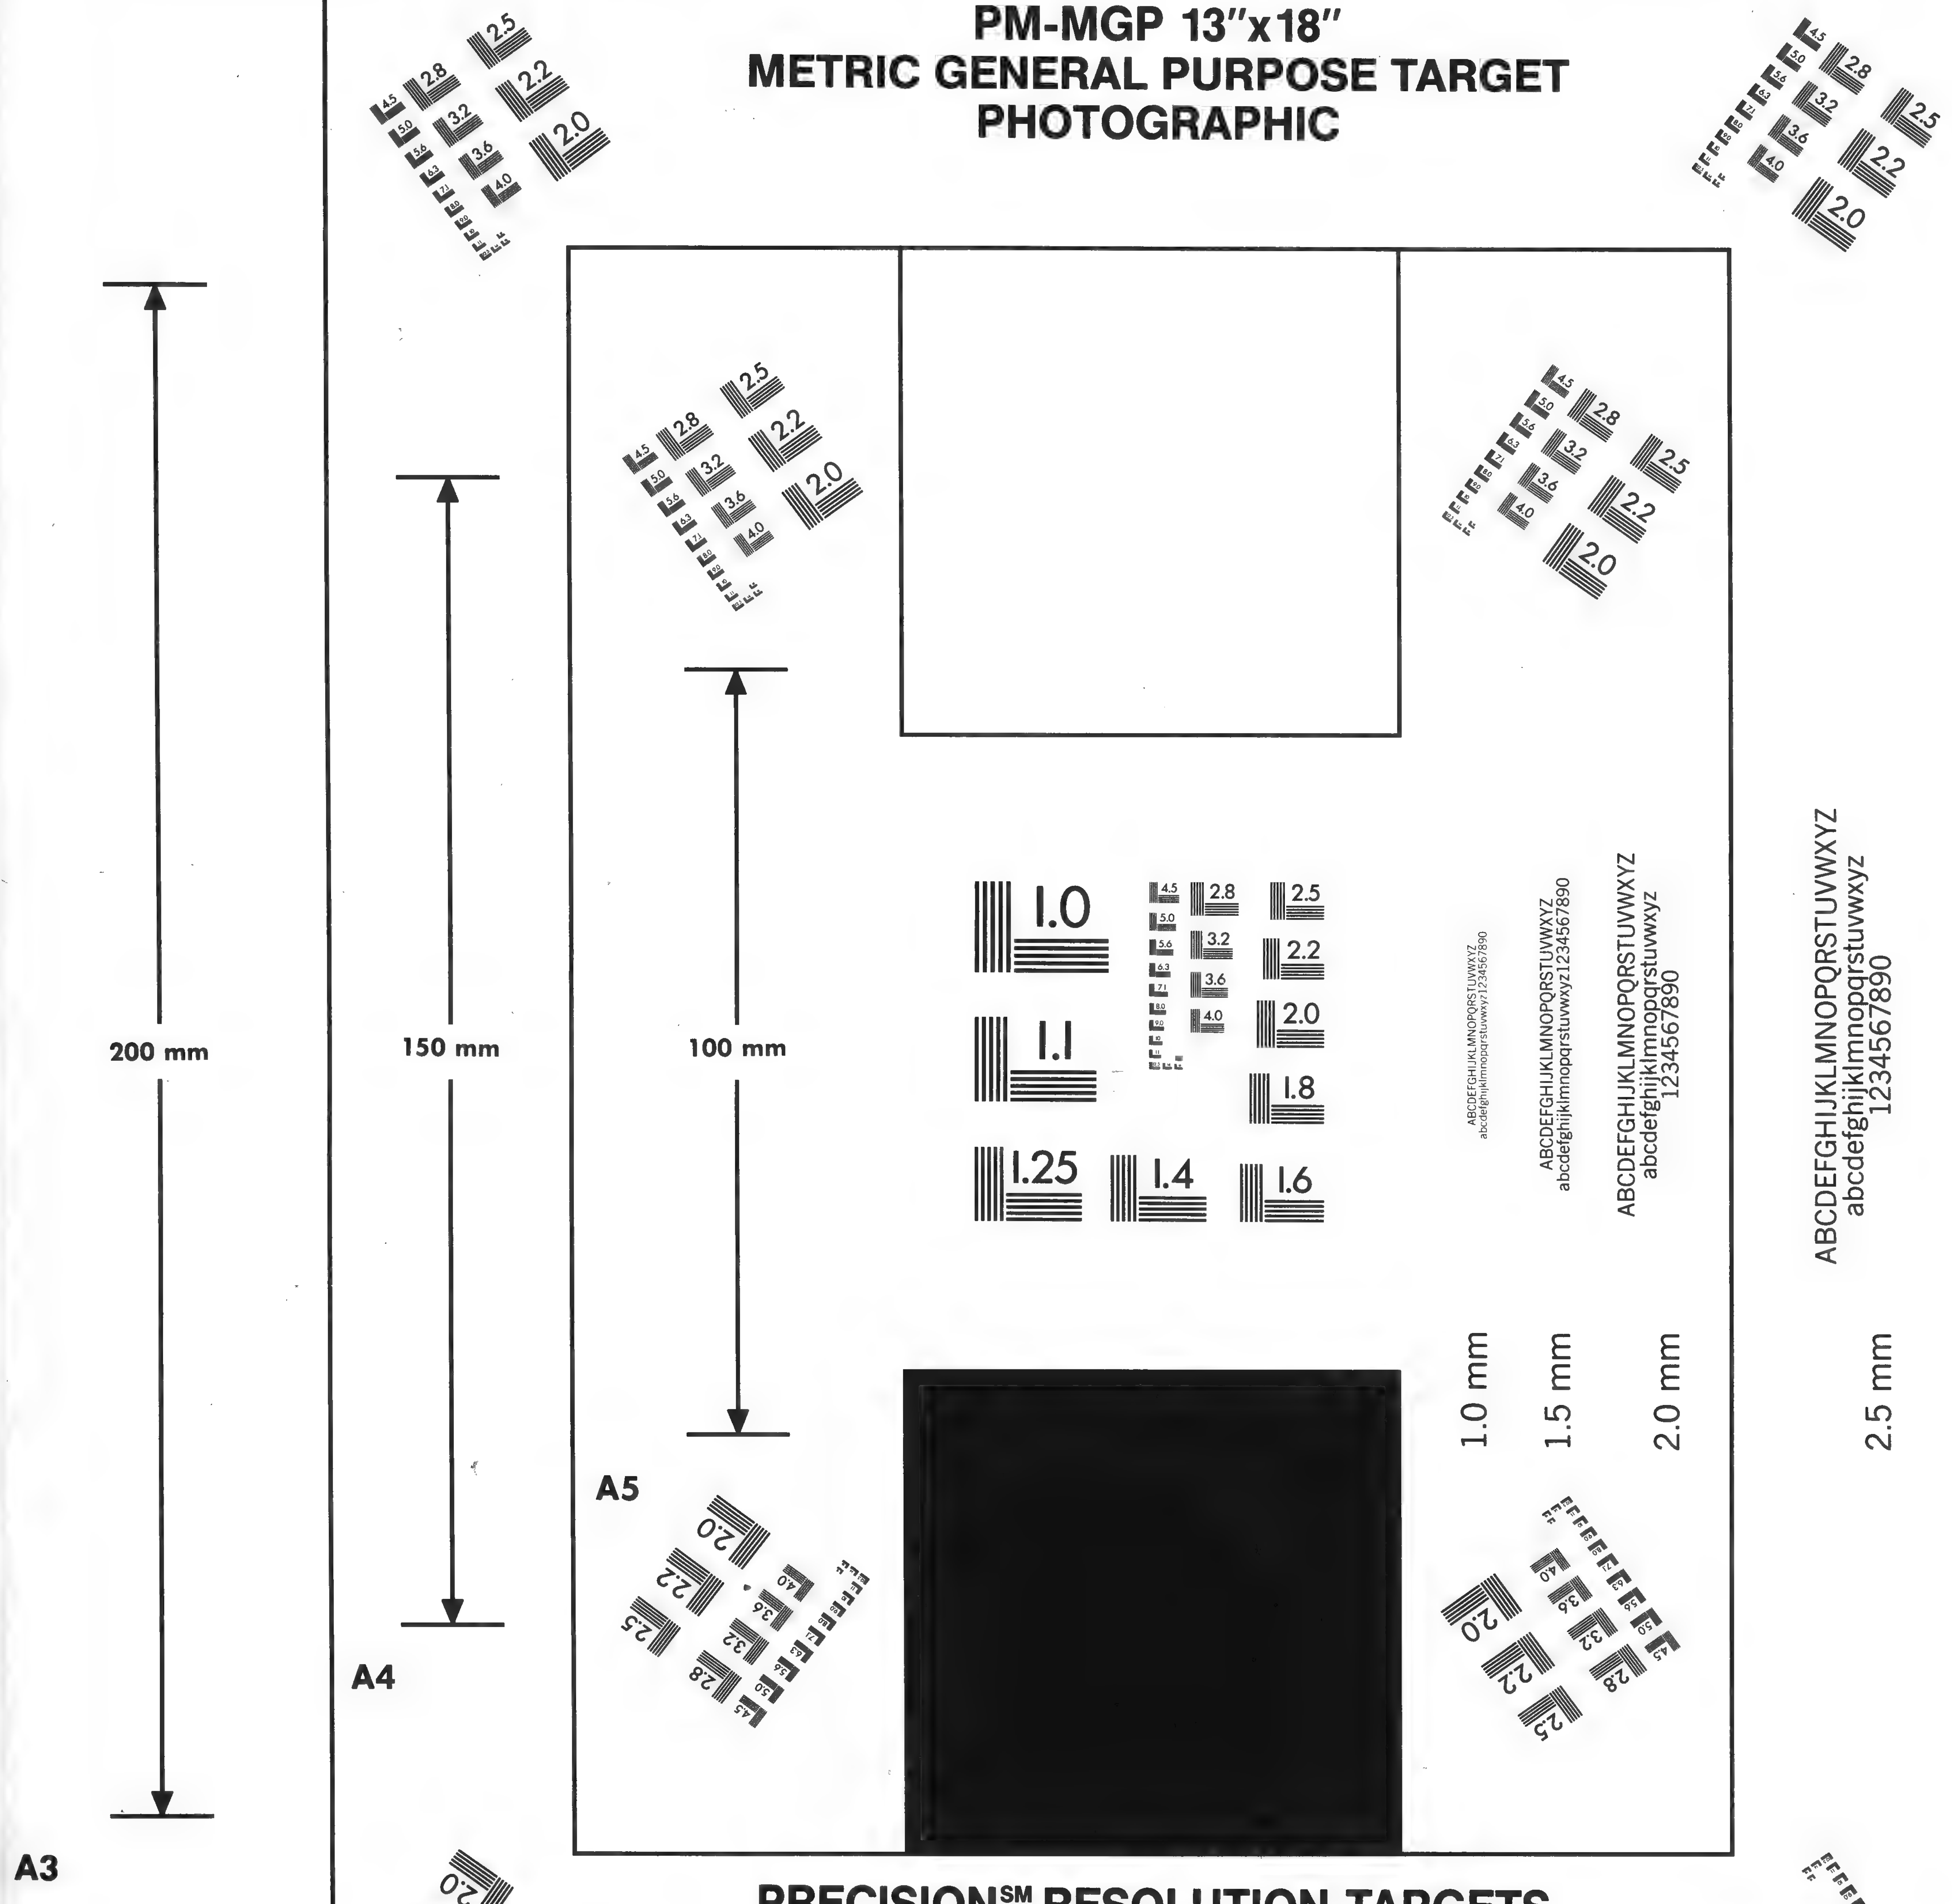
BOSTON SYMPHONY TO PLAY HERE SUNDAY

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give its annual concert under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian association Sunday afternoon at the Auditorium. This event of the musical season is always eagerly anticipated by the music-lovers of Springfield. The full orchestra of 100 pieces, with Pierce Moneux, conductor, will play Sunday afternoon, starting promptly at 3.

The side doors will be open soon after 2, and the front doors at 2.45. Tickets either subscription or free, can be obtained at the Y. M. C. A. or at the principal music stores of the city.

REDUCTION
RATIO
13x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



2.5
2.8
2.2
2.0
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
8.0
200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
A5
A4
A3
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

INFORMATION OBSCURED

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TRIBUNE
DEC 30 192

Mr. Bliss's "Color Symphony"; 'A Familiar Question Revived

Bainbridge Bishop's "Color Organ" of the '70s; Scriabin's "Prometheus"; Mr. Scholes's Treatise on the Bliss Score

By Lawrence Gilman

THE coming performance of Arthur Bliss's "Color Symphony" for the first time in New York, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on January 5 (it was heard two days ago in Boston), revives the old question of the supposed analogies between color and tone. This subject was hotly debated nine years ago when Scriabin's "Prometheus" was first exhibited to New York, with the "color-keyboard" devised by Scriabin to produce effects of colored light concurrently with the music; but the subject was left very much up in the air. Mark Twain once observed that people are "always talking about the weather, yet nothing is ever done." It is the same with the question of color and music.

The subject is, of course, much older than Scriabin's "Prometheus." One may trace it at least as far back as Aristotle, who wrote: "Colors may mutually relate like musical concords; for their pleasantest arrangements, like those concords, are mutually proportionate." Since Aristotle's day there has been an immense amount of theorization on the subject. Professor A. Wallace Rimington published his treatise, "Color Music," a decade ago, and he invented, we believe, a color organ. The experiments of Thomas Wilfred with his "Clavilux" are well remembered—although Mr. Wilfred did not aim to exhibit music and color in co-ordination, but rather attempted to produce through color the emotional effects which musical instruments produce with sound.

The immemorial attempts to discover and formulate a supposed analogy between color and music have proceeded from the conviction, held by many who are not altogether hopeless sentimentalists, that there is really some discoverable principle of correspondence involved. Almost a quart
tury before Professor Ri
lished his study, one Bainb
dwelling in New Russia, E N. Y., printed a discussio
ject under this beguiling
Color Organ, With Some
in Regard to the Soul of
and the Harmony of Life.'
may possibly convey to th
a notion of the color of mind, and will convince e thoughtless that he knew about the soul than abo
there is any real antago
the two. Mr. Bishop, how feet quite firmly planted for he remarked on the
his treatise, with singular
that "from all that had
on the subject a satisfac
between color and music
terialize, and the subje
chiefly one of theory and
And then Mr. Bishop proc own account to develop wh
him a wholly satisfactory

* * *

In his youth, being "
fond of color harmonies,"
various authorities on th
Chevreul, Field and the G
procured an organ, and exp
building an attachment
which would produce a serie lights to correspond with t
the instrument. After mu
tion and reflection he turne
tion to the construction of
and practical mechanism
"play colors and music tog Bishop began work on his
in 1875, and spent, he says,
years in studying the subje
ing experimental instrum
cannot undertake to expou ciples or his system; in the
because we are unable to selves that we understand t
the second place, because, i should be obliged to pre-en purpose several issues of T in order to do justice to
But some idea of his met proach may perhaps be gi his statement that "after tion upon the question of h
his color intervals" he to employ red for C, and to prismatic spectrum of semitones, adding crimson for B and a lighter red for
of the octave, and doubling and volume of color in each octave, the lower or pedal being reflected evenly ground. The whole eff sent to the eye the move
mony of the music and ment. The instrument with a stop, so that music could be played separately

* * *

Unfortunately, the thr
which Mr. Bishop constructe destroyed by fire, although
ited them in New York,
about forty years ago. But M was convinced that some ti future this color science "wi ognized and adopted". He se
few general conclusions on th
"Colors," he wrote, "have the
and major qualities. Take, stance, the relative minor of
of C, which would be A minor violet-blue key"—this is not qu
to us, but we are quoting Mr
with faithful literalism. Vi always gave Mr. Bishop, he
"a sad impression, similar music played in A minor. T be observed in viewing distant blue mountains at sunset or
The melancholy effect is strong
the dominant or subdominant
the minor key is present, yell
orange, one of which colors w monly see at such times ab mountains." Mr. Bishop drea
using the color organ in church whole end of a cathedral, beh its organ, could be arra tablet or ground on which the color harmonies. Beautifu could be produced with a com
of statuary and gauze curtains
as the music pealed forth, wou
and fade, with the soft, melting colored lights in symphony w chant of adoration."

* * *

These may appear to b and whirring words, and we fe
are. The various experiments subject seem to have demon that there is no definite and
ing relationship between mu

light. Mr. Koussevitzky, the distinguished Russian, who is to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season, is reported to have said that "F sharp is decidedly strawberry red." For him, no doubt, it is, but is F

hat it is known to every one me
Beethoven's Fifth Symphony? B
s return to Mr. Bliss and his "
Symphony."

* * *

It appears that Mr. Scholes ma
nsidious suggestion to Mr. Blis
t would be good business for void identifying his new sym merely by number, as if it w utomobile or a convict, and im to give it what he calls "
ame, such as Vaughan Willia
ised for his 'London Symphon
Pastoral Symphony.'" Mr. S
losely questioned Mr. Bliss hether he had in mind when co ng his work any extra-musical nd, if so, whether he would per
o be indicated in the title. Mr
t once admitted the existence o n idea. "It seems [says Mr. Sc hat when composing he always nces a play of color sensation
uch a play had been vivid in his hen working at this symphony hat the title, 'A Color Symp hich at once suggested itself t ould actually express a con hat had dominated him when a
he title is, therefore, legitima
think it is also attractive; wh ubtitles given to the various ents are, I feel sure, likely t ervice to many readers, by r
n a very general way, of co
nderlying feeling of each.

* * *

he exposition of Mr. Bliss's
n this provocative symphony as ex ounded by Mr. Scholes, who evidently peaks with authority. The "general
olor scheme" of the work is set forth
s follows by Mr. Scholes, who asks us
o recollect, under his guidance, "some
f the symbolic associations of color":
irst Movement: PURPLE ("The color
of Amethysts, Pageantry, Royalty
and Death").
econd Movement: RED ("The color of
Rubies, Wine, Revelry, Furnaces, Courage and Magic").

[illegible]; then a "Mag
then a fortissimo passa
brass, with "the reddest
tunes—red as a furnace."
"dies down into sultry mut effect like glowing embers."
ment ends in "a prolonged a crescendo, a blaze of scarlet
The Third Movement ("B
other slow movement—sugg
ous poetical concepts: "Wat
play of sunlight upon it"
besques); a "hint of all th

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
JAN 1924

Symphony Orchestra

This afternoon there was another of the interesting concerts for young people given by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Mr. Boyd, assisted by Miss Magoley from the north junior and Miss Turner from the south junior high schools, will accompany a group of 80 pupils to the concert. This remarkable opportunity will be greatly enjoyed by all. Another concert will be held some time in March. Ample notice will be given in time for all who will make arrangements to attend.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From
Evening Sun
New York City
N 4 - 1924

The Boston Symphony.

Mr. Monteux gave New York a demonstration of good program making at the Boston Symphony's concert last night in Carnegie Hall, but from the size of the audience it may be inferred that discrimination in the choice of music is not always appreciated. The evening began with the overture to Mozart's "Magic Flute," one of the composer's least played overtures, and continued with Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica" and Gliere's "Les Sirenes," neither of which has been heard in the city since 1921. Finally came Liszt's "Tasso" as a spirited and by no means hackneyed close.

Through this program the symphony displayed a customary ability and finish and its conductor a typical intelligence. But while the music was accurately led and adequately performed there was little infection of enthusiasm to stir the audience. The Strauss picture of a day in a well ordered home is worth painting occasionally for its cleverness, if not for its reminiscence of greater hours spent outside the hearth; but it demands more conviction than it last night received to insure its power. Under Mr. Monteux's baton it suggested no contagion in its felicity. For such a home as he conscientiously presented it was easy to fall a victim to the sirens of the ensuing work, and one must admit that Strauss was not alone to blame. If Mr. Monteux had as much personal persuasion as he has initiative he might better vivify so excellent a program.

EVENING MAIL
New York City
JAN 4 - 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY

An intellectual tinge quite inevitably colors the enjoyment of the musical layman or critic hieing himself to Carnegie Hall to listen to a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Last night Mr. Monteux, by his programme, gave ample opportunity to indulge this gentle thesis. To begin with there was Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute," a work old in years, but ever young in spirit, in which one fondly traced analogies with the adorable elements of the primitive in another art.

There followed Richard Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica," with its double fugue and long drawn out development of modern noise. A family of three, papa, mamma and the only son, require 110 instruments to record their daily jars in Strauss's idiom, whereas Mozart gives us magic and a queen of the night with one-quarter of that number.

Reinhold Moritzovich Gliere, third on the list, with his symphonic poem, "The Sirens," makes less to-do than the Strauss family with an island of mythological temptresses and a whole shipwreck. Whether intended so or not, the concert served neatly to exercise one's mentality on the true and particular development of programme music through the musical ages.

Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso: Lament and Triumph," which ended the concert, was superbly played, as well as the numbers too that went before it.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
3 1924

Hall.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in an interesting program at Carnegie Hall this evening.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
JAN 5

Arthur Bliss's "Color Symphony" is put forward to the early part of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's matinee on Saturday in Carnegie Hall, to be followed by Mozart's concerto, with Thibaud.

Eugen d'Albert's opera, "Die Toten Augen," founded on the legend of a blind woman in

---

AMERICAN
N 4 - 1924

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra paid New York its holiday visit last night, and presented a programme of interesting music in Carnegie Hall. The list was one of contrasts. It began with Mozart's delicately scintillating "Magic Flute" overture. This was followed by Strauss' Symphonia Domestica, the Teuton composer's musical portrayal of "Papa, Mama and the Baby." Gliere's "The Sirens," a Slavic setting to an episode in the Iliad; and Liszt's brilliant and highly-colored "Tasso Lament and Triumph."

The outstanding number was the Strauss' family album presented by an augmented orchestra and played with meticulous care and precision. The work sounds like a series of unrelated fragments, some ravishingly beautiful and others harsh and discordant.

Mr. Monteux directed with his customary authority and effect.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE SPRINGFIELD
MASS.
UNION
JAN 2 - 1924

Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra Coming Here Sunday

PIERRE MONTEUX.

Next Sunday afternoon the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its annual appearance under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A. at the Auditorium. This, the crowning event of the Y. M. C. A. series is always eagerly anticipated by the music-loving public of this city. The full orchestra of 100 will be here and Pierre Monteux will be the conductor.

Springfield alone enjoys, year after year, an opportunity to hear such an orchestra at its best free of an admission fee and open to all who secure a ticket.

As usual the concert will begin at o'clock, promptly. The side doors will open shortly after 2 o'clock and the front doors at 2.45. Tickets can be obtained, either subscription or free, at the Y. M. C. A., or at the principal music stores.

[178]

NEW YORK
N. Y.
EVE. POST
24

ON THE CONCERT STAGE

Spalding at the Beethoven Concert—Bostonians Play Strauss

Albert Spalding was soloist at yesterday afternoon's Beethoven concert of the Damrosch orchestra in Carnegie Hall. He played the great concerto with the superlative art for which he has become internationally famous. The symphonies were the fourth and the fifth. Particularly enjoyable was the postlude, consisting of a trio for flute, bassoon, and piano, and a rondino for wood instruments.

The big thing—at least in duration—at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert last night was Strauss's "Domestic" symphony, which Mr. Monteux and his men played very well indeed. The real climax of the concert was, however, Liszt's dramatic "Tasso"; the orchestra painted the tragic subject of this tone-poem in heroic colors.

At Town Hall last night Roland Hayes sang again to an overflowing audience. There were repeats and many added encore numbers. Art like that of this tenor appeals to all because it is also heart music. It is the stuff of life itself—life at its noblest.

At Aeolian Hall Miss Ellen Ballou, the Canadian pianist, who in her childhood was a pupil of Joseffy, gave a piano recital which showed her to be a player of exceptional merit. Among her unhackneyed numbers were a Pastorale and Capriccio by Alberto Jonas.

Calendar for

SUNDAY—Carnegie Hall, 3 p.
8:30 p. m., song recital b
House, 3 p. m., concert by popular operatic concert; T
of Music; Aeolian Hall, 3 p.
Manhattan Opera House, 3
MONDAY—Carnegie Hall, 8:30
monic Society; Metropolita
"La Traviata"; Manhattan
"Die Fledermaus"; Century
except Sunday).
TUESDAY—Carnegie Hall, 3 p.
p. m., violin recital by Mis
p. m., German opera, "Pars
Manhattan Opera House, 1
singer"; 8 p. m., German o
"Der Evangelimann."
WEDNESDAY—Carnegie Hall,
Orchestra; 8:15 p. m., conce
Hall, 8:15 p. m., concert by House, 8:15 p. m., America
and Italian opera, "I Com
p. m., German opera, "Trist
THURSDAY—Carnegie Hall, 3
Orchestra; 8:15 p. m., con
Aeolian Hall, 8:15 p. m., p
8:15 p. m., song recital by
8 p. m., Italian operas, "Ca
hattan Opera House, 1:30
p. m., German opera, Ne
Wanamaker Auditorium,
ham; Hunter College, 8:30
FRIDAY—Carnegie Hall, 8:15
Orchestra; Metropolitan
"Tannhäuser"; Manhattan
"Lohengrin"; Brooklyn A
Boston Symphony Orchest
SATURDAY—Carnegie Hall, 2
Orchestra; 8:30 p. m., co
Hall, 3 p. m., piano recita recital by Thomas Wilfrid opera, "La Bohème"; 8 p.
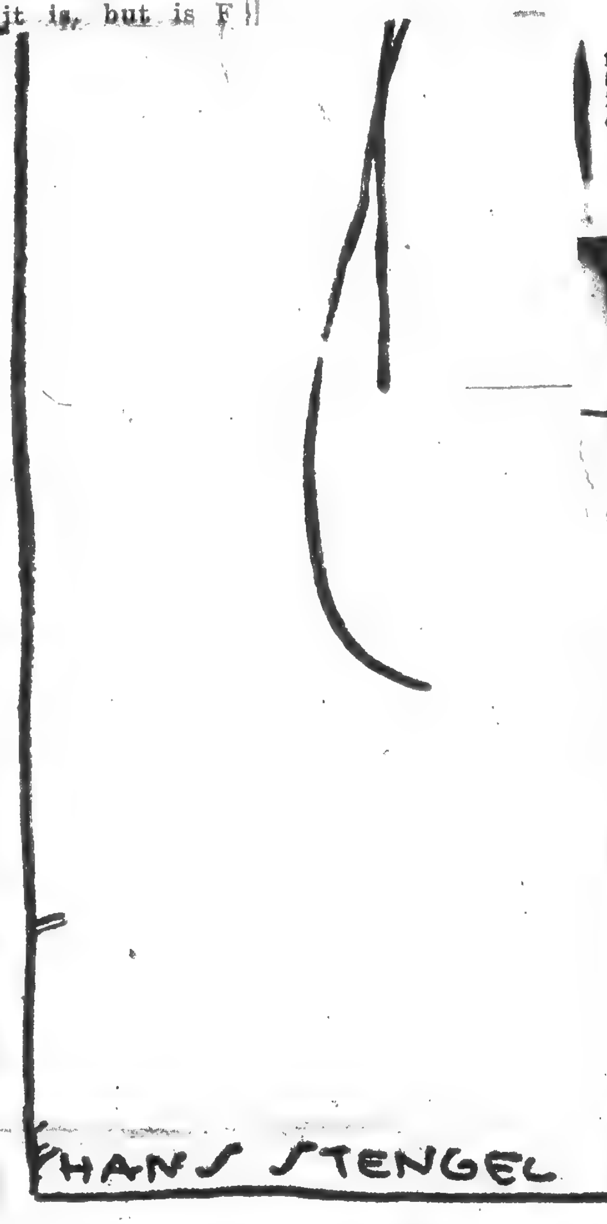
House, 2:15 p. m., German
German opera, "Rienzi";
Grant; Rumford Hall, 8:
Brooklyn Academy of Mu
Paul Gundlach; Metropoli
concert.



Above and below are the artis

Every Man in His Humor

As It May or May Not Be

SIR: I wonder if a letter of this sort would explain something to me—via any possible reader of your columns. I am aware that the editors have not time to go into things of this sort. It concerns Miss Jane Cowl's recent production of Maeterlinck's masterpiece "Pelleas and Melisande," which is still running at the Times Square Theater, where I saw the premiere a short time ago.

First, before seeming to be too belligerent and seeming to attack the proverbial erudite dramatic critics of our great city, I want to say that they, as well as the audience, appeared not only to enjoy the performance tremendously, but were actually spellbound by it. I have attended many first nights, but it has been a long time since I have been in as tense, and still as beautiful, an atmosphere in a theater. The beauty of Miss Cowl, even in a blond wig, the majesty of the settings and the ravishing colorings may have had a little to do with sustaining the interest—probably a great deal, but certainly not everything.

Even the supreme vitality that this young American actress infused into the part of Melisande may, and certainly did, contribute the major part of the enjoyment, but again I say it could not preclude the transcendent beauty of the play. It is a great play. Why did the critics—nearly all—miss the point?

If they agreed, as they did, about Miss Cowl's marvelous acting and her good taste in selecting and producing plays, why did they not give her credit for having selected a play with more than passing reason? Certainly, they who know so much about plays and play producing realize that Miss Cowl, no matter how idealistic she may be, would certainly not select anything in which she did not see some financial and artistic returns as well as, shall we say, a good vehicle for her dramatic possibilities. Yet no one among the critics seemed to get the beauty, the majesty, the poetry of this marvelous Maeterlinck tragedy. In the past they have appeared to understand the "Blue Bird" and other poetical and dramatic works of the playwright, and yet when they get his greatest work they miss it altogether.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK
TRIBUNE

DEC 30 1923

Mr. Bliss's "Color Symphony"; A Familiar Question Revived

Bainbridge Bishop's "Color Organ" of the '70s; Scriabin's "Prometheus"; Mr. Scholes's Treatise on the Bliss Score

By Lawrence Gilman

THE coming performance of Arthur Bliss's "Color Symphony" for the first time in New York, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on January 5 (it was heard two days ago in Boston), revives the old question of the supposed analogies between color and tone. This subject was hotly debated nine years ago when Scriabin's "Prometheus" was first exhibited to New York, with the "color-keyboard" devised by Scriabin to produce effects of colored light concurrently with the music; but the subject was left very much up in the air. Mark Twain once observed that people are "always talking about the weather, yet nothing is ever done." It is the same with the question of color and music.

The subject is, of course, much older than Scriabin's "Prometheus." One may trace it at least as far back as Aristotle, who wrote: "Colors may mutually relate like musical concords; for their pleasantest arrangements, like those concords, are mutually proportionate." Since Aristotle's day there has been an immense amount of theorization on the subject. Professor A. Wallace Rimington published his treatise, "Color Music," a decade ago, and he invented, we believe, a color organ. The experiments of Thomas Wilfred with his "Clavilux" are well remembered—although Mr. Wilfred did not aim to exhibit music and color in co-ordination, but rather attempted to produce through color the emotional effects which musical instruments produce with sound.

The immemorial attempts to discover and formulate a supposed analogy between color and music have proceeded from the conviction, held by many who are not altogether hopeless sentimentalists, that there is really some discoverable principle of correspondence involved. Almost a quart
tury before Professor Ri
lished his study, one Bainb
dwelling in New Russia, E N. Y., printed a discussio
ject under this beguiling
Color Organ, With Some
in Regard to the Soul of
and the Harmony of Life.'
may possibly convey to th
a notion of the color of
mind, and will convince e
thoughtless that he knew
about the soul than abo
there is any real antagon
the two. Mr. Bishop, how feet quite firmly planted o
for he remarked on the
his treatise, with singular
that "from all that had
on the subject a satisfac
between color and music
terialize, and the subje
chiefly one of theory and
And then Mr. Bishop proc
own account to develop wh
him a wholly satisfactory

* * *

In his youth, being "
fond of color harmonies,"
various authorities on th
Chevreul, Field and the G
procured an organ, and exp
building an attachment
which would produce a serie
lights to correspond with t
the instrument. After mu
tion and reflection he turne
tion to the construction of
and practical mechanism
"play colors and music tog Bishop began work on his
in 1875, and spent, he says,
years in studying the subje
ing experimental instrum
cannot undertake to expou
ciples or his system; in the
because we are unable to selves that we understand t
the second place, because, i should be obliged to pre-en
purpose several issues of T
in order to do justice to
But some idea of his met proach may perhaps be gl his statement that "after tion upon the question of h
his color intervals" he "fina
to employ red for C, and to prismatic spectrum of color
semitones, adding crimson
for B and a lighter red for
of the octave, and doubling
and volume of color in each octave, the lower or pedal
being reflected evenly ground. The whole effect sent to the eye the move
mony of the music and ment. The instrument w with a stop, so that music could be played separately o

* * *

Unfortunately, the thr
which Mr. Bishop constructe destroyed by fire, although
ited them in New York,
about forty years ago. But M
was convinced that some ti
future this color science "wi
ognized and adopted". He se
few general conclusions on th
"Colors," he wrote, "have the
and major qualities. Take,
stance, the relative minor of
of C, which would be A minor
violet-blue key"—this is not qu
to us, but we are quoting Mr.
with faithful literalism. Vi
always gave Mr. Bishop, he
"a sad impression, similar
music played in A minor. T
be observed in viewing distan
blue mountains at sunset or
The melancholy effect is strong
the dominant or subdominant
the minor key is present, yell
orange, one of which colors w
monly see at such times abo
mountains." Mr. Bishop drea
using the color organ in church
whole end of a cathedral, beh
its organ, could be arrang
tablet or ground on which the color harmonies. Beautiful could be produced with a com
of statuary and gauze curtains
as the music pealed forth, wou
and fade, with the soft, melting
colored lights in symphony w
chant of adoration."

* * *

These may appear to b
and whirring words, and we fe
are. The various experiments subject seem to have demo
that there is no definite and
ing relationship between mu

light. Mr. Koussevitzky, the distinguished Russian, who is to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season, is reported to have said that "F sharp is decidedly strawberry red." For him, no doubt, it is, but is F

hat it is known to every one me
Beethoven's Fifth Symphony? B
s return to Mr. Bliss and his "
Symphony."

* * *

It appears that Mr. Scholes ma
nsidious suggestion to Mr. Blis
t would be good business for h void identifying his new sym nerely by number, as if it w utomobile or a convict, and
im to give it what he calls "
ame, such as Vaughan Willian
ised for his 'London Symphon
Pastoral Symphony.'" Mr. S
losely questioned Mr. Bliss " whether he had in mind when co
ng his work any extra-musical
nd, if so, whether he would per
o be indicated in the title. Mr.
t once admitted the existence o n idea. "It seems [says Mr. Sc hat when composing he always nces a play of color sensation
uch a play had been vivid in his hen working at this symphon hat the title, 'A Color Symp which at once suggested itself would actually express a con
hat had dominated him when a
he title is, therefore, legitima
think it is also attractive; wh
ubtitles given to the various nents are, I feel sure, likely t
ervice to many readers, by r
n a very general way, of co
nderlying feeling of each.

* * *

he exposition of Mr. Bliss's
n this provocative symphony as ex
ounded by Mr. Scholes, who evidently peaks with authority. The "general
olor scheme" of the work is set forth
s follows by Mr. Scholes, who asks us
o recollect, under his guidance, "some
f the symbolic associations of color":
irst Movement: PURPLE ("The color
of Amethysts, Pageantry, Royalty
and Death").
econd Movement: RED ("The color of
Rubies, Wine, Revelry, Furnaces, Courage and Magic").

courage", then a "Mag
then a fortissimo passa
brass, with "the reddest
tunes—red as a furnace."
"dies down into sultry mu effect like glowing embers."
ment ends in "a prolonged a crescendo, a blaze of scarlet
The Third Movement ("B
other slow movement—sugg
ous poetical concepts: "Wat
play of sunlight upon it"
besques); a "hint of all th

Calendar for

SUNDAY—Carnegie Hall, 3 p.
8:30 p. m., song recital b
House, 3 p. m., concert by t popular operatic concert; T
of Music; Aeolian Hall, 3 p.
Manhattan Opera House, 3

MONDAY—Carnegie Hall, 8:30
monic Society; Metropolita
"La Traviata"; Manhattan
"Die Fledermaus"; Century
except Sunday).

TUESDAY—Carnegie Hall, 3 p.
p. m., violin recital by Mis
p. m., German opera, "Pars
Manhattan Opera House, 1
singer"; 8 p. m., German o
"Der Evangelimann."

WEDNESDAY—Carnegie Hall,
Orchestra; 8:15 p. m., conce
Hall, 8:15 p. m., concert by House, 8:15 p. m., America
and Italian opera, "I Com
p. m., German opera, "Trist

THURSDAY—Carnegie Hall, 3
Orchestra; 8:15 p. m., con
Aeolian Hall, 8:15 p. m., p
8:15 p. m., song recital by
8 p. m., Italian operas, "Ca
hattan Opera House, 1:30 p. m., German opera, New Wanamaker Auditorium, 2
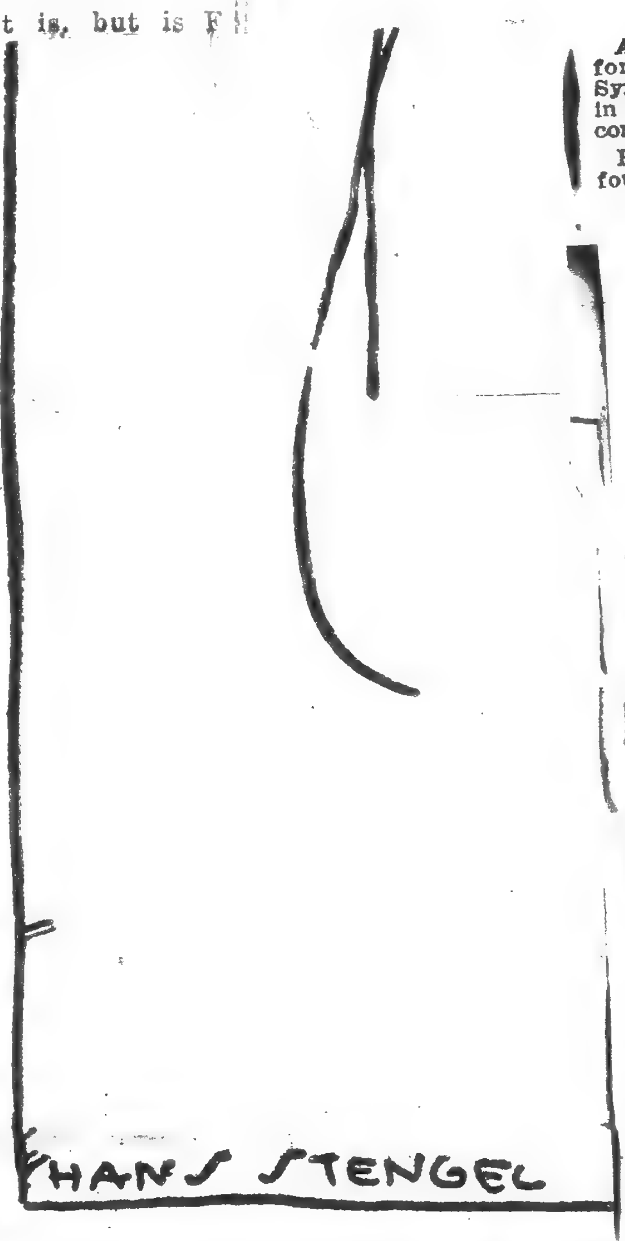
ham; Hunter College, 8:30

FRIDAY—Carnegie Hall, 8:15
Orchestra; Metropolitan
"Tannhäuser"; Manhattan
"Lohengrin"; Brooklyn Ac
Boston Symphony Orchest

SATURDAY—Carnegie Hall, 2
Orchestra; 8:30 p. m., co
Hall, 3 p. m., piano recita
recital by Thomas Wilfrid;
opera, "La Bohème"; 8 p.
House, 2:15 p. m., German
German opera, "Rienzi";
Grant; Rumford Hall, 8:1
Brooklyn Academy of Mu
Paul Gundlach; Metropoli
concert.



Above and below are the artis

Every Man in His Humor

As It May or May Not Be

SIR: I wonder if a letter of this sort would explain something to me—via any possible reader of your columns. I am aware that the editors have not time to go into things of this sort. It concerns Miss Jane Cowl's recent production of Maeterlinck's masterpiece "Pelleas and Melisande," which is still running at the Times Square Theater, where I saw the premiere a short time ago.

First, before seeming to be too belligerent and seeming to attack the proverbial erudite dramatic critics of our great city, I want to say that they, as well as the audience, appeared not only to enjoy the performance tremendously, but were actually spellbound by it. I have attended many first nights, but it has been a long time since I have been in as tense, and still as beautiful, an atmosphere in a theater. The beauty of Miss Cowl, even in a blond wig, the majesty of the settings and the ravishing colorings may have had a little to do with sustaining the interest—probably a great deal, but certainly not everything.

Even the supreme vitality that this young American actress infused into the part of Melisande may, and certainly did, contribute the major part of the enjoyment, but again I say it could not preclude the transcendent beauty of the play. It is a great play. Why did the critics—nearly all—miss the point?

If they agreed, as they did, about Miss Cowl's marvelous acting and her good taste in selecting and producing plays, why did they not give her credit for having selected a play with more than passing reason? Certainly, they who know so much about plays and play producing realize that Miss Cowl, no matter how idealistic she may be, would certainly not select anything in which she did not see some financial and artistic returns as well as, shall we say, a good vehicle for her dramatic possibilities. Yet no one among the critics seemed to get the beauty, the majesty, the poetry of this marvelous Maeterlinck tragedy. In the past they have appeared to understand the "Blue Bird" and other poetical and dramatic works of the playwright, and yet when they get his greatest work they miss it altogether.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

JAN 4 1924

Symphony Orchestra

This afternoon there was another of the interesting concerts for young people given by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Mr. Boyd, assisted by Miss Magoley from the north junior and Miss Turner from the south junior high schools, will accompany a group of 80 pupils to the concert. This remarkable opportunity will be greatly enjoyed by all. Another concert will be held some time in March. Ample notice will be given in time for all who will make arrangements to attend.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK

1924

Hall.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in an interesting program at Carnegie Hall this evening.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From
Evening Sun
New York City

JAN 4 - 1924

The Boston Symphony.

Mr. Monteux gave New York a demonstration of good program making at the Boston Symphony's concert last night in Carnegie Hall, but from the size of the audience it may be inferred that discrimination in the choice of music is not always appreciated. The evening began with the overture to Mozart's "Magic Flute," one of the composer's least played overtures, and continued with Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica" and Gliere's "Les Sirenes," neither of which has been heard in the city since 1921. Finally came Liszt's "Tasso" as a spirited and by no means hackneyed close.

Through this program the symphony displayed a customary ability and finish and its conductor a typical intelligence. But while the music was accurately led and adequately performed there was little infection of enthusiasm to stir the audience. The Strauss picture of a day in a well ordered home is worth painting occasionally for its cleverness, if not for its reminiscence of greater hours spent outside the hearth; but it demands more conviction than it last night received to insure its power. Under Mr. Monteux's baton it suggested no contagion in its felicity. For such a home as he conscientiously presented it was easy to fall a victim to the sirens of the ensuing work, and one must admit that Strauss was not alone to blame. If Mr. Monteux had as much personal persuasion as he has initiative he might better vivify so excellent a program.

EVENING MAIL
New York City

JAN 4 - 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY

An intellectual tinge quite inevitably colors the enjoyment of the musical layman or critic hieing himself to Carnegie Hall to listen to a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Last night Mr. Monteux, by his programme, gave ample opportunity to indulge this gentle thesis. To begin with there was Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute," a work old in years, but ever young in spirit, in which one fondly traced analogies with the adorable elements of the primitive in another art.

There followed Richard Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica," with its double fugue and long drawn out development of modern noise. A family of three, papa, mamma and the only son, require 110 instruments to record their daily jars in Strauss's idiom, whereas Mozart gives us magic and a queen of the night with one-quarter of that number.

Reinhold Moritzovich Gliere, third on the list, with his symphonic poem, "The Sirens," makes less to do than the Strauss family with an island of mythological temptresses and a whole shipwreck. Whether intended so or not, the concert served neatly to exercise one's mentality on the true and particular development of programme music through the musical ages.

Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso: Lament and Triumph," which ended the concert, was superbly played, as well as the numbers too that went before it.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK
TIMES

JAN 5

Arthur Bliss's "Color Symphony" is put forward to the early part of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's matinee on Saturday in Carnegie Hall, to be followed by Mozart's concerto, with Thibaud.

Eugen d'Albert's opera, "Die Toten Augen," founded on the legend of a blind woman in

---

NEW YORK
AMERICAN

JAN 4 - 1924

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra paid New York its holiday visit last night, and presented a programme of interesting music in Carnegie Hall. The list was one of contrasts. It began with Mozart's delicately scintillating "Magic Flute" overture. This was followed by Strauss' Symphonia Domestica, the Teuton composer's musical portrayal of "Papa, Mama and the Baby." Gliere's "The Sirens," a Slavic setting to an episode in the Iliad; and Liszt's brilliant and highly-colored "Tasso Lament and Triumph."

The outstanding number was the Strauss' family album presented by an augmented orchestra and played with meticulous care and precision. The work sounds like a series of unrelated fragments, some ravishingly beautiful and others harsh and discordant.

Mr. Monteux directed with his customary authority and effect.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

SPRINGFIELD
MASS.
UNION

JAN

Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra Coming Here Sunday

PIERRE MONTEUX.

Next Sunday afternoon the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its annual appearance under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A. at the Auditorium. This, the crowning event of the Y. M. C. A. series is always eagerly anticipated by the music-loving public of this city. The full orchestra of 100 will be here and Pierre Monteux will be the conductor.

Springfield alone enjoys, year after year, an opportunity to hear such an orchestra at its best free of an admission fee and open to all who secure a ticket.

As usual the concert will begin at 3 o'clock, promptly. The side doors will open shortly after 2 o'clock and the front doors at 2.15. Tickets can be obtained, either subscription or free, at the Y. M. C. A., or at the principal music stores.

[1.78]

NEW YORK
N. Y.
EVE. POST

24

ON THE CONCERT STAGE

Spalding at the Beethoven Concert—Bostonians Play Strauss

Albert Spalding was soloist at yesterday afternoon's Beethoven concert of the Damrosch orchestra in Carnegie Hall. He played the great concerto with the superlative art for which he has become internationally famous. The symphonies were the fourth and the fifth. Particularly enjoyable was the postlude, consisting of a trio for flute, bassoon, and piano, and a rondino for wood instruments.

The big thing—at least in duration—at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert last night was Strauss's "Domestic" symphony, which Mr. Monteux and his men played very well indeed. The real climax of the concert was, however, Liszt's dramatic "Tasso"; the orchestra painted the tragic subject of this tone-poem in heroic colors.

At Town Hall last night Roland Hayes sang again to an overflowing audience. There were repeats and many added encore numbers. Art like that of this tenor appeals to all because it is also heart music. It is the stuff of life itself—life at its noblest.

At Aeolian Hall Miss Ellen Ballou, the Canadian pianist, who in her childhood was a pupil of Joseffy, gave a piano recital which showed her to be a player of exceptional merit. Among her unhackneyed numbers were a Pastorale and Capriccio by Alberto Jonas.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK
TRIBUNE

DEC 30 1923

Mr. Bliss's "Color Symphony"; A Familiar Question Revived

Bainbridge Bishop's "Color Organ" of the '70s; Scriabin's "Prometheus"; Mr. Scholes's Treatise on the Bliss Score

By Lawrence Gilman

THE coming performance of Arthur Bliss's "Color Symphony" for the first time in New York, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on January 5 (it was heard two days ago in Boston), revives the old question of the supposed analogies between color and tone. This subject was hotly debated nine years ago when Scriabin's "Prometheus" was first exhibited to New York, with the "color-keyboard" devised by Scriabin to produce effects of colored light concurrently with the music; but the subject was left very much up in the air. Mark Twain once observed that people are "always talking about the weather, yet nothing is ever done." It is the same with the question of color and music.

The subject is, of course, much older than Scriabin's "Prometheus." One may trace it at least as far back as Aristotle, who wrote: "Colors may mutually relate like musical concords; for their pleasantest arrangements, like those concords, are mutually proportionate." Since Aristotle's day there has been an immense amount of theorization on the subject. Professor A. Wallace Rimington published his treatise, "Color Music," a decade ago, and he invented, we believe, a color organ. The experiments of Thomas Wilfred with his "Clavilux" are well remembered—although Mr. Wilfred did not aim to exhibit music and color in co-ordination, but rather attempted to produce through color the emotional effects which musical instruments produce with sound.

The immemorial attempts to discover and formulate a supposed analogy between color and music have proceeded from the conviction, held by many who are not altogether hopeless sentimentalists, that there is really some discoverable principle of correspondence involved. Almost a quarter of a century before Professor Rimington published his study, one Bainbridge Bishop, dwelling in New Russia, Essex County, N. Y., printed a discussion of the subject under this beguiling title: "The Color Organ, With Some Suggestions in Regard to the Soul of the Rainbow and the Harmony of Life." This title may possibly convey to the discerning a notion of the color of Mr. Bishop's mind, and will convince even the most thoughtless that he knew perhaps more about the soul than about science—if there is any real antagonism between the two. Mr. Bishop, however, had his feet quite firmly planted on the earth; for he remarked on the first page of his treatise, with singular good sense, that "from all that had been written on the subject a satisfactory analogy between color and music did not materialize, and the subject remained chiefly one of theory and speculation." And then Mr. Bishop proceeded on his own account to develop what seemed to him a wholly satisfactory analogy.

* * *

In his youth, being "passionately fond of color harmonies," he read the various authorities on the subject—Chevreul, Field and the Germans. He procured an organ, and experimented by building an attachment to the keys which would produce a series of colored lights to correspond with the music of the instrument. After much observation and reflection he turned his attention to the construction of an effective and practical mechanism which would "play colors and music together." Mr. Bishop began work on his color organ in 1875, and spent, he says, nearly five years in studying the subject and building experimental instruments. We cannot undertake to expound his principles or his system; in the first place, because we are unable to flatter ourselves that we understand them, and in the second place, because, if we did, we should be obliged to pre-empt for the purpose several issues of The Tribune in order to do justice to Mr. Bishop. But some idea of his method of approach may perhaps be gleaned from his statement that "after much reflection upon the question of how to space his color intervals" he "finally decided to employ red for C, and to divide the prismatic spectrum of color into eleven semitones, adding crimson or violet red for B and a lighter red for the upper C of the octave, and doubling the depth and volume of color in each descending octave, the lower or pedal bass notes being reflected evenly over the entire ground. The whole effect was to present to the eye the movement and harmony of the music and also its sentiment. The instrument was arranged with a stop, so that music and color could be played separately or together."

* * *

Unfortunately, the three organs which Mr. Bishop constructed were all destroyed by fire, although he exhibited them in New York, he says, about forty years ago. But Mr. Bishop was convinced that some time in the future this color science "will be recognized and adopted". He set down a few general conclusions on the subject. "Colors," he wrote, "have their minor and major qualities. Take, for instance, the relative minor of the scale of C, which would be A minor, or the violet-blue key"—this is not quite clear to us, but we are quoting Mr. Bishop with faithful literalism. Violet-blue always gave Mr. Bishop, he tells us, "a sad impression, similar to the music played in A minor. This will be observed in viewing distant violet-blue mountains at sunset or twilight. The melancholy effect is stronger when the dominant or subdominant color of the minor key is present, yellow and orange, one of which colors we commonly see at such times above the mountains." Mr. Bishop dreamed of using the color organ in church: "The whole end of a cathedral, behind and above its organ, could be arranged as a tablet or ground on which to display the color harmonies. Beautiful effects could be produced with a combination of statuary and gauze curtains, which, as the music pealed forth, would flash and fade, with the soft, melting hues of colored lights in symphony with the chant of adoration."

* * *

These may appear to be wild and whirring words, and we fear they are. The various experiments on this subject seem to have demonstrated that there is no definite and unvarying relationship between music and light. Mr. Koussevitzky, the distinguished Russian, who is to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season, is reported to have said that "F sharp is decidedly strawberry red." For him, no d sharp strawberry and Mr. Stock a Mr. Mengelberg man?

Sabaneef, in prints a table of tions that exist composers; Scria koff. The compa
tive. For Rimsk
C major was whi red; for Rimsky-
"rosy and clear,
green; for Rim major was "da Scriabin it was metallic lustre."
agreed perfectly key—for both of low; and it is a Scriabin two dif
the same color whether he was F major (Mr. Bai way, also found red and the key vinced that "th sounds of nature of F, or very ne test this on a p a thunderstorm a gard to the soun or waterfalls.)

When Scriabin Poem of Fire" ( performed in New Symphony Orche
it was explaine his "Symphony o companied by a Rays"; and to th keyboard instrum tastiera per luce, by means of wh light were to screen behind th nizing with the p and having a with its expressiv
"Prometheus" w
first time at Bos keyboard which to use with it w rused to work ( this point), and formed without colored lights.
tried in any su until "Prometheu first time in New 1915, under Mod
rection.

At this perfo à lumières was with Scriabin's keyboard whereby duce his effects o junction with complete and published score, tinuous pa
the top st keys of the in produce va combinatio a screen be the note C bin's schem resents red; G, low; A, gre produce vari

At the pe 1915, the res ordination w colors did not table or approp moods and the music;
"Color Symp
music at th deavor to spondence be distracting "Prometheus" before last

the Philadelphia Orchesor keyboard was dispensed so far as we are aware, no agitated protests from were thus compelled to re-ork merely as music.

* * *

es Mr. Arthur Bliss, the ussed young English com-his new "Color Symphony." was composed in 1922 and performed at the Gloucester that year. It is Mr. Bliss's d, we believe, his most con-work.
ng the composer himself it sary to say much at this Mr. Bliss is now living in nd his career and his deeds s time well known, by reast, to most music lovers.
ce to say that he was born August 2, 1891, and is still man. He was educated at at Pembroke College, Cam-ere he took his B. A. and n 1913. In 1915 he served in h the 13th Battalion of the iliers; he was wounded on in 1916, and was mentioned es for gallantry. In 1918 n France with the 1st Batnadier Guards, and was r Cambrai. Mr. Bliss first own as a composer about few years later he gained inence through the perf his "Madame Noy" and er Rhapsody" for soprano voices, flute, English horn, tet and double bass (the vocalize on "Ah" through-in the same year his soprano and chamber orhanced his celebrity, and at same time the incidental h he wrote for Shake-empest" was heard with Tree's production of the ondon. His Concerto for tenor voice, accompanied and percussion, and his que," for full orchestra, on after. He has since Oboe Concerto and a bal-Mask of the Red Death," Allan Poe. Some of these rks have been heard in t the larger works—the e "Mêlée Fantasque" and Symphony"—are, we be-undisclosed to this public.

* * *

be occasion later on to Bliss's characteristics as for the present, we may elves with a brief exam-highly interesting "Color o which we are helped by pon the subject published London by Mr. Percy A. appears to have had a do with the manner in lor Symphony" was pre-public. Mr. Bliss, Mr.
ms us, had at first de-vague" title for the sym-did not please Mr.
argued that the "popu-of the greater music nturies been impeded by
, meaningless, and alge-
'titles-that-are-no-titles' in A-flat, Op. 55'; and s as Beethoven's 'Eroica Tchaikovsky's 'Pathetic ve gained, perhaps, in eciation, and decidedly in reception, by their more s." It is not easy to . Scholes in this matter.
intain that Beethoven's C minor has suffered any ity, or what he calls "ulation," through the fact

Arthur Bliss's "Color rumpets, is described furnace."

ENGEL

something t der of at the things
Miss Jane
of Maeter-Pelleas and till running at where I time ago.
be too attack the critics of
that they appeared no ance tremen spellbound by first nights,
time since I and still as in a theater.
even in a
of the settings may have sustaining the deal, but ality that this infused into may, and cer-major part of
I say it could endent beauty
t play. Why all—miss the ey did, about cting and her and producing not give her a play with ? Certainly, about plays that Miss ic she may anything me finan-well as, for her no one get the poetry of this tragedy. In the to understand her poetical and playwright, and greatest work

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

JAN 1924

Symphony Orchestra

This afternoon there was another of the interesting concerts for young people given by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Mr. Boyd, assisted by Miss Magoley from the north junior and Miss Turner from the south junior high schools, will accompany a group of 80 pupils to the concert. This remarkable opportunity will be greatly enjoyed by all. Another concert will be held some time in March. Ample notice will be given in time for all who will make arrangements to attend.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK

JAN 3 1924

Hall.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in an interesting program at Carnegie Hall this evening.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From
Evening Sun
New York City

JAN 4 - 1924

The Boston Symphony.

Mr. Monteux gave New York a demonstration of good program making at the Boston Symphony's concert last night in Carnegie Hall, but from the size of the audience it may be inferred that discrimination in the choice of music is not always appreciated. The evening began with the overture to Mozart's "Magic Flute," one of the composer's least played overtures, and continued with Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica" and Gliere's "Les Sirenes," neither of which has been heard in the city since 1921. Finally came Liszt's "Tasso" as a spirited and by no means hackneyed close.

Through this program the symphony displayed a customary ability and finish and its conductor a typical intelligence. But while the music was accurately led and adequately performed there was little infection of enthusiasm to stir the audience. The Strauss picture of a day in a well ordered home is worth painting occasionally for its cleverness, if not for its reminiscence of greater hours spent outside the hearth; but it demands more conviction than it last night received to insure its power. Under Mr. Monteux's baton it suggested no contagion in its felicity. For such a home as he conscientiously presented it was easy to fall a victim to the sirens of the ensuing work, and one must admit that Strauss was not alone to blame. If Mr. Monteux had as much personal persuasion as he has initiative he might better vivify so excellent a program.

EVENING MAIL
New York City
JAN 4 - 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY

An intellectual tinge quite inevitably colors the enjoyment of the musical layman or critic hieing himself to Carnegie Hall to listen to a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Last night Mr. Monteux, by his programme, gave ample opportunity to indulge this gentle thesis. To begin with there was Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute," a work old in years, but ever young in spirit, in which one fondly traced analogies with the adorable elements of the primitive in another art.

There followed Richard Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica," with its double fugue and long drawn out development of modern noise. A family of three, papa, mamma and the only son, require 110 instruments to record their daily jars in Strauss's idiom, whereas Mozart gives us magic and a queen of the night with one-quarter of that number.

Reinhold Moritzovich Gliere, third on the list, with his symphonic poem, "The Sirens," makes less to do than the Strauss family with an island of mythological temptresses and a whole shipwreck. Whether intended so or not, the concert served neatly to exercise one's mentality on the true and particular development of programme music through the musical ages.

Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso: Lament and Triumph," which ended the concert, was superbly played, as well as the numbers too that went before it.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK
TIMES

JAN 5 - 1924

Arthur Bliss's "Color Symphony" is put forward to the early part of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's matinee on Saturday in Carnegie Hall, to be followed by Mozart's concerto, with Thibaud.

Eugen d'Albert's opera, "Die Toten Augen," founded on the legend of a blind woman in

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

SPRINGFIELD
MASS.
UNION

JAN 2 - 1924

Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra Coming Here Sunday

PIERRE MONTEUX.

Next Sunday afternoon the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its annual appearance under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A. at the Auditorium. This, the crowning event of the Y. M. C. A. series is always eagerly anticipated by the music-loving public of this city. The full orchestra of 100 will be here and Pierre Monteux will be the conductor.

Springfield alone enjoys, year after year, an opportunity to hear such an orchestra at its best free of an admission fee and open to all who secure a ticket.

As usual the concert will begin at 3 o'clock, promptly. The side doors will open shortly after 2 o'clock and the front doors at 2.45. Tickets can be obtained, either subscription or free, at the Y. M. C. A., or at the principal music stores.

[178]

AMERICAN

JAN 4 - 1924

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra paid New York its holiday visit last night, and presented a programme of interesting music in Carnegie Hall. The list was one of contrasts. It began with Mozart's delicately scintillating "Magic Flute" overture. This was followed by Strauss' Symphonia Domestica, the Teuton composer's musical portrayal of "Papa, Mama and the Baby." Gliere's "The Sirens," a Slavic setting to an episode in the Iliad; and Liszt's brilliant and highly-colored "Tasso Lament and Triumph."

The outstanding number was the Strauss' family album presented by an augmented orchestra and played with meticulous care and precision. The work sounds like a series of unrelated fragments, some ravishingly beautiful and others harsh and discordant.

Mr. Monteux directed with his customary authority and effect.

* * *

NEW YORK
N. Y.
EVE. POST

JAN 4 - 1924

ON THE CONCERT STAGE

Spalding at the Beethoven Concert—Bostonians Play Strauss

Albert Spalding was soloist at yesterday afternoon's Beethoven concert of the Damrosch orchestra in Carnegie Hall. He played the great concerto with the superlative art for which he has become internationally famous. The symphonies were the fourth and the fifth. Particularly enjoyable was the postlude, consisting of a trio for flute, bassoon, and piano, and a rondino for wood instruments.

The big thing—at least in duration—at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert last night was Strauss's "Domestic" symphony, which Mr. Monteux and his men played very well indeed. The real climax of the concert was, however, Liszt's dramatic "Tasso"; the orchestra painted the tragic subject of this tone-poem in heroic colors.

At Town Hall last night Roland Hayes sang again to an overflowing audience. There were repeats and many added encore numbers. Art like that of this tenor appeals to all because it is also heart music. It is the stuff of life itself—life at its noblest.

At Aeolian Hall Miss Ellen Ballou, the Canadian pianist, who in her childhood was a pupil of Joseffy, gave a piano recital which showed her to be a player of exceptional merit. Among her unhackneyed numbers were a Pastorale and Capriccio by Alberto Jonas.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK
TRIBUNE

DEC 30 1923

Mr. Bliss's "Color Symphony"; A Familiar Question Revived

Bainbridge Bishop's "Color Organ" of the '70s; Scriabin's "Prometheus"; Mr. Scholes's Treatise on the Bliss Score

By Lawrence Gilman

THE coming performance of Arthur Bliss's "Color Symphony" for the first time in New York, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on January 5 (it was heard two days ago in Boston), revives the old question of the supposed analogies between color and tone. This subject was hotly debated nine years ago when Scriabin's "Prometheus" was first exhibited to New York, with the "color-keyboard" devised by Scriabin to produce effects of colored light concurrently with the music; but the subject was left very much up in the air. Mark Twain once observed that people are "always talking about the weather, yet nothing is ever done." It is the same with the question of color and music.

The subject is, of course, much older than Scriabin's "Prometheus." One may trace it at least as far back as Aristotle, who wrote: "Colors may mutually relate like musical concords; for their pleasantest arrangements, like those concords, are mutually proportionate." Since Aristotle's day there has been an immense amount of theorization on the subject. Professor A. Wallace Rimington published his treatise, "Color Music," a decade ago, and he invented, we believe, a color organ. The experiments of Thomas Wilfred with his "Clavilux" are well remembered—although Mr. Wilfred did not aim to exhibit music and color in co-ordination, but rather attempted to produce through color the emotional effects which musical instruments produce with sound.

The immemorial attempts to discover and formulate a supposed analogy between color and music have proceeded from the conviction, held by many who are not altogether hopeless sentimentalists, that there is really some discoverable principle of correspondence involved. Almost a quart
tury before Professor Ri
lished his study, one Bainb
dwelling in New Russia, E N. Y., printed a discussio
ject under this beguiling
Color Organ, With Some
in Regard to the Soul of
and the Harmony of Life.'
may possibly convey to th
a notion of the color of
mind, and will convince e
thoughtless that he knew
about the soul than abo
there is any real antagon
the two. Mr. Bishop, how feet quite firmly planted o
for he remarked on the
his treatise, with singular
that "from all that had
on the subject a satisfac
between color and music
terialize, and the subje
chiefly one of theory and
And then Mr. Bishop proc
own account to develop wh
him a wholly satisfactory

* * *

In his youth, being "
fond of color harmonies," various authorities on t Chevreul, Field and the G
procured an organ, and exp
building an attachment
which would produce a seri lights to correspond with t
the instrument. After mu
tion and reflection he turne
tion to the construction of and practical mechanism w
"play colors and music tog Bishop began work on his
in 1875, and spent, he says,
years in studying the subjec
ing experimental instrum
cannot undertake to expou
ciples or his system; in the
because we are unable to selves that we understand t
the second place, because, i should be obliged to pre-em purpose several issues of T
in order to do justice to
But some idea of his met proach may perhaps be gle
his statement that "after tion upon the question of h
his color intervals" he "an
to employ red for C, and to prismatic spectrum of color
semitones, adding crimson for B and a lighter red for t
of the octave, and doubling
and volume of color in each octave, the lower or pedal being reflected evenly over ground. The whole effect w sent to the eye the movemen mony of the music and asso ment. The instrument was with a stop, so that music could be played separately or

* * *

Unfortunately, the thr which Mr. Bishop constructed destroyed by fire, although
ited them in New York,
about forty years ago. But M
was convinced that some ti
future this color science "wi
ognized and adopted". He se
few general conclusions on th
"Colors," he wrote, "have the
and major qualities. Take,
stance, the relative minor of
of C, which would be A mino
violet-blue key"—this is not qu to us, but we are quoting M
with faithful literalism. Vi
always gave Mr. Bishop, he
"a sad impression, similar
music played in A minor. T
be observed in viewing distan
blue mountains at sunset or
The melancholy effect is strong
the dominant or subdominant
the minor key is present, yell
orange, one of which colors w
monly see at such times abo
mountains." Mr. Bishop drea
using the color organ in church
whole end of a cathedral, beh
its organ, could be arrang
tablet or ground on which the color harmonies. Beautiful could be produced with a comb
of statuary and gauze curtains
as the music pealed forth, wou
and fade, with the soft, melting colored lights in symphony chant of adoration."

* * *

These may appear to and whirling words, and we are. The various experiment subject seem to have dem
that there is no definite and ing relationship between m

light. Mr. Koussevitzky, the distinguished Russian, who is to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season, is reported to have said that "F sharp is decidedly strawberry red." For him, no doubt, it is, but is w to Ro (wood-wo orn tune me " and a pre and every ma rs."
tur based on Her Scholes.
wa scribed as Ga alled) 'St. in into three grows out t, and the more rapid the third and Bliss, emotional ance.
section of it is chiefly differs, per-written or the second s from pre-as episodes.
een worked x, in which more and treatment, give out a
. . a sec-to represent s hope and section, the ms, playing arlier theme.
point of the closes soon nfares. . . .
this 'green' says the
as anything he time.'"

t Mr. Bliss which the r symbolistic ive; it is a rogram com-ognized [Mr.
the work is n of as 'pro-
these hints, is a vague association ut there is e, according or poetical such works, f Liszt and hat it is known to every one merely as Beethoven's Fifth Symphony? But let s return to Mr. Bliss and his "Color Symphony."

* * *

It appears that Mr. Scholes made the insidious suggestion to Mr. Bliss that t would be good business for him to void identifying his new symphony merely by number, as if it were an utomobile or a convict, and begged im to give it what he calls "a real ame, such as Vaughan Williams de- ised for his 'London Symphony' and Pastoral Symphony.'" Mr. Scholes losely questioned Mr. Bliss "as to whether he had in mind when composing his work any extra-musical idea," nd, if so, whether he would permit it o be indicated in the title. Mr. Bliss t once admitted the existence of such n idea. "It seems [says Mr. Scholes] hat when composing he always experiences a play of color sensation, that uch a play had been vivid in his mind when working at this symphony, and hat the title, 'A Color Symphony,' hich at once suggested itself to him, ould actually express a conception hat had dominated him when at work. he title is, therefore, legitimate, and think it is also attractive; whilst the ubtitles given to the various movements are, I feel sure, likely to be of ervice to many readers, by revealing, n a very general way, of course—the nderlying feeling of each.

We shall now adhere faithfully to he exposition of Mr. Bliss's purposes n this provocative symphony as exounded by Mr. Scholes, who evidently peaks with authority. The "general olor scheme" of the work is set forth s follows by Mr. Scholes, who asks us o recollect, under his guidance, "some f the symbolic associations of color":

First Movement: PURPLE ("The color of Amethysts, Pageantry, Royalty and Death").

Second Movement: RED ("The color of Rubies, Wine, Revelry, Furnaces, Courage and Magic").

Third Se
a Fourt
o
Sp

III) II) is is a fug between and III, between III tended that break in the

It is not full Mr. Scholes the symphony selves with a dige ment ("Purple
"the feeling of march, of Pageantry Death"; later in pet fanfare introd may perhaps be d
alty' section"; th is a "big outburst approach of the end of the is indicated by the striking continuously.
a four-bar coda, and finally of the gong, which may taken as a final symbol and Death."

The Second Movement
hibits at the start a tu
"the downward leap of the bolizes the revelry which the whole movement."
convulsive climax, sugges
courage"; then a "Mag
then a fortissimo passa
brass, with "the reddest
tunes—red as a furnace."
"dies down into sultry mu
effect like glowing embers."
ment ends in "a prolonged crescendo, a blaze of scarlet

The Third Movement ("B
other slow movement—sugg
ous poetical concepts: "Wat
play of sunlight upon it"
besques); a "hint of all th

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

JAN 1924

Symphony Orchestra

This afternoon there was another of the interesting concerts for young people given by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Mr. Boyd, assisted by Miss Magoley from the north junior and Miss Turner from the south junior high schools, will accompany a group of 80 pupils to the concert. This remarkable opportunity will be greatly enjoyed by all. Another concert will be held some time in March. Ample notice will be given in time for all who will to make arrangements to attend.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK

1924

Hall.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in an interesting program at Carnegie Hall this evening.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From
Evening Sun
New York City

JAN 4 - 1924

The Boston Symphony.

Mr. Monteux gave New York a demonstration of good program making at the Boston Symphony's concert last night in Carnegie Hall, but from the size of the audience it may be inferred that discrimination in the choice of music is not always appreciated. The evening began with the overture to Mozart's "Magic Flute," one of the composer's least played overtures, and continued with Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica" and Gliere's "Les Sirenes," neither of which has been heard in the city since 1921. Finally came Liszt's "Tasso" as a spirited and by no means hackneyed close.

Through this program the symphony displayed a customary ability and finish and its conductor a typical intelligence. But while the music was accurately led and adequately performed there was little infection of enthusiasm to stir the audience. The Strauss picture of a day in a well ordered home is worth painting occasionally for its cleverness, if not for its reminiscence of greater hours spent outside the hearth; but it demands more conviction than it last night received to insure its power. Under Mr. Monteux's baton it suggested no contagion in its felicity. For such a home as he conscientiously presented it was easy to fall a victim to the sirens of the ensuing work, and one must admit that Strauss was not alone to blame. If Mr. Monteux had as much personal persuasion as he has initiative he might better vivify so excellent a program.

EVENING MAIL
New York City

JAN 4 - 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY

An intellectual tinge quite inevitably colors the enjoyment of the musical layman or critic hieing himself to Carnegie Hall to listen to a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Last night Mr. Monteux by his programme gave ample opportunity to indulge this gentle thesis. To begin with there was Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute," a work old in years, but ever young in spirit, in which one fondly traced analogies with the adorable elements of the primitive in another art.

There followed Richard Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica," with its double fugue and long drawn out development of modern noise. A family of three, papa, mamma and the only son, require 110 instruments to record their daily jars in Strauss's idiom, whereas Mozart gives us magic and a queen of the night with one-quarter of that number.

Reinhold Moritzovich Gliere, third on the list, with his symphonic poem, "The Sirens," makes less to-do than the Strauss family with an island of mythological temptresses and a whole shipwreck. Whether intended so or not, the concert served neatly to exercise one's mentality on the true and particular development of programme music through the musical ages.

Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso: Lament and Triumph," which ended the concert, was superbly played, as well as the numbers too that went before it.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK
TIMES

JAN 5 - 1924

Arthur Bliss's "Color Symphony" is put forward to the early part of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's matinee on Saturday in Carnegie Hall, to be followed by Mozart's concerto, with Thibaud.

Eugen d'Albert's opera, "Die Toten Augen," founded on the legend of a blind woman in

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

SPRINGFIELD
MASS.
UNION

JAN - 1924

Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra Coming Here Sunday

PIERRE MONTEUX.

Next Sunday afternoon the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its annual appearance under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A. at the Auditorium. This, the crowning event of the Y. M. C. A. series is always eagerly anticipated by the music-loving public of this city. The full orchestra of 100 will be here and Pierre Monteux will be the conductor.

Springfield alone enjoys, year after year, an opportunity to hear such an orchestra at its best free of an admission fee and open to all who secure a ticket.

As usual the concert will begin at 3 o'clock, promptly. The side doors will open shortly after 2 o'clock and the front doors at 2.45. Tickets can be obtained, either subscription or free, at the Y. M. C. A., or at the principal music stores.

AMERICAN

JAN 4 - 1924

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra paid New York its holiday visit last night, and presented a programme of interesting music in Carnegie Hall. The list was one of contrasts. It began with Mozart's delicately scintillating "Magic Flute" overture. This was followed by Strauss' Symphonia Domestica, the Teuton composer's musical portrayal of "Papa, Mama and the Baby." Gliere's "The Sirens," a Slavic setting to an episode in the Iliad; and Liszt's brilliant and highly-colored "Tasso Lament and Triumph."

The outstanding number was the Strauss' family album presented by an augmented orchestra and played with meticulous care and precision. The work sounds like a series of unrelated fragments, some ravishingly beautiful and others harsh and discordant.

Mr. Monteux directed with his customary authority and effect.

* * *

NEW YORK
N. Y.
EVE. POST

1924

ON THE CONCERT STAGE

Spalding at the Beethoven Concert—Bostonians Play Strauss

Albert Spalding was soloist at yesterday afternoon's Beethoven concert of the Damrosch orchestra in Carnegie Hall. He played the great concerto with the superlative art for which he has become internationally famous. The symphonies were the fourth and the fifth. Particularly enjoyable was the postlude, consisting of a trio for flute, bassoon, and piano, and a rondino for wood instruments.

The big thing—at least in duration—at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert last night was Strauss's "Domestic" symphony, which Mr. Monteux and his men played very well indeed. The real climax of the concert was, however, Liszt's dramatic "Tasso"; the orchestra painted the tragic subject of this tone-poem in heroic colors.

At Town Hall last night Roland Hayes sang again to an overflowing audience. There were repeats and many added encore numbers. Art like that of this tenor appeals to all because it is also heart music. It is the stuff of life itself—life at its noblest.

At Aeolian Hall Miss Ellen Ballon, the Canadian pianist, who in her childhood was a pupil of Joseffy, gave a piano recital which showed her to be a player of exceptional merit. Among her unhackneyed numbers were a Pastorale and Capriccio by Alberto Jonas.

Calendar for the C

SUNDAY—Carnegie Hall, 3 p. m., concert
8:30 p. m., song recital by Feodor Ch House, 3 p. m., concert by the State Sym popular operatic concert; Town Hall, 4 of Music; Aeolian Hall, 3 p. m., song rec Manhattan Opera House, 3 p. m., song

MONDAY—Carnegie Hall, 8:30 p. m., stud
monic Society; Metropolitan Opera Hou
"La Traviata"; Manhattan Opera House,
"Die Fledermaus"; Century Roof, 8:45
except Sunday).

TUESDAY—Carnegie Hall, 3 p. m., violin re
p. m., violin recital by Mischa Elman;
p. m., German opera, "Parsifal"; 8:15 Manhattan Opera House, 1:15 p. m., singer"; 8 p. m., German opera, New Y
"Der Evangelimann."

WEDNESDAY—Carnegie Hall, 3 p. m., con
Orchestra; 8:15 p. m., concert by the Ph
Hall, 8:15 p. m., concert by the Lenox House, 8:15 p. m., American premieres, and Italian opera, "I Compagnacci"; M
p. m., German opera, "Tristan und Isolde

THURSDAY—Carnegie Hall, 3 p. m., concert
Orchestra; 8:15 p. m., concert by the Aeolian Hall, 8:15 p. m., piano recital
8:15 p. m., song recital by Roland Hayes
8 p. m., Italian operas, "Cavalleria Rusti hattan Opera House, 1:30 p. m., German
p. m., German opera, New York premi Wanamaker Auditorium, 2:30 p. m., org ham; Hunter College, 8:30 p. m., concer

FRIDAY—Carnegie Hall, 8:15 p. m., concer Orchestra; Metropolitan Opera House
"Tannhäuser"; Manhattan Opera Hous
"Lohengrin"; Brooklyn Academy of Mu
Boston Symphony Orchestra.

SATURDAY—Carnegie Hall, 2:30 p. m., con
Orchestra; 8:30 p. m., concert by the Hall, 3 p. m., piano recital by Ignaz F recital by Thomas Wilfrid; Metropolitan opera, "La Bohème"; 8 p. m., Italian op House, 2:15 p. m., German opera, "The German opera, "Rienzi"; Hotel Plaza,
Grant; Rumford Hall, 8:15 p. m., oper
Brooklyn Academy of Music, 8:30 p.
Paul Gundlach; Metropolitan Art Mus concert.

TENGEL

in Glamor

Not

Mr. Bliss letter of this something ible reader of aware that the go into things
Miss Jane
of Maeter-
"Pelleas" and ill running at ter, where I
time ago.
to too attack the critics of
that they appeared not tremen spellbound by first nights,
since I still as theater. in a settings may have the but comment by actic Edwin

Mr. Evans, nd at length
Arthur Bliss, ease in the York. "De-

[178]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK
TRIBUNE

DEC 30 1923

Mr. Bliss's "Color Symphony"; A Familiar Question Revived

Bainbridge Bishop's "Color Organ" of the '70s; Scriabin's "Prometheus"; Mr. Scholes's Treatise on the Bliss Score

By Lawrence Gilman

THE coming performance of Arthur Bliss's "Color Symphony" for the first time in New York, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on January 5 (it was heard two days ago in Boston), revives the old question of the supposed analogies between color and tone. This subject was hotly debated nine years ago when Scriabin's "Prometheus" was first exhibited to New York, with the "color-keyboard" devised by Scriabin to produce effects of colored light concurrently with the music; but the subject was left very much up in the air. Mark Twain once observed that people are "always talking about the weather, yet nothing is ever done." It is the same with the question of color and music.

The subject is, of course, much older than Scriabin's "Prometheus." One may trace it at least as far back as Aristotle, who wrote: "Colors may mutually relate like musical concords; for their pleasantest arrangements, like those concords, are mutually proportionate." Since Aristotle's day there has been an immense amount of theorization on the subject. Professor A. Wallace Rimington published his treatise, "Color Music," a decade ago, and he invented, we believe, a color organ. The experiments of Thomas Wilfred with his "Clavilux" are well remembered—although Mr. Wilfred did not aim to exhibit music and color in co-ordination but rather attempted to produce through color the emotional effects which musical instruments produce with sound.

The immemorial attempts to discover and formulate a supposed analogy between color and music have proceeded from the conviction, held by many who are not altogether hopeless sentimentalists, that there is really some discoverable principle of correspondence involved. Almost a quart
tury before Professor Ri
lished his study, one Bainb
dwelling in New Russia, E N. Y., printed a discussio
ject under this beguiling
Color Organ, With Some
in Regard to the Soul of
and the Harmony of Life.
may possibly convey to th
a notion of the color of mind, and will convince e
thoughtless that he knew
about the soul than abo
there is any real antago
the two. Mr. Bishop, how feet quite firmly planted
for he remarked on the his treatise, with singula that "from all that light. Mr. Koussevitzky, the distinguished Russian, who is to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season, is reported to have said that "F sharp is decidedly strawberry red." For him, no doubt, it is, but is F

Calendar for

SUNDAY—Carnegie Hall, 3 p.
8:30 p. m., song recital House, 3 p. m., concert by popular operatic

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

JAN 4 1924

Symphony Orchestra

This afternoon there was another of the interesting concerts for young people given by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Mr. Boyd, assisted by Miss Magoley from the north junior and Miss Turner from the south junior high schools, will accompany a group of 80 pupils to the concert. This remarkable opportunity will be greatly enjoyed by all. Another concert will be held some time in March. Ample notice will be given in time for all who will to make arrangements to attend.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK

3 1924

Hall.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in an interesting program at Carnegie Hall this evening.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From
Evening Sun
New York City

JAN 4 - 1924

The Boston Symphony.

Mr. Monteux gave New York a demonstration of good program making at the Boston Symphony's concert last night in Carnegie Hall, but from the size of the audience it may be inferred that discrimination in the choice of music is not always appreciated. The evening began with the overture to Mozart's "Magic Flute," one of the composer's least played overtures, and continued with Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica" and Gliere's "Les Sirenes," neither of which has been heard in the city since 1921. Finally came Liszt's "Tasso" as a spirited and by no means hackneyed close.

Through this program the symphony displayed a customary ability and finish and its conductor a typical intelligence. But while the music was accurately led and adequately performed there was little infection of enthusiasm to stir the audience. The Strauss picture of a day in a well ordered home is worth painting occasionally for its cleverness, if not for its reminiscence of greater hours spent outside the hearth; but it demands more conviction than it last night received to insure its power. Under Mr. Monteux's baton it suggested no contagion in its felicity. For such a home as he conscientiously presented it was easy to fall a victim to the sirens of the ensuing work, and one must admit that Strauss was not alone to blame. If Mr. Monteux had as much personal persuasion as he has initiative he might better vivify so excellent a program.

EVENING MAIL
New York City

JAN 4 - 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY

An intellectual tinge quite inevitably colors the enjoyment of the musical layman or critic hieing himself to Carnegie Hall to listen to a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Last night Mr. Monteux by his programme gave ample opportunity to indulge this gentle thesis. To begin with there was Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute," a work old in years, but ever young in spirit, in which one fondly traced analogies with the adorable elements of the primitive in another art.

There followed Richard Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica," with its double fugue and long drawn out development of modern noise. A family of three, papa, mamma and the only son, require 110 instruments to record their daily jars in Strauss's idiom, whereas Mozart gives us magic and a queen of the night with one-quarter of that number.

Reinhold Moritzovich Gliere, third on the list, with his symphonic poem, "The Sirens," makes less to-do than the Strauss family with an island of mythological temptresses and a whole shipwreck. Whether intended so or not, the concert served neatly to exercise one's mentality on the true and particular development of programme music through the musical ages.

Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso: Lament and Triumph," which ended the concert, was superbly played, as well as the numbers too that went before it.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK
TIMES

JAN 5

Arthur Bliss's "Color Symphony" is put forward to the early part of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's matinee on Saturday in Carnegie Hall, to be followed by Mozart's concerto, with Thibaud.

Eugen d'Albert's opera, "Die Toten Augen," founded on the legend of a blind woman in

---

AMERICAN

JAN 4 - 1924

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra paid New York its holiday visit last night, and presented a programme of interesting music in Carnegie Hall. The list was one of contrasts. It began with Mozart's delicately scintillating "Magic Flute" overture. This was followed by Strauss' Symphonia Domestica, the Teuton composer's musical portrayal of "Papa, Mama and the Baby." Gliere's "The Sirens," a Slavic setting to an episode in the Iliad; and Liszt's brilliant and highly-colored "Tasso Lament and Triumph."

The outstanding number was the Strauss' family album presented by an augmented orchestra and played with meticulous care and precision. The work sounds like a series of unrelated fragments, some ravishingly beautiful and others harsh and discordant.

Mr. Monteux directed with his customary authority and effect.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

SPRINGFIELD
MASS.
UNION

JAN 2 - 1924

Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra Coming Here Sunday

PIERRE MONTEUX.

Next Sunday afternoon the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its annual appearance under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A. at the Auditorium. This, the crowning event of the Y. M. C. A. series is always eagerly anticipated by the music-loving public of this city. The full orchestra of 100 will be here and Pierre Monteux will be the conductor.

Springfield alone enjoys, year after year, an opportunity to hear such an orchestra at its best free of an admission fee and open to all who secure a ticket.

As usual the concert will begin at 3 o'clock, promptly. The side doors will open shortly after 2 o'clock and the front doors at 2.45. Tickets can be obtained, either subscription or free, at the Y. M. C. A., or at the principal music stores.

NEW YORK
N. Y.
EVE. POST

JAN 4 - 1924

ON THE CONCERT STAGE

Spalding at the Beethoven Concert—Bostonians Play Strauss

Albert Spalding was soloist at yesterday afternoon's Beethoven concert of the Damrosch orchestra in Carnegie Hall. He played the great concerto with the superlative art for which he has become internationally famous. The symphonies were the fourth and the fifth. Particularly enjoyable was the postlude, consisting of a trio for flute, bassoon, and piano, and a rondino for wood instruments.

The big thing—at least in duration—at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert last night was Strauss's "Domestic" symphony, which Mr. Monteux and his men played very well indeed. The real climax of the concert was, however, Liszt's dramatic "Tasso"; the orchestra painted the tragic subject of this tone-poem in heroic colors.

At Town Hall last night Roland Hayes sang again to an overflowing audience. There were repeats and many added encore numbers. Art like that of this tenor appeals to all because it is also heart music. It is the stuff of life itself—life at its noblest.

At Aeolian Hall Miss Ellen Ballou, the Canadian pianist, who in her childhood was a pupil of Joseffy, gave a piano recital which showed her to be a player of exceptional merit. Among her unhackneyed numbers were a Pastorale and Capriccio by Alberto Jonas.

---

esteem, and I want to apologize having annoyed you. At the same I cannot help feeling that you somewhat malicious in intimat- that what I wrote was in the na- of "finding fault" or was among "thoughtless reproofs." I merely I was puzzled.

Mr. Skinner's explanation is eminently elucidating, and your own "the king can do no wrong" pronunciamento is deliciously worded.

I wish you a most merry Christmas and hope the New Year will bring you none but good plays to review.

GEORGE W. DORLAND.

1924

First Nights of the New Year

MONDAY

"KID BOOTS," a musical comedy starring Eddie Cantor and featuring Mary Eaton, with book by William Anthony McGuire and Otto Harbach, music by Harry Tierney and lyrics by Joseph McCarthy, will be presented by Florenz Ziegfeld at the Earl Carroll Theater. The supporting cast: Jobyna Howland, Ethelynd Terry, Beth Beri, Harry Fender, Marie Callahan, Paul Everton, Harry Short, John Rutherford and Harland Dixon.

"THE SONG AND DANCE MAN," a new George M. Cohan comedy, of which Mr. Cohan himself is the producer and leading actor, will be revealed at the Hudson Theater. The supporting cast: Mayo Methot, Eleanor Woodruff, Laura Bennett, Mary Agnes Martin, Alice Beam, Frederick Perry, Louis C. John Meehan, Robert Cummings, William Walcott, William S. Phinney and Albert Bushee.

FRIDAY

"HELL-BENT FER HEAVEN," a play of the Blue Ridge, by Thatcher Hughes, will be presented by Marc Klaw at the Klaw Theater at a special matinee with the following cast: Augustin Duncan, George Abbott, Glenn Anders, Clara Blandick, John F. Hamilton, Margaret Borough and Burke Clarke.

"NALA AND DAMAYANTI," the Dorothy Coite-Edith King production of the Hindu legend, will be given at a special matinee by the Theater Guild at the Garrick Theater with a cast of children.

SATURDAY

"THE SPOOK SONATA," a drama by August Strindberg, will be the first production at the Provincetown Playhouse, reopening under the direction of Kenneth MacGowan, Robert Edmond Jones and Eugene O'Neill. The cast: Clare Eames, Helen Freeman, Stanley Howlitt, Walter Abel, Mary Blair, Rita Matthias, Charles Ellis, Romeyn Park Benjamin, Mary Morris, Marion Berry and Alan Nagle.

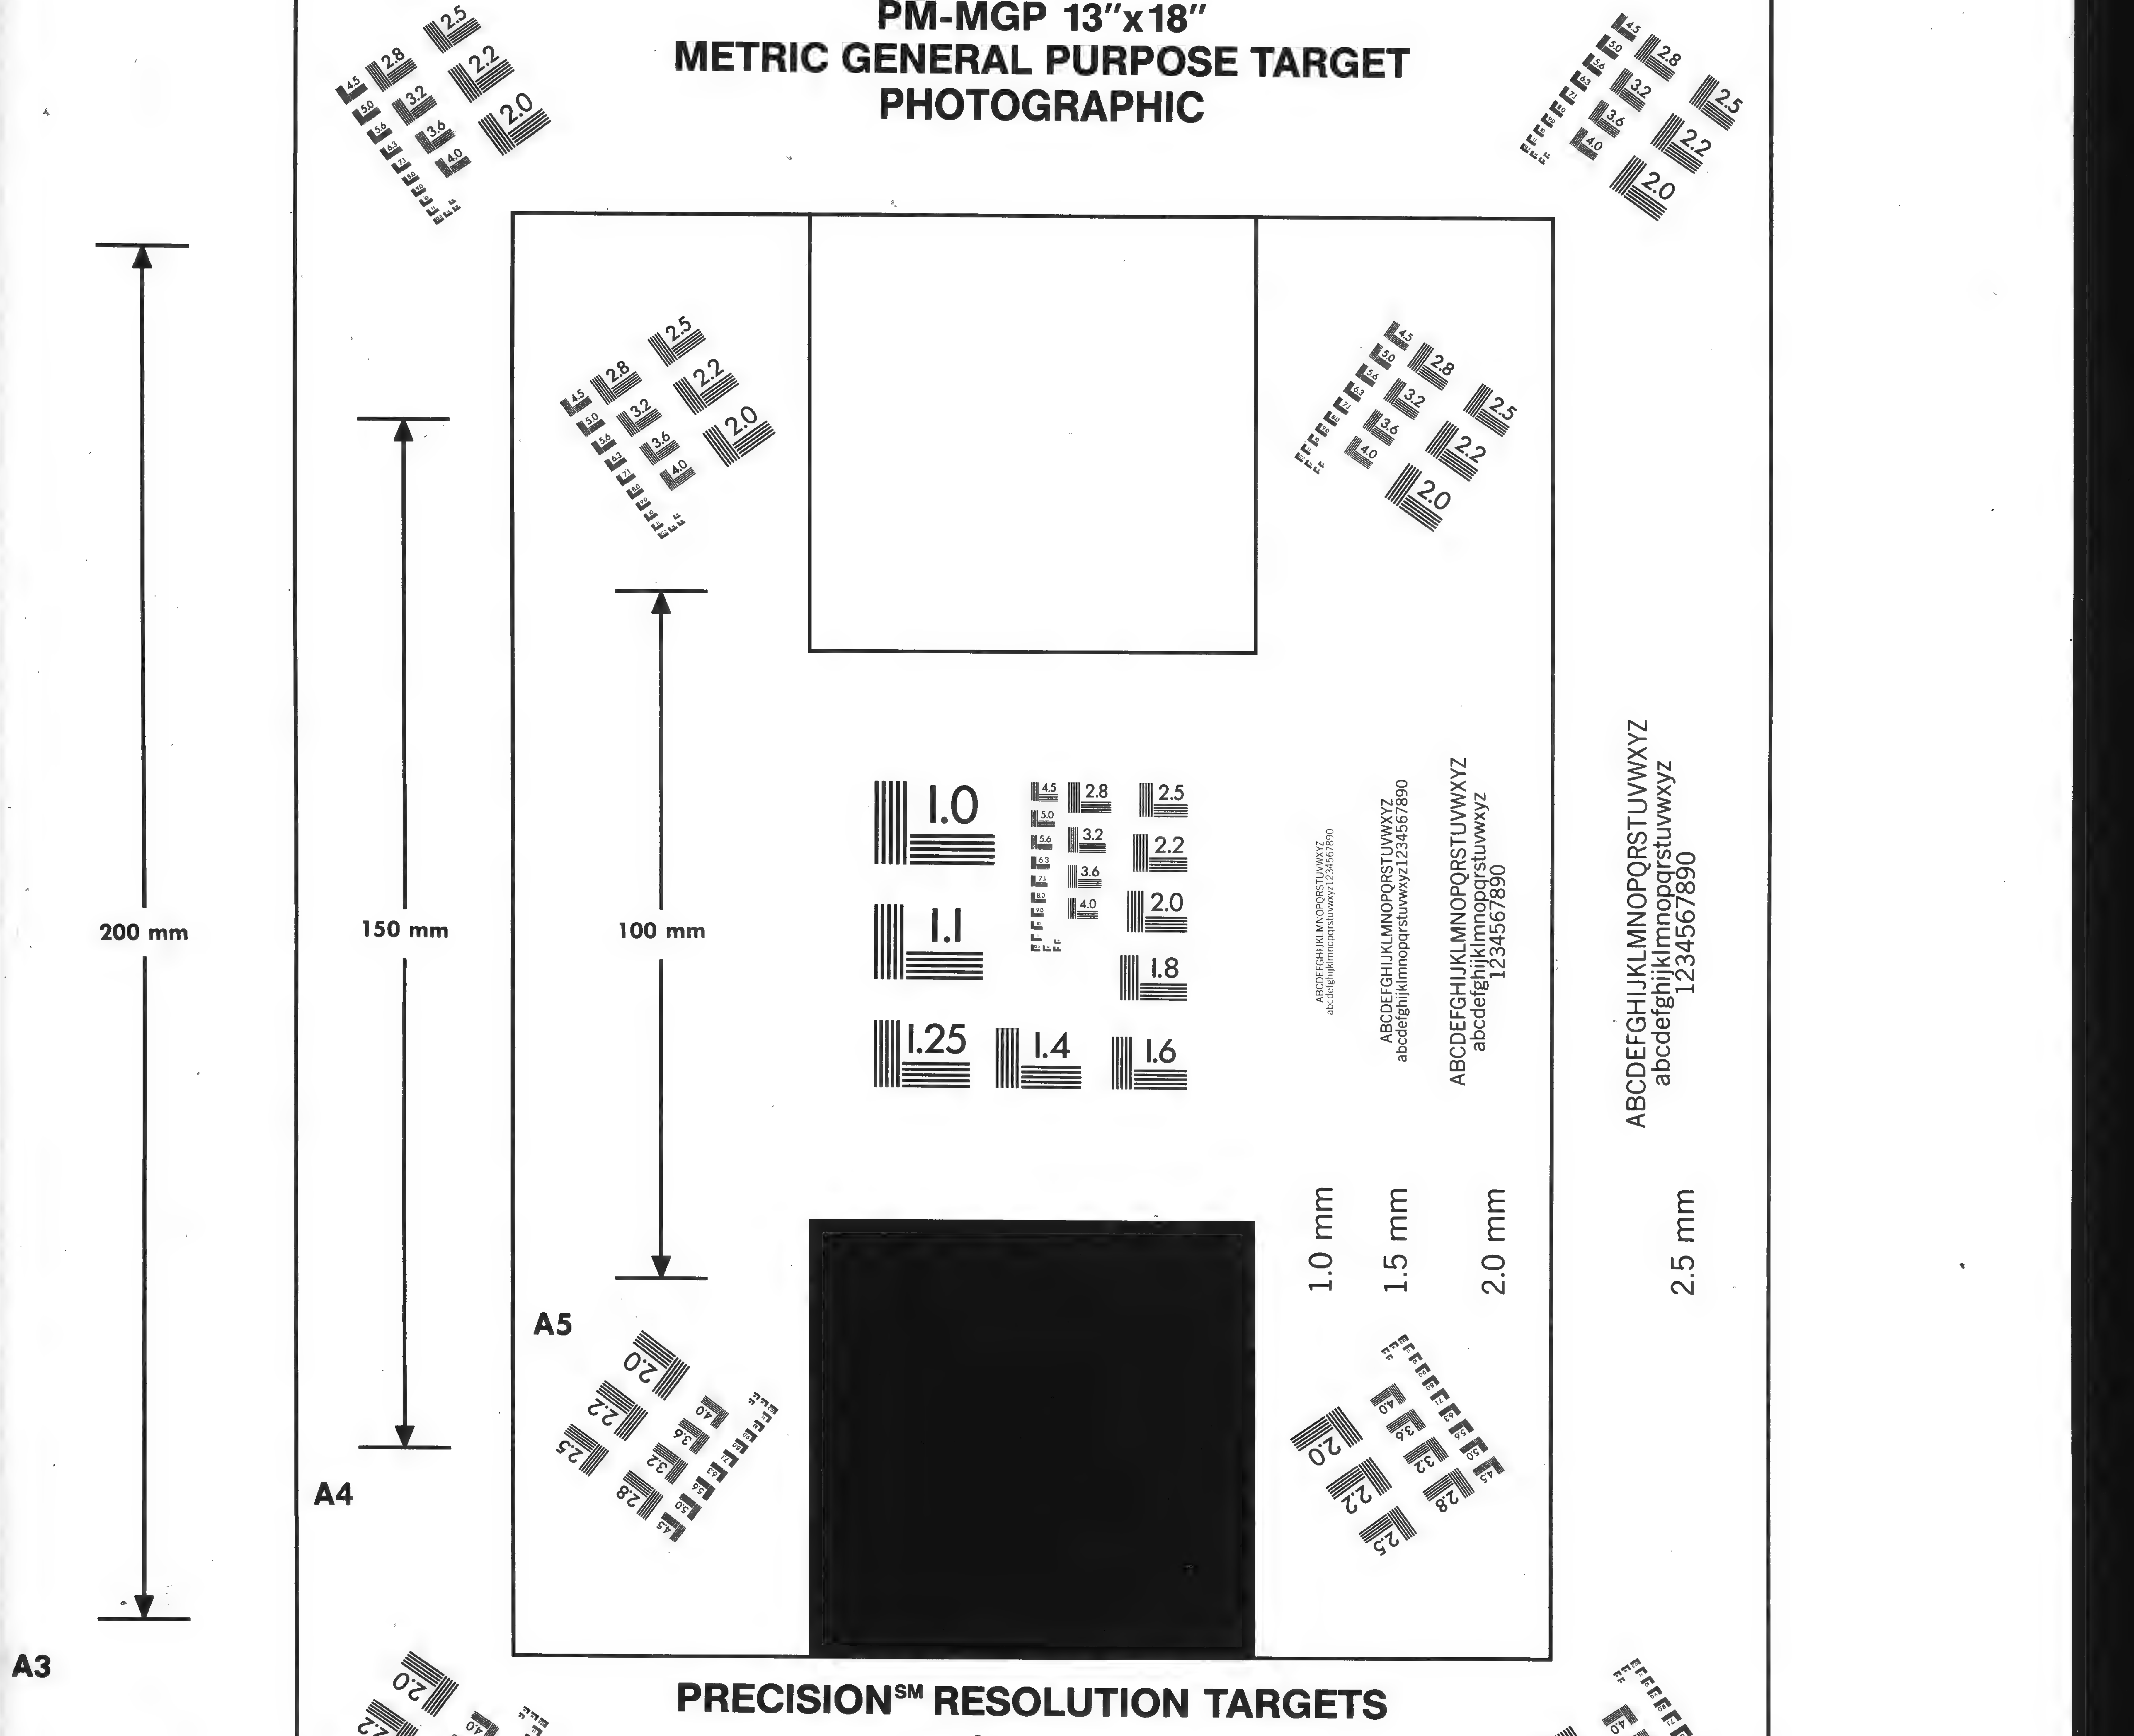
---

icize—or at least adversely —something they do not nd? They took the attitude play is a present day Bro ma and, setting up this idea acked it. Possibly, from their nt, they were right, but why consider the playwright's theme and then write their according to that? After re is the author's viewpoin ute it! I think the play fell pass the critics didn't get and they couldn't classify it, or aid to.

ou see, it's not old enough ntique and therefore a classi new enough to be a modern fore a sort of current event. olière had written it, I think commended it. An didn't get it, they ood play. They mig ven way sufficiently t sion that maybe they thing. But no, not ne one had only taken t possibly there was s had escaped them! have said, as one a fantasy, that it explained in just so

REDUCTION
RATIO
12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
5.0
3.2
2.0
5.6
6.3
3.6
7.1
4.0
200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm
A5
A4
A3

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

NEW YORK
TRIBUNE

JAN 4 - 1924

Albert Spalding Is Soloist With N. Y. Symphony

Two More Beethoven Numbers Are Heard at Carnegie; Violinist Plays With Smoothness and Ease

Bostonians Give Concert

"Symphonia Domestica" Is Well Received and Gliere's "The Sirens" Follows

By F. D. Perkins

Two more Beethoven symphonies were played yesterday afternoon by Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall in the third of the Beethoven cycle programs. These were the most and possibly the least familiar of the nine; the Fourth Symphony sometimes going a full concert season, such as the last [illegible] While the slow movement is one of the most beautiful things Beethoven ever wrote, it is doubtful whether the B flat symphony could stand the intensive treatment given to the "Eroica," Fifth and Seventh.

Albert Spalding was the soloist, and his performance of the violin concerto seemed the feature of the afternoon. He brought out smooth, full tones, especially rich in the lowest notes, and the smoothness was unruffled in the complex passages which the violinist unraveled with apparent ease, waxing polyphonic in his cadenzas with the same clear, flowing tone and calm of manner. With poise and clarity there was ample life and vigor in Mr. Spalding's playing; it was a performance of much vitality, showing the high position he has reached among contemporary violinists.

Fifth Symphony Played

When Mr. Damrosch and his musicians, who co-operated with Mr. Spalding in a well unified performance, played the Fifth Symphony, which had been heard from Mr. Stransky's forces the day before vigorously and sonorously. There was another postlude of unfamiliar numbers this time, a trio for piano, bassoon and flute, dated 1786, when Beethoven was fifteen or sixteen, and a Rondino for Wind Instruments, played by Messrs. Mathieu, Marsh, Duques, Yegudkin and Hoogstoel, with Mr. Barrere holding the baton, while he, Mr. Lettelier and Mr. Damrosch, at the piano, played the early trio. This was a light, tuneful dessert for the weightier numbers gone before.

In the evening, Mr. Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to Carnegie Hall for their second Thursday concert and described domestic life as heard by Richard Strauss. The "Symphonia Domestica" is not done often; it has a certain length, but it sounded very well last night in a remarkable performance by the Bostonians.

Orchestral Tone Rich

Under Mr. Monteux, the orchestral tone had a rich smoothness, but not thickness; it was always clear and relevant, giving each part its contemplated value, with nothing overplayed or obscured. Clear and well balanced, the performance was thoroughly expressive; bright, humorous, contemplative or tender as the family situation required. Almost twenty years after its first performance (March 21, 1904, in the same hall) there seemed nothing horrific in the Symphonia yesterday; on the contrary, it seemed tuneful to the point of mildness—a cheerful family spending a quiet day without vicissitudes.

Mr. Monteux and his men, applauded at length after the Strauss number, followed with "The Sirens," a symphonic poem by Reinhold Gliere, first heard in Petrograd in 1902. With various undulating passages and muted strings, then with agitated outbursts, it tells of the fatally attracted ship, which is wrecked to the tune of a sustained, ominous low note fading away in the lower strings. It has one or two hints of Strauss, but does not, on the whole, seem Straussian; Gallic touches are stronger. The overture to "The Magic Flute" began and Liszt's "Tasso" ended a well-played concert.

NEW YORK
TIMES

JAN 4 - 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS.

Pierre Monteux Gives Strauss's Strange "Sinfonia Domestica."

Bringing glowing coals of Strauss to the Newcastle of orchestras, as tomorrow they will bring the "Color" symphony of Bliss, the Boston Symphony's hundred men under Pierre Monteux were heard in Carnegie Hall last evening in the infrequently performed "Sinfonia Domestica." A new generation has arisen to whom the composer's airing of domestic linen is evidently yet surprising. It will be twenty years the coming March 21 since Richard Strauss himself gave his work on this platform for the first time anywhere in the world.

"A day in my family life," he had called it, and then cynically made a night of it instead. New York remembers the confusion of listeners who found the baby's noon siesta transformed into a nocturne, supper time into breakfast and so on around the clock.

Strauss, as was written in this newspaper in 1904, wished this strange symphony to be taken as music, for what it is, and not as elaboration of details. It was music last evening to be enjoyed in many passages of fine and lyric eloquence, lover-like playing with orchestral sound, romancing even with the grotesque. The Bostonians' tone and mass technique, needless to say, was admirable.

Monteux revived also, in Gliere's "The Sirens," an atmospheric setting of a classic story by the Kiev composer, heard first in Boston when Mr. Monteux originally led the band as its brief guest before Rabaud, whom he later succeeded as conductor. The program last night prefaced Strauss with Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture, and followed Gliere with the "Tasso" of Liszt.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK
HERALD

JAN 4

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second evening concert in Carnegie Hall last night. The program consisted of Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute," the "Symphonia Domestica," by Richard Strauss; Gliere's symphonic poem, "The Sirens," and Liszt's "Tasso: Lament and Triumph."

Dr. Strauss's sketch of domestic felicity was composed in 1903 and performed for the first time at the last concert of the Richard Strauss Festival in Carnegie Hall, March 21, 1904, by Wetzler's

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BROOKLYN
NEW YORK
EAGLE

JAN 5

MUSIC OF THE DAY

Monteux's programic genius was never better demonstrated than last evening at the Academy, when the Boston Orchestra made its second appearance in Brooklyn for this season. Beginning with Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" (a faux pas that can be forgiven this notable conductor), the evening went its way through Schumann's D minor Symphony, Gliere's poem, "The Sirens," a Mozart violin concerto, and the Polovtsian dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor." Not a strikingly novel program, but one well off the beaten track and interesting at all times.

The Berlioz overture we have with us always, yet if music of this sort were to be written by any contemporary composer it would stand little [illegible] of performance. It is noisily [illegible], like so much of Berlioz's music.

Of the Schumann Symphony one could write a great deal. Its parentage is unmistakable, for the composer's romantic shadow is cast over every bar. Particularly admirable is the first tempestuous movement, its rhythmic figure and emotional content so like Schumann's "In der Nacht," that soaring and elegiac piano epic. The continual reiteration of a single phrase gives this music a morbid, feverish coloring, accentuated by Schumann's heavy handling of the orchestra. The Romanza which follows only intensifies the drama inclosed in this music. It is a brooding, melancholy song, full of somber suggestions. A measure of gayety pervades the Scherzo, with its Pierrot-like trio, and the finale is all sunshine.

Of Gliere's "Sirens" one receives a complex impression. The amazingly effective opening, with its chaotic murmurings, its pictures of ocean nights clouded and moonless, with an indefinable something approaching in the darkness, is highly original; but later the mysterious presence evolves into the ghost of Richard Wagner. Evidently Gliere, after deciding on his subject, referred to the sirens of the "Tannhauser" baccanale, for his score is sadly in need of quotation marks. Two phrases are borrowed outright, no mistake, and the coloring of the climax is that of the Dresden master.

That French violinist of silky tone, Jacques Thibaud, gave a splendid performance of the Mozart Concerto, written in the days when the concerto was still primarily a display piece and not the symphonic rhapsody that it became later under Beethoven and Brahms. But there are expressive and delightful passages in it, notably the "Un poco adagio."

Borodin's dances are among his most original works—though indeed the entire list of this Russian composer's works—so few in number—is marked by individuality and unusual promise. We say promise since Borodin was essentially a dilettante and music was not the major interest of a varied and eventful life. But he was the forerunner, though credit is rarely given him, of many later developments of musical art. The Polovasian dances are barbaric and stunning in their orchestral coat-of-many-colors and have the authentic Russian flavor that is more evident in Borodin's music than in that of any other composer, excepting Moussorgsky.

We have purposely refrained till now from any comment on the performance of Monteux and his splendid band, for it was one that needed little criticism—finely wrought, expressive and colored by a master hand. There will be many regrets when this French conductor leaves his familiar post at the head of the Boston organization.

EDWARD CUSHING.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK

JAN 1924

At Carnegie Hall tomorrow afternoon, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, assisted by Jacques Thibaud, violin soloist, will present a Mozart-Bliss-Brahms-Ravel program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LAWRENCE
MASS.

JAN 1924

BOSTON SYMHONY ORCHESTRA COMING

An event of prime importance will be the coming visit of the internationally celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra of 100 musicians, which is to give a concert in the Colonial on Sunday afternoon, Jan. 20th.

This orchestra has been for years considered one of the most remarkable organizations of its kind in the world. Its name stands for the utmost perfection in musical performance. These supreme qualities are the outcome of more than 40 years of endeavor.

The history of the orchestra makes a fine record of high purpose, administrative wisdom, and munificence on the part of its founder. Every effort was directed toward artistic supremacy. One after another of the world's greatest conductors devoted their best towards the further refinement of the ensemble. Nothing was spared to bring the finest musicians of Europe to make up the ranks.

Hence the ensemble, in glow of tone, in clear cut unanimity and delicate balance of choirs, is the envy of all orchestras. It requires a remarkable leader to shape this ensemble and to evoke from it a wondrously eloquent performance.

Such a leader is Pierre Monteux. This, his fifth season as conductor, will also be his last, and promises to be one of the finest, artistically speaking, of them all. The Boston Symphony concerts have never been more widely popular, nor the schedule more crowded.

Seats are on sale at the Colonial. The sale thus far indicates that the concert will have the usual capacity crowds as in 1910, 1920 and 1922.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LAWRENCE
MASS.

JAN 1924

THE announcement that the Boston Symphony orchestra will come here to the Colonial theatre on Sunday afternoon, Jan. 20, is the first bit of pleasant musical news of the present season. Strange to say there is usually somewhat more interest shown in song or instrumental recitals than in a symphony program. Why this is so can be ascribed to several different reasons, the chief of which is that a recital reaches the average intelligence much more directly and quickly that do the higher and more pre-

---

THIS CLIPPING
WORCES
MASS.
POST

JAN 1924

BOSTON SYMPH HERE FEBRUAR

Will Be Local Farewel

Pierre Monteux, Conduc

A visit of paramount importan the musical season here will be concert by the Boston Symphony chestra, to be given in Mecha Hall on Tuesday evening, Feb. 12.

This concert bears double inter because it comes after three yea absence from this city, and because will be in the nature of a farewell Pierre Monteux who completes t season his five year term as condu tor of the orchestra. Much to the r gret of his large American public, th noted French leader intends to retur to Paris in the spring.

Pierre Monteux appeared here at the head of the orchestra in his first two seasons, 1920 and 1921. Now in his fifth year at this post he is generally said to have brought the quality of the performance to the highest degree of marvelous perfection.

He first came to America at the head of Diaghileff's Ballet Russe, having won much fame in the old world as conductor of the principal orchestras of Paris and in the larger opera houses of Europe. He was particularly noted for the concerts Monteux at the Paris Casino, and likewise for his conducting of the Ballet Russe, with which he toured Europe before coming here. Previous to his present post, he was the French conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York.

A program of particular interest is being planned by Mr. Monteux, which will be at once directly enjoyable to the layman and contain the greatest achievements in orchestral repertory.

ESTABLISHED 1861
FROM
NEWS, 1924
Providence, R. I.

The programme is announced the third appearance of the B Symphony Orchestra in Provi this season, to be given in Inf hall on Tuesday evening, Jan.

The soloist of the evening w Jean Bedetti, the famous lead the 'cello section in the orch who came from Europe, wher held a very high reputation, to this post three years ago, and wh ranked as one of the foremost 'c virtuosos in America. He will pear with the orchestra on this casion in Schumann's beautiful certo for that instrument.

Pierre Monteux will open the gramme with Schubert's immo symphony in C-major, the sc which is considered by many master work of this composer which, as chance as had it, has been performed by this orchestra Providence for a number of season

There will be a diversion in tw numbers from Ravel's fantastic sui "Mother Goose," namely, "The Con versations of Beauty and the Beast and "Laideronette, Empress of th Pagodas. The evening will clos with Wagner's "Flying Dutchman overture.

NEW YORK
EVENING MAIL

JAN 25 1924

NOW "LE SACRE"

The music of Stravinsky's famous ballet, "Le Sacre du Printemps," will finally be heard in New York at the Carnegie Hall concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the last day of this month. Pierre Monteux, who conducted the initial performance of the work in Paris—an occasion of riotous opposition, as well as of frantic applause—will, of course, conduct it here.

That performance took place ten and a half years ago. The Diaghileff troupe danced the work. But the music has likewise been much played in concert abroad. The first performance in America was given by the Philadelphia Orchestra, under the direction of Leopold Stokowski, in Philadelphia, last season. New York is one of the last of the big cities of the world to hear what is perhaps the most celebrated orchestral composition of the present century. And yet New York does not lack orchestras, resident and visiting.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
ROCHESTER
N. Y.
TIMES UNION

1924

Following its statement published in the program book of the subscribers who have been helping cover its annual deficit, the Boston Symphony Orchestra publishes its financial record for the last three seasons. From this it appears that the deficit was reduced from $121,000 in 1921 to $97,000 in 1922 and $83,000 in 1923, which an endowment fund reduces a little below these figures. At the same time the salaries paid have risen from $299,000 to $303,000. The gross incomes from concerts have risen from $407,000 in 1922 to $423,000 in 1923. The trustees say that they are informed that "among the American orchestras of the first grade, none of which are self-supporting, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is burdened with the smallest operating deficit." The public is appealed to to give "this Boston institution" its firmest support at the present time.

A gift to the guaranty fund of $10,000 from an anonymous giver is n announced, bringing it [illegible] $150,000. This gift is "In the memory Henry L. Higginson." The fun however, according to The Bost Transcript, mounts too slowly to me the deficit, which now stands at $6 000.

Because the Boston audience tha heard Arthur Bliss' "Color Syn phony" did not applaud vigorous H. T. P., in The Boston Transcript not at all satisfied. He thinks it wa "an audience afraid of itself"; seemed to him to be saying to itself "Safety first." "It must have been interested; it should have been engrossed, enkindled." He intimates that it did not applaud because it was "not quite prudent" to applau "a new man with a new voice." But what if it were an audience not afraid to indicate, in the polite American way that it did not like the "new voice"? If it had the courage to think hat even a modernist was writing mere noise, sounds that were not justi ed, and to express its disapproval; hat it had opinions of its own, as Mr. Parker had of his own, and even at the risk of public reprimand in The Transcript was determined to retain them? It is barely possible.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
WORCESTER
MASS.
POST

1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT MECHANICS

After an absence of three years, the Boston Symphony orchestra is to return to Worcester to give a concert in Mechanics hall, Tuesday evening, Feb. 12. The event will be one of the most important in the Worcester season, not only on account of the orchestra, which is considered one of the very finest of its kind in the world, but because this is the farewell season of Pierre Monteux as its conductor.

Pierre Monteux appeared here at the head of the orchestra in his first two seasons—1920 and 1921. Now completing his five-year term, he is generally said to have brought the quality of the performances to the highest degree of marvelous perfection, rivaling its eloquence in any past season of its long and illustrious history. There is considerable regret at the pending departure of this most distinguished of French conductors.

He first came to America at the head of Diaghileff's Ballet Russe, having won much fame in the Old World as conductor of the principal orchestras of Paris and in the larger opera houses of Europe. He was particularly noted for the Concerts Monteux at the Paris Casino, and likewise for his conducting of the Ballet Russe, with which he toured Europe before coming here. Previous to his present post, he was the French conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York.

It is as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, however, that he is considered to have reached the highest degree of his executive and interpretative genius. The program which Pierre Monteux is preparing for Worcester will be of the highest beauty and brilliance and likewise have popular appeal.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

NEW YORK
TRIBUNE

JAN 4 - 192

Albert Spalding Is Soloist With N. Y. Symphony

Two More Beethoven Numbers Are Heard at Carnegie; Violinist Plays With Smoothness and Ease

Bostonians Give Concert

"Symphonia Domestica" Is Well Received and Gliere's "The Sirens" Follows

By F. D. Perkins

Two more Beethoven symphonies were played yesterday afternoon by Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall in the third of the Beethoven cycle programs. These were the most and possibly the least familiar of the nine; the Fourth Symphony sometimes going a full concert season, such as the last [illegible] while the slow movement is one of the most beautiful things Beethoven ever wrote, it is doubtful whether the B flat symphony could stand the intensive treatment given to the "Eroica," Fifth and Seventh.

Albert Spalding was the soloist, and his performance of the violin concerto seemed the feature of the afternoon. He brought out smooth, full tones, especially rich in the lowest notes, and the smoothness was unruffled in the complex passages which the violinist unraveled with apparent ease, waxing polyphonic in his cadenzas with the same clear, flowing tone and calm of manner. With poise and clarity there was ample life and vigor in Mr. Spalding's playing; it was a performance of much vitality, showing the high position he has reached among contemporary violinists.

Fifth Symphony Played

Then Mr. Damrosch and his musicians, who co-operated with Mr. Spalding in a well unified performance, played the Fifth Symphony, which had been heard from Mr. Stransky's forces the day before vigorously and sonorously. There was another postlude of unfamiliar numbers this time, a trio for piano, bassoon and flute, dated 1786, when Beethoven was fifteen or sixteen, and a Rondino for Wind Instruments, played by Messrs. Mathieu, Marsh, Duques, Yegudkin and Hoogstoel, with Mr. Barrere holding the baton, while he, Mr. Lettelier and Mr. Damrosch, at the piano, played the early trio. This was a light, tuneful dessert for the weightier numbers gone before.

In the evening, Mr. Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to Carnegie Hall for their second Thursday concert and described domestic life as heard by Richard Strauss. The "Symphonia Domestica" is not done often; it has a certain length, but it sounded very well last night in a remarkable performance by the Bostonians.

Orchestral Tone Rich

Under Mr. Monteux, the orchestral tone had a rich smoothness, but not thickness; it was always clear and relevant, giving each part its contemplated value, with nothing overplayed or obscured. Clear and well balanced, the performance was thoroughly expressive; bright, humorous, contemplative or tender as the family situation required. Almost twenty years after its first performance (March 21, 1904, in the same hall) there seemed nothing horrific in the Symphonia yesterday; on the contrary, it seemed tuneful to the point of mildness—a cheerful family spending a quiet day without vicissitudes.

Mr. Monteux and his men, applauded at length after the Strauss number, followed with "The Sirens," a symphonic poem by Reinhold Gliere, first heard in Petrograd in 1902. With various undulating passages and muted strings, then with agitated outbursts, it tells of the fatally attracted ship, which is wrecked to the tune of a sustained, ominous low note fading away in the lower strings. It has one or two hints of Strauss, but does not, on the whole, seem Straussian; Gallic touches are stronger. The overture to "The Magic Flute" began and Liszt's "Tasso" ended a well-played concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK

JAN 4 1924

At Carnegie Hall tomorrow afternoon, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, assisted by Jacques Thibaud, violin soloist, will present a Mozart-Bliss-Brahms-Ravel program.

NEW YORK
TIMES

JAN 4 - 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS.

Pierre Monteux Gives Strauss's Strange "Sinfonia Domestica."

Bringing glowing coals of Strauss to the Newcastle of orchestras, as tomorrow they will bring the "Color" symphony of Bliss, the Boston Symphony's hundred men under Pierre Monteux were heard in Carnegie Hall last evening in the infrequently performed "Sinfonia Domestica." A new generation has arisen to whom the composer's airing of domestic linen is evidently yet surprising. It will be twenty years the coming March 21 since Richard Strauss himself gave his work on this platform for the first time anywhere in the world.

"A day in my family life," he had called it, and then cynically made a night of it instead. New York remembers the confusion of listeners who found the baby's noon siesta transformed into a nocturne, supper time into breakfast and so on around the clock.

Strauss, as was written in this newspaper in 1904, wished this strange symphony to be taken as music, for what it is, and not as elaboration of details. It was music last evening to be enjoyed in many passages of fine and lyric eloquence, lover-like playing with orchestral sound, romancing even with the grotesque. The Bostonians' tone and mass technique, needless to say, was admirable.

Monteux revived also, in Gliere's "The Sirens," an atmospheric setting of a classic story by the Kiev composer, heard first in Boston when Mr. Monteux originally led the band as its brief guest before Rabaud, whom he later succeeded as conductor. The program last night prefaced Strauss with Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture, and followed Gliere with the "Tasso" of Liszt.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK
HERALD

JAN 4

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second evening concert in Carnegie Hall last night. The program consisted of Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute," the "Symphonia Domestica," by Richard Strauss; Gliere's symphonic poem, "The Sirens," and Liszt's "Tasso: Lament and Triumph."

Dr. Strauss's sketch of domestic felicity was composed in 1903 and performed for the first time at the last concert of the Richard Strauss Festival in Carnegie Hall, March 21, 1904, by Wetzler's Orchestra. The composer was the conductor. Mr. Monteux imparted unwonted vim and energy to his men last night. Their performance of the Strauss work was excellent, and out of domestic chaos they frequently brought reconciliation and order. In "The Sirens" there was beautiful work by the strings. The quality of tone more than affirmed that the Boston orchestra was on its best mettle.

Y TRANSFORMERS

inches long, three being 3¼ inches in diameter and three being 3 inches in diameter.

The primary winding on each transformer is made on one of the tubes having the 3-inch diameter. A great many experimenters wind ten turns on the tube marked "Tl" in the diagram. Fifteen turns are then wound on the other 3-inch tubes for the primaries of the other two transformers.

A much sharper tuning set can be made by winding only six turns on each tube for the primaries of the transformers. This winding should be made of No. 26, or eight double cotton covered, the winding commencing at a point about ¼ of an inch from one end of the tube and occupying about an inch of space on the tube. The rest of the tube is bare.

The secondaries of the transformers are wound with 65 turns of either No. 24 or No. 28 double cotton covered wire, on the tubes having the 3¼-inch diameter. Start the winding about ½ inch from the end of the tube. When complete, the winding tube should be equally spaced on the tube with about a half inch left bare on each end.

The secondaries of the second and third transformers should have a tap taken off 14 turns from the end of the winding for the connection to the neutralizing condenser. This may be left out and the connection made at the end of the coil if desired, however. When the windings are complete assemble the primary coil inside the secondary and bring the leads out.

More details concerning the construction of the Neutrodyne will be

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LAWRENCE
MASS.

JAN 1924

BOSTON SYMHONY ORCHESTRA COMING

An event of prime importance will be the coming visit of the internationally celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra of 100 musicians, which is to give a concert in the Colonial on Sunday afternoon, Jan. 20th.

This orchestra has been for years considered one of the most remarkable organizations of its kind in the world. Its name stands for the utmost perfection in musical performance. These supreme qualities are the outcome of more than 40 years of endeavor.

The history of the orchestra makes a fine record of high purpose, administrative wisdom, and munificence on the part of its founder. Every effort was directed toward artistic supremacy. One after another of the world's greatest conductors devoted their best towards the further refinement of the ensemble. Nothing was spared to bring the finest musicians of Europe to make up the ranks.

Hence the ensemble, in glow of tone, in clear cut unanimity and delicate balance of choirs, is the envy of all orchestras. It requires a remarkable leader to shape this ensemble and to evoke from it a wondrously eloquent performance.

Such a leader is Pierre Monteux. This, his fifth season as conductor, will also be his last, and promises to be one of the finest, artistically speaking, of them all. The Boston Symphony concerts have never been more widely popular, nor the schedule more crowded.

Seats are on sale at the Colonial. The sale thus far indicates that the concert will have the usual capacity crowds as in 1919, 1920 and 1922.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LAWRENCE
MASS.

JA 1924

THE announcement that the Boston Symphony orchestra will come here to the Colonial theatre on Sunday afternoon, Jan. 20, is the first bit of pleasant musical news of the present season. Strange to say there is usually somewhat more interest shown in song or instrumental recitals than in a symphony program. Why this is so can be ascribed to several different reasons, the chief of which is that a [illegible] reaches the average intelligence more directly and quicker [illegible] do the higher and more pretentious symphonic forms. Still at the last appearance here of the world famous Boston organization the program was so arranged that it took on almost a popular aspect, containing the familiar, though thrilling overture to Wagner's "Tannhauser." Interest in the forthcoming event will be heightened by the appearance here again of Raymond Havens, pianist, as soloist. He came in a similar capacity in 1919 when Henri Rabaud was the conductor. Mr. Havens, who has developed into one of America's foremost pianists, will play Schumann's A-minor Concerto. Pierre Monteux, who has been the leader of the Boston Symphony for the past five seasons, will conduct. This will be his final season with the orchestra.

The program in detail will be as follows:

Symphony in A-major, No. 7, Op.92 Beethoven
- 1 Poco sostenuto; Vivace
- 2 Allegretto
- 3 Presto, Presto meno assai
- 4 Allegro con brio

Nocturnes Debussy
- a Clouds
- b Festivals

Concerto in A-minor for piano and orchestra, Op 54 Schumann
- 1 Allegro appetuoso
- 2 Intermezzo: Andantino grazioso
- 3 Allegro vivace Mr. Havens

Ouverture Solenneiie: 1812 Tchaikowsky

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
WORCESTER
MASS.
POST

JAN 2 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE FEBRUARY 12

Will Be Local Farewell to Pierre Monteux, Conductor

A visit of paramount importance in the musical season here will be concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Mechanics Hall on Tuesday evening, Feb. 12.

This concert bears double interest because it comes after three years absence from this city, and because it will be in the nature of a farewell to Pierre Monteux who completes this season his five year term as conductor of the orchestra. Much to the regret of his large American public, the noted French leader intends to return to Paris in the spring.

Pierre Monteux appeared here at the head of the orchestra in his first two seasons, 1920 and 1921. Now in his fifth year at this post he is generally said to have brought the quality of the performance to the highest degree of marvelous perfection.

He first came to America at the head of Diaghileff's Ballet Russe, having won much fame in the old world as conductor of the principal orchestras of Paris and in the larger opera houses of Europe. He was particularly noted for the concerts Monteux at the Paris Casino, and likewise for his conducting of the Ballet Russe, with which he toured Europe before coming here. Previous to his present post, he was the French conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York.

A program of particular interest is being planned by Mr. Monteux, which will be at once directly enjoyable to the layman and contain the greatest achievements in orchestral repertory.

ESTABLISHED 1881
FROM
NEWS,
Providence, R. I.

1924

The programme is announced for the third appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Providence this season, to be given in Infantry hall on Tuesday evening, Jan. 22.

The soloist of the evening will be Jean Bedetti, the famous leader of the 'cello section in the orchestra who came from Europe, where he held a very high reputation, to take this post three years ago, and who is ranked as one of the foremost 'cello virtuosos in America. He will appear with the orchestra on this occasion in Schumann's beautiful concerto for that instrument.

Pierre Monteux will open the programme with Schubert's immortal symphony in C-major, the score which is considered by many the master work of this composer and which, as chance as had it, has not been performed by this orchestra in Providence for a number of seasons.

There will be a diversion in two numbers from Ravel's fantastic suite "Mother Goose," namely, "The Conversations of Beauty and the Beast" and "Laideronette, Empress of the Pagodas. The evening will close with Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture.

NEW YORK
EVENING MAIL

JAN 15 1924

NOW "LE SACRE"

The music of Stravinsky's famous ballet, "Le Sacre du Printemps," will finally be heard in New York at the Carnegie Hall concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the last day of this month. Pierre Monteux, who conducted the initial performance of the work in Paris—an occasion of riotous opposition, as well as of frantic applause—will, of course, conduct it here.

That performance took place ten and a half years ago. The Diaghileff troupe danced the work. But the music has likewise been much played in concert abroad. The first performance in America was given by the Philadelphia Orchestra, under the direction of Leopold Stokowski, in Philadelphia, last season. New York is one of the last of the big cities of the world to hear what is perhaps the most celebrated orchestral composition of the present century. And yet New York does not lack orchestras, resident and visiting.

FROM THE

blished in subscribers over its an- Symphony financial re- seasons. From the deficit was re- 0 in 1921 to $97, $83,000 in 1922, endowment fund reduces these figures. At the same salaries paid have risen from to $303,000. The gross income from concerts have risen from 000 in 1922 to $423,000 in 1923. trustees say that they are informed that "among the American orchestras of the first grade, none of which are self-supporting, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is burdened with the smallest operating deficit." The public is appealed to to give "this Boston institution" its firmest support at the present time.

A gift to the guaranty fund of $1 000 from an anonymous giver is now announced, bringing it up to $15 000. This gift is "In the memory of Henry L. Higginson." The fund however, according to The Boston Transcript, mounts too slowly to meet the deficit, which now stands at $6 000.

Because the Boston audience that heard Arthur Bliss' "Color Symphony" did not applaud vigorously H. T. P., in The Boston Transcript not at all satisfied. He thinks it was "an audience afraid of itself"; seemed to him to be saying to itself "Safety first." "It must have been interested; it should have been engrossed, enkindled." He intimates that it did not applaud because it was "not quite prudent" to applaud "a new man with a new voice." But what if it were an audience not afraid to indicate, in the polite American way that it did not like the "new voice"? If it had the courage to think that even a modernist was writing mere noise, sounds that were not justified, and to express its disapproval that it had opinions of its own, as Mr. Parker had of his own, and even at the risk of public reprimand in The Transcript was determined to retain them? It is barely possible.

CLIPPING FROM THE STER
ST 1924

ON SYMPHONY AT MECHANICS

After an absence of three years, the Boston Symphony orchestra is to return to Worcester to give a concert in Mechanics hall, Tuesday evening, Feb. 12. The event will be one of the most important in the Worcester season, not only on account of the orchestra, which is considered one of the very finest of its kind in the world, but because this is the farewell season of Pierre Monteux as its conductor.

Pierre Monteux appeared here at the head of the orchestra in his first two seasons—1920 and 1921. Now completing his five-year term, he is generally said to have brought the quality of the performances to the highest degree of marvelous perfection, rivaling its eloquence in any past season of its long and illustrious history. There is considerable regret at the pending departure of this most distinguished of French conductors.

He first came to America at the head of Diaghileff's Ballet Russe, having won much fame in the Old World as conductor of the principal orchestras of Paris and in the larger opera houses of Europe. He was particularly noted for the Concerts Monteux at the Paris Casino, and likewise for his conducting of the Ballet Russe, with which he toured Europe before coming here. Previous to his present post, he was the French conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York.

It is as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, however, that he is considered to have reached the highest degree of his executive and interpretative genius. The program which Pierre Monteux is preparing for Worcester will be of the highest beauty and brilliance and likewise have popular appeal.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

FROM THE STER
UNION
2 1924

ement published i
of the subscribers
ving cover its an-
Boston Symphony
its financial reree seasons. From
t the deficit was re-
000 in 1921 to $87,- $83,000 in 1923.
nent fund reduces figures. At the same
paid have risen from
,000. The gross in-
erts have risen from
to $423,000 in 1923.
y that they are in-nong the American
first grade, none o
upporting, the Bosto chestra is burdene
st operating deficit.
appealed to to giv
stitution". Its firmes present time.
guaranty fund of $10,
nonymous giver is no
aging it $150
is "In the memory
igginson." The fu ding to The Bos
nts too slowly to m
ch now stands at $6

Boston audience th
Bliss' "Color Sy
ot applaud vigorous
e Boston Transcript
ied. He thinks it w
afraid of itself";
to be saying to it
"It must have bee
hould have been en dled." He intimate pplaud because it was dent" to applaud "a a new voice." Bu
an audience not afraid
the polite American
d not like the "new
the courage to think odernist was writing
ds that were not justi
press its disapproval
ons of its own, as Mr.
his own, and even at lic reprimand in The determined to retain ely possible.

FROM THE STER
S.
ST 1924

MPHONY
CHANICS

of three years,
orchestra is to
give a concert
uesday evening,
will be one of the Worcester
account of the considered one
its kind in the
this is the fare-Monteux as its peared here at stra in his first nd 1921. Now ear term, he is ve brought the mances to the rvelous perfec-
quence in any
and illustrious considerable re-departure of this
of French con-
America at the Ballet Russe, hav-
in the Old World
principal orches-
the larger opera
was particularly Monteux at likewise for his Russe, with before com-his present conductor at House in New
the Boston
wever, that reached the xecutive and he program is preparing the highest and likewise

PROVIDENCE
RHODE ISLAND
TRIBUNE

JAN 13 1924

JEAN BEDETTI

Soloist With the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Infantry Hall, Jan. 22

PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE PROVIDENCE
R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 13 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY WILL HOLD THIRD CONCERT HERE JAN. 22

Soloist of Evening Will be Jean Bedetti, 'Cello Leader.

The programme is announced for the third appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Providence this season in Infantry Hall, Tuesday evening, Jan. 22.

The soloist will be Jean Bedetti, the famous leader of the 'cello section in the orchestra, who came from Europe, where he had held a high reputation, to take this post three years ago, and who is ranked as one of the foremost 'cello virtuosos in America. He will appear in Schumann's beautiful concerto for that instrument.

Pierre Monteux will open the programme with Schubert's immortal symphony in C major, the score which is considered by many the master work of this composer, and which has not been performed by this orchestra in Providence for a number of seasons.

There will be a diversion in two numbers from Ravel's fantastic suite, "Mother Goose," namely, "The Conversations of Beauty and the Beast" and "Laideronette, Empress of the Pagodas." The evening will close with Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE
RHODE ISLAND
TRIBUNE

JAN 13 1924

Third Boston Symphony Program

With Jean Bedetti as the soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its third visit to Providence to give a concert in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, Jan. 22. This illustrious cellist, who leads the corresponding section of the orchestra and is perhaps the finest virtuoso of the instrument that has ever been a member of this organization, will be heard on this occasion in the Concerto of Schumann, which is particularly noted for its beautiful slow movement.

The symphony of the evening will be that of Schubert in C minor, the divinely beautiful score which many consider this composer's masterpiece and which, as it happens, has not been performed by this orchestra in Providence for many seasons.

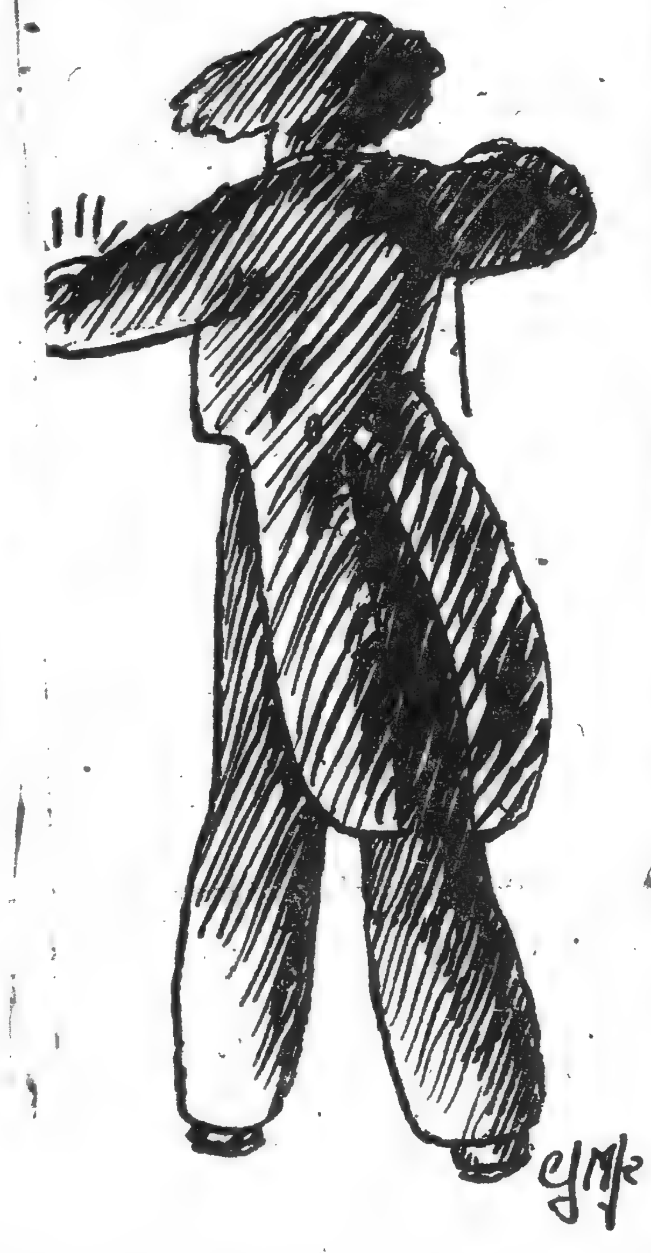
There will be a diversion in two numbers from Ravel's fantastic suite, "Mother Goose," namely, "The Conversations of Beauty and the Beast" and "Laideronette, Empress of the Pagodas." The evening will close with Wagner's "Flying Dutchman," overture.

BROOKLYN
NEW YORK
EAGLE

JAN 13 1924

Back Views of Famous Conductors

Our friend the artist sat with us to hear the Boston Symphony. Being a very fastidious fellow, he had inquired in advance whether the program included any of Strawinsky's or Schoenberg's music. We assured him no and were rewarded with the sketch reproduced on this page and which he drew on his program to the intense annoyance of the dowager in the seat across the aisle, with whose esthetic enjoyment of a Schumann symphony the pencil scratching interfered. But art brooks no interference and the sketching went on.



As George Jean Nathan has said, the trivial may often inspire the great, and so it is that our friend the artist's sketch inspired us to meditations on the linear perspectives of various of our long-distance friends in the Conductors' Union. As will be gleaned from the accompanying sketch, M. Monteux's is an imposing facade. One could not mistake it for another—it is unique. Henry Hadley boasts of no such individual line—we have often remarked the resemblance of the American to Van Hoogstraten.

Mr. Van Hoogstraten is more persuasive in gesture—he seems to coax music from his men and one almost expects to see him reach out a handful of little sugar lumps.

Mengelberg (we go down the list) is the actor-manager of the clan. We have been told that his every gesture is a studied one, so that nothing will disturb the synthesis of music and motion for which he strives. All this smacks somewhat of preciousness, but Mr. Mengelberg is above our petty insinuations.

Next is Stokowski, the Romeo of the conductors, who woos the Muse with such evident success. Mr. Stokowski is less picturesque than Mengelberg but he is esthetically as satisfactory.

Mr. Damrosch does not always present a back view to the audience. We suspect that Walter has some complex with politeness at its base. At a recent concert in Brooklyn he incontinently turned to the audience with gestures inferring that it might join in the performance of Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony. And Mr. Damrosch has been known to vocalize. In fact, his is a decided failing for words. Not content is the conductor of the New York Symphony to let the orchestra speak for itself, but he must needs descend the Olympian heights of the conductor's platform to the keyboard of a piano for a verbal tete-a-tete with his audience.

But Mr. Damrosch presents an aristocratic and formidable back, without Latin or Teutonic grace of movement. Those in the audience who find the music of the modernists too tediously old-fashioned may in the future spend their time comparing fashions in conductors as displayed by the tailor's and barber's art.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE ST. PAUL
MINN.
PIONEER PRESS

JAN 13 1924

of the best nights of the German season.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The second afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place. The program comprised Brahms' "Tragic Overture," Arthur Bliss' "Color Symphony," Mozart's E flat violin concerto and the first series of orchestral fragments from the "Daphnis and Chloe" of Maurice Ravel. The violinist was Jacques Thibaud, the distinguished French artist, long and favorably known to the public.

The novelty of the concert was Mr. Bliss' composition, which was first performed at a festival of the Three Choirs at Gloucester, England, on September 7, 1922. It is not a red, white and blue symphony. The composer has made no attempt to translate the painter's palette into terms of tone. He has done just what any sane musician might be expected to do, namely, to give his fancy free rein amid the suggestions offered by the things colors are supposed to represent.

The first movement unfolds itself from the associations of purple, "the color of amethysts, pageantry, royalty and death." The second movement treats of red, "the color of rubies, wine, revelry, furnaces, courage and magic"—a "tall order" as a British commentator remarked on the purpose of "also sprach Zarathustra." The third or scherzo represents blue, "the color of sapphires, deep water skies, loyalty and melancholy," and the finale deals with green, the color of "emeralds, hope, joy, youth, spring and victory."

Several things may be said for Mr. Bliss: The most important is that although he is modern the diatonic scale has no terrors for him nor is he in the least perturbed in the presence of a tune.

His symphony is melodious throughout and there is among his theatic ideas a finely drawn kinship which gives his four movements a family resemblance. We should say that the family came from Ireland, that the purple was on the heather somewhere around the Bog of Allen, the red on the peaks of the Mournes, the blue in the eyes of the coleens and the green in the emerald all over the country. The composition has originality which betrays no sign of painful effort. The melodic idiom is apparently natural to the man, and his spontaneous and unaffected use of modern harmoniees is delightful.

There is no profundity of development, although there is a burst of jocund counterpoint in the wood wind in the second subject of the finale. But on the whole Mr. Bliss sings his way quite irresponsibly through the compositions ignoring the authority of the fathers and the appetites of the concertgoers with equal self-assurance.

It is always pleasant to behold a young man who apes no one and carries himself with a fine air of confidence, yet holds something in his soul that clamors for utterance and can be uttered without offense except to the aged who dislike the disturbing sounds of progress and wish only to be left alone with their memories. Mr. Bliss has not overset the seven hills nor has he created an epoch, but he has written an interesting and stimulating symphony quite worth hearing and capable of stirring up the smoldering embers of a damply burning season. The work was very well performed by the gentlemen of Boston under the careful guidance of Mr. Monteux.

Mr. Thibaud played Mozart as if he enj play h

they baud' puri bowl his conc atte beau prett heard (Copyri

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE PROVIDENCE
R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 13 1924

08-69

Trench the r Story a Violinist published in

* * *

Jean Bedetti, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 'cello section, will be the soloist at the third symphony concert of the season on Tuesday, Jan. 22, in Infantry Hall. He will take the solo part in the concerto by Schumann for 'cello, which is particularly noted for its beautiful slow movement. Mr. Monteux will present as his feature number Schubert's immortal symphony in C-major, which has not been performed here for a number of seasons by the Boston players. There will also be two numbers from Ravel's "Mother Goose" Suite, "The Conversations of Beauty and the Best," and "Laideronette Empress of the Pagodas." The final number is Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WORCESTER
MASSACHUSETTS
GAZETTE

JAN 26 1924

Boston Symphony Play Here Feb

A program of remarkable i and brilliance will be presen the Boston Symphony Orches its concert to be given in Mec hall on Tuesday evening, Fe 12th.

The symphony will be the Sev of Beethoven in A major, one of grandest in conception and certa the most impelling by its rhyth sweep of the immortal Nine. divine Allegretto of this symphon as famous as any measures of B thoven.

The modern German school will represented by Richard Strauss's to poem "Death and Tranfiguration."

Debussy's two nocturnes, "Cloud and "Festivals", will also be p sented.

JAN 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FAREWELL TOUR UNDER MONTEUX

After Absence of Three Years, Boston Symphony To Appear In Mechanics Hall, Worcester, Feb. 12

104 MUSICIANS

After an absence of three year the Boston Symphony Orchestra 104 musicians is to return to Wo cester to give a concert in Mechanic Hall Tuesday evening, Februar 12th. The event will be one of th most important in the Worceste season, not only on account of th Orchestra, which is considered on of the very finest of its kind in th world, but because this is the fare well season of Pierre Montenx a its conductor.

Pierre Monteux appeared here a the head of the Orchestra in hi first two seasons -1920 and 192 Now completing his five year ter he is generally said to have broug the quality of the performance the highest degree of marvelous p fection, rivaling its eloquence in a past season of its long and illustr ous history. There is considerab regret at the pending departure this most distinguished of Fren conductors, particularly since he tends to return to his own count He first came to America at t head of Diaghileff's Ballet Rus having won much fame in the O World as conductor of the prin pal orchestras of Paris and in t larger opera houses of Europe.

He was particularly noted for the Concerts Monteux at the Paris Casino, and likewise for his conducting of the Ballet Russe, over which he

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

JAN 24 1924

Worcester Mass

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FAREWELL TOUR UNDER MONTEUX

After Absence of Three Years, Boston Symphony To Appear In Mechanics Hall, Worcester, Feb. 12

104 MUSICIANS

After an absence of three years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 104 musicians is to return to Worcester to give a concert in Mechanics February

red Europe before coming here. vious to his present post, he was French conductor at the Metlitan Opera House in New York as conductor of the Boston hony Orchestra, however, that is considered to have reached highest degree of his executive interpretative genius.

erre Monteux has prepared a ble programme for the opening ert. It will include Beethoven's th Symphony in A major, ard Strauss' tone poem "Death Transfiguration," Debussy's rne's "Clouds" and "Festi-, and Wagner's Overture to nhauser."

il orders for this concert are received at Symphony Hall, n. The public sale will open week.

DICAL COURSE

having won much fame in the Ol World as conductor of the princ pal orchestras of Paris and in th larger opera houses of Europe.

He was particularly noted for th Concerts Monteux at the Paris Ca ino, and likewise for his conductin of the Ballet Russe, over which h toured Europe before coming here Previous to his present post, he w the French conductor at the M ropolitan Opera House in New Yo It is as conductor of the Bosto Symphony Orchestra, however, th he is considered to have rea the highest degree of his execu and interpretative genius.

Pierre Monteux has prepared notable programme for the open concert. It will include Beethoven Seventh Symphony in A maj Richard Strauss' tone poem "De and Transfiguration," Deb Nocturne's "Clouds" and vals", and Wagner's Overtu "Tannhauser."

Mail orders for this conce being received at Symphony Boston. The public sale wil next week.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WORCESTER
MASSACHUSETTS
GAZETTE

JAN 25 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Boston Symphony orchestra of 104 pieces comes to Worcester for a concert in Mechanics hall Tuesday evening, Feb. 12. This is the first visit of the orchestra since 1921 and will be the farewell appearance of Conductor Pierre Monteux. The program is carefully selected. It opens with Beethoven's Symphony No. 7, in A major, a composition that stands with the fifth and ninth in the grandeur of its conception. The second number is Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration," a tone poem. Following is Debussey's nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," and closes with Wagner's Overture to "Tannhauser."

A public sale of seats will open in Worcester Feb. 1.

Revy of Pretty Girls

INFORMATION OBSCURED

FROM THE STER
UNION 21924 ement published in

of the subscribers
ping cover its an-
Boston Symphony
its financial rehree seasons. From
t the deficit was re-
000 in 1921 to $87,- $83,000 in 1923.
ment fund reduces figures. At the same
paid have risen from
000. The gross in-
erts have risen from
to $423,000 in 1923.
that they are inmong the American first grade, none of upporting, the Boston hestra is burdened ost operating deficit.
appealed to to give stitution" its firmest
present time.
guaranty fund of $10,
onymous giver is no
ging it $150
is "in the memory
ginson." The fun ding to The Bos
nts too slowly to m
ch now stands at $6

Boston audience th
Bliss' "Color Sy
ot applaud vigorous
e Boston Transcript
led. He thinks it w
afraid of itself";
to be saying to it
"It must have bee
hould have been en
dled." He intimates pplaud because it was
dent" to applaud "a new voice." But
An audience not afraid
the polite American
not like the "new
the courage to think modernist was writing
ds that were not justi
press its disapproval;
ons of its own, as Mr.
his own, and even at
lic reprimand in The determined to retain
ely possible.

FROM THE STER
S.
ST

1924

MPHONY
CHANICS

of three years,
orchestra is to o give a concert
uesday evening,
will be one of
the Worcester
account of the considered one
its kind in the
this is the fare-Monteux as its

ppeared here at estra in his first and 1921. Now year term, he is ve brought the rmances to the rvelous perfec-
quence in any
and illustrious considerable re-
departure of this
of French con-

America at the Ballet Russe, hav-
in the Old World
principal orches-
the larger opera
was particularly Monteux at
likewise for his Russe, with before com-
his present conductor at House in New

the Boston
owever, that reached the xecutive and
The program
is preparing the highest and likewise

PROVIDENCE
RHODE ISLAND
TRIBUNE

JAN 13 1924

JEAN BEDETTI

Soloist With the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Infantry Hall, Jan. 22

PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

PROVIDENCE
R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 13 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY WILL HOLD THIRD CONCERT HERE JAN. 22

Soloist of Evening Will be Jean Bedetti, 'Cello Leader.

The programme is announced for the third appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Providence this season in Infantry Hall, Tuesday evening, Jan. 22.

The soloist will be Jean Bedetti, the famous leader of the 'cello section in the orchestra, who came from Europe, where he had held a high reputation, to take this post three years ago, and who is ranked as one of the foremost 'cello virtuosos in America. He will appear in Schumann's beautiful concerto for that instrument.

Pierre Monteux will open the programme with Schubert's immortal symphony in C major, the score which is considered by many the master work of this composer, and which has not been performed by this orchestra in Providence for a number of seasons.

There will be a diversion in two numbers from Ravel's fantastic suite, "Mother Goose," namely, "The Conversations of Beauty and the Beast" and "Laideronette, Empress of the Pagodas." The evening will close with Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PROVIDENCE
RHODE ISLAND
TRIBUNE

JAN 13 1924

Third Boston Symphony Program

With Jean Bedetti as the soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its third visit to Providence to give a concert in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, Jan. 22. This illustrious 'cellist, who leads the corresponding section of the orchestra and is perhaps the finest virtuoso of the instrument that has ever been a member of this organization, will be heard on this occasion in the Concerto of Schumann, which is particularly noted for its beautiful slow movement.

The symphony of the evening will be that of Schubert in C minor, the divinely beautiful score which many consider this composer's masterpiece and which, as it happens, has not been performed by this orchestra in Providence for many seasons.

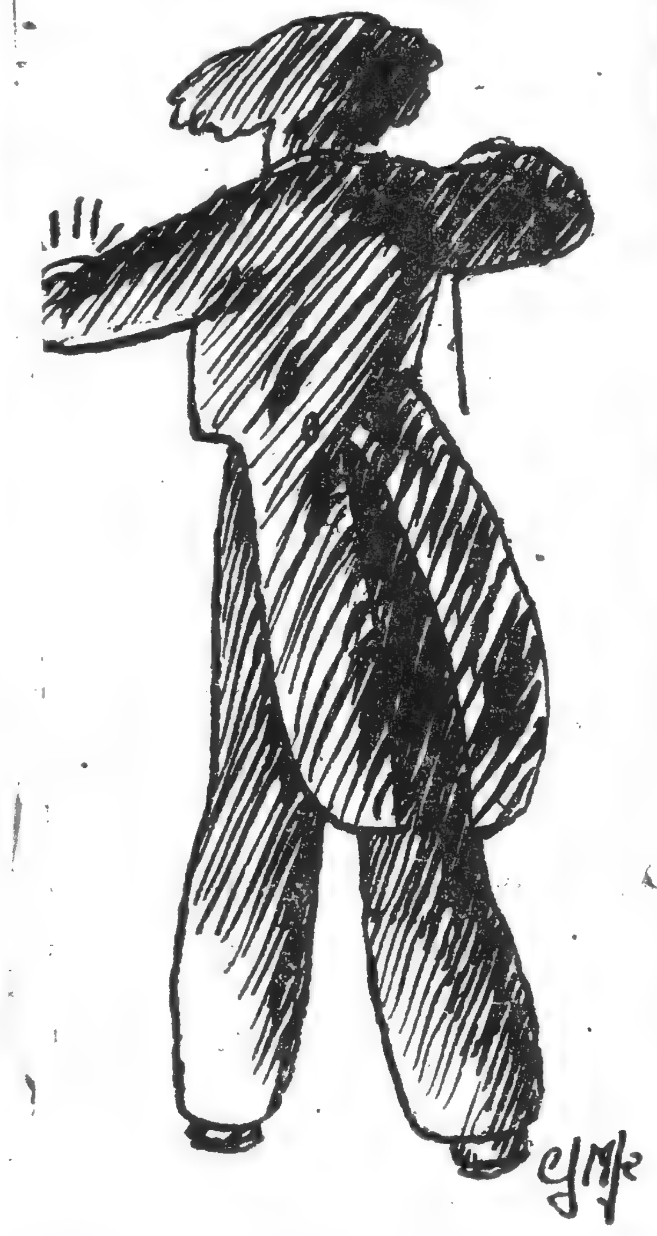
There will be a diversion in two numbers from Ravel's fantastic suite, "Mother Goose," namely, "The Conversations of Beauty and the Beast" and "Laideronette, Empress of the Pagodas." The evening will close with Wagner's "Flying Dutchman," overture.

BROOKLYN
NEW YORK
EAGLE

JAN 13

Back Views of Famous Conductors

Our friend the artist sat with us to hear the Boston Symphony. Being a very fastidious fellow, he had inquired in advance whether the program included any of Strawinsky's or Schoenberg's music. We assured him no and were rewarded with the sketch reproduced on this page and which he drew on his program to the intense annoyance of the dowager in the seat across the aisle, with whose esthetic enjoyment of a Schumann symphony the pencil scratching interfered. But art brooks no interference and the sketching went on.



As George Jean Nathan has said, the trivial may often inspire the great, and so it is that our friend the artist's sketch inspired us to meditations on the linear perspectives of various of our long-distance friends in the Conductors' Union. As will be gleaned from the accompanying sketch, M. Monteux's is an imposing facade. One could not mistake it for another—it is unique. Henry Hadley boasts of no such individual line—we have often remarked the resemblance of the American to Van Hoogstraten.

Mr. Van Hoogstraten is more persuasive in gesture—he seems to coax music from his men and one almost expects to see him reach out a handful of little sugar lumps.

Mengelberg (we go down the list) is the actor-manager of the clan. We have been told that his every gesture is a studied one, so that nothing will disturb the synthesis of music and motion for which he strives. All this smacks somewhat of preciousness, but Mr. Mengelberg is above our petty insinuations.

Next is Stokowski, the Romeo of the conductors, who woos the Muse with such evident success. Mr. Stokowski is less picturesque than Mengelberg but he is esthetically as satisfactory.

Mr. Damrosch does not always present a back view to the audience. We suspect that Walter has some complex with politeness at its base. At a recent concert in Brooklyn he incontinently turned to the audience with gestures inferring that it might join in the performance of Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony. And Mr. Damrosch has been known to vocalize. In fact, his is a decided failing for words. Not content is the conductor of the New York Symphony to let the orchestra speak for itself, but he must needs descend the Olympian heights of the conductor's platform to the keyboard of a piano for a verbal tete-a-tete with his audience.

But Mr. Damrosch presents an aristocratic and formidable back, without Latin or Teutonic grace of movement. Those in the audience who find the music of the modernists too tediously old-fashioned may in the future spend their time comparing fashions in conductors as displayed by the tailor's and barber's art.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

ST. PAUL
MINN.
PIONEER PRESS

JAN 13 1924

of the best nights of the German son.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The second afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place. The program comprised Brahms' "Tragic Overture," Arthur Bliss' "Color Symphony," Mozart's E flat violin concerto and the first series of orchestral fragments from the "Daphnis and Chloe" of Maurice Ravel. The violinist was Jacques Thibaud, the distinguished French artist, long and favorably known to the public.

The novelty of the concert was Mr. Bliss' composition, which was first performed at a festival of the Three Choirs at Gloucester, England, on September 7, 1922. It is not a red, white and blue symphony. The composer has made no attempt to translate the painter's palette into terms of tone. He has done just what any sane musician might be expected to do, namely, to give his fancy free rein amid the suggestions offered by the things colors are supposed to represent.

The first movement unfolds itself from the associations of purple, "the color of amethysts, pageantry, royalty and death." The second movement treats of red, "the color of rubies, wine, revelry, furnaces, courage and magic"—a "tall order" as a British commentator remarked on the purpose of "also sprach Zarathustra." The third or scherzo represents blue "the color of sapphires, deep water skies, loyalty and melancholy," and the finale deals with green, the color of "emeralds, hope, joy, youth, spring and victory."

Several things may be said for Mr. Bliss: The most important is that although he is modern the diatonic scale has no terrors for him nor is he in the least perturbed in the presence of a tune.

His symphony is melodious throughout and there is among his theatic ideas a finely drawn kinship which gives his four movements a family resemblance. We should say that the family came from Ireland, that the purple was on the heather somewhere around the Bog of Allen, the red on the peaks of the Mournes, the blue in the eyes of the coleens and the green in the emerald all over the country. The composition has originality which betrays no sign of painful effort. The melodic idiom is apparently natural to the man, and his spontaneous and unaffected use of modern harmoniees is delightful.

There is no profundity of development, although there is a burst of jocund counterpoint in the wood wind in the second subject of the finale. But on the whole Mr. Bliss sings his way quite irresponsibly through the compositions ignoring the authority of the fathers and the appetites of the concertgoers with equal self-assurance.

It is always pleasant to behold a young man who apes no one and carries himself with a fine air of confidence, yet holds something in his soul that clamors for utterance and can be uttered without offense except to the aged who dislike the disturbing sounds of progress and wish only to be left alone with their memories. Mr. Bliss has not overset the seven hills nor has he created an epoch, but he has written an interesting and stimulating symphony quite worth hearing and capable of stirring up the smoldering embers of a damply burning season. The work was very well performed by the gentlemen of Boston under the careful guidance of Mr. Monteux.

Mr. Thibaud played Mozart as if he enj play h they baud' puri bowi his conc atte beau prett heare (Copyri

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

PROVIDENCE
R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 13 1924

08-69

Trenches the War Story of a Violinist published in

* * *

Jean Bedetti, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 'cello section, will be the soloist at the third symphony concert of the season on Tuesday, Jan. 22, in Infantry Hall. He will take the solo part in the concerto by Schumann for 'cello, which is particularly noted for its beautiful slow movement. Mr. Monteux will present as his feature number Schubert's immortal symphony in C-major, which has not been performed here for a number of seasons by the Boston players. There will also be two numbers from Ravel's "Mother Goose" Suite, "The Conversations of Beauty and the Best," and "Laideronette Empress of the Pagodas." The final number is Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM

WORCESTER
MASSACHUSETTS
GAZETTE

JAN 26 1924

Boston Symphony Play Here Feb

A program of remarkable in and brilliance will be presen the Boston Symphony Orches its concert to be given in Mec hall on Tuesday evening, Fe 12th.

The symphony will be the Sev of Beethoven in A major, one of grandest in conception and certa the most impelling by its rhyth sweep of the immortal Nine. divine Allegretto of this symphon as famous as any measures of B thoven.

The modern German school will represented by Richard Strauss's to poem "Death and Tranfiguration." Debussy's two nocturnes, "Cloud and "Festivals", will also be p sented.

JAN 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FAREWELL TOUR UNDER MONTEUX

After Absence of Three Years, Boston Symphony To Appear In Mechanics Hall, Worcester, Feb. 12

104 MUSICIANS

After an absence of three years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 104 musicians is to return to Worcester to give a concert in Mechanics Hall Tuesday evening, February 12th. The event will be one of the most important in the Worcester season, not only on account of the Orchestra, which is considered one of the very finest of its kind in the world, but because this is the farewell season of Pierre Montenx as its conductor.

Pierre Monteux appeared here at the head of the Orchestra in his first two seasons -1920 and 1921. Now completing his five year term he is generally said to have brought the quality of the performance to the highest degree of marvelous perfection, rivaling its eloquence in any past season of its long and illustrious history. There is considerable regret at the pending departure of this most distinguished of French conductors, particularly since he intends to return to his own country. He first came to America at the head of Diaghileff's Ballet Russe having won much fame in the Old World as conductor of the principal orchestras of Paris and in the larger opera houses of Europe.

He was particularly noted for the Concerts Monteux at the Paris Casino, and likewise for his conducting of the Ballet Russe, over which he

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

28

JAN 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FAREWELL TOUR UNDER MONTEUX

After Absence of Three Years, Boston Symphony To Appear In Mechanics Hall, Worcester, Feb. 12

104 MUSICIANS

After an absence of three years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 104 musicians is to return to Worcester to give a concert in Mechanics February

red Europe before coming here. vious to his present post, he was French conductor at the Metlitan Opera House in New York as conductor of the Boston hony Orchestra, however, that is considered to have reached highest degree of his executive interpretative genius.

ierre Monteux has prepared a ble programme for the opening rt. It will include Beethoven's th Symphony in A major, ard Strauss' tone poem "Death Transfiguration," Debussy's rne's "Clouds" and "Festi-, and Wagner's Overture to nhauser."

il orders for this concert are received at Symphony Hall, n. The public sale will open week.

DICAL COURSE

having won much fame in the Old World as conductor of the princi pal orchestras of Paris and in the larger opera houses of Europe.

He was particularly noted for the Concerts Monteux at the Paris Casino, and likewise for his conducting of the Ballet Russe, over which he toured Europe before coming here. Previous to his present post, he was the French conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York. It is as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, however, that he is considered to have reached the highest degree of his executive and interpretative genius.

Pierre Monteux has prepared a notable programme for the opening concert. It will include Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A major, Richard Strauss' tone poem "Death and Transfiguration," Debussy's Nocturne's "Clouds" and "Festivals", and Wagner's Overture to "Tannhauser."

Mail orders for this concert are being received at Symphony Hall, Boston. The public sale will open next week.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

WORCESTER
MASSACHUSETTS
GAZETTE

JAN 25 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Boston Symphony orchestra of 104 pieces comes to Worcester for a concert in Mechanics hall Tuesday evening, Feb. 12. This is the first visit of the orchestra since 1921 and will be the farewell appearance of Conductor Pierre Monteux. The program is carefully selected. It opens with Beethoven's Symphony No. 7, in A major, a composition that stands with the fifth and ninth in the grandeur of its conception. The second number is Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration," a tone poem. Following is Debussey's nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," and closes with Wagner's Overture to "Tannhauser."

A public sale of seats will open in Worcester Feb. 1.

Bevy of Pretty Girls

INFORMATION OBSCURED

FROM THE STER
UNION

2 1924

ment published t
the subscribers
ing cover its a
Boston Symphony
its financial re
ree seasons. From the deficit was re
00 in 1921 to $37
$33,000 in 1923
ent fund reduces a igures. At the same aid have risen from 00. The gross in rts have risen from
to $423,000 in 1923
that they are in ong the American
first grade; none o
pporting, the Boston
estra is burdene operating deficit appealed to to g itution" its firmest resent time.
guaranty fund of $10 nymous giver is no
ging its ... $150
s "In the memory kinson." The fu
ing to The Bos
nts too slowly to m
now stands at $6

Boston audience th
Bliss' "Color Sy
applaud vigorous Boston Transcript
d. He thinks it w
fraid of itself";
be saying to it
"It must have bee
ould have been en led." He intimates plaud because it was ent" to applaud "a new voice." Bu audience not afraid he polite American not like the "new
the courage to think ealist was writing that were not justi ess its disapproval
s of its own, as Mr.
own, and even at reprimand in The termined to retain y possible.

ROM THE TER

924

PHONY
HANICS

three years, rchestra is to give a concert
sday evening, ill be one of he Worcester count of the nsidered one s kind in the is the fare-Monteux as its ared here at ra in his first 1921. Now term, he is e brought the nances to the velous perfec-uence in any

and illustrious nsiderable re-parture of this French con-

merica at the let Russe, hav-the Old World
incipal orches-he larger opera was particularly Monteux at
likewise for his et Russe, with pe before como his present
h conductor at House in New

the Boston
wever, that reached the cutive and program preparing the highest nd likewise

PROVIDENCE
RHODE ISLAND
TRIBUNE

JAN 13 1924

JEAN BEDETTI

Soloist With the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Infantry Hall, Jan. 22

PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE PROVIDENCE
R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 13 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY WILL HOLD THIRD CONCERT HERE JAN. 22

Soloist of Evening Will be Jean Bedetti, 'Cello Leader.

The programme is announced for the third appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Providence this season in Infantry Hall, Tuesday evening, Jan. 22.

The soloist will be Jean Bedetti, the famous leader of the 'cello section in the orchestra, who came from Europe, where he had held a high reputation, to take this post three years ago, and who is ranked as one of the foremost 'cello virtuosos in America. He will appear in Schumann's beautiful concerto for that instrument.

Pierre Monteux will open the programme with Schubert's immortal symphony in C major, the score which is considered by many the master work of this composer, and which has not been performed by this orchestra in Providence for a number of seasons.

There will be a diversion in two numbers from Ravel's fantastic suite, "Mother Goose," namely, "The Conversations of Beauty and the Beast" and "Laideronette, Empress of the Pagodas." The evening will close with Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE
RHODE ISLAND
TRIBUNE

JAN 13 1924

Third Boston Symphony Program

With Jean Bedetti as the soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its third visit to Providence to give a concert in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, Jan. 22. This illustrious 'cellist, who leads the corresponding section of the orchestra and is perhaps the finest virtuoso of the instrument that has ever been a member of this organization, will be heard on this occasion in the Concerto of Schumann, which is particularly noted for its beautiful slow movement.

The symphony of the evening will be that of Schubert in C-minor, the divinely beautiful score which many consider this composer's masterpiece and which, as it happens, has not been performed by this orchestra in Providence for many seasons.

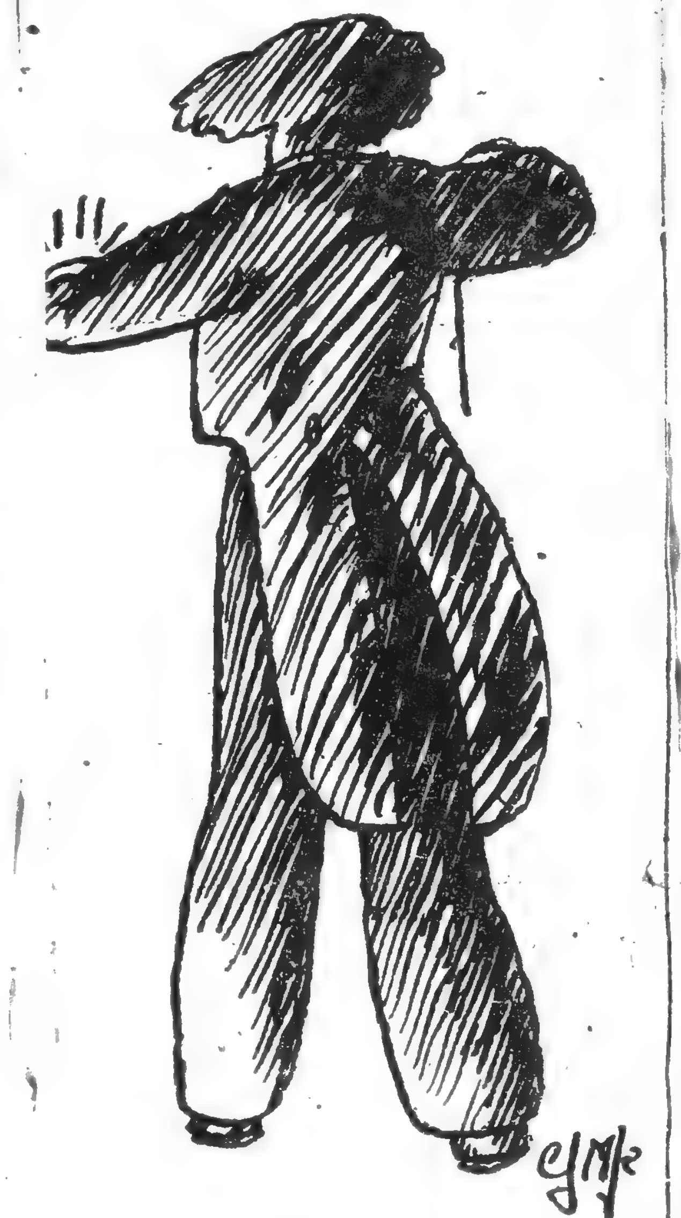
There will be a diversion in two numbers from Ravel's fantastic suite, "Mother Goose," namely, "The Conversations of Beauty and the Beast" and "Laideronette, Empress of the Pagodas." The evening will close with Wagner's "Flying Dutchman," overture.

BROOKLYN
NEW YORK
EAGLE

JAN 13

Back Views of Famous Conductors

Our friend the artist sat with us to hear the Boston Symphony. Being a very fastidious fellow, he had inquired in advance whether the program included any of Strawinsky's or Schoenberg's music. We assured him no and were rewarded with the sketch reproduced on this page and which he drew on his program to the intense annoyance of the dowager in the seat across the aisle, with whose esthetic enjoyment of a Schumann symphony the pencil scratching interfered. But art brooks no interference and the sketching went on.



As George Jean Nathan has said, the trivial may often inspire the great, and so it is that our friend the artist's sketch inspired us to meditations on the linear perspectives of various of our long-distance friends in the Conductors' Union. As will be gleaned from the accompanying sketch, M. Monteux's is an imposing facade. One could not mistake it for another—it is unique. Henry Hadley boasts of no such individual line—we have often remarked the resemblance of the American to Van Hoogstraten.

Mr. Van Hoogstraten is more persuasive in gesture—he seems to coax music from his men and one almost expects to see him reach out a handful of little sugar lumps.

Mengelberg (we go down the list) is the actor-manager of the clan. We have been told that his every gesture is a studied one, so that nothing will disturb the synthesis of music and motion for which he strives. All this smacks somewhat of preciousness, but Mr. Mengelberg is above our petty insinuations.

Next is Stokowski, the Romeo of the conductors, who woos the Muse with such evident success. Mr. Stokowski is less picturesque than Mengelberg but he is esthetically as satisfactory.

Mr. Damrosch does not always present a back view to the audience. We suspect that Walter has some complex with politeness at its base. At a recent concert in Brooklyn he incontinently turned to the audience with gestures inferring that it might join in the performance of Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony. And Mr. Damrosch has been known to vocalize. In fact, his is a decided failing for words. Not content is the conductor of the New York Symphony to let the orchestra speak for itself, but he must needs descend the Olympian heights of the conductor's platform to the keyboard of a piano for a verbal tete-a-tete with his audience.

But Mr. Damrosch presents an aristocratic and formidable back, without Latin or Teutonic grace of movement. Those in the audience who find the music of the modernists too tediously old-fashioned may in the future spend their time comparing fashions in conductors as displayed by the tailor's and barber's art.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE ST. PAUL
MINN.
PIONEER PRESS

JAN 13 1924

of the best lights of the German season.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The second afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place. The program comprised Brahms' "Tragic Overture," Arthur Bliss' "Color Symphony," Mozart's E flat violin concerto and the first series of orchestral fragments from the "Daphnis and Chloe" of Maurice Ravel. The violinist was Jacques Thibaud, the distinguished French artist, long and favorably known to the public.

The novelty of the concert was Mr. Bliss' composition, which was first performed at a festival of the Three Choirs at Gloucester, England, on September 7, 1922. It is not a red, white and blue symphony. The composer has made no attempt to translate the painter's palette into terms of tone. He has done just what any sane musician might be expected to do, namely, to give his fancy free rein amid the suggestions offered by the things colors are supposed to represent.

The first movement unfolds itself from the associations of purple, "the color of amethysts, pageantry, royalty and death." The second movement treats of red, "the color of rubies, wine, revelry, furnaces, courage and magic"—a "tall order" as a British commentator remarked on the purpose of "also sprach Zarathustra." The third or scherzo represents blue, "the color of sapphires, deep water, skies, loyalty and melancholy," and the finale deals with green, the color of "emeralds, hope, joy, youth, spring and victory."

Several things may be said for Mr. Bliss: The most important is that although he is modern the diatonic scale has no terrors for him nor is he in the least perturbed in the presence of a tune.

His symphony is melodious throughout and there is among his theatic ideas a finely drawn kinship which gives his four movements a family resemblance. We should say that the family came from Ireland, that the purple was on the heather somewhere around the Bog of Allen, the red on the peaks of the Mournes, the blue in the eyes of the coleens and the green in the emerald all over the country. The composition has originality which betrays no sign of painful effort. The melodic idiom is apparently natural to the man, and his spontaneous and unaffected use of modern harmoniees is delightful.

There is no profundity of development, although there is a burst of jocund counterpoint in the wood wind in the second subject of the finale. But on the whole Mr. Bliss sings his way quite irresponsibly through the compositions ignoring the authority of the fathers and the appetites of the concertgoers with equal self-assurance.

It is always pleasant to behold a young man who apes no one and carries himself with a fine air of confidence, yet holds something in his soul that clamors for utterance and can be uttered without offense except to the aged who dislike the disturbing sounds of progress and wish only to be left alone with their memories. Mr. Bliss has not overset the seven hills nor has he created an epoch, but he has written an interesting and stimulating symphony quite worth hearing and capable of stirring up the smoldering embers of a damply burning season. The work was very well performed by the gentlemen of Boston under the careful guidance of Mr. Monteux.

Mr. Thibaud played Mozart as if he enj play h
they baud' puri
bowi his conc atte beau
prett heard (Copyri

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE PROVIDENCE
R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 13 1924

869

Trench the War Story of a Violinist published in

* * *

Jean Bedetti, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 'cello section, will be the soloist at the third symphony concert of the season on Tuesday, Jan. 22, in Infantry Hall. He will take the solo part in the concerto by Schumann for 'cello, which is particularly noted for its beautiful slow movement. Mr. Monteux will present as his feature number Schubert's immortal symphony in C-major, which has not been performed here for a number of seasons by the Boston players. There will also be two numbers from Ravel's "Mother Goose" Suite, "The Conversations of Beauty and the Best," and "Laideronette Empress of the Pagodas." The final number is Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

* * *

Marcel D

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WORCESTER
MASSACHUSETTS
GAZETTE

JAN 26 1924

Boston Symphony Play Here Feb

A program of remarkable i and brilliance will be presen the Boston Symphony Orches its concert to be given in Mec hall on Tuesday evening, Fe 12th.

The symphony will be the Sev of Beethoven in A major, one of grandest in conception and certa the most impelling by its rhyth sweep of the immortal Nine. divine Allegretto of this symphon as famous as any measures of B thoven.

The modern German school will represented by Richard Strauss's to poem "Death and Tranfiguration." Debussy's two nocturnes, "Cloud and "Festivals", will also be p sented.

JAN 1924

one of red and white g ham, one of blue and white gingh and one of gray gingham or can It is so much easier to send so one to get a bit of cloth fro blue, red or gray bag, accord the quality of the rag desire.

First, the blue bag should h fine linen pieces, such as th use for mending, bandages a other purposes where old li invaluable. The red bag shou all of the good cotton pieces. have many uses in household omy. The gray bag may be u flannel pieces and others. l spreads, suitable for floor clo rough work. It really does to save rags for a rag-man i days, so few homes boast t mixed rag-bags.

Bags for the kitchen are numerous. Among those in use are cheese-cloth lettuce ery bags, flannel jelly-bags, bags, fish-bags or binders bag for soiled tea-towels. Th is usually made of tea-towe

Laundry-bags vary accor their different uses. Sorting- laundry use are generally of the gathering string or tw 104 musicians is to return to Wor cester to give a concert in Mechanic Hall Tuesday evening, Februar 12th. The event will be one of th most important in the Worceste season, not only on account of th Orchestra, which is considered on of the very finest of its kind in th world, but because this is the fare well season of Pierre Montenx a its conductor.

Pierre Monteux appeared here a the head of the Orchestra in hi first two seasons -1920 and 192 Now completing his five year ter he is generally said to have broug the quality of the performance the highest degree of marvelous pe fection, rivaling its eloquence in a past season of its long and illustr ous history. There is considerab regret at the pending departure this most distinguished of Fren conductors, particularly since he tends to return to his own countr He first came to America at th head of Diaghileff's Ballet Rus having won much fame in the O World as conductor of the prin pal orchestras of Paris and in t larger opera houses of Europe.

He was particularly noted for the Concerts Monteux at the Paris Casino, and likewise for his conducting of the Ballet Russe, over which he

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

JAN 24 1924

Worcester Tel...

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FAREWELL TOUR UNDER MONTEUX

After Absence of Three Years, Boston Symphony To Appear In Mechanics Hall, Worcester, Feb. 12

104 MUSICIANS

After an absence of three years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 104 musicians is to return to Worcester to give a concert in Mechanics Hall Tuesday evening, February 12th. The event will be one of the most important in the Worcester season, not only on account of the Orchestra, which is considered one of the very finest of its kind in the world, but because this is the farewell season of Pierre Montenx as its conductor.

Pierre Monteux appeared here at the head of the Orchestra in his first two seasons -1920 and 1921. Now completing his five year term he is generally said to have brough the quality of the performance to the highest degree of marvelous perfection, rivaling its eloquence in any past season of its long and illustrious history. There is considerable regret at the pending departure of this most distinguished of French conductors, particularly since he intends to return to his own country. He first came to America at the head of Diaghileff's Ballet Russe having won much fame in the Old World as conductor of the principal orchestras of Paris and in the larger opera houses of Europe.

He was particularly noted for the Concerts Monteux at the Paris Casino, and likewise for his conducting of the Ballet Russe, over which he toured Europe before coming here. Previous to his present post, he was the French conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York. It is as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, however, that he is considered to have reached the highest degree of his executive and interpretative genius.

Pierre Monteux has prepared a notable programme for the opening concert. It will include Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A major, Richard Strauss' tone poem "Death and Transfiguration," Debussy's Nocturne's "Clouds" and "Festivals", and Wagner's Overture "Tannhauser."

Mail orders for this concert are being received at Symphony Hall, Boston. The public sale will open next week.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WORCESTER
MASSACHUSETTS
GAZETTE

JAN 25 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Boston Symphony orchestra of 104 pieces comes to Worcester for a concert in Mechanics hall Tuesday evening, Feb. 12. This is the first visit of the orchestra since 1921 and will be the farewell appearance of Conductor Pierre Monteux. The program is carefully selected. It opens with Beethoven's Symphony No. 7, in A major, a composition that stands with the fifth and ninth in the grandeur of its conception. The second number is Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration," a tone poem. Following is Debussey's nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," and closes with Wagner's Overture to "Tannhauser."

A public sale of seats will open in Worcester Feb. 1.

Bevy of Pretty Girls

[180]

Jan 26

TERRIFIC NUMBER BY SYMPHONY

Stravinsky's Daring "Rite of Spring" Well Received

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

At the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon the unexpected happened. As final number on the programme stood Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps," the most daring piece of music yet written in the 20th century, and yesterday performed for the first time in Boston. And it was heard to prolonged applause.

WAS HISSED IN 1913

When this "Rite of Spring," to give the piece its accepted English title, was originally produced as a ballet in Paris on May 29, 1913, there came from the hearers a storm of protest that took the form of hissing, hooting and howls of rage. Even after 10 years this music was still drastic, relentless in its dissonance, savage and uncompromising in its rhythmic emphasis.

That it provoked no audible expression of disapproval yesterday was not surprising. A Boston audience is too decorous to hiss. But altogether unforeseen was the enthusiasm with which Stravinsky's music was received by a not inconsiderable portion of the assembled company. Time and again Mr. Monteux was recalled to the stage, and not until the men of the orchestra had risen from their chairs to bow repeatedly did the clapping finally cease.

Tremendously Difficult

Undoubtedly much of this applause was prompted by the performance itself; and surely such applause was never more richly deserved. The "Sacre du Printemps" is beyond question the most difficult, the most exacting music that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has ever been called upon to play. Stravinsky asks of the players that they do things pronounced impossible by every book upon orchestration; and the rhythmic complexity of the final "Sacrificial Dance" is probably unparalleled in Western music. Rehearsal after rehearsal was needed before every player could be sure of his "entrances." Yet over all these difficulties the orchestra yesterday triumphed.

Not since Mr. Monteux first came to Boston five years ago has he more completely demonstrated his authority as conductor of his mastery over the technique of his trade. And it was Mr. Monteux, it may be remarked in passing, who in Paris conducted the first performance of this formidable music.

Rites in Pagan Russia

As a ballet "La Sacre du Printemps" is a representation of rites in ancient pagan Russia for the inducing of fertility in spring, rites which culminate in the propitatory sacrifie of a "chosen maiden," who must dance herself to death. For this extraordinary scenario Stravinsky has written music altogether appropriate in its elemental strength, its primitive savage force. There is no blinking the fact that some of this music is not pleasant to hear. At times it lacerates the ear. Here and there it causes the listener's flesh to creep. No doubt in a stage performance, however, these more excrutiating passages would make a less concentrated, and hence a less incisive impression.

And there is in Stravinsky's unbelievably complicated score much that, even at first hearing, seems possessed of a rare and penetrating beauty, as, for example, the Introduction to Part II that Stravinsky has named "The Pagan Night," and the "Mysterious Circles of the Adolescents," while for sheer excitement the final episode is unmatched in music. Beside it Electra's dance of triumph in Strauss' opera is but the tooting of a penny whistle.

Regarding the ultimate place of this revolutionary score, it were unwise to hazard an opinion. But only the hidebound would deny that in "Le Sacre du Printemps" we are confronted by the workings of an extraordinary musical personality, and of a tremendous intellectual force.

For the rest of this concert a few words must suffice. Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony in sympathetic performance began it, and before "Le Sacre du Printemps," Marya Freund, hitherto unheard here, sang the pathetic recitative and lament of Ariadne, from Monteverdi's opera of that name, and three songs by Mahler.

Mme. Freund has a voice of agreeable quality; but it is as interpreter rather than as vocalist that she chiefly impressed. Clearly she is a singer of rare intelligence, and she has, besides, the priceless gift of personality.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
WORCESTER
MASS.
POST
JAN 26 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM NOTABLE

Includes Grandest Works of Beethoven and Strauss

A program of remarkable interest and brilliance will be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert to be given in Mechanics Hall on Tuesday evening, Feb. 12. This will be the first visit of the orchestra to Worcester in three years and the farewell appearance here of Pierre Monteux, its celebrated French conductor, who is now completing his engagement.

The symphony will be the Seventh Beethoven in A Major, one of the grandest in conception and certainly the most impelling by its rhythmic sweep of the immortal Nine. The divine allegretto of this symphony is as famous as any measures of Beethoven.

The modern German school will be represented by Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration." The score describes the agony of a man on his deathbed. He finally succumbs and his soul, meeting God, is transfigured. The culmination of the score is such as probably no other contemporary composer could have written.

Debussy's two nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," will also be presented. Pierre Monteux was a friend of this foremost of French composers in the years which preceded his death, and thus at first hand learned to understand the significance of Debussy's music and style. The performance of these nocturnes by the famous orchestra under its French conductor is said to be eloquent in the extreme.

The concert will close with Wagner's popular overture to Tannhäuser.

N. Y.
TIMES
ISSUE OF
JAN 27 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

On Friday evening, in the Academy of Music, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its third concert of the Brooklyn season with Alexander Siloti, the Russian pianist, as the soloist.

Pierre Monteux will conduct Beethoven's famous "Pastoral" Symphony, No. 6, and introduce the first series of excerpts from Maurice Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," which ballot the conductor was the first to perform in Europe at the head of Diaghileff's Ballet Russe. Siloti will appear with the orchestra in Liszt's "Dance of Death," a paraphrase of the "Dies Irae." The concert will close with Dvorak's "Carnival" Overture.

NEW YORK
TIMES
JAN 27 1924

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, played Vincent d'Indy's "Symphony on a Mountaineer Air," with Mr. Schmitz at the piano. The Boston Transcript says: "Wagner had been dead three years when d'Indy wrote this, but it is fresh and vital and shows no sign of age."

TELEGRAM
JAN 2 1924

The Boston Symphony orchestral club, of which Carlos E. Pinfield is leader and first violinist, will play this afternoon in the galleries of the Worcester Art Museum at a concert open to the public. A Tschaikowsky program of

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
AMERICAN
JAN 27 1924

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps"; Sibelius' violin concerto, Richard Burgin, soloist, and Mozart's C major symphony at Carnegie Hall Thursday evening. The programme for the Saturday afternoon concerts includes excerpts from Debussy's "Martyrdom of St. Sebastian"; Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, and Liszt's Danse Macabre.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
JAN 27 1924

SYMPHONY BACKERS TO ASSEMBLE HERE

Orchestra Chiefs of 13 Cities Will Attempt to Solve Problem of Huge Deficits.

INVITED BY C. H. MACKAY

Efforts to Be Made to Strengthen the Financial Situation in Various Communities.

Following visits to New York by thre out-of-town orchestras and a fourth soon to play here, it has become known that a first meeting of financial backers of the great symphony organizations i thirteen American cities will be held here at the invitation of Clarence H Mackay next Saturday. The meeting is for discussion, so the invitations explained, "of all matters of interest t American orchestras at this time." I is expected that the problem of the annual deficits will be taken up and plans laid to remedy the situation.

To Discuss Rival Bidding.

Next Saturday's discussion will b wholly free as to subject, taking whatever direction those present desire o suggest. It is certain that there will b talk of rival bidding for players an conductors, such as in the past ha cost Eastern orchestras many men an $50,000 increases in their own budget for the faithful who remained, whe some of the newer organizations wer forming.

A report yesterday of $70,000 offer to a conductor, not far afield nor u known here, to come to New York, w denied by all concerned. The man me tioned now receives over $40,000, whic was the price the Metropolitan once pa to Toscanini, and it has been announc from his concert platform that M Stokowski accepted Philadelphia's figu at a personal loss. He is at present, are most other leaders, under bindi contract for a term of years.

Mr. Mackay's guests are expected consider how rival city orchestras m "live and let live" in future years. Th will informally, in American parlan "swap hard luck stories" and seek re edies for their difficulties in good Am ican "big business" methods.

Mr. Mackay is the present Chairman of the Board of Directors of the harmonic Society, the oldest orc in this country and the third old the world. He has been South issuing the call for this informal ference to both the chief officer practical business men of the other cal groups.

Final plans await his return to Tuesday or Wednesday and no inf tion of the semi-public meeting ha available at either his offices Postal Telegraph Company, those Philharmonic Society or the M home at 3 East Seventy-fifth From outside the city it was le that the men accepting the invi will meet informally as guests at dinner at Mr. Mackay's home on Saturday night.

Thirteen presiding officers of symphony organizations and thirteen business managers of their orchestras have accepted, according to report from some of their home towns. They will represent, in terms of concert hall box offices, $5,000,000 annual turnover, or nearly twice the gross business of the Metropolitan Opera House. Their common bond will be that each has an average annual deficit of $100,000 a season.

Some of Those to Attend.

Some of those who are expected or will send proxies if unable to attend are W. A. Clark Jr. of Los Angeles, who up to this year had paid $543,000 for the Los Angeles Philharmonic, and is still "carrying on" a six-figure deficit; Elbert I. Carpenter of Minneapolis, where also one man carries the chief financial load; Charles H. Hamill of Chicago, Mr. Murphy of Detroit, Mrs. Charles P. Taft of Cincinnati, John L. Severance of Cleveland and H. H. Flagler of the New York Symphony.

From Rochester, with its youngest of all the big orchestras, will come George Eastman, who has undertaken to run music with "big business" brains and experience. From Philadelphia is Alexander Van Rensselaer, acting in the absence of Edward Bok, largest donor of the recent endowment. Representing Boston is Judge Frederick P. Cabot, the successor of Major Higginson, now wrestling with $95,000 annual difference between expenses and income of the Boston Symphony.

With their chief there have been invited the business managers, who will dine in New York the same evening and will, in event of promising developments, remain to work out any plans adopted by the respective groups. The managers are W. H. Brennan, Boston; Arthur Judson, New York Philharmonic and Philadelphia; George Engles, New York Symphony; Mr. See, Rochester, Mrs. J. W. Darby, Cincinnati; Mrs. Adela Prentiss Hughes, Cleveland; W. E. Walter, Detroit; F. J. Wessels, Chicago; S. E. Macmillen, St. Louis; A. J. Gaines, Minneapolis; Caroline A. Smith, Los Angeles, and A. W. Widenham, San Francisco.

Four of the Middle West orchestras had been reported in the beginning of their current season as planning to "save themselves by a merger." That move, though it came to no definite action, led to much consideration of the common interests of rival touring orchestras having their home bases at Cleveland, Cincinnati, St. Louis and Detroit.

In the case of the New York Symphony Orchestra the need of begging orchestra funds in grudging driblets from a host of promising contributors led Harry Harkness Flagler some years ago to assume personally the entire financial responsibility, leaving to a Board of Directors only questions of artistic policy.

The older Philharmonic Society received $500,000 by bequest of Jose Pulitzer, of wh [illegible] ducing [illegible] give a [illegible] hundre [illegible] year.

Mac [illegible]

At the season's fir [illegible] harmonic directors in [illegible] cent Astor last Fall, [illegible] Frederick A. Juilliard presiding, Chairman Mackay first indicated some of the problems he will now discuss with other orchestra heads. In his report then he emphasized "the great cost of maintaining a symphony orchestra, owing to the high standard demanded." Here, as well as in other cities, adequate financial returns could not be insured without an endowment fund, he said.

"Even with a full attendance at every concert," his report added, "there would still be a considerable deficit." There was a limit to what the public could be charged, he continued, and this had about been reached. Mr. Mackay mentioned the addition of $22,248 to this year's heavy budget through the new union schedule and a $15,000 bonus to a retiring conductor.

The Philharmonic, on Mr. Mackay's taking its chairmanship three years ago, combined with the then National Symphony Orchestra, from which both subscribers and players were recruited to the older band. In this present season's report he announced a further joining forces with the leading interests in the City Symphony Orchestra as "an added source of strength."

An understanding was reached between the Philharmonic and the American Orchestra Society whereby Mrs. E. H. Harriman, founder of that enterprise, is now Chairman of the Philharmonic's educational concerts.

Wallis to Speak in Church

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BROOKLYN
N. Y.
STANDARD UNION
JAN 27 192

Third Brooklyn Concert

The third conc lyn will be given Alexander Siloti, t will open the progr this master's most d of scenes in the coun The first orchestr score of the modern will follow. Mr. Silo Death," a paraphrase o

---

BROOKLYN, N.
N. Y.
CITIZEN
JAN 27 1924

oston Symphony Program, Alexander Siloti Solo

Alexander Siloti, the great Russi pianist, will be the soloist Friday e ning, Feb. 1, at the Academy for t third Boston Symphony concert of t Brooklyn season. Pierre Monteux wi open this concert with Beethoven' "Pastoral" Symphony No. 6, the most distinctly descriptive music which the master ever wrote. A notable score of the modern French school will be the first series of excerpts from Maurice Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," including Nocturne, Interlude, and War-like Dance. This score Pierre Monteux was the first to produce in Europe when he was at the head of Diaghileff's Ballet Russe. Dvorak's "Carnival" Overture will also be played.

The music in which Mr. Siloti will appear with the orchestra is Liszt's "Dance of Death," a paraphrase on the "Dies Irae," a score of astounding brilliance and dramatic qualities, of which Siloti, the great pupil of Liszt, is perhaps the most authentic living interpreter.

JAN 27 1924

The Boston Symphony.

The following programs will be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, on the occasion of its third visit here for a pair of concerts on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall.

At the Thursday concert Mr. Monteux will conduct for the first time in New York a concert variation of Stravinsky's ballet, "The Rites of Spring," a picture of pagan Russia, which is considered one of the most important scores of this Russian composer. The soloist will be Richard Burgin, the concert master of the orchestra, who will play the D minor violin concerto of Sibelius. The symphony, which will open the concert, will be the "Jupiter" of Mozart.

As soloist at the Saturday matinee concert Alexander Siloti, Russian pianist and Liszt pupil, will appear in Liszt's "Dance of Death," a paraphrase on the "Dies Irae." In the second number Mr. Monteux will conduct four symphonic numbers from Debussy's incidental music to D'Annunzio's mystery play, "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian." The numbers are "The Court of the Lilies," "Dance of Ecstasy," "The Passion" and "The Good Shepherd." The symphony which will open the list will be the "Pastoral" of Beethoven.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
JAN 27 1924

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has Alexander Siloti as soloist at the Academy on Friday night in a program from Beethoven, Ravel, Dvorak and Liszt.

Fritz Kreisler will give his annual recital in the Brooklyn Institute series at the Academy on Feb. 5.

Arthur B. Hunt lectures at the Brook-

[181]

NEW YORK
TRIBUNE
JAN 27 1924

Mengelberg Begins Season This Week; Symphony Ends Cycle

Philharmonic, Symphony and State Orchestras Play This Afternoon; Bostonians to Give "Le Sacre du Printemps"

With our local orchestras and [illegible] Boston Symphony in action, there [illegible] be one or more orchestral conce [illegible] every day of this week. Willem Mengelberg will make his first appearance of the season, his fourth in New York (not counting his appearances with the Philharmonic eighteen years ago as one of a series of guest-conductors) and third with the Philharmonic, at that orchestra's next concert at the Metropolitan Opera House on Tuesday evening, with a program of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and numbers by Cherubini, Strauss and Wagner.

Willem van Hoogstraten will end his first regular season with the Philharmonic with this afternoon's concert, with his wife, Elly Ney, as soloist in Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto, and the rest of the program devoted to Brahms. This will make forty-five concerts for his first Philharmonic season; thirty-three in Manhattan, two in Brooklyn and ten on tour; a total, including the forty-two concerts at the Lewisohn Stadium, of eighty-seven concerts under Mr. van Hoogstraten's direction since his arrival last July.

Mr. Mengelberg will conduct [illegible] sixth concert in the students' se [illegible] Wednesday evening, with Albert Sp [illegible] ing as soloist in John Powell's vi [illegible] concerto. This will be its first [illegible] formance in its present form, a [illegible] Powell had recently to rescor [illegible] work, owing to the loss of the o [illegible] manuscript. The remaining stud [illegible] concerts will be given on Wednes [illegible] evenings.

On Thursday evening Mr. Me [illegible] berg will direct the second Ph [illegible] monic membership concert, for [illegible] admission is free to members o [illegible] society, at the Waldorf-Astoria, w [illegible] program devoted to the two Strau [illegible] Richard Strauss's suite, "Le Bour [illegible] Gentilhomme," will be followed b [illegible] hann Strauss's overture to "Die F [illegible] maus" and two waltzes, "Tales [illegible] m the Vienna Woods" and "Wiener [illegible]."

Symphony Society to End Beethoven Cycle

Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra will conclu [illegible] the Beethoven Cycle this week, givi [illegible] the Ninth Symphony, with the cho [illegible] of the Oratorio Society in the final [illegible] The soloists will be Ruth Rodgers, so [illegible] no; Mabel Ritch, contralto; Richard C [illegible] oks, tenor, and Fred Patton, bass [illegible] Mr. Damrosch will conduct.

The Oratorio Society will o [illegible] the program with the unaccompanie [illegible] canon or six voices, "Helpful be, [illegible] Man, noble and good," arranged by M [illegible] Damrosch for solo voices and cho [illegible] s, Albert Stoessel conducting. Harold Bauer will play Beethoven's la [illegible] piano sonato, Op. 111, in C minor, w [illegible] ch, Mr. Damrosch has said, is writte [illegible] in the same transcendental mood as the Ninth Symphony. There will be no postlude.

The New York Symphony will give its eighth Aeolian Hall concert this afternoon, with Pablo Casals as soloist in the Dvorak cello concerto in B minor. Blair Fairchild's Tableau Musi [illegible], "Shah Feridoun," will have its performance here at this concert. The symphonic poem, "North and West," by Howard Hanson, fellow of the American Academy in Rome, will be given for the first time in America next Sunday afternoon, February 3, at Aeolian Hall, where Georges Enesco will be the soloist. This will be Mr. Damrosch's last appearance until the latter part of March, as the intervening concerts will be conducted by Bruno Walter. Mr. Damrosch will conclude this season's series of children's concerts at Carnegie Hall next Saturday morning, February 2.

Percy Grainger will be the soloist at this afternoon's concert of the State Symphony Orchestra at the Metropolitan Opera House in the Grieg concerto, while Mr. Stransky will also lead "Scheherazade" and Wagner numbers. A new work by an American composer, Bernard Rogers's prelude to "The Faithful," will be played by the State Symphony at the Metropolitan next Sunday afternoon, with Ossip Gabrilowitsch as soloist in the Schumann piano concerto. The symphony will be the Tchaikovsky "Pathetique."

The last Wednesday afternoon concert of the State Symphony this season, on February 6 at Carnegie Hall, will be devoted to Saint-Saëns, with three symphonic poems, "Phaeton," "Rouet d'Omphale" and "Danse Macabre," and the Second Symphony, in A minor, and the ballet music from "Samson et Dalila." Horace Britt, first cellist of the orchestra, will play the cello concerto, and Helen Stanley, soprano, will sing the arias "Catherine," from "Henry VIII," and "O mon beau rêve," from "Etienne Marcel."

Visiting Orchestras To Play Stravinsky

Igor Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps" will be heard for the first time in New York next Thursday evening, played by the Boston Symphony under Pierre Monteux. Mr. Monteux conducted the first performance of the original ballet with Diaghileff's Ballet Russe in Paris at the Theatre des Champs Elysees on May 29, 1913. What with seventeen rehearsals, the orchestra and dancers were able to keep on valiantly until the end, although nothing could be heard through the uproar from the audience. Finally, as missiles began to be thrown, the police intervened. Stravinsky, conspicuous by his height and his opera hat, managed to escape unrecognized, but the hat was smashed.

Richard Burgin, the concertmaster of the orchestra, will be the soloist on Thursday evening, and Alexander Siloti on Saturday afternoon, when the program will include the Beethoven Pastoral Symphony and four numbe from Debussy's incidental music t D'Annunzio's mystery play, "The Ma tyrdom of St. Sebastian." A later S vinsky work will be given here by th Philadelphia Orchestra on Tuesd evening, February 5, the "Symphoni for Wind Instruments," written in memory of Claude Debussy.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

10 Jan 26

TERRIFIC NUMBER BY SYMPHONY

Stravinsky's Daring "Rite of Spring" Well Received

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

At the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon the unexpected happened. As final number on the programme stood Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps," the most daring piece of music yet written in the 20th century, and yesterday performed for the first time in Boston. And it was heard to prolonged applause.

WAS HISSED IN 1913

When this "Rite of Spring," to give the piece its accepted English title, was originally produced as a ballet in Paris on May 29, 1913, there came from the hearers a storm of protest that took the form of hissing, hooting and howls of rage. Even after 10 years this music was still drastic, relentless in its dissonance, savage and uncompromising in its rhythmic emphasis.

That it provoked no audible expression of disapproval yesterday was not surprising. A Boston audience is too decorous to hiss. But altogether unforeseen was the enthusiasm with which Stravinsky's music was received by a not inconsiderable portion of the assembled company. Time and again Mr. Monteux was recalled to the stage, and not until the men of the orchestra had risen from their chairs to bow repeatedly did the clapping finally cease.

Tremendously Difficult

Undoubtedly much of this applause was prompted by the performance itself; and surely such applause was never more richly deserved. The "Sacre du Printemps" is beyond question the most difficult, the most exacting music that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has ever been called upon to play. Stravinsky asks of the players that they do things pronounced impossible by every book upon orchestration; and the rhythmic complexity of the final "Sacrificial Dance" is probably unparalleled in Western music. Rehearsal after rehearsal was needed before every player could be sure of his "entrances." Yet over all these difficulties the orchestra yesterday triumphed.

Not since Mr. Monteux first came to Boston five years ago has he more completely demonstrated his authority as conductor of his mastery over the technique of his trade. And it was Mr. Monteux, it may be remarked in passing, who in Paris conducted the first performance of this formidable music.

Rites in Pagan Russia

As a ballet "La Sacre du Printemps" is a representation of rites in ancient pagan Russia for the inducing of fertility in spring, rites which culminate in the propitatory sacrifice of a "chosen maiden," who must dance herself to death. For this extraordinary scenario Stravinsky has written music altogether appropriate in its elemental strength, its primitive savage force. There is no blinking the fact that some of this music is not pleasant to hear. At times it lacerates the ear. Here and there it causes the listener's flesh to creep. No doubt in a stage performance, however, these more excrutiating passages would make a less concentrated, and hence a less incisive impression.

And there is in Stravinsky's unbelievably complicated score much that, even at first hearing, seems possessed of a rare and penetrating beauty, as, for example, the Introduction to Part II that Stravinsky has named "The Pagan Night," and the "Mysterious Circles of the Adolescents," while for sheer excitement the final episode is unmatched in music. Beside it Electra's dance of triumph in Strauss' opera is but the tootling of a penny whistle.

Regarding the ultimate place of this revolutionary score, it were unwise to hazard an opinion. But only the hidebound would deny that in "Le Sacre du Printemps" we are confronted by the workings of an extraordinary musical personality, and of a tremendous intellectual force.

For the rest of this concert a few words must suffice. Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony in sympathetic performance began it, and before "Le Sacre du Printemps," Marya Freund, hitherto unheard here, sang the pathetic recitative and lament of Ariadne, from Monteverdi's opera of that name, and three songs by Mahler.

Mme. Freund has a voice of agreeable quality; but it is as interpreter rather than as vocalist that she chiefly impressed. Clearly she is a singer of rare intelligence, and she has, besides, the priceless gift of personality.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
WORCESTER
MASS.
POST

JAN 26 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM NOTABLE

Includes Grandest Works of Beethoven and Strauss

A program of remarkable interest and brilliance will be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert to be given in Mechanics Hall on Tuesday evening, Feb. 12. This will be the first visit of the orchestra to Worcester in three years and the farewell appearance here of Pierre Monteux, its celebrated French conductor, who is now completing his engagement.

The symphony will be the Seventh Beethoven in A Major, one of the grandest in conception and certainly the most impelling by its rhythmic sweep of the immortal Nine. The divine allegretto of this symphony is as famous as any measures of Beethoven.

The modern German school will be represented by Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration." The score describes the agony of a man on his deathbed. He finally succumbs and his soul, meeting God, is transfigured. The culmination of the score is such as probably no other contemporary composer could have written.

Debussy's two nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," will also be presented. Pierre Monteux was a friend of this foremost of French composers in the years which preceded his death, and thus at first hand learned to understand the significance of Debussy's music and style. The performance of these nocturnes by the famous orchestra under its French conductor is said to be eloquent in the extreme.

The concert will close with Wagner's popular overture to Tannhäuser.

N. Y.
TIMES
ISSUE OF

JAN 27 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

On Friday evening, in the Academy of Music, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its third concert of the Brooklyn season with Alexander Siloti, the Russian pianist, as the soloist.

Pierre Monteux will conduct Beethoven's famous "Pastoral" Symphony, No. 6, and introduce the first series of excerpts from Maurice Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," which ballot the conductor was the first to perform in Europe at the head of Diaghileff's Ballet Russe. Siloti will appear with the orchestra in Liszt's "Dance of Death," a paraphrase of the "Dies Irae." The concert will close with Dvorak's "Carnival" Overture.

NEW YORK
TIMES

JAN 27 1924

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, played Vincent d'Indy's "Symphony on a Mountaineer Air," with Mr. Schmitz at the piano. The Boston Transcript says: "Wagner had been dead three years when d'Indy wrote this, but it is fresh and vital and shows no sign of age."

TELEGRAM

JAN 27 1924

The Boston Symphony orchestral club, of which Carlos E. Pinfield is leader and first violinist, will play this afternoon in the galleries of the Worcester Art Museum at a concert open to the public. A Tschaikowsky program of music is planned by eight instruments. This afternoon will also open a new exhibition of paintings owned by the museum.

Monday

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps"; Sibelius' violin concerto, Richard Burgin, soloist, and Mozart's C major symphony at Carnegie Hall Thursday evening. The programme for the Saturday afternoon concerts includes excerpts from Debussy's "Martyrdom of St. Sebastian"; Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, and Liszt's Danse Macabre.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES

JAN 27 1924

SYMPHONY BACKERS TO ASSEMBLE HERE

Orchestra Chiefs of 13 Cities Will Attempt to Solve Problem of Huge Deficits.

INVITED BY C. H. MACKAY

Efforts to Be Made to Strengthen the Financial Situation in Various Communities.

Following visits to New York by three out-of-town orchestras and a fourth soon to play here, it has become known that a first meeting of financial backers of the great symphony organizations in thirteen American cities will be held here at the invitation of Clarence H. Mackay next Saturday. The meeting is for discussion, so the invitations explained, "of all matters of interest to American orchestras at this time." It is expected that the problem of the annual deficits will be taken up and plans laid to remedy the situation.

To Discuss Rival Bidding.

Next Saturday's discussion will be wholly free as to subject, taking whatever direction those present desire or suggest. It is certain that there will be talk of rival bidding for players and conductors, such as in the past has cost Eastern orchestras many men and $50,000 increases in their own budget for the faithful who remained, when some of the newer organizations were forming.

A report yesterday of $70,000 offered to a conductor, not far afield nor unknown here, to come to New York, was denied by all concerned. The man mentioned now receives over $40,000, which was the price the Metropolitan once paid to Toscanini, and it has been announced from his concert platform that Mr. Stokowski accepted Philadelphia's figure at a personal loss. He is at present, as are most other leaders, under binding contract for a term of years.

Mr. Mackay's guests are expected to consider how rival city orchestras may "live and let live" in future years. They will informally, in American parlance, "swap hard luck stories" and seek remedies for their difficulties in good American "big business" methods.

Mr. Mackay is the present Chairman of the Board of Directors of the Philharmonic Society, the oldest orchestra in this country and the third oldest in the world. He has been South since issuing the call for this informal conference to both the chief officers and practical business men of the other musical groups.

Final plans await his return to town Tuesday or Wednesday and no information of the semi-public meeting has been available at either his offices in the Postal Telegraph Company, those of the Philharmonic Society or the Mackay home at 3 East Seventy-fifth Street. From outside the city it was learned that the men accepting the invitation will meet informally as guests at dinner at Mr. Mackay's home on Saturday night.

Thirteen presiding officers of symphony organizations and thirteen business managers of their orchestras have accepted, according to report from some of their home towns. They will represent, in terms of concert hall box offices, $5,000,000 annual turnover, or nearly twice the gross business of the Metropolitan Opera House. Their common bond will be that each has an average annual deficit of $100,000 a season.

Some of Those to Attend.

Some of those who are expected or will send proxies if unable to attend are W. A. Clark Jr. of Los Angeles, who up to this year had paid $543,000 for the Los Angeles Philharmonic, and is still "carrying on" a six-figure deficit; Elbert I. Carpenter of Minneapolis, where also one man carries the chief financial load; Charles H. Hamill of Chicago, Mr. Murphy of Detroit, Mrs. Charles P. Taft of Cincinnati, John L. Severance of Cleveland and H. H. Flagler of the New York Symphony.

From Rochester, with its youngest of all the big orchestras, will come George Eastman, who has undertaken to run music with "big business" brains and experience. From Philadelphia is Alexander Van Rensselaer, acting in the absence of Edward Bok, largest donor of the recent endowment. Representing Boston is Judge Frederick P. Cabot, the successor of Major Higginson, now wrestling with $95,000 annual difference between expenses and income of the Boston Symphony.

With their chief there have been invited the business managers, who will dine in New York the same evening and will, in event of promising developments, remain to work out any plans adopted by the respective groups. The managers are W. H. Brennan, Boston; Arthur Judson, New York Philharmonic and Philadelphia; George Engles, New York Symphony; Mr. See, Rochester, Mrs. J. W. Darby, Cincinnati; Mrs. Adela Prentiss Hughes, Cleveland; W. E. Walter, Detroit; F. J. Wessels, Chicago; S. E. Macmillen, St. Louis; A. J. Gaines, Minneapolis; Caroline A. Smith, Los Angeles, and A. W. Widenham, San Francisco.

Four of the Middle West orchestras had been reported in the beginning of their current season as planning to "save themselves by a merger." That move, though it came to no definite action, led to much consideration of the common interests of rival touring orchestras having their home bases at Cleveland, Cincinnati, St. Louis and Detroit.

In the case of the New York Symphony Orchestra the need of begging orchestra funds in grudging driblets from a host of promising contributors led Harry Harkness Flagler some years ago to assume personally the entire financial responsibility, leaving to a Board of Directors only questions of artistic policy.

The older Philharmonic Society received $500,000 by bequest of Joseph Pulitzer, of which the [illegible] producing [illegible] hundred [illegible] year.

Mackay [illegible]

At the season's first [illegible] harmonic directors in [illegible] cent Astor last Fall, [illegible] Frederick A. Juilliard presiding, Chairman Mackay first indicated some of the problems he will now discuss with other orchestra heads. In his report then he emphasized "the great cost of maintaining a symphony orchestra, owing to the high standard demanded." Here, as well as in other cities, adequate financial returns could not be insured without an endowment fund, he said.

"Even with a full attendance at every concert," his report added, "there would still be a considerable deficit." There was a limit to what the public could be charged, he continued, and this had about been reached. Mr. Mackay mentioned the addition of $22,248 to this year's heavy budget through the new union schedule and a $15,000 bonus to a retiring conductor.

The Philharmonic, on Mr. Mackay's taking its chairmanship three years ago, combined with the then National Symphony Orchestra, from which both subscribers and players were recruited to the older band. In this present season's report he announced a further joining forces with the leading interests in the City Symphony Orchestra as "an added source of strength."

An understanding was reached between the Philharmonic and the American Orchestra Society whereby Mrs. E. H. Harriman, founder of that enterprise, is now Chairman of the Philharmonic's educational concerts.

Wallis to Speak in Church

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BROOKLYN
N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

JAN 27 192

Third Brooklyn Concert by Boston Orchestra on Frida

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra series in Brooklyn will be given at the Academy of Music next Friday night. Alexander Siloti, the famous Russian pianist, as soloist. Mr. will open the programme with Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony (this master's most distinct "programme" music, describing his impre of scenes in the country.

The first orchestral suite from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," score of the modern French school, and Dvorak's "Carnival" ove will follow. Mr. Siloti will play (with orchestra) Liszt's Dan Death," a paraphrase on the Dies Irae.

BROOKLYN, N.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

JAN 27 1924

Boston Symphony Program, Alexander Siloti Soloist

Alexander Siloti, the great Russian pianist, will be the soloist Friday evening, Feb. 1, at the Academy for the third Boston Symphony concert of the Brooklyn season. Pierre Monteux will open this concert with Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony No. 6, the most distinctly descriptive music which the master ever wrote. A notable score of the modern French school will be the first series of excerpts from Maurice Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," including Nocturne, Interlude, and War-like Dance. This score Pierre Monteux was the first to produce in Europe when he was at the head of Diaghileff's Ballet Russe. Dvorak's "Carnival" Overture will also be played.

The music in which Mr. Siloti will appear with the orchestra is Liszt's "Dance of Death," a paraphrase on the "Dies Irae," a score of astounding brilliance and dramatic qualities, of which Siloti, the great pupil of Liszt, is perhaps the most authentic living interpreter.

AN 27 1924

The Boston Symphony.

The following programs will be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, on the occasion of its third visit here for a pair of concerts on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall.

At the Thursday concert Mr. Monteux will conduct for the first time in New York a concert variation of Stravinsky's ballet, "The Rites of Spring," a picture of pagan Russia, which is considered one of the most important scores of this Russian composer. The soloist will be Richard Burgin, the concert master of the orchestra, who will play the D minor violin concerto of Sibelius. The symphony, which will open the concert, will be the "Jupiter" of Mozart.

As soloist at the Saturday matinee concert Alexander Siloti, Russian pianist and Liszt pupil, will appear in Liszt's "Dance of Death," a paraphrase on the "Dies Irae." In the second number Mr. Monteux will conduct four symphonic numbers from Debussy's incidental music to D'Annunzio's mystery play, "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian." The numbers are "The Court of the Lilies," "Dance of Ecstasy," "The Passion" and "The Good Shepherd." The symphony which will open the list will be the "Pastoral" of Beethoven.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES

JAN 27 1924

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has Alexander Siloti as soloist at the Academy on Friday night in a program from Beethoven, Ravel, Dvorak and Liszt.

Fritz Kreisler will give his annual recital in the Brooklyn Institute series at the Academy on Feb. 5.

Arthur B. Hunt lectures at the Brook-

---

season, his fourth in New York (not counting his appearances with the Philharmonic eighteen years ago as one of a series of guest-conductors) and third with the Philharmonic, at that orchestra's next concert at the Metropolitan Opera House on Tuesday evening, with a program of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and numbers by Cherubini, Strauss and Wagner.

Willem van Hoogstraten will end his first regular season with the Philharmonic with this afternoon's concert, with his wife, Elly Ney, as soloist in Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto, and the rest of the program devoted to Brahms. This will make forty-five concerts for his first Philharmonic season; thirty-three in Manhattan, two in Brooklyn and ten on tour; a total, including the forty-two concerts at the Lewisohn Stadium, of eighty-seven concerts under Mr. van Hoogstraten's direction since his arrival last July.

Mr. Mengelberg will conduct the sixth concert in the students' series Wednesday evening, with Albert Spalding as soloist in John Powell's violin concerto. This will be its first performance in its present form, as Mr. Powell had recently to rescore the work, owing to the loss of the original manuscript. The remaining students' concerts will be given on Wednesday evenings.

On Thursday evening Mr. Mengelberg will direct the second Philharmonic membership concert, for which admission is free to members of the society, at the Waldorf-Astoria, with a program devoted to the two Strausses. Richard Strauss's suite, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," will be followed by Johann Strauss's overture to "Die Fledermaus" and two waltzes, "Tales from the Vienna Woods" and "Wiener Blut."

Symphony Society to End Beethoven Cycle

Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra will conclude the Beethoven Cycle this week, giving the Ninth Symphony, with the chorus of the Oratorio Society in the finale. The soloists will be Ruth Rodgers, soprano; Mabel Ritch, contralto; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fred Patton, bass. Mr. Damrosch will conduct.

The Oratorio Society will open the program with the unaccompanied canon for six voices, "Helpful be, O Man, noble and good," arranged by Mr. Damrosch for solo voices and chorus, Albert Stoessel conducting. Harold Bauer will play Beethoven's last piano sonata, Op. 111, in C minor, which, Mr. Damrosch has said, is written in the same transcendental mood as the Ninth Symphony. There will be no postlude.

The New York Symphony will give its eighth Aeolian Hall concert this afternoon, with Pablo Casals as soloist in the Dvorak cello concerto in B minor. Blair Fairchild's Tableau Musi-

---

ns Season This Ends Cycle

Orchestras Play Le

doun," will have its per at th concert. The m, "North and West," by n, fellow the American in Rome, will be given ne in A next Sunday, February 3, at Aeolian Hall Georges Enesco will be the soloist. This will be Mr. Damrosch's last appearance until the latter part of March, as the intervening concerts will be conducted by Bruno Walter. Mr. Damrosch will conclude this season's series of children's concerts at Carnegie Hall next Saturday morning, February 2.

Percy Grainger will be the soloist at this afternoon's concert of the State Symphony Orchestra at the Metropolitan Opera House in the Grieg concerto, while Mr. Stransky will also lead "Scheherazade" and Wagner numbers. A new work by an American composer, Bernard Rogers's prelude to "The Faithful," will be played by the State Symphony at the Metropolitan next Sunday afternoon, with Ossip Gabrilowitsch as soloist in the Schumann piano concerto. The symphony will be the Tchaikovsky "Pathetique."

The last Wednesday afternoon concert of the State Symphony this season, on February 6 at Carnegie Hall, will be devoted to Saint-Saëns, with three symphonic poems, "Phaeton," "Rouet d'Omphale" and "Danse Macabre," and the Second Symphony, in A minor, and the ballet music from "Samson et Dalila." Horace Britt, first cellist of the orchestra, will play the cello concerto, and Helen Stanley, soprano, will sing the arias "Catherine," from "Henry VIII," and "O mon beau rêve," from "Etienne Marcel."

Visiting Orchestras To Play Stravinsky

Igor Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps" will be heard for the first time in New York next Thursday evening, played by the Boston Symphony under Pierre Monteux. Mr. Monteux conducted the first performance of the original ballet with Diaghileff's Ballet Russe in Paris at the Theatre des Champs Elysees on May 29, 1913. What with seventeen rehearsals, the orchestra and dancers were able to keep on valiantly until the end, although nothing could be heard through the uproar from the audience. Finally, as missiles began to be thrown, the police intervened. Stravinsky, conspicuous by his height and his opera hat, managed to escape unrecognized, but the hat was smashed.

Richard Burgin, the concertmaster of the orchestra, will be the soloist on Thursday evening, and Alexander Siloti on Saturday afternoon, when the program will include the Beethoven Pastoral Symphony and four numbers from Debussy's incidental music to D'Annunzio's mystery play, "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian." A later Stravinsky work will be given here by the Philadelphia Orchestra on Tuesday evening, February 5, the "Symphonies for Wind Instruments," written in memory of Claude Debussy.

[181]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

NEW YORK
HERALD

JAN 27 1924

Mistakes Made by Conductors in Framing Their Programs

Boston Symphony This Week to Play Stravinsky Last Instead of First When Hearers Are Fresh and Mentally Alert.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

M. PIERRE MONTEUX, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is not a celebrated constructor of good programs. Next Thursday evening he will present for the first time in this city Igor Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps," but before permitting his audience to hear it he will do all and the best he can to surcharge every listener's mind with the "Jupiter" symphony of Mozart and a concerto for violin and orchestra, with Richard Burgin, concert master of the orchestra, as solo player.

M. Monteux's theory of the psychology of concert audiences is in accord with that held apparently by most of the other conductors. They are evidently of the opinion that novelties should be placed late in programs in order to hold the listeners in their seats. Or in the case of such a work as that of Stravinsky it may be that the eminent dispenser of sounds is afraid that after hearing it no one would believe it worth while to remain and enjoy a little quiet rest and refreshment in the shape of a Mozart symphony.

Or possibly, as Capt. Coffin's skipper who harnessed the whale to pull his ship remarked, "A marciful man is marciful to his beast," and M. Monteux wishes to give fearful persons an opportunity to escape before the "Consecration of Spring" breaks loose.

Serious Part of Program Should Come First.

But no matter what reason may be offered, a badly made program cannot be excused. The most serious part of a program of music should be the first part, performed when an audience is fresh, mentally alert, keen to receive and assimilate something new or satisfying. The lighter part of the entertainment should follow, just as salads follow the roasts. But conductors will probably continue to create program plans out of their own self-sufficient minds without due consideration of the minds of those who are to listen.

The first performance of the "Sacre du Printemps," which in its original form was a ballet, took place at the Theatre des Champs Elysees, Paris, on May 29, 1913, the actors being the members of the Diaghileff Ballet Russe, and the conductor M. Monteux.

There was a rumpus which must have stirred even M. Varese to greenest envy. The audience yelled and bawled. Even the fortissimo passages, which are generously provided by the distinguished composer, were drowned out. Missiles were thrown upon the stage. The police had to defend the right. Stravinsky, who is tall, nevertheless managed to escape unrecognized, but his priceless high hat was ignominiously smashed in the melee.

In spite of the riot there were four more performances in France and one in London. M. Monteux later produced the work in concert form. So perhaps next Friday morning we may be able to tell the world that on the previous evening "an enjoyable time was had by all."

Will Become Worth While.

The musical editor of THE NEW YORK HERALD, "doddering into the twilight of a misspent life," as William Winter once phrased it, intends to pursue the modern movement as long ing drinks out of the musical lemons which have been handed to us in the course of the day.

And once and for all none of these things will be settled soon. Up to the present time only a very few of these modernists have made the impression of being worth while. They have simply seized upon a manner to conceal their own poverty of ideas. And some of them are not even honest. Their compositions reek with intellectual deceit. They select song texts and set them to music which palpably has nothing to do with them. And they are unmistakably doing this for the sheer sake of causing people to sit up.

Mr. Montague-Nathan in his "History of Russian Music" has a few words about Stravinsky's spring song. He says, "In this work Stravinsky has

---

WORCESTER
MASS.
TELEGRAM

JAN 2 1924

contract with the orchestra at the end of the season. The subscription sale of seats is just closing and the public sale begins at Steinert's music store Friday, Feb. 1.

The program comprises four numbers. The opening is Beethoven's "Seventh Symphony in A Major," the second number is Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," the third number is Debussey's two nocturne's "Clouds," and "Festivals" and the program closes with the always popular Wagner overture to "Tannhauser"

Mechanics Hall

After an absence of three year the Boston Symphony orchestra, 104 pieces, is coming back to Worcester to give a concert in Mechanics hall, Tuesday evening, Feb. 12. A program of remarkable interest and brilliance will be given and the concert will constitute the farewell appearance here to Pierre Monteux, its celebrated conductor, who is now completing his engagement as leader of the orchestra. No orchestra in the world has achieved greater things than this famous Boston institution and it has come to the pride of New England. Founded in 1881 by the late Maj. Henry L. Higginson, this organization, originally 60 pieces, has grown to an organization of over 100 pieces, has ranked as the leading orchestra in the United States and has been under the leadership of some of the master musical minds of the world.

For the Worcester concert there is a program of four numbers opening with Beethoven's "Seventh Symphony" in major, one of the grandest in conception and certainly the most impelling by its rythmic sweep of the immortal Nine. The divine Allegretto of this symphony is as famous as any measure of Beethoven. The German school will be represented by Richard Strausse's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration." Debussey's two nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals" will also be presented and the concert will close with Wagner's popular overture to "Tannhauser."

The public sale of seats goes on at Steinert's music store, Friday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
WORCESTER
MASS.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WORCESTER
MASSACHUSETTS
GAZETTE
JAN 2 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The return to Worcester after an absence of three years, of the Boston Symphony orchestra for one concert in Mechanics hall on Tuesday evening, Feb. 12, is unquestionably the musical event of the season. It is also the farewell appearance of Pierre Monteux, the popular conductor, who closes his engagement with the orchestra at the close of this season.

A subscription sale has been going on for the concert for two weeks and on Friday, there will be a public sale of seats at Steinert's music store. The interest taken and the demand for seats indicates that the orchestra will be greeted by a full house, and the program selected by Conductor Monteux is particularly attractive. It opens with Beethoven's Seventh symphony in A major, followed by Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration." The two nocturnes of Debussey, "Clouds" and "Festivals" is the third number. The program closes with Wagner's popular overture to Wagner's "Tannhauser."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE SALEM
MASS.
NEWS

JAN 30 1924

Complete Boston Symphony Orchestra Coming Here Feb. 17

Salem is responding splendidly to the enterprise which brings the full Boston Symphony orchestra of 104 musicians to the Empire theatre on Sunday afternoon, Feb. 17. Although the public sale of tickets does not begin until Saturday morning, Feb. 2, there have been enough reservations made to indicate a fine audience for the great orchestra when it comes here.

The fact that the full orchestra is coming here for the first time makes the concert notable. Salem has heard many of the individual players as soloists, in groups or ensemble, but this is the first time that the entire orchestra has come here. The management states very frankly that it hopes that this concert will be the first of a long series of annual concerts. There are many cities which have the Boston Symphony orcnestra visit them once a year, and Salem undoubtedly will be included in the list after this year.

There is extra interest in the orchestra this season because it is the final year for Pierre Monteux as conductor. In the five years that he has led this famous organization it has grown steadily in power and brilliance and has gone back to the high place it held in the years when Colonel Higginson backed it with unlimited money.

The soloist on the occasion is Miss Edith Thompson, a brilliant pianist. She appeared as soloist with the Boston Symphony in Lynn two years ago and her splendid work then is well recalled by the many Salem people who attended the concert. She is a great favorite throughout the North shore and for this occasion, at least, she is devoting all her time to making her Salem appearance even a finer thing than the very successful Lynn performance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
WORCESTER
MASS.
TELEGRAM

JAN 1924

Mechanics Hall

The Boston symphony orchestra, 10 pieces, Pierre Monteux, conductor, comes to Worcester, Feb. 12, for one concert in Mechanics hall. It is the first appearance of the orchestra in three years, and it is the farewell appearance of Conductor Monteux with the orchastra, in Worcester for he closes his contract with the orchestra this season. The subscription sale of seats is just closing and the public sale opens Friday, Feb. 1, at Steinert's music store.

There is a splendid program prepared, the opening number being Beethoven's "Seventh Symphony" in A major. The second number is Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration" the third number closes with the popular Wagner overture "Tannhauser."

BRONX,
N. Y.
HOME NEWS

JAN 27 1924

Alexander Siloti, Russian pianist, will be heard as assisting artist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn, and in Carnegie Hall, respectively, Feb. 1 and 2. He will play the Dance of Death, by Liszt.

HERALD
JAN 24

Tribune.

The extraordinary "Rite of Spring," by Stravinsky, will be performed tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening at the Symphony concerts. When Mr. Monteux conducted this ballet at its first performance in Paris, there was a stormy scene. Some applauded wildly; some hissed fiercely. We shall hear what we shall hear. Today these "Pictures of Pagan Russia" are considered the greatest work of Stravinsky. There has been only one performance in this country, the one by the Philadelphia orchestra in Philadelphia. There was then no perturbation of nature; the moon did not veil her face, stars did not fall, nor was there earthquake shock. Beethoven's Pastoral (and ornithological) symphony will be played, and Mme. Freund, the Polish mezzo-soprano, of whom fine things have been said, will sing the beautiful Lament of Adriadne by old Monteverdi and three songs by Gustave Mahler.

ON SERA HEUREUX DE LE REVOIR ICI

M. Pierre Monteux sera à la salle Mechanics le 12 février prochain

Le public franco-américain de notre ville apprendra avec autant d'intérêt que de plaisir que M. Pierre Monteux qui vient de terminer ses cinq années comme directeur de l'orchestre symphonique de Boston, va venir donner un concert d'adieux au Mechanics Hall, le mardi soir 12 février prochain.

M. PIERRE MONTEUX
Directeur de l'orchestre symphonique de Boston

M. Pierre Monteux a dirigé l'orchestre symphonique ici à divers concerts de la Société Philharmonique, et il possède à Worcester un bon cercle d'amis ainsi que de nombreux admirateurs.

La dernière fois que M. Monteux est venu ici, c'était il y a trois ans.

Il viendra cette fois avec ses 104 musiciens; c'est dire que l'on peut s'attendre à quelque chose de tout à fait supérieur.

L'orchestre rendra notamment:

La "Symphonie No. 7 en A majeur", de Beethoven;

Le poëme musical "Mort et Transfiguration", de Strauss;

"Nuages" et "Festival", des "Nocturnes" de Debussy;

Et l'ouverture de "Tannhauser", de Wagner.

L'interprétation de ces beaux airs sous la direction de M. Pierre Monteux est tout simplement unique. Relativement aux Nocturnes, M. Monteux a été un intime collaborateur de Debussy dans la production initiale de ces œuvres.

Sous la direction de M. Pierre Monteux, l'orchestre symphonique de Boston a accompli de merveilleux progrès, et cela n'est guère étonnant, car M. Monteux avait déjà fait plusieurs tournées mondiales et avait dirigé les principaux orchestres de Paris ainsi que ceux de plusieurs autres capitales européennes.

Il est hors de doute que le public franco-américain se portera en foule au concert du 12 février, à la salle Mechanics.

Au grand regret de tous, M. Pierre Monteux retourne à Paris au printemps.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERTS

The second and last pair of young people's concerts this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, will be given in Symphony hall on the afternoons of Monday and Tuesday, Jan. 28 and 29. The program comprises Humperdinck's Prelude to "Haensel and Gretel," the Minuet and Finale from Mozart's G minor Symphony, excerpts from the third act of "The Mastersingers," Debussy's Nocturne "Festivals" and Rossini's "William Tell" Overture. All tickets for these concerts have been distributed through the schools of Greater Boston.

[182]

NEW YORK
HERALD

JAN 27 1924

infested a conviction that, despite prevailing bias in favor of things they are, music is an art which st progress, and that its evolution, that of mankind, to whom it miners, is a natural condition of its exence." Having unloaded this pack of bromide, Mr. Montague-Nathan ceeds with suddenly awakened inlligence to inform us that "The owning of Springs" has been deribed as the ritual of an imaginary igion, but there is a touch of acality which connects the subject tter with the beliefs of pagan Rus It has two scenes, in which the s devoted to the sun god Yarilo r further particulars about this nity see Rimsky-Korsakov's "Snow iden") are celebrated. In setting s subject Stravinsky has turned his ck on everything in the nature of ventional music and has given us score which at the first hearing apars to confine itself to a rhythmical mentary on the stage movement. criticizing this work the mistake s made of suggesting that Strasky's music had gone back to an mental stage in an endeavor to proe an appropriate setting for the historic. In reality, of course, the vement was forward, in that music s used in a sphere to which it herto had been strange."

Awaits a Mighty Master.

All of which fills us with dazzling ightenment as to the artistic charer of this composition. What it ncipally does is once more to demstrate the futility of all literary deiption of music. The lyric art has ays defied the forcible embraces of rds, and it continues to preserve its stity in spite of the violent efforts the whole race of modern comers to subjugate it to the semitorical story, the legend or the m. Some day there will arise a hty master who will proclaim to world the true gospel of this lofti of the arts—that it needs no aid m literature or painting, vocal voration or pantomime, but that it is roud and independent creation of human mind, capable of forming uttering its own message of inparable beauty.

When that time comes, as come it ely will, the whole shop full of nikins and tinsel costumes and silly rary twaddle will be hurled viotly down a steep place into the sea. sic will be rid of the shams which re wrapped themselves about her ely limbs and she will once more e forth into the sunlight robed in her own naked beauty. The uglis and the posturings and the spouts and pretendings will all be gone music will be just music, heav maid, and nothing else.

ut we are far from that happy e just now. We shall have to lis to many strange sounds justified e marvelous meanings which are e found in the tales or the action ch they represent. For if you take y from the contemporaneous comr his story or his pantomime he s helpless as a baby without his carriage.

of Shaw's Joan

WORCESTER
MASS.
TELEGRAM

JAN 27 1924

Mechanics Hall

After an absence of three year the Boston Symphony orchestra, 10 pieces, is coming back to Worcester to give a concert in Mechanics hall, Tuesday evening, Feb. 12. A program of remarkable interest and brilliance will be given and the concert will constitute the farewell appearance here to Pierre Monteux, its celebrated conductor, who is now completing his engagement as leader of the orchestra. No orchestra in the world has achieved greater things than this famous Boston institution and it has come to the pride of New England. Founded in 1381 by the late Maj. Henry L. Higginson, this organization, originally 60 pieces, has grown to an organization of over 100 pieces, has ranked as the leading orchestra in the United States and has been under the leadership of some of the master musical minds of the world.

For the Worcester concert there is a program of four numbers opening with Beethoven's "Seventh Symphony" in major, one of the grandest in conception and certainly the most impelling by its rythmic sweep of the immortal Nine. The divine Allegretto of this symphony is as famous as any measure of Beethoven. The German school will be represented by Richard Strausse's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration." Debussey's two nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals" will also be presented and the concert will close with Wagner's popular overture to "Tannhauser."

The public sale of seats goes on at Steinert's music store, Friday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
WORCESTER
MASS.
POST

JAN 24

SYMPHONY CONCERT EVENT OF SEASON

Great Interest in Coming of Boston Orchestra

The return to Worcester after an absence of three years, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for one concert in Mechanics Hall on the evening of Tuesday, Feb. 12, is unquestionably the musical event of the season. It is also the farewell appearance of Pierre Monteux, the popular conductor, who closes his engagement with the orchestra at the end of this season.

A subscription sale has been going on for the concert for two weeks and on Friday, Feb. 1, there will be a public sale of seats at Steinert's music store. The interest taken and the demand for seats indicates that the orchestra will be greeted by a full house, and the program selected by Conductor Monteux is particularly attractive. It opens with Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A major, one of the grandest conception and certainly the most impelling by its rhythmic sweep of the immortal nine. The divine Allegretto of this symphony is as famous as any measures of Beethoven.

The second number is Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration." The score describes the agony of a man on his death bed. He finally succumbs and his soul, meeting God, is transfigured. The two nocturnes of Debussey, "Clouds" and "Festivals," is the third number and it will be given with all the significance of Debussey's music and style, for Conductor Monteux was a friend of this foremost French composers in the years which preceded his death, and thus learned first hand the significance of the composer's style. The program closes with Wagner's popular overture to Wagner's "Tannhauser."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WORCESTER
MASSACHUSETTS
GAZETTE

JAN 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY COMING

The Boston Symphony orchestra, 104 pieces, Pierre Monteux, conductor, comes to Worcester Tuesday, Feb. 12, for a concert in Mechanics hall. It is the first appearance of the orchestra in Worcester for three years, and it is also the farewell appearance in this city of Conductor Monteux, who completes his contract with the orchestra at the end of the season. The subscription sale of seats is just closing and the public sale begins at Steinert's music store Friday, Feb. 1.

The program comprises four numbers. The opening is Beethoven's "Seventh Symphony in A Major," the second number is Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," the third number is Debussey's two nocturne's "Clouds," and "Festivals" and the program closes with the always popular Wagner overture to "Tannhauser"

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WORCESTER
MASSACHUSETTS
GAZETTE

JAN 21 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The return to Worcester after an absence of three years, of the Boston Symphony orchestra for one concert in Mechanics hall on Tuesday evening, Feb. 12, is unquestionably the musical event of the season. It is also the farewell appearance of Pierre Monteux, the popular conductor, who closes his engagement with the orchestra at the close of this season.

A subscription sale has been going on for the concert for two weeks and on Friday, there will be a public sale of seats at Steinert's music store. The interest taken and the demand for seats indicates that the orchestra will be greeted by a full house, and the program selected by Conductor Monteux is particularly attractive. It opens with Beethoven's Seventh symphony in A major, followed by Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration." The two nocturnes of Debussey, "Clouds" and "Festivals" is the third number. The program closes with Wagner's popular overture to Wagner's "Tannhauser."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE SALEM
MASS.
NEWS

JAN 1924

Complete Boston Symphony Orchestra Coming Here Feb. 17

Salem is responding splendidly to the enterprise which brings the full Boston Symphony orchestra of 104 musicians to the Empire theatre on Sunday afternoon, Feb. 17. Although the public sale of tickets does not begin until Saturday morning, Feb. 2, there have been enough reservations made to indicate a fine audience for the great orchestra when it comes here.

The fact that the full orchestra is coming here for the first time makes the concert notable. Salem has heard many of the individual players as soloists, in groups or ensemble, but this is the first time that the entire orchestra has come here. The management states very frankly that it hopes that this concert will be the first of a long series of annual concerts. There are many cities which have the Boston Symphony orcnestra visit them once a year, and Salem undoubtedly will be included in the list after this year.

There is extra interest in the orchestra this season because it is the final year for Pierre Monteux as conductor. In the five years that he has led this famous organization it has grown steadily in power and brilliance and has gone back to the high place it held in the years when Colonel Higginson backed it with unlimited money.

The soloist on the occasion is Miss Edith Thompson, a brilliant pianist. She appeared as soloist with the Boston Symphony in Lynn two years ago and her splendid work then is well recalled by the many Salem people who attended the concert. She is a great favorite throughout the North shore and for this occasion, at least, she is devoting all her time to making her Salem appearance even a finer thing than the very successful Lynn performance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
WORCESTER
MASS.
TELEGRAM

JAN 1924

Mechanics Hall

The Boston symphony orchestra, 10 pieces, Pierre Monteux, conductor, comes to Worcester, Feb. 12, for one concert in Mechanics hall. It is the first appearance of the orchestra in three years, and it is the farewell appearance of Conductor Monteux with the orchastra, in Worcester for he closes his contract with the orchestra this season. The subscription sale of seats is just closing and the public sale opens Friday, Feb. 1, at Steinert's music store.

There is a splendid program prepared, the opening number being Beethoven's "Seventh Symphony" in A major. The second number is Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration" the third number closes with the popular Wagner overture "Tannhauser."

BRONX,
N. Y.
HOME NEWS

JAN 24 1924

Alexander Siloti, Russian pianist, will be heard as assisting artist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn, and in Carnegie Hall, respectively, Feb. 1 and 2. He will play the Dance of Death, by Liszt.

HERALD
JAN 24

The extraordinary "Rite of Spring," by Stravinsky, will be performed tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening at the Symphony concerts. When Mr. Monteux conducted this ballet at its first performance in Paris, there was a stormy scene. Some applauded wildly; some hissed fiercely. We shall hear what we shall hear. Today these "Pictures of Pagan Russia" are considered the greatest work of Stravinsky. There has been only one performance in this country, the one by the Philadelphia orchestra in Philadelphia. There was then no perturbation of nature; the moon did not veil her face, stars did not fall, nor was there earthquake shock. Beethoven's Pastoral (and ornithological) symphony will be played, and Mme. Freund, the Polish mezzo-soprano, of whom fine things have been said, will sing the beautiful Lament of Adriadne by old Monteverdi and three songs by Gustave Mahler.

ON SERA HEUREUX DE LE REVOIR ICI

M. Pierre Monteux sera à la salle Mechanics le 12 février prochain

Le public franco-américain de notre ville apprendra avec autant d'intérêt que de plaisir que M. Pierre Monteux qui vient de terminer ses

M. PIERRE MONTEUX
Directeur de l'orchestre symphonique de Boston

cinq années comme directeur de l'orchestre symphonique de Boston, va venir donner un concert d'adieux au Mechanics Hall, le mardi soir 12 février prochain.

M. Pierre Monteux a dirigé l'orchestre symphonique ici à divers concerts de la Société Philharmonique, et il possède à Worcester un bon cercle d'amis ainsi que de nombreux admirateurs.

La dernière fois que M. Monteux est venu ici, c'était il y a trois ans.

Il viendra cette fois avec ses 104 musiciens; c'est dire que l'on peut s'attendre à quelque chose de tout à fait supérieur.

L'orchestre rendra notamment:

La "Symphonie No. 7 en A majeur", de Beethoven;

Le poëme musical "Mort et Transfiguration", de Strauss;

"Nuages" et "Festival", des "Nocturnes" de Debussy;

Et l'ouverture de "Tannhauser", de Wagner.

L'interprétation de ces beaux airs sous la direction de M. Pierre Monteux est tout simplement unique. Relativement aux Nocturnes, M. Monteux a été un intime collaborateur de Debussy dans la production initiale de ces œuvres.

Sous la direction de M. Pierre Monteux, l'orchestre symphonique de Boston a accompli de merveilleux progrès, et cela n'est guère étonnant, car M. Monteux avait déjà fait plusieurs tournées mondiales et avait dirigé les principaux orchestres de Paris ainsi que ceux de plusieurs autres capitales européennes.

Il est hors de doute que le public franco-américain se portera en foule au concert du 12 février, à la salle Mechanics.

Au grand regret de tous, M. Pierre Monteux retourne à Paris au printemps.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERTS

The second and last pair of young people's concerts this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, will be given in Symphony hall on the afternoons of Monday and Tuesday, Jan. 28 and 29. The program comprises Humperdinck's Prelude to "Haensel and Gretel," the Minuet and Finale from Mozart's G minor Symphony, excerpts from the third act of "The Mastersingers," Debussy's Nocturne "Festivals" and Rossini's "William Tell" Overture. All tickets for these concerts have been distributed through the schools of Greater Boston.

[182]

PROVD JOUR JAN 20

"One of Greatest Symphonies" in Boston Orchestra Programme

Written for the Sunday Journal
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH.

Joyous and exultant as are many of its pages, a note of tragedy yet hangs over Schubert's C major Symphony, which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play at its concert of next Tuesday evening, for by general admission one of the world's greatest symphonies, standing close to those of Beethoven, its composer was fated never to hear it played. Begun when Schubert had barely eight months of life before him, the Symphony was completed not long before his untimely death at the age of 31. It is said that the Symphony was tried out in rehearsal at Vienna during the composer's lifetime, but that it proved too difficult for the players and was consequently abandoned.

The first actual performance took place a decade later, at the instigation of Schumann, who at his first sight of the score became acutely sensible of the music's beauty and importance. In the course of a few years—in 18 to be exact—Mendelssohn attempted a performance with the Philharmonic Orchestra of London, but the members of the band laughed at the triplets in the last movement and Mendelssohn, much incensed, withdrew the piece. Meanwhile Habeneck, the famous French conductor of the time, had rehearsed the Symphony in Paris, but after trying the first movement the orchestra refused to go farther.

It is to Schumann that we owe the much-quoted characterization of this Symphony as of "Heavenly lengths." The proportions of the piece are indeed colossal; the final movement alone occupies 1159 bars, and the three preceding sections are planned upon the same heroic scale. Few conductors to-day would venture to play the Symphony without certain judicious excisions, although Felix Weingartner, as ardent a champion of the piece as Schumann himself, is not of this mind. "I cannot conceive," he has said, "how it is that there are still people so ill humored as to think this symphony so long, nay even to ask for cuts to be made in it. I am not of their opinion, and I own that whenever I hear this work well conducted, or when I conduct it myself, I always experience the most happy sensations, and am absolutely intoxicated with the music. It produces on me the effect of a flight through a bright ether."

The music of Schubert forms a connecting link between the classicism of Beethoven and the romanticism of Schumann and his immediate followers. In its general design the C-major Symphony respects the traditions of the form; but in many a detail there is evidenced a freer spirit and a marked tendency toward a lyrical manner of expression.

Broadly speaking, Schubert's themes have not the severity of contour that distinguishes the melodies of Beethoven, and in many instances they might well be fitted to words and sung by voices, and not a little that has a truly heroic stride and sweep. The chief theme of the first movement, for example, is rhythmic rather than melodic, and the same propulsion characterizes the second subject of the Finale, with its four thumping reiterations of the same tone. In the Andante con moto, however, Schubert is again his essentially lyric self. Here, and also in the Trio of the Scherzo, the principal melody has almost the quality of a folksong. According to Schubert's English biographer, Edmondstone Duncan, the opening of the Scherzo is "intended humorously; but the trio, expressively played, might easily draw tears."

Not since February, 1911, has the Boston Orchestra played Schubert's great Symphony in Providence. And wholly new to these concerts are two of the other items on Tuesday's programme. Of these numbers one is Schumann's seldom-heard Concerto for the violoncello, to be played by Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist of the orchestra, and the other is a pair of movement from Ravel's suite, "Ma Mere l'Oye, or, to give the work its English title, "Mother Goose."

With the possible exception of Vincent d'Indy, no living French composer holds so high a place in the esteem of musicians the world over as does Maurice Ravel. Once considered a dangerous revolutionary, Ravel seems to-day a model of musical propriety and restraint, though there is in his music no hint of academic smugness. The first of the little pieces to be heard in Tuesday evening's concert, "Les Entretiens de la Belle et de la Bete," sets forth, as the title implies, a conversation between Beauty and the Beast. The words of the former, conveyed through a graceful waltz-melody, are answered by the latter in the gruff and cavernous voice of the double-bassoon. The second piece, "Laideronnette, Imperatrice des Pagodes," is a fascinating exercise in oriental coloring.

For resounding end to this concert comes Wagner's Overture to his romantic opera, "The Flying Dutchman," last played by Mr. Monteux in Providence on March 9, 1920. Though "The Flying Dutchman" was the first of Wagner's genuinely significant works for the stage, the Overture still remains unsurpassed in its particular field for all the more than 80 years that have passed since it was first set on paper. In later years, to be sure, Wagner revised the instrumentation and even recast the final passage, but in their essentials the first and second versions are the same. Other composers before and after him have endeavored to translate into music the fury and the exaltation of an ocean storm, but their efforts one and all pale beside those portions of the "Flying Dutchman" Overture in which Wagner depicts the play of the elements.

HER JAN 20

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

There will be two features of unusual interest at the next concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Jan. 25 and 26: the debut here of Marya Freund, the noted Polish singer, and the first performance of Stravinsky's remarkable "Rite of Spring." Stravinsky's ballet, which has been probably more often praised and more often attacked than any of his other works, was first performed in Paris under Mr. Monteux's direction, both in ballet and concert form. These occasions rivalled the Parisian premiere of "Tannhaeuser" in the disturbance and ultimate riot which were aroused. The score is called "A Tableau of Pagan Russia." It is divided into two parts: "Adoration of the Earth" and "The Sacrifice." There are dances in worship of spring by the "adolescents," which culminate in the choosing of one to be sacrificed. The chosen one dances until she drops from exhaustion. Madame Freund will sing with the orchestra an aria of Monteverdi and three songs of Mahler. The symphony will be the "Pastoral," No. 6, of Beethoven.

ZANGWILL TO LECTURE

WORCESTER TIMES JAN 22

MECHANICS HALL - WORCESTER
TUESDAY EVENING, FEB. 12
(104 Musicians)
BOSTON SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA
Pierre Monteux, Conductor
... to W. H. Brennan, Manager, Symphony Hall, ... by Check, Filled in Order of Receipt.
... $2.00, $1.50 (No Tax)
... subscribed

WORLD JAN 20

Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring," By Boston Symphony Orchestra

Pierre Monteux, who was the intrepid pioneer in the introduction of Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" in Paris (on which occasion a riot resulted in the calling in of the police), will perform the composer's orchestral suite from this score at the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall, which are scheduled for Jan. 31 and Feb. 2. This will be the first performance in New York and will take place at the Thursday concert.

A feature of the Saturday concert will be Debussy's suite from his incidental music to d'Annunzio's mystery play, "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian."

The soloist at the Thursday concert will be Richard Burgin, the concertmaster of the orchestra, appearing in Sibleius's violin concerto. Mozart's Symphony in C major (K. 338) will also be played.

The soloist of the Saturday concert will be Alexander Giloti, who will appear in Liszt's "Dance Macabre." Besides the Debussy score, Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony will be played.

ROSENTHAL TO RETIRE

TRANS JAN 21

MUSIC OF DEBUSSY, MUSIC OF HARVARD, VARIOUSLY PLAYED

AGAIN THE PIECES FROM "SAINT SEBASTIAN"

Beauty in One, Power in Another—The Composer's Sense of the Theatre—Missing Choruses—The Pierian Sodality Progresses to Mozart, and Also to Mr. Ballentine—Return of Mitja Nikisch

DEBUSSY'S music to d'Annunzio's mystery-play, "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian," is designedly music for the theatre—summoning prelude, enhancing accompaniment, complementary postlude, to an action unfolded and poetized upon the stage. The composer would not have been the discriminating and conscientious artist that he was in 1910 and 1911, had he written in any other manner for any other end. The thought of an orchestral suite, assembled for the concert-hall, may hardly have crossed his mind. None the less, Monsieur Caplet, or some hand unsuspected, did well when he put together four such pieces; while to have brought them to Symphony Hall is equal credit to Mr. Monteux. Repeated at the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening, only one seemed lifeless and insignificant, so removed from place in the play, apart from the theatre. The brief pages that accompany Sebastian's miming of the march of Jesus to Calvary, suggested little but the phantoms of "Parsifal" that now haunt every such music. Debussy was no Wagnerite. It was his custom indeed to profess a mirthful scorn of most of his music-dramas. Yet face to face with a holy and anguished mystery, back come the Wagnerian progressions and colorings first bestowed upon the woe-ridden and pain-tortured Amfortas.

No doubt, also, these measures of Christian passion gained from the contrast of the omitted choruses mourning Adonais of pagan legend and cult. By all accounts, in fact, in the choral rather than in the symphonic music to d'Annunzio's play, Debussy rises higher; while nowhere else has he written for divided or massed human choirs. He fills a whole act with hymns of Paradise, ardent and ecstatic, prayerful and adoring, puissant and wondrous. They might have made exalted climax to the whole Suite. Yet so long as the Symphony Orchestra has no complementary chorus, we may not hear them. Perhaps, Mr. Kusevitzsky, who often uses a chorus at his concerts in Paris, will supply the lack.

The other three excerpts from the theatre-music quite justified transfer to the concert-hall, even though the programme-book was not as graphic as it should have been in preparatory description of the play. In particular, the Introduction to the Fourth Act, labelled in the Suite, "The Good Shepherd," is altogether worthy of Debussy's prime—a last gleam, almost, upon a horizon soon to dim. The martyrdom of the archer-saint draws near. A venerable priest of the new religion would bring him strength and solace. In him, Sebastian rapt sees, as in vision, the mystical presence of his gentle Lord. From the English horn, Debussy evokes a melody, fine-textured, low-voiced, of an ineffable compassion, dying upon the ear like a touch loved and consoling. The orchestra weaves a background of like serenity, pity, ecstasy, spun in as poignant strands. To one listener, at least, only the Introduction to the Third Act of "Tristan," likewise for English horn, contains its fellow in another beauty. . . . of Saint Sebastian. Nor need it be entombed with a dead play.

Harvard Music-Making

The Pierian Sodality as orchestra of Harvard is not yet the Glee Club as choir of the university. Yet within it a like ambition and a new diligence are beginning to blossom and bear fruit. Otherwise it would hardly have begun its "Boston Concert," Sunday afternoon in the Copley Theatre, with the First Movement of Mozart's Symphony in E-flat. At the outset, a pardonable excess of caution made the music move stiffly, sluggishly. Then the band and the conductor—Mr. Walter Piston—gained confidence and freedom. The music began to flow with a pleasing sense of phrase, euphony and accent in the strings, with less ease and surety in the wind choir, but with audible Mozartean clarity and pliancy. Often there was good tone, as the musicians say, clean and curving; once and again bright and balanced upon the ear; even with figures, ready with modulation; yet, as it seemed, reined over-much by Mr. Piston's careful pace.

Clearly in the string-choir, "The Pierian" flowers, by which merit Mr. Foote's Serenade for those voices fared better than the movement from the Symphony. The music is open and transparent; while through it no more than agreeable fancy and artifice play. It depends much upon shading of timbres and light interweaving of the parts. Again conductor and choir were cautious; but their pains left the music neither blurred nor stiffened. The listener heard its quality. Best of all went Mr. Ballentine's tone-poem in little, "By a Lake in Russia." By this time Mr. Piston and the orchestra had both gained confidence and freedom. They charactered the contrasting themes, the development of the one musingly, of the other in livelier mood. They caught the rhythms, pointed the progress of the music. Once more Mr. Ballentine's readiness of means and fancy in these short pieces praised him—the more for the gentle reticence that measures both.

Other musical abilities of the college also had place—in a Waltz for Orchestra by Mr. George Newell, now or recently a student; in Mr. Launtner's singing of the tenor air from Handel's oratorio, 'Jephtha's Daughter," of songs by Parisians and Mr. Goossens. The Waltz suggested Mr. Newell's becoming faith in modernist theory and practice; but the manner decidedly overlaid the matter of his music. Not once could Mr. Newell persuade himself into directness. Yet that quality is not least of Stravinsky's virtues. In pieces of Massenet, "Noël Paien"; of Szulc about a kiss; of Hahn about those "wings of love," Mr. Lautner sang expertly through the neat sentimental rhetoric. He succeeded well with the keen-edged declamation of Goossens, in Fortunio's song after de Musset; and surprisingly well with Debussy's fine-lined, half-melancholy "Romance." For the while, however, the simplicities of Handel, like the subtleties of Fauré, are beyond his powers. Missing were Mr. Thomson's promised Tangos. In all Harvard University, there was not money to pay for copied parts!

HER JAN 26

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The next Boston Symphony concerts will be given a week from next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, since the orchestra will play in New York and Brooklyn this week. The 14th program will include the Third Symphony of Brahms, Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" with Motte Lacroix as the soloist, and Strauss's Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration."

GLOBE JAN 20

Music Notes and Comment

The chief event of the week will be the first performances here of Stravinsky's "The Rites of Spring" at the Symphony concerts. This is a much-discussed score by one of the best-known modernist composers. It was first played in Paris in its original ballet form with Mr Monteux as conductor. He also led the first concert performance. The ballet from which the music to be heard here is taken dealt with pagan Russia. The score has two parts, called "Adoration of the Earth," and "The Sacrifice."' This music is sure to arouse controversy and protest as it has done all over the musical world for a decade. It has been slow in coming to our concert halls, partly because of the extraordinary difficulty of the music. The Boston Orchestra will give the first performances in New York at their next pair of concerts there. The Philadelphia Orchestra has played it in Philadelphia, last season.

This week's Symphony soloist, Marya Freund, is Polish, but well known in Paris. She has not sung here before.

Symphony Orchestra Endowment

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in appealing this season for funds to meet the deficit, estimated at $95,000 for this year alone, have printed the complete list of subscribers to the fund, the amounts of the deficits for several seasons past, and the total of the permanent endowment fund of the orchestra, to which contributions are always welcome.

This information, which has never before been made public in full, proves what some people have long suspected, that there is and will continue to be, until the income of the permanent endowment is sufficient to meet the annual deficits, a real danger that some day Boston will lose the Symphony Orchestra.

Since Maj Higginson gave up, after 36 years, what had been the sole financial responsibility for the Boston Symphony, its existence has depended upon the generosity of the present trustees and of a few people to whom they appealed or who volunteered aid. This season the publication of the names of the 300 contributors toward the deficit has brought in about 150 additional contributions, totaling at the last announcement $67,989.34 toward the desired $95,000. The sum needed will probably be made up, but there is no certainty that it will.

The endowment fund totals $146,003.52, plus $10,000 recently given in memory of Henry Lee Higginson. At least $3,000,000 would be needed to insure against a deficit which would need to be met by the present hand-to-mouth methods.

Every possible economy consistent with maintenance of the high standards of the orchestra seems to have been made already by the management. The deficit is plainly due to excess of salaries paid orchestra players and conductor over receipts from sale of tickets. To balance the budget on strictly business principles either the salaries ought to be lowered or the price of tickets raised.

HER JAN 2

SYMPHONY GIVES 13TH CONCERT

Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring" Heard for the First Time Here

FAMILIAR PASTORAL BEAUTIFULLYPLAYED

By PHILIP HALE

The 13th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Beethoven, Pastoral Symphony; Monteverdi, Recitative and Lament of Ariadne; Mahler, Three Songs with orchestra: "Primal Light," "Earthly Life," "Who thought out the little Song" (Mme. Marya Freund, mezzo soprano); Stravinsky, "The Rite of Spring" (first time in Boston).

A finer performance of Beethoven's symphony is hardly imaginable. Too often the symphony is treated in a perfunctory manner, as if it were an old story that needed no care in the retelling. Then one is tempted to repeat the remark of a famous Boston woman, who, told by a friend that she was going into the country, said; "Kick a tree for me." Too often the audience dozes by Beethoven's brookside, and its thanksgiving after the storm is in recognition of the fact that the symhpony is nearing its end.

Yesterday the performance was so euphonious, the tempi were so judiciously taken, the phrasing and the nuances were so exquisite, that the symphony again became a thing of beauty. The thunderstorm was not, as in times past, discreet, almost apologetic; it was portrayed dramatically, yet without extravagant emphasis.

Beethoven has never had here so sympathetic an interpreter as Mr. Monteaux; nor has any conductor before him had so plastic, responsive and superb orchestra.

When Mme. Culp sang Ariadne's Lament at these concerts she used the accompaniment arranged by Respighi. It was for full orchestra. The arrangement yesterday was by Gustave Doret the Swiss composed, for strings and harp. Monteverdi was in the habit of employing many instruments, some of which are obsolete. Mme. Freund sang the old music with genuine feeling, with depressed rather than boisterous emotion. She displayed the intelligence and refinement of her art in the songs by Mahler, who had ingeniously orchestrated the accompaniments.

Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring" was not so terrible. So deliriously exciting and cacophonous as was feared. After Ernest Newman had heard this music several times, he wrote: "The Grand Guignol convulsions of it are losing what power they once had to make me sit up. . . . I found myself sitting as calmly through Stravinsky's terrific screaming and drum-pounding as I would if I were cradled in the heart of an earthquake and knew myself to be absolutely safe."

Much nonsense has been written about this composition by commentators, who have found the music symbolical, even phallic; who have talked about "the enormous and terrible shaping of the visible and invisible world through movement." Some have gone to Sir J. G. Frazer's "Golden Bough" for "explanation." Others quote Stravinsky as saying that the work is to be regarded as abstract music in all but name, a modern symphony. But "The Rite of Spring" was produced as a ballet, and in the score for concert use the explanatory sub-titles are retained.

And the music to be appreciated, liked or disliked with understanding, should be heard with the ballet on the stage. Otherwise much of it is without significance and irritatingly tiresome. There are beautiful pages in the first part, as the measures for flutes; there are impressive pages as "the entrance of the old man, the Celebrant; there are exciting, frenzied pages

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8:15, Boston Symphony Orchestra, 13th program. "Pastoral Symphony," Beethoven; aria, Monteverde; three songs, Mahler; "Le Sacre du Printemps," Stravinsky (first time in Boston). Soloist, Marya Freund (first time in Boston.)

second part there seems to be a paucity of invention, a lack of imagination.

Perhaps these words could not justly be applied to the music of the second part if it were heard with the ballet in the theatre. In the concert hall there were, yesterday, musical moments of greatness, especially in the first part; there was interest in the extraordinary instrumentation; but too much of the music seemed noisily commonplace, too "physical." It is needless to say that Mr. Monteux, who conducted the first performances of the ballet in Paris, both in the theatre and as concert music, had rehearsed his virtuoso orchestra, so that in all probability there has never been so brilliant a rendering.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will be out of town next week. The program for Feb. 8, 9, is as follows: Brahms, Symphony No. 3, F major; Loeffler, "A Pagan Poem" (after Virgil: Motte Lacroix, pianist; Louis Speyer, English horn); Strauss, Tone Poem "Death and Transfiguration."

[183]

PROV JOUR JAN 20

"One of Greatest Symphonies" in Boston Orchestra Programme

Written for the Sunday Journal

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH.

Joyous and exultant as are many of its pages, a note of tragedy yet hangs over Schubert's C major Symphony, which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play at its concert of next Tuesday evening, for by general admission one of the world's greatest symphonies, standing close to those of Beethoven, its composer was fated never to hear it played. Begun when Schubert had barely eight months of life before him, the Symphony was completed not long before his untimely death at the age of 31. It is said that the Symphony was tried out in rehearsal at Vienna during the composer's lifetime, but that it proved too difficult for the players and was consequently abandoned.

The first actual performance took place a decade later, at the instigation of Schumann, who at his first sight of the score became acutely sensible of the music's beauty and importance. In the course of a few years—in 18[illegible] to be exact—Mendelssohn attempted a performance with the Philharmonic Orchestra of London, but the members of the band laughed at the triplets in the last movement and Mendelssohn, much incensed, withdrew the piece. Meanwhile Habeneck, the famous French conductor of the time, had rehearsed the Symphony in Paris, but after trying the first movement the orchestra refused to go farther.

It is to Schumann that we owe the much-quoted characterization of this Symphony as of "Heavenly lengths." The proportions of the piece are indeed colossal; the final movement alone occupies 1159 bars, and the three preceding sections are planned upon the same heroic scale. Few conductors to-day would venture to play the Symphony without certain judicious excisions, although Felix Weingartner, as ardent a champion of the piece as Schumann himself, is not of this mind. "I cannot conceive," he has said, "how it is that there are still people so ill humored as to think this symphony too long, nay even to ask for cuts to be made in it. I am not of their opinion, and I own that whenever I hear this work well conducted, or when I conduct it myself, I always experience the most happy sensations, and am absolutely intoxicated with the music. It produces on me the effect of a flight through a bright ether."

The music of Schubert forms a connecting link between the classicism of Beethoven and the romanticism of Schumann and his immediate followers. In its general design the C-major Symphony respects the traditions of the form; but in many a detail there is evidenced a freer spirit and a marked tendency toward a lyrical manner of expression.

Broadly speaking, Schubert's themes have not the severity of contour that distinguishes the melodies of Beethoven, and in many instances they might well be fitted to words and sung by voices, and not a little that has a truly heroic stride and sweep. The chief theme of the first movement, for example, is rhythmic rather than melodic, and the same propulsion characterizes the second subject of the Finale, with its four thumping reiterations of the same tone. In the Andante con moto, however, Schubert is again his essentially lyric self. Here, and also in the Trio of the Scherzo, the principal melody has almost the quality of a folk-song. According to Schubert's English biographer, Edmondstone Duncan, the opening of the Scherzo is "intended humorously; but the trio, expressively played, might easily draw tears."

Not since February, 1911, has the Boston Orchestra played Schubert's great Symphony in Providence. And wholly new to these concerts are two of the other items on Tuesday's programme. Of these numbers one is Schumann's seldom-heard Concerto for the violoncello, to be played by Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist of the orchestra, and the other is a pair of movement from Ravel's suite, "Ma Mere l'Oye, or, to give the work its English title, "Mother Goose."

With the possible exception of Vincent d'Indy, no living French composer holds so high a place in the esteem of musicians the world over as does Maurice Ravel. Once considered a dangerous revolutionary, Ravel seems to-day a model of musical propriety and restraint, though there is in his music no hint of academic smugness. The first of the little pieces to be heard in Tuesday evening's concert, "Les Entretiens de la Belle et de la Bete," sets forth, as the title implies, a conversation between Beauty and the Beast. The words of the former, conveyed through a graceful waltz-melody, are answered by the latter in the gruff and cavernous voice of the double-bassoon. The second piece, "Laideronnette, Imperatrice des Pagodes," is a fascinating exercise in oriental coloring.

For resounding end to this concert comes Wagner's Overture to his romantic opera, "The Flying Dutchman," last played by Mr. Monteux in Providence on March 9, 1920. Though "The Flying Dutchman" was the first of Wagner's genuinely significant works for the stage, the Overture still remains unsurpassed in its particular field for all the more than 80 years that have passed since it was first set on paper. In later years, to be sure, Wagner revised the instrumentation and even recast the final passage, but in their essentials the first and second versions are the same. Other composers before and after him have endeavored to translate into music the fury and the exaltation of an ocean storm, but their efforts one and all pale beside those portions of the "Flying Dutchman" Overture in which Wagner depicts the play of the elements.

TRANS JAN 21

MUSIC OF DEBUSSY, MUSIC OF HARVARD, VARIOUSLY PLAYED

AGAIN THE PIECES FROM "SAINT SEBASTIAN"

Beauty in One, Power in Another—The Composer's Sense of the Theatre—Missing Choruses—The Pierian Sodality Progresses to Mozart, and Also to Mr. Ballentine—Return of Mitja Nikisch

DEBUSSY'S music to d'Annunzio's mystery-play, "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian," is designedly music for the theatre—summoning prelude, enhancing accompaniment, complementary postlude, to an action unfolded and poetized upon the stage. The composer would not have been the discriminating and conscientious artist that he was in 1910 and 1911, had he written in any other manner for any other end. The thought of an orchestral suite, assembled for the concert-hall, may hardly have crossed his mind. None the less, Monsieur Caplet, or some hand unsuspected, did well when he put together four such pieces; while to have brought them to Symphony Hall is equal credit to Mr. Monteux. Repeated at the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening, only one seemed lifeless and insignificant, so removed from place in the play, apart from the theatre. The brief pages that accompany Sebastian's miming of the march of Jesus to Calvary, suggested little but the phantoms of "Parsifal" that now haunt every such music. Debussy was no Wagnerite. It was his custom indeed to profess a mirthful scorn of most of his music-dramas. Yet face to face with a holy and anguished mystery, back come the Wagnerian progressions and colorings first bestowed upon the woe-ridden and pain-tortured Amfortas.

No doubt, also, these measures of Christian passion gained from the contrast of the omitted choruses mourning Adonais of pagan legend and cult. By all accounts, in fact, in the choral rather than in the symphonic music to d'Annunzio's play, Debussy rises higher; while nowhere else has he written for divided or massed human choirs. He fills a whole act with hymns of Paradise, ardent and ecstatic, prayerful and adoring, puissant and wondrous. They might have made exalted climax to the whole Suite. Yet so long as the Symphony Orchestra has no complementary chorus, we may not hear them. Perhaps, Mr. Kusevitzsky, who often uses a chorus at his concerts in Paris, will supply the lack.

The other three excerpts from the theatre-music quite justified transfer to the concert-hall, even though the programme-book was not as graphic as it should have been in preparatory description of the play. In particular, the Introduction to the Fourth Act, labelled in the Suite, "The Good Shepherd," is altogether worthy of Debussy's prime—a last gleam, almost, upon a horizon soon to dim. The martyrdom of the archer-saint draws near. A venerable priest of the new religion would bring him strength and solace. In him, Sebastian rapt sees, as in vision, the mystical presence of his gentle Lord. From the English horn, Debussy evokes a melody, fine-textured, low-voiced, of an ineffable compassion, dying upon the ear like a touch loved and consoling. The orchestra weaves a background of like serenity, pity, ecstasy, spun in as poignant strands. To one listener, at least, only the Introduction to the Third Act of "Tristan," likewise for English horn, contains its fellow in another beauty. . . .

of Saint Sebastian. Nor need it be entombed with a dead play.

Harvard Music-Making

The Pierian Sodality as orchestra of Harvard is not yet the Glee Club as choir of the university. Yet within it a like ambition and a new diligence are beginning to blossom and bear fruit. Otherwise it would hardly have begun its "Boston Concert," Sunday afternoon in the Copley Theatre, with the First Movement of Mozart's Symphony in E-flat. At the outset, a pardonable excess of caution made the music move stiffly, sluggishly. Then the band and the conductor—Mr. Walter Piston—gained confidence and freedom. The music began to flow with a pleasing sense of phrase, euphony and accent in the strings, with less ease and surety in the wind choir, but with audible Mozartean clarity and pliancy. Often there was good tone, as the musicians say, clean and curving; once and again bright and balanced upon the ear; even with figures, ready with modulation; yet, as it seemed, reined over-much by Mr. Piston's careful pace.

Clearly in the string-choir, "The Pierian" flowers, by which merit Mr. Foote's Serenade for those voices fared better than the movement from the Symphony. The music is open and transparent; while through it no more than agreeable fancy and artifice play. It depends much upon shading of timbres and light interweaving of the parts. Again conductor and choir were cautious; but their pains left the music neither blurred nor stiffened. The listener heard its quality. Best of all went Mr. Ballentine's tone-poem in little, "By a Lake in Russia." By this time Mr. Piston and the orchestra had both gained confidence and freedom. They charactered the contrasting themes, the development of the one musingly, of the other in livelier mood. They caught the rhythms, pointed the progress of the music. Once more Mr. Ballentine's readiness of means and fancy in these short pieces praised him—the more for the gentle reticence that measures both.

Other musical abilities of the college also had place—in a Waltz for Orchestra by Mr. George Newell, now or recently a student; in Mr. Launtner's singing of the tenor air from Handel's oratorio, 'Jephtha's Daughter," of songs by Parisians and Mr. Goossens. The Waltz suggested Mr. Newell's becoming faith in modernist theory and practice; but the manner decidedly overlaid the matter of his music. Not once could Mr. Newell persuade himself into directness. Yet that quality is not least of Stravinsky's virtues. In pieces of Massenet, "Noël Païen"; of Szulc about a kiss; of Hahn about those "wings of love," Mr. Lautner sang expertly through the neat sentimental rhetoric. He succeeded well with the keen-edged declamation of Goossens, in Fortunio's song after de Musset; and surprisingly well with Debussy's fine-lined, half-melancholy "Romance." For the while, however, the simplicities of Handel, like the subtleties of Fauré, are beyond his powers. Missing were Mr. Thompson's promised Tangos. In all Harvard University, there was not money to pay for copied parts!

HER JAN 2

SYMPHONY GIVES 13TH CONCERT

Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring" Heard for the First Time Here

FAMILIAR PASTORAL BEAUTIFULLYPLAYED

By PHILIP HALE

The 13th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Beethoven, Pastoral Symphony; Monteverdi, Recitative and Lament of Ariadne; Mahler, Three Songs with orchestra: "Primal Light," "Earthly Life," "Who thought out the little Song" (Mme. Marya Freund, mezzo soprano); Stravinsky, "The Rite of Spring" (first time in Boston).

A finer performance of Beethoven's symphony is hardly imaginable. Too often the symphony is treated in a perfunctory manner, as if it were an old story that needed no care in the retelling. Then one is tempted to repeat the remark of a famous Boston woman, who, told by a friend that she was going into the country, said; "Kick a tree for me." Too often the audience dozes by Beethoven's brookside, and its thanksgiving after the storm is in recognition of the fact that the symphony is nearing its end.

Yesterday the performance was so euphonious, the tempi were so judiciously taken, the phrasing and the nuances were so exquisite, that the symphony again became a thing of beauty. The thunderstorm was not, as in times past, discreet, almost apologetic; it was portrayed dramatically, yet without extravagant emphasis.

Beethoven has never had here so sympathetic an interpreter as Mr. Monteaux; nor has any conductor before him had so plastic, responsive and superb orchestra.

When Mme. Culp sang Ariadne's Lament at these concerts she used the accompaniment arranged by Respighi. It was for full orchestra. The arrangement yesterday was by Gustave Doret, the Swiss composed, for strings and harp. Monteverdi was in the habit of employing many instruments, some of which are obsolete. Mme. Freund sang the old music with genuine feeling, with depressed rather than boisterous emotion. She displayed the intelligence and refinement of her art in the songs by Mahler, who had ingeniously orchestrated the accompaniments.

Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring" was not so terrible. So deliriously exciting and cacophonous as was feared. After Ernest Newman had heard this music several times, he wrote: "The Grand Guignol convulsions of it are losing what power they once had to make me sit up. . . . I found myself sitting as calmly through Stravinsky's terrific screaming and drum-pounding as I would if I were cradled in the heart of an earthquake and knew myself to be absolutely safe."

Much nonsense has been written about this composition by commentators, who have found the music symbolical, even phallic; who have talked about "the enormous and terrible shaping of the visible and invisible world through movement." Some have gone to Sir J. G. Frazer's "Golden Bough" for "explanation." Others quote Stravinsky as saying that the work is to be regarded as abstract music in all but name, a modern symphony. But "The Rite of Spring" was produced as a ballet, and in the score for concert use the explanatory sub-titles are retained.

And the music to be appreciated, liked or disliked with understanding, should be heard with the ballet on the stage. Otherwise much of it is without significance and irritatingly tiresome. There are beautiful pages in the first part, as the measures for flutes; there are impressive pages as "the entrance of the old man, the Celebrant; there are exciting, frenzied pages as in [illegible] second part there seems to be a paucity of invention, a lack of imagination.

Perhaps these words could not justly be applied to the music of the second part if it were heard with the ballet in the theatre. In the concert hall there were, yesterday, musical moments of greatness, especially in the first part; there was interest in the extraordinary instrumentation; but too much of the music seemed noisily commonplace, too "physical." It is needless to say that Mr. Monteux, who conducted the first performances of the ballet in Paris, both in the theatre and as concert music, had rehearsed his virtuoso orchestra, so that in all probability there has never been so brilliant a rendering.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will be out of town next week. The program for Feb. 8, 9, is as follows: Brahms, Symphony No. 3, F major; Loeffler, "A Pagan Poem" (after Virgil: Motte Lacroix, pianist; Louis Speyer, English horn); Strauss, Tone Poem "Death and Transfiguration."

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8:15, Boston Symphony Orchestra, 13th program. "Pastoral Symphony," Beethoven; aria, Monteverde; three songs, Mahler; "Le Sacre du Printemps," Stravinsky (first time in Boston). Soloist, Marya Freund (first time in Boston.)

HER JAN 20

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

There will be two features of unusual interest at the next concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Jan. 25 and 26: the debut here of Marya Freund, the noted Polish singer, and the first performance of Stravinsky's remarkable "Rite of Spring." Stravinsky's ballet, which has been probably more often praised and more often attacked than any of his other works, was first performed in Paris under Mr. Monteux's direction, both in ballet and concert form. These occasions rivalled the Parisian premiere of "Tannhaeuser" in the disturbance and ultimate riot which were aroused. The score is called "A Tableau of Pagan Russia." It is divided into two parts: "Adoration of the Earth" and "The Sacrifice." There are dances in worship of spring by the "adolescents," which culminate in the choosing of one to be sacrificed. The chosen one dances until she drops from exhaustion. Madame Freund will sing with the orchestra an aria of Monteverdi and three songs of Mahler. The symphony will be the "Pastoral," No. 6, of Beethoven.

ZANGWILL TO LECTURE

WO[illegible]

Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring," By Boston Symphony Orchestra

Pierre Monteux, who was the intrepid pioneer in the introduction of Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" in Paris (on which occasion a riot resulted in the calling in of the police), will perform the composer's orchestral suite from this score at the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall, which are scheduled for Jan. 31 and Feb. 2. This will be the first performance in New York and will take place at the Thursday concert.

A feature of the Saturday concert will be Debussy's suite from his incidental music to d'Annunzio's mystery play, "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian."

The soloist at the Thursday concert will be Richard Burgin, the concertmaster of the orchestra, appearing in Sibleius's violin concerto. Mozart's Symphony in C major (K. 338) will also be played.

The soloist of the Saturday concert will be Alexander Giloti, who will appear in Liszt's "Dance Macabre." Besides the Debussy score, Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony will be played.

ROSENTHAL TO RETIRE

WEBSTER TIMES JAN 22

MECHANICS HALL - WORCESTER

TUESDAY EVENING, FEB. 12

(104 Musicians)

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Pierre Monteux, Conductor

MAIL ORDERS to W. H. Brennan, Manager, Symphony Hall, Boston, Accompanied by Check, Filled in Order of Receipt. [illegible] $2.50, $2.00, $1.50 (No Tax)

[illegible] have been subscribed

GLOBE JAN 20

Music Notes and Comment

The chief event of the week will be the first performances here of Stravinsky's "The Rites of Spring" at the Symphony concerts. This is a much-discussed score by one of the best-known modernist composers. It was first played in Paris in its original ballet form with Mr Monteux as conductor. He also led the first concert performance. The ballet from which the music to be heard here is taken dealt with pagan Russia. The score has two parts, called "Adoration of the Earth," and "The Sacrifice."' This music is sure to arouse controversy and protest as it has done all over the musical world for a decade. It has been slow in coming to our concert halls, partly because of the extraordinary difficulty of the music. The Boston Orchestra will give the first performances in New York at their next pair of concerts there. The Philadelphia Orchestra has played it in Philadelphia, last season.

This week's Symphony soloist, Marya Freund, is Polish, but well known in Paris. She has not sung here before.

Symphony Orchestra Endowment

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in appealing this season for funds to meet the deficit, estimated at $95,000 for this year alone, have printed the complete list of subscribers to the fund, the amounts of the deficits for several seasons past, and the total of the permanent endowment fund of the orchestra, to which contributions are always welcome.

This information, which has never before been made public in full, proves what some people have long suspected, that there is and will continue to be, until the income of the permanent endowment is sufficient to meet the annual deficits, a real danger that some day Boston will lose the Symphony Orchestra.

Since Maj Higginson gave up, after 36 years, what had been the sole financial responsibility for the Boston Symphony, its existence has depended upon the generosity of the present trustees and of a few people to whom they appealed or who volunteered aid. This season the publication of the names of the 300 contributors toward the deficit has brought in about 150 additional contributions, totaling at the last announcement $67,989.34 toward the desired $95,000. The sum needed will probably be made up, but there is no certainty that it will.

The endowment fund totals $146,003.52, plus $10,000 recently given in memory of Henry Lee Higginson. At least $3,000,000 would be needed to insure against a deficit which would need to be met by the present hand-to-mouth methods.

Every possible economy consistent with maintenance of the high standards of the orchestra seems to have been made already by the management. The deficit is plainly due to excess of salaries paid orchestra players and conductor over receipts from sale of tickets. To balance the budget on strictly business principles either the salaries ought to be lowered or the price of tickets raised.

HER [illegible] JAN 26

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The next Boston Symphony concerts will be given a week from next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, since the orchestra will play in New York and Brooklyn this week. The 14th program will include the Third Symphony of Brahms, Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" with Motte Lacroix as the soloist, and Strauss's Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration."

PROVDJOUR JAN 20

"One of Greatest Symphonies" in Boston Orchestra Programme

Written for the Sunday Journal

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH.

Joyous and exultant as are many of its pages, a note of tragedy yet hangs over Schubert's C major Symphony, which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play at its concert of next Tuesday evening, for by general admission one of the world's greatest symphonies, standing close to those of Beethoven, its composer was fated never to hear it played. Begun when Schubert had barely eight months of life before him, the Symphony was completed not long before his untimely death at the age of 31. It is said that the Symphony was tried out in rehearsal at Vienna during the composer's lifetime, but that it proved too difficult for the players and was consequently abandoned.

The first actual performance took place a decade later, at the instigation of Schumann, who at his first sight of the score became acutely sensible of the music's beauty and importance. In the course of a few years—in 18[illegible] to be exact—Mendelssohn attempted a performance with the Philharmonic Orchestra of London, but the members of the band laughed at the triplets in the last movement and Mendelssohn, much incensed, withdrew the piece. Meanwhile Habeneck, the famous French conductor of the time, had rehearsed the Symphony in Paris, but after trying the first movement the orchestra refused to go farther.

It is to Schumann that we owe the much-quoted characterization of this Symphony as of "Heavenly lengths." The proportions of the piece are indeed colossal; the final movement alone occupies 1159 bars, and the three preceding sections are planned upon the same heroic scale. Few conductors to-day would venture to play the Symphony without certain judicious excisions, although Felix Weingartner, as ardent a champion of the piece as Schumann himself, is not of this mind. "I cannot conceive," he has said, "how it is that there are still people so ill humored as to think this symphony too long, nay even to ask for cuts to be made in it. I am not of their opinion, and I own that whenever I hear this work well conducted, or when I conduct it myself, I always experience the most happy sensations, and am absolutely intoxicated with the music. It produces on me the effect of a flight through a bright ether."

The music of Schubert forms a connecting link between the classicism of Beethoven and the romanticism of Schumann and his immediate followers. In its general design the C-major Symphony respects the traditions of the form; but in many a detail there is evidenced a freer spirit and a marked tendency toward a lyrical manner of expression.

Broadly speaking, Schubert's themes have not the severity of contour that distinguishes the melodies of Beethoven, and in many instances they might well be fitted to words and sung by voices, and not a little that has a truly heroic stride and sweep. The chief theme of the first movement, for example, is rhythmic rather than melodic, and the same propulsion characterizes the second subject of the Finale, with its four thumping reiterations of the same tone. In the Andante con moto, however, Schubert is again his essentially lyric self. Here, and also in the Trio of the Scherzo, the principal melody has almost the quality of a folksong. According to Schubert's English biographer, Edmondstone Duncan, the opening of the Scherzo is "intended humorously; but the trio, expressively played, might easily draw tears."

Not since February, 1911, has the Boston Orchestra played Schubert's great Symphony in Providence. And wholly new to these concerts are two of the other items on Tuesday's programme. Of these numbers one is Schumann's seldom-heard Concerto for the violoncello, to be played by Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist of the orchestra, and the other is a pair of movement from Ravel's suite, "Ma Mere l'Oye, or, to give the work its English title, "Mother Goose."

With the possible exception of Vincent d'Indy, no living French composer holds so high a place in the esteem of musicians the world over as does Maurice Ravel. Once considered a dangerous revolutionary, Ravel seems to-day a model of musical propriety and restraint, though there is in his music no hint of academic smugness. The first of the little pieces to be heard in Tuesday evening's concert, "Les Entretiens de la Belle et de la Bete," sets forth, as the title implies, a conversation between Beauty and the Beast. The words of the former, conveyed through a graceful waltz-melody, are answered by the latter in the gruff and cavernous voice of the double-bassoon. The second piece, "Laideronnette, Imperatrice des Pagodes," is a fascinating exercise in oriental coloring.

For resounding end to this concert comes Wagner's Overture to his romantic opera, "The Flying Dutchman," last played by Mr. Monteux in Providence on March 9, 1920. Though "The Flying Dutchman" was the first of Wagner's genuinely significant works for the stage, the Overture still remains unsurpassed in its particular field for all the more than 80 years that have passed since it was first set on paper. In later years, to be sure, Wagner revised the instrumentation and even recast the final passage, but in their essentials the first and second versions are the same. Other composers before and after him have endeavored to translate into music the fury and the exaltation of an ocean storm, but their efforts one and all pale beside those portions of the "Flying Dutchman" Overture in which Wagner depicts the play of the elements.

HER JAN 20

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

There will be two features of unusual interest at the next concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Jan. 25 and 26: the debut here of Marya Freund, the noted Polish singer, and the first performance of Stravinsky's remarkable "Rite of Spring." Stravinsky's ballet, which has been probably more often praised and more often attacked than any of his other works, was first performed in Paris under Mr. Monteux's direction, both in ballet and concert form. These occasions rivalled the Parisian premiere of "Tannhaeuser" in the disturbance and ultimate riot which were aroused. The score is called "A Tableau of Pagan Russia." It is divided into two parts: "Adoration of the Earth" and "The Sacrifice." There are dances in worship of spring by the "adolescents," which culminate in the choosing of one to be sacrificed. The chosen one dances until she drops from exhaustion. Madame Freund will sing with the orchestra an aria of Monteverdi and three songs of Mahler. The symphony will be the "Pastoral," No. 6, of Beethoven.

ZANGWILL TO LECTURE

WORLD JAN 20

Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring," By Boston Symphony Orchestra

Pierre Monteux, who was the intrepid pioneer in the introduction of Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" in Paris (on which occasion a riot resulted in the calling in of the police), will perform the composer's orchestral suite from this score at the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall, which are scheduled for Jan. 31 and Feb. 2. This will be the first performance in New York and will take place at the Thursday concert.

A feature of the Saturday concert will be Debussy's suite from his incidental music to d'Annunzio's mystery play, "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian."

The soloist at the Thursday concert will be Richard Burgin, the concertmaster of the orchestra, appearing in Sibelius's violin concerto. Mozart's Symphony in C major (K. 338) will also be played.

The soloist of the Saturday concert will be Alexander Giloti, who will appear in Liszt's "Dance Macabre." Besides the Debussy score, Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony will be played.

ROSENTHAL TO RETIRE

WESTER TIMES JAN 22

MECHANICS HALL - WORCESTER

TUESDAY EVENING, FEB. 12

(104 Musicians)

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Pierre Monteux, Conductor

[illegible] ORDERS to W. H. Brennan, Manager, Symphony Hall, [illegible] Accompanied by Check, Filled in Order of Receipt. [illegible] $2.50, $2.00, $1.50 (No Tax)

[illegible] have been subscribed

TRANS JAN 21

MUSIC OF DEBUSSY, MUSIC OF HARVARD, VARIOUSLY PLAYED

AGAIN THE PIECES FROM "SAINT SEBASTIAN"

Beauty in One, Power in Another—The Composer's Sense of the Theatre—Missing Choruses—The Pierian Sodality Progresses to Mozart, and Also to Mr. Ballentine—Return of Mitja Nikisch

DEBUSSY'S music to d'Annunzio's mystery-play, "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian," is designedly music for the theatre—summoning prelude, enhancing accompaniment, complementary postlude, to an action unfolded and poetized upon the stage. The composer would not have been the discriminating and conscientious artist that he was in 1910 and 1911, had he written in any other manner for any other end. The thought of an orchestral suite, assembled for the concert-hall, may hardly have crossed his mind. None the less, Monsieur Caplet, or some hand unsuspected, did well when he put together four such pieces; while to have brought them to Symphony Hall is equal credit to Mr. Monteux. Repeated at the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening, only one seemed lifeless and insignificant, so removed from place in the play, apart from the theatre. The brief pages that accompany Sebastian's miming of the march of Jesus to Calvary, suggested little but the phantoms of "Parsifal" that now haunt every such music. Debussy was no Wagnerite. It was his custom indeed to profess a mirthful scorn of most of his music-dramas. Yet face to face with a holy and anguished mystery, back come the Wagnerian progressions and colorings first bestowed upon the woe-ridden and pain-tortured Amfortas.

No doubt, also, these measures of Christian passion gained from the contrast of the omitted choruses mourning Adonais of pagan legend and cult. By all accounts, in fact, in the choral rather than in the symphonic music to d'Annunzio's play, Debussy rises higher; while nowhere else has he written for divided or massed human choirs. He fills a whole act with hymns of Paradise, ardent and ecstatic, prayerful and adoring, puissant and wondrous. They might have made exalted climax to the whole Suite. Yet so long as the Symphony Orchestra has no complementary chorus, we may not hear them. Perhaps, Mr. Kusevitzsky, who often uses a chorus at his concerts in Paris, will supply the lack.

The other three excerpts from the theatre-music quite justified transfer to the concert-hall, even though the programme-book was not as graphic as it should have been in preparatory description of the play. In particular, the Introduction to the Fourth Act, labelled in the Suite, "The Good Shepherd," is altogether worthy of Debussy's prime—a last gleam, almost, upon a horizon soon to dim. The martyrdom of the archer-saint draws near. A venerable priest of the new religion would bring him strength and solace. In him, Sebastian rapt sees, as in vision, the mystical presence of his gentle Lord. From the English horn, Debussy evokes a melody, fine-textured, low-voiced, of an ineffable compassion, dying upon the ear like a touch loved and consoling. The orchestra weaves a background of like serenity, pity, ecstasy, spun in as poignant strands. To one listener, at least, only the Introduction to the Third Act of "Tristan," likewise for English horn, contains its fellow in another beauty . . . of Saint Sebastian. Nor need it be entombed with a dead play.

Harvard Music-Making

The Pierian Sodality as orchestra of Harvard is not yet the Glee Club as choir of the university. Yet within it a like ambition and a new diligence are beginning to blossom and bear fruit. Otherwise it would hardly have begun its "Boston Concert," Sunday afternoon in the Copley Theatre, with the First Movement of Mozart's Symphony in E-flat. At the outset, a pardonable excess of caution made the music move stiffly, sluggishly. Then the band and the conductor—Mr. Walter Piston—gained confidence and freedom. The music began to flow with a pleasing sense of phrase, euphony and accent in the strings, with less ease and surety in the wind choir, but with audible Mozartean clarity and pliancy. Often there was good tone, as the musicians say, clean and curving; once and again bright and balanced upon the ear; even with figures, ready with modulation; yet, as it seemed, reined over-much by Mr. Piston's careful pace.

Clearly in the string-choir, "The Pierian" flowers, by which merit Mr. Foote's Serenade for those voices fared better than the movement from the Symphony. The music is open and transparent; while through it no more than agreeable fancy and artifice play. It depends much upon shading of timbres and light interweaving of the parts. Again conductor and choir were cautious; but their pains left the music neither blurred nor stiffened. The listener heard its quality. Best of all went Mr. Ballentine's tone-poem in little, "By a Lake in Russia." By this time Mr. Piston and the orchestra had both gained confidence and freedom. They charactered the contrasting themes, the development of the one musingly, of the other in livelier mood. They caught the rhythms, pointed the progress of the music. Once more Mr. Ballentine's readiness of means and fancy in these short pieces praised him—the more for the gentle reticence that measures both.

Other musical abilities of the college also had place—in a Waltz for Orchestra by Mr. George Newell, now or recently a student; in Mr. Launtner's singing of the tenor air from Handel's oratorio, 'Jephtha's Daughter," of songs by Parisians and Mr. Goossens. The Waltz suggested Mr. Newell's becoming faith in modernist theory and practice; but the manner decidedly overlaid the matter of his music. Not once could Mr. Newell persuade himself into directness. Yet that quality is not least of Stravinsky's virtues. In pieces of Massenet, "Noël Paien"; of Szulc about a kiss; of Hahn about those "wings of love," Mr. Lautner sang expertly through the neat sentimental rhetoric. He succeeded well with the keen-edged declamation of Goossens, in Fortunio's song after de Musset; and surprisingly well with Debussy's fine-lined, half-melancholy "Romance." For the while, however, the simplicities of Handel, like the subtleties of Fauré, are beyond his powers. Missing were Mr. Thompson's promised Tangos. In all Harvard University, there was not money to pay for copied parts!

HER JAN 26

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The next Boston Symphony concerts will be given a week from next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, since the orchestra will play in New York and Brooklyn this week. The 14th program will include the Third Symphony of Brahms, Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" with Motte Lacroix as the soloist, and Strauss's Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration."

GLOBE JAN 20

Music Notes and Comment

The chief event of the week will be the first performances here of Stravinsky's "The Rites of Spring" at the Symphony concerts. This is a much-discussed score by one of the best-known modernist composers. It was first played in Paris in its

let form with Mr Monteux

tor. He also led the first formance. The ballet from music to be heard here is with pagan Russia. The sco parts, called "Adoration of t and "The Sacrifice."' This sure to arouse controversy and protest as it has done all over the musical world for a decade. It has been slow in coming to our concert halls, partly because of the extraordinary difficulty of the music. The Boston Orchestra will give the first performances in New York at their next pair of concerts there. The Philadelphia Orchestra has played it in Philadelphia, last season.

This week's Symphony soloist, Marya Freund, is Polish, but well known in Paris. She has not sung here before.

Symphony Orchestra Endowment

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in appealing this season for funds to meet the deficit, estimated at $95,000 for this year alone, have printed the complete list of subscribers to the fund, the amounts of the deficits for several seasons past, and the total of the permanent endowment fund of the orchestra, to which contributions are always welcome.

This information, which has never before been made public, what some

One of the marvels of present day civilization, to be ranked with the radio, is the persistence of "Abie's Irish Rose" all over the country, so that some day a theatre somewhere may possibly be decorated with a brass tablet reading, "This is the only house where 'Abie's Irish Rose' played for one have, however, been the sole financial responsibility for the Boston Symphony, its existence has depended upon the generosity of the present trustees and of a few people to whom they appealed or who volunteered aid. This season the publication of the names of the 300 contributors toward the deficit has brought in about 150 additional contributions, totaling at the last announcement $67,989.34 toward the desired $95,000. The sum needed will probably be made up, but there is no certainty that it will.

The endowment fund totals $146,003.52, plus $10,000 recently given in memory of Henry Lee Higginson. At least $3,000,000 would be needed to insure against a deficit which would need to be met by the present hand-to-mouth methods.

Every possible economy consistent with maintenance of the high standards of the orchestra seems to have been made already by the management. The deficit is plainly due to excess of salaries paid orchestra players and conductor over receipts from sale of tickets. To balance the budget on strictly business principles either the salaries ought to be lowered or the price of tickets raised.

HER JAN 2

SYMPHONY GIVES 13TH CONCERT

Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring" Heard for the First Time Here

FAMILIAR PASTORAL BEAUTIFULLYPLAYED

By PHILIP HALE

The 13th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Beethoven, Pastoral Symphony; Monteverdi, Recitative and Lament of Ariadne; Mahler, Three Songs with orchestra: "Primal Light," "Earthly Life," "Who thought out the little Song" (Mme. Marya Freund, mezzo soprano); Stravinsky, "The Rite of Spring" (first time in Boston).

A finer performance of Beethoven's symphony is hardly imaginable. Too often the symphony is treated in a perfunctory manner, as if it were an old story that needed no care in the retelling. Then one is tempted to repeat the remark of a famous Boston woman, who, told by a friend that she was going into the country, said; "Kick a tree for me." Too often the audience dozes by Beethoven's brookside, and its thanksgiving after the storm is in recognition of the fact that the symphony is nearing its end.

Yesterday the performance was so euphonious, the tempi were so judiciously taken, the phrasing and the nuances were so exquisite, that the symphony again became a thing of beauty. The thunderstorm was not, as in times past, discreet, almost apologetic; it was portrayed dramatically, yet without extravagant emphasis.

Beethoven has never had here so sympathetic an interpreter as Mr. Monteux; nor has any conductor before him had so plastic, responsive and superb orchestra.

When Mme. Culp sang Ariadne's Lament at these concerts she used the accompaniment arranged by Respighi. It was for full orchestra. The arrangement yesterday was by Gustave Doret, the Swiss composed, for strings and harp. Monteverdi was in the habit of employing many instruments, some of which are obsolete. Mme. Freund sang the old music with genuine feeling, with depressed rather than boisterous emotion. She displayed the intelligence and refinement of her art in the songs by Mahler, who had ingeniously orchestrated the accompaniments.

Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring" was not so terrible. So deliriously exciting and cacophonous as was feared. After Ernest Newman had heard this music several times, he wrote: "The Grand Guignol convulsions of it are losing what power they once had to make me sit up. . . . I found myself sitting as calmly through Stravinsky's terrific screaming and drum-pounding as I would if I were cradled in the heart of an earthquake and knew myself to be absolutely safe."

Much nonsense has been written about this composition by commentators, who have found the music symbolical, even phallic; who have talked about "the enormous and terrible shaping of the visible and invisible world through movement." Some have gone to Sir J. G. Frazer's "Golden Bough" for "explanation." Others quote Stravinsky as saying that the work is to be regarded as abstract music in all but name, a modern symphony. But "The Rite of Spring" was produced as a ballet, and in the score for concert use the explanatory sub-titles are retained.

And the music to be appreciated, liked or disliked with understanding, should be heard with the ballet on the stage. Otherwise much of it is without significance and irritatingly tiresome. There are beautiful pages in the first part, as the measures for flutes; there are impressive pages as "the entrance of the old man, the Celebrant; there are exciting, frenzied pages as in "The Dance of the Earth." The second part, "The Sacrifice," we found for the most part dull, exasperating with its succession of pauses and resumptions, its repetitions of trivial measures, while the ending, "The Sacrificial Dance of the Chosen One," is disappointing. In this second part there seems to be a paucity of invention, a lack of imagination.

Perhaps these words could not justly be applied to the music of the second part if it were heard with the ballet in the theatre. In the concert hall there were, yesterday, musical moments of greatness, especially in the first part; there was interest in the extraordinary instrumentation; but too much of the music seemed noisily commonplace, too "physical." It is needless to say that Mr. Monteux, who conducted the first performances of the ballet in Paris, both in the theatre and as concert music, had rehearsed his virtuoso orchestra, so that in all probability there has never been so brilliant a rendering.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will be out of town next week. The program for Feb. 8, 9, is as follows: Brahms, Symphony No. 3, F major; Loeffler, "A Pagan Poem" (after Virgil: Motte Lacroix, pianist; Louis Speyer, English horn); Strauss, Tone Poem "Death and Transfiguration."

[183]

REDUCTION
RATIO
16x

2.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

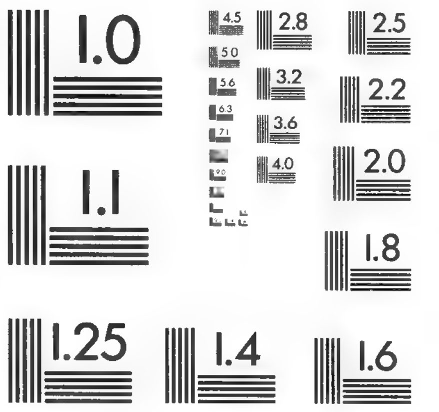
1.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm



1.0 mm

1.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

A5

A4

A3

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

3.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

INFORMATION OBSCURED

CIVES
ONCERT
The Rite of d for the e Here
ASTORAL
LYPLAYED
HALE

GLOBE JAN 26

DERN CLASSIC AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Stravinsky's "Le Sacre" for First Time Here

Daring Music Wins Cordial and Prolonged Applause

Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps," described by its subtitle "A Picture of Pagan Russia," and first performed with ballet in Paris in 1913 with Mr Monteux conducting, was played for the first time in Boston and the second time in America yesterday afternoon. No music more startling to timid ears has been heard here since Schienberg's Five Orchestral Pieces, in 1914. Those who feel with the writer that this music, whether or not one likes or approves of it as a whole, plainly marks a turning point in the history of music, have been battering in what turned out to be open doors in defense of Mr Monteux's inclusion of it on the program. For it was received with loud and prolonged applause from a number so large that one was not sure it was not a majority of those present. Mr Monteux was recalled again and again, even after he had bade the orchestra share the applause with him. Finally the players began applauding him, because this music is inhumanly difficult to conduct and he had given a thrilling performance.

The few irate conservatives who departed during the pause between the first and second sections of "Le Sacre" ought to have heard the rest of it, if only to be quite sure that they want no more Stravinsky. Nothing else in Mr Monteux's conductorship has been so worthy of unstinted praise as this performance of "Le Sacre," which will be remembered for years to come as a musical landmark.

Stravinsky in writing this music had evidently made up his mind that the whole language of music evolved and employed by composers for three centuries past was not capable of further use as it stood. This he has in common with all except Pizzetti among important living composers. Instead of trying to invent an entire new musical system as Schoenberg, Skriabin, and latterly, if press comment may be trusted, Hindemith have done, Stravinsky has sought moods and feelings hitherto ruled out of music, and in the matter of means of expression contented himself with using unresolved dissonances in two beys at once and combining as many as four different and vigorous rhythms, none of which can be written out without constant changes of time signature. He does not abandon the major and minor scale, which means that he is still within the limits of the orthodox musical system.

The composer himself has made short work of the rhapsodical commentators on the piece. "Pagan Russia," according to him, was an after thought. He had imagined ruthless, primitive, vigorous music and wanted to invent a title for it. Had he been an American he might have called it "The Snake Dance in the Stadium" or "Armistice Day."

The program does not matter, nor does this music suffer from the absence of the illustrative action of the ballet. It is logically and powerfully imagined, and worked out for orchestra with superlative ingenuity and adroitness of technique. A young composer might as well hope to imitate Wagner, Beethoven or Mozart as imitate Stravinsky. This music ought to be played again this season.

In Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony the rather trivial thunder storm was unusually effectively played and much of the glory of the rest of the masterpiece obscured by a routine performance. This piece is sui generis. There will never be anything else like it. Mme Marya Freund, the soloist, sang Monteverde's poignant "Lament of Ariadne" and three fine Mahler songs tastefully, but with more musicianship than beauty of tone.

P. R.

TRANS JAN 26

Monday evening, Feb. 4, in Symphony Hall, the third of the supplementary concerts by the Symphony Orchestra, for the pleasure of a public now firmly won. It prefers programmes of "standard pieces"; it likes soloists; it is disinclined to the lengthier and more exacting series of "regular concerts"; yet it is content with no inferior piece of performance. Claudio Arrau, a rising South American, will be the assisting pianist. The programme traverses Mozart's "Jupiter Symphony"; Charpentier's pictorial "Italian Impressions"; Chopin's Concerto in F minor for Piano and Orchestra.

HER JAN 26

ONE SCHNEEVOIGHT

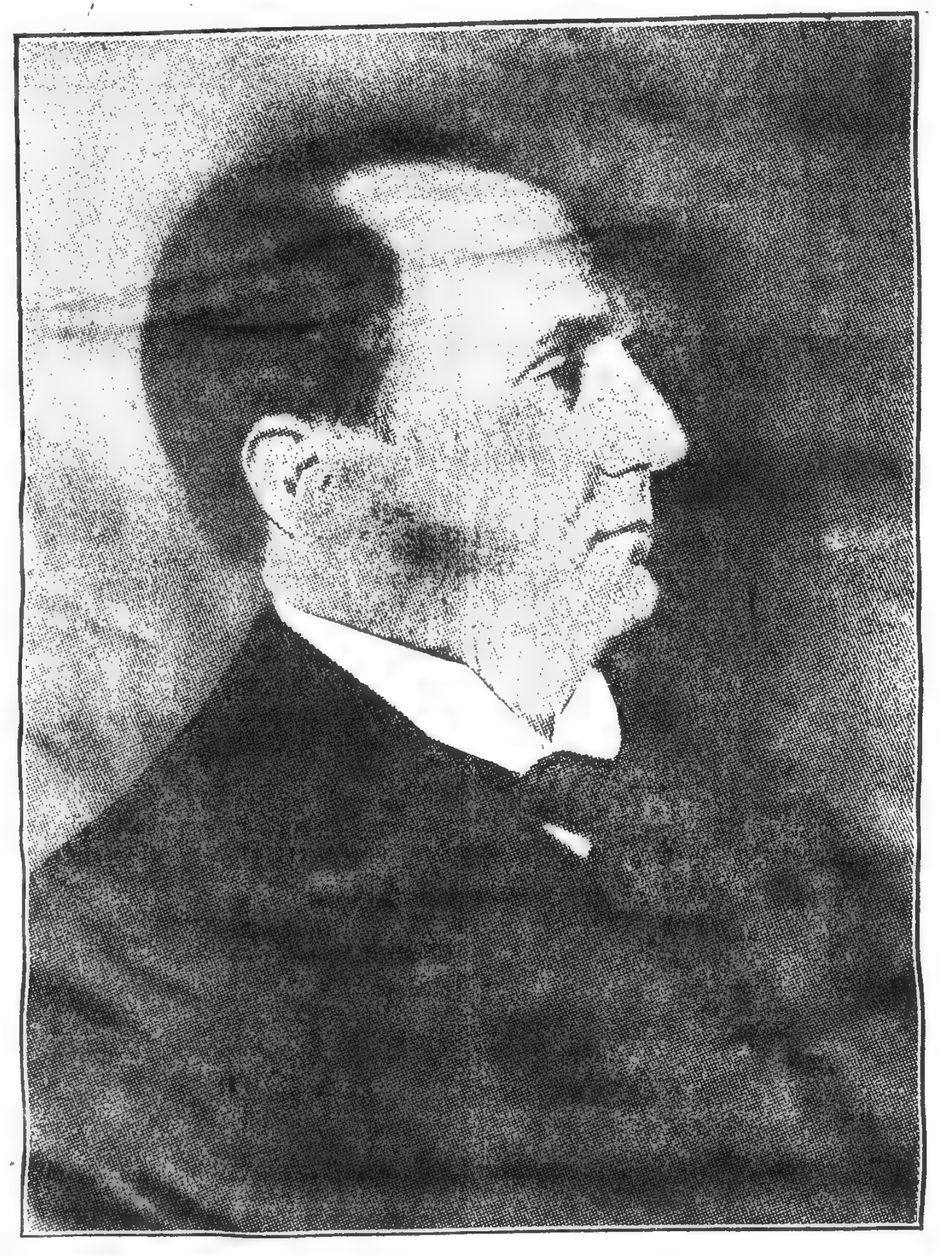
Georg Schneevoight, who will appear as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra for a pair of concerts, was born at Wiborg, Finland, on Nov. 8, 1872. He studied music at Helsingfors, Sonderhausen, Leipsic, Dresden, Brussels. From 1894 to 1899 he taught the violoncello at the Helsingfors Conservatory and was a member of the Philharmonic orchestra. Since 1901 he has conducted, as a guest, in many European cities.

The engagement of "guest" conductors is, as a rule, to be deplored. As Mr. Monteux, to the regret of the audience, will leave Boston at the end of this season, his absence from the conductor's stand for even one concert will be mourned.

TRANS JAN 23

Another Guest-Conductor Comes to the Symphony Orchestra

Schneevoigt, the Finn, at the Concerts of March 7 and 8



(By Courtesy of The Musical Courier)

Georg Schneevoigt

THE happy precedent of last winter is to be renewed at the Symphony Concerts. For a second time, by invitation of The Trustees, in which Mr. Monteux joins, the Symphony Orchestra will entertain a Guest-conductor—Georg Schneevoigt, of Helsingfors, capital city of Finland. He is on his way to the United States in response to several such invitations. To Boston he will come for the Symphony Concerts of Friday afternoon, March 7, and Saturday evening, March 8—in a programme yet to be chosen.

Mr. Schneevoigt, a Finn by birth as well by residence, is in the prime of the arly fifties. He was schooled as a musician in Brussels and Dresden. He rose from violoncello-player to conductor, practising his profession at Riga, Munich and Helsingfors through long terms and in incidental visits to Scandinavian and German cities. For four years past, Western Europe has discovered his powers at the symphony concerts of Scheveningen, the international watering-place a few miles from The Hague, in summer a capital of various music. First performances, under Mr. Schneevoigt's hand in Helsingfors, of Sibelius's music had spread his name westward. Scheveningen then confirmed his quality. Now Boston and other American cities are to taste it.

H. T. P.

SCHNEEVOIGT TO WIELD BATON HERE

Finn Musician to Conduct Symphony March 7-8

Georg Schneevoigt, the Finnish conductor, has accepted the invitation of Judge Frederick P. Cabot, representing the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra, to be guest conductor at concerts in Symphony hall, March 7 and 8. Mr. Monteux has been invited by the directors of the People's Symphony orchestra to appear as guest conductor. Since he will be released from rehearsals and concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra in the first week of March, Mr. Monteux has accepted this invitation, with the concurrence of the trustees, for the ensuing Sunday. The concert will be given in the St. James Theatre on March 9.

Mr. Schneevoigt expects soon to sail for America. He has long been prominent in Helsingfors, and likewise in Norway and Sweden, where, as conductor of the Stockholm and Christiania Symphony orchestras for many seasons, he has given a musical importance to the Scandinavian cities. In the last four seasons he has attracted attention by concerts in the Kurhaus in Scheveningen, Holland. He has maintained symphonic standards in all his programs and yet drawn crowds in the summer season when popular concerts are the general rule.

TRANS JAN 26

Milestone of Music, Masterpiece in Kind

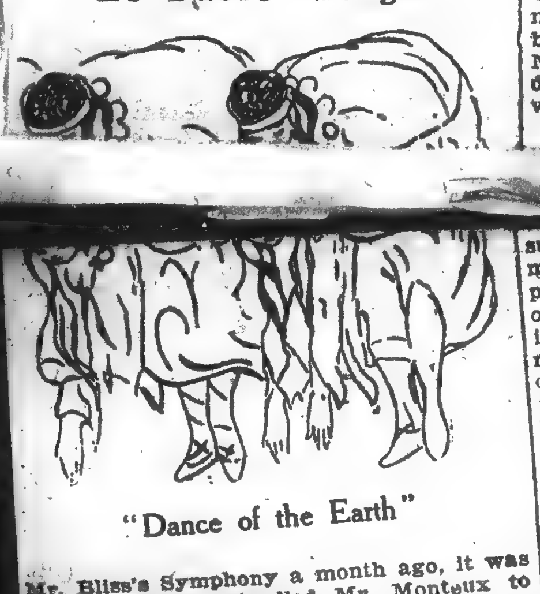
Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring" for the First Time in Boston---Record and Reception---Exceptional Honors to Mr. Monteux---Course and Purport of the Piece---Procedure and Outcome---New Powers Released, New Vistas Opened

FIRST of all let the record be written as accurately and briefly as it may. For it is believable that a future historian of the Boston Orchestra, continuing Mr. Howe's chronicle and recounting the conductorship of Pierre Monteux, will note in particular the Symphony Concert of Friday, Jan. 25, 1924. Then and there, he may write, was first heard in Boston a masterpiece that had altered the whole course of music in our time; that had become beacon and goal to a whole generation of composers up and down the European and American earth. That masterpiece, he may continue, was Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring"—not in its earlier and natural guise as ballet-pantomime of the theatre; but in its second and necessary incarnation as tone-poem of the concert-hall. It was so played—he is bound to add—because through ten years that same Pierre Monteux had believed in this music and treasured it. A man of faith and courage, devotion and diligence, he at last brought it to performance in the city where he had rounded and crowned his career. Out of himself and out of an orchestra that through weeks of preparation had worked eagerly and unsparingly, he achieved a performance that summoned the body and voice, the movement, the color, the veritable life and being of Stravinsky's music. More, as the chronicle may end, when the audience was applauding and re-applauding Mr. Monteux, and he had bidden the band rise as well, his men turned upon him and with common and hearty impulse clapped him as the hero and master of the day.

A foot-note upon those imaginary pages may also contain minutiæ of the afternoon. In the subscribers' seats sat the usual audience; but even a heralded occasion could not fill all the places now mistakenly reserved for chance comers. This company heard with no little pleasure, answered with no small applause, a performance of Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony," exceptionally fine-textured and radiant in tone, animated and resilient in progress, smiling with the lively or the gentle moods, the sport or the sentiment, of the music. It also listened with interest to Mme. Marya Freund, newcoming singer, as her wine-dark tones flowed through an ancient air of Monteverdi and three songs from Mahler in simple or sublimated mood. Since Mme. Freund is a singer less of lavish and sensuous voice than of finely imagined and artfully colored tones; since she more cultivates a penetrating finesse than a power outpoured, her hearers betrayed no excitement.

Though the fame and the nature of the music must have been widespread, few departed on the verge of "The Rite of Spring." No more did any square themselves as for an ordeal. . . . In the concert-room, as in the theatre, the piece falls into two parts or scenes. Through the first, music and performance, curiosity and excitement, satisfaction or surprise held the whole hall intent. Obviously, many had not anticipated Mr. Monteux's pause between the two divisions. For an instant a gap of silence. Then, from every quarter of the hall applause began to rattle. Simultaneously, and likewise from all parts of the house, some seventy or eighty—less than a hundred at the utmost—went their ways. Of these, a few moved to the doors with that air of scornful superiority and released resentment which, no doubt, is as comforting to spirits in stress as it is amusing to detached eyes. Toward the climax of the second part of "The Rite," through measures that depend beyond any others upon stage-action and stage-picture, there were signs of restless hearers, and incidental departures. Quickly came the end—and therewith such a burst of applause, on all sides and from many hands, as no modernist music has hitherto won in Symphony Hall. Compared with the thin patter that approved Mr. Bliss's Symphony a month ago, it was an ovation. It recalled Mr. Monteux to the platform; brought the orchestra to its feet; held the conductor fast between clapping band and clapping audience. Once more Stravinsky had prevailed and Pierre Monteux had been his voice. With reason, the composer wrote "the homage" elsewhere set upon this record.

"Le Sacre" Staged



"Dance of the Earth"

Before such music as "The Rite of Spring," it seems the office of the reviewer even in a daily newspaper, to put by both antipathies and enthusiasms; to listen with willing ear and open mind; to waive away pre-conceptions or illusions; to discover, so far as he may, the purpose of the composer, the means employed, the degree of fulfilment. So doing, the reviewer will record his impressions of the piece; while through them he may be fortunate enough to adumbrate the mind, the spirit, the handiwork and the specific achievement of the composer in the music in hand. The reviewer, again, should be neither defender nor prosecutor. Yet he would be less than human—and so unfit for the job—did not his impressions disclose his predilections. A stone-man could hardly be indifferent before "The Rite of Spring: Scenes, in Two Parts, from Pagan Russia. Scenario by Nicholas Roerich; Music by Igor Stravinsky; Choreography by Vaslav Nijinsky; Produced for the First Time at the Théatre des Champs-Elysées at Paris on May 29, 1913."

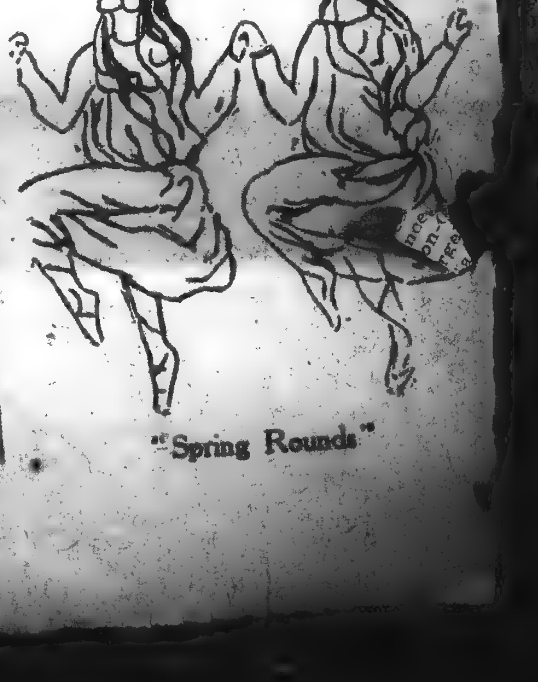
By the equal evidence of page and performance Stravinsky has written both a self-contained and an objective music. It is self-contained, because, heard apart from all suggestions of scenario or programme-labels, it remains a unified, close knit, steadily advancing, fully culminated design. It is bound together by recurring and interwoven motivs, used not as integers in a Wagnerian system; but in accord with the composer's imaginative need and will. It is also compact with reiterated, recurring, steadily intensified rhythms. The tonal structure is further buttressed by great piles and pillars of chords. Furthermore; if the hearer once surrenders himself, at the outset, to the course of this music, it bears him forward as upon some broad, mighty, darkling current. Scrutinize it closely on the pages of the score, listen to it intently in the concert-hall, and it generates itself from itself—in strength upon strength.

In "The Rite of Spring" Stravinsky has also written an intensely objective music. It may now please him to say that the scenario of Roerich, the picturing and the action of the whole ballet, were an afterthought—a convenient vehicle for a music already self-sustained. If so, the excellent Roerich (whose testimony would be interesting in these matters) must have possessed a faculty of supernatural divination when he so mated outer stage-scheme to inner substance and spirit. The scenario lays the scene in a primitive and pagan Russia; while, before or after that fact, Stravinsky has written a music often savage in matter, brutal in march, primordial in suggestion. The scenario invokes the dark and dread suggestion of the vastness, the mystery, the fatalistic puissance of nature upon primitive spirits. Time and again, of such imagery and import happened, or was designed, to be Stravinsky's music. Pages upon pages rip with the thrusts, rain with the blows, upleap with the iterations of a fierce and frenzied energy. Of such, by a fortunate coincidence, is many a rite of this spring-sacrifice.

The music softens and charms, folk-like; while somehow the scenario chances to flow into "Rounds of Spring" and "Mystical Circles." Stravinsky wrote measures of mystery, now palpitating and piercing, again sombre and boding. They prelude the two divisions of "The Rite." They also lift the curtain, in a marvel of illusion, upon Roerich's pagan world, leaping from stupors of dread into frenzies of elation. Either division of the ballet ends in such furies of tumult, such tempest of motion. Call the music fortunate in the complementary scenario; the scenario thrice-blessed with the self-determined music. Neither alternative diminishes the stripped directness, the seething objectivity, of Stravinsky's measures.

Embarked upon these courses, Stravinsky summons every essential or enha means, old or new. With either, as the painters would say, his handling is all his own. As he forswears the intricate and—in any other hands—rigid system of Wagner's motivs, introducing, labelling and recurring, so he discards the Wagnerian and the Straussian complexity of counterpoint, luxuriance of harmony, thick-textured instrumentation, prepared transition, climax long up-surging. Into his own metal he converts at will and need whatever they have infused into the substance or wrought upon the surface of music universal. Similarly Stravinsky eschews the courses of Debussy and the subsequent coteries of impressionists. He flouts evanescence and iridescence. He will have none of delicate and titillating dissonance. His canvas is coarse beside Debussyan tapestries, silken and fine-spun. His instrumental colors flare naked and primary; not in delicate fusions or contrasts of tints and demi-tints. Yet to those very impressionists and to Debussy writing for the theatre or in puissant mood, Stravinsky's uppiled and juxtaposed chords, his binding and compelling rhythms, owe not a little. He would not prevail as he does, did he not link the new ways with the old. He receives the torch, not to extinguish it but to blow it into fresher, brighter blaze.

"Le Sacre" Staged



"Spring Rounds"

For his own part, of his own genius—for it is time to use that rare and spacious word—Stravinsky, in "The Rite of Spring," attains a power of rhythm above any that music, before him, knows. It can be monstruously brutal, fierce and savage. It can pound and crunch until the ear and the spirit first resent and then thrill to such tremendous, reiterated, yet ever-changing impact. Of such were the paroxysms of "Le Sacre." Again this rhythm can whirr as though the darkling forces of nature were in mysterious, insinuating and insistent under-motion. Yet again, and this rhythm leaps, as though less an impulse than a vertigo had mounted from the earth into those that would renew by their rites its fertility, as though the summoned sap of spring had fermented [illegible] the instant into the headies [illegible] And this rhythm [illegible] bright, as gracious [illegible] dancing virgins through [illegible] beats.

A new world of rhythmic [illegible] pours from "Le Sacre" upon m[illegible] new world of the power of ch[illegible] them as Stravinsky uprears the[illegible] upon mass. Hear them as he stre[illegible] like monoliths along the path of his music. Hear them as like battle-axes they cleave measures and pages into dissonance. Again there is no doubting. Stravinsky, so imagining, so employing, chords, has vested tones with a new power. Observe again his abrupt transitions, bare and acrid harmonies, rending dissonances. They are not arbitrary, or fantastic, or mannered, or ostentatious, as in some sterile modernists and the pretending pseudo-modernists. Rather, they seem the inevitable turn of the musical thought, the foreordained progress of the musical design, the method that summons the mood, the stroke that conveys the imagery.

Even so with Stravinsky's juxtaposed and superposed keys, not usually in such unchaste relationships. Gradually he leads his music from accustomed voice into this polytony. Thereby the thought, the imagining, the whole quality and process of the measures become more sharply characterized. Writing in this recent fashion, Stravinsky is following a necessity of his design and speech—not whirling a new and screaming toy under the shocked noses—or rather ears—of his orthodox elders.

Listen, finally, to the play of Stravinsky's [illegible] voices through the lengths and breadths, the depths and heights, of "The Rite." At moments, indeed, he holds them tight in choirs or groups that he may so wield their compacted power. Far oftener, he parts them; isolates them for the fraction of an instant; strips them to the quick; makes play with their individual and essential quality until the ear and the imagination receive a sensation, an impulse veritably strange, penetrating and exciting. Stravinsky wings the power, deepens the intensity of his orchestral voices; from them wrings new secrets. He masses them in "Le Sacre"—and overwhelms. He individualizes them in "Le Sacre"—and pierces. The imagery and the practice of instrumentation are no longer as Rimsky-Korsakov and Richard Strauss left them.

The ultimate tests, the deep-seated and mulating pleasures, of music are its uty or its power or both within it comngled; its self-contained integrity of ought, emotion and progress; its enhan g illusion of sensations and images oute itself. To every one of these criteria The Rite of Spring" answers full, firm and ear. Beauty haunts those mysterious predings; exhales from those mystical rounds" and dances; brightens the course f the lighter rites. From measure upon easure also springs that sense of a glamous and piercing instant which is beauty nged and swift. For power what is "Le cre' for page upon page, but the very springing and outflinging of it, now sav and frenzied, now solemn, sombre, sterious; yet again ecstasies of energy, athomable, irresistible? By twenty fs "The Rite" is a self-generated, selftained music. By a hundred, it projects vivifies the outer semblance, the inner it of these "Two Scenes of Pagan Rus glorifying the earth and the powers ature, renewing the annual sacrifice of world fertilized and energized by the ng. We of the early twentieth century ansitional but not unblessed time in arts—have had from Wagner our roic music; from Strauss our realistic ic, with the romantic blended; from De our music of dream visioned until its glamor is poignant. Now from Stravinsky outleaps our music of the energy, the zest, the glow, of life. In him, in "Le Sacre" above all his other pieces, this life-force is transmuted and enkindled into tones. Enlarged, intensified, again stands music—waiting the next and glorious comer.

It has been the fortune of some of us whose daily stint is to write of music and the theatre, to sit before Debussy's "Pelléas and Mélisande" as new opera; before Musorgsky's "Boris Godunov" as discovered op ra in the Western world; before Strauss's "Don Quixote" as new tone-poem—and to know intuitively and assuredly that we were in presence of a masterpiece. Yesterday, before Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring," that sensation, faith and exaltation returned. The bringers were Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

H. T. P.

The Pace Quickens

$10,000 Added Within a Week to the Guarantee Fund for the Symphony Orchestra

BY $10,000 the Guarantee Fund for the current expenses of the Symphony Concerts has mounted during the past week. On Friday, Jan. 18, it stood at $68,479.34. Yesterday it had risen to $78,884.34. Though new subscribers have been few, they have also been generous. These names are:

Badger, Dr. and Mrs. George S. C.
Beckwith, Mrs. Daniel, Providence.
Cochran, Mrs. Edwin Paul, New Haven.
Frost, Horace W.
Hornblower, Henry.
Hornblower, Mrs. Henry.
Kaffenburgh, Mr. and Mrs. Carl J.
Lyons, John A.
Moseley, Mrs. F. S.
Stevens, Moses T.
Tappan, Mrs. Frederick H.
Ware, Henry.

With such an increase, the prospects for the final rounding of the Guarantee Fund brighten. Approximately $95,000 is necessary as insurance against the probable deficit for the present working year. In round figures $16,000 more should be pledged. A fortnight more of subscriptions like those here recorded and the trick is turned. The more generous the guarantors, the more will their good work praise them. The more numerous they are, the closer come the Symphony Concerts to those that hear them.

Tribute Well Won

A Pier[illegible] onteux ave[illegible] souve[illegible]
[illegible] nirs'
[illegible] s au[illegible] de travail [illegible] n son admirateur
Igor Strawinsky
Paris 10 juin 22

Stravinsky Salutes Monteux

Inscription Below a Recent Photograph

Loon' was [illegible] more, [illegible] ll I die."
garet Bondfield will leave first woman represen Government at a mee body of the intern
League of Nations

INFORMATION OBSCURED

JAN 26

...Y GIVES ...ONCERT

The Rite of ...rd for the ...e Here

...ASTORAL ...LY PLAYED

HALE

the Boston Sym-
. Monteux con-
sterday afternoon.
The program was
, Pastoral Symecitative and La-hler, Three Songs
'Primal Light," thought out the Marya Freund,
insky, "The Rite
in Boston).
e of Beethoven's imaginable. Too treated in a perf it were an old care in the re-tempted to rea famous Boston a friend that she ntry, said; "Kick often the audi-oven's brookside,
fter the storm is act that the sym-
nd.
ormance was so
! were so judihrasing and the uisite, that the ame a thing of torm was not, as t, almost apoled dramatically,
ant emphasis.
had here so sym-
as Mr. Mon-conductor before sponsive and sung Ariadne's La-

she used the ac-
by Respighi. It
The arrange-
Gustave Doret, or strings and
in the habit of ments, some of
ne. Freund sang ine feeling, with boisterous emo-intelligence and the songs by eniously orchesents.
Spring" was not sly exciting and feared. After eard this music
e: "The Grand it are losing ad to make me myself sitting avinsky's terrific pounding as I d in the heart
new myself to been written by commentathe music; symho have talked

d terrible shap-invisible world
ome have gone Golden Bough"
ers quote Stra-e work is to be usic in all but ny. But "The produced as a for concert use es are retained.
ppreciated, liked standing, should et on the stage.
is without sig-
ingly tiresome.
ages in the first or flutes; there
"the entrance of rant; there are s as in "The
The second part,
nd for the most
with its suc-resumptions, its measures, while ificial Dance of sapponting. In-seems to be a ack of imagina-

could not justly c of the second ith the ballet in oncert hall there cal moments of the first part;
he extraordinary oo much of the ommonplace, too less to say that nducted the first ballet in Paris, and as concert
d his virtuoso all probability so brilliant a repeated tonight.

ut of town next r Feb. 8, 9, is as mphony No. 3, Pagan Poem"
acroix, pianist;
horn); Strauss,
and Transfigura-

GLOBE JAN 26

MODERN CLASSIC AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Stravinsky's "Le Sacre" for First Time Here

Daring Music Wins Cordial and Prolonged Applause

Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps," described by its subtitle "A Picture of Pagan Russia," and first performed with ballet in Paris in 1913 with Mr Monteux conducting, was played for the first time in Boston and the second time in America yesterday afternoon. No music more startling to timid ears has been heard here since Schienberg's Five Orchestral Pieces, in 1914. Those who feel with the writer that this music, whether or not one likes or approves of it as a whole, plainly marks a turning point in the history of music, have been battering in what turned out to be open doors in defense of Mr Monteux's inclusion of it on the program.

For it was received with loud and prolonged applause from a number so large that one was not sure it was not a majority of those present. Mr Monteux was recalled again and again, even after he had bade the orchestra share the applause with him. Finally the players began applauding him, because this music is inhumanly difficult to conduct and he had given a thrilling performance.

The few irate conservatives who departed dur'ng the pause between the first and second sections of "Le Sacre" ought to have heard the rest of it, if only to be quite sure that they want no more Stravinsky. Nothing else in Mr Monteux's conductorship has been so worthy of unstinted praise as this performance of "Le Sacre," which will be remembered for years to come as a musical landmark.

Stravinsky in writing this music had evidently made up his mind that the whole language of music evolved and employed by composers for three centuries past was not capable of further use as it stood. This he has in common with all except Pizzetti among important living composers. Instead of trying to invent an entire new musical system as Schoenberg, Skriabin, and latterly, if press comment may be trusted, Hindemith have done, Stravinsky has sought moods and feelings hitherto ruled out of music, and in the matter of means of expression contented himself with using unresolved dissonances in two keys at once and combining as many as four different and vigorous rhythms, none of which can be written out without constant changes of time signature. He does not abandon the major and minor scale, which means that he is still within the limits of the orthodox musical system.

The composer himself has made short work of the rhapsodical commentators on the piece. "Pagan Russia," according to him, was an after thought. He had imagined ruthless, primitive, vigorous music and wanted to invent a title for it. Had he been an American he might have called it "The Snake Dance in the Stadium" or "Armistice Day."

The program does not matter, nor does this music suffer from the absence of the illustrative action of the ballet. It is logically and powerfully imagined, and worked out for orchestra with superlative ingenuity and adroitness of technique. A young composer might as well hope to imitate Wagner, Beethoven or Mozart as imitate Stravinsky. This music ought to be played again here this season.

In Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony the rather trivial thunder storm was unusually effectively played and much of the glory of the rest of the masterpiece obscured by a routine performance. This piece is sui generis. There will never be anything else like it. Mme Marya Freund, the soloist, sang Monteverde's poignant "Lament of Ariadne" and three fine Mahler songs tastefully, but with more musicianship than beauty of tone.

P. R.

TRANS JAN 26

Monday evening, Feb. 4, in Symphony Hall, the third of the supplementary concerts by the Symphony Orchestra, for the pleasure of a public now firmly won. It prefers programmes of "standard pieces"; it likes soloists; it is disinclined to the lengthier and more exacting series of "regular concerts"; yet it is content with no inferior piece of performance. Claudio Arrau, a rising South American, will be the assisting pianist. The programme traverses Mozart's "Jupiter Symphony"; Charpentier's pictorial "Italian Impressions"; Chopin's Concerto in F minor for Piano and Orchestra.

HER JAN 26

ONE SCHNEEVOIGHT

Georg Schneevoight, who will appear as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra for a pair of concerts, was born at Wiborg, Finland, on Nov. [illegible], 1872. He studied music at Helsingfors, Sonderhausen, Leipsic, Dresden, Brussels. From 1891 to 1899 he taught the violoncello at the Helsingfors Conservatory and was a member of the Philharmonic orchestra. Since 1901 he has conducted, as a guest, in many European cities.

The engagement of "guest" conductors is, as a rule, to be deplored. As Mr. Monteux, to the regret of the audience, will leave Boston at the end of this season, his absence from the conductor's stand for even one concert will be mourned.

TRANS JAN 23

Another Guest-Conductor Comes to the Symphony Orchestra

Schneevoigt, the Finn, at the Concerts of March 7 and 8

(By Courtesy of The Musical Courier)

Georg Schneevoigt

THE happy precedent of last winter is to be renewed at the Symphony Concerts. For a second time, by invitation of The Trustees, in which Mr. Monteux joins, the Symphony Orchestra will entertain a Guest-conductor—Georg Schneevoigt, of Helsingfors, capital city of Finland. He is on his way to the United States in response to several such invitations. To Boston he will come for the Symphony Concerts of Friday afternoon, March 7, and Saturday evening, March 8—in a programme yet to be chosen.

Mr. Schneevoigt, a Finn by birth as well by residence, is in the prime of the early fifties. He was schooled as a musician in Brussels and Dresden. He rose from violoncello-player to conductor, practising his profession at Riga, Munich and Helsingfors through long terms and in incidental visits to Scandinavian and German cities. For four years past, Western Europe has discovered his powers at the symphony concerts of Scheveningen, the international watering-place a few miles from The Hague, in summer a capital of various music. First performances, under Mr. Schneevoigt's hand in Helsingfors, of Sibelius's music had spread his name westward. Scheveningen then confirmed his quality. Now Boston and other American cities are to taste it.

H. T. P.

SCHNEEVOIGT TO WIELD BATON HERE

Finn Musician to Conduct Symphony March 7-8

Georg Schneevoigt, the Finnish conductor, has accepted the invitation of Judge Frederick P. Cabot, representing the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra, to be guest conductor at concerts in Symphony hall, March 7 and 8. Mr. Monteux has been invited by the directors of the People's Symphony orchestra to appear as guest conductor. Since he will be released from rehearsals and concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra in the first week of March, Mr. Monteux has accepted this invitation, with the concurrence of the trustees, for the ensuing Sunday. The concert will be given in the St. James Theatre on March 9.

Mr. Schneevoigt expects soon to sail for America. He has long been prominent in Helsingfors, and likewise in Norway and Sweden, where, as conductor of the Stockholm and Christiania Symphony orchestras for many seasons, he has given a musical importance to the Scandinavian cities. In the last four seasons he has attracted attention by concerts in the Kurhaus in Scheveningen, Holland. He has maintained symphonic standards in all his programs and yet drawn crowds in the summer season when popular concerts are the general rule.

TRANS JAN 26

Milestone of Music, Masterpiece in Kind

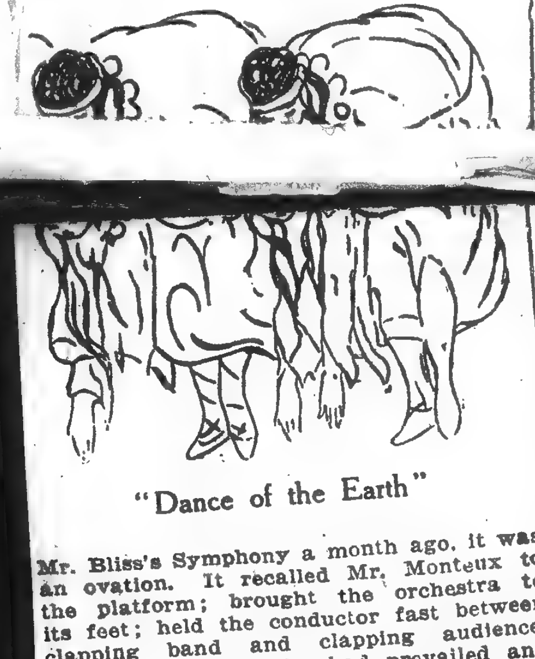
Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring" for the First Time in Boston---Record and Reception---Exceptional Honors to Mr. Monteux---Course and Purport of the Piece---Procedure and Outcome---New Powers Released, New Vistas Opened

FIRST of all let the record be written as accurately and briefly as it may. For it is believable that a future historian of the Boston Orchestra, continuing Mr. Howe's chronicle and recounting the conductorship of Pierre Monteux, will note in particular the Symphony Concert of Friday, Jan. 25, 1924. Then and there, he may write, was first heard in Boston a masterpiece that had altered the whole course of music in our time; that had become beacon and goal to a whole generation of composers up and down the European and American earth. That masterpiece, he may continue, was Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring"—not in its earlier and natural guise as ballet-pantomime of the theatre; but in its second and necessary incarnation as tone-poem of the concert-hall. It was so played—he is bound to add—because through ten years that same Pierre Monteux had believed in this music and treasured it. A man of faith and courage, devotion and diligence, he at last brought it to performance in the city where he had rounded and crowned his career. Out of himself and out of an orchestra that through weeks of preparation had worked eagerly and unsparingly, he achieved a performance that summoned the body and voice, the movement, the color, the veritable life and being of Stravinsky's music. More, as the chronicle may end, when the audience was applauding and re-applauding Mr. Monteux, and he had bidden the band rise as well, his men turned upon him and with common and hearty impulse clapped him as the hero and master of the day.

A foot-note upon those imaginary pages may also contain minutiæ of the afternoon. In the subscribers' seats sat the usual audience; but even a heralded occasion could not fill all the places now mistakenly reserved for chance comers. This company heard with no little pleasure, answered with no small applause, a performance of Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony," exceptionally fine-textured and radiant in tone, animated and resilient in progress, smiling with the lively or the gentle moods, the sport or the sentiment, of the music. It also listened with interest to Mme. Marya Freund, newcoming singer, as her wine-dark tones flowed through an ancient air of Monteverdi and three songs from Mahler in simple or sublimated mood. Since Mme. Freund is a singer less of lavish and sensuous voice than of finely imagined and artfully colored tones; since she more cultivates a penetrating finesse than a power outpoured, her hearers betrayed no excitement.

Though the fame and the nature of the music must have been widespread, few departed on the verge of "The Rite of Spring." No more did any square themselves as for an ordeal. . . . In the concert-room, as in the theatre, the piece falls into two parts or scenes. Through the first, music and performance, curiosity and excitement, satisfaction or surprise held the whole hall intent. Obviously, many had not anticipated Mr. Monteux's pause between the two divisions. For an instant a gap of silence. Then, from every quarter of the hall applause began to rattle. Simultaneously, and likewise from all parts of the house, some seventy or eighty—less than a hundred at the utmost—went their ways. Of these, a few moved to the doors with that air of scornful superiority and released resentment which, no doubt, is as comforting to spirits in stress as it is amusing to detached eyes. Toward the climax of the second part of "The Rite," through measures that depend beyond any others upon stage-action and stage-picture, there were signs of restless hearers, and incidental departures. Quickly came the end—and therewith such a burst of applause, on all sides and from many hands, as no modernist music has hitherto won in Symphony Hall. Compared with the thin patter that approved Mr. Bliss's Symphony a month ago, it was an ovation. It recalled Mr. Monteux to the platform; brought the orchestra to its feet; held the conductor fast between clapping band and clapping audience. Once more Stravinsky had prevailed and Pierre Monteux had been his voice. With reason, the composer wrote "the homage" elsewhere set upon this record.

"Le Sacre" Staged



"Dance of the Earth"

Before such music as "The Rite of Spring," it seems the office of the reviewer, even in a daily newspaper, to put by both antipathies and enthusiasms; to listen with willing ear and open mind; to waive away pre-conceptions or illusions; to discover, so far as he may, the purpose of the composer, the means employed, the degree of fulfilment. So doing, the reviewer will record his impressions of the piece; while through them he may be fortunate enough to adumbrate the mind, the spirit, the handiwork and the specific achievement of the composer in the music in hand. The reviewer, again, should be neither defender nor prosecutor. Yet he would be less than human—and so unfit for the job—did not his impressions disclose his predilections. A stone-man could hardly be indifferent before "The Rite of Spring: Scenes, in Two Parts, from Pagan Russia. Scenario by Nicholas Roerich: Music by Igor Stravinsky; Choreography by Vaslav Nijinsky; Produced for the First Time at the Théatre des Champs-Elysées at Paris on May 29, 1913."

By the equal evidence of page and performance Stravinsky has written both a self-contained and an objective music. It is self-contained, because, heard apart from all suggestions of scenario or programme-labels, it remains a unified, close knit, steadily advancing, fully culminated design. It is bound together by recurring and interwoven motivs, used not as integers in a Wagnerian system; but in accord with the composer's imaginative need and will. It is also compact with reiterated, recurring, steadily intensified rhythms. The tonal structure is further buttressed by great piles and pillars of chords. Furthermore; if the hearer once surrenders himself, at the outset, to the course of this music, it bears him forward as upon some broad, mighty, darkling current. Scrutinize it closely on the pages of the score, listen to it intently in the concert-hall, and it generates itself from itself—in strength upon strength.

In "The Rite of Spring" Stravinsky has also written an intensely objective music. It may now please him to say that the scenario of Roerich, the picturing and the action of the whole ballet, were an afterthought—a convenient vehicle for a music already self-sustained. If so, the excellent Roerich (whose testimony would be interesting in these matters) must have possessed a faculty of supernatural divination when he so mated outer stage-scheme to inner substance and spirit. The scenario lays the scene in a primitive and pagan Russia; while, before or after that fact, Stravinsky has written a music often savage in matter, brutal in march, primordial in suggestion. The scenario invokes the dark and dread suggestion of the vastness, the mystery, the fatalistic puissance of nature upon primitive spirits. Time and again, of such imagery and import happened, or was designed, to be Stravinsky's music. Pages upon pages rip with the thrusts, rain with the blows, upleap with the iterations of a fierce and frenzied energy. Of such, by a fortunate coincidence, is many a rite of this spring-sacrifice.

The Pace Quickens

$10,000 Added Within a Week to the Guarantee Fund for the Symphony Orchestra

BY $10,000 the Guarantee Fund for the current expenses of the Symphony Concerts has mounted during the past week. On Friday, Jan. 18, it stood at $68,479.34. Yesterday it had risen to $78,884.34. Though new subscribers have been few, they have also been generous. These names are:

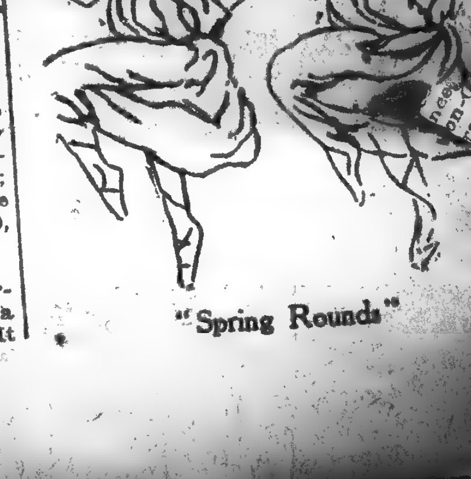
Badger, Dr. and Mrs. George S. C.
Beckwith, Mrs. Daniel, Providence.
Cochran, Mrs. Edwin Paul, New Haven.
Frost, Horace W.
Hornblower, Henry.
Hornblower, Mrs. Henry.
Kaffenburgh, Mr. and Mrs. Carl J.
Lyons, John A.
Moseley, Mrs. F. S.
Stevens, Moses T.
Tappan, Mrs. Frederick H.
Ware, Henry.

With such an increase, the prospects for the final rounding of the Guarantee Fund brighten. Approximately $95,000 is necessary as insurance against the probable deficit for the present working year. In round figures $16,000 more should be pledged. A fortnight more of subscriptions like those here recorded and the trick is turned. The more generous the guarantors, the more will their good work praise them. The more numerous they are, the closer come the Symphony Concerts to those that hear them.

The music softens and charms, folk-like; while somehow the scenario chances to flow into "Rounds of Spring" and "Mystical Circles." Stravinsky wrote measures of mystery, now palpitating and piercing, again sombre and boding. They prelude the two divisions of "The Rite." They also lift the curtain, in a marvel of illusion, upon Roerich's pagan world, leaping from stupors of dread into frenzies of elation. Either division of the ballet ends in such furies of tumult, such tempest of motion. Call the music fortunate in the complementary scenario; the scenario thrice-blessed with the self-determined music. Neither alternative diminishes the stripped directness, the seething objectivity, of Stravinsky's measures.

Embarked upon these courses, Stravinsky summons every essential or enh means, old or new. With either, as the painters would say, his handling is all his own. As he forswears the intricate and—in any other hands—rigid system of Wagner's motivs, introducing, labelling and recurring, so he discards the Wagnerian and the Straussian complexity of counterpoint, luxuriance of harmony, thick-textured instrumentation, prepared transition, climax long up-surging. Into his own metal he converts at will and need whatever they have infused into the substance or wrought upon the surface of music universal. Similarly Stravinsky eschews the courses of Debussy and the subsequent coteries of impressionists. He flouts evanescence and iridescence. He will have none of delicate and titillating dissonance. His canvas is coarse beside Debussyan tapestries, silken and fine-spun. His instrumental colors flare naked and primary; not in delicate fusions or contrasts of tints and demi-tints. Yet to those very impressionists and to Debussy writing for the theatre or in puissant mood, Stravinsky's uppiled and juxtaposed chords, his binding and compelling rhythms, owe not a little. He would not prevail as he does, did he not link the new ways with the old. He receives the torch, not to extinguish it but to blow it into fresher, brighter blaze.

"Le Sacre" Staged



"Spring Rounds"

For his own part, of his own genius—for it is time to use that rare and spacious word—Stravinsky, in "The Rite of Spring," attains a power of rhythm above any that music, before him, knows. It can be monstruously brutal, fierce and savage. It can pound and crunch until the ear and the spirit first resent and then thrill to such tremendous, reiterated, yet ever-changing impact. Of such were the paroxysms of "Le Sacre." Again this rhythm can whirr as though the darkling forces of nature were in mysterious, insinuating and insistent under-motion. Yet again, and this rhythm leaps, as though less an impulse than a vertigo had mounted from the earth into those that would renew by their rites its fertility, as though the summoned sap of spring had ferment the instant into the headles Loon' was more,
and this rhythm ll I die."
bright, as gracious garet Bondfield will leave dancing virgins through first woman represe beats. Government at a me
A new world of rhythm body of the inter pours from "Le Sacre" upon mu League of Nations new world of the power of ch them as Stravinsky uprears the upon mass. Hear them as he stre like monoliths along the path of his music. Hear them as like battle-axes they cleave measures and pages into dissonance. Again there is no doubting. Stravinsky, so imagining, so employing, chords, has vested tones with a new power. Observe again his abrupt transitions, bare and acrid harmonies, rending dissonances. They are not arbitrary, or fantastic, or mannered, or ostentatious, as in some sterile modernists and the pretending pseudo-modernists. Rather, they seem the inevitable turn of the musical thought, the foreordained progress of the musical design, the method that summons the mood, the stroke that conveys the imagery.

Even so with Stravinsky's juxtaposed and superposed keys, not usually in such unchaste relationships. Gradually he leads his music from accustomed voice into this polytony. Thereby the thought, the imagining, the whole quality and process of the measures become more sharply characterized. Writing in this recent fashion, Stravinsky is following a necessity of his design and speech—not whirling a new and screaming toy under the shocked noses—or rather ears—of his orthodox elders.

Listen, finally, to the play of Stravinsky's through the lengths and breadths, the depths and heights, of "The Rite." At moments, indeed, he holds them tight in choirs or groups that he may so wield their compacted power. Far oftener, he parts them; isolates them for the fraction of an instant; strips them to the quick; makes play with their individual and essential quality until the ear and the imagination receive a sensation, an impulse veritably strange, penetrating and exciting. Stravinsky wings the power, deepens the intensity of his orchestral voices; from them wrings new secrets. He masses them in "Le Sacre"—and overwhelms. He individualizes them in "Le Sacre"—and pierces. The imagery and the practice of instrumentation are no longer as Rimsky-Korsakov and Richard Strauss left them.

The ultimate tests, the deep-seated and stimulating pleasures, of music are its beauty or its power or both within it commingled; its self-contained integrity of thought, emotion and progress; its enhancing illusion of sensations and images outside itself. To every one of these criteria "The Rite of Spring" answers full, firm and clear. Beauty haunts those mysterious preludings; exhales from those mystical "rounds" and dances; brightens the course of the lighter rites. From measure upon measure also springs that sense of a glamorous and piercing instant which is beauty winged and swift. For power what is "Le Sacre" for page upon page, but the very upspringing and outflinging of it, now savage and frenzied, now solemn, sombre, mysterious; yet again ecstasies of energy, unfathomable, irresistible? By twenty tests "The Rite" is a self-generated, self-sustained music. By a hundred, it projects and vivifies the outer semblance, the inner spirit of these "Two Scenes of Pagan Russia," glorifying the earth and the powers of nature, renewing the annual sacrifice of world fertilized and energized by the spring. We of the early twentieth century—transitional but not unblessed time in arts—have had from Wagner our romantic music; from Strauss our realistic music, with the romantic blended; from Debussy our music of dream visioned until its glamor is poignant. Now from Stravinsky outleaps our music of the energy, the zest, the glow, of life. In him, in "Le Sacre" above all his other pieces, this life-force is transmuted and enkindled into tones. Enlarged, intensified, again stands music—waiting the next and glorious comer.

It has been the fortune of some of us whose daily stint is to write of music and the theatre, to sit before Debussy's "Pelléas and Mélisande" as new opera; before Musorgsky's "Boris Godunov" as discovered opera in the Western world; before Strauss's "Don Quixote" as new tone-poem—and to know intuitively and assuredly that we were in presence of a masterpiece. Yesterday, before Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring," that sensation, faith and exaltation returned. The bringers were Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

H. T. P.

Tribute Well Won

A Pierre Monteux avec souv
irs s au de travail n son admirateur
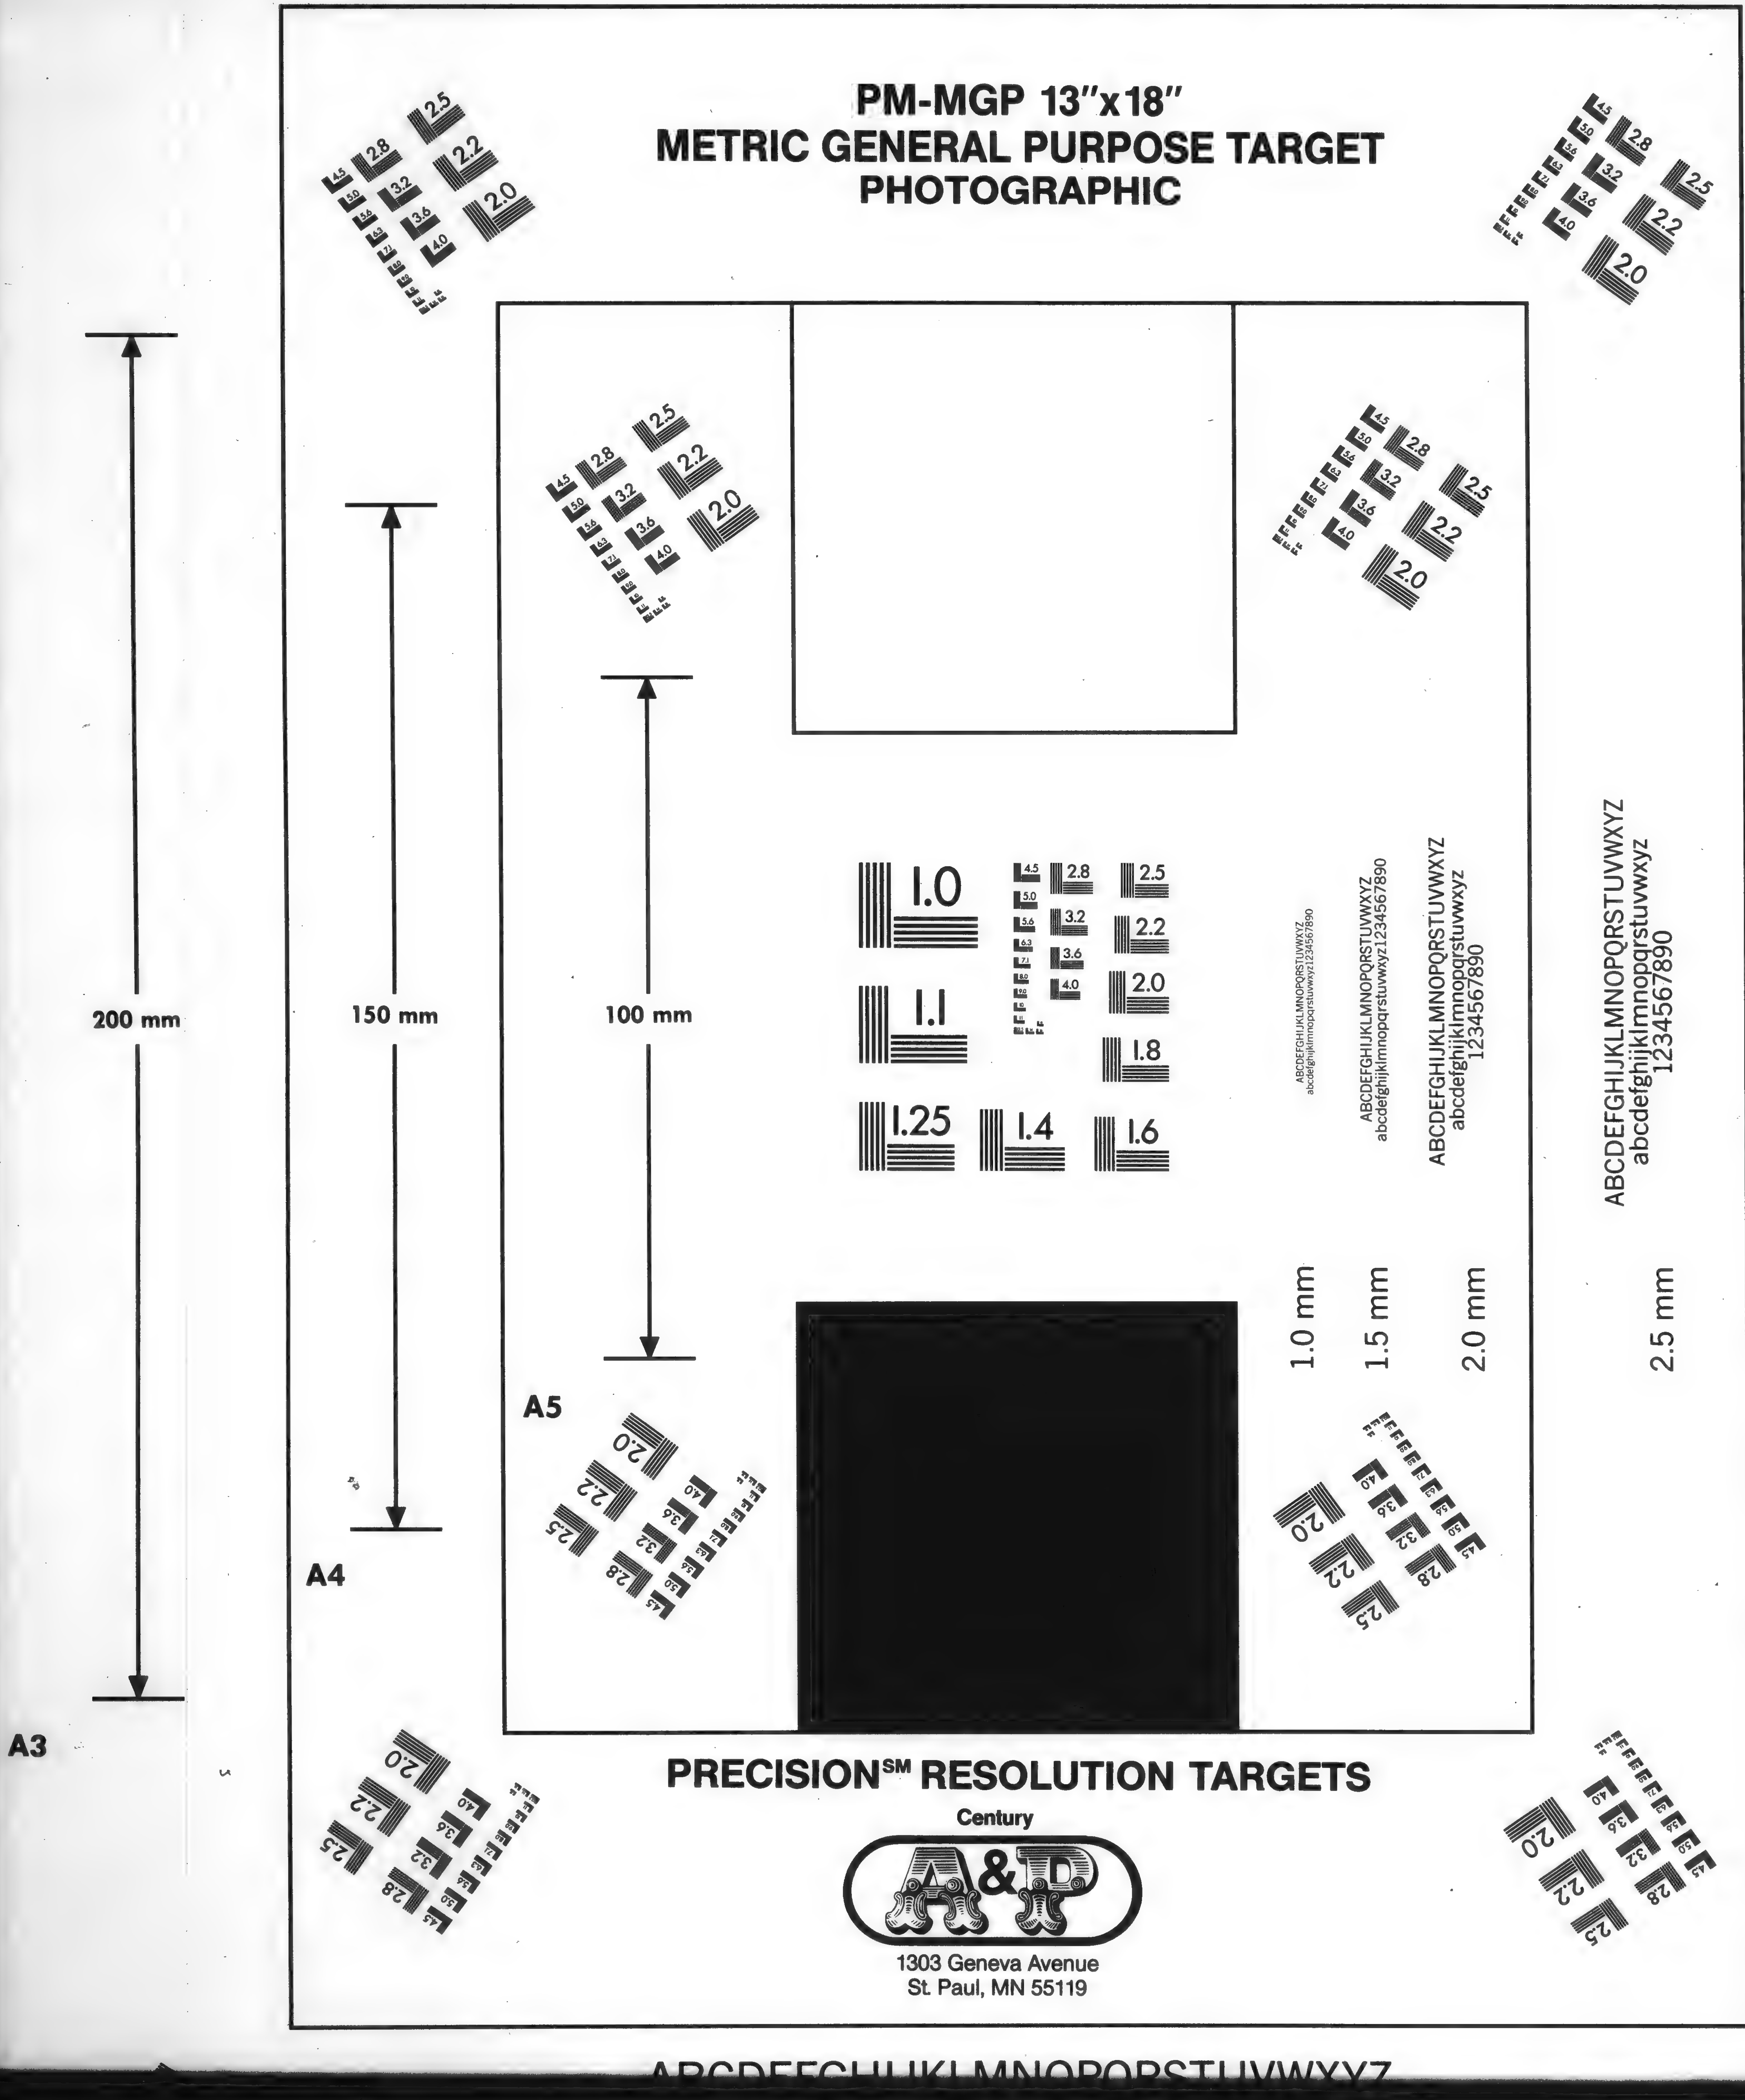
Igor Strawinsky
Paris 10 janv 22

Stravinsky Salutes Monteux

Inscription Below a Recent Photograph

REDUCTION
RATIO
12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A5
A4
A3
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
8.0
9.0
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

INFORMATION OBSCURED

GLOBE JAN 2

TRANS JAN 23

TRANS JAN 26

MODERN CLASSIC AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Stravinsky's "Le Sacre" for First Time Here

Daring Music Wins Cordial and Prolonged Applause

Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps," described by its subtitle "A Picture of Pagan Russia," and first performed with ballet in Paris in 1913 with Mr Monteux conducting, was played for the first time in Boston and the second time in America yesterday afternoon. No music more startling to timid ears has been heard here since Schienberg's Five Orchestral Pieces, in 1914. Those who feel with the writer that this music, whether or not one likes or approves of it as a whole, plainly marks a turning point in the history of music, have been battering in what turned out to be open doors in defense of Mr Monteux's inclusion of it on the program.

For it was received with loud and prolonged applause from a number so large that one was not sure it was not a majority of those present. Mr Monteux was recalled again and again, even after he had bade the orchestra share the applause with him. Finally the players began applauding him, because this music is inhumanly difficult to conduct and he had given a thrilling performance.

The few irate conservatives who departed dur'ng the pause between the first and second sections of "Le Sacre" ought to have heard the rest of it, if only to be quite sure that they want no more Stravinsky. Nothing else in Mr Monteux's conductorship has been so worthy of unstinted praise as this performance of "Le Sacre," which will be remembered for years to come as a musical landmark.

Stravinsky in writing this music had evidently made up his mind that the whole language of music evolved and employed by composers for three centuries past was not capable of further use as it stood. This he has in common with all except Pizzetti among important living composers. Instead of trying to invent an entire new musical system as Schoenberg, Skriabin, and latterly, if press comment may be trusted, Hindemith have done, Stravinsky has sought moods and feelings hitherto ruled out of music, and in the matter of means of expression contented himself with using unresolved dissonances in two beys at once and combining as many as four different and vigorous rhythms, none of which can be written out without constant changes of time signature. He does not abandon the major and minor scale, which means that he is still within the limits of the orthodox musical system.

The composer himself has made short work of the rhapsodical commentators on the piece. "Pagan Russia," according to him, was an after thought. He ad imagined ruthless, primitive, vigrous music and wanted to invent a itle for it. Had he been an American e might have called it "The Snake Dance in the Stadium" or "Armistice Day."

The program does not matter, nor loes this music suffer from the absence f the illustrative action of the ballet t is logically and powerfully imagined, and worked out for orchestra with superlative ingenuity and adroitness of technique. A young composer might s well hope to imitate Wagner, Beehoven or Mozart as imitate Stravinsky. his music ought to be played again ere this season.

In Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony e rather trivial thunder storm was usually effectively played and much the glory of the rest of the masterce obscured by a routine performce. This piece is sui generis. There never be anything else like it. Mme ya Freund, the soloist, sang Montee's poignant "Lament of Ariadne" three fine Mahler songs tastefully, with more musicianship than beauty tone.

P. R.

TRANS JAN 26

Monday evening, Feb. 4, in Symphony Hall, the third of the supplementary concerts by the Symphony Orchestra, for the pleasure of a public now firmly won. It prefers programmes of "standard pieces"; it likes soloists; it is disinclined to the lengthier and more exacting series of "regular concerts"; yet it is content with no inferior piece of performance. Claudio Arrau, a rising South American, will be the assisting pianist. The programme traverses Mozart's "Jupiter Symphony"; Charpentier's pictorial "Italian Impressions"; Chopin's Concerto in F minor for Piano and Orchestra.

HER JAN 26

ONE SCHNEEVOIGHT

Georg Schneevoight, who will appear as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra for a pair of concerts, was born at Wiborg, Finland, on Nov. 8, 1872. He studied music at Helsingfors, Sonderhausen, Leipsic, Dresden, Brussels. From 1894 to 1899 he taught the violoncello at the Helsingfors Conservatory and was a member of the Philharmonic orchestra. Since 1901 he has conducted, as a guest, in many European cities.

The engagement of "guest" conductors is, as a rule, to be deplored. As Mr. Monteux, to the regret of the audience, will leave Boston at the end of this season, his absence from the conductor's stand for even one concert will be mourned.

Another Guest-Conductor Comes to the Symphony Orchestra

Schneevoigt, the Finn, at the Concerts of March 7 and 8

(By Courtesy of The Musical Courier)

Georg Schneevoigt

THE happy precedent of last winter is to be renewed at the Symphony Concerts. For a second time, by invitation of The Trustees, in which Mr. Monteux joins, the Symphony Orchestra will entertain a Guest-conductor—Georg Schneevoigt, of Helsingfors, capital city of Finland. He is on his way to the United States in response to several such invitations. To Boston he will come for the Symphony Concerts of Friday afternoon, March 7, and Saturday evening, March 8—in a programme yet to be chosen.

Mr. Schneevoigt, a Finn by birth as well by residence, is in the prime of the arly fifties. He was schooled as a musician in Brussels and Dresden. He rose from violoncello-player to conductor, practising his profession at Riga, Munich and Helsingfors through long terms and in incidental visits to Scandinavian and German cities. For four years past, Western Europe has discovered his powers at the symphony concerts of Scheveningen, the international watering-place a few miles from The Hague, in summer a capital of serious music. First performances, under Mr. Schneevoigt's hand in Helsingfors, of Sibelius's music had spread his name westward. Scheveningen then confirmed his quality. Now Boston and other American cities are to taste it.

H. T. P.

SCHNEEVOIGT TO WIELD BATON HERE

Finn Musician to Conduct Symphony March 7-8

Georg Schneevoigt, the Finnish conductor, has accepted the invitation of Judge Frederick P. Cabot, representing the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra, to be guest conductor at concerts in Symphony hall, March 7 and 8. Mr. Monteux has been invited by the directors of the People's Symphony orchestra to appear as guest conductor. Since he will be released from rehearsals and concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra in the first week of March, Mr. Monteux has accepted this invitation, with the concurrence of the trustees, for the ensuing Sunday. The concert will be given in the St. James Theatre on March 9.

Mr. Schneevoigt expects soon to sail for America. He has long been prominent in Helsingfors, and likewise in Norway and Sweden, where, as conductor of the Stockholm and Christiania Symphony orchestras for many seasons, he has given a musical importance to the Scandinavian cities. In the last four seasons he has attracted attention by concerts in the Kurhaus in Schevlningen. Holland. He has maintained symphonic standards in all his programs and yet drawn crowds in the summer season when popular concerts are the general rule.

TRANS JAN 26

Milestone of Music, Masterpiece in Kind

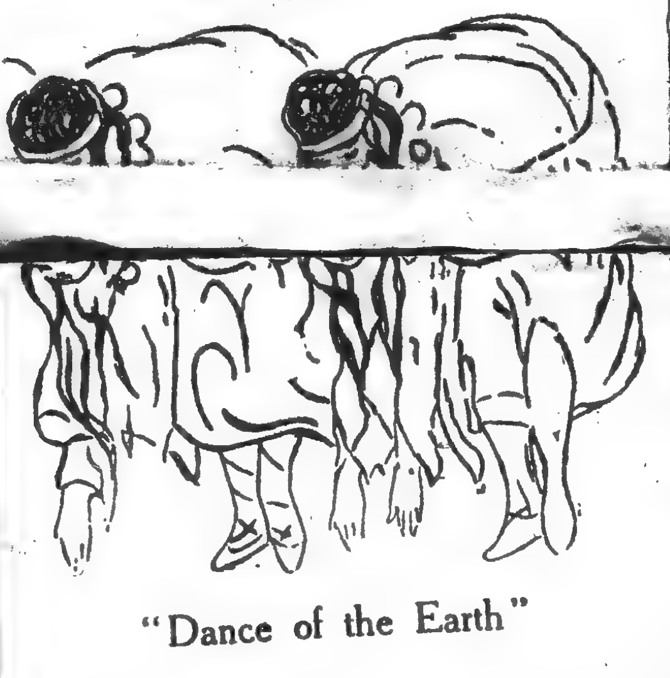
Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring" for the First Time in Boston---Record and Reception---Exceptional Honors to Mr. Monteux---Course and Purport of the Piece---Procedure and Outcome---New Powers Released, New Vistas Opened

FIRST of all let the record be written as accurately and briefly as it may. For it is believable that a future historian of the Boston Orchestra, continuing Mr. Howe's chronicle and recounting the conductorship of Pierre Monteux, will note in particular the Symphony Concert of Friday, Jan. 25, 1924. Then and there, he may write, was first heard in Boston a masterpiece that had altered the whole course of music in our time; that had become beacon and goal to a whole generation of composers up and down the European and American earth. That masterpiece, he may continue, was Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring"—not in its earlier and natural guise as ballet-pantomime of the theatre; but in its second and necessary incarnation as tone-poem of the concert-hall. It was so played—he is bound to add—because through ten years that same Pierre Monteux had believed in this music and treasured it. A man of faith and courage, devotion and diligence, he at last brought it to performance in the city where he had rounded and crowned his career. Out of himself and out of an orchestra that through weeks of preparation had worked eagerly and unsparingly, he achieved a performance that summoned the body and voice, the movement, the color, the veritable life and being of Stravinsky's music. More, as the chronicle may end, when the audience was applauding and re-applauding Mr. Monteux, and he had bidden the band rise as well, his men turned upon him and with common and hearty impulse clapped him as the hero and master of the day.

A foot-note upon those imaginary pages may also contain minutiæ of the afternoon. In the subscribers' seats sat the usual audience; but even a heralded occasion could not fill all the places now mistakenly reserved for chance comers. This company heard with no little pleasure, answered with no small applause, a performance of Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony," exceptionally fine-textured and radiant in tone, animated and resilient in progress, smiling with the lively or the gentle moods, the sport or the sentiment, of the music. It also listened with interest to Mme. Marya Freund, newcoming singer, as her wine-dark tones flowed through an ancient air of Monteverdi and three songs from Mahler in simple or sublimated mood. Since Mme. Freund is a singer less of lavish and sensuous voice than of finely imagined and artfully colored tones; since she more cultivates a penetrating finesse than a power outpoured, her hearers betrayed no excitement.

Though the fame and the nature of the music must have been widespread, few departed on the verge of "The Rite of Spring." No more did any square themselves as for an ordeal. . . . In the concert-room, as in the theatre, the piece falls into two parts or scenes. Through the first, music and performance, curiosity and excitement, satisfaction or surprise held the whole hall intent. Obviously, many had not anticipated Mr. Monteux's pause between the two divisions. For an instant a gap of silence. Then, from every quarter of the hall applause began to rattle. Simultaneously, and likewise from all parts of the house, some seventy or eighty —less than a hundred at the utmost— went their ways. Of these, a few moved to the doors with that air of scornful superiority and released resentment which, no doubt, is as comforting to spirits in stress as it is amusing to detached eyes. Toward the climax of the second part of "The Rite," through measures that depend beyond any others upon stage-action and stage-picture, there were signs of restless hearers, and incidental departures. Quickly came the end—and therewith such a burst of applause, on all sides and from many hands, as no modernist music has hitherto won in Symphony Hall. Compared with the thin patter that approved Mr. Bliss's Symphony a month ago, it was an ovation. It recalled Mr. Monteux to the platform; brought the orchestra to its feet; held the conductor fast between clapping band and clapping audience. Once more Stravinsky had prevailed and Pierre Monteux had been his voice. With reason, the composer wrote "the homage" elsewhere set upon this record.

"Le Sacre" Staged



"Dance of the Earth"

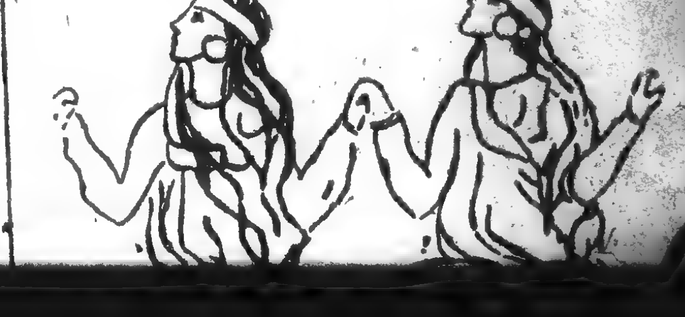
Before such music as "The Rite of Spring," it seems the office of the reviewer, even in a daily newspaper, to put by both antipathies and enthusiasms; to listen with willing ear and open mind; to waive away pre-conceptions or illusions; to discover, so far as he may, the purpose of the composer, the means employed, the degree of fulfilment. So doing, the reviewer will record his impressions of the piece; while through them he may be fortunate enough to adumbrate the mind, the spirit, the handiwork and the specific achievement of the composer in the music in hand. The reviewer, again, should be neither defender [illegible] Yet he would be less than [illegible] is self-contained, because, heard apart from all suggestions of scenario or programme-labels, it remains a unified, close knit, steadily advancing, fully culminated design. It is bound together by recurring and interwoven motivs, used not as integers in a Wagnerian system; but in accord with the composer's imaginative need and will. It is also compact with reiterated, recurring, steadily intensified rhythms. The tonal structure is further buttressed by great piles and pillars of chords. Furthermore; if the hearer once surrenders himself, at the outset, to the course of this music, it bears him forward as upon some broad, mighty, darkling current. Scrutinize it closely on the pages of the score, listen to it intently in the concert-hall, and it generates itself from itself—in strength upon strength.

In "The Rite of Spring" Stravinsky has also written an intensely objective music. It may now please him to say that the scenario of Roerich, the picturing and the action of the whole ballet, were an afterthought—a convenient vehicle for a music already self-sustained. If so, the excellent Roerich (whose testimony would be interesting in these matters) must have possessed a faculty of supernatural divination when he so mated outer stage-scheme to inner substance and spirit. The scenario lays the scene in a primitive and pagan Russia; while, before or after that fact, Stravinsky has written a music often savage in matter, brutal in march, primordial in suggestion. The scenario invokes the dark and dread suggestion of the vastness, the mystery, the fatalistic puissance of nature upon primitive spirits. Time and again, of such imagery and import happened, or was designed, to be Stravinsky's music. Pages upon pages rip with the thrusts, rain with the blows, upleap with the iterations of a fierce and frenzied energy. Of such, by a fortunate coincidence, is many a rite of this spring-sacrifice.

The music softens and charms, folk-like; while somehow the scenario chances to flow into "Rounds of Spring" and "Mystical Circles." Stravinsky wrote measures of mystery, now palpitating and piercing, again sombre and boding. They prelude the two divisions of "The Rite." They also lift the curtain, in a marvel of illusion, upon Roerich's pagan world, leaping from stupors of dread into frenzies of elation. Either division of the ballet ends in such furies of tumult, such tempest of motion. Call the music fortunate in the complementary scenario; the scenario thrice-blessed with the self-determined music. Neither alternative diminishes the stripped directness, the seething objectivity, of Stravinsky's measures.

Embarked upon these courses, Stravinsky summons every essential or [illegible] means, old or new. With eith[illegible] painters would say, his handling is all his own. As he forswears the intricate and— in any other hands—rigid system of Wagner's motivs, introducing, labelling and recurring, so he discards the Wagnerian and the Straussian complexity of counterpoint, luxuriance of harmony, thick-textured instrumentation, prepared transition, climax long up-surging. Into his own metal he converts at will and need whatever they have infused into the substance or wrought upon the surface of music universal. Similarly Stravinsky eschews the courses of Debussy and the subsequent coteries of impressionists. He flouts evanescence and iridescence. He will have none of delicate and titillating dissonance. His canvas is coarse beside Debussyan tapestries, silken and fine-spun. His instrumental colors flare naked and primary; not in delicate fusions or contrasts of tints and demi-tints. Yet to those very impressionists and to Debussy writing for the theatre or in puissant mood, Stravinsky's uppiled and juxtaposed chords, his bind-

"Le Sacre" Staged



g and compelling rhythms, owe not a ttle. He would not prevail as he does, did not link the new ways with the old. e receives the torch, not to extinguish it t to blow it into fresher, brighter blaze. For his own part, of his own genius— r it is time to use that rare and spacious ord—Stravinsky, in "The Rite of Spring," ttains a power of rhythm above any that sic, before him, knows. It can be onstruously brutal, fierce and savage. It n pound and crunch until the ear and the pirit first resent and then thrill to such remendous, reiterated, yet ever-changing mpact. Of such were the paroxysms of "Le Sacre." Again this rhythm can whirr s though the darkling forces of nature ere in mysterious, insinuating and insistent under-motion. Yet again, and this hythm leaps, as though less an impulse han a vertigo had mounted from the earth nto those that would renew by their rites s fertility, as though the summoned sap f spring had fermented [illegible] the instant nto the headies[illegible] more, nd this rhythm [illegible] right, as gracious [illegible] ancing virgins through [illegible] t beats.

A new world of rhythmic [illegible] ours from "Le Sacre" upon mu[illegible] ew world of the power of ch[illegible] em as Stravinsky uprears the[illegible] on mass. Hear them as he strews [illegible] e monoliths along the path of his music. Hear them as like battle-axes they cleave easures and pages into dissonance. Again here is no doubting. Stravinsky, so imagning, so employing, chords, has vested ones with a new power. Observe again is abrupt transitions, bare and acrid harnonies, rending dissonances. They are not rbitrary, or fantastic, or mannered, or stentatious, as in some sterile modernists nd the pretending pseudo-modernists. Rather, they seem the inevitable turn of he musical thought, the foreordained progess of the musical design, the method hat summons the mood, the stroke that onveys the imagery.

Even so with Stravinsky's juxtaposed nd superposed keys, not usually in such nchaste relationships. Gradually he leads is music from accustomed voice into this olytony. Thereby the thought, the imagning, the whole quality and process of the neasures become more sharply characterzed. Writing in this recent fashion, Stravinsky is following a necessity of his design and speech—not whirling a new and creaming toy under the shocked noses—or ather ears—of his orthodox elders.

Listen, finally, to the play of Stravinsky's [illegible] through the lengths and breadths, the depths and heights, of "The Rite." At moments, indeed, he holds them tight in choirs or groups that he may so wield their compacted power. Far oftener, he parts them; isolates them for the fraction of an instant; strips them to the quick; makes play with their individual and essential quality until the ear and the imagination receive a sensation, an impulse veritably strange, penetrating and exciting. Stravinsky wings the power, deepens the intensity of his orchestral voices; from them wrings new secrets. He masses them in "Le Sacre"— and overwhelms. He individualizes them in "Le Sacre"—and pierces. The imagery and the practice of instrumentation are no longer as Rimsky-Korsakov and Richard Strauss left them.

The ultimate tests, the deep-seated and stimulating pleasures, of music are its beauty or its power or both within it commingled; its self-contained integrity of thought, emotion and progress; its enhancing illusion of sensations and images outside itself. To every one of these criteria "The Rite of Spring" answers full, firm and ear. Beauty haunts those mysterious predings; exhales from those mystical rounds" and dances; brightens the course f the lighter rites. From measure upon easure also springs that sense of a glamrous and piercing instant which is beauty inged and swift. For power what is "Le acre" for page upon page, but the very utspringing and outflinging of it, now savge and frenzied, now solemn, sombre, ysterious; yet again ecstasies of energy. athomable, irresistible? By twenty "The Rite" is a self-generated, self-

its glam
vinsky
the zest Sacre" force l tones.
music—

It ha whose the the

Loon' was ll I die."
garet Bondfield will leave t first woman represe Government at a m body of the inte
e League of Nat

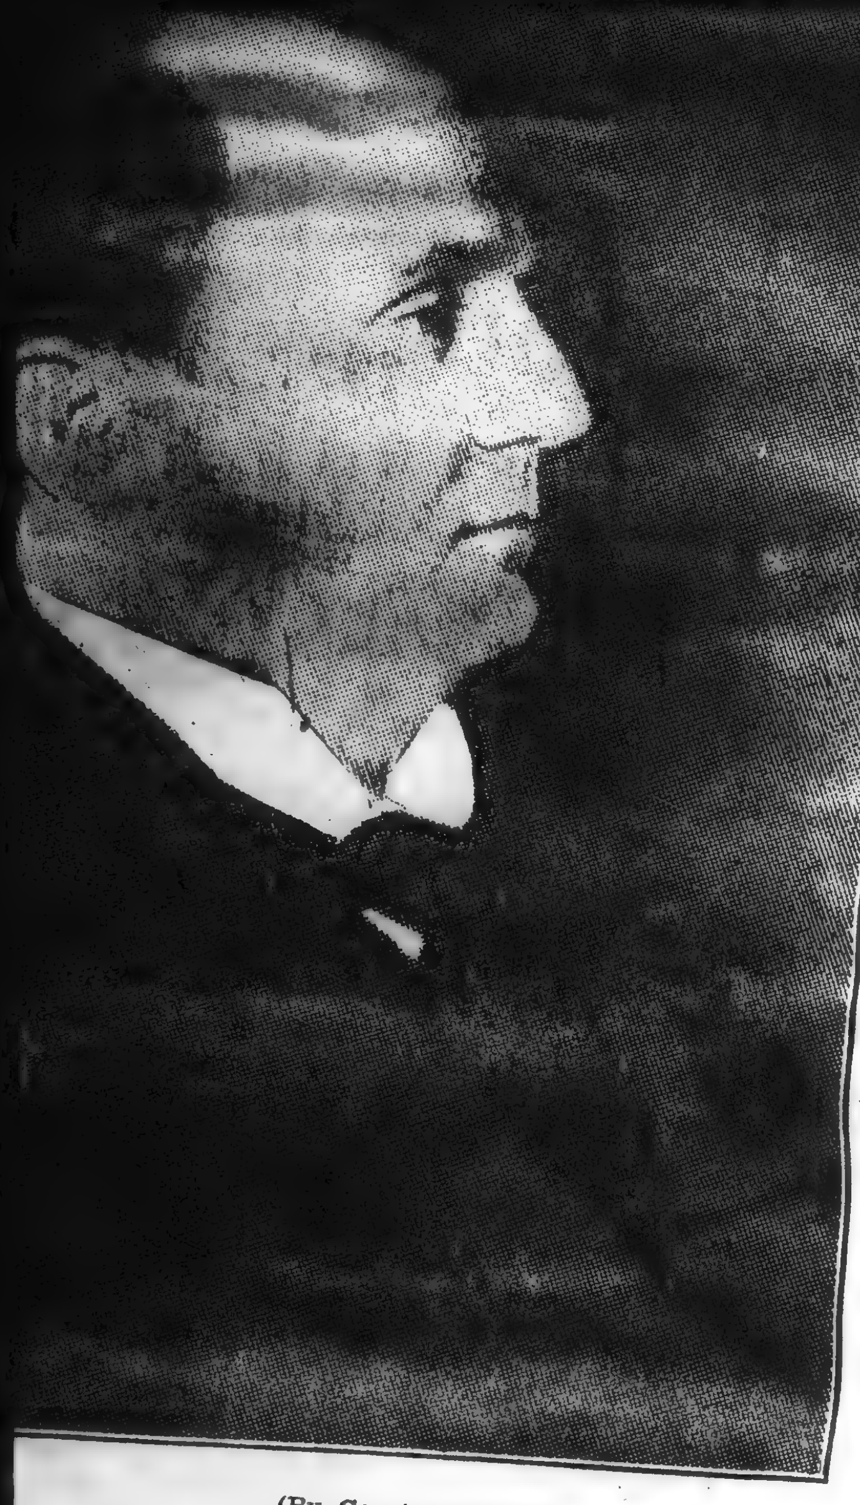
The Pace Quickens

$10,000 Added Within a Week to the Guarantee Fund for the Symphony Orchestra

BY $10,000 the Guarantee Fund for the current expenses of the Symphony Concerts has mounted during the past week. On Frida Jan. 18, it stood at $68,479.34. Ye terday it had risen to $78,884 Though new subscribers have few, they have also been gener These names are:

Badger, Dr. and Mrs. Geo S. C.
Beckwith, Mrs. Daniel, Pr dence.
Cochran, Mrs. Edwin Paul, N Haven.
Frost, Horace W.
Hornblower, Henry.
Hornblower, Mrs. Henry.
Kaffenburgh, Mr. and Mrs. Carl J.
Lyons, John A.
Moseley, Mrs. F. S.
Stevens, Moses T.
Tappan, Mrs. Frederick H.
Ware, Henry.

With such an increase, the prospects for the final rounding of the Guarantee Fund brighten. Approximately $95,000 is necessary as insurance against the probable deficit for the present working year. In round figures $16,000 more should be pledged. A fortnight more of subscriptions like those here recorded and the trick is turned. The more generous the guarantors, the more will their good work praise them. The more numerous they are, the closer come the Symphony Concerts to those that hear them.



(By Courtesy of The Musical Courier)

Georg Schneevoigt

st winter is phony Con-me, by inwhich Mr.
Orchestra
ctor—Georg pital city of the United such invita-ne for the afternoon, March 8
sen.
rth as well
the arly musician

in Brussels and Dresden. He rose from violoncello-player to conductor, practising his profession at Riga, Munich and Helsingfors through long terms and in incidental visits to Scandinavian and German cities. For four years past, Western Europe has discovered his powers at the symphony concerts of Scheveningen, the international watering-place a few miles from The Hague, in summer a capital of serious music. First performances, under Mr. Schneevoigt's hand in Helsingfors, of Sibelius's music had spread his name westward. Scheveningen then confirmed his quality. Now Boston and other American cities are to taste it.

H. T. P.

D ERE
nduct 8 sh conction" of esenting mphony
ctor at arch 7 invited e Sym-st cond from Boston
t week ccepted ence of Sunday.
the St.
to sail prom-wise in s conistiania seasons, nce to e last tention Schev-stained rograms ummer are the

Boston---Record and Reception---Exceptional Honors to Mr. Monteux---Course and Purport of the Piece---Procedure and Outcome---New Powers Released, New Vistas Opened

FIRST of all let the record be written as accurately and briefly as it may. For it is believable that a future historian of the Boston Orchestra, continuing Mr. Howe's chronicle and recounting the conductorship of Pierre Monteux, will note in particular the Symphony Concert of Friday, Jan. 25, 1924. Then and there, he may write, was first heard in Boston a masterpiece that had altered the whole course of music in our time; that had become beacon and goal to a whole generation of composers up and down the European and American earth. That masterpiece, he may continue, was Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring"—not in its earlier and natural guise as ballet-pantomime of the theatre; but in its second and necessary incarnation as tone-poem of the concert-hall. It was so played—he is bound to add—because through ten years that same Pierre Monteux had believed in this music and treasured it. A man of faith and courage, devotion and diligence, he at last brought it to performance in the city where he had rounded and crowned his career. Out of himself and out of an orchestra that through weeks of preparation had worked eagerly and unsparingly, he achieved a performance that summoned the body and voice, the movement, the color, the veritable life and being of Stravinsky's music. More, as the chronicle may end, when the audience was applauding and re-applauding Mr. Monteux, and he had bidden the band rise as well, his men turned upon him and with common and hearty impulse clapped him as the hero and master of the day.

A foot-note upon those imaginary pages may also contain minutiæ of the afternoon. In the subscribers' seats sat the usual audience; but even a heralded occasion could not fill all the places now mistakenly reserved for chance comers. This company heard with no little pleasure, answered with no small applause, a performance of Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony," exceptionally fine-textured and radiant in tone, animated and resilient in progress, smiling with the lively or the gentle moods, the sport or the sentiment, of the music. It also listened with interest to Mme. Marya Freund, newcoming singer, as her wine-dark tones flowed through an ancient air of Monteverdi and three songs from Mahler in simple or sublimated mood. Since Mme. Freund is a singer less of lavish and sensuous voice than of finely imagined and artfully colored tones; since she more cultivates a penetrating finesse than a power outpoured, her hearers betrayed no excitement.

Though the fame and the nature of the music must have been widespread, few departed on the verge of "The Rite of Spring." No more did any square themselves as for an ordeal. . . . In the concert-room, as in the theatre, the piece falls into two parts or scenes. Through the first, music and performance, curiosity and excitement, satisfaction or surprise held the whole hall intent. Obviously, many had not anticipated Mr. Monteux's pause between the two divisions. For an instant a gap of silence. Then, from every quarter of the hall applause began to rattle. Simultaneously, and likewise from all parts of the house, some seventy or eighty—less than a hundred at the utmost—went their ways. Of these, a few moved to the doors with that air of scornful superiority and released resentment which, no doubt, is as comforting to spirits in stress as it is amusing to detached eyes. Toward the climax of the second part of "The Rite," through measures that depend beyond any others upon stage-action and stage-picture, there were signs of restless hearers, and incidental departures. Quickly came the end—and therewith such a burst of applause, on all sides and from many hands, as no modernist music has hitherto won in Symphony Hall. Compared with the thin patter that approved Mr. Bliss's Symphony a month ago, it was an ovation. It recalled Mr. Monteux to the platform; brought the orchestra to its feet; held the conductor fast between clapping band and clapping audience. Once more Stravinsky had prevailed and Pierre Monteux had been his voice. With reason, the composer wrote "the homage" elsewhere set upon this record.

"Le Sacre" Staged

"Dance of the Earth"

Before such music as "The Rite of Spring," it seems the office of the reviewer, even in a daily newspaper, to put by both antipathies and enthusiasms; to listen with willing ear and open mind; to waive away pre-conceptions or illusions; to discover, so far as he may, the purpose of the composer, the means employed, the degree of fulfilment. So doing, the reviewer will record his impressions of the piece; while through them he may be fortunate enough to adumbrate the mind, the spirit, the handiwork and the specific achievement of the composer in the music in hand. The reviewer, again, should be neither defender nor prosecutor. Yet he would be less than human—and so unfit for the job—did not his impressions disclose his predilections. A stone-man could hardly be indifferent before "The Rite of Spring: Scenes, in Two Parts, from Pagan Russia. Scenario by Nicholas Roerich; Music by Igor Stravinsky; Choreography by Vaslav Nijinsky; Produced for the First Time at the Théâtre des Champs-Elysées at Paris on May 29, 1913."

By the equal evidence of page and performance Stravinsky has written both a self-contained and an objective music. It is self-contained, because, heard apart from all suggestions of scenario or programme-labels, it remains a unified, close knit, steadily advancing, fully culminated design. It is bound together by recurring and interwoven motivs, used not as integers in a Wagnerian system; but in accord with the composer's imaginative need and will. It is also compact with reiterated, recurring, steadily intensified rhythms. The tonal structure is further buttressed by great piles and pillars of chords. Furthermore; if the hearer once surrenders himself, at the outset, to the course of this music, it bears him forward as upon some broad, mighty, darkling current. Scrutinize it closely on the pages of the score, listen to it intently in the concert-hall, and it generates itself from itself—in strength upon strength.

In "The Rite of Spring" Stravinsky has also written an intensely objective music. It may now please him to say that the scenario of Roerich, the picturing and the action of the whole ballet, were an after-thought—a convenient vehicle for a music already self-sustained. If so, the excellent Roerich (whose testimony would be interesting in these matters) must have possessed a faculty of supernatural divination when he so mated outer stage-scheme to inner substance and spirit. The scenario lays the scene in a primitive and pagan Russia; while, before or after that fact, Stravinsky has written a music often savage in matter, brutal in march, primordial in suggestion. The scenario invokes the dark and dread suggestion of the vastness, the mystery, the fatalistic puissance of nature upon primitive spirits. Time and again, of such imagery and import happened, or was designed, to be Stravinsky's music. Pages upon pages rip with the thrusts, rain with the blows, upleap with the iterations of a fierce and frenzied energy. Of such, by a fortunate coincidence, is many a rite of this spring-sacrifice.

The music softens and charms, folk-like; while somehow the scenario chances to flow into "Rounds of Spring" and "Mystical Circles." Stravinsky wrote measures of mystery, now palpitating and piercing, again sombre and boding. They prelude the two divisions of "The Rite." They also lift the curtain, in a marvel of illusion, upon Roerich's pagan world, leaping from stupors of dread into frenzies of elation. Either division of the ballet ends in such furies of tumult, such tempest of motion. Call the music fortunate in the complementary scenario; the scenario thrice-blessed with the self-determined music. Neither alternative diminishes the stripped directness, the seething objectivity, of Stravinsky's measures.

Embarked upon these courses, Stravinsky summons every essential or means, old or new. With eith as painters would say, his handling is all his own. As he forswears the intricate and—in any other hands—rigid system of Wagner's motivs, introducing, labelling and recurring, so he discards the Wagnerian and the Straussian complexity of counterpoint, luxuriance of harmony, thick-textured instrumentation, prepared transition, climax long up-surging. Into his own metal he converts at will and need whatever they have infused into the substance or wrought upon the surface of music universal. Similarly Stravinsky eschews the courses of Debussy and the subsequent coteries of impressionists. He flouts evanescence and iridescence. He will have none of delicate and titillating dissonance. His canvas is coarse beside Debussyan tapestries, silken and fine-spun. His instrumental colors flare naked and primary; not in delicate fusions or contrasts of tints and demi-tints. Yet to those very impressionists and to Debussy writing for the theatre or in puissant mood, Stravinsky's uppiled and juxtaposed chords, his bind-s and compelling rhythms, owe not a ttle. He would not prevail as he does, did e not link the new ways with the old. e receives the torch, not to extinguish it t to blow it into fresher, brighter blaze.

"Le Sacre" Staged

"Spring Rounds"

For his own part, of his own genius—r it is time to use that rare and spacious ord—Stravinsky, in "The Rite of Spring," ttains a power of rhythm above any that sic, before him, knows. It can be onstruously brutal, fierce and savage. It n pound and crunch until the ear and the pirit first resent and then thrill to such emendous, reiterated, yet ever-changing pact. Of such were the paroxysms of Le Sacre." Again this rhythm can whirr s though the darkling forces of nature ere in mysterious, insinuating and instent under-motion. Yet again, and this hythm leaps, as though less an impulse han a vertigo had mounted from the earth to those that would renew by their rites s fertility, as though the summoned sap f spring had fe[illegible] the instant nto the headies. Loon' was [illegible] more, nd this rhythm [illegible] ll I die." [illegible] right, as gracious [illegible] ancing virgins through [illegible] t beats.

A new world of rhythmic ours from "Le Sacre" upon mu ew world of the power of ch em as Stravinsky uprears the on mass. Hear them as he strew e monoliths along the path of his music. Hear them as like battle-axes they cleave measures and pages into dissonance. Again here is no doubting. Stravinsky, so imagning, so employing, chords, has vested ones with a new power. Observe again is abrupt transitions, bare and acrid harmonies, rending dissonances. They are not arbitrary, or fantastic, or mannered, or stentatious, as in some sterile modernists nd the pretending pseudo-modernists. Rather, they seem the inevitable turn of he musical thought, the foreordained progress of the musical design, the method hat summons the mood, the stroke that onveys the imagery.

Even so with Stravinsky's juxtaposed nd superposed keys, not usually in such nchaste relationships. Gradually he leads is music from accustomed voice into this polytony. Thereby the thought, the imagning, the whole quality and process of the measures become more sharply characterzed. Writing in this recent fashion, Stravinsky is following a necessity of his degn and speech—not whirling a new and creaming toy under the shocked noses—or ather ears—of his orthodox elders.

Listen, finally, to the play of Stravinsky's breadths, the depths and heights, of "The Rite." At moments, indeed, he holds them tight in choirs or groups that he may so wield their compacted power. Far oftener, he parts them; isolates them for the fraction of an instant; strips them to the quick; makes play with their individual and essential quality until the ear and the imagination receive a sensation, an impulse veritably strange, penetrating and exciting. Stravinsky wings the power, deepens the intensity of his orchestral voices; from them wrings new secrets. He masses them in "Le Sacre"—and overwhelms. He individualizes them in "Le Sacre"—and pierces. The imagery and the practice of instrumentation are no longer as Rimsky-Korsakov and Richard Strauss left them.

The ultimate tests, the deep-seated and stimulating pleasures, of music are its beauty or its power or both within it commingled; its self-contained integrity of thought, emotion and progress; its enhancing illusion of sensations and images outside itself. To every one of these criteria, "The Rite of Spring" answers full, firm and ear. Beauty haunts those mysterious preldings; exhales from those mystical rounds" and dances; brightens the course f the lighter rites. From measure upon measure also springs that sense of a glamrous and piercing instant which is beauty inged and swift. For power what is "Le acre' for page upon page, but the very utspringing and outflinging of it, now savge and frenzied, now solemn, sombre, ysterious; yet again ecstasies of energy, athomable, irresistible? By twenty "The Rite" is a self-generated, selfned music. By a hundred, it projects ivifies the outer semblance, the inner of these "Two Scenes of Pagan Rusglorifying the earth and the powers nature, renewing the annual sacrifice of world fertilized and energized by the ng. We of the early twentieth century ransitional but not unblessed time in arts—have had from Wagner our roic music; from Strauss our realistic ic, with the romantic blended; from De our music of dream visioned until its glamor is poignant. Now from Stravinsky outleaps our music of the energy, the zest, the glow, of life. In him, in "Le Sacre" above all his other pieces, this life-force is transmuted and enkindled into tones. Enlarged, intensified, again stands music—waiting the next and glorious comer.

It has been the fortune of some of us whose daily stint is to write of music and the theatre, to sit before Debussy's "Pelléas and Mélisande" as new opera; before Musorgsky's "Boris Godunov" as discovered opera in the Western world; before Strauss's "Don Quixote" as new tone-poem—and to know intuitively and assuredly that we were in presence of a masterpiece. Yesterday, before Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring," that sensation, faith and exaltation returned. The bringers were Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

H. T. P.

eld will leave today woman representa-rnment at a meet-
dy of the interna-
League of Nations.

The Pace Quickens

$10,000 Added Within a Week to the Guarantee Fund for the Symphony Orchestra

BY $10,000 the Guarantee Fund for the current expenses of the Symphony Concerts has mounted during the past week. On Friday Jan. 18, it stood at $68,479.34. Yesterday it had risen to $78,884 Though new subscribers have few, they have also been gener These names are:

Badger, Dr. and Mrs. Geo S. C.
Beckwith, Mrs. Daniel, Providence.
Cochran, Mrs. Edwin Paul, N. Haven.
Frost, Horace W.
Hornblower, Henry.
Hornblower, Mrs. Henry.
Kaffenburgh, Mr. and Mrs. Carl J.
Lyons, John A.
Moseley, Mrs. F. S.
Stevens, Moses T.
Tappan, Mrs. Frederick H.
Ware, Henry.

With such an increase, the prospects for the final rounding of the Guarantee Fund brighten. Approximately $95,000 is necessary as insurance against the probable deficit for the present working year. In round figures $16,000 more should be pledged. A fortnight more of subscriptions like those here recorded and the trick is turned. The more generous the guarantors, the more will their good work praise them. The more numerous they are, the closer come the Symphony Concerts to those that hear them.

Tribute Well Won

A Pierre M avec souv
Monteux aux 25
son album de travail Igor Stravinsky
Paris 10 22

Stravinsky Salutes Mon Inscription Below a Recent Pho teux tograph

[184]

WEBSTER TIMES JAN 26

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FAREWELL TOUR UNDER MONTEUX

After Absence of Three Years, Boston Symphony To Appear In Mechanics Hall, Worcester, Feb. 12

104 MUSICIANS

After an absence of three years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 104 musicians is to return to Worcester to give a concert in Mechanics Hall Tuesday evening, February 13th. The event will be one of the most important in the Worcester season, not only on account of the Orchestra, which is considered one of the very finest of its kind in the world, but because this is the farewell season of Pierre Montenx as its conductor.

Pierre Monteux appeared here at the head of the Orchestra in his first two seasons 1920 and 1921. Now completing his five year term he is generally said to have brought the quality of the performance to the highest degree of marvelous perfection, rivaling its eloquence in any past season of its long and illustrious history. There is considerable regret at the pending departure of this most distinguished of French conductors, particularly since he intends to return to his own country. He first came to America at the head of Diaghileff's Ballet Russe, having won much fame in the Old World as conductor of the principal orchestras of Paris and in the larger opera houses of Europe.

He was particularly noted for the Concerts Monteux at the Paris Casino, and likewise for his conducting of the Ballet Russe, over which he toured Europe before coming here. Previous to his present post, he was the French conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York. It is as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, however, that he is considered [illegible] have reached the highest degree [illegible] his executive and interpretative genius.

Pierre Monteux has prepared [illegible] notable programme for the opening concert. It will include Beethoven's Seventh Symphony [illegible] A major, Richard Strauss' tone [illegible] "Death and Transfiguration," [illegible] Debussy's Nocturne's "Clouds" and "Festivals", and Wagner's Overture [illegible] "Tannhauser."

Mail orders for this concert are being received at Symphony Hall, Boston. The public sale [illegible] opens next week.

GLOBE JAN 27

The chief musical news in Boston during last week was the announcement made public Wednesday from Symphony Hall that George Schneevoight, the Finnish conductor, will appear as guest conductor at the pair of Boston Symphony concerts, March 7 and 8. Mr Monteux, with the permission of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has accepted an invitation to conduct the concert of the People's Symphony Orchestra, Sunday, March 9, at 3:30, in the St James Theatre. This is the second time in the history of the Boston Symphony that a guest conductor not also a composer has been asked to conduct a pair of its regular concerts. It is, as far as available records show, the first time that any conductor of the Boston Symphony has ever conducted another orchestra during the regular Symphony season. Bruno Walter last year was the first guest conductor not a composer.

◆◆◆◆◆

Mr Monteux' appearance with the People's Symphony ought to dispose finally of the rumors which have for three years persisted, without foundation in fact, to the effect that there is hostility or rivalry between the People's Symphony and the Boston Symphony. The aims, attainments and audience of the two orchestras are so different that no comparison is possible. The People's Symphony management has repeatedly denied that their orchestra was attempting to conflict in any way with the Boston Symphony. But three of the present players in the People's Symphony have ever been members of the Boston Symphony. The People's Symphony is not an outgrowth of the lamentable strike several years ago, but an independent organization which has already proved itself a strong force for good in the musical life of this city and won influential backing.

◆◆◆◆◆

Next week's Monday Symphony concert, with the Boston debut of Claudio Arrau, a Chilean infant prodigy pianist, now 19 years old, also conflicts with Boito's "Mefistofele" and Chaliapin. Mr Monteux, after setting a particularly stupid program at the previous Monday concert, has this time chosen to include Mozart's exquisite "Jupiter" symphony, which the writer cannot hear too often. Arrau will play Chopin in F minor. Charpentier's "Impressions of Italy," music as spinelessly and as shamelessly sentimental as most of "Louise" is the other number.

◆◆◆◆◆

Flonzaley Quartet concert

L'OPINON PUBLIQUE JAN 24

SALLE MECHANICS MARDI SOIR 12 FEVRIER

L'EVENEMENT MUSICAL DE LA SAISON

De Retour Après Trois Années d'Absence

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Pierre Monteux, Directeur

La Saison d'Adieu du Grand Directeur Français

LES COMMANDES PAR LA POSTE à W. H.Brennan, Gérant, Salle Symphony, Boston, Accompagnées d'un Chèque, Rempli Contre Reçu du Montant.
.BILLETS: $2.50, $2.00, $1.50 ET $1.00 (Pas de Taxe de Guerre)

ADV JAN 27

service men.

YOUNG FOLKS' CONCERT

Tomorrow and Tuesday the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give concerts for the young in Symphony Hall with the following program: Prelude to 'Hansel and Gretel," Humperdinck; two movements from Mozart's G minor symphony; selections from Wagner's "Mastersingers"; Debussy's nocturne, "Festivals," and Rossini's "William Tell" overture. Thomas Whitney Surette will make an explanatory address.

MONDAY SYMPHONY

A week from tomorrow the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give another Monday concert, with Claudio Arrau, South American pianist, now making his first tour of America, as soloist. Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony, Charpentier's suite, "Impressions of Italy," and Chopin's concerto in F. minor, for piano and orchestra, will make up the program.

NIKISCH CONCERT

[illegible] first Boston recital in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, February 10, for the benefit of the Children's Island Sanitarium. This young virtuoso has made a conspicuous success on his first tour of America.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The next regular Symphony concerts will be given February 8 and 9. Brahms' third symphony, Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," with Motte Lacroix as soloist, and Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" will [illegible] the program.

GLOBE JAN 29.

SYMPHONY CONCERT FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the second of the season's Young People's Concerts yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr Monteux conducted and as before Mr T. W. Surette of Concord made introductory and explanatory remarks.

The program was decidedly better chosen than the previous one, taken either from the point of view of general beauty and interest or from the more important one in this case of educational purpose. Mr Surette's comments were very valuable and with the music in hand should have driven home three points at least.

The two last movements of Mozart's Symphony in G minor he used to illustrate the rules of symphonic form, in particular pointing out that there were two themes in the final movement and that the development followed logically and beautifully.

Wagner's "Dance of the Apprentices" and the "Homage to Hans Sachs" from "Die Meistersinger" followed immediately upon the Mozart. This evoked the heartiest applause of the afternoon except for the final "William Tell Overture." One can hardly expect a child, who has in himself sufficient naivete and simplicity, to prefer the finer nuances of Mozart to the rough-hewn power of Wagner and perhaps it is not to be desired. The essential thing is that both shall be impressed upon the youthful mind even if subconsciously.

Mr Surette used the Wagner and De-

POST JAN 27

Young People's Concerts

For the pair of Young People's Concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Monday and Tuesday afternoons of this week, Mr. Monteaux has made a programme unusually broad in scope since it ranges from the Minuet and Finale from Mozart's Symphony in G minor to Debussy's Nieturne "Festivals." Other numbers are Humperdinck's Prelude to his opera "Hansel and Gretel"; excerpts from the third act of Wagner's comedy-opera "Die Meistersinger"; and the Overture to Rossini's opera "William Tell." Both Debussy and Wagner are names hitherto unlisted on the programmes of these concerts and the music of the former, if not of the latter, is presumably unfamiliar to these youthful audiences. Wisely Mr. Monteux would make known to them modern as well as "classic" music. As usual all the tickets for both of these concerts have been distributed among the schools of the city.

Schneevoigt Guest Conductor

The announcement that Georg Schneevoigt, the celebrated Finnish conductor, will appear as guest conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concerts of March 7 and 8 arouses considerable anticipatory interest. This conductor has long been prominent in Helsingfors, and as conductor of the Stockholm and Christiania Symphony Orchestras he has brought those Scandinavian cities into a new prominence in the musical world. During the last four seasons he has also drawn attention through his series of concerts at the Kurhaus in Schevininger, the summer resort near the Hague. Here, while maintaining exacting standards in all his programmes, he has drawn large audiences during the summer season when "popular" concerts are the general rule.

Monteux to Conduct People's

Inasmuch as Mr. Schneevoigt's visit will release Mr. Monteux from rehearsals and concerts of the Boston Symphony during the first week of March, he has accepted an invitation to be the guest conductor of the People's Symphony Orchestra at the concert of March 9. That Mr. Monteux is thus to lead this orchestra through a concert before his return to Paris is indeed a fortunate and propitious circumstance.

TRANS JAN 27

Saens.

When Pierre Monteux, who will introduce here Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps," conducted the first performance with the Diaghileff Ballet in Paris, May 29, 1913, the audience greeted the music with an uproar. Although orchestra and dancers kept on valiantly to the end, it was of small avail, for even the fortissimo passages, which are many, were inaudible in the general clamor. Things were thrown, and the police intervened. The composer, conspicuous by his tall frame and [illegible] hat, managed to escape recognition, but his hat was smashed. There [illegible] four more performances in France and one in London.

M. Monteux produced the score in concert form at the Concerts Monteux [illegible] the Paris Casino. The work is called [illegible] of Pagan Russia." Nicholas [illegible] describes the ritual gesticulations of the "Adolescents" who welcome the advent of spring. "One of them, a young girl, is chosen for immolation. [illegible] a wild dance which in- [illegible] until she falls from

---

HER JAN 27

EXTRA SYMPHONY

A week from tomorrow the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the third concert of the Monday evening series in Symphony hall, with Claudio Arrau, South American pianist, who is now making his first tour of America, as soloist. Mr. Monteux will open the program with Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony. The closing number will be Charpentier's suite, "Impressions of Italy," a delightful series of pictures entitled: Serenade; At the Fountain; On Muleback; On the Summits; Naples. The viola solo off the stage in the Serenade will be played by Georges Fourel, the first viola of the orchestra. Chopin's Concerto in F minor will be played by Mr. Arrau. This brilliant young pianist went to Europe to pursue his studies when still a boy. He gave concerts there which attracted much attention. His introductory American [illegible] in New York and other cities [illegible] immediately placed him in the [illegible] of pianists of the younger

---

TRANS JAN

THE PROBLEM SOLVED?

At Last a Concert for Young People by the Symphony Orchestra Holds Them Still, Eager, Pleased — Mr. Surette's Notable Share — Warm Welcome for Wagner and Debussy

BEYOND precedent, above expectation, went the concert of the Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon, for young people. Among the bystanders there had, indeed, been forebodings. Agreed that the Prelude to "Hänsel and Gretel," the Overture to "William Tell," a Minuet and a darting Finale out of a Symphony of Mozart were music to entice young ears. Yet were not fragments from "Die Meistersinger" a hazardous choice, and Debussy's Nocturne of "Festivals" an invitation to disaster? Yet Mr. Monteux persisted. Perhaps he had observed that conductors elsewhere, setting programmes for children and youth, had not been so tender as he. Perhaps he had remarked that, given rhythm, the youngsters are pleased; that, given sonorities, they are impressed.

Moreover, was there not Mr. Surette to prepare the way with a clear word of introduction to each piece? And admirable in these exercises is Mr. Surette. He suggests an idea and plainly it interests his audience. He unfolds, embroiders the idea, and forthwith he has awakened a curiosity for the music to satisfy. The boys and the girls listen more intently, hear with the [illegible] notion that now they are [illegible] Twice as ining and interesting are these Young People's Concerts now that Mr. Surette has become spokesman. Add to his sayings Mr. Burk's printed notes, and the circle of pleasure and profit is well rounded.

"Festivals" was played and both the teens and the ten-year-olds listened intently and clapped warmly. Fortunate youngsters with no prejudices against muted trumpets and not a demur to Debussy's dissonances so long as they are interesting. They had ears also for his rhythm, though to this day certain elders lack them. And Wagner—of the larruping violins and the slow Waltz of The Apprentices, of the pompous Mastersingers and their clanging procession. Ears would not be ears, count them fifteen or fifty, could they resist this folk-jollity, these sonorous splendors of sound. Home also went Humperdinck's folk-melodies, though he led them now and then through byways of counterpoint. Plainly some of the lads and their sisters already knew them.

Old stories also to many were the 'cello-tune, the thunderstorm and all the rest in the Overture to "William Tell"—but now an orchestra and a master-cellist like Mr. Bedetti, were glorifying them. Rhythm, again, won the day for Mozart's Minuet; but the theme-chasing and the theme-flecking of the Finale to this Symphony in G minor, seemed to evade the more casual ears, though Mr. Surette had set them on the trail. . . . Still, content was the audience to the youngest. Plainly it was interested, pleased, looking as well as clapping its pleasure. At last after two years of groping, these Concerts for Young People have found the clue. H. T. P.

WEBSTER TIMES JAN 26

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FAREWELL TOUR UNDER MONTEUX

After Absence of Three Years, Boston Symphony To Appear In Mechanics Hall, Worcester, Feb. 12

104 MUSICIANS

After an absence of three years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 104 musicians is to return to Worcester to give a concert in Mechanics Hall Tuesday evening, February 12th. The event will be one of the most important in the Worcester season, not only on account of the Orchestra which is considered one of the very finest of its kind in the world, but because this is the farewell season of Pierre Montenx as its conductor.

Pierre Monteux appeared here at the head of the Orchestra in his first two seasons 1920 and 1921. Now completing his five year term, he is generally said to have brought the quality of the performance to the highest degree of marvelous perfection, rivaling its eloquence in any past season of its long and illustrious history. There is considerable regret at the pending departure of this most distinguished of French conductors, particularly since he intends to return to his own country. He first came to America at the head of Diaghileff's Ballet Russe, having won much fame in the Old World as conductor of the principal orchestras of Paris and in the larger opera houses of Europe.

He was particularly noted for the Concerts Monteux at the Paris Casino, and likewise for his conducting of the Ballet Russe, over which he toured Europe before coming here. Previous to his present post, he was the French conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York. It is as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, however, that he is considered [illegible] have reached the highest degree [illegible] his executive and interpretative genius.

Pierre Monteux has prepared a notable programme for the opening concert. It will include Beethoven's Seventh Symphony [illegible] A major Richard Strauss' tone poem "Death and Transfiguration," [illegible] Debussy's Nocturne's "Clouds" and "Festivals", and Wagner's Overture of "Tannhauser."

Mail orders for this concert are being received at Symphony Hall Boston. The public sale will open next week.

GLOBE JAN 27

The chief musical news in Boston during last week was the announcement made public Wednesday from Symphony Hall that George Schneevoight, the Finnish conductor, will appear as guest conductor at the pair of Boston Symphony concerts, March 7 and 8. Mr Monteux, with the permission of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has accepted an invitation to conduct the concert of the People's Symphony Orchestra, Sunday, March 9, at 3:30, in the St James Theatre. This is the second time in the history of the Boston Symphony that a guest conductor not also a composer has been asked to conduct a pair of its regular concerts. It is, as far as available records show, the first time that any conductor of the Boston Symphony has ever conducted another orchestra during the regular Symphony season. Bruno Walter last year was the first guest conductor not a composer.

◆◆◆◆◆

Mr Monteux' appearance with the People's Symphony ought to dispose finally of the rumors which have for three years persisted, without foundation in fact, to the effect that there is hostility or rivalry between the People's Symphony and the Boston Symphony. The aims, attainments and audience of the two orchestras are so different that no comparison is possible. The People's Symphony management has repeatedly denied that their orchestra was attempting to conflict in any way with the Boston Symphony. But three of the present players in the People's Symphony have ever been members of the Boston Symphony. The People's Symphony is not an outgrowth of the lamentable strike several years ago, but an independent organization which has already proved itself a strong force for good in the musical life of this city and won influential backing.

◆◆◆◆◆

Next week's Monday Symphony concert, with the Boston debut of Claudio Arrau, a Chilean infant prodigy pianist, now 19 years old, also conflicts with Boito's "Mefistofele" and Chaliapin. Mr Monteux, after setting a particularly stupid program at the previous Monday concert, has this time chosen to include Mozart's exquisite "Jupiter" symphony, which the writer cannot hear too often. Arrau will play Chopin in F minor. Charpentier's "Impressions of Italy," music as spinelessly and as shamelessly sentimental as most of "Louise" is the other number.

◆◆◆◆◆

[illegible] Quartet concert

L'OPinon Publique JAN 24

SALLE MECHANICS — MARDI SOIR — 12 FEVRIER

L'EVENEMENT MUSICAL DE LA SAISON

De Retour Après Trois Années d'Absence

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Pierre Monteux, Directeur

La Saison d'Adieu du Grand Directeur Français

LES COMMANDES PAR LA POSTE à W. H. Brennan, Gérant, Salle Symphony, Boston, Accompagnées d'un Chèque, Rempli Contre Reçu du Montant.

.BILLETS: $2.50, $2.00, $1.50 ET $1.00 (Pas de Taxe de Guerre)

ADV JAN 27

YOUNG FOLKS' CONCERT

Tomorrow and Tuesday the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give concerts for the young in Symphony Hall with the following program: Prelude to 'Hansel and Gretel," Humperdinck; two movements from Mozart's G minor symphony; selections from Wagner's "Mastersingers"; Debussy's nocturne, "Festivals," and Rossini's "William Tell" overture. Thomas Whitney Surette will make an explanatory address.

MONDAY SYMPHONY

A week from tomorrow the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give another Monday concert, with Claudio Arrau, South American pianist, now making his first tour of America, as soloist. Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony, Charpentier's suite, "Impressions of Italy," and Chopin's concerto in F. minor, for piano and orchestra, will make up the program.

NIKISCH CONCERT

Mitja Nikisch will give his first Boston recital in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, February 10, for the benefit of the Children's Island Sanitarium. This young virtuoso has made a conspicuous success on his first tour of America.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The next regular Symphony concerts will be given February 8 and 9. Brahms' third symphony, Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," with Motte Lacroix as soloist, and Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" will comprise the program.

GLOBE JAN 29.

SYMPHONY CONCERT FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the second of the season's Young People's Concerts yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr Monteux conducted and as before Mr T. W. Surette of Concord made introductory and explanatory remarks.

The program was decidedly better chosen than the previous one, taken either from the point of view of general beauty and interest or from the more important one in this case of educational purpose. Mr Surette's comments were very valuable and with the music in hand should have driven home three points at least.

The two last movements of Mozart's Symphony in G minor he used to illustrate the rules of symphonic form, in particular pointing out that there were two themes in the final movement and that the development followed logically and beautifully.

Wagner's "Dance of the Apprentices" and the "Homage to Hans Sachs" from "Die Meistersinger" followed immediately upon the Mozart. This evoked the heartiest applause of the afternoon except for the final "William Tell Overture." One can hardly expect a child, who has in himself sufficient naivete and simplicity, to prefer the finer nuances of Mozart to the rough-hewn power of Wagner and perhaps it is not to be desired. The essential thing is that both shall be impressed upon the youthful mind even if subconsciously.

Mr Surette used the Wagner and

POST JAN 27

Young People's Concerts

For the pair of Young People's Concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Monday and Tuesday afternoons of this week, Mr. Monteaux has made a programme unusually broad in scope since it ranges from the Minuet and Finale from Mozart's Symphony in G minor to Debussy's Nicturne "Festivals." Other numbers are Humperdinck's Prelude to his opera "Hansel and Gretel"; excerpts from the third act of Wagner's comedy-opera "Die Meistersinger"; and the Overture to Rossini's opera "William Tell." Both Debussy and Wagner are names hitherto unlisted on the programmes of these concerts and the music of the former, if not of the latter, is presumably unfamiliar to these youthful audiences. Wisely Mr. Monteux would make known to them modern as well as "classic" music. As usual all the tickets for both of these concerts have been distributed among the schools of the city.

Schneevoigt Guest Conductor

The announcement that Georg Schneevoigt, the celebrated Finnish conductor, will appear as guest conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concerts of March 7 and 8 arouses considerable anticipatory interest. This conductor has long been prominent in Helsingfors, and as conductor of the Stockholm and Christiania Symphony Orchestras he has brought those Scandinavian cities into a new prominence in the musical world. During the last four seasons he has also drawn attention through his series of concerts at the Kurhaus in Schevininngen, the summer resort near the Hague. Here, while maintaining exacting standards in all his programmes, he has drawn large audiences during the summer season when "popular" concerts are the general rule.

Monteux to Conduct People's

Inasmuch as Mr. Schneevoigt's visit will release Mr. Monteux from rehearsals and concerts of the Boston Symphony during the first week of March, he has accepted an invitation to be the guest conductor of the People's Symphony Orchestra at the concert of March 9. That Mr. Monteux is thus to lead this orchestra through a concert before his return to Paris is indeed a fortunate and propitious circumstance.

TRANS JAN 27

Saens.

When Pierre Monteux, who will introduce here Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps," conducted the first performance with the Diaghileff Ballet in Paris, May 29, 1913, the audience greeted the music with an uproar. Although orchestra and dancers kept on valiantly to the end, it was of small avail, for even the fortissimo passages, which are many, were inaudible in the general clamor. Things were thrown, and the police intervened. The composer, conspicuous by his tall frame and his opera hat, managed to escape recognition, but his hat was smashed. There were four more performances in France and one in London.

M. Monteux produced the score in concert form at the Concerts Monteux in the Paris Casino. The work is called "A Tableau of Pagan Russia." Nicholas Roerich describes the ritual gesticulations of the "Adolescents" who welcome the advent of Spring. "One of them, a young girl, is chosen for immolation. She performs a wild dance which increases in ecstasy until she falls from

---

HER JAN 27

EXTRA SYMPHONY

A week from tomorrow the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the third concert of the Monday evening series in Symphony hall, with Claudio Arrau, South American pianist, who is now making his first tour of America, as soloist. Mr. Monteux will open the program with Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony. The closing number will be Charpentier's suite, "Impressions of Italy," a delightful series of pictures entitled: Serenade; At the Fountain; On Muleback; On the Summits; Naples. The viola solo off the stage in the Serenade will be played by Georges Fourel, the first viola of the orchestra. Chopin's Concerto in F minor will be played by Mr. Arrau. This brilliant young pianist went to Europe to pursue his studies when still a boy. He gave concerts there which attracted much attention. His introductory American concerts in New York and other cities have immediately placed him in the [illegible] of pianists of the younger

---

TRANS JAN 2

THE PROBLEM SOLVED?

At Last a Concert for Young People by the Symphony Orchestra Holds Them Still, Eager, Pleased — Mr. Surette's Notable Share — Warm Welcome for Wagner and Debussy

BEYOND precedent, above expectation, went the concert of the Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon, for young people. Among the bystanders there had, indeed, been forebodings. Agreed that the Prelude to "Hänsel and Gretel," the Overture to "William Tell," a Minuet and a darting Finale out of a Symphony of Mozart were music to entice young ears. Yet were not fragments from "Die Meistersinger" a hazardous choice, and Debussy's Nocturne of "Festivals" an invitation to disaster? Yet Mr. Monteux persisted. Perhaps he had observed that conductors elsewhere, setting programmes for children and youth, had not been so tender as he. Perhaps he had remarked that, given rhythm, the youngsters are pleased; that, given sonorities, they are impressed.

Moreover, was there not Mr. Surette to prepare the way with a clear word of introduction to each piece? And admirable in these exercises is Mr. Surette. He suggests an idea and plainly it interests his audience. He unfolds, embroiders the idea, and forthwith he has awakened a curiosity for the music to satisfy. The boys and the girls listen more intently, hear with the natural, prideful notion that now they are finding their way about. Twice as informing and interesting are these Young People's Concerts now that Mr. Surette has become spokesman. Add to his sayings Mr. Burk's printed notes, and the circle of pleasure and profit is well rounded.

"Festivals" was played and both the teens and the ten-year-olds listened intently and clapped warmly. Fortunate youngsters with no prejudices against muted trumpets and not a demur to Debussy's dissonances so long as they are interesting. They had ears also for his rhythm, though to this day certain elders lack them. And Wagner —of the larruping violins and the slow Waltz of The Apprentices, of the pompous Mastersingers and their clanging procession. Ears would not be ears, count them fifteen or fifty, could they resist this folk-jollity, these sonorous splendors of sound. Home also went Humperdinck's folk-melodies, though he led them now and then through byways of counterpoint. Plainly some of the lads and their sisters already knew them.

Old stories also to many were the 'cello-tune, the thunderstorm and all the rest in the Overture to "William Tell"—but now an orchestra and a master-cellist like Mr. Bedetti, were glorifying them. Rhythm, again, won the day for Mozart's Minuet; but the theme-chasing and the theme-flecking of the Finale to this Symphony in G minor, seemed to evade the more casual ears, though Mr. Surette had set them on the trail. . . . Still, content was the audience to the youngest. Plainly it was interested, pleased, looking as well as clapping its pleasure. At last after two years of groping, these Concerts for Young People have found the clue. H. T. P.

[185]

3 Concert

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.
(ORIGINAL)
106-110 SEVENTH AVE.
NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From FEB 1 - 1924
Evening Sun
New York City

Into Stravinsky's Fires of Spring Our Classics Fling

Modern Russian Rites Blaze Here for First Time, Atop Mozart and Beethoven Mountaintops.

So it came to pass last night that this year, which is musically all Stravinsky's year, reached its crescendo with "Le Sacre du Printemps," brought into town for its first New York performance by Conductor Pierre Monteux and his Boston Symphony Orchestra. Much heralded, debated, touted, flouted, hailed at last as the newest arch of triumph across the via Sacra of all music making, it arrived here ten years too late to win anything but a fierce approbation. Those who walked out on it walked out on deferential tiptoe. Those who remained gave it a classic's greeting, deeming it fit and logical company for the "Jupiter" of Mozart and the "Ninth" of Beethoven which filled a prodigious day.

There were the usual demurrers on the way out, of course; such remarks as make eavesdropping pleasurable and profitable: "A dreadful, vulgar work," we heard one lady call it. "And to think that he wrote it in Clarens, that lovely, peaceful, little Swiss place! You remember Clarens, don't you, dear, where we bought that cute little carved teddy bear?"

If there are bears secreted anywhere along the hillsides of these "Rites of Spring," be warned, they are not of the cute, little teddy family, but monstrous, shaggy, prehistoric beasts. They are fellows of a pagan Russia, muttering from out of the deep woods at the ceremonies of a half imagined, half realized people who shuffle and pray, writhe and sacrifice before their Kostrobunko.

Not all the space that Warren Story Smith used so excellently in the Boston Evening Transcript, nor all the time that Boris de Schloezer gave to his treatise in La Revue Musicale, can press us to linger now over the fascinating discussions on the philosophic and mythological sources of this work of music. For it was purely as music that Mr. Monteux presented it last night, stripped of the cooperation of Nijinsky's choreography and Roerich's scenery. And as such it has its own prime rights, asserted by Stravinsky himself, who said of it: "Note well that this idea came from the music; the music did not come from the idea. My work is architectonic; objective not descriptive construction."

Before launching the whole chute of adjectives that are pressing irresistibly against the endeavor to make this a simple and succinct account it may be well to recall how picturesquely "Le Sacre du Printemps" was received at the Theatre des Champs Elysees on May 29, 1913, when it was performed in staged version by the Diaghilev Ballet Russe. The details of that riot were recited on this page a week ago, even down to the things that an outraged audience flung at the stage and the difficulty Mr. Stravinsky had to keep his silk hat from destruction.

By all musical rights Mr. Monteux was the one to introduce us to the work. It was he who conducted that world premiere of it; it was he, in turn, who gave its first playing abroad in concert form. It has come since then to be recognized as the turning point of Stravinsky's genius, and, more than that, the springboard on which modern composers—the camps of Schoenberg as well as of Stravinsky—leaped away and out of the mists of Debussian impressionism.

It stands in strange relation to its newest hearers, though. For, though it is called by many Stravinsky's masterpiece he has already surpassed it—not in beauty and effectiveness, perhaps, but in experimental theory, instrumental device. He wrote it for a whole, tremendous Straussian orchestra, glutted with a massy personnel of all sorts of extra players. Nowadays, in "Les Noces" for instance, or in the symphonies for wood winds which New Yorkers will hear for the first time next week, he is striving for a refinement of his daring, all the more amazing because of its minimum of means. Thanks to our many guilds, leagues and orchestras we have already had Stravinsky more Starvinskian than this. The "Sacre' 'is the Genesis of its cult, and here we have been hard at his "Revelations."

Let's not quote the Bible, though, to pagan purposes. Out of whatever stage of Igor Stravinsky's genius these "Rites of Spring" are glorious matter. Throbbing as unsentimentally and relentlessly as the seasons themselves, the rhythm of them is a deep, hungry rumbling in the stomach of Mother Earth. And the little ones, the humans, the fleas in flock, go through their dreadful mummery across her: Hop, pray, take counsel, dance, prostrate themselves, parade in locked lascivity, till their sacrificial maiden, holding her piously, exultantly aloft . . . as if all this, or any of it, could appease!

Even the sad respite of the introduction to the second part, "The Sacrifice," is cold and dark of color. The two actual Russian folk tunes that are included in the work are clews to the whole of its vivid reek of an old soil, its clubbing accentuations, its steely sharpness of melodic line, its ruthless polytonal challenges. It is logically, strongly, immortally cruel. Cruel beyond lewdness or horror or cruelty itsalf. And splendid beyond all.

Mr. Monteux and his orchestra gave the novelty stirring interpretation, winning decided attention and applause for it. The Mozart symphony, too, had beautiful playing. The Boston Symphony's own concert master, Mr. Richard Burgin, was the evening's soloist in Sibelius's violin concerto. The late Maud Powell introduced this difficult work bravely to America and used to say of it that it was less a concerto than an orchestral piece with violin obligato. Mr. Burgin did not use, as she did, the Floridia coda of the last movement, and hence ended somewhat indecisively up in the air at the end of an able and vigorous performance.

One needed to be Janus faced to hear both past and future signalized so fully in one day of successive orchestras. Probably the packing of events has never before in the history of music tamped such a tremendous undertaking as Beethoven's Ninth Symphony down to second place on a day's list. Heaven forbid that the circumstance should have any essence of prophecy in it!

This was the end of Mr. Walter Damrosch's Beethoven cycle that was being celebrated in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, the New York Symphony combining with the Oratorio Society's chorus to recall that final pha of genius which expressed itself in n Ode to Joy. The occasion brought n, too, Mr. Harold Bauer, pianist, to play Beethoven's last sonata, opus 111, and these vocal soloists for the symphony: Ruth Rodgers, soprano; Mabel Ritch, contralto; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fred Patton, bass. Elsewhere Nevada Van der Veer, contralto, and Frederic Baer, barytone, sang along.

Mr. Damrosch was himself represented on the program as arranger of an unaccompanied Canon for six voices, upon the words, "Helpful Be, O Man, Noble and Good," which its present form distributed among soloists and chorus and which was conducted by Mr. Albert Stoessel, the Oratorio Society's director. This led off the list, and it was not until the symphony that the orchestra convened upon the stage and the chorus gathered something like full strength.

Specialist in the Ninth, no matter what land and language he's conducting in, William Mengelberg conducted the monumental work here only last season. Mr. Damrosch is famous for having conducted it twice over in one concert. The performance Toscanini gave at the Metropolitan with the opera company's chorus swung effectively forward on a specially raised bank, remains the memorable one of recent years. It is a staggering thing to prepare, evidently, and the carpenters must play as big a part in it as any. The disposition of the chorus seems to control a quarter of the verdict on its singing, and the unsingable hardships that Beethoven created must influence the rest.

Taking all this into consideration, it ought still be said that the Oratorio Society's deputation did neither suc bright nor determined things with choral opportunities. Possibly, it a midweek matinee, not all the bers could be present, and so th tition of the work this evening to have stronger singing. As soloists, they did averagely w those heathenishly hard passa the composer has dared th voice to encounter.

There were all the usual moments, though—that one stance, to which Richard Wag by history to have devoted hearsals, where the deep, strings march in unison th hush to proclaim the beginn Ode. It has become almost late years, to split the thir movements apart—and this rosch did, in turn. What lence is gained of th that, it expense of an impressive seemed to take a long w before the brasses recover ure of timorousness; and ing, even though Mr. D

The high place of the afternoon, then, was won by Mr. Bauer, whose playing of the sonata—of the first two movements, especially—was a handsomely wrought labor of love.

GILBERT W. GABRIEL.

Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
EAGLE
FEB 1 - 1924

MUSICAL PROGRESS

When given its first performance some years ago in Paris, Strawinsky's ballet, "Le Sacre du Printemps," created a sizable riot. At its New Y premiere last evening again, a happened, under the baton of P Monteux, the result was a de stration of an exceedingly frie character, another sign, we ta that music has continued on its exorable march of progress, des the cries of the reactionists.

We have had this year much Strawinsky; when next Tuesday th Philadelphians give his Debussy Memorial Symphonies the list of novelties by this single composer will hav crept up to five: "Rossignol," "Renard," "Sacre," the Pieces for Clarine and the Wind Instrument Symphonies. We do not recall any other contemporary to enjoy such unprecedented popularity within the space of a brief half season. All this Strawinsky richly deserves, for among living composers he is preeminent, a musical stylist with a language known to him alone, a great many ideas and an amazing orchestral technique with which to carry out his designs.

"Le Sacre du Printemps," a picture of pagan Russia, is perhaps greatest, the most independent a characteristic of his works. "L Chant du Rossignol" has the piquancy of its Oriental milieu, its delicately poetic tale, but "Sacre" in concert form must rely more definitely upon itself. To understand this music one must hear it; on paper it has often an incomprehensible look, a puzzling subtl that disappears in performance. score is a long one; the rhyth pulse is unceasing, and one is pressed by what seems at first an necessary brutality—the starkness the whole is a bit terrifying. Ha monic planes clash and distort rhythms pulse one against anoth The orchestral virtuosity of the wh is more than amazing, for it see that Strawinsky never repeats hi self; if he does there is always som thing new to come from his bag gether with the old.

Mr. Monteux was the first to c Printemps," and years been reclaimed from among the lost, and never were its many admirable qualities more eviden than in last evening's performance of the Strawinsky score.

The novelty was preceded by Mozart's delightful "Jupiter" Symphony and the Sibelius Violin Concerto D minor, played by Richard Bu concert master of the orche The concerto is a difficult and beautiful one, but Mr. Burgin not measure up to its requirem His tone was small, though plea in quality, and his intonation imperfect. The law of averages led us to believe that few co masters prove adequate solo formers.

* * *

ROMEIKE
(ORIGINAL)
106-110 SEVENTH AVE.
NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
Mail
From TELEGRAM FEB 1 - 1924
New York City

At Last "Le Sacre du Printemps."

When Pierre Monteux, as conductor the Diaghileff Ballets Russes, led first performance of Stravinsky's ballet "Le Sacre du Printemps" the Theatre des Champs Elysees in Paris on May 29, 1913, the response of the audience to what it heard scarcely stopped short of massacre. Mr. Monteux, now conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, must have had that historic fracas vividly in mind as he observed the ovations that greeted each of the two parts into which the work is divided for concert purposes on the occasion of the first performance of "Sacre" in New York last evening at Carnegie Hall. Whether in 1913 a New York audience would have rioted even as did the Parisians of that year no one can know. But this is certain, the impressiveness of the 'Sacre" last evening lay in the intrinsic meaning and the splendor of its music, not in any sensationalism, deliberate or accidental. The "Sacre" is an enormously complicated score, but it sounds as clear to our ears in this year of grace as the purling of a mountain brook.

Every dictionary in several tongues has been ransacked by the many commentators on this work, and in witness has been called a testimonial line that ranges from our common father, Adam, to Dr. Sigmund Freud. Indeed, the rioting of spilled ink did not cease with the Diaghileff performance of May 29, 1913. It has travelled from land to land. It is now in full swing here. Of course, the "Sacre" is an old story in Paris and in London. Our less backward neighbors, Philadelphia and Boston, have feasted their ears on it. When Sergei Koussewitzky takes up, next autumn, the baton that Pierre Monteux will have laid down, some predict we shall hear little but the "Sacre" from the temperamental Russian. Be that as may, it is safe to say that in of years there will be more local ink spilling over the B flat symphony of Beethoven than over "Le Sacre du Printemps."

These words are not written in disparagement of the "Sacre," still less would they underrate the importance of last night's concert. It is doubtful whether Stravinsky's crucially difficult score ever before had so fine a performance anywhere. Mr. Monteux conducted it with complete understanding, with keen sympathy, with the authority of a quasi-official interpreter. He had a superb orchestra at his disposal, and evidently the performance had been unsparingly rehearsed. I have heard the "Sacre" done twice in Paris, with the benefits of the Russian dancers and the vermil flame of Roerich's tempestuous scenery. On neither occasion did the music stand out in such bold and impressive relief as in this performance without scenery and dancers, where it had to invite judgment as a purely symphonic piece.

Ten years ago the "Sacre" caused rioting. Today audiences receive it with applause spontaneous and prolongued. What will be the verdict of another ten years? That no man can predict with certainty. But today the "Sacre" sounds like a really mighty work. The pulse, the throb, the ruthless, undiscourageable urge of spring are in this music. Its relentless beat is the mysterious eternal rhythm of the life whose genesis we know not, whose end we can only feebly divine, as on the rivers of time the seasons rush and leap to their resurrection. Stravinsky, like a variant of the absolute, summons the cataclysm in sonorous creation out of the void. His "Sacre" is the resounding symphony of atomic energy.

It would be interesting to study this work in its relation to other works of Stravinsky. More than once there are reminiscences of his relatively conventional "Fire Bird." His orchestration, expert, splendid, austere, of a tonic acidity and hardness, is in its weight and massiveness less typical of what Stravinsky's orchestration means to us ten years later than the instrumental fabric of his "Nightingale" or of his "Fox," or even of his earier "Petrouchka." Some still regard the "Sacre" as the most important of all Stravinsky's compositions. There is no disputing the imposing dimensions of the work, its utter magnificence as sheer sound, and, further, nobody but Stravinsky could have written it. And yet it is the least Stravinskyian of Stravinsky's compositions since "The Fire Bird."

Although the "Sacre" has come to us absolutely late, we must still be glad that it has come under the authoritative direction of Mr. Monteux, to whom all our gratitude for a superlative performance.

The "Sacre" stood last on a program that somewhat exceeded symphonic length. The first number was Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, played with a rare excellence. Between it and the "Sacre" stood the violin concerto of Sibelius. This interesting and neglected work is a welcome relief from the round of over-driven concertos that the fiddlers are continually pressing upon us. But its problems demand a doughtier violinist than Richard Burgin, the concert master of the orchestra.

However, the audience received his colorless and wavering performance with marked favor. It was the admirably expressive orchestral accompaniment, nevertheless, that really saved the day for Sibelius. The audience likewise applauded the symphony most heartily. Mr. Monteux called on his men to stand in acknowledgment at the end of the symphony and after each section of the "Sacre."

PITTS SANBORN.

3 Concert

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.
(ORIGINAL)
106-110 SEVENTH AVE.
NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From FEB 1 - 1924
Evening Sun
New York City

Into Stravinsky's Fires of Spring Our Classics Fling

Modern Russian Rites Blaze Here for First Time, Atop Mozart and Beethoven Mountaintops.

So it came to pass last night that this year, which is musically all Stravinsky's year, reached its crescendo with "Le Sacre du Printemps," brought into town for its first New York performance by Conductor Pierre Monteux and his Boston Symphony Orchestra. Much heralded, debated, touted, flouted, hailed at last as the newest arch of triumph across the via Sacra of all music making, it arrived here ten years too late to win anything but a fierce approbation. Those who walked out on it walked out on deferential tiptoe. Those who remained gave it a classic's greeting, deeming it fit and logical company for the "Jupiter" of Mozart and the "Ninth" of Beethoven which filled a prodigious day.

There were the usual demurrers on the way out, of course; such remarks as make eavesdropping pleasurable and profitable: "A dreadful, vulgar work," we heard one lady call it. "And to think that he wrote it in Clarens, that lovely, peaceful, little Swiss place! You remember Clarens, don't you, dear, where we bought that cute little carved teddy bear?"

If there are bears secreted anywhere along the hillsides of these "Rites of Spring," be warned, they are not of the cute, little teddy family, but monstrous, shaggy, prehistoric beasts. They are fellows of a pagan Russia, muttering them out of the deep woods at the ceremonies of a half imagined, half realized people who shuffle and pray, writh sacrifice before their Kostrobunko

Not all the space that Warren Smith used so excellently in the B Evening Transcript, nor all the that Boris de Schloezer gave t treatise in La Revue Musicale, can us to linger now over the fasci and discussions on the philosophic mythological sources of this work of music. For it was purely as music that Mr. Monteux presented it last night, stripped of the cooperation of Nijinsky's choreography and Roerich's scenery. And as such it has its own prime rights, asserted by Stravinsky himself, who said of it: "Note well that this idea came from the music; the music did not come from the idea. My work is architectonic, objective not descriptive construction."

Before launching the whole chute of objectives that are pressing irresistibly against the endeavor to make this a simple and succinct account it may be well to recall how picturesquely "Le Sacre du Printemps" was received at the Theatre des Champs Elysees on May 29, 1913, when it was performed in staged version by the Diaghilev Ballet Russe. The details of that riot were recited on this page a week ago, even down to the things that an outraged audience flung at the stage and the difficulty Mr. Stravinsky had to keep his silk hat from destruction.

By all musical rights Mr. Monteux was the one to introduce us to the work. It was he who conducted that world premiere of it; it was he, in turn, who gave its first playing abroad in concert form. It has come since then to be recognized as the turning point of Stravinsky's genius, and, more than that, the springboard on which modern composers—the camps of Schoenberg as well as of Stravinsky—leaped away and out of the mists of Debussian impressionism.

It stands in strange relation to its newest hearers, though. For, though it is called by many Stravinsky's masterpiece he has already surpassed it—not in beauty and effectiveness, perhaps, but in experimental theory, instrumental device. He wrote it for a whole, tremendous Straussian orchestra, glutted with a massy personnel of all sorts of extra players. Nowadays, in "Les Noces" for instance, or in the symphonies for wood winds which New Yorkers will hear for the first time next week, he is striving for a refinement of his daring, all the more amazing because of its minimum of means. Thanks to our many guilds, leagues and orchestras we have already had Stravinsky more Starvinskian than this. The "Sacre' 'is the Genesis of its cult, and here we have been hard at his "Revelations."

Let's not quote the Bible, though, to pagan purposes. Out of whatever stage of Igor Stravinsky's genius these "Rites of Spring" are glorious matter. Throbbing as unsentimentally and relentlessly as the seasons themselves, the rhythm of them is a deep, hungry rumbling in the stomach of Mother Earth. And the little ones, the humans, the fleas in flock, go through their dreadful mummery across her: Hop, pray, take counsel, dance, prostrate themselves, parade in locked lascivity, till their sacrificial maiden, holding her piously, exultantly aloft . . . as if all this, or any of it, could appease!

Even the sad respite of the introduction to the second part, "The Sacrifice," is cold and dark of color. The two actual Russian folk tunes that are included in the work are clews to the whole of its vivid reek of an old soil, its clubbing accentuations, its steely sharpness of melodic line, its ruthless polytonal challenges. It is logically, strongly, immortally cruel. Cruel beyond lewdness or horror or cruelty itsalf. And splendid beyond all.

Mr. Monteux and his orchestra gave the novelty stirring interpretation, winning decided attention and applause for it. The Mozart symphony, too, had beautiful playing. The Boston Symphony's own concert master, Mr. Richard Burgin, was the evening's soloist in Sibelius's violin concerto. The late Maud Powell introduced this difficult work bravely to America and used to say of it that it was less a concerto than an orchestral piece with violin obligato. Mr. Burgin did not use, as she did, the Floridia coda of the last movement, and hence ended somewhat indecisively up in the air at the end of an able and vigorous performance.

One needed to be Janus faced to hear both past and future signalized so fully in one day of successive orchestras. Probably the packing of events has being celebrated in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, the New York Symphony combining with the Oratorio Society's chorus to recall that final phase of genius which expressed itself in an Ode to Joy. The occasion brought in, too, Mr. Harold Bauer, pianist, to play Beethoven's last sonata, opus 111, and these vocal soloists for the symphony: Ruth Rodgers, soprano; Mabel Ritch, contralto; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fred Patton, bass. Elsewhere Nevada Van der Veer, contralto, and Frederic Baer, barytone, sang along.

TUBES—PHONES
DIALS—SOCKET
SETS — NEUTRO

Mr. Damrosch was himself represented on the program as arranger of an unaccompanied Canon for six voices, upon the words, "Helpful Be, O Man, Noble and Good," which its present form distributed among soloists and chorus and which was conducted by Mr. Albert Stoessel, the Oratorio Society's director. This led off the list, and it was not until the symphony that the orchestra convened upon the stage and the chorus gathered something like full strength.

Specialist in the Ninth, no matter what land and language he's conducting in, William Mengelberg conducted the monumental work here only last season. Mr. Damrosch is famous for having conducted it twice over in one concert. The performance Toscanini gave at the Metropolitan with the opera company's chorus swung effectively forward on a specially raised bank, remains the memorable one of recent years. It is a staggering thing to prepare, evidently, and the carpenters must play as big a part in it as any. The disposition of the chorus seems to control a quarter of the verdict on its singing, and the unsingable hardships that Beethoven created must influence the rest.

Taking all this into consideration, it ought still be said that the Oratorio Society's deputation did neither suc bright nor determined things with choral opportunities. Possibly, it a midweek matinee, not all the bers could be present, and so th tition of the work this evening to have stronger singing. As soloists, they did averagely w those heathenishly hard passag the composer has dared th voice to encounter.

There were all the usual moments, though—that one, stance, to which Richard Wag by history to have devoted hearsals, where the deep, strings march in unison th hush to proclaim the beginn Ode. It has become almost late years, to split the thir movements apart—and this rosch did, in turn. What ience is gained of th that, it expense of an impressive seemed to take a long w before the brasses recover ure of timorousness; and ing, even though Mr. D low to it, lacked for

---

Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
EAGLE

FEB 1 - 1924

MUSICAL PROGRESS

When given its first performance some years ago in Paris, Strawinsky's ballet, "Le Sacre du Printemps," created a sizable riot. At its New Y premiere last evening again, a happened, under the baton of Pi Monteux, the result was a de stration of an exceedingly frie character, another sign, we ta that music has continued on its exorable march of progress, desp the cries of the reactionists.

We have had this year much Stra winsky; when next Tuesday th Philadelphians give his Debussy Me morial Symphonies the list of novel ties by this single composer will hav crept up to five: "Rossignol," "Ren ard," "Sacre," the Pieces for Clarine and the Wind Instrument Symphonies. We do not recall any other contemporary to enjoy such unprecedented popularity within the space of a brief half season. All this Strawinsky richly deserves, among living composers he is preeminent, a musical stylist with a language known to him alone, a great many ideas and an amazing orchestral technique with which to carry out his designs.

"Le Sacre du Printemps," a picture of pagan Russia, is perhaps greatest, the most independent a characteristic of his works. " Chant du Rossignol" has the piquancy of its Oriental milieu, its delicately poetic tale, but "Sacre" in concert form must rely more definitely upon itself. To understan this music one must hear it; o paper it has often an incomprehensible look, a puzzling subt that disappears in performance. score is a long one; the rhyth pulse is unceasing, and one is i pressed by what seems at first an u necessary brutality—the starkness the whole is a bit terrifying. Ha monic planes clash and distort rhythms pulse one against anoth The orchestral virtuosity of the wh is more than amazing, for it see that Strawinsky never repeats hi self; if he does there is always som thing new to come from his bag gether with the old.

Mr. Monteux was the first to co duct "Sacre du Printemps," and him fell the honor of introduc this great modern classic to N York 10 years after its complet in Paris. His performance was e traordinary in its thoroughness and brilliance. Under his leadership the Boston Orchestra has in the past few years been reclaimed from among the lost, and never were its many admirable qualities more evident than in last evening's performance of the Strawinsky score.

The novelty was preceded by Mozart's delightful "Jupiter" Symphony and the Sibelius Violin Concerto D minor, played by Richard Bu concert master of the orche The concerto is a difficult and beautiful one, but Mr. Burgin not measure up to its requirem His tone was small, though plea in quality, and his intonation imperfect. The law of averages led us to believe that few co masters prove adequate solo formers.

* * *

ROMEIKE
(ORIGINAL)
106-110 SEVENTH AVE.
NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From
TELEGRAM
New York City
FEB 1 - 1924

Mail

At Last "Le Sacre du Printemps."

When Pierre Monteux, as conductor the Diaghileff Ballets Russes, led first performance of Stravinsky's ballet "Le Sacre du Printemps" the Theatre des Champs Elysees in Paris on May 29, 1913, the response of the audience to what it heard scarcely stopped short of massacre. Mr. Monteux, now conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, must have had that historic fracas vividly in mind as he observed the ovations that greeted each of the two parts into which the work is divided for concert purposes on the occasion of the first performance of "Sacre" in New York last evening at Carnegie Hall. Whether in 1913 a New York audience would have rioted even as did the Parisians of that year no one can know. But this is certain, the impressiveness of the 'Sacre" last evening lay in the intrinsic meaning and the splendor of its music, not in any sensationalism, deliberate or accidental. The "Sacre" is an enormously complicated score, but it sounds as clear to our ears in this year of grace as the purling of a mountain brook.

Every dictionary in several tongues has been ransacked by the many commentators on this work, and in witness has been called a testimonial line that ranges from our common father, Adam, to Dr. Sigmund Freud. Indeed, the rioting of spilled ink did not cease with the Diaghileff performance of May 29, 1913. It has travelled from land to land. It is now in full swing here. Of course, the "Sacre" is an old story in Paris and in London. Our less backward neighbors, Philadelphia and Boston, have feasted their ears on it. When Sergei Koussewitzky takes up, next autumn, the baton that Pierre Monteux will have laid down, some predict we shall hear little but the "Sacre" from the temperamental Russian. Be that may, it is safe to say that in of years there will be more local ink spilling over the B flat symphony of Beethoven than over "Le Sacre du Printemps."

These words are not written in disparagement of the "Sacre," still less would they underrate the importance of last night's concert. It is doubtful whether Stravinsky's crucially difficult score ever before had so fine a erformance anywhere. Mr. Monteux onducted it with complete undertanding, with keen sympathy, with e authority of a quasi-official inrpreter. He had a superb orchestra his disposal, and evidently the perrmance had been unsparingly rearsed. I have heard the "Sacre" ne twice in Paris, with the benefits the Russian dancers and the ver flame of Roerich's tempestuous enery. On neither occasion did the sic stand out in such bold and imessive relief as in this performance thout scenery and dancers, where had to invite judgment as a purely ymphonic piece.

Ten years ago the "Sacre" caused rioting. Today audiences receive it with applause spontaneous and prolongued. What will be the verdict of another ten years? That no man can predict with certainty. But today the "Sacre" sounds like a really mighty work. The pulse, the throb, the ruthless, undiscourageable urge of spring are in this music. Its relentless beat is the mysterious eternal rhythm of the life whose genesis we know not, whose end we can only feebly divine, as on the rivers of time the seasons rush and leap to their resurrection. Stravinsky, like a variant of the absolute, summons the cataclysm in sonorous creation out of the void. His "Sacre" is the resounding symphony of atomic energy.

It would be interesting to study this work in its relation to other works of Stravinsky. More than once there are reminiscences of his relatively conventional "Fire Bird." His orchestration, expert, splendid, austere, of a tonic acidity and hardness, is in its weight and massiveness less typical of what Stravinsky's orchestration means to us ten years later than the instrumental fabric of his "Nightingale" or of his "Fox," or even of his earier "Petrouchka." Some still regard the "Sacre" as the most important of all Stravinsky's compositions. There is no disputing the imposing dimensions of the work, its utter magnificence as sheer sound, and, further, nobody but Stravinsky could have written it. And yet it is the least Stravinskyian of Stravinsky's compositions since "The Fire Bird."

Although the "Sacre" has come to us absolutely late, we must still be glad that it has come under the authoritative direction of Mr. Monteux, to whom all our gratitude for a superlative performance.

The "Sacre" stood last on a program that somewhat exceeded symphonic length. The first number was Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, played with a rare excellence. Between it and the "Sacre" stood the violin concerto of Sibelius. This interesting and neglected work is a welcome relief from the round of over-driven concertos that the fiddlers are continually pressing upon us. But its problems demand a doughtier violinist than Richard Burgin, the concert master of the orchestra.

However, the audience received his colorless and wavering performance with marked favor. It was the admirably expressive orchestral accompaniment, nevertheless, that really saved the day for Sibelius. The audience likewise applauded the symphony most heartily. Mr. Monteux called on his men to stand in acknowledgment at the end of the symphony and after each section of the "Sacre."

PITTS SANBORN.

[186]

3 Concert

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.
(ORIGINAL)
106-110 SEVENTH AVE.
NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From FEB 1 - 1924
Evening Sun
New York City

Into Stravinsky's Fires of Spring Our Classics Fling

Modern Russian Rites Blaze Here for First Time, Atop Mozart and Beethoven Mountaintops.

So it came to pass last night that this year, which is musically all Stravinsky's year, reached its crescendo with "Le Sacre du Printemps," brought into town for its first New York performance by Conductor Pierre Monteux and his Boston Symphony Orchestra. Much heralded, debated, touted, flouted, hailed at last as the newest arch of triumph across the via Sacra of all music making, it arrived here ten years too late to win anything but a fierce approbation. Those who walked out on it walked out on deferential tiptoe. Those who remained gave it a classic's greeting, deeming it fit and logical company for the "Jupiter" of Mozart and the "Ninth" of Beethoven which filled a prodigious day.

There were the usual demurrers on the way out, of course; such remarks as make eavesdropping pleasurable and profitable: "A dreadful, vulgar work," we heard one lady call it. "And to think that he wrote it in Clarens, that lovely, peaceful, little Swiss place! You remember Clarens, don't you, dear, where we bought that cute little carved teddy bear?"

If there are bears secreted anywhere along the hillsides of these "Rites of Spring," be warned, they are not of the cute, little teddy family, but monstrous, shaggy, prehistoric beasts. They are fellows of a pagan Russia, muttering from out of the deep woods at the ceremonies of a half imagined, half realized people who shuffle and pray, writh sacrifice before their Kostrobunko

Not all the space that Warren Smith used so excellently in the B Evening Transcript, nor all the that Boris de Schloezer gave treatise in La Revue Musicale, can us to linger now over the fasci discussions on the philosophic and mythological sources of this work of music. For it was purely as music that Mr. Monteux presented it last night, stripped of the cooperation of Nijinsky's choreography and Roerich's scenery. And as such it has its own prime rights, asserted by Stravinsky himself, who said of it: "Note well that this idea came from the music; the music did not come from the idea. My work is architectonic; objective not descriptive construction."

Before launching the whole chute of objectives that are pressing irresistibly against the endeavor to make this a simple and succinct account it may be well to recall how picturesquely "Le Sacre du Printemps" was received at the Theatre des Champs Elysees on May 29, 1913, when it was performed in staged version by the Diaghilev Ballet Russe. The details of that riot were recited on this page a week ago, even down to the things that an outraged audience flung at the stage and the difficulty Mr. Stravinsky had to keep his silk hat from destruction.

By all musical rights Mr. Monteux was the one to introduce us to the work. It was he who conducted that world premiere of it; it was he, in turn, who gave its first playing abroad in concert form. It has come since then to be recognized as the turning point of Stravinsky's genius, and, more than that, the springboard on which modern composers—the camps of Schoenberg as well as of Stravinsky—leaped away and out of the mists of Debussian impressionism.

It stands in strange relation to its newest hearers, though. For, though it is called by many Stravinsky's masterpiece he has already surpassed it—not in beauty and effectiveness, perhaps, but in experimental theory, instrumental device. He wrote it for a whole, tremendous Straussian orchestra, glutted with a massy personnel of all sorts of extra players. Nowadays, in "Les Noces" for instance, or in the symphonies for wood winds which New Yorkers will hear for the first time next week, he is striving for a refinement of his daring, all the more amazing because of its minimum of means. Thanks to our many guilds, leagues and orchestras we have already had Stravinsky more Starvinskian than this. The "Sacre' 'is the Genesis of its cult, and here we have been hard at his "Revelations."

Let's not quote the Bible, though, to pagan purposes. Out of whatever stage of Igor Stravinsky's genius these "Rites of Spring" are glorious matter. Throbbing as unsentimentally and relentlessly as the seasons themselves, the rhythm of them is a deep, hungry rumbling in the stomach of Mother Earth. And the little ones, the humans, the fleas in flock, go through their dreadful mummery across her: Hop, pray, take counsel, dance, prostrate themselves, parade in locked lascivity, till their sacrificial maiden, holding her piously, exultantly aloft . . . as if all this, or any of it, could appease!

Even the sad respite of the introduction to the second part, "The Sacrifice," is cold and dark of color. The two actual Russian folk tunes that are included in the work are clews to the whole of its vivid reek of an old soil, its clubbing accentuations, its steely sharpness of melodic line, its ruthless polytonal challenges. It is logically, strongly, immortally cruel. Cruel beyond lewdness or horror or cruelty itsalf. And splendid beyond all.

Mr. Monteux and his orchestra gave the novelty stirring interpretation, winning decided attention and applause for it. The Mozart symphony, too, had beautiful playing. The Boston Symphony's own concert master, Mr. Richard Burgin, was the evening's soloist in Sibelius's violin concerto. The late Maud Powell introduced this difficult work bravely to America and used to say of it that it was less a concerto than an orchestral piece with violin obligato. Mr. Burgin did not use, as she did, the Floridia coda of the last movement, and hence ended somewhat indecisively up in the air at the end of an able and vigorous performance.

One needed to be Janus faced to hear both past and future signalized so fully in one day of successive orchestras. Probably the packing of events has

TUBES—PHONES
DIALS—SOCKETS
SETS — NEUTRO

being celebrated in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, the New York Symphony combining with the Oratorio Society's chorus to recall that final pha of genius which expressed itself in Ode to Joy. The occasion brought in, too, Mr. Harold Bauer, pianist, to play Beethoven's last sonata, opus 111, and these vocal soloists for the symphony: Ruth Rodgers, soprano; Mabel Ritch, contralto; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fred Patton, bass. Elsewhere Nevada Van der Veer, contralto, and Frederic Baer, barytone, sang along.

Mr. Damrosch was himself represented on the program as arranger of an unaccompanied Canon for six voices, upon the words, "Helpful Be, O Man, Noble and Good," which its present form distributed among soloists and chorus and which was conducted by Mr. Albert Stoessel, the Oratorio Society's director. This led off the list, and it was not until the symphony that the orchestra convened upon the stage and the chorus gathered something like full strength.

Specialist in the Ninth, no matter what land and language he's conducting in, William Mengelberg conducted the monumental work here only last season. Mr. Damrosch is famous for having conducted it twice over in one concert. The performance Toscanini gave at the Metropolitan with the opera company's chorus swung effectively forward on a specially raised bank, remains the memorable one of recent years. It is a staggering thing to prepare, evidently, and the carpenters must play as big a part in it as any. The disposition of the chorus seems to control a quarter of the verdict on its singing, and the unsingable hardships that Beethoven created must influence the rest.

Taking all this into consideration, it ought still be said that the Oratorio Society's deputation did neither suc bright nor determined things with choral opportunities. Possibly, it a midweek matinee, not all the bers could be present, and so th tition of the work this evening to have stronger singing. As soloists, they did averagely w those heathenishly hard passag the composer has dared th voice to encounter.

There were all the usual moments, though—that one stance, to which Richard Wag by history to have devoted hearsals, where the deep, strings march in unison th hush to proclaim the beginn Ode. It has become almost late years, to split the third movements apart—and this rosch did, in turn. What lence is gained of that, it expense of an impressive seemed to take a long w before the brasses recover ure of timorousness; and ing, even though Mr. D low to it, lacked for

---

Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
EAGLE

FEB 1 - 1924

MUSICAL PROGRESS

When given its first performance some years ago in Paris, Strawinsky's ballet, "Le Sacre du Printemps," created a sizable riot. At its New premiere last evening a happened, under the baton of Pi Monteux, the result was a demonstration of an exceedingly friendly character, another sign, we take it, that music has continued on its exorable march of progress, des the cries of the reactionists.

We have had this year much Strawinsky; when next Tuesday th Philadelphians give his Debussy Me morial Symphonies the list of novel ties by this single composer will hav crept up to five: "Rossignol," "Ren ard," "Sacre," the Pieces for Clarine and the Wind Instrument Sym phonies. We do not recall any other contemporary to enjoy such unprecedented popularity within the space of a brief half season. All this Strawinsky richly deserves, for among living composers he is preeminent, a musical stylist with a language known to him alone, a great many ideas and an amazing orchestral technique with which to carry out his designs.

"Le Sacre du Printemps," a pic ture of pagan Russia, is perhaps greatest, the most independent a characteristic of his works. "L Chant du Rossignol" has the piquancy of its Oriental milieu, its delicately poetic tale, but "Sacre" in concert form must rely more definitely upon itself. To understand this music one must hear it; on paper it has often an incomprehensible look, a puzzling subtl that disappears in performance. score is a long one; the rhyth pulse is unceasing, and one is i pressed by what seems at first an u necessary brutality—the starkness the whole is a bit terrifying. Ha monic planes clash and distort rhythms pulse one against anoth The orchestral virtuosity of the wh is more than amazing, for it see that Strawinsky never repeats hi self; if he does there is always son thing new to come from his bag gether with the old.

Mr. Monteux was the first to co duct "Sacre du Printemps," and him fell the honor of introduc this great modern classic to N York 10 years after its complet in Paris. His performance was e traordinary in its thoroughness and brilliance. Under his leadership the Boston Orchestra has in the past few years been reclaimed from among the lost, and never were its many admirable qualities more evident than in last evening's performance of the Strawinsky score.

The novelty was preceded by Mozart's delightful "Jupiter" Symphony and the Sibelius Violin Concerto D minor, played by Richard Bu concert master of the orche The concerto is a difficult and o beautiful one, but Mr. Burgin not measure up to its requirem His tone was small, though plea in quality, and his intonation o imperfect. The law of averages led us to believe that few co masters prove adequate solo formers.

* * *

(ORIGINAL)
106-110 SEVENTH AVE.
NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From
TELEGRAM FEB 1 - 1924
New York City

Mail

At Last "Le Sacre du Printemps."

When Pierre Monteux, as conductor of the Diaghileff Ballets Russes, led the first performance of Stravinsky's new ballet "Le Sacre du Printemps" at the Theatre des Champs Elysees in Paris on May 29, 1913, the response of the audience to what it heard scarcely stopped short of massacre. Mr. Monteux, now conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, must have had that historic fracas vividly in mind as he observed the ovations that greeted each of the two parts into which the work is divided for concert purposes on the occasion of the first performance of "Sacre" in New York last evening at Carnegie Hall. Whether in 1913 a New York audience would have rioted even as did the Parisians of that year no one can know. But this is certain, the impressiveness of the 'Sacre" last evening lay in the intrinsic meaning and the splendor of its music, not in any sensationalism, deliberate or accidental. The "Sacre" is an enormously complicated score, but it sounds as clear to our ears in this year of grace as the purling of a mountain brook.

Every dictionary in several tongues has been ransacked by the many commentators on this work, and in witness has been called a testimonial line that ranges from our common father, Adam, to Dr. Sigmund Freud. Indeed, the rioting of spilled ink did not cease with the Diaghileff performance of May 29, 1913. It has travelled from land to land. It is now in full swing here. Of course, the "Sacre" is an old story in Paris and in London. Our less backward neighbors, Philadelphia and Boston, have feasted their ears on it. When Sergei Koussewitzky takes up, next autumn, the baton that Pierre Monteux will have laid down, some predict we shall hear little but the "Sacre" from the temperamental Russian. Be that as it may, it is safe to say that in of years there will be more local ink spilling over the B flat symphony of Beethoven than over "Le Sacre du Printemps."

These words are not written in disparagement of the "Sacre," still less would they underrate the importance of last night's concert. It is doubtful whether Stravinsky's crucially difficult score ever before had so fine a erformance anywhere. Mr. Monteux nducted it with complete underanding, with keen sympathy, with e authority of a quasi-official inrpreter. He had a superb orchestra his disposal, and evidently the perrmance had been unsparingly rearsed. I have heard the "Sacre" ne twice in Paris, with the benefits the Russian dancers and the ver flame of Roerich's tempestuous nery. On neither occasion did the sic stand out in such bold and imessive relief as in this performance thout scenery and dancers, where had to invite judgment as a purely symphonic piece.

Ten years ago the "Sacre" caused rioting. Today audiences receive it with applause spontaneous and prolongued. What will be the verdict of another ten years? That no man can predict with certainty. But today the "Sacre" sounds like a really mighty work. The pulse, the throb, the ruthless, undiscourageable urge of spring are in this music. Its relentless beat is the mysterious eternal rhythm of the life whose genesis we know not, whose end we can only feebly divine, as on the rivers of time the seasons rush and leap to their resurrection. Stravinsky, like a variant of the absolute, summons the cataclysm in sonorous creation out of the void. His "Sacre" is the resounding symphony of atomic energy.

It would be interesting to study this work in its relation to other works of Stravinsky. More than once there are reminiscences of his relatively conventional "Fire Bird." His orchestration, expert, splendid, austere, of a tonic acidity and hardness, is in its weight and massiveness less typical of what Stravinsky's orchestration means to us ten years later than the instrumental fabric of his "Nightingale" or of his "Fox," or even of his earier "Petrouchka." Some still regard the "Sacre" as the most important of all Stravinsky's compositions. There is no disputing the imposing dimensions of the work, its utter magnificence as sheer sound, and, further, nobody but Stravinsky could have written it. And yet it is the least Stravinskyian of Stravinsky's compositions since "The Fire Bird."

Although the "Sacre" has come to us absolutely late, we must still be glad that it has come under the authoritative direction of Mr. Monteux, to whom all our gratitude for a superlative performance.

The "Sacre" stood last on a program that somewhat exceeded symphonic length. The first number was Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, played with a rare excellence. Between it and the "Sacre" stood the violin concerto of Sibelius. This interesting and neglected work is a welcome relief from the round of over-driven concertos that the fiddlers are continually pressing upon us. But its problems demand a doughtier violinist than Richard Burgin, the concert master of the orchestra.

However, the audience received his colorless and wavering performance with marked favor. It was the admirably expressive orchestral accompaniment, nevertheless, that really saved the day for Sibelius. The audience likewise applauded the symphony most heartily. Mr. Monteux called on his men to stand in acknowledgment at the end of the symphony and after each section of the "Sacre."

PITTS SANBORN.

[186]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

3 Conc't

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.
(ORIGINAL)
106-110 SEVENTH AVE.
NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From FEB 1-1924
Evening Sun
New York City

Into Stravinsky's Fires of Spring Our Classics Fling

Modern Russian Rites Blaze Here for First Time, Atop Mozart and Beethoven Mountaintops.

So it came to pass last night that this year, which is musically all Stravinsky's year, reached its crescendo with "Le Sacre du Printemps," brought into town for its first New York performance by Conductor Pierre Monteux and his Boston Symphony Orchestra. Much heralded, debated, touted, flouted, hailed at last as the newest arch of triumph across the via Sacra of all music making, it arrived here ten years too late to win anything but a fierce approbation. Those who walked out on it walked out on deferential tiptoe. Those who remained gave it a classic's greeting, deeming it fit and logical company for the "Jupiter" of Mozart and the "Ninth" of Beethoven which filled a prodigious day.

There were the usual demurrers on the way out, of course; such remarks as make eavesdropping pleasurable and profitable: "A dreadful, vulgar work," we heard one lady call it. "And to think that he wrote it in Clarens, that lovely, peaceful, little Swiss place! You remember Clarens, don't you, dear, where we bought that cute little carved teddy bear?"

If there are bears secreted anywhere along the hillsides of these "Rites of Spring," be warned, they are not of the cute, little teddy family, but monstrous, shaggy, prehistoric beasts. They are fellows of a pagan Russia, muttering them out of the deep woods at the ceremonies of a half imagined, half realized people who shuffle and pray, writhe in sacrifice before their Kostrobunko.

Not all the space that Warren Smith used so excellently in the B Evening Transcript, nor all the that Boris de Schloezer gave t treatise in La Revue Musicale, can us to linger now over the fasci discussions on the philosophic and mythological sources of this work of music. For it was purely as music that Mr. Monteux presented it last night, stripped of the cooperation of Nijinsky's choreography and Roerich's scenery. And as such it has its own prime rights, asserted by Stravinsky himself, who said of it: "Note well that this idea came from the music; the music did not come from the idea. My work is architectonic; objective not descriptive construction."

Before launching the whole chute of adjectives that are pressing irresistibly against the endeavor to make this a simple and succinct account it may be well to recall how picturesquely "Le Sacre du Printemps" was received at the Theatre des Champs Elysees on May 29, 1913, when it was performed in staged version by the Diaghilev Ballet Russe. The details of that riot were recited on this page a week ago, even down to the things that an outraged audience flung at the stage and the difficulty Mr. Stravinsky had to keep his silk hat from destruction.

By all musical rights Mr. Monteux was the one to introduce us to the work. It was he who conducted that world premiere of it; it was he, in turn, who gave its first playing abroad in concert form. It has come since then to be recognized as the turning point of Stravinsky's genius, and, more than that, the springboard on which modern composers—the camps of Schoenberg as well as of Stravinsky—leaped away and out of the mists of Debussian impressionism.

It stands in strange relation to its newest hearers, though. For, though it is called by many Stravinsky's masterpiece he has already surpassed it—not in beauty and effectiveness, perhaps, but in experimental theory, instrumental device. He wrote it for a whole, tremendous Straussian orchestra, glutted with a massy personnel of all sorts of extra players. Nowadays, in "Les Noces" for instance, or in the symphonies for wood winds which New Yorkers will hear for the first time next week, he is striving for a refinement of his daring, all the more amazing because of its minimum of means. Thanks to our many guilds, leagues and orchestras we have already had Stravinsky more Starvinskian than this. The "Sacre' 'is the Genesis of its cult, and here we have been hard at his "Revelations."

Let's not quote the Bible, though, to pagan purposes. Out of whatever stage of Igor Stravinsky's genius these "Rites of Spring" are glorious matter. Throbbing as unsentimentally and relentlessly as the seasons themselves the rhythm of them is a deep, hungry rumbling in the stomach of Mother Earth. And the little ones, the humans, the fleas in flock, go through their dreadful mummery across her: Hop, pray, take counsel, dance, prostrate themselves, wallow in locked lascivity, till their ificial maiden, holding her piously, exultantly aloft . . . as if all this, or any of it, could appease!

Even the sad respite of the introduction to the second part, "The Sacrifice," is cold and dark of color. The two actual Russian folk tunes that are included in the work are clews to the whole of its vivid reek of an old soil, its clubbing accentuations, its steely sharpness of melodic line, its ruthless polytonal challenges. It is logically, strongly, immortally cruel. Cruel beyond lewdness or horror or cruelty itself. And splendid beyond all.

Mr. Monteux and his orchestra gave the novelty stirring interpretation, winning decided attention and applause for it. The Mozart symphony, too, had beautiful playing. The Boston Symphony's own concert master, Mr. Richard Burgin, was the evening's soloist in Sibelius's violin concerto. The late Maud Powell introduced this difficult work bravely to America and used to say of it that it was less a concerto than an orchestral piece with violin obligato. Mr. Burgin did not use, as she did, the Floridia coda of the last movement, and hence ended somewhat indecisively up in the air at the end of an able and vigorous performance.

One needed to be Janus faced to hear both past and future signalized so fully in one day of successive orchestras. Probably the packing of events has

TUBES—PHONES
DIALS—SOCKET
SETS — NEUTRO

being celebrated in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, the New York Symphony combining with the Oratorio Society's chorus to recall that final pha of genius which expressed itself in Ode to Joy. The occasion brought n, too, Mr. Harold Bauer, pianist, to play Beethoven's last sonata, opus 111, and these vocal soloists for the symphony: Ruth Rodgers, soprano; Mabel Ritch, contralto; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fred Patton, bass. Elsewhere Nevada Van der Veer, contralto, and Frederic Baer, barytone, sang along.

Mr. Damrosch was himself represented on the program as arranger of an unaccompanied Canon for six voices, upon the words, "Helpful Be, O Man, Noble and Good," which its present form distributed among soloists and chorus and which was conducted by Mr. Albert Stoessel, the Oratorio Society's director. This led off the list, and it was not until the symphony that the orchestra convened upon the stage and the chorus gathered something like full strength.

Specialist in the Ninth, no matter what land and language he's conducting in, William Mengelberg conducted the monumental work here only last season. Mr. Damrosch is famous for having conducted it twice over in one concert. The performance Toscanini gave at the Metropolitan with the opera company's chorus swung effectively forward on a specially raised bank, remains the memorable one of recent years. It is a staggering thing to prepare, evidently, and the carpenters must play as big a part in it as any. The disposition of the chorus seems to control a quarter of the verdict on its singing, and the unsingable hardships that Beethoven created must influence the rest.

Taking all this into consideration, it ought still be said that the Oratorio Society's deputation did neither suc bright nor determined things with choral opportunities. Possibly, it a midweek matinee, not all the bers could be present, and so th tition of the work this evening to have stronger singing. As soloists, they did averagely w those heathenishly hard passa the composer has dared th voice to encounter.

There were all the usual moments, though—that one stance, to which Richard Wag by history to have devoted hearsals, where the deep, strings march up in unison th hush to proclaim the beginn Ode. It has become almost late years, to split the thir movements apart Damrosch did, in turn, lence is gained of that, it expense of all impressive seemed to take a long w before the brasses recover ure of timorousness; and ing, even though Mr. D low to it, lacked fo

---

220 W
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
EAGLE

EB 1-1924

MUSICAL PROGRESS

When given its first performance some years ago in Paris, Strawinsky's ballet, "Le Sacre du Printemps," created a sizable riot. At its New York première last evening aga happened, under the baton Monteux, the result was a dem stration of an exceedingly friendly character, another sign, we take it, that music has continued on its inexorable march of progress, despite the cries of the reactionists.

We have had this year much Strawinsky; when next Tuesday the Philadelphians give his Debussy Memorial Symphonies the list of novelties by this single composer will have crept up to five: "Rossignol," "Renard," "Sacre," the Pieces for Clarinet and the Wind Instrument Symphonies. We do not recall any other contemporary to enjoy such unprecedented popularity within the space of a brief half season. All this Strawinsky richly deserves, for among living composers he is preeminent, a musical stylist with a language known to him alone, a great many ideas and an amazing orchestral technique with which to carry out his designs.

"Le Sacre du Printemps," a picture of pagan Russia, is perhaps greatest, the most independent a characteristic of his works. " Chant du Rossignol" has the piquancy of its Oriental milieu, its delicately poetic tale, but "Sacre" in concert form must rely more definitely upon itself. To understand this music one must hear it; on paper it has often an incomprehensible look, a puzzling subtl that disappears in performance. score is a long one; the rhyth pulse is unceasing, and one is i pressed by what seems at first an u necessary brutality—the starkness the whole is a bit terrifying. Ha monic planes clash and distort rhythms pulse one against anoth The orchestral virtuosity of the who is more than amazing, for it see that Strawinsky never repeats hi self; if he does there is always som thing new to come from his bag gether with the old.

Mr. Monteux was the first to co duct "Sacre du Printemps," and him fell the honor of introduc this great modern classic to N York 10 years after its complet in Paris. His performance was e traordinary in its thoroughness and brilliance. Under his leadership the Boston Orchestra has in the past few years been reclaimed from among the lost, and never were its many admirable qualities more evident than in last evening's performance of the Strawinsky score.

The novelty was preceded by Mozart's delightful "Jupiter" Symphony and the Sibelius Violin Concerto D minor, played by Richard Bur concert master of the orche The concerto is a difficult and o beautiful one, but Mr. Burgin not measure up to its requirem His tone was small, though plea in quality, and his intonation o imperfect. The law of averages led us to believe that few co masters prove adequate solo formers.

* * *

ROMEIKE
(ORIGINAL)
106-110 SEVENTH AVE.
NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From
TELEGRAM FEB 1-1924
New York City

At Last "Le Sacre du Printemps."

When Pierre Monteux, as conductor of the Diaghileff Ballets Russes, led the first performance of Stravinsky's new ballet "Le Sacre du Printemps" at the Theatre des Champs Elysees in Paris on May 29, 1913, the response of the audience to what it heard scarcely stopped short of massacre. Mr. Monteux, now conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, must have had that historic fracas vividly in mind as he observed the ovations that greeted each of the two parts into which the work is divided for concert purposes on the occasion of the first performance of "Sacre" in New York last evening at Carnegie Hall. Whether in 1913 a New York audience would have rioted even as did the Parisians of that year no one can know. But this is certain, the impressiveness of the 'Sacre" last evening lay in the intrinsic meaning and the splendor of its music, not in any sensationalism, deliberate or accidental. The "Sacre" is an enormously complicated score, but it sounds as clear to our ears in this year of grace as the purling of a mountain brook.

Every dictionary in several tongues has been ransacked by the many commentators on this work, and in witness has been called a testimonial line that ranges from our common father, Adam, to Dr. Sigmund Freud. Indeed, the rioting of spilled ink did not cease with the Diaghileff performance of May 29, 1913. It has travelled from land to land. It is now in full swing here. Of course, the "Sacre" is an old story in Paris and in London. Our less backward neighbors, Philadelphia and Boston, have feasted their ears on it. When Sergei Koussewitzky takes up, next autumn, the baton that Pierre Monteux will have laid down, some predict we shall hear little but the "Sacre" from the temperamental Russian. Be that may, it is safe to say that in of years there will be more local ink spilling over the B flat symphony of Beethoven than over "Le Sacre du Printemps."

These words are not written in disparagement of the "Sacre," still less would they underrate the importance of last night's concert. It is doubtful whether Stravinsky's crucially difficult score ever before had so fine a performance anywhere. Mr. Monteux conducted it with complete understanding, with keen sympathy, with the authority of a quasi-official interpreter. He had a superb orchestra at his disposal, and evidently the performance had been unsparingly rehearsed. I have heard the "Sacre" done twice in Paris, with the benefits of the Russian dancers and the verbal flame of Roerich's tempestuous scenery. On neither occasion did the music stand out in such bold and impressive relief as in this performance without scenery and dancers, where it had to invite judgment as a purely symphonic piece.

Ten years ago the "Sacre" caused rioting. Today audiences receive it with applause spontaneous and prolongued. What will be the verdict of another ten years? That no man can predict with certainty. But today the "Sacre" sounds like a really mighty work. The pulse, the throb, the ruthless, undiscourageable urge of spring are in this music. Its relentless beat is the mysterious eternal rhythm of the life whose genesis we know not, whose end we can only feebly divine, as on the rivers of time the seasons rush and leap to their resurrection. Stravinsky, like a variant of the absolute, summons the cataclysm in sonorous creation out of the void. His "Sacre" is the resounding symphony of atomic energy.

It would be interesting to study this work in its relation to other works of Stravinsky. More than once there are reminiscences of his relatively conventional "Fire Bird." His orchestration, expert, splendid, austere, of a tonic acidity and hardness, is in its weight and massiveness less typical of what Stravinsky's orchestration means to us ten years later than the instrumental fabric of his "Nightingale" or of his "Fox," or even of his earier "Petrouchka." Some still regard the "Sacre" as the most important of all Stravinsky's compositions. There is no disputing the imposing dimensions of the work, its utter magnificence as sheer sound, and, further, nobody but Stravinsky could have written it. And yet it is the least Stravinskyian of Stravinsky's compositions since "The Fire Bird."

Although the "Sacre" has come to us absolutely late, we must still be glad that it has come under the authoritative direction of Mr. Monteux, to whom all our gratitude for a superlative performance.

The "Sacre" stood last on a program that somewhat exceeded symphonic length. The first number was Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, played with a rare excellence. Between it and the "Sacre" stood the violin concerto of Sibelius. This interesting and neglected work is a welcome relief from the round of over-driven concertos that the fiddlers are continually pressing upon us. But its problems demand a doughtier violinist than Richard Burgin, the concert master of the orchestra.

However, the audience received his colorless and wavering performance with marked favor. It was the admirably expressive orchestral accompaniment, nevertheless, that really saved the day for Sibelius. The audience likewise applauded the symphony most heartily. Mr. Monteux called on his men to stand in acknowledgment at the end of the symphony and after each section of the "Sacre."

PITTS SANBORN.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From FEB 1 - 1924
EVENING WORLD
New York City

REALM OF MUSIC

By Frank H. Warren.

If musical sportsmanship had at its disposal the journalistic facilities of baseball or horse racing there might be spread across this page to-day the fact that last night in Carnegie Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first New York performance of Igor Strawinsky's ballet, "Le Sacre du Printemps." To those who know something of the daring and courage, the rigorous training and highly developed skill, and something, as well, of the intellectual and artistic significance that are involved in bringing such a work as "Le Sacre du Printemps" into being and performance, the fact that New York has at last heard it will seem almost as noteworthy an event as a new record in home runs. However, the fact must be recorded with no typographical hurrah that last night's performance of "Le Sacre" was the most important single event that has taken place in New York concert halls this season.

"The Rite of Spring," as the title of this work is translated, is one of the half dozen really great products of the modern school of composition, and that by reason of just those qualities that have always made great music, regardless of the particulars of their harmonic or formal substance. It has ideas, cogent, forceful, original ideas, and they are always to the fore. Strawinsky is not playing with discord or digging for uncanny sounds. He has something to say and he says it. There is not a fumbling or obscure page in the whole score. There are melodies as straightforward as a Mozart theme, as, for example, in the Dance of the Adolescents of Part 1. There are pages of atmospheric conjuration as vivid as some of Wagner; there are scenes as delicately suggested as anything in Debussy. In these and in other matters Strawinsky has bettered much of his instruction. But there is more. The unremitting rhythmic sweep, the unrelenting incisiveness with which Strawinsky cuts into our habitual passivity in the concert hall, and the firm hand with which he probes the hitherto unknown resources of the orchestra—these are new in music and they give their author the rank of master.

Mr. Monteux could tell a curious story if he chose about "Le Sacre." He conducted the first performance in Paris in April, 1913. The pandemonium of protest and execration hardly permitted a note to be heard. Most of the Paris journals used such epithets as only a music critic can command. A year later Mr. Monteux played the work in concert with a reception as enthusiastic in approval as, formerly, it had been vocal in denunciation. By 1920 "Le Sacre" had passed into history by inclusion in the most solemn of the Histories of Music. It would not be surprising if the next edition of Grove's Dictionary should make guarded reference to the work as a significant evidence of the trend of the times.

Besides Strawinsky's work, last night's program contained Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony and the violin concerto of Sibelius, op. 47. Richard Burgin, concert master of the orchestra, played the solo part of the concerto. The concerto itself is, for long stretches, a tedious work of endless cadenza over subdued orchestral background, occasionally interrupted by melodies of much charm and nationalistic flavor. Mr. Burgin, not always true to pitch, produced a singing, mellow tone, and played with great skill and sincerity. The Mozart symphony was read with utmost clarity and wise restraint.

Walter Damrosch played "finis" to [illegible] Beethoven cycle yesterday after- [illegible] Carnegie Hall, except for to-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES

FEB 1 - 1924

MUSIC

'Sacre de Printemps' Played.

By OLIN DOWNES.

To Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra fell the task, superbly executed, of introducing to the public of this city Igor Strawinsky's "Sacre de printemps," as the work is most commonly known, last night in Carnegie Hall. This work, which created a riot when it was first performed by Mr. Monteax and the Russian Ballet in Paris in 1913, has been more discussed than any other composition of Strawinsky.

The audience knowing this and fearing more through the many articles of a descriptive kind which had appeared in the daily press, came prepared for the worst, to listen to the new music. After the first part of the score had come to an end there were a few hisses—whether in indignation or to suppress premature applause was not easy to tell. After the second part had ended it was apparent that a majority had enjoyed themselves. The applause of this majority was long and loud, and to all appearances most sincere. It repeatedly acclaimed Mr. Monteux and the gentlemen of the orchestra.

Misleading things are always said about a work with such a sensational history. Two false impressions had been spread abroad, concerning this work, first, that it was unequaled in ugliness and fearfulness generally, and, secondly, that it was completely unprecedented among Strawinsky's compositions. Both these reports, as Mark Twain would have said, seem greatly exaggerated. The music, filled as it is with a primitive and at times vertiginous energy, has pages of a rare and highly individual beauty. The score is obviously a logical evolution of the style of Strawinsky, following naturally indications contained in "The Fire-Bird" and "Petrouchka." There are a number of passages in "Sacre de printemps" which could come straight from both these earlier works. In fact, it contains in one place a quotation, almost exact, of the music of the magician Katschei from the "Fire-Bird."

The expression, however, is greatly intensified. It is done principally by means of the force and individuality of the counterpoint, and also by rhythms that have at times a well-night hysterical shock and fury. There is the effect of complete abandon of mood and manner in this music. We believe that it is thought and written with the most exact precision, with enormous power and with an uncanny knowledge—prescience—of the capacities of a greatly extended orchestra.

And it is music, not mere sound to eccentuate or accompany something done in the theatre. This should be emphasized, as Strawinsky has emphasized it in various statements. "Sacre de Printemps" is not an accompaniment for a ballet. It is the other way round. The ballet is the accompaniment or the representation, after the fact, of the music. Its scenario will serve as a description of the general mood of the music, which, however, might be fully as well comprehended if it simply bore its general title, "Sacre du Pintemps"—"The Rite of Spring," or, in a more exact translation of the Russian title, "Spring Consecration."

The scene on the stage, when the work is thus performed, is first of dance of youths and maidens in the spring-time, a ceremony of incantation in primitive fashion, with vigorous stamping of the ground. There follow the mock abduction of a maiden; "Spring Rounds"; "Games of Rival Towns"; an old man, a celebrant, who prostrates himself and kisses the earth. In the second part, after an orchestral introduction called "The Pagan Night", there are preparations for the ancient pagan of the victim of a human victim to Spring—the choice of the victim; her glorification; the "Evocation of Ancestors," the sacrificial act of the victim, who must dance herself to death.

Long before the scenario of the ballet existed, as Strawinsky told Michel Georges-Michel, he had conceived the "embryo-theme" of the score. "As this theme," said the composer, "with that which followed, was conceived in a strong, brutal manner, I took as pretext for developments, for the evocation of this music, the Russian prehistoric epoch, since I am a Russian. But note well that this idea came from the music; the music did not come from the idea. My work is architectonic, not anecdotical; objective, not descriptive construction."

That is the story, and we believe the sincere story, of the musical evolution of this extremely interesting and exciting score. As far as appraising its ultimate valu eis concerned that is a responsibility fortunately visited neither upon audiences nor reviewers of the present. Their concern is only to react honestly to what they hear, and, in the case of the newspaper man, to record it. The inspiration of this music seems to us profound and genuine. And Russian, which is another sign of its authenticity, since, when a composer speaks most truly, he is most likely to express not only himself but his native land. The Russians in the music is not superficial. It does not depend upon the use of a Russian folk-song here and there, or some familiar idiom of popular Russian music. It is much more fundamental than that.

What stands out technically and emotionally in this music, and gives it a place significant, as it seems today, in the history of the modern development of the art, is the unprecedented energy, definiteness, and power. No orchestra that we have heard throws off such heat, such sonorities, such galvanizinz rhythmical force as this orchestra of Strawinsky.

The remainder of the program consisted of the Mozart "Jupiter" symphony, given a performance different in kind but not in standard, by Mr. Monteux and his now highly perfected orchestra, and the Sibelius violine concerto, which Mr. Burgin, concert master, was courageous enough to play, and interpret with splendid sincerity, expression and fire.

TRIBUNE FEB 2

Music—By Lawrence Gilman

Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" Heard for the First Time in New York

"Le Sacre du Printemps" ("The Consecration of Spring")—Symphonic Poem in Two Parts, by Igor Stravinsky. Performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, at Carnegie Hall, for the first time in New York.

I. The Adoration of the Earth.
  Introduction—Harbingers of Spring, Dance of the Adolescents—Abduction—Spring Rounds—Games of the Rival Cities—The Procession of the Wise Men—The Adoration of the Earth (The Wise Man)—Dance of the Earth.
II. The Sacrifice.
  Introduction—Mysterious Circles of the Adolescents—Glorification of the Chosen One—Evocation of the Ancestors—Ritual of the Ancestors—The Sacrificial Dance of the Chosen One.

(Reprinted from yesterday's late editions)

After one of the London performances of Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" a few years ago, a reviewer declared excitedly the next morning that in another age the man who could do what Stravinsky had done to him would have been burned at the stake. "He plays upon the listener's perceptions as if they, rather than the orchestra, were his instrument. He sets your nervous system tingling with excitement, and so long as that excitement lasts you are his slave, you cannot escape the domination of the sounds he produces. He leaves you limp, exhausted, but he thrills you through all the surface of your civilization to that primitive core of you that is seldom moved."

* * *

When we read those sentences we smiled to ourselves with that pleasant sense of superiority that is sometimes aroused by the heated expression of an enthusiasm that one has not shared. We had not then heard "Le Sacre du Printemps." But we heard it last night, and now we know how our English colleague felt and what he meant. We know, too, what a much perturbed lady meant last evening when she declared as she came out of Carnegie Hall that she would never be the same again.

It is not easy to be cool in the presence of "Le Sacre du Printemps" or to appraise it afterward with the detachment that one can usually bring to the consideration of an unfamiliar work. It is the most exciting music that we have ever heard. There are ten pages of introduction that can be listened to in comfort; which are, indeed, a little dull and obviously derivative. You sit quite calmly, your score on your knees, and check off the borrowed tonal plumage as it emerges in the slow Spring dawn: Here a feather from the helmet of Strauss's Don Quixote, there a gayer one from Grieg; and the wild swans of Debussy's idyllically pagan skies have flown across the iron dawns of Stravinsky's prehistoric Slavic world.

* * *

Then something happens to Stravinsky, to his music, and to you. Here, in the original ballet, the curtain rises and the action starts. The Adolescents begin their dance, performing a rite which consists of an incantatory stamping upon the earth, while the orchestra reiterates a curiously rhythmed chord that is half in A flat and half in E natural. From this point on (except for those passages in the Introduction to the second part that so inexplicably content themselves with being mere shadowgraphs of "Pelléas et Mélisande") the music seizes you with a grip of steel, and never releases you until the last chord of that delirious culmination, the sacrificial dance of the chosen victim of the Spring rite.

The music traverses stages of progressive excitement, interrupted by moments of hieratic solemnity. The concluding pages baffle description. Here the elected victim begins her sacrificial rite; for the final act of propitiation has been demanded, and she must dance herself to death. The mystical rapture, the elemental fury of this invocation of vernal fertility is expressed in a complex of rhythms and orchestral timbres that reach an overwhelming climax of paroxysmal frenzy. There is nothing in music that is to be compared with this terrific Finale, with its almost unbearably exciting alternations of meter—bars of 5-16, 3-16, 4-16, 2-16—and its delirious culmination as the victim falls dead and the music dies into silence.

* * *

We have already described and analyzed at length in The Tribune (of Sunday, January 6) Stravinsky's unparalleled score. There is no need now, nor is there time, for a recapitulation, but only for these hurried field notes.

The music impresses one, upon actual hearing, as surprisingly simple, surprisingly austere and indisputably the work of a master. Stravinsky's command of rhythms, of orchestral timbres, of mood and of climax is assured and complete. We have been warned by the Grand Kleagles of the Stravinsky clan that we must not discover so banal a thing as emotional utterance in this music. We are to find in it a piece of abstract music, a modern symphony, a juggling with tone-masses and planes of sound, devoid of meaning, of program. This, of course, is sheer nonsense. "Le Sacre du Printemps," in its concert form, is a two-part symphonic poem, and the episodes that are illustrated in it are indicated by the explanatory sub-titles sprinkled through the score.

* * *

The music is essentially a barbaric and stupendous spring song. The spring that is celebrated is not, as Mr. Evans has truly pointed out, the poetic conception that has lured the romantics in all ages and in all countries, but "Spring stripped of its literary associations and presented bare, with a naked directness that is the secret of the music's compelling force." He might have gone further, and said that if this music is anything, it is a glorification of spring as the supreme expression of the creative impulse—a primordial spring, savage, elemental, ruthless. Music has long been in love with death—the greatest music in the world, indeed, is music of the ecstasy of death. Here, for the first time, is music of the ecstasy of birth; music which makes audible "that conflict which is forever rending and tearing, not in order to destroy but in order to emerge. It is not the sound of death battering down and in, but of life hewing and tearing apart, that a new birth may issue out."

What Stravinsky has made of this conception is one of the marvelous things of art, and we fancy it will remain so—a thing of gigantic strength, of terrifying intensity, of overwhelming imaginative veracity. Stravinsky may transcend it, may outgrow it, may disown it; but it will remain a lonely and incomparable achievement, an authentic masterpiece.

* * *

It remains to be added that Mr. Monteux and his superb orchestra played the work with incredible virtuosity, and that the audience received it with every evidence of enthusiasm. There was other music on the program: Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony and the violin concerto of Sibelius, played by Richard Burgin; but these things hardly counted. It was Stravinsky's night.

TIMES

MUSIC

From Late Editions of Yesterday's

'Sacre du Printemps' Played.

By OLIN DOWNES.

To Pierre Monteux and the Bos Symphony Orchestra fell the task, perbly executed, of introducing to th public of this city Igor Strawinsky "Sacre du Printemps," as the work most commonly known, last night Carnegie Hall. This work, which ated a riot when it was first perfor by Mr. Monteux and the Russian Ba in Paris in 1913, has been more d cussed than any other composition Strawinsky.

The audience, knowing this and fearin more through the many articles of descriptive kind which had appeared in the daily press, came prepared for th worst, to listen to the new music. After the first part of the score had come to an end there were a few hisses— whether in indignation or to suppress premature applause was not easy to tell. After the second part had ended it was apparent that a majority had enjoyed themselves. The applause of this major ity was long and loud, and to a appearances most sincere. It repeatedl acclaimed Mr. Monteux and the gentle men of the orchestra.

[illegible]

That is the story, and we believe the sincere story, of the musical evolution of this extremely interesting and exciting creation. As far as appraising its ultimate value is concerned, that is a responsibility fortunately visited neither upon audiences nor reviewers of the present. Their responsibility is to react honestly to what they hear, and, in the case of the newspaper man, to record it. The inspiration of this music seems to us profound and genuine. And Russian, which is another sign of its authenticity, since, when a composer speaks most truly, he is most likely to express not only himself but his native land. The Russianism in the music is not superficial. It does not depend upon the use of a Russian folk-song here and there, or some familiar idiom of popular Russian music. It is much more fundamental than that.

What stands out technically and emotionally in this work, and gives it a place significant, as it seems today, in the history of the modern development of an art, is its unprecedented energy, definiteness and power. No orchestra that we have heard throws off such heat, such sonorities, such galvanizing, rhythmical force as this orchestra of Strawinsky.

The remainder of the program consisted of the Mozart "Jupiter" symphony, given a performance different in kind but not in standard by Mr. Monteux and his now highly perfected orchestra, and the Sibelius violin concerto, which Mr. Burgin, concert master, was courageous enough to play and interpret with splendid sincerity, expression and fire. His appearance was not the least significant element of a program laden with riches.

JAN

MUSIC

ate Editions of Yesterday's Times

e du Printemps' Played.

By OLIN DOWNES.

re Monteux and the Bos
y Orchestra fell the task, ccorded, of introducing to th
f the city Igor Strawinsky' du Printemps," as the work
mmonly known, last night Hall. This work, which t when it was first perfor onteux and the Russian Ballet in 1913, has been more dis-han any other composition of sky.

udience, knowing this and fearing through the many articles of a ptive kind which had appeared in aily press, came prepared for the
, to listen to the new music. After irst part of the score had come end there were a few hisses—en in indignation or to suppress ture applause was not easy to tell.
the second part had ended it was ent that a majority had enjoyed elves. The applause of this major-as long and loud, and to all ances most sincere. It repeatedly Mr. Monteux and the gentle-the orchestra.

ading things are always said
a work with such a sensational Two false impressions had been broad, concerning this music, t it was unequaled in ugliness fulness generally, and, second-t was completely unprecedented trawinsky's compositions. Both ports, as Mark Twain would d, seem greatly exaggerated.
ic, filled as it is with a primi-at times vertiginous energy, has a rare and highly individual
The score is obviously a logical of the style of Strawinsky, naturally indications contained Fire-Bird" and "Petrouchka." a number of passages in u Printemps" which could come from both these earlier works.
t contains in one place a quo-st exact, of the music of the tschel from the "Fire-Bird."
ession, however, is greatly
It is done principally by the force and individuality of rpoint, and also by rhythms at times a well-nigh hysteriand fury. There is the effect abandon of mood and man-music. We believe that it is d written with the most exact with enormous power and with y knowledge—prescience—of ties of a greatly extended music, not mere sound to or accompany something theatre. This should be ems Strawinsky has emphasized us statements. "Sacre du is not an accompaniment

It is the other way round.
as the accompaniment or the n, after the conception, of Its scenario will serve as a f the general tenor of the however, might be fully rehended if it simply bore
e. "Sacre du Printemps"— Spring," or, in a more ex-on of the Russian title, ecration."
n the stage, when the work rmed, is first of dance of aidens in the Springtime, incantation in primitive igorous stamping of the follow the mock abduciden; "Spring Rounds";
val Towns"; an old man,
o prostrates himself and
th. In the second pa stral introduction called ight" there are preparaient pagan sacrifice of a o Spring; the choice of glorification; the "Evo-tors," the sacrificial act who must dance herself

e scenario of the ballet rawinsky told Michel he had conceived the of the score. "As this composer, "with that was conceived in a nner, I took as pre-nts, for the evocation
Russian prehistoric Russian. But note came from the mu-not come from the
is architectonic, not tive, not descriptive.

y, and we believe the
the musical evolutio interesting and excit far as appraising its concerned, that is a re-nately visited neither nor reviewers of the esponsibility is to react they hear, and, in the spaper man, to record on of this music seems d genuine. And Rusnother sign of its au-
when a composer
, he is most likely to himself but his native anism in the music is
It does not depend upon sian folk-song here and miliar idiom of popular
It is much more fundatechnically and emoork, and gives it a

as it seems today, in modern development
precedented energy,
wer. No orchestra
rd throws off such s, such galvanizing, this orchestra, of f the program con-

"Jupiter" symphony,
e different in kind
by Mr. Monteux perfected orchestra,
lin concerto, which master, was courplay and interpret rity, expression and ce was not the least of a program laden

WORLD FEB 2

MUSIC

By Deems Taylor

(Reprinted from yesterday's late editions.)

Yesterday was one of the days—curiously rare in a New York "musical" season—when the music offered was of such admitted importance as actually to overshadow its performers in public attention. Moreover, it was a day of emphatic contrasts, for the two important works heard—were nearly a century apart, and each, in its way, a musical landmark.

The first was Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, at Carnegie Hall in the afternoon, the end and climax of Walter Damrosch's cycle of Beethoven concerts by the New York Symphony Orchestra. Yesterday's performance, incidentally, came within a few days of occuring just 100 years after Beethoven finished the last pages of the work.

One hundred years, of course, have given the critics and commentators ample time in which to make up their minds about the Ninth Symphony, and it is hardly probable that the present reviewer, even granting him the leisure and the effrontery, could add anything important to the volume of their speculations.

It is perhaps possible to wo whether the Ninth would be assi quite the commanding rank it o pies among Beethoven's works i associations surrounding it wer dramatic and sentimental. Its c poser was a deaf, tragic figure wh he wrote it. It was his supreme e fort, the culmination of a lifetime's struggle and thought. If it is not h s masterpiece, it ought to be.

Certainly it is, so far as form is concerned. It is the work of a craftsm so sure of his structure, so supr confident in the handling of hi rial that, writing at times freedom that might reduce a le man to formlessness, he still contri to be clear, coherent and eloquent.

The material itself is not alwa convincing. Despite moments of passing greatness, some of it s intrinsically less eloquent tha Fifth, or the Seventh. If the the longest of the symphoni so partly, perhaps, because i poser found his musical ideas n variably easy to make persuasive. the Seventh Symphony he is sure of his ground. In the Ninth his goal is greater, perhaps, but he sees it less clearly, and presses toward it with more noticeable effort.

Yesterday's performance was not flawless, but it was generally vigorous and well planned. The chorus, from the Oratorio Society, was a bit less numerous than an ideal performance demanded, but sang with confidence and fine intonation that atoned for lack of volume. The sol quartet included Ruth Rodgers, soprano; Mabel Ritch, contralto; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fred Patton, bass. Mr. Crooks was excellent and Mr. Patton little less so. The others were hardly so successful.

The concert began with Beethoven's six-voiced canon, "Helpful be, O Man, Noble and Good," arranged by Mr. Damrosch for solo voices and chorus (with Nevada Van Der Veer and Frederic Baer augmenting the quartet of the symphony) and conducted by Albert Stoessel. Harold Bauer followed, playing the Opus 11 sonata.

* * *

In the evening, eleven years after it was composed, New York heard Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps" for the first time, played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Pierre Monteux, who conducted it last night, was the conductor of the historic first performance in Paris, when the audience behaved much as it had done, half a century before, at the first performance of "Tannhaeuser." In 1922 Leopold Stokowski conducted it for the first time in America at a concert in Philadelphia by the Philadelphia Orchestra, and Mr. Monteux introduced it last week to Boston.

Although "The Rites of Spring" was originally performed as a ballet, it is not, strictly speaking, program or pantomime music. It might be called a suite, for it is a series of dance movements designed to embody the mood and spirit of the springtime rites of prehistoric man. A series of dances was first invented for it by the famous Nijinsky. These were later withdrawn, and it is danced at present, when it is given in stage form, according to a scenario evolved by Massine and Nijinsky's daughter.

There is no definite program for the work. It is divided into two parts, the first being entitled "The Adoration of the Earth," the second, "The Sacrifice." The sequence of movements—they follow without a break—in the first part is as follows:

Introduction: a pastoral scene designed to express "the mystery of the physical world in spring." This is followed by "Spring Auguries," a ponderous, [illegible] accented measure, which alte[illegible] with a graceful "Dance of [illegible] Adolescents." This gives way to the "Game of Abduction," which is in turn succeeded by a "Springtime Round," startingly unlike its title. Now comes the "Game of the Rival Towns," which is interrupted by a brief "Entrance of the Wise Man," who prepares the way for the closing "Dance of the Earth."

The second part opens with a prelude that Stravinsky is said to have called "The Pagan Night." This leads without a pause to "The Mystic Circle of the Adolescents," in which the village maidens move in a solemn dance preparatory to choosing the victim for the human sacrifice. Then follows "The Glorification of the Chosen One," a movement of frenetic ecstasy. A brief pause, followed by "The Evocation of the Ancestors" and "The Ritual of the Ancestors." The work comes to a close with a "Sacrificial Dance," in which the chosen victim dances herself to death.

It is foolish, of course, to attem nything like detailed criticism of onumental work like "The Rites of ring" after one hearing. One can t record reactions. Briefly, then—d much too briefly, this listener can d no word short of "masterpiece" to describe the score. It is music of almost unbelievable complexity of orchestral texture, yet essentially as stark and primitive in outline as the wall pictures of a cave-man. It is not beautiful, in any external sense of the word; but it has a power and truth that strke deep, that awaken age-old emotions and desires, almost terrifying in their unfamiliarity. This is great music.

There was other music on the program, although the newness and ugly magnificence of "Le Sacre" rather dims the memory of it. There was Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, beautifully played by the orchestra, and Sibelius's violin concerto, which somehow does not seem very important now, although Richard Burgin gave it a better performance than it deserved. The playing of "Le Sacre" by the orchestra was an amazing feat of virtuosity.

Perhaps it is well that "The Rites of Spring" reached us so late; for the audience, being more or less inured to dissonance by this time, listened with a more open mind than it might have possessed a few years ago. Certainly, if the thunderous applause that followed both parts be any evidence, most of the hearers were profoundly stirred.

1913

ENTHUSIASM OVER STRAVINSKY MUSIC

vation for Monteux and Boston Orchestra in Carnegie Hall

"EW WORK CREATES SENSATION

By HENRY T. FINCK

Critics seldom applaud—every regular concert goer can see that. I am not exception to the rule, but occasionally I do; and last night was one of the occasions when I did applaud. Not only because Pierre Monteux and his splendid Boston Orchestra gave a superlatively fine performance of Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps," new to New York, but because I liked the novelty immensely.

I have always liked Stravinsky. Years ago I wrote for this journal rapturously enthusiastic articles on his "Petrouchka" and "Fire Bird," and ditto about all his works heard here since. I may be pardoned for calling attention to this matter because I am so often accused in print of being unfairly hostile to the modernists in music. But there are modernists and modernists. I am most emphatically opposed to those of them who deliberately make their omelettes with rotten eggs, that being the only way they know of being "different" from the great masters, who used euphony—that is, fresh eggs—in their compositions.

Stavinsky is not that kind of a "modernist." One of the most wonderful things about his genius is his skill—in which he follows in the footsteps of Wagner and Liszt—of using orchestral colors to throw such a glamour over dissonances that instead of torturing the ears (as Schoenberg's and Milhaud's pieces do) they gratify them in new ways. In some of his other works he has shown what wonders he can work with few instruments. His "Sacre du Printemps," on the contrary, is scored for the full Wagnerian orchestra, including Bayreuth tubas, six trumpets, eight horns, and a terrific battery of percussion instruments, including big and small kettledrums, antique and modern cymbals, triangle, tamtan and a rape guero, or scratcher.

What he does with this battery of drums and his other forces transcends belief. Even the Parisian bacchanale in "Tannhaeuser" seems a trifle civilized compared with the orgiastic noises made when the maiden, who has been chosen as the victim of the rites of spring, dances herself to death.

"Le Sacre du Printemps' was originally a ballet and as such was staged in Paris on May 29, 1923, by the Ballet Russe under Pierre Monteux. There were howls of protest, and no wonder, for the music, besides being dissonantal, was badly done. If it could have been done as it was last night the result would, no doubt, have been different. There were only two hissers in Carnegie Hall. The rest of the audience was tremendously enthusiastic.

What makes this the more noteworthy is that the audience heard only one side of this great work—the music. Stravinsky has reduced it to two dramatic tone-poems with the simple titles, "The Adoration of the Earth" and "The Sacrifice." If this music was so enchanting by itself, what must it be when heard in connection with the action and the dancing! To describe this action and the dancing is not necessary till we hear the whole work, which surely Mr. Gatti-Casazza cannot withhold from the Metropolitan subscribers after the tremendous Stravinsky triumph last night. The subject is too big to be exhausted at one writing; we shall come back to it.

WORLD FEB 1

[188]

TIMES
St. Louis, Mo.
DEC 8 - 1923

A good-sized audience heard the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mahlor's "First Symphony" was offered as "piece de resistance." Written as long ago as 1889, it is less Mahlerisch and detestable to the Mahlerphobes than the later works of the Bohemian master who was conductor of the Philharmonic at the time of his death. Certainly this "First Symphony" is not all "Kopf musik"—there is pastoral melody a-plenty in the first movement, and the spirit of folk music is in that and in the other movements—likewise there is humor and satire in the "Hunter's Funeral Procession"—queerly enough, built upon the familiar old tune "Frere Jacques." Mahler said what he had to say with unwonted brevity in this work, and Mentaux brought out its beauties so capably as to make him a worthy assistant to Mengelberg in the latter's efforts to render Mahler's less than anathema here—efforts which seem only to deepen the admiration of the perfect Mahlerites—while the others remain unconvinced. The Boston musicians also gave us Resphihi's transcription of "Old Dances and Airs for the Lute," Dukas' "La Peri" and Smetana's Overture to "The Bartered Bride." This is the last year of Mr. Menteux's engagement with the Boston Symphony, as he will next year be succeeded by Koussewitzky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
ST. PAUL
MINN.
PIONEER PRESS
DEC 9 - 1923

The Boston Symphony.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra's thirty-eighth season in this city took place in Carnegie Hall. The program comprised Jan Sibelius' first symphony, the Brahms variations on the "Choral St. Anthony" theme of Haydn and the dance from Richard Strauss' "Salome," with "Gerichter Gott," from "Rienzi," and Schubert's "Die Allmacht" and "Erlkoenig" as the vocal solo contributions. The singer was Mme. Sigrid Onegin.

There was nothing in this list demanding anxious scrutiny or rhapsodic praise. In the program notes the dythyrambic prose of Paul Rosenfeld evoked by the symphonic creations of Sibelius was quoted most aptly. Sibelius deserves every word of it. If one has crossed the narrow sea between Sweden and Finland and landed in the cheerless port of Abo and thence journeyed by train to Petrograd, he asserts that Sibelius well knew how to translate the darkling moods of his country into grandiose and gloomy music.

But the symphony is well known to music lovers. Casual concertgoers do not like it, for it breathes tragedy. Brahms' Haydn variations are more cheerful, albeit they parade something too much of musical cunning to please the indolent listener. And the dance of Salome pales in the brilliance of the latest achievements in ballet music.

The performance of the symphony, which was the most important undertaking of the orchestra, had great vigor to commend it. Mr. Monteux was plainly in sympathy with the stress and storm of the work and with its clashing instrumentation. The work was effectively, if not luminously, played, and received much applause. Mme. Onegin sang in her familiar manner. Hers is a prodigious voice not always amenable to the laws of art. She sang with power and enthusiasm but with many singularities of technic. However finished vocal art is so rare in these days that grandeur of voice and intensity of style must be awarded much glory. The audience apparently was well satisfied with Mme. Onegin's offerings.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE 9 1924

"Sacre du Printemps" at Last

Pierre Monteux, who was the intrepid pioneer in the introduction of Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" in Paris, on which occasion a riot resulted in the calling in of the police, will perform the composer's orchestral suite from this score at the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall, which will take place on January 31 and February 2. This will be the first performance in New York and will take place at the Thursday concert.

MILWAUKEE
WIS.
LEADER
DEC 9 - 1923

Boston Plays Sibelius Symphony.

The Boston Symphony orchestra added the opening concert of its New York series to our unnumbered other series last week. Mr. Monteux received the best welcome he ever had since he started his work with the orchestra, due probably to the fact that this is his last year with it. He has brought it a long way from the dismembered thing it was a few years ago.

The first symphony of Sibelius was the feature of the program, though it is no better than most first symphonies are, excepting Brahms. It is about 25 years old, full of youthful and obvious tunes, well made but not nearly as good as this composer's more recent music. Mme. Onegin sang the third act aria and scene from Rienzi in the same splendid voice she has displayed to us before.

Now that the Boston has begun its series, the orchestral quota is complete. We have Dutch, German, Polish and French conductors with us regularly, heading five orchestras. The duplication of programs is not as serious as last year, but there is still enough surplus music to supply several cities.

Frieda Hempel Sings Shadow Song.

Coloratura sopranos are always

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LAWRENCE
MASS.
TRIBUNE
JAN 1924

SYMPHONY PLAYS HERE NEXT SUNDAY

As a museum brings visual works of art before the people; the Boston Symphony Orchestra does its great service to the art of music. It was endowed and supported for the inestimable public benefit it might bring forty years of concerts in Boston, New York and other principal cities, this world-famous organization has splendidly fulfilled its purpose.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has brought to the light of ideal performance the great wealth of orchestral music. The music of new composers, both American and foreign, which might otherwise remain silent and unknown, has found a presentation and recognition in this way.

A glance at the lives of the hundred members reveals the orchestra as a great organic main source of musical activity. The musicians are the best of their kind, and have been brought from every corner of the old world, where musical life flowers from traditional roots centuries old. These virtuosos make America their country. Their sons grow up to be American citizens and often become fine musicians, taking their place in the Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony players naturally give their first genius to the matchless performances of the Orchestra, and yet this is but part of their service to the community. They instill their talent by teaching. They form among themselves Quartettes and other small ensembles such as the Knesel Quartette and the new Burgin Quartette. The individual virtuosos give concerts of their own. Thus the message of music in smaller forms is spread throughout the country.

Some former members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who have left its ranks to carry music into other parts are: Franz Kneisel and his Quartette, Nicolai Sokoloff and Gustav Strube, the present conductors of the Cleveland and Baltimore Symphony Orchestras respectively, Max Zach, until his recent death conductor of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra, Modeste Alloo, Assistant conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, Emil Mollenhauer, conductor of the Handel and Haydn Choral Society, the oldest musical organization in America, C. M. Loeffler, now named as the foremost American composer and many others.

Seats are on sale at the box office for the concert next Sunday at the Colonial theatre.

THIS OUT — IT IS WORTH

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LAWRENCE
MASS.
TRIBUNE
JAN 1924

SYMPHONY WILL PRESENT BRILLIANT PROGRAM HERE

A program remarkable for its brilliance, which combines popular appeal with the highest symphonic standards, will be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra in its only appearance in Lawrence this season, to take place in the Colonial theatre Sunday afternoon next, Jan. 20, at 3 o'clock.

The principal number on the programgram will be Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 in A-major. Of Beethoven's immortal nine symphonies, the seventh stands with the fifth and ninth in the grandeur of its conception. it leads them all in its swift course and impelling rhythms. The impetus of the first and last movements sweeps all before them; the scherzo is as rapid as light itself; never was the master more inspired than when he wrote the melody of the divine allegretto. The rhythmic pulse of the symphony led Wagner to call it "the apotheosis of the dance

Debussy's Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals" comprise music of an utterly different sort. These sketches distinctly reveal Debussy as an impressionist painter, and the fact that he painted in tones instead of in pigments, makes the classification all the more striking. The music of mood and subttle suggestion is in its way more potent than any canvas. The interpretation of the nocturnes at the hands of the French conductor and the great orchestra under him is said to be unrivalled. Indeed, Pierre Monteux was a close collaborator with Debussy in the early production of his scores.

The closing number will be Tschaikowsky's thunderous battle piece, the solemn overture "1812." This music was written for the inauguration of the Church of the Redeemer at Moscow in celebration of the ultimate victory of Russia over the invader Napoleon in the year which its title bears. The score opens with a slow and impressive hymn-like theme. Martial measures are soon introduced, and the score develops into a furious contest between the Russian hosts, as typified by the Russian national hymn, and the French hosts, as typified by the Marseillaise. Needless to say, the Russian hymn ultimately trimuphs in exciting fashion.

As the soloist of the afternoon, Raymond Havens will appear with the orchestra in Schumann's pianoforte concerto. This, one of the most popular of all concertoes, combines brilliance with an exciting vein of romantic melody which is particularly evident in the second movement, an andantino.

In a word, the program will provide music for all tastes, and reveal in splendid fashion the qualities of the great orchestra which make for its world-wide fame.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WORCESTER
MASSACHUSETTS
GAZETTE
JAN 1924

Boston Symphony Is Coming Here Feb. 12

A visit of paramount importance in the musical season here will be a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Mechanics hall on Tuesday evening, Feb. 12.

This concert bears double interest because it comes after three years' absence from this city, and because it will be in the nature of a farewell to Pierre Monteux who completes this season his five year term as conductor of the orchestra. Much to the regret of his large American public, the noted French leader intends to return to Paris in the spring.

A program of particular interest is being planned by Mr. Monteux, which will be at once directly enjoyable to the layman and contain the greatest achievements in the orchestral repertory.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ALBANY
NEW YORK
KNICKERBOCKER PRESS
JAN 20 1924

Other Music

PIRRE MONTEUX gave New York a chance, at the latest Boston Symphony concert here, to become acquainted with Arthur Bliss' Color Symphony. Most of the newspaper reviewers liked the work, the notable dissenter being Henry Finck, of the Post. He thought it "malodorous music offered the New York public. Bliss dipped his pen into melody, then colored his score with a facility that made the average listener more than content. For here is a symphony that throbs with life, with spontaneity and beauty. Among the many new compositions heard in New York this season the Bliss work must be given a foremost place. Jacques Thibaud, playing Mozart's E flat concerto for violin, was at his best. Loveliness of tone and elegance of phrasing went far to make his performance exceptonal.

The first appearance of Donna Ortensia, soprano, who made a favorable impression by an agreeable voice and a vivid temperamental dispaly; and a flock of concerts by the Philharmonic, New York and State symphony orchestras, were among the recent music ogered the New York public. Mitja Nikisch's piano playing, and the violinistic accomplishments of Erika Morini were solo contributions. And still the music mill grinds, with some of the material proving not in the least to be the sort of grist the people care for.

Copyright, 1924.

ESTABLISHED 1881
FROM
NEWS,
Providence, R. I.
JAN 19 1924

Third Symphony Concert

With Jean Bedetti, the illustrious 'cello virtuoso of the orchestra as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the third concert of its Providence season next Tuesday evening in Infantry Hall at 8:15.

Jean Bedetti came to America to take his present post in the autumn of 1919, leaving behind him an enviable reputation in Europe as one of its foremost 'cellists. American has been quick to recognize his remarkable artistry and scarcely rivaled beauty of tone. He has appeared in numerous recitals of his own besides playing as soloist with the Symphony Orchestra in New Work, Boston and other cities. Mr. Bedetti will, in the pending concert take the 'cello part of Robert Schumann's concerto for this instrument. The principal number on the programme will be Schubert's immortal symphony in C-major which is often called its composer's masterpiece. In contrast to the "Unfinished" Symphony which is one of the longest and led Schumann to write the six famous phrase—"The symphony of heavenly lengths." Pierre Monteux will also conduct the two movements from Ravel's Mother Goose Suite;—"Beauty and the Beast Converse" and Laideronnette, Empress of the Pagodas" and to close the evenging Wagner's overture from the "Flying Dutchman."

A return concert will be given by d Hayes, the celebrated tenor, rtly afterward will sail for fulfil! numerous engage-ously contracted for. He at the Albee Theatre on ning, Jan. 27.
ican tour now ending has America will continue to ging of Roland Hayes in eem which has been the pe for the last three sea-ppearances in each city, West or South, have been same wonderment, keen and superlative praise.
matter of beauty of tone,
interpretation, or perfecnique. Whether a French man lied, an 18th cen-air, or a spiritual of his s on his programme, his it proves a work of art

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LAWRENCE
MASS.
TRIBUNE
JAN 1924

FAMOUS ORCHESTRA HERE TOMORROW

The world famous Boston Symphony orchestra comes to the Colonial tomorrow afternoon to give a program which is popular enough to please the occasional concert goer as well as the student of symphonic music.

The full orchestra of 104 members is coming and the able conductor, Pierre Monteux, will lead it in one of its finest programs. This is the fourth time in easy memory that the Boston Symphony has come to Lawrence. On the other three occasions a capacity audience greeted it. The ticket sale for the present concert has been very successful and as things look now the audience will again be capacity when Mr. Monteux waves his baton for the men to begin the great seventh symphony of Beethoven.

Sunday's concert will be of special significance. It will be the last time that Mr. Monteux will appear in Lawrence with the Boston Symphony. The present is his fifth and last year. During his splendid term at the head of this great orchestra he has appeared with it twice in Lawrence, in 20 and 1922. He made an excellent impression upon his local audiences and they will regret very much to see him depart from the post which he has filled with so much honor.

PIERRE MONTEUX

In all probability the concert tomorrow will be the last one for some years to come. The Boston Symphony orchestra never has been a financial success. It has drawn great crowds always; its regular series in Boston are always capacity audiences, but it has aimed to present the best music as cheap as posisble in order that its influence may be far reaching. The costs have steadily mounted until the trustees have regretfully announced that they must ask for a fee of $1750 instead of $1500. That means that a theatre with small capacity like the Colonial can hardly hope to attract further engagements. If the raise in the fee means that the concerts will be discontinued for the future they will be sorely missed. Not every year, but more or less regularly since 1888 has the Boston Symphony orchestra come to Lawrence with its splendid inspiration of great music superbly rendered.

The soloist for tomorrow's concert is Raymond Havens, pianist. His first appearance as soloist with the orchestra was in 1919. Lawrence is the place where he appeared and his debut was a brilliant success. Since that year he has appeared with the orchestra on numerous occasions. He has also appeared as soloist with every other important Symphony orchestra in the country. He has a large local following which he won five years ago and which he has added to in local recitals, sometimes under White Fund auspices.

[199]

M THE NCE ASS.
UNE 1924

CHESTRA
OMORROW

…ous Boston Sym-
…omes to the Colo-
…ernoon to give a
…popular enough to
…ual concert goer
…ment of symphonic

…a of 104 members
…e able conductor,
…will lead it in one
…rams. This is the
…y memory that the
…has come to Law-
…er three occasions
…e greeted it. The
…he present concert
…uccessful and as
…the audience will
…when Mr. Monteux
…or the men to be-
…enth symphony of

…t will be of special
…ll be the last time
…x will appear in
…Boston Symphony
…fifth and last year.
…d term at the head
…estra he has ap-
…e in Lawrence, in

TEUX

…ade an excel-
…his local au-
…regret very
…from the post
…ith so much

…concert to-
…one for some
…Boston Sym-
…has been a
…drawn great
…lar series in
…pacity audi-
…to present
…as possible
…nce may be
…have stead-
…ustees have
…that they
…750 instead
…t a theatre
…he Colonial
…act further
…ise in the
…rts will be
…e they will
…very year,
…since 1888
…orchestra
…ts splendid
…c superbly

…'s concert
…nist. His
…with the
…Lawrence
…peared and
…t success.
…eared with
…ous occa-
…d as solo-
…ant Sym-
…ntry. He
…which
…which he
…s, some-
…spices.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
EAGLE

JAN 20 1924

Boston Symphony Program.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra series here will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Feb. 1, with Alexander Siloti, the pianist, as soloist. Pierre Monteux will open the program with Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony No. 6. A notable score of the modern French school will be the First Suite from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," which includes "Nocturne—Interlude and Warlike Dance." The closing number will be Dvorak's "Carnival" Overture. Siloti will appear with the orchestra in Liszt's "Dance of Death," a paraphrase on the Dies Irae. This score, of tremendous brilliance, is interpreted at first hand by the former pupil of Liszt, who studied its measures with the composer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

JAN 20 1924

Rich Musical Treat For Brooklynites

Rarely indeed are such gifts of united and finished artistry bestowed upon two individuals in one family as those possessed by Mme. Louise Homer and her talented daughter, Louise. They will give a joint recital at the Academy, under Institute auspices, Friday evening, Jan. 25, that should prove a musical event of more than ordinary interest. The program will include selections by Handel, Sidney Homer, Massenet, Beethoven, Meyerbeer, Tosti, Marzials, Dvorak; scene and duet from fourth act of "Le Prophete," by Meyerbeer; Mozart's "Allelujah," Gounod's "Ring Out, Wild Bells," and the duet, "Tutti fior" from "Madam Butterfly."

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra series here will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Feb. 1, with Alexander Siloti, the famous Russian pianist, as soloist. Pierre Monteux will open the program with Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, No.

A notable score of the modern French schol will be the First Suite drawn from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," which includes "Nocturne—Interlude and War-Like Dance." hTe closing number will be Dvorak's "Carnival" Overture. Siloti will appear with the orchestra in Liszt's "Dance of Death," a paraphrase on the Dies Irae.

Fritz Kreisler, the great Austrian musician, who stands, for many, alone in his mastery of the violin and his power of interpretation throuhg his chosen instrument, will appear at the Academy on Tuesday evening, Feb. 5, under Institute auspices.

CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK
HERALD

JAN 20 1924

The Boston Symphony.

The "Sacre du Printemps" or "Rites of Spring," which has been more often attacked and defended than any other of Stravinsky's scores, will be performed for the first time in New York at the Thursday evening concert of the third pair by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall the last day of this month.

Pierre Monteux was the pioneer in the introduction of Stravinsky's ballet in Paris, and when he performed it at the Concerts Monteux at the Casino, with the composer in the audience, a riot ensued which rivaled the Parisian premiere of "Tannhauser" and resulted in the calling in of the police.

A feature of the Saturday concert will be a series of orchestral excerpts from Debussy's incidental music to d'Annunzio's mystery play, "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian." The Thursday program will also include Sibelius's violin concerto, in which Richard Burgin, the concertmaster, will appear, and Mozart's Symphony in C, K. 338. The program for Saturday, February 2, will include besides the Debussy score, Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, and Liszt's "Danse Macabre," with Alexander Siloti taking the piano part.

ROCHESTER
NEW YORK
AMERICAN

JAN 20 1924

Pierre Monteux gave New York a chance, at the latest Boston Symphony concert here, to become acquainted with Arthur Bliss' Color Symphony. Most of the newspaper reviewers liked the work, the notable dissenter being Henry Finck, of the Post. He thought it "malodorous music," which seems to have been somewhat harshly put.

Bliss dipped his pen into melody, then colored his score with a facility that made the average listener more than content.

For here is a symphony that throbs with life, with spontaneity and beauty. Among the many new compositions heard in New York this season the Bliss work must be given a foremost place. Jacques Thibaud, playing Mozart's E flat concerto for violin, was at his best. Lovliness of tone and elegance of phrosing went far to make his performance exceptional.

The first appearance of Donna Ortensia, soprano, who made a favorable impression by an agreeable voice and a vivid tempermental display; and a flock of concerts by the Philharmonic, New York and State symphony orchestras, were among the recent music offered the New York public. Mitja Nikisch's piano playing, and the violinistic accomplishments of Erika Morini were solo contributions. And still the music mill grinds,

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK
TRIBUNE

JAN 20 1924

Cleveland Orchestra Here on Tuesday; Symphonic Plans

Sokoloff to Give D'Indy Symphony; Concerts of Local Organizations; Bostonians to Introduce Stravinsky Work

The Cleveland Orchestra, which is conducted by Nikolai Sokoloff, will give its annual New York concert next Tuesday evening in Carnegie Hall. The principal number of its program will be d'Indy's second symphony in B flat major, which is not often heard here.

The week after his New York concert Mr. Sokoloff will leave for London to conduct his fifth season with the London Symphony Orchestra in Queen's Hall, on February 13. Sokoloff is the only American in a list of guest conductors numbering Felix Weingartner, Wilhelm Furtwangler, Eugene Goossens and Serge Koussevitzky (who will be heard here next season with the Boston Symphony). Sokoloff is also the only American who has appeared at the conductor's desk of the London Symphony in three successive seasons.

The Cleveland Orchestra's schedule for this, its sixth season, calls for 131 concerts, eighty of these in Cleveland, including children's and community concerts. The orchestra will give three performances of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony with the Oberlin Choral Union; one at Oberlin and two in Cleveland for the final pair of subscription concerts.

Leo Schulz, commemorating his twenty-fifth year as solo cellist with the Philharmonic Orchestra, will be the soloist this afternoon at Carnegie Hall, playing a rarely heard violoncello concerto by Wilhelm Bernard Molique (1802-'69). The work has been abridged and edited for this performance by Mr. Schulz, who says that it is one of the finest in the literature of numbers for violoncello and orchestra, but has been neglected on account of its length.

Roa Eaton, soprano, who recently appeared with the American Orchestral Society, will be the soloist to-morrow night at the Philharmonic's fifth Students' Concert, singing, "Ah, fors'e lui," from "La Traviata." The novelty of Mr. van Hoogstraten's program is an Elegy for orchestra by Egon Kornauth, a young composer now living in Vienna, where he was formerly a professor of theory. Kornauth, who is a pupil of Schreker, paid a short visit to this country in 1915. He has been a prolific composer, and also has played with various chamber music organizations. Other numbers to-morrow night will be Weingartner's version of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" and Brahms's Academic Festival Overture and Second Symphony. The Kornauth work was first played here at a stadium concert last summer.

Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony will be the principal number in the Philharmonic concerts of Thursday evening and Friday afternoon, Mr. van Hoogstraten's last appearance of the season with the Philharmonic will be next Sunday afternoon, the 27th, in a request program, with his wife, Elly Ney, the pianist, as soloist.

Beethoven Cycle Approaching End

Walter Damrosch will resume his Beethoven cycle at the Carnegie Hall concerts of the New York Symphony Orchestra next Thursday afternoon and Friday evening, with John Barclay as barytone soloist in three of Beethoven's settings of Scotch folksongs for voice, violin, 'cello and piano, as well as "The Song of the Flea" and "The Kiss." The orchestral numbers will be the third "Leonore" and "King Stephen" overtures and Eighth Symphony, with "Wellington's Victory, or the Battle of Vittoria," as the postlude. The following and last pair of cycle concerts will be on January 31 and February 1, when the Ninth Symphony will be given, with the chorus of the Oratorio Society in the finale. Harold Bauer will play Beethoven's last piano sonata.

Pablo Casals, 'cellist, will be the soloist at the fourth Symphony Concert for Young People Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall, and at the Aeolian Hall concert next Sunday afternoon, playing Boccherini's B flat concerto on both occasions. The Sunday concert also will bring the first New York performance of Blair Fairchild's new "tableau musical," "Shah Feridoun."

The State Symphony Orchestra will give the third concert of its Wednesday evening subscription series at Carnegie Hall this week, with Mitja Nikisch as soloist in Beethoven's "Emperor" piano concerto, which will come between the Brahms Academic Festival Overture and Tchaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony. At the third concert of the series at the Metropolitan Opera House next Sunday afternoon, the 27th, Percy Grainger will play the Grieg piano concerto, while the purely orchestral numbers will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" and Mr. Stransky's arrangement of excerpts from Wagner's Ring cycle.

Boston Symphony Announces "Le Sacre du Printemps"

The first performance in New York of Igor Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps," which was described in last week's music section, will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Thursday, January 31, at Carnegie Hall. The Stravinsky work is also on [illegible] of Mr. Mengelberg's

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE
RHODE ISLAND
TRIBUNE

JAN 20 1924

Boston Symphony Concert Next Tuesday

Features of the third Boston Symphony concert of the season here to be given in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening at 8:15 will be the appearance of Jean Bedetti, the 'cello virtuoso of the orchestra, as soloist and the revival by Pierre Monteux of Schubert's great symphony in C major, which has not been heard in Providence for a number of seasons. Jean Bedetti came from Europe to take his present post four years ago. He had been held in the highest regard by virtue of his recital tours and appearances with the leading orchestra and as leader of its famous 'cello section, he has attracted as much attention as by his recitals in Boston, New York and other cities. This scarcely rivaled master of his beautiful instrument will play with the orchestra next Tuesday the concerto of Robert Schumann.

The symphony of Schubert is considered by many his master work. It is larger in scope and in many ways greater than his "Unfinished" symphony. Felix Weingartner, the great conductor, thus speaks of this wondrous score: "Schubert was the lyric musician 'par excellence' Whatever he wrote, the most serene as well as the most tragic work, seems as it were imbued with that infintely soft, melodic element, which always lets us perceive his figure as if through tears of gentle emotion. A blissful warmth emanates from his music. Only think of the great Symphony in C major . . . I cannot conceive how it is that there are still people so ill-humored as to think this symphony too long, nay, even to ask for cuts to be made in it. I am not of their opinion, and I own that whenever I hear this work well conducted, or when I conduct

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE ROANOKE
VA.
Times
ISSUE OF
JAN 2 1924

An Astute Critic Is Lost And Admits It

The engagingly brilliant style of Lawrence Gilman, of the New York Tribune, in his written comments of music has been mentioned in these columns before. Another gem from his pen was his review of a recent concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with particular reference to Arthur Bliss' "Color Symphony."

Mr. Gilman bewails the plight of the concert-goer who has to listen to program music without program notes, as was generally the case when the Bliss work was played, and then admits that about the best thing a listener could do with the notes was to stick them in his pocket for future perusal and listen to the symphony as absolute music.

The composer's pictures of some of the primary colors did not fit the average imagination, so it didn't mean anything as a color symphony; but, as absolute music, Mr. Gilman found much that was new, told in an individual language and interpreted in a rich manner by M. Monteux and his musicians.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TH
SPRINGFIELD
MASS.
EVENING UNIO

JAN 22 192

THOSE RESERVED SEATS

"Y" Sunday Ticketholder Favors Abolishing Them Entirely.

To the Editor of The Union.

Sir: Let me settle once and for all the object of my letters to the Forum in which I criticized the ushers at the Sunday Y. M. C. A. concerts and especially that of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. I criticize this "reserved-for-usher" seat business and suggest that there be no reserved seats: that the ushers be given two side-door tickets for each Sunday, and that the ushers' friends take their chances along with the others who enter by the side door. By "no reserved seats," I mean that side-door ticketholders will have first choice of seats.

I don't believe this is a question which can be settled on a commercial basis. Each side-door ticket may be worth 15 cents and each usher may be worth two tickets, or 30 cents; but did we forget to include the side-door ticketholder's contribution to the collection? He may put in 5 cents or $1 we can't determine, but I don't believe that side-door ticketholders are quite so stingy as Agnes Odell would infer. Any way, why argue over the collection: it hasn't anything to do with the point I am trying to make that there should be no reserved seats.

Yes; Springfield does owe a great deal to men like Kenneth Robbie and B. A. Hoover. I know them both and they know me—and quite well, too but they are men who certainly can see the point of an argument, even though they may not agree with it, and I hope that Mr. Hoover doesn't think that I am trying to slam the Y. M. C. A. or the concert series. I have said already that meetings certainly meet a demand for pleasure, satisfaction and education that would be hard to equal.

If the committee in charge of seats desires to adopt my suggestion I hope it will prove satisfactory. If they reject it, I can do nothing to help the situation. I believe that I have been justifiable in my criticism, although "B. A. Booster" doesn't think so, and I believe I have tried to criticize constructively since I have offered a remedy.

SIDE-DOOR TICKETHOLDER.
Springfield, Jan. 21, 1924.

FROM
NEWS, JAN 22 1924
Providence, R. I.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gives another in its series of winter concerts in Infantry Hall at 8:15 this evening.

Mrs. James E. Cheeseman and Mrs.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
WORCESTER
MASS.
TELEGRAM

JAN 22 1924

Mechanics Hall

Pierre Monteux has compiled an unusually brilliant and eventful program for the pending concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Worcester which will take place in Mechanics Hall, Tuesday evening, Feb. 12.

This will probably be the farewell appearance of the illustrious French conductor in this city, since, at the conclusion of his five-year period as conductor of the orchestra, in the spring he expects to return to his own country. It was Pierre Monteux who brought the Boston Symphony orchestra to Worcester three years ago. In the intervening period his executive genius is said to have brought this organization to fresh and scarcely equalled heighs of eloquent beauty and perfection of ensemble.

The symphony on the Worcester program will be the Seventh by Beethoven in A major. This score, which ranks with the noblest and greatest of the Immortal Nine, has bbeen the favorite on the symphonic repertory, revalled only by the Fifth of the same composer. The modern French school will be repesented by Debussy's Two Nocturnes "Clouds" and "Festivals," executed in the delicate colorings which are characteristic of the late French composer. The modern German school will be represented by Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," a mighty and imposing score which rises to heights seldom reached in its ultimate climax.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WORCESTER
MASSACHUSETTS
GAZETTE

JAN 23 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY COMING

The Boston Symphony orchestra, 104 pieces, Pierre Monteux, conductor, is coming to Worcester Tuesday evening, Feb. 12, for one concert. It is the first appearance of the orchestra for three years. The program is "Beethoven's Symphony, No. 7, in A Major," Strauss' "Tone Poem," "Death and Transfiguration," "Debussey's Nocturnes," "Clouds," and "Festivals," Wagner's overture to "Tannhauser."

This will be Conductor Monteux's farewell appearance in Worcester, as he completes his five-year contract with the orchestra at the end of this season.

Pierre Monteux came to the orchestra equipped by an active and distinguished career in Europe and America. He toured Europe four years as head of the Ballet Russe, and first came to America as leader of that organization. He was subsequently appointed French conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. From that post he came to the Boston Symphony orchestra, where, according to general opinion, his rare genius has found its best fruition.

M THE ENCE ASS
UNE 19 1924

CHESTRA TOMORROW

us Boston Sym-
omes to the Colo-ternoon to give a popular enough to onal concert goer
ident of symphonic ra of 104 members

he able conductor,
will lead it in one
rams. This is the sy memory that the
has come to Law-
her three occasions nce greeted it. The
he present concert successful and as the audience will
when Mr. Monteux
for the men to be-enth symphony of

t will be of special ill be the last time
x will appear in
Boston Symphony
fifth and last year.
d term at the head
estra he has ap-
ce in Lawrence, in

TEUX

ade an excel-
this local au-regret very
from the post ith so much concert to-one for some Boston Sym-
has been a drawn great ular series in pacity audi-
to present
as possible ce may be have stead-ustees have
that they 750 instead
t a theatre
he Colonial ect further s in the rts will be e they will very year, since 1888
mystery is splendid superbly
's concert
ist. His with the Lawrence
eared and success.
been a us occa-
ed as solo-ant Symntry. He which the
which he s, some-spices.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N.Y.
N. Y.
EAGLE

JAN 20 1924

Boston Symphony Program.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra series here will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Feb. 1, with Alexander Siloti, the pianist, as soloist. Pierre Monteux will open the program with Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony No. 6. A notable score of the modern French school will be the First Suite from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," which includes "Nocturne—Interlude and Warlike Dance." The closing number will be Dvorak's "Carnival" Overture. Siloti will appear with the orchestra in Liszt's "Dance of Death," a paraphrase on the Dies Irae. This score, of tremendous brilliance, is interpreted at first hand by the former pupil of Liszt, who studied its measures with the composer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

20 1924

Rich Musical Treat For Brooklynites

Rarely indeed are such gifts of united and finished artistry bestowed upon two individuals in one family as those possessed by Mme. Louise Homer and her talented daughter, Louise. They will give a joint recital at the Academy, under Institute auspices, Friday evening, Jan. 25, that should prove a musical event of more than ordinary interest. The program will include selections by Handel, Sidney Homer, Massenet, Beethoven, Meyerbeer, Tosti, Marzials, Dvorak; scene and duet from fourth act of "Le Prophete," by Meyerbeer; Mozart's "Allelujah," Gounod's "Ring Out, Wild Bells," and the duet, "Tutti fior" from "Madam Butterfly."

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra series here will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Feb. 1, with Alexander Siloti, the famous Russian pianist, as soloist. Pierre Monteux will open the program with Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, No.

A notable score of the modern French schol will be the First Suite drawn from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," which includes "Nocturne—Interlude and War-Like Dance." hTe closing number will be Dvorak's "Carnival" Overture. Siloti will appear with the orchestra in Liszt's "Dance of Death," a paraphrase on the Dies Irae.

Fritz Kreisler, the great Austrian musician, who stands, for many, alone in his mastery of the violin and his power of interpretation throuhg his chosen instrument, will appear at the Academy on Tuesday evening, Feb. 5, under Institute auspices.

CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD

JAN 20 1924

The Boston Symphony.

The "Sacre du Printemps" or "Rites of Spring," which has been more often attacked and defended than any other of Stravinsky's scores, will be performed for the first time in New York at the Thursday evening concert of the third pair by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall the last day of this month.

Pierre Monteux was the pioneer in the introduction of Stravinsky's ballet in Paris, and when he performed it at the Concerts Monteux at the Casino, with the composer in the audience, a riot ensued which rivaled the Parisian premiere of "Tannhauser" and resulted in the calling in of the police.

A feature of the Saturday concert will be a series of orchestral excerpts from Debussy's incidental music to d'Annunzio's mystery play, "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian." The Thursday program will also include Sibelius's violin concerto, in which Richard Burgin, the concertmaster, will appear, and Mozart's Symphony in C, K. 388. The program for Saturday, February 2, will include besides the Debussy score, Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, and Liszt's "Danse Macabre," with Alexander Siloti taking the piano part.

ROCHESTER
NEW YORK
AMERICAN

0 1924

Pierre Monteux gave New York a chance, at the latest Boston Symphony concert here, to become acquainted with Arthur Bliss' Color Symphony. Most of the newspaper reviewers liked the work, the notable dissenter being Henry Finck, of the Post. He thought it "malodorous music," which seems to have been somewhat harshly put.

Bliss dipped his pen into melody, then colored his score with a facility that made the average listener more than content.

For here is a symphony that throbs with life, with spontaneity and beauty. Among the many new compositions heard in New York this season the Bliss work must be given a foremost place. Jacques Thibaud, playing Mozart's E flat concerto for violin, was at his best. Lovliness of tone and elegance of phrosing went far to make his performance exceptional.

The first appearance of Donna Ortensia, soprano, who made a favorable impression by an agreeable voice, and a vivid tempermental display; and a flock of concerts by the Philharmonic, New York and State symphony orchestras, were among the recent music offered the New York public. Mitja Nikisch's piano playing, and the violinistic accomplishments of Erika Morini were solo contributions. And still the music mill grinds.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TRIBUNE

Coming Philharmonic programs. The first half of Mr. Monteux's program will consist of Mozart's symphony in C major (Köchel No. 388) and the D minor violin concerto of Sibelius, in which Richard Burgin, the orchestra's concert master, will be the soloist. On Saturday afternoon, February 2, Alexander Siloti will be the soloist in Liszt's paraphrase of the "Dies Iræ" for piano and orchestra, "Dance of Death," preceded by Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony and Debussy's suite from his incidental music to d'Annunzio's "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian."

d Stravinsky also will be played here by the Philadelphia Orchestra, which will give his octet for wind instruments at Carnegie Hall on Tuesday, February 5.

last three morrow night at the Metropolitan Opera House in its usual form of a opera-pantomime. Mme. Galli-Curci will sing for the first time the music of the Queen, whom Rosina Galli, as before, will impersonate in the pantomime, while the part of King Dodo will be sung by Adamo Didur and mimed by Alexis Kosloff. The other singers in the cast are Mmes. Alcock and Robertson and Messrs. Diaz, Reschilian, D'Angelo and Audisio; the other mimes Florence Rudolph and Messrs. Bartik and Bonfiglio. The work has been restudied musically under Giuseppe Bamboschek, who will conduct, while Miss Galli has prepared and rehearsed its choreographic side. Willy Pogany's scenery will be used.

"Le Coq d'Or," the sixth opera on General Manager Gatti-Casazza's list of novelties and revivals, will be preceded to-morrow night by "Cavalleria Rusticana," with Mmes. Easton, Perini and Wakefield and Messrs. Chamlee and Picco. Mr. Moranzoni will conduct.

Other operas this week, the twelfth of the season, will be:

"Fedora," on Wednesday evening, with Mmes. Jeritza, Mario, Dalossy and Alcock and Messrs. Martinelli, Scotti, D'Angelo, Picchi, Ananian, Picco, Bada, Paltrinieri and Audisio, Mr. Papi conducting.

"Marta," Thursday afternoon, with Mmes. Alda and Howard and Messrs. Gigli, Didur, Malatesta, D'Angelo and Reschilian. Mr. Papi will conduct.

Programs

Sunday

Carnegie Hall, 3 p. m. Concert by the Philharmonic Society; soloist, Leo Schulz:

Unfinished Symphony, in B minor	Schubert
Violoncello concerto in D major	Molique
Mr. Schulz.
Caucasian Sketches	Ippolitoff-Ivanoff
Blue Danube Waltz	Strauss

Aeolian Hall, 3 p. m. Violin recital by Samuel Dushkin; accompanist, Samuel Chotzinoff:

Sonata in G minor	Tartini
Sonata in E major	Bach
Nocturne	Lili Boulanger
Chant of the Yemenite Jews, Palestinian Song	Paul Kirman
Russian Dance	Blair Fairchild
	Wagner-Auer

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE
RHODE ISLAND
TRIBUNE

20 1924

Boston Symphony Concert Next Tuesday

Features of the third Boston Symphony concert of the season here to be given in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening at 8:15 will be the appearance of Jean Bedetti, the 'cello virtuoso of the orchestra, as soloist and the revival by Pierre Monteux of Schubert's great symphony in C major, which has not been heard in Providence for a number of seasons. Jean Bedetti came from Europe to take his present post four years ago. He had been held in the highest regard by virtue of his recital tours and appearances with the leading orchestra and as leader of its famous 'cello section, he has attracted as much attention as by his recitals in Boston, New York and other cities. This scarcely rivaled master of his beautiful instrument will play with the orchestra next Tuesday the concerto of Robert Schumann.

The symphony of Schubert is considered by many his master work. It is larger in scope and in many ways greater than his "Unfinished" symphony. Felix Weingartner, the great conductor, thus speaks of this wondrous score: "Schubert was the lyric musician 'par excellence' Whatever he wrote, the most serene as well as the most tragic work, seems as it were imbued with that infintely soft, melodic element, which always lets us perceive his figure as if through tears of gentle emotion. A blissful warmth emanates from his music. Only think of the great Symphony in C major . . . I cannot conceive how it is that there are still people so ill-humored as to think this symphony too long, nay, even to ask for cuts to be made in it. I am not of their opinion, and I own that whenever I hear this work well conducted, or when I conduct it myself, I always experience the most happy sensations, and am absolutely intoxicated with the music. It produces on me the effect as of flight through a bright ether."

The remainder of the program will be the two movements from Ravel's Mother Goose Suite—"Beauty and the Beast Converse" and "Laideronnette, Empress of the Pagodas" and to close the evening Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" Overture.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE PROVIDENCE
R. I.
JOURNAL

The Boston Symphony is also playing an anniversary date, its last year's schedule bringing it to Infantry Hall on Jan. 23. At that time Jean Bedetti was the soloist, as he will be next Tuesday night. The programme is an unusually attractive one, having for its feature Schubert's symphony in C-major, called, as Warren Storey Smith mentions in another column "one of the world's greatest symphonies." other selections are two Mother Goose" Wag-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
WORCESTER
MASS.
POST

JAN 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO PLAY HERE

The program is announced which Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony orchestra will present at their concert in Worcester, to be given in Mechanics hall, Tuesday evening, February 12th.

The principal number will be Beethoven's great Seventh Symphony in A major, a score which reveals the master at the highest point of his maturity and creative vigor, and which has been called an unequalled achievement in music by such subsequent composers as Wagner and Berlioz.

A score of entirely different sort will be Debussy's two nocturnes "Clouds" and "Festivals," which have been called the most characteristic scores of the late French master impressionist. Richard Strauss will be represented by his brilliant tone poem of ultimately soaring mood, "Death and Transfiguration." The evening will close with Wagner's well-known overture to "Tannhauser."

This concert will constitute in all likelihood the farewell appearance of the famous French conductor in Worcester. Pierre Monteux is completing his fifth and last season as leader of the great orchestra and is expected to return to France in the spring. Since the Boston Symphony orchestra last visited Worcester under his conductorship three years ago, he is considered to have brought the orchestra to new and rarely precedented heights and tone perfection, of ensemble and interpretative eloquence.

For this concert, which will surely be one of the most important of the Worcester season, the seats are

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE ROANOKE
VA.
ISSUE OF
JAN 2 1924

An Astute Critic Is Lost And Admits It

The engagingly brilliant style of Lawrence Gilman, of the New York Tribune, in his written comments of music has been mentioned in these columns before. Another gem from his pen was his review of a recent concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with particular reference to Arthur Bliss' "Color Symphony."

Mr. Gilman bewails the plight of the concert-goer who has to listen to program music without program notes, as was generally the case when the Bliss work was played, and then admits that about the best thing a listener could do with the notes was to stick them in his pocket for future perusal and listen to the symphony as absolute music.

The composer's pictures of some of the primary colors did not fit the average imagination, so it didn't mean anything as a color symphony; but, as absolute music, Mr. Gilman found much that was new, told in an individual language and interpreted in a rich manner by M. Monteux and his musicians.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TH
SPRINGFIELD
MASS.
EVENING UNION

22 1924

THOSE RESERVED SEATS

"Y" Sunday Ticketholder Favors Abolishing Them Entirely.

To the Editor of The Union.

Sir: Let me settle once and for all the object of my letters to the Forum in which I criticized the ushers at the Sunday Y. M. C. A. concerts and especially that of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. I criticize this "reserved-for-usher" seat business and suggest that there be no reserved seats: that the ushers be given two side-door tickets for each Sunday, and that the ushers' friends take their chances along with the others who enter by the side door. By "no reserved seats," I mean that side-door ticketholders will have first choice of seats.

I don't believe this is a question which can be settled on a commercial basis. Each side-door ticket may be worth 15 cents and each usher may be worth two tickets, or 30 cents; but did we forget to include the side-door ticketholder's contribution to the collection? He may put in 5 cents or $1 we can't determine, but I don't believe that side-door ticketholders are quite so stingy as Agnes Odell would infer. Any way, why argue over the collection: it hasn't anything to do with the point I am trying to make that there should be no reserved seats.

Yes; Springfield does owe a great deal to men like Kenneth Robbie and B. A. Hoover. I know them both and they know me—and quite well, too, but they are men who certainly can see the point of an argument, even though they may not agree with it, and I hope that Mr. Hoover does not think that I am trying to slam the Y. M. C. A. or the concert series. I have said already that meetings certainly meet a demand for pleasure, satisfaction and education that would be hard to equal.

If the committee in charge of seats desires to adopt my suggestion I hope it will prove satisfactory. If they reject it, I can do nothing to help the situation. I believe that I have been justifiable in my criticism, although "B. A. Booster" doesn't think so, and I believe I have tried to criticize constructively since I have offered a remedy.

SIDE-DOOR TICKETHOLDER.
Springfield, Jan. 21, 1924.

FROM
NEWS, 22 1924
Providence, R. I.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gives another in its series of winter concerts in Infantry Hall at 8:15 this evening.

Mrs. James E. Cheeseman and Mrs.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
WORCESTER
MASS.
TELEGRAM

JAN 23 1924

Mechanics Hall

Pierre Monteux has compiled an unusually brilliant and eventful program for the pending concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Worcester, which will take place in Mechanics hall, Tuesday evening, Feb. 12.

This will probably be the farewell appearance of the illustrious French conductor in this city, since, at the conclusion of his five-year period as conductor of the orchestra, in the spring he expects to return to his own country. It was Pierre Monteux who brought the Boston Symphony orchestra to Worcester three years ago. In the intervening period his executive genius is said to have brought this organization to fresh and scarcely equalled heighs of eloquent beauty and perfection of ensemble.

The symphony on the Worcester program will be the Seventh by Beethoven in A major. This score, which ranks with the noblest and greatest of the Immortal Nine, has bbeen the favorite on the symphonic repertory, revalled only by the Fifth of the same composer. The modern French school will be repesented by Debussy's Two Nocturnes "Clouds" and "Festivals," executed in the delicate colorings which are characteristic of the late French composer. The modern German school will be represented by Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," a mighty and imposing score which rises to heights seldom reached in its ultimate climax.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WORCESTER
MASSACHUSETTS
GAZETTE

JAN 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY COMING

The Boston Symphony orchestra, 104 pieces, Pierre Monteux, conductor, is coming to Worcester Tuesday evening, Feb. 12, for one concert. It is the first appearance of the orchestra for three years. The program is: "Beethoven's Symphony, No. 7, in A Major," Strauss' "Tone Poem," "Death and Transfiguration," "Debussey's Nocturnes," "Clouds," and "Festivals," Wagner's overture to "Tannhauser."

This will be Conductor Monteux's farewell appearance in Worcester, as he completes his five-year contract with the orchestra at the end of this season.

Pierre Monteux came to the orchestra equipped by an active and distinguished career in Europe and America. He toured Europe four years as head of the Ballet Russe, and first came to America as leader of that organization. He was subsequently appointed French conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York.

From that post he came to the Boston Symphony orchestra, where, according to general opinion, his rare genius has found its best fruition.

[190]

M THE CE
UNE 1924

CHESTRA
MORROW

TEUX

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
EAGLE

JAN 20 1924

Boston Symphony Program.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra series here will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Feb. 1, with Alexander Siloti, the pianist, as soloist. Pierre Monteux will open the program with Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony No. 6. A notable score of the modern French school will be the First Suite from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," which includes "Nocturne—Interlude and Warlike Dance." The closing number will be Dvorak's "Carnival" Overture. Siloti will appear with the orchestra in Liszt's "Dance of Death," a paraphrase on the Dies Irae. This score, of tremendous brilliance, is interpreted at first hand by the former pupil of Liszt, who studied its measures with the composer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

JAN 20 1924

Rich Musical Treat For Brooklynites

Rarely indeed are such gifts of united and finished artistry bestowed upon two individuals in one family as those possessed by Mme. Louise Homer and her talented daughter, Louise. They will give a joint recital at the Academy, under Institute auspices, Friday evening, Jan. 25, that should prove a musical event of more than ordinary interest. The program will include selections by Handel, Sidney Homer, Massenet, Beethoven, Meyerbeer, Tosti, Marzials, Dvorak; scene and duet from fourth act of "Le Prophete," by Meyerbeer; Mozart's "Allelujah," Gounod's "Ring Out, Wild Bells," and the duet, "Tutti fior" from "Madam Butterfly."

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra series here will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Feb. 1, with Alexander Siloti, the famous Russian pianist, as soloist. Pierre Monteux will open the program with Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, No. A notable score of the modern French schol will be the First Suite drawn from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," which includes "Nocturne—Interlude and War-Like Dance." hTe closing number will be Dvorak's "Carnival" Overture. Siloti will appear with the orchestra in Liszt's "Dance of Death," a paraphrase on the Dies Irae.

Fritz Kreisler, the great Austrian musician, who stands, for many, alone in his mastery of the violin and his power of interpretation throuhg his chosen instrument, will appear at the Academy on Tuesday evening, Feb. 5, under Institute auspices.

CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK
HERALD

JAN 20 1924

The Boston Symphony.

The "Sacre du Printemps" or "Rites of Spring," which has been more often attacked and defended than any other of Stravinsky's scores, will be performed for the first time in New York at the Thursday evening concert of the third pair by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall the last day of this month.

Pierre Monteux was the pioneer in the introduction of Stravinsky's ballet in Paris, and when he performed it at the Concerts Monteux at the Casino, with the composer in the audience, a riot ensued which rivaled the Parisian premiere of "Tannhauser" and resulted in the calling in of the police.

A feature of the Saturday concert will be a series of orchestral excerpts from Debussy's incidental music to d'Annunzio's mystery play, "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian." The Thursday program will also include Sibelius's violin concerto, in which Richard Burgin, the concertmaster, will appear, and Mozart's Symphony in C, K. 388. The program for Saturday, February 2, will include besides the Debussy score, Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, and Liszt's "Danse Macabre," with Alexander Siloti taking the piano part.

ROCHESTER
NEW YORK
AMERICAN

JAN 20 1924

Pierre Monteux gave New York a chance, at the latest Boston Symphony concert here, to become acquainted with Arthur Bliss' Color Symphony. Most of the newspaper reviewers liked the work, the notable dissenter being Henry Finck, of the Post. He thought it "malodorous music," which seems to have been somewhat harshly put.

Bliss dipped his pen into melody, then colored his score with a facility that made the average listener more than content.

For here is a symphony that throbs with life, with spontaneity and beauty. Among the many new compositions heard in New York this season the Bliss work must be given a foremost place. Jacques Thibaud, playing Mozart's E flat concerto for violin, was at his best. Lovliness of tone and elegance of phrosing went far to make his performance exceptional.

The first appearance of Donna Ortensia, soprano, who made a favorable impression by an agreeable voice and a vivid tempermental display; and a flock of concerts by the Philharmonic, New York and State symphony orchestras, were among the recent music offered the New York public. Mitja Nikisch's piano playing, and the violinistic accomplishments of Erika Morini were solo contributions. And still the music mill grinds.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK
TRIBUNE

Coming Philharmonic programs. The first half of Mr. Monteux's program will consist of Mozart's symphony in C major (Köchel No. 388) and the D minor violin concerto of Sibelius, in which Richard Burgin, the orchestra's concert master, will be the soloist. On Saturday afternoon, February 2, Alexander Siloti will be the soloist in Liszt's paraphrase of the "Dies Iræ" for piano and orchestra, "Dance of Death," preceded by Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony and Debussy's suite from his incidental music to d'Annunzio's "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian."

Stravinsky also will be played here by the Philadelphia Orchestra, which will give his octet for wind instruments at Carnegie Hall on Tuesday, February 5.

last three morrow night at the Metropolitan Opera House in its usual form of a opera-pantomime. Mme. Galli-Curci will sing for the first time the music of the Queen, whom Rosina Galli, as before, will impersonate in the pantomime, while the part of King Dodon will be sung by Adamo Didur and mimed by Alexis Kosloff. The other singers in the cast are Mmes. Alcock and Robertson and Messrs. Diaz, Reschilian, D'Angelo and Audisio; the other mimes Florence Rudolph and Messrs. Bartik and Bonfiglio. The work has been restudied musically under Giuseppe Bamboschek, who will conduct, while Miss Galli has prepared and rehearsed its choreographic side. Willy Pogany's scenery will be used.

"Le Coq d'Or," the sixth opera on General Manager Gatti-Casazza's list of novelties and revivals, will be preceded to-morrow night by "Cavalleria Rusticana," with Mmes. Easton, Perini and Wakefield and Messrs. Chamlee and Picco. Mr. Moranzoni will conduct.

Other operas this week, the twelfth of the season, will be:

"Fedora," on Wednesday evening, with Mmes. Jeritza, Mario, Dalossy and Alcock and Messrs. Martinelli, Scotti, D'Angelo, Picchi, Ananian, Picco, Bada, Paltrinieri and Audisio, Mr. Papi conducting.

"Marta," Thursday afternoon, with Mmes. Alda and Howard and Messrs. Gigli, Didur, Malatesta, D'Angelo and Reschilian. Mr. Papi will conduct.

Programs

Sunday

Carnegie Hall, 3 p. m. Concert by the Philharmonic Society; soloist, Leo Schulz:

Unfinished Symphony, in B minor. Schubert
Violoncello concerto in D major . . Molique
Mr. Schulz.
Caucasian Sketches . . . . . . Ippolitoff-Ivanoff
Blue Danube Waltz . . . . Strauss

Aeolian Hall, 3 p. m. Violin recital by Samuel Dushkin; accompanist, Samuel Chotzinoff:

Sonata in G minor . . . . Tartini
Sonata in E major . . . . Bach
Nocturne . . . . Lili Boulanger
Chant of the Yemenite Jews; Palestinian Song . . . . Paul Kirman
Russian Dance . . . . Blair Fairchild

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PROVIDENCE
RHODE ISLAND
TRIBUNE

JAN 20 1924

Boston Symphony

Concert Next Tuesday

Features of the third Boston Symphony concert of the season here to be given in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening at 8:15 will be the appearance of Jean Bedetti, the 'cello virtuoso of the orchestra, as soloist and the revival by Pierre Monteux of Schubert's great symphony in C major, which has not been heard in Providence for a number of seasons. Jean Bedetti came from Europe to take his present post four years ago. He had been held in the highest regard by virtue of his recital tours and appearances with the leading orchestra and as leader of its famous 'cello section, he has attracted as much attention as by his recitals in Boston, New York and other cities. This scarcely rivaled master of his beautiful instrument will play with the orchestra next Tuesday the concerto of Robert Schumann.

The symphony of Schubert is considered by many his master work. It is larger in scope and in many ways greater than his "Unfinished" symphony. Felix Weingartner, the great conductor, thus speaks of this wondrous score: "Schubert was the lyric musician par excellence" Whatever he wrote, the most serene as well as the most tragic work, seems as it were imbued with that infintely soft, melodic element, which always lets us perceive his figure as if through tears of gentle emotion. A blissful warmth emanates from his music. Only think of the great Symphony in C. major . . . I cannot conceive how it is that there are still people so ill-humored as to think this symphony too long, nay, even to ask for cuts to be made in it. I am not of their opinion, and I own that whenever I hear this work well conducted, or when I conduct it myself, I always experience the most happy sensations, and am absolutely intoxicated with the music. It produces on me the effect as of flight through a bright ether."

The remainder of the program will be the two movements from Ravel's Mother Goose Suite—"Beauty and the Beast Converse" and "Laideronnette, Empress of the Pagodas" and to close the evening Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" Overture.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

PROVIDENCE
R. I.
JOURNAL

The Boston Symphony is also playing an anniversary date, its last year's schedule bringing it to Infantry Hall on Jan. 23. At that time Jean Bedetti was the soloist, as he will be next Tuesday night. The programme is an unusually attractive one, having for its feature Schubert's symphony in C-major, called, as Warren Storey Smith mentions in another column to-day, "one of the world's greatest symphonies." The other selections are two numbers from Ravel's "Mother Goose" suite, and for a resounding finale Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman." Mr. Bedetti will play the solo part in Schumann's concreto for that instrument.

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO PLAY HERE

The program is announced which Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony orchestra will present at their concert in Worcester, to be given in Mechanics hall, Tuesday evening, February 12th.

The principal number will be Beethoven's great Seventh Symphony in A major, a score which reveals the master at the highest point of his maturity and creative vigor, and which has been called an unequalled achievement in music by such subsequent composers as Wagner and Berlioz.

A score of entirely different sort will be Debussy's two nocturnes "Clouds" and "Festivals," which have been called the most characteristic scores of the late French master impressionist. Richard Strauss will be represented by his brilliant tone poem of ultimately soaring mood, "Death and Transfiguration." The evening will close with Wagner's well-known overture to "Tannhauser."

This concert will constitute in all likelihood the farewell appearance of the famous French conductor in Worcester. Pierre Monteux is completing his fifth and last season as leader of the great orchestra and is expected to return to France in the spring. Since the Boston Symphony orchestra last visited Worcester under his conductorship three years ago, he is considered to have brought the orchestra to new and rarely precedented heights and tone perfection, of ensemble and interpretative eloquence.

For this concert, which will surely be one of the most important of

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

ROANOKE
VA.

ISSUE OF

JAN 2 1924

An Astute Critic Is Lost And Admits It

The engagingly brilliant style of Lawrence Gilman, of the New York Tribune, in his written comments of music has been mentioned in these columns before. Another gem from his pen was his review of a recent concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with particular reference to Arthur Bliss' "Color Symphony."

Mr. Gilman bewails the plight of the concert-goer who has to listen to program music without program notes, as was generally the case when the Bliss work was played, and then admits that about the best thing a listener could do with the notes was to stick them in his pocket for future perusal and listen to the symphony as absolute music.

The composer's pictures of some of the primary colors did not fit the average imagination, so it didn't mean anything as a color symphony; but, as absolute music, Mr. Gilman found much that was new, told in an individual language and interpreted in a rich manner by M. Monteux and his musicians.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TH

SPRINGFIELD
MASS.
~~EVENING~~ UNION

JAN 22 192

THOSE RESERVED SEATS

"Y" Sunday Ticketholder Favors Abolishing Them Entirely.

To the Editor of The Union.

Sir: Let me settle once and for all the object of my letters to the Forum in which I criticized the ushers at the Sunday Y. M. C. A. concerts and especially that of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. I criticize this "reserved-for-usher" seat business and suggest that there be no reserved seats: that the ushers be given two side-door tickets for each Sunday, and that the ushers' friends take their chances along with the others who enter by the side door. By "no reserved seats," I mean that side-door ticketholders will have first choice of seats.

I don't believe this is a question which can be settled on a commercial basis. Each side-door ticket may be worth 15 cents and each usher may be worth two tickets, or 30 cents; but did we forget to include the side-door ticketholder's contribution to the collection? He may put in 5 cents or $1 we can't determine, but I don't believe that side-door ticketholders are quite so stingy as Agnes Odell would infer. Any way, why argue over the collection: it hasn't anything to with the point I am trying to make that there should be no reserved seats.

Yes; Springfield does owe a great deal to men like Kenneth Robbie and B. A. Hoover. I know them both and they know me—and quite well, too but they are men who certainly can see the point of an argument, even though they may not agree with and I hope that Mr. Hoover does think that I am trying to slam the Y. M. C. A. or the concert series. I have said already that meetings certainly meet a demand for pleasure, satisfaction and education that would be hard to equal.

If the committee in charge of seats desires to adopt my suggestion I hope it will prove satisfactory. If they reject it, I can do nothing to help the situation. I believe that I have been justifiable in my criticism, although "B. A. Booster" doesn't think so, and I believe I have tried to criticize constructively since I have offered a remedy.

SIDE-DOOR TICKETHOLDER.
Springfield, Jan. 21, 1924.

FROM
NEWS, JAN 22 1924
Providence, R. I.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gives another in its series of winter concerts in Infantry Hall at 8:15 this evening.

Mrs. James E. Cheeseman and Mrs.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

WORCESTER
MASS.
TELEGRAM

JAN 23 1924

Mechanics Hall

Pierre Monteux has compiled an unusually brilliant and eventful program for the pending concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Worcester, which will take place in Mechanics hall, Tuesday evening, Feb. 12.

This will probably be the farewell appearance of the illustrious French conductor in this city, since, at the conclusion of his five-year period as conductor of the orchestra, in the spring he expects to return to his own country. It was Pierre Monteux who brought the Boston Symphony orchestra to Worcester three years ago. In the intervening period his executive genius is said to have brought this organization to fresh and scarcely equalled heighs of eloquent beauty and perfection of ensemble.

The symphony on the Worcester program will be the Seventh by Beethoven in A major. This score, which ranks with the noblest and greatest of the Immortal Nine, has bbeen the favorite on the symphonic repertory, revalled only by the Fifth of the same composer. The modern French school will be repesented by Debussy's Two Nocturnes "Clouds" and "Festivals," executed in the delicate colorings which are characteristic of the late French composer. The modern German school will be represented by Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," a mighty and imposing score which rises to heights seldom reached in its ultimate climax.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

WORCESTER
MASSACHUSETTS
GAZETTE

JAN 23 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY COMING

The Boston Symphony orchestra, 104 pieces, Pierre Monteux, conductor, is coming to Worcester Tuesday evening, Feb. 12, for one concert. It is the first appearance of the orchestra for three years. The program is "Beethoven's Symphony, No. 7, in A Major," Strauss' "Tone Poem," "Death and Transfiguration," "Debussey's Nocturnes," "Clouds," and "Festivals," Wagner's overture to "Tannhauser."

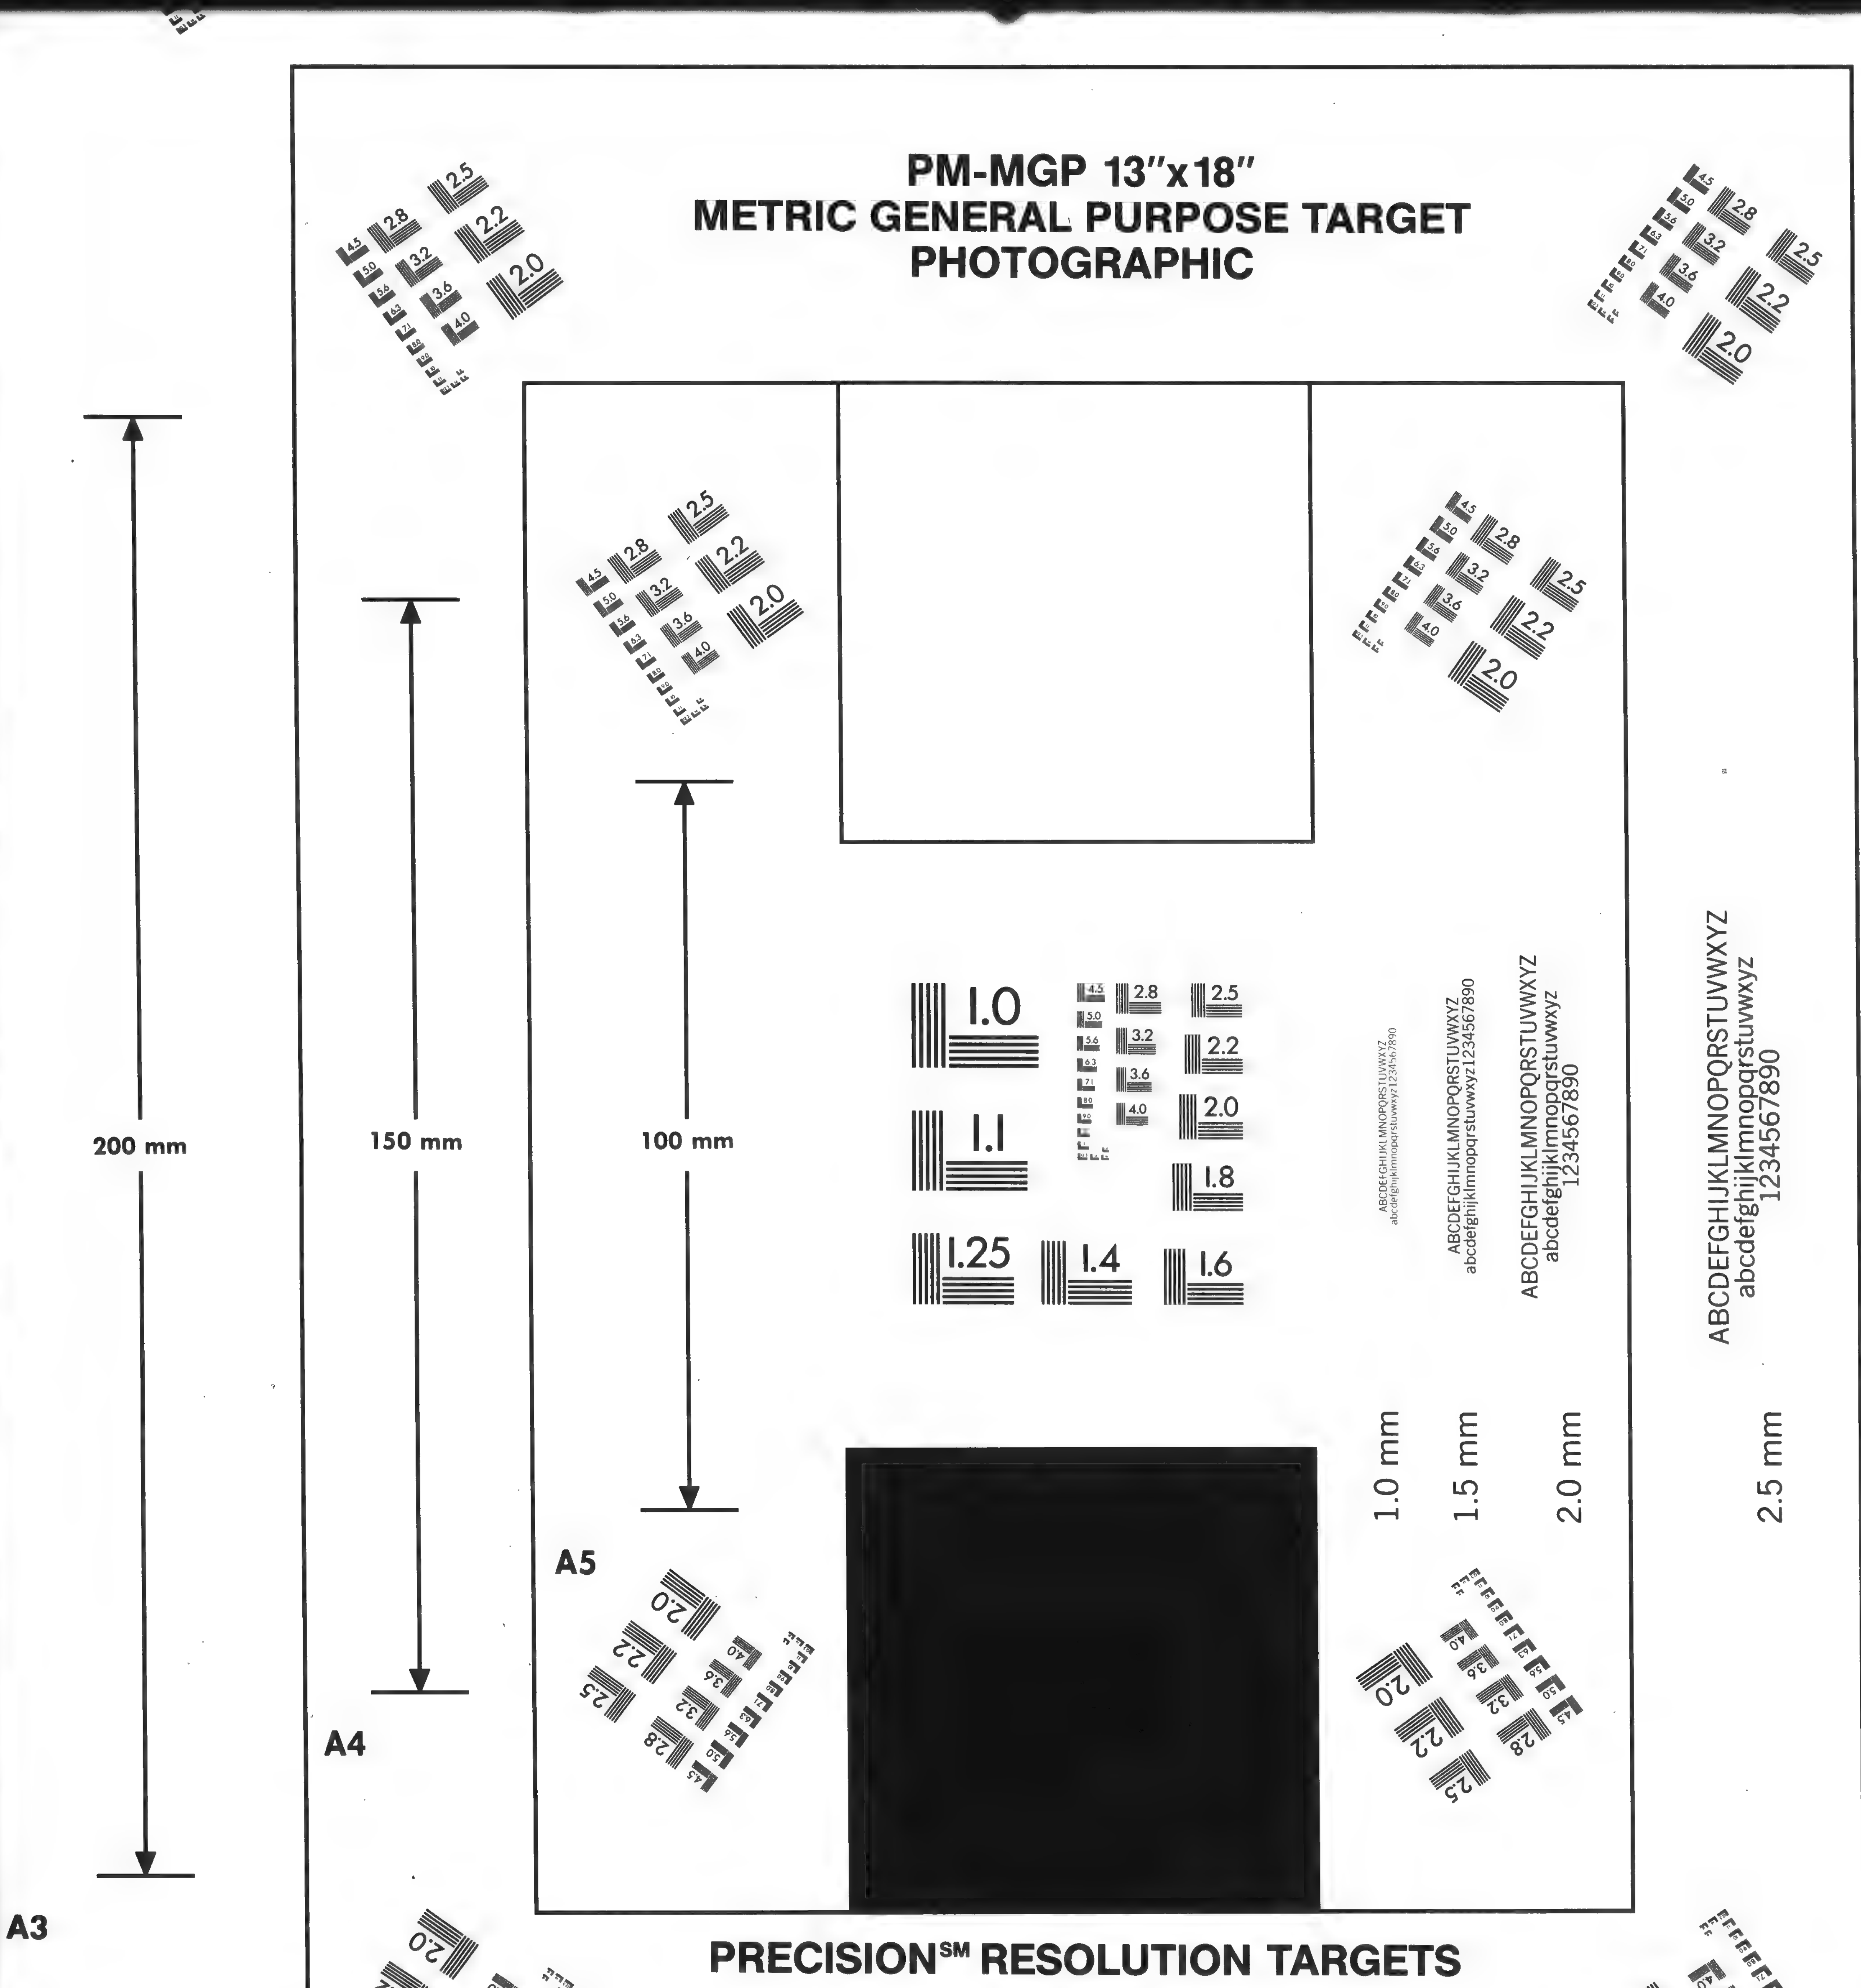
This will be Conductor Monteux's farewell appearance in Worcester, as he completes his five-year contract with the orchestra at the end of this season.

Pierre Monteux came to the orchestra equipped by an active and distinguished career in Europe and America. He toured Europe four years as head of the Ballet Russe, and first came to America as leader of that organization. He was subsequently appointed French conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. From that post he came to the Boston Symphony orchestra, where, according to general opinion, his rare genius has found its best fruition.

[190]

REDUCTION
RATIO
14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
5.0
3.2
5.6
2.0
6.3
3.6
7.1
4.0
8.0
9.0
200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
A5
A4
A3

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

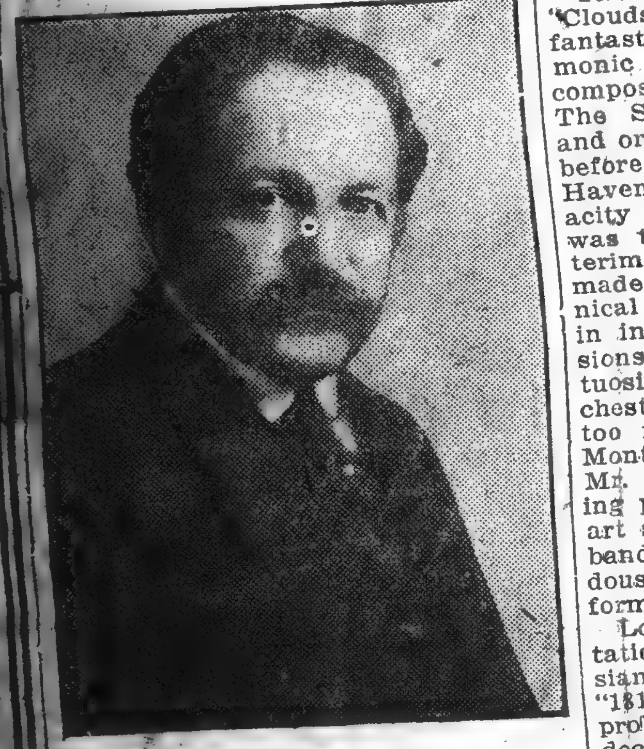
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LAWRENCE
MASS.
TRIBUNE
AN 2 1924

CONCERT WELL GIVEN

Boston Symphony Orchestra in Program That Appeals Delights Large Audience at Colonial Theatre

The first musical event of the season drew a very large audience to the Colonial theatre yesterday afternoon when the famous Boston Symphony orchestra gave one of its inimitable concerts. The organization which has played here before on several occasions were under the able leadership of Pierre Monteux, the French conductor, whose directorship terminates at the close of the present season after five consecutive years at the helm. He was given a cordial reception when he stepped to the conductor's desk. Raymond Havens, the youthful American pianist, was the soloist of the day. The program was as follows:



PIERRE MONTEUX

Symphony in A Major, No. 7, Op. 9, Beethoven
- I. Poco sostenuto; Vivace
- II. Allegretto
- III. Presto: Presto meno assai
- IV. Allegro con brio

Nocturnes, Debussy
- (a) Clouds
- (b) Festivals

Concerto in A minor for pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 54, Schumann
- I. Allegro appetuoso
- II. Intermezzo; Andantino grazioso
- III. Allegro vivace

Overture Solennelle, "1812", Tchaikovsky

Symphony programs, more than any other form of musical entertainment, afford the intelligent and critical listeners much fodder for their vivisections. Yesterday's program, like those generally used by the orchestra en tour through cities with limited opportunities for hearing big orchestras, was made up of works calculated to appeal to manifold tastes. Beginning with the seventh Beethoven symphony, it offered a fairly comprehensive idea of the onward march in contrapuntal development. After a century it is remarkable how much virility remains in Beethoven, even though many scholarly commentators long ago yawningly have consigned the whole nine symphonies to the limbo of obsolete forms, arguing that whatever scholarly merit they possess is nullified by the apparently interminable repetitions.

The two short Debussy numbers, "Clouds" and Festivals" represent in fantastic manner the striking harmonic palette of the gifted French composer, who died a few years ago. The Schumann Concerto for piano and orchestra, brought forward again before a local audience Raymond Havens, who played in a similar capacity in 1919 when Henri Rabaud was the conductor. During the interim of those years Mr. Havens has made great strides both in the technical mastery of his instrument and in interpretive grasp. Unlike occasions when certain illustrious virtuosi appear with a symphony orchestra and thrust their personalty too much into the foreground, Mr. Monteux remained the leader and Mr. Havens, playing with scintillating precision, was content to let his art shine forth as a unit in a great band. He was given a tremendous ovation at the close of his performance.

Lovers of that sturdy instrumentation, so characteristic of the Russians, had their fill in the popular "1812" Tchaikovsky overture, which, probably better than any of its predecessors on the program gave the various choirs full sway in surmounting the turgid, thunderous, almost barbaric battle music. Both the French and Russian national airs, so adroitly interwoven into the musical strands, represent the successes and reverses of the armies in the Napoleonic invasion of Russia in 1812, with the subsequent repulse of the French forces. This number, so full of what we see fit to call red-blooded music, was a fitting close to a delightful program, and judging by the applause that greeted the tonal opulence of the closing measures, it was the most satisfying to the majority of the audience, even though classic adherents may stigmatize some of it as bombast.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
EAGLE

WITH THE ORCHESTRAS

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Pierre Monteux, who was the pioneer in the introduction of Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" in Paris, on which occasion a riot necessitated the calling in of the police, will conduct the composer's orchestral suite from this score at the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall, which will take place on Jan. 31 and Feb. 2. This will be the first performance in New York and will take place at the Thursday concert. A feature of the Saturday concert will be Debussy's suite from his incidental music to D'Annunzio's mystery play, "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian." The soloist of the Thursday concert will be Richard Burgin, the concertmaster of the orchestra, appearing in Sibelius' violin concerto. Mozart's symphony in C major will also be played. The soloist of the Saturday concert will be Alexander Siloti, appearing with the orchestra in Liszt's "Danse Macabre."

BEST BY ATTEST
Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN
NEW YORK
EAGLE

1924

Boston Orchestra.

At the Thursday concert of the Boston Symphony, Mr. Monteux will conduct for the first time in New York, Stravinsky's ballet "The Rites of Spring—A Picture of Pagan Russia," one of the most important scores of this Russian composer. The soloist will be Richard Burgin, the concertmaster of the orchestra, who will appear in the violin concerto of Sibelius in D minor. As soloist at the Saturday matinee concert, Alexander Siloti, the noted Russian pianist and Liszt pupil, will play Liszt's "Dance of Death," a paraphrase of the "Dies Irae." Pierre Monteux will conduct four symphonic numbers from Debussy's incidental music to d'Annunzio's mystery play, "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian."

NEW YORK
ABLISHED 1881
om
EWS
FEB 1924

Centenary Celebrated of Beethoven's 9th Symphony

BY MAURICE ROSENFELD.

[Special Dispatch from Staff Correspondent.]

New York, Feb. —Assisted by the Oratorio Society of New York, and a list of vocal soloists including Ruth Rodgers, soprano; Mabel Ritch, contralto; Nevada Van Der Deer, contralto; Richard Crooks, tenor; Frederick Baer, barytone, and Frederic Patton, basso, the New York Symphony orchestra completed its Beethoven cycle yesterday afternoon at Carnegie hall with a performance of the ninth symphony, in D minor, celebrating at the same time the centenary of the first performance of this work. Walter Damrosch was the conductor.

The concert was the sixth of the Beethoven series and began with a canon for six voices, "Helpful Be, O Man: Noble and Good," composed in 1823, arranged for solo voices and chorus by Albert Stoessel, conductor of the Oratorio society. Then followed the last of the Beethoven piano sonatas, opus 111, which was played in his well-known authoritative and musicianly manner by Harold Bauer, the celebrated pianist.

After the intermission, the chorus, assembled on the stage, some 300 mixed voices the vocal soloists and the orchestra combined in the performance of Beethoven's ninth and last symphony, with choral finale, on Schiller's "Ode to Joy."

Mr. Damrosch read the work more in its classic style than with any sensational interpretations of his own, ar his manner was dignified and forma The vocal soloists were adequate if n brilliant. We have heard Richa Crooks and Frederick Patton with o own choral societies, and their parts the finale were well taken care of.

Carnegie hall was filled with a lar musical audience.

The Boston symphony orchestra w Pierre Monteux, conductor, came for biweekly pair of concerts to the sa hall last evening and gave the first two concerts to another large audien of music lovers, presenting a Moza symphony, the Sibelius violin concer in which Richard Burgin, concert m ter, played the solo, and Stravinsk "Le Sacre du Printemps," which h not been heard in Chicago as yet.

The Mozart "Jupiter" symphony w played with translucent clarity, with f ent technical ease and with stric formal musical rendition. While the were a few moments when the ensemb was not entirely perfect in the rapi parts of the work, the tone was refined and beautiful in quality. Mr. Burgin presented the Sibelius concerto with a firm grasp of its mechanical and musical problems. The audience gave him enthusiastic applause and recalled him a number of times.

The piece of the day of course was Igor Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring," which is styled "Pictures of Pagan Russia," in two parts, originally written for a ballet, first produced in Paris in 1913 by the Diaghilev ballet with scenery and costumes. It is in two parts and has an elaborate program to accompany its performance. The Boston orchestra disclosed its remarkable instrumental resources in the rendition of this very decidedly futuristic, impressionistic composition, dissociated from the scenery and the choreography.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Post
6 192

STRAVINSKY AT LAST

His "Rites of Spring" to Be Played Here Next Week

Next Thursday evening, January 31, and Saturday afternoon, February 2, in Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its third pair of concerts of the New York season.

On Thursday Pierre Monteux will conduct for the first time in New York Stravinsky's notable score, "The Rites of Spring." The soloist will be Richard Burgin, the concertmaster of the orchestra, who will appear in the violin concerto of Sibelius in D minor. The opening number will be Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony.

The Saturday afternoon concert will have as soloist Alexander Siloti, the noted Russian pianist. This foremost of the pupils of Liszt will play the piano part in his former master's score, "The Dance of Death," a paraphrase on the "Dies Irae." Pierre Monteux will conduct four orchestral numbers from Debussy's music to d'Annunzio's play, "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian." The symphony of the afternoon will be the sixth of Beethoven (Pastoral).

When Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring" was first performed in Paris (1913) by M. Monteux there was such a row that the police had to be called in. The composer managed to escape after his hat was smashed. The work is called "A Tableau of Pagan Russia." Nicholas Roerich describes the ritual gesticulations of the "Adolescents," who welcome the advant of spring. One of them, a young girl, is chosen for immolation. She performs a wild dance, which increases in ecstasy until she falls from exhaustion. As the curtain falls her rigid form is held aloft by a group of youths.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
ROCHESTER
N. Y.
TIMES UNION
1924

New York heard for the first tim on last Thursday Stravinsky's wide discussed "Le Sacre du Printemps which Pierre Monteux and the Bost Symphony Orchestra presented. M Monteux was the conductor of t historic first performance of "T Rites of Spring" in Paris with th Diaghileff ballet on May 29, 1923, o which occasion the audience brok into an uproar, although the orchestr and dancers kept valiantly on to th end. Things were thrown and the police intervened. In New York on Thursday the audience greeted t work with thunderous applause, according to Deems Taylor, who says of it in the World:—"It is music of almost unbelievable complexity of orchestral texture, yet essentially as stark and primitive in outline as the wall pictures of a cave-man. It is not beautiful, in any external sense of the word; but it has a power and truth that strikes deep, that awakens age-old emotions and desires, almost terrifying in their unfamiliarity. This is great music." It was given for th first time in America in 1922 at concert in Philadelphia by the Philadelphia Orchestra, Leopold Stokowsk conducting, and Mr. Monteux intr duced it last week in Boston. "Th Rites" was led by Eugene Goosse in London some time ago and w hailed as one of his most notable co ductorial achievements.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
BROOKLYN
N. Y.
STANDARD UNION
FEB 9 1924

Brooklyn would undoubtedly have preferred, had the choice been granted, to have heard Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printempts," given by Pierre Monteux at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening. But instead Mr. Monteux, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last night, treated the ears and imagination of the audience to the lesser novelty of three excerpts from Ravel's "Daphinis et Chloe," a Nocturne, Interlude and War Dance. These were preceded by Beethoven's "Pastorale" symphony and followed by Liszt's "Dance of Death" (for piano and orchestra), with Alexander Siloti the soloist. Dvorak's "Carnival" overture was closing number.

The audience was large and the programme pleasing, though offering nothing of special moment insofar as critical comment is concerned. The Boston Orchestra's next concert here will be on March 14. This series is held under the auspices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE ROCHESTER
N. Y.
TIMES UNION
1924

The Boston Symphony orchestra under Pierre Monteux, recently playe Vincent d'Indy's "Symphony on Mountainer Air," with Mr. Schmitz the piano. The Boston Transcri remarked at the time: "Wagner h been dead three years when d'In wrote this, but it is fresh and vi and shows no sign of age."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
FEB 3 1924

ORCHESTRA POOLS MAY END DEFICITS

Backers of Symphony Organizations Discuss Big Business Methods, Including Mergers.

LOSING $1,250,000 A YEAR

Results of a Conference at Clarence H. Mackay's Home to Be Announced Soon.

Clarence H. Mackay and prominent patrons of the leading symphony orchestras of the United States met last night at the home of Mr. Mackay, 3 East Seventy-fifth Street, to discuss plans for putting the organizations on a sound financial basis. At the meeting figures showing that the deficits of the symphony societies amounted to approximately $1,250,000 annually were presented for the consideration of Mr. Mackay's guests.

The application of big business methods, including mergers and pools, was among the proposals the patrons of symphony were asked to consider and express an opinion on as a means of solving the financial problem.

An announcement following the meeting, among other things, said:

"During the dinner there was informal discussion of the various problems now confronting the various orchestra associations, foremost among them being the question of annual deficits and endowments. It was brought to the attention of the Presidents that the annual deficits of the thirteen orchestras in the United States approximated $1,250,000 on an annual expenditure of not less than $5,000,000."

Remedies to Be Announced.

Mr. Mackay was unable last night to go into the details of the proposed remedies considered by his guests and himself. His spokesman said that Mr. Mackay hoped to disclose within a few days the results of the conference somewhat more in detail.

Following a dinner, there was a reception and a musical program, at which the artists were Mme. Wanda Landowska, harpsichordist, and Jacques Thibaud, violinist.

Among those present were Alexander Van Rensselaer and William J. Turner of the Philadelphia Orchestra Association, Henry Harkness Flagler of the Symphony Society of New York, Charles H. Hamill of the Orchestral Association, Chicago; William H. Murphy of the Detroit Symphony Society, Elbert L. Carpenter of the Orchestral Association, Minneapolis, Minn.; George Todd of the Rochester Symphony Society, Louis T. More of the Orchestra Association, Cincinnati, Ohio; Melville Clark of the Syracuse Symphony Orchestra, representatives of the Cleveland Orchestra and the Philharmonic Orchestra of Los Angeles, Frederic A. Juilliard, Otto H. Kahn and Marshall Field of the Philharmonic Society of New York and Kenneth O'Brien.

Boston Not Represented.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was not represented among the guests of Mr. Mackay. Judge Frederick P. Cabot, principal guarantor of that organization, sent his declination after having looked over the agenda of the conference which was attached to the invitation sent out by the Chairman of the Philharmonic. In the agenda was included the question of dealing with unions. That question is one which was disposed of by the Boston organization in establishing the open shop.

Another proposal among those outlined for discussion was an exchange of libraries. From that phase of the contemplated reorganization of the symphony orchestras management the Bostonians are said to have wished to keep aloof, since they possess one of the most complete libraries of musical scores in the world, which they are not desirous of distributing in one way or another among more than a dozen different organizations. The Boston Symphony backers also are said to have found it undesirable to join in the discussion from the point of view of joint engagement of soloists.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, at its matinee yesterday in Carnegie Hall was heard by several of the visiting symphony orchestra presidents and other officers invited here by Mr. Mackay.

While the presidents of the Symphony organizations were threshing out their problems at the home of Mr. Mackay, the managers of the same orchestras were the guests of Arthur Judson, manager of the Philharmonic, at a dinner at the Waldorf-Astoria, where they considered their particular problems.

Under leadership of Clarence H. Mackay the Philharmonic Society of New York, the oldest symphony organization in the United States and said to be the third oldest in the world, was consolidated three years ago with the National Symphony Orchestra, whose financial backers and musicians went over to the Philharmonic. At the beginning of the present season it joined forces with the City Symphony Orchestra.

Increasing Cost of Production.

To the deficits of the symphony organizations the high cost of musical talent contributes no less than generally rising prices that followed the war. Conductors are paid salaries comparable to those received by the heads of large industrial organizations. The pay of musical talent has increased all along the line. In another connection the contrast between the musician of today and of two decades gone by was described in one of the announcements of the Philharmonic Orchestra last Fall. Among other things it said:

"The orchestra musician of twenty years ago would be amazed if he were to stand at the Fifty-sixth Street entrance to Carnegie Hall today and count the Philharmonic players who come to rehearsal in their own motor cars. A casual observer noticed one morning a Studebaker, Maxwell, Oakland, Chevrolet, Nash, Reo, Dort, Hudson, Essex and a Packard bringing to rehearsal a bass player, a viola, horn, another horn, trumpet, trombone, violin, 'cello, second violin player—until the observer had to leave an unfinished symposium in prosperity awheel, with about seventy men unaccounted for. In his count, however, about thirty were included, making the tally a motor car to every three musicians. In every case, however, the player was his own chauffeur."

Bird's-eye View of Situation.

The deficits of some of the leading symphony orchestras have been assumed in years past and still are met by single guarantors. In other cases the deficits are wiped out by groups of guarantors or public subscription. The following list gives a bird's-eye view of the situation:

Boston Symphony—In programs last month 500 subscribers to this year's deficit of $95,000 were named.

Philharmonic—Originally organized in 1842 as a co-operative society of players, reorganized in the present century, absorbed National Symphony three years ago, absorbed City Symphony last year, also joined educational program with Mrs. E. H. Harriman's American Orchestral Society.

New York Symphony—Harry Harkness Flagler, sole guarantor last ten years of $100,000 annual deficit. He wiped out the $250,000 deficit the year the New York Symphony Orchestra went abroad.

Philadelphia Orchestra—Raised endowment fund two years ago when streets of its home city were placarded with, "Save the Orchestra," and when Edward Bok gave largest sum, reported to be $100,000, to the orchestra association, of which he is now President.

Syracuse—Newest orchestra, formed by musicians, led by Professor William Berwald of Syracuse University; gives five noon-hour concerts, Keith's Theatre, largest in Syracuse, and house is always sold out.

Rochester—George Eastman, kodak manufacturer, founder and sole guarantor.

Cleveland—Popular subscription.

Cincinnati—Mrs. C. P. Taft, chief guarantor.

Detroit—Subscription by wealthy citizens.

Chicago—Founded by Theodore Thomas thirty-three years ago, and has general support.

Minneapolis—Its deficits are met almost entirely by one guarantor.

St. Louis—Raised $300,000 last year.

Los Angeles—W. A. Clark Jr. gave $543,000 in three years and still guarantees deficit.

San Francisco—Launched a drive last year for funds with which to make possible the continuance of the orchestra.

A survey of the United States has shown that there are approximately 100 cities of the same size as Syracuse which under proper leadership and with the financial aid of citizens could organize symphony orchestras among the musicians of moving picture and legitimate theatre and other organizations where musicians are employed.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
TELEGRAM
New York City

Debussy's "Sebastian" at the Boston Symphony

Beethoven, Debussy and Liszt made up the program of the Boston Symphony concert yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The "Pastoral" symphony, one of the loveliest pieces of descriptive music in existence, was beautifully played. Excerpts from "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian," by Debussy for the chance of hearing which again after too long an interval one must be exceedingly grateful to Pierre Monteux—followed, in vivifying contrast.

The notes of the learned Philip Hale in the book of the concert added nothing to the clarity of one's understanding of the great master's little excursion into the country; it could not be done. For Debussy's "Saint Sebastian," written for the much more definite purpose of exemplifying the action and pantomime of d'Annunzio's mystery play, clarity of programmatic annotation was unattainable and unwanted.

Probably few people who heard these excerpts yesterday had ever seen and heard the mystery play—their misfortune, not their fault—so that they could not see again the episodes of Saint Sebastian's life and death, as one, for instance, listening to the Fire Music from "Die Walkuere" recalls and sees again the smoke-encircled Bruennhilde among her stage rocks. It was not necessary. Debussy's "Saint Sebastian" itself hung before them—a great rich tapestry of pure sound.

Tawdry by comparison seemed Liszt's "Dance of Death," a paraphrase of the "Dies Irae" for piano and orchestra, well played though it was by Alexander Siloti at the piano.

[191]

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LAWRENCE
MASS.
TRIBUNE
N 1924

CONCERT WELL GIVEN

Boston Symphony Orchestra in Program That Appeals Delights Large Audience at Colonial Theatre

The first musical event of the season drew a very large audience to the Colonial theatre yesterday afternoon when the famous Boston Symphony orchestra gave one of its inimitable concerts. The organization which has played here before on several occassions were under the able leadership of Pierre Monteux, the French conductor, whose directorship terminates at the close of the present season after five consecutive years at the helm. He was given a cordial reception when he stepped to the conductor's desk. Raymond Havens, the youthful American pianist, was the soloist of the day. The program was as follows:

PIERRE MONTEUX

Symphony in A Major, No. 7, Op. 9 — Beethoven
 I. Poco sostenuto; Vivace
 II. Allegretto
 III. Presto: Presto meno assai
 IV. Allegro con brio
Nocturnes — Debussy
 (a) Clouds
 (b) Festivals
Concerto in A minor for pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 54 — Schumann
 I. Allegro appetuoso
 II. Intermezzo; Andantino grazioso
 III. Allegro vivace
Overture Solennelle, "1812" — Tchaikovsky

Symphony programs, more than any other form of musical entertainment, afford the intelligent and critical listeners much fodder for their vivisections. Yesterday's program, like those generally used by the orchestra en tour through cities with limited opportunities for hearing big orchestras, was made up of works calculated to appeal to manifold tastes. Beginning with the seventh Beethoven symphony, it offered a fairly comprehensive idea of the onward march in contrapuntal development. After a century it is remarkable how much virility remains in Beethoven, even though many scholarly commentators long ago yawningly have consigned the whole nine symphonies to the limbo of obsolete forms, arguing that whatever scholarly merit they possess is nullified by the apparently interminable repetitions.

The two short Debussy numbers, "Clouds" and Festivals" represent in fantastic manner the striking harmonic palette of the gifted French composer, who died a few years ago. The Schumann Concerto for piano and orchestra, brought forward again before a local audience Raymond Havens, who played in a similar capacity in 1919 when Henri Rabaud was the conductor. During the interim of those years Mr. Havens has made great strides both in the technical mastery of his instrument and in interpretive grasp. Unlike occasions when certain illustrious virtuosi appear with a symphony orchestra and thrust their personalty too much into the foreground, Mr. Monteux remained the leader and Mr. Havens, playing with scintillating precision, was content to let his art shine forth as a unit in a great band. He was given a tremendous ovation at the close of his performance.

Lovers of that sturdy instrumentation, so characteristic of the Russians, had their fill in the popular "1812" Tchaikovsky overture, which, probably better than any of its predecessors on the program gave the various choirs full sway in surmounting the turgid, thunderous, almost barbaric battle music. Both the French and Russian national airs, so adroitly interwoven into the musical strands, represent the successes and reverses of the armies in the Napoleonic invasion of Russia in 1812, with the subsequent repulse of the French forces. This number, so full of what we see fit to call red-blooded music, was a fitting close to a delightful program, and judging by the applause that greeted the tonal opulence of the closing measures, it was the most satisfying to the majority of the audience, even though classic adherents may stigmatize some of it as bombast.

BEST BY ATTEST
Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN
NEW YORK
EAGLE 1924

Boston Orchestra.

At the Thursday concert of the Boston Symphony, Mr. Monteux will conduct for the first time in New York, Stravinsky's ballet "The Rites of Spring—A Picture of Pagan Russia," one of the most important scores of this Russian composer. The soloist will be Richard Burgin, the concertmaster of the orchestra, who will appear in the violin concerto of Sibelius in D minor. As soloist at the Saturday matinee concert, Alexander Siloti, the noted Russian pianist and Liszt pupil, will play Liszt's "Dance of Death," a paraphrase of the "Dies Irae." Pierre Monteux will conduct four symphonic numbers from Debussy's incidental music to d'Annunzio's mystery play, "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian."

NEW YORK
ABLISHED 1881
m EWS
FEB 1924

Centenary Celebrated of Beethoven's 9th Symphony

BY MAURICE ROSENFELD.

[Special Dispatch from a Staff Correspondent.]

New York, Feb. 1.—Assisted by the Oratorio Society of New York, and a list of vocal soloists including Ruth Rodgers, soprano; Mabel Ritch, contralto; Nevada Van Der Deer, contralto; Richard Crooks, tenor; Frederick Baer, barytone, and Frederic Patton, basso, the New York Symphony orchestra completed its Beethoven cycle yesterday afternoon at Carnegie hall with a performance of the ninth symphony, in D minor, celebrating at the same time the centenary of the first performance of this work. Walter Damrosch was the conductor.

The concert was the sixth of the Beethoven series and began with a canon for six voices, "Helpful Be, O Man; Noble and Good," composed in 1823, rearranged for solo voices and chorus by Walter Damrosch and conducted by Albert Stoessel, conductor of the Oratorio society. Then followed the last of the Beethoven piano sonatas, opus 111, which was played in his well-known authoritative and musicianly manner by Harold Bauer, the celebrated pianist.

After the intermission, the chorus, assembled on the stage, some 300 mixed voices the vocal soloists and the orchestra combined in the performance of Beethoven's ninth and last symphony, with choral finale, on Schiller's "Ode to Joy."

Mr. Damrosch read the work more in its classic style than with any sensational interpretations of his own, ar his manner was dignified and forma The vocal soloists were adequate if n brilliant. We have heard Richa Crooks and Frederick Patton with ou own choral societies, and their parts the finale were well taken care of.

Carnegie hall was filled with a lar musical audience.

The Boston symphony orchestra wi Pierre Monteux, conductor, came for i biweekly pair of concerts to the sar hall last evening and gave the first two concerts to another large audien of music lovers, presenting a Moza symphony, the Sibelius violin concert in which Richard Burgin, concert ma ter, played the solo, and Stravinsk "Le Sacre du Printemps," which h not been heard in Chicago as yet.

The Mozart "Jupiter" symphony w played with translucent clarity, with f ent technical ease and with stric formal musical rendition. While the were a few moments when the ensembl was not entirely perfect in the rapic parts of the work, the tone was refined and beautiful in quality. Mr. Burgin presented the Sibelius concerto with a firm grasp of its mechanical and musical problems. The audience gave him enthusiastic applause and recalled him a number of times.

The piece of the day of course was Igor Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring," which is styled "Pictures of Pagan Russia," in two parts, originally written for a ballet, first produced in Paris in 1913 by the Diaghilev ballet with scenery and costumes. It is in two parts and has an elaborate program to accompany its performance. The Boston orchestra disclosed its remarkable instrumental resources in the rendition of this very decidedly futuristic, impressionistic composition, dissociated from the scenery and the choreography.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
6 192

STRAVINSKY AT LAST

His "Rites of Spring" to Be Played Here Next Week

Next Thursday evening, January 31, and Saturday afternoon, February 2, in Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its third pair of concerts of the New York season.

On Thursday Pierre Monteux will conduct for the first time in New York Stravinsky's notable score, "The Rites of Spring." The soloist will be Richard Burgin, the concertmaster of the orchestra, who will appear in the violin concerto of Sibelius in D minor. The opening number will be Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony.

The Saturday afternoon concert will have as soloist Alexander Siloti, the noted Russian pianist. This foremost of the pupils of Liszt will play the piano part in his former master's score, "The Dance of Death," a paraphrase on the "Dies Irae." Pierre Monteux will conduct four orchestral numbers from Debussy's music to d'Annunzio's play, "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian." The symphony of the afternoon will be the sixth of Beethoven (Pastoral).

When Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring" was first performed in Paris (1913) by M. Monteux there was such a row that the police had to be called in. The composer managed to escape after his hat was smashed. The work is called "A Tableau of Pagan Russia." Nicholas Roerich describes the ritual gesticulations of the "Adolescents," who welcome the advant of spring. One of them, a young girl, is chosen for immolation. She performs a wild dance, which increases in ecstasy until she falls from exhaustion. As the curtain falls her rigid form is held aloft by a group of youths.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
EAGLE

WITH THE ORCHESTRAS

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Pierre Monteux, who was the pioneer in the introduction of Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" in Paris, on which occasion a riot necessitated the calling in of the police, will conduct the composer's orchestral suite from this score at the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall, which will take place on Jan. 31 and Feb. 2. This will be the first performance in New York and will take place at the Thursday concert. A feature of the Saturday concert will be Debussy's suite from his incidental music to D'Annunzio's mystery play, "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian." The soloist of the Thursday concert will be Richard Burgin, the concertmaster of the Orchestra, appearing in Sibelius' violin concerto. Mozart's symphony in C major will also be played. The soloist of the Saturday concert will be Alexander Siloti, appearing with the orchestra in Liszt's "Danse Macabre."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
ROCHESTER
N. Y.
TIMES UNION
1924

New York heard for the first tim on last Thursday Stravinsky's wide discussed "Le Sacre du Printemps which Pierre Monteux and the Bostc Symphony Orchestra presented. M Monteux was the conductor of t historic first performance of "T Rites of Spring" in Paris with th Diaghileff ballet on May 29, 1923, on which occasion the audience brok into an uproar, although the orchestra and dancers kept valiantly on to the end. Things were thrown and the police intervened. In New York on Thursday the audience greeted th work with thunderous applause, according to Deems Taylor, who says of it in the World:—"It is music of almost unbelievable complexity of orchestral texture, yet essentially as stark and primitive in outline as the wall pictures of a cave-man. It is not beautiful, in any external sense of the word: but it has a power and truth that strikes deep, that awakens age-old emotions and desires, almost terrifying in their unfamiliarity. This is great music." It was given for th first time in America in 1922 at concert in Philadelphia by the Philadelphia Orchestra, Leopold Stokowsk conducting, and Mr. Monteux intro duced it last week in Boston. "Th Rites" was led by Eugene Goosse in London some time ago and w hailed as one of his most notable co ductorial achievements.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
BROOKLYN
N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

Brooklyn would undoubtedly have preferred, had the choice been granted, to have heard Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printempts," given by Pierre Monteux at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening. But instead Mr. Monteux, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last night, treated the ears and imagination of the audience to the lesser novelty of three excerpts from Ravel's "Daphinis et Chloe,' a Nocturne, Interlude and War Dance. These were preceded by Beethoven's "Pastorale" symphony and followed by Liszt's "Dance of Death" (for piano and orchestra), with Alexander Siloti the soloist. Dvorak's "Carnival" overture was closing number.

The audience was large and the programme pleasing, though offering nothing of special moment insofar as critical comment is concerned. The Boston Orchestra's next concert here will be on March 14. This series is held under the auspices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE ROCHESTER
N. Y.
TIMES UNION
1924

The Boston Symphony orchestra under Pierre Monteux, recently playe Vincent d'Indy's "Symphony on Mountainer Air," with Mr. Schmitz the piano. The Boston Transcri remarked at the time: "Wagner h been dead three years when d'In wrote this, but it is fresh and vi and shows no sign of age."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
FEB 3 1924

ORCHESTRA POOLS MAY END DEFICITS

Backers of Symphony Organizations Discuss Big Business Methods, Including Mergers.

LOSING $1,250,000 A YEAR

Results of a Conference at Clarence H. Mackay's Home to Be Announced Soon.

Clarence H. Mackay and prominent patrons of the leading symphony orchestras of the United States met last night at the home of Mr. Mackay, 3 East Seventy-fifth Street, to discuss plans for putting the organizations on a sound financial basis. At the meeting figures showing that the deficits of the symphony societies amounted to approximately $1,250,000 annually were presented for the consideration of Mr. Mackay's guests.

The application of big business methods, including mergers and pools was among the proposals the patrons of symphony were asked to consider and express an opinion on as a means of solving the financial problem.

An announcement following the meeting, among other things, said:

"During the dinner there was informal discussion of the various problems now confronting the various orchestra associations, foremost among them being the question of annual deficits and endowments. It was brought to the attention of the Presidents that the annual deficits of the thirteen orchestras in the United States approximated $1,250,000 on an annual expenditure of not less than $5,000,000."

Remedies to Be Announced.

Mr. Mackay was unable last night to go into the details of the proposed remedies considered by his guests and himself. His spokesman said that Mr. Mackay hoped to disclose within a few days the results of the conference somewhat more in detail.

Following a dinner, there was a reception and a musical program, at which the artists were Mme. Wanda Landowska, harpsichordist, and Jacques Thibaud, violinist.

Among those present were Alexander Van Rensselaer and William J. Turner of the Philadelphia Orchestra Association, Henry Harkness Flagler of the Symphony Society of New York, Charles H. Hamill of the Orchestral Association, Chicago; William H. Murphy of the Detroit Symphony Society; Elbert L. Carpenter of the Orchestral Association, Minneapolis, Minn.; George Todd of the Rochester Symphony Society, Louis T. More of the Orchestra Association, Cincinnati, Ohio; Melville Clark of the Syracuse Symphony Orchestra, representatives of the Cleveland Orchestra and the Philharmonic Orchestra of Los Angeles, Frederic A. Juilliard, Otto H. Kahn and Marshall Field of the Philharmonic Society of New York and Kenneth O'Brien.

Boston Not Represented.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was not represented among the guests of Mr. Mackay. Judge Frederick P. Cabot, principal guarantor of that organization, sent his declination after having looked over the agenda of the conference which was attached to the invitation sent out by the Chairman of the Philharmonic. In the agenda was included the question of dealing with unions. That question is one which was disposed of by the Boston organization in establishing the open shop.

Another proposal among those outlined for discussion was an exchange of libraries. From that phase of the contemplated reorganization of the symphony orchestras management the Bostonians are said to have wished to keep aloof, since they possess one of the most complete libraries of musical scores in the world, which they are not desirous of distributing in one way or another among more than a dozen different organizations. The Boston Symphony backers also are said to have found it undesirable to join in the discussion from the point of view of joint engagement of soloists.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, at its matinee yesterday in Carnegie Hall was heard by several of the visiting symphony orchestra presidents and other officers invited here by Mr. Mackay.

While the presidents of the Symphony organizations were threshing out their problems at the home of Mr. Mackay, the managers of the same orchestras were the guests of Arthur Judson, manager of the Philharmonic, at a dinner at the Waldorf-Astoria, where they considered their particular problems.

Under leadership of Clarence H. Mackay the Philharmonic Society of New York, the oldest symphony organization in the United States and said to be the third oldest in the world, was consolidated three years ago with the National Symphony Orchestra, whose financial backers and musicians went over to the Philharmonic. At the beginning of the present season it joined forces with the City Symphony Orchestra.

Increasing Cost of Production.

To the deficits of the symphony organizations the high cost of musical talent contributes no less than generally rising prices that followed the war. Conductors are paid salaries comparable to those received by the heads of large industrial organizations. The pay of musical talent has increased all along the line. In another connection the contrast between the musician of today and of two decades gone by was described in one of the announcements of the Philharmonic Orchestra last Fall. Among other things it said:

"The orchestra musician of twenty years ago would be amazed if he were to stand at the Fifty-sixth Street entrance to Carnegie Hall today and count the Philharmonic players who come to rehearsal in their own motor cars. A casual observer noticed one morning a Studebaker, Maxwell, Oakland, Chevrolet, Nash, Reo, Dort, Hudson, Essex and a Packard bringing to rehearsal a bass player, a viola, horn, another horn, trumpet, trombone, violin, 'cello, second violin player—until the observer had to leave an unfinished symposium in prosperity awheel, with about seventy men unaccounted for. In his count, however, about thirty were included, making the tally a motor car to every three musicians. In every case, however, the player was his own chauffeur."

Bird's-eye View of Situation.

The deficits of some of the leading symphony orchestras have been assumed in years past and still are met by single guarantors. In other cases the deficits are wiped out by groups of guarantors or public subscription. The following list gives a bird's-eye view of the situation:

Boston Symphony—In programs last month 500 subscribers to this year's deficit of $95,000 were named.

Philharmonic—Originally organized in 1842 as a co-operative society of players, reorganized in the present century, absorbed National Symphony three years ago, absorbed City Symphony last year, also joined educational program with Mrs. E. H. Harriman's American Orchestral Society.

New York Symphony—Harry Harkness Flagler, sole guarantor last ten years of $100,000 annual deficit. He wiped out the $250,000 deficit the year the New York Symphony Orchestra went abroad.

Philadelphia Orchestra—Raised endowment fund two years ago when streets of its home city were placarded with, "Save the Orchestra," and when Edward Bok gave largest sum, reported to be $100,000, to the orchestra association, of which he is now President.

Syracuse—Newest orchestra, formed by musicians, led by Professor William Berwald of Syracuse University; gives five noon-hour concerts, Keith's Theatre, largest in Syracuse, and house is always sold out.

Rochester—George Eastman, kodak manufacturer, founder and sole guarantor.

Cleveland—Popular subscription.

Cincinnati—Mrs. C. P. Taft, chief guarantor.

Detroit—Subscription by wealthy citizens.

Chicago—Founded by Theodore Thomas thirty-three years ago, and has general support.

Minneapolis—Its deficits are met almost entirely by one guarantor.

St. Louis—Raised $300,000 last year.

Los Angeles—W. A. Clark Jr. gave $543,000 in three years and still guarantees deficit.

San Francisco—Launched a drive last year for funds with which to make possible the continuance of the orchestra.

A survey of the United States has shown that there are approximately 100 cities of the same size as Syracuse which under proper leadership and with the financial aid of citizens could organize symphony orchestras among the musicians of moving picture and legitimate theatre and other organizations where musicians are employed.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
TELEGRAM
New York City

Debussy's "Sebastian" at the Boston Symphony

Beethoven, Debussy and Liszt made up the program of the Boston Symphony concert yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The "Pastoral" symphony, one of the loveliest pieces of descriptive music in existence, was beautifully played. Excerpts from "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian," by Debussy for the chance of hearing which again after too long an interval one must be exceedingly grateful to Pierre Monteux—followed, in vivifying contrast.

The notes of the learned Philip Hale in the book of the concert added nothing to the clarity of one's understanding of the great master's little excursion into the country; it could not be done. For Debussy's "Saint Sebastian," written for the much more definite purpose of exemplifying the action and pantomime of d'Annunzio's mystery play, clarity of programmatic annotation was unattainable and unwanted.

Probably few people who heard these excerpts yesterday had ever seen and heard the mystery play—their misfortune, not their fault—so that they could not see again the episodes of Saint Sebastian's life and death, as one, for instance, listening to the Fire Music from "Die Walkuere" recalls and sees again the smoke-encircled Bruennhilde among her stage rocks. It was not necessary. Debussy's "Saint Sebastian" itself hung before them—a great rich tapestry of pure sound.

Tawdry by comparison seemed Liszt's "Dance of Death," a paraphrase of the "Dies Irae" for piano and orchestra, well played though it was by Alexander Siloti at the piano.

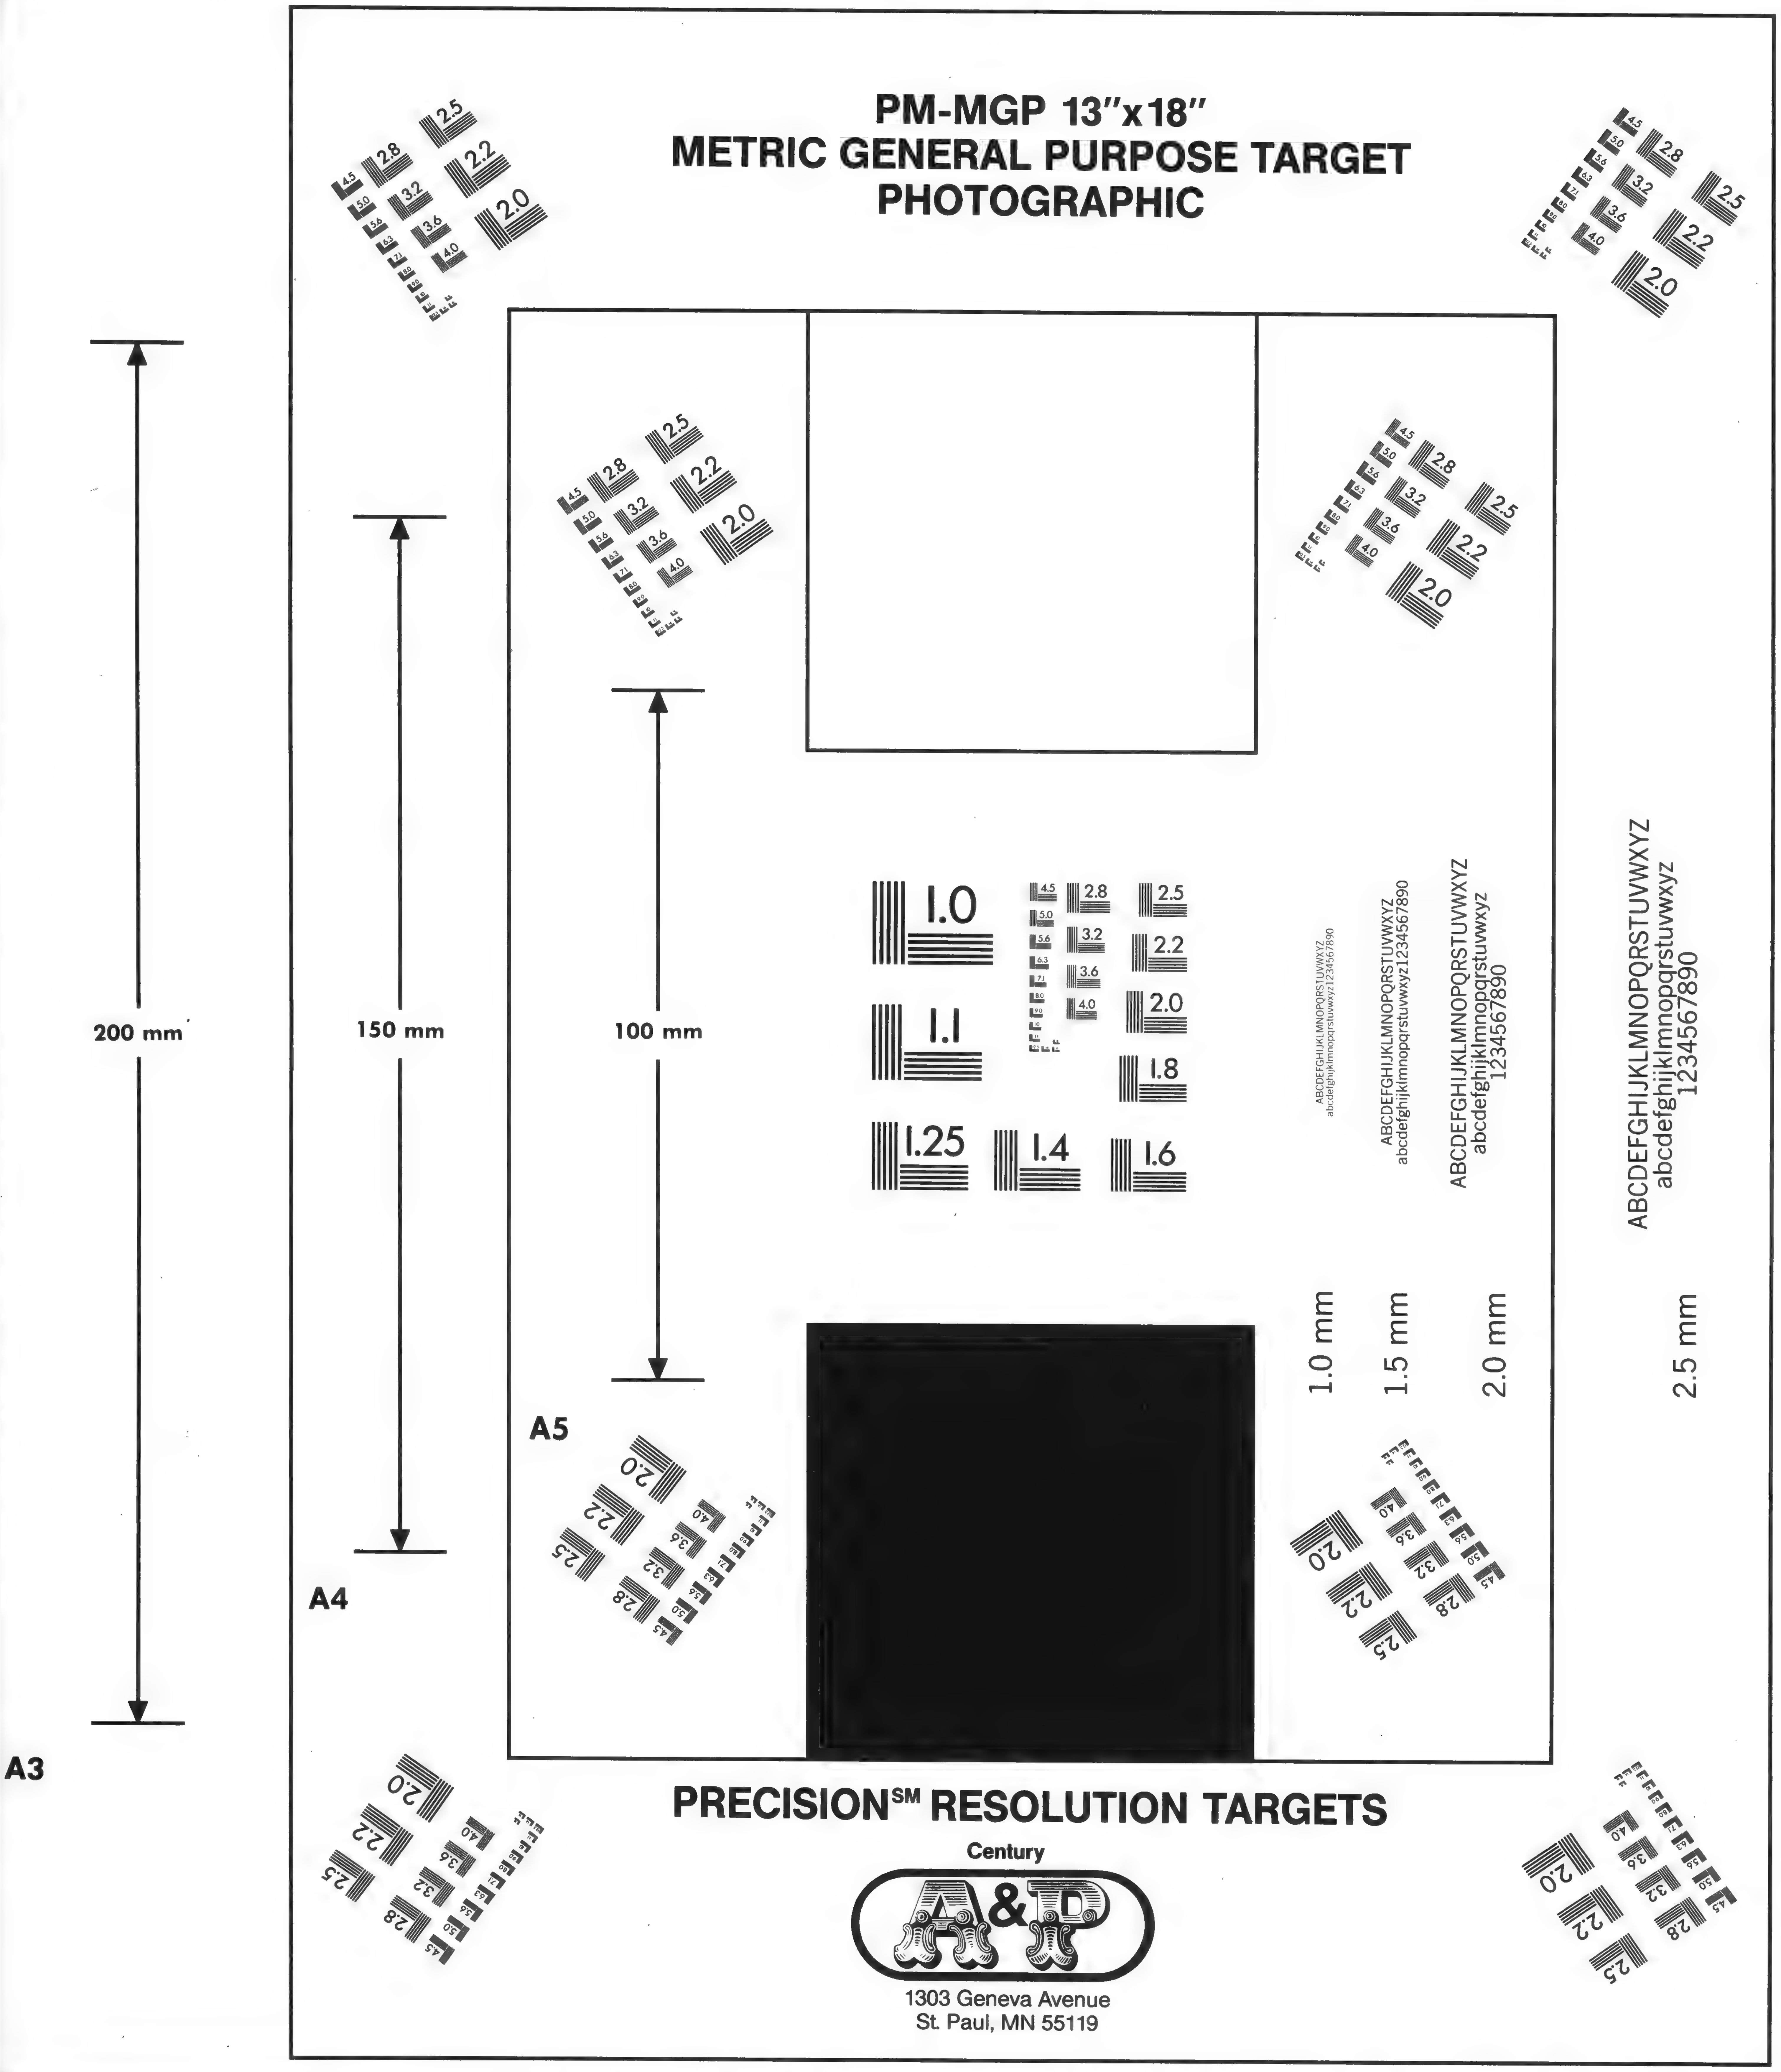
[191]

REDUCTION

RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A3
A4
A5
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
1.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
1.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
2.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
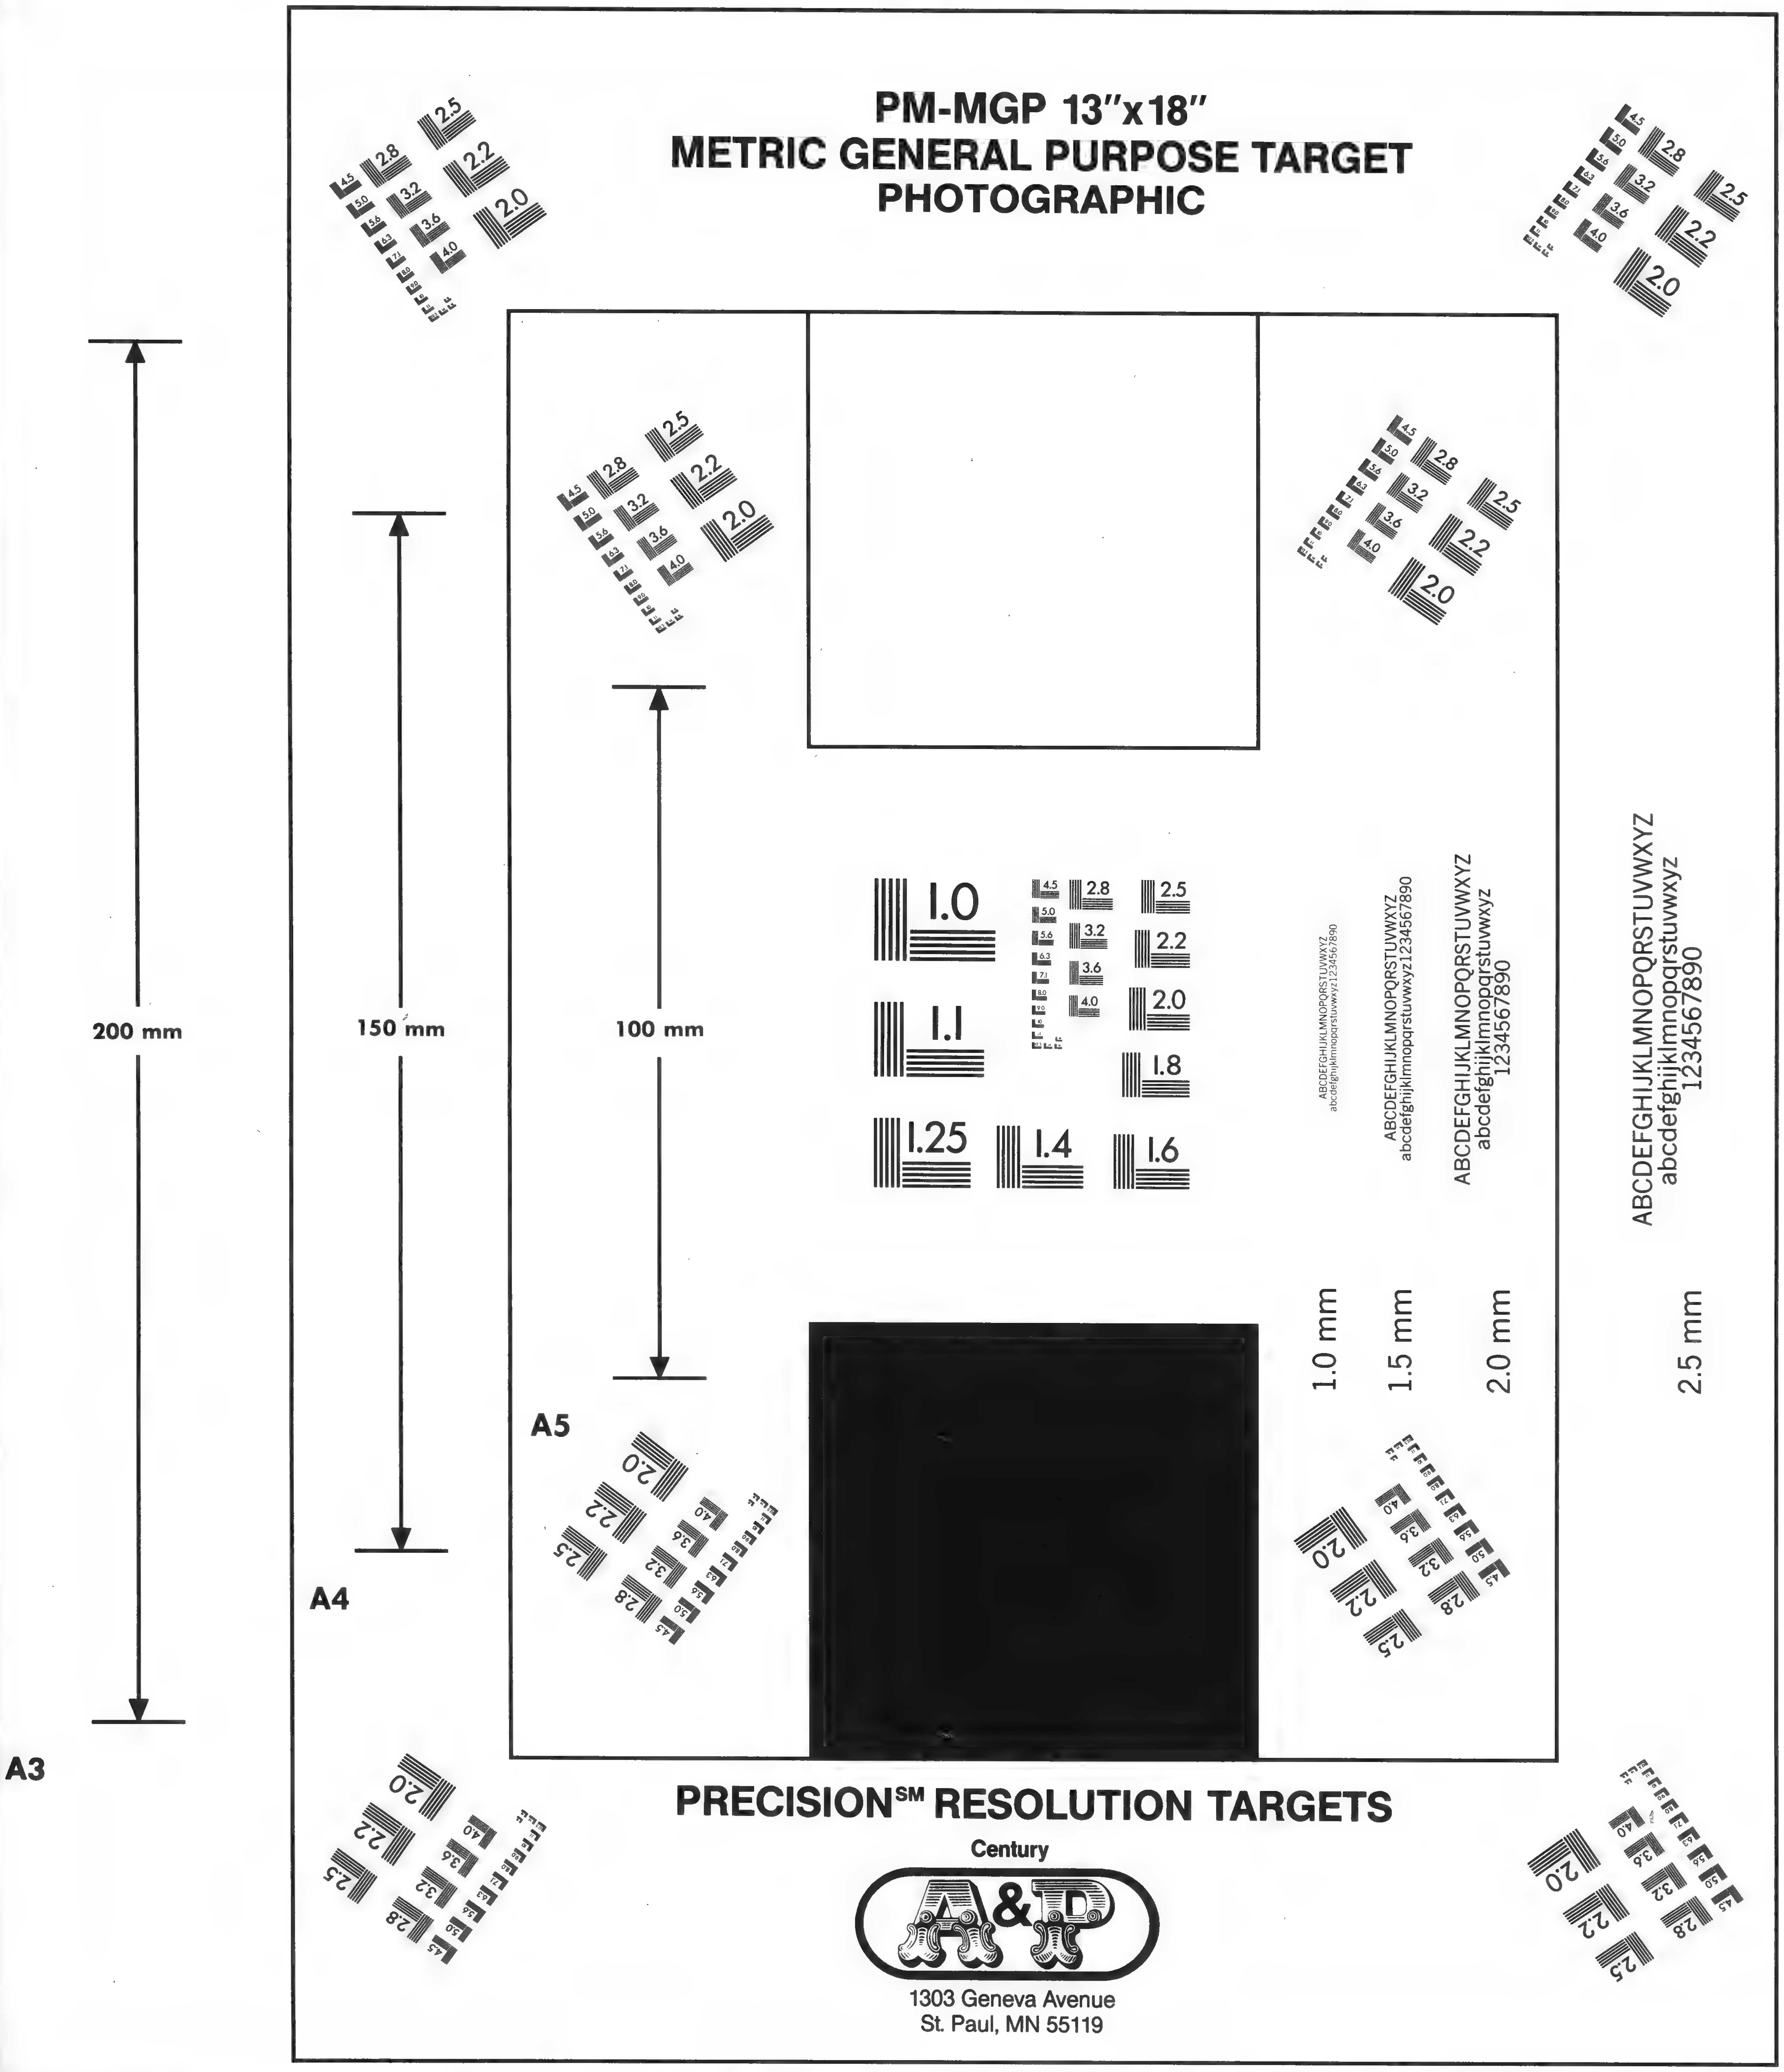
2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

REDUCTION
RATIO
13x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A3
A4
A5
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
8.0
9.0
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ORK
MES

EB 3 1924

EB 3 1924
GRAM
York City

"Sebastian" at Boston Symphony

Debussy and Liszt made up of the Boston Symphony afternoon in Carne-
"Pastoral" symphony,
t pieces of descriptive existence, was beautifully from "The Martyrdom
" by Debussy—for the which again after too e must be exceedingly Monteux—followed, in

e learned Philip Hale concert added nothing one's understanding of little excursion into uld not be done. For ebastian," written for finite purpose of ex-action and pantomime of mystery play, clarity of tation was unattainpeople who heard these had ever seen and play—their misfor-fault—so that they gain the episodes of life and death, as listening to the Fire Walkuere" recalls and oke-encircled Bruennstage rocks. It was ebussy's "Saint Sebasbefore them—a great pure sound.

parison seemed Liszt's
," a paraphrase of the piano and orchestra,
gh it was by Alexander
no.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From FEB 2-1924
Evening Sun
New York City

Wintry Blasts and Spring Sacrifices of This Modern World of Universal Music

Post-Impressions of the Stravinsky Masterpiece, Its Philosophical and Orchestral Tidings; Operatic and Symphonic Events of a Week Ahead.

By GILBERT W. GABRIEL.

All yesterday, after a night's sleep that rocked with tribal drum beats, deep mutterings of the resurgent earth, the lightning scream of piccolos, the spurt of the "rape guero," we went shuffling unconsciously through the antics of an unforgettable "Sacre du Printemps. Times Square and its massed inhabitants performed in ceremonial frenzy at the feet of towering lithic gods who saw nothing out of their thousands of square, glassy eyes. A trip hammer, buffeting away its life against some girders overhead, gave us the rhythm of it, and the ironic ecstacy. For thus did Stravinsky, on Thursday night of the week, strip us all of shirt fronts and send us out so many Calibans.

Such large treatises had been written concerning this now famous novelty, even before Mr. Monteux and his Boston Symphony introduced it to us, little was left to be said afterward. And the best of that little has already been said by our betters. But in our first review of it we did keep dutifully far—as far as possibe—from any but its actually musical aspects. Second thoughts on it, even though they risk dull redundance, may earn the right to play with the fire of this great ballet's drama and philosophy.

Yet those who chanced to see the Diaghileff troupe perform the "Sacre du Printemps" in Paris sometimes say that these orgiastic visualizations of it there seemed totally unnecessary to the music did not come from the idea"—might and mystery. Stravinsky himself claimed, in the manner of several other eminent composers of the day, that his music was constructed objectively, not descriptively. He warns us that "the idea came from the music; the music did not come from the idea"—and here, this once, the protest may be taken at full value. For here is music its own master. Blood brother it may be of all the arts that join with it in ballet—but elder brother, head of the house, and always master.

There is no going behind the music's back, then, to discuss the picturesqueness of its application. The picturesqueness is the music's own. Such a performis the music's own. Such a performance as Thursday night's of it in concert form proved that. No need of prattling, either, of the cruel force of its idea, the pantheistic rapture, the sacramental pageant of its games and dark dances, its throes of human sacrifice. There is the pitiless, physical tread of these things in the accentuated rhythms of the score itself, in its harmonic barbarity, its diatonic countenance criscrossed with thin, sharp, purplish veins of ancient melody. It needs but this music itself to make the scadp of civilization prickle with fears and impulses as old as man. All the thunderous planet turns round and round in the roar to which its orchestration mounts, and steams and drips with sap in turning.

Such concepts as this one—this worship of the dust of old Slavonia by those who tilled it, slept in it, printed their heels on it in patterns of ritualistic dance, patted it, personified it, begged miracles of it, washed down its barrenness with sacrificial blood, the while they moaned to it of the death of their Spring deity and shrieked for her rebirth from it: "Come to life, come to life, has our Kostrubonko! Come to life, to life has our dear one.."—such concepts as this one belong to the Stravinskian day in music. The music of no other day could have embodied them.

The music of no other day would have dared try. Or have wanted to try, perhaps. For here in the gorgeous notes of one Russian is the answer to the gorgeous prose of his contemporary and compatriot, Balmont: "I give myself to the Universal, and the Universal invades me. Stars and valleys and the mountains are near to me. The beautiful and the unbeautiful are near to me."

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK
AMERICAN

FEB 5-1924

* * *

Debussy's symphonic excerpts from "The Martyrdom of San Sebastian" formed the outstanding novel feature of the Boston symphony matinee at Carnegie Hall. It is not of the finest flowering of Debussy's genius, but it is music sufficiently arresting to stimulate the fancy lightly and please the ear mildly.

The orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, played the number exceptionally well.

Beethoven's Sixth, or "Pastoral," Symphony, opened the programme. The soloist of the occasion was Alexander Siloti, who played Liszt's "Dies Irae" paraphrase, known as "The Dance of Death."

It is brilliant and cerebral pianomusic and Siloti made the most of it, with the result that the auditors made the most of him.

* * *

(Other Remedies May Disappoint)

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE ROANOKE
VA.
Times
ISSUE OF
JAN 192

Longs For Reign Of "Absolute" Music

When the Boston Symphony recently announced program for its concert in New York which was scheduled for last Thursday evening, Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps," was included. With this as a text, Mr. Henderson, of the New York Herald, rises again to the subject of modern music and particularly music that has to be programmed for any sort of an understanding:

Mr. Henderson is one who holds that the modernists must be heard and has hopes that some day the movement will bear luscious fruit, although he holds that about all the "windfalls" he has tasted were a little bitter around the core and the meat of poor grain.

Speaking of the wish for Absolute music, Mr. Henderson says:

> Some day there will arise a mighty master who will proclaim to the world the true gospel of this loftiest of the arts—that it needs no aid from literature or painting, vocal vociferation or pantomime, but that it is a proud and independent creation of the human mind, capable of forming and uttering its own message of incomparable beauty.
>
> When that time comes, as come it surely will, the whole shop full of manikins and tinsel costumes and silly literature twaddle will be hurled violently down a steep place into the sea. Music will be rid of the shams which have wrapped themselves about her lovely limbs and she will once more stride forth into the sunlight robed in all her own naked beauty. The ugliness and the posturings and the spoutings and pretendings will all be gone and music will be just music, heavenly made, and nothing else.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK
HERALD

FEB 5-1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Varied Program Is Given at Carnegie Hall.

The Boston Symphony gave a program of varied fare in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. Mr. Monteux's musical excursions ranged the plane of existence from the serene retreats of nature through the mystical realms of the human spirit to the triumph of eternal death. His offerings consisted of Beethoven's sixth symphony, four excerpts from Claude Debussy's music for Gabriele d'Annunzio's tragedy "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian" and Liszt's rather seldom played but familiar "Dance of Death," a paraphrase on the "Dies Irae," for piano with orchestra. Alexander Siloti was the soloist.

Mr. Siloti's performance was brilliant, finely tempered and intelligent. It revealed his thorough understanding of the master's work. His tone was often hard and his touch lacked resiliency. Yet these very qualities

---

106-110 SEVENTH
NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From -1924
JOURNAL
Providence, R. I.

* * *

In the quarterly bulletin of the Pub Library for January is a list of "P gramme music of the season." Since t bulletin went to press, the library nounces, the following music, which been given by the Boston Symphony O chestra in Symphony Hall this season, be been added: Concerto for violoncello, b Boccherini; Concerto in A-minor for viol and violoncello with orchestra, op. 102, Brahms; "Polyeucte" (overture to Co neille's tragedy) by Dukas; "The Sirens symphonic poem, op. 33, by Gliere; Co certo grosso No. 6, in C-minor, by Ha del; "Second episode from Lenau's 'Fau (Mephisto waltz)," by Liszt; "T Waltz; a Choregraphic Poem," by Ra "Old Dances and Airs for the Lute," Respighi; Symphony in E-minor, No. op. 39, by Sibelius; and "Le Sacre Printemps," by Stravinsky.

* * *

ROCHESTER
NEW YORK
JOURNAL

FEB 4-1924

Propose Merging of Orchestras at New York Session

Suggestion that big business merger methods may be necessary to stop growing orchestra deficits is being considered by several Rochester men in conjunction with other prominent patrons of the leading symphony orchestras of the United States at a meeting in New York. George W. Todd, Albert Coates, conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra; Arthur M. See, secretary of the Eastman School of Music, and Eric Thatcher Clarke, manager of the Eastman Theater, are among those who are attending the conference.

It was announced that the annual deficits of the thirteen orchestras in the United States approximated $1,250,000 on an annual expendliture of no less than $5,000,000.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is not represented at the meeting, supposedly because the program called for a discussion of unions and a suggestion that a circulating library be established among the symphony orchestras of the country. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has established the open shop and is said to oppose the library plan because it has one of the finest musical libraries in the United States.

One reason given for the deficit of the orchestras was the increased cost of production and the fact that many orchestra leaders now are receiving salaries comparable to those given captains of industry. Even players are establishing comfortable incomes by their efforts, it was said.

THIS CLIPPING FROM N Y Post

FEB 4-1924

WAGNER SCORES AT METROPOLITAN

Revival of "Siegfried" Arouses Enthusiasm—Star Cast Gives Satisfaction

OTHER WEEK-END MUSIC

By HENRY T. FINCK

The revival of Wagner's "Siegfried" a the Metropolitan on Saturday was th gala event of the whole opera season. A packed audience listened with bate breath as the dramatic and musical wonders of this the greatest of Wagner' operas (that is, of all operas) were unfolded, and at the end there was a grea demonstration of applause, heightened b the gloriously emotional singing of Florence Easton in the love duo with Siegfried Taucher, who had climbed throug the volcanic fires to awaken with a lon kiss the virgin Bruennhilde after h long sleep. What a joy to hear once mo in this great part a genuine soprano i stead of a screwed-up contralto trying force her voice to the high C at the fir climax. Mme. Easton has seldom ris to such heights of opulent and emotion singing as she did on this occasion. S is growing in artistic stature from ye to year—nay from month to month.

An Excellent Cast Presented

The whole cast was excellent relecting great honor on Manager Gatti-Casazza, while the orchestra under Bodanzky did its best—a very good best indeed—to reveal the glories of Wagner's miraculously inspired score. Mr. Taucher was reported to be suffering from a cold. If he was it was a mighty good thing for he sang better than at any time last year. His Siegfried did not dim memories of Max Alvary or Jean de Reszke, but it was an enjoyable impersonation.

All fears that the hideous malicious, odious Nibelung dwarfs, Alberich and Mime, would never have justice done them after the retirement of Goritz and Reiss were dispelled by the really admirable vociferations (no real singing is expected of them: Wagner was sometimes a twentieth century futurist) of Gustav Schutzendorff and George Meader. Their quarrel over the dragon's gold was in true caveman style, they were, literally, cavemen): Alberich fairly jumped on Mime with both feet; and how detestably mean and nasty Meader was to poor Siegfried who, thanks o having tasted the dragon's blood, read is though of "why, I memely want to chop ff your head after I have given you a rugged drink after your sword has slain he dragon." In details there is much yet or Mr. Meader to learn. His "Siegfried nd Fafner, Fafner und Siegfried, O raechten beide sich um" was not half as telligible and maliciously forceful as Reiss made it.

It will be better, no doubt, next time. And Miss Sabanieva will learn to sing the forest bird's song in a more telling way.

Whitehill's Wanderer Superb

Whitehill never sang any of the Wotans as superbly as he did the Wanderer on this occasion. He and Meader made the question scene—which sums up the Rheingold story about dwarfs, giants, and gods—actually seem too short—quite an achievement. And Marguerite Matzenauer deserves credit for taking the short role of Erda—short but grand in its music.

Concerning the Fafner of William Gustavson I was going to add a pleasant word, but refrain because he neglected a detail which is of great importance. When the hero, after stabbing the big brute, tells him "Siegfried I am called," the dragon should rise on its haunches and in loud tones of agonized surprise echo the word "Siegfried!"

As done at the Wagner festival in Bayreuth in 1876, which I attended, according to Wagner's special directions, that final word was thrilling. At the "Siegfried" performances under Seidl that tradition was preserved. Mr. Bodanzky would earn the gratitude of Wagner fans by restoring this impressive detail.

The Fight With the Dragon

The fight with the dragon might be made more gruesome. More of the monster's body should be shown, and the brush which stupidly hides him should be removed. I had a boy of nine with me on Saturday; he enjoyed the opera immensely, but did wish he could see more of the dragon. Also, he wondered why, in the second act, the bird which tells Siegfried about the maiden lying [illegible] are important, not only to boys of nine, but also to men who like this writer have heard "Siegfried" fifty times. I herewith swear solemnly that I was as deeply moved and thrilled by this music and the poetic, exciting play as when I first heard it forty-eight years ago. One of things scenic that gave me most pleasure was the volcanic fire which looms up in the background as Siegfried begins to climb the mountain, after shattering the impeding spear of Wotan, king of gods. It's a great story, ladies and gentlemen, and the music is immortal.

A Strange Novelty

While Walter Damrosch added Chopin's funeral march, or the dirge part of it, to his Aeolian Hall concert yesterday, as a tribute to Woodrow Wilson, Josef Stransky needed no dirge except the doleful opening and closing parts of the Pathetic Symphony which was on his program. Ossip Gabrilowitsch gave a poetic performance of the Schumann concerto and there was a novelty by Bernard Rogers, called Prelude to "The Faithful." It proved to be agreeable music of no epoch-making importance.

An Early Debussy

Beethoven at his most melodious, an earlier Debussy, entirely unsweetened, and sounding more modern than usual because of the somewhat fragmentary nature of the composition, and a danse macabre by Liszt made up the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon, with Alexander Siloti as soloist in the well-known paraphrase of "Dies Irae." The symphony was the Pastoral. The Debussy was

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM ROCHESTER
N. Y.
TIMES UNION

FEB 4-1924

Meeting Regarding Orchestral Deficits Held In New York

Suggestion that big business merger methods may be necessary to stop growing orchestra deficits is being considered by several Rochester men in conjunction with other prominent patrons of the leading symphony orchestras of the United States at a meeting in New York. George W. Todd, Albert Coats, conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra; Arthur M. See, secretary of the Eastman School of Music; and Eric Thatcher Clarke, manager of the Eastman Theater, are among those who are attending the conference.

It has been announced that the annual deficits of the 18 orchestras in the United States approximated $1,250,000 on an annual expenditure of no less than $5,000,000.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is not represented at the meeting, supposedly because the program calls for a discussion of unions and a suggestion that a circulating library be established among the symphony orchestras of the country. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has established the open shop and is said to oppose the library plan because it has one of the finest musical libraries in the United States.

One reason given for the deficit of the orchestras is the increased cost of production and the fact that many orchestra leaders now are receiving salaries comparable to those given captains of industry. The players, too, are earning comfortable incomes by their efforts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES

-1924

George Schneevoigt, the Stockholm conductor, is due on the Adania tomorrow. He will lead the Boston Symphony on March 7 and 8.

The Choral Club of Flushing [illegible] the first large organization [illegible] the music week contests in Queens Borough next week.

19

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BROCKTON
MASS.
ENTERPRISE

FEB 1924

the subject.

...Frederick Tillotson, noted pianist, will appear in the concert here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Feb. 10, and will give Brockton music lovers an opportunity to hear another of the country's best artists. Mr. Tillotson has met with marked success in other large cities of the country.

...Building Inspector Roderick A McKay and Assistant Inspector Walter N. Hard will

G FROM YORK
IMES

FEB 3 1924

FEB 5 1924
GRAM
York City

"Sebastian" at Boston Symphony

Debussy and Liszt made up of the Boston Symphony afternoon in Carne- "The "Pastoral" symphony, liveliest pieces of descriptive existence, was beautifully erpts from "The Martyrdom bastian," by Debussy—for the which again after too one must be exceedingly Monteux—followed, in the learned Philip Hale the concert added nothing one's understanding of ster's little excursion into it could not be done. For Sebastian," written for definite purpose of ex- e action and pantomime of mystery play, clarity of annotation was unattain- wanted.

people who heard these had ever seen and play—their misfor- fault—so that they gain the episodes of life and death, as listening to the Fire Die Walkuere" recalls and smoke-encircled Bruenn- stage rocks. It was Debussy's "Saint Sebasbefore them—a great pure sound. parison seemed Liszt's ," a paraphrase of the piano and orchestra, ough it was by Alexander no.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From FEB 2 - 1924
Evening Sun
New York City

Wintry Blasts and Spring Sacrifices of This Modern World of Universal Music

Post-Impressions of the Stravinsky Masterpiece, Its Philosophical and Orchestral Tidings; Operatic and Symphonic Events of a Week Ahead.

By GILBERT W. GABRIEL.

All yesterday, after a night's sleep that rocked with tribal drum beats, deep mutterings of the resurgent earth, the lightning scream of piccolos, the spurt of the "rape guero," we went shuffling unconsciously through the antics of an unforgettable "Sacre du Printemps. Times Square and its massed inhabitants performed in ceremonial frenzy at the feet of towering lithic gods who saw nothing of their thousands of square, glassy eyes. A trip hammer, buffeting away its life against some girders overhead, ~~gave us the~~ rhythm of it, and the ironic ecstacy. For thus did Stravinsky, on Thursday night of the week, strip us all of shirt fronts and send us out so many Calibans.

Such large treatises had been written concerning this now famous novelty, even before Mr. Monteux and his Boston Symphony introduced it to us, little was left to be said afterward. And the best of that little has already been said by our betters. But in our first review of it we did keep dutifully far—as far as possibe—from any but its actually musical aspects. Second thoughts on it, even though they risk dull redundance, may earn the right to play with the fire of this great ballet's drama and philosophy.

Yet those who chanced to see the Diaghileff troupe perform the "Sacre du Printemps" in Paris sometimes say that these orgiastic visualizations of it there seemed totally unnecessary to the music did not come from the idea"—might and mystery. Stravinsky himself claimed, in the manner of several other eminent composers of the day, that his music was constructed objectively, not descriptively. He warns us that "the idea came from the music; the music did not come from the idea"—and here, this once, the protest may be taken at full value. For here is music its own master. Blood brother it may be of all the arts that join with it in ballet—but elder brother, head of the house, and always master.

There is no going behind the music's back, then, to discuss the picturesqueness of its application. The picturesqueness is the music's own. Such a performis the music's own. Such a performance as Thursday night's of it in concert form proved that. No need of prattling, either, of the cruel force of its idea, the pantheistic rapture, the sacramental pageant of its games and dark dances, its throes of human sacrifice. There is the pitiless, physical tread of these things in the accentuated rhythms of the score itself, in its harmonic barbarity, its diatonic countenance crisscrossed with thin, sharp, purplish veins of ancient melody. It needs but this music itself to make the scadp of civilization prickle with fears and impulses as old as man. All the thunderous planet turns round and round in the roar to which its orchestration mounts, and steams and drips with sap in turning.

Such concepts as this one—this worship of the dust of old Slavonia by those who tilled it, slept in it, printed their heels on it in patterns of ritualistic dance, patted it, personified it, begged miracles of it, washed down its barrenness with sacrificial blood, the while they moaned to it of the death of their Spring deity and shrieked for her rebirth from it: "Come to life, come to life, has our Kostrubonko! Come to life, to life has our dear one.."—such concepts as this one belong to the Stravinskian day in music. The music of no other day could have embodied them.

The music of no other day would have dared try. Or have wanted to try, perhaps. For here in the gorgeous notes of one Russian is the answer to the gorgeous prose of his contemporary and compatriot, Balmont: "I give myself to the Universal, and the Universal invades me. Stars and valleys and the mountains are near to me. The beautiful and the unbeautiful are near to me."

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK
AMERICAN

FEB 5 - 1924

* * *

Debussy's symphonic excerpts from "The Martyrdom of San Sebastian" formed the outstanding novel feature of the Boston symphony matinee at Carnegie Hall. It is not of the finest flowering of Debussy's genius, but it is music sufficiently arresting to stimulate the fancy lightly and please the ear mildly.

The orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, played the number exceptionally well.

Beethoven's Sixth, or "Pastoral," Symphony, opened the programme. The soloist of the occasion was Alexander Siloti, who played Liszt's "Dies Irae" paraphrase, known as "The Dance of Death."

It is brilliant and cerebral pianomusic and Siloti made the most of it, with the result that the auditors made the most of him.

* * *

BE SURE
(Other Romeikes May Disappoint)
THIS CLIPPING FROM THE ROANOKE
VA.
Times
ISSUE OF
JAN 192

Longs For Reign Of "Absolute" Music

When the Boston Symphony recently announced program for its concert in New York which was scheduled for last Thursday evening, Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps," was included. With this as a text, Mr. Henderson, of the New York Herald, rises again to the subject of modern music and particularly music that has to be programmed for any sort of an understanding:

Mr. Henderson is one who holds that the modernists must be heard and has hopes that some day the movement will bear luscious fruit, although he holds that about all the "windfalls" he has tasted were a little bitter around the core and the meat of poor grain.

Speaking of the wish for Absolute music, Mr. Henderson says:

> Some day, there will arise a mighty master who will proclaim to the world the true gospel of this loftiest of the arts—that it needs no aid from literature or painting, vocal vociferation or pantomime, but that it is a proud and independent creation of the human mind, capable of forming and uttering its own message of incomparable beauty.
>
> When that time comes, as come it surely will, the whole shop full of manikins and tinsel costumes and silly literature twaddle will be hurled violently down a steep place into the sea. Music will be rid of the shams which have wrapped themselves about her lovely limbs and she will once more stride forth into the sunlight robed in all her own naked beauty. The ugliness and the posturings and the spoutings and pretendings will all be gone and music will be just music, heavenly made, and nothing else.

—o—

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK
HERALD

FEB 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Varied Program Is Given at Carnegie Hall.

The Boston Symphony gave a program of varied fare in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. Mr. Monteux's musical excursions ranged the plane of existence from the serene retreats of nature through the mystical realms of the human spirit to the triumph of eternal death. His offerings consisted of Beethoven's sixth symphony, four excerpts from Claude Debussy's music for Gabriele d'Annunzio's tragedy "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian" and Liszt's rather seldom played but familiar "Dance of Death," a paraphrase on the "Dies Irae," for piano with orchestra. Alexander Siloti was the soloist.

Mr. Siloti's performance was brilliant, finely tempered and intelligent. It revealed his thorough understanding of the master's work. His tone was often hard and his touch lacked resiliency. Yet these very qualities viction

---

106-110 SEVENTH
NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From - 1924
JOURNAL
Providence, R. I.

* * *

In the quarterly bulletin of the Pub Library for January is a list of "P gramme music of the season." Since t bulletin went to press, the library nounces, the following music, which been given by the Boston Symphony O chestra in Symphony Hall this season, ha been added: Concerto for violoncello, b Boccherini; Concerto in A-minor for viol and violoncello with orchestra, op. 102, Brahms; "Polyeucte" (overture to Co neille's tragedy) by Dukas; "The Sirens symphonic poem, op. 33, by Gliere; Co certo grosso No. 6, in C-minor, by Ha del; "Second episode from Lenau's 'Fau (Mephisto waltz)," by Liszt; "T Waltz: a Choregraphic Poem," by Rav "Old Dances and Airs for the Lute," Respighi; Symphony in E-minor, No. op. 39, by Sibelius; and "Le Sacre Printemps," by Stravinsky.

* * *

ROCHESTER
NEW YORK
JOURNAL

FEB 4 - 1924

Propose Merging of Orchestras at New York Session

Suggestion that big business merger methods may be necessary to stop growing orchestra deficits is being considered by several Rochester men in conjunction with other prominent patrons of the leading symphony orchestras of the United States at a meeting in New York. George W. Todd, Albert Coates, conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra; Arthur M. See, secretary of the Eastman School of Music, and Eric Thatcher Clarke, manager of the Eastman Theater, are among those who are attending the conference.

It was announced that the annual deficits of the thirteen orchestras in the United States approximated $1,250,000 on an annual expendliture of no less than $5,000,000.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is not represented at the meeting, supposedly because the program called for a discussion of unions and a suggestion that a circulating library be established among the symphony orchestras of the country. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has established the open shop and is said to oppose the library plan because it has one of the finest musical libraries in the United States.

One reason given for the deficit of the orchestras was the increased cost of production and the fact that many orchestra leaders now are receiving salaries comparable to those given captains of industry. Even players are establishing comfortable incomes by their efforts, it was said.

THIS CLIPPING FROM N Y Post

FEB 4 - 1924

WAGNER SCORES AT METROPOLITAN

Revival of "Siegfried" Arouses Enthusiasm—Star Cast Gives Satisfaction

OTHER WEEK - END MUSIC

By HENRY T. FINCK

The revival of Wagner's "Siegfried" at the Metropolitan on Saturday was the gala event of the whole opera season. A packed audience listened with bated breath as the dramatic and musical wonders of this the greatest of Wagner's operas (that is, of all operas) were unfolded, and at the end there was a great demonstration of applause, heightened by the gloriously emotional singing of Florence Easton in the love duo with Siegfried Taucher, who had climbed through the volcanic fires to awaken with a long kiss the virgin Bruennhilde after h long sleep. What a joy to hear once mo in this great part a genuine soprano i stead of a screwed-up contralto trying force her voice to the high C at the fir climax. Mme. Easton has seldom ris to such heights of opulent and emotio singing as she did on this occasion. S is growing in artistic stature from ye to year—nay from month to month.

An Excellent Cast Presented

The whole cast was excellent relecting great honor on Manager Gatti-Casazza, while the orchestra under Bodanzky did its best—a very good best indeed—to reveal the glories of Wagner's miraculously inspired score. Mr. Taucher was reported to be suffering from a cold. If he was't was a mighty good thing for he sang better than at any time last year. His Siegfried did not dim memories of Max Alvary or Jean de Reszke, but it was an enjoyable impersonation.

All fears that the hideous malicious, odious Nibelung dwarfs, Alberich and Mime, would never have justice done them after the retirement of Goritz and Reiss were dispelled by the really admirable vociferations (no real singing is expected of them: Wagner was sometimes a twentieth century futurist) of Gustav Schutzendorff and George Meader. Their quarrel over the dragon's gold was in true caveman style, they were, literally, cavemen): Alberich fairly jumped on Mime with both feet; and how detestably mean and nasty Meader was to poor Siegfried who, thanks o having tasted the dragon's blood, read is though of "why, I menely want to chop ff your head after I have given you a rugged drink after your sword has slain he dragon." In details there is much yet or Mr. Meader to learn. His "Siegfried nd Fafner, Fafner und Siegfried, O raechten beide sich um" was not half as ntelligible and maliciously forceful as Reiss made it.

It will be better, no doubt, next time. And Miss Sabanieva will learn to sing the forest bird's song in a more telling way.

Whitehill's Wanderer Superb

Whitehill never sang any of the Wotans as superbly as he did the Wanderer on this occasion. He and Meader made the question scene—which sums up the Rheingold story about dwarfs, giants, and gods—actually seem too short—quite an achievement. And Marguerite Matzenauer deserves credit for taking the short role of Erda—short but grand in its music.

Concerning the Fafner of William Gustavson I was going to add a pleasant word, but refrain because he neglected a detail which is of great importance. When the hero, after stabbing the big brute, tells him "Siegfried I am called," the dragon should rise on its haunches and in loud tones of agonized surprise echo the word "Siegfried!"

As done at the Wagner festival in Bayreuth in 1876, which I attended, according to Wagner's special directions, that final word was thrilling. At the "Siegfried" performances under Seidl that tradition was preserved. Mr. Bodanzky would earn the gratitude of Wagner fans by restoring this impressive detail.

The Fight With the Dragon

The fight with the dragon might be made more gruesome. More of the monster's body should be shown, and the brush which stupidly hides him should be removed. I had a boy of nine with me on Saturday; he enjoyed the opera immensely, but did wish he could see more of the dragon. Also, he wondered why, in the second act, the bird which tells Siegfried about the maiden lying important, not only to boys of nine, but also to men who like this writer have heard "Siegfried" fifty times. I herewith swear solemnly that I was as deeply moved and thrilled by this music and the poetic, exciting play as when I first heard it forty-eight years ago. One of things scenic that gave me most pleasure was the volcanic fire which looms up in the background as Siegfried begins to climb the mountain, after shattering the impeding spear of Wotan, king of gods. It's a great story, ladies and gentlemen, and the music is immortal.

A Strange Novelty

While Walter Damrosch added Chopin's funeral march, or the dirge part of it, to his Aeolian Hall concert yesterday, as a tribute to Woodrow Wilson, Josef Stransky needed no dirge except the doleful opening and closing parts of the Pathetic Symphony which was on his program. Ossip Gabrilowitsch gave a poetic performance of the Schumann concerto and there was a novelty by Bernard Rogers, called Prelude to "The Faithful." It proved to be agreeable music of no epoch-making importance.

An Early Debussy

Beethoven at his most melodious, an earlier Debussy, entirely unsweetened, and sounding more modern than usual because of the somewhat fragmentary nature of the composition, and a danse macabre by Liszt made up the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon, with Alexander Siloti as soloist in the well-known paraphrase of "Dies Irae." The symphony was the Pastoral. The Debussy was

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM ROCHESTER
N. Y.
TIMES UNION

FEB 4 - 1924

Meeting Regarding Orchestral Deficits Held In New York

Suggestion that big business merger methods may be necessary to stop growing orchestra deficits is being considered by several Rochester men in conjunction with other prominent patrons of the leading symphony orchestras of the United States at a meeting in New York. George W. Todd, Albert Coats, conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra; Arthur M. See, secretary of the Eastman School of Music, and Eric Thatcher Clarke, manager of the Eastman Theater, are among those who are attending the conference.

It has been announced that the annual deficits of the 13 orchestras in the United States approximated $1,250,000 on an annual expenditure of no less than $5,000,000.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is not represented at the meeting, supposedly because the program calls for a discussion of unions and a suggestion that a circulating library be established among the symphony orchestras of the country. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has established the open shop and is said to oppose the library plan because it has one of the finest musical libraries in the United States.

One reason given for the deficit of the orchestras is the increased cost of production and the fact that many orchestra leaders now are receiving salaries comparable to those given captains of industry. The players, too, are earning comfortable incomes by their efforts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES

- 1924

George Schneevoight, the Stockholm conductor, is due on the Adania tomorrow. He will lead the Boston Symphony on March 7 and 8.

The Choral Club of Flushing will be the first large organization competing in the music week contests in Queens Borough next week.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BROCKTON
MASS.
ENTERPRISE

FEB 1924

complete report received thus far on the subject.

...Frederick Tillotson, noted pianist, will appear in the concert here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Feb. 10, and will give Brockton music lovers an opportunity to hear another of the country's best artists. Mr. Tillotson has met with marked success in other large cities of the country.

...Building Inspector Roderick A. McKay and Assistant Inspector Walter N. Hardy will then

[192]

ESTABLISHED 1881
From FEB 2 - 1924
Evening Sun
New York City

Wintry Blasts and Spring Sacrifices of This Modern World of Universal Music

Post-Impressions of the Stravinsky Masterpiece, Its Philosophical and Orchestral Tidings; Operatic and Symphonic Events of a Week Ahead.

By GILBERT W. GABRIEL.

All yesterday, after a night's sleep that rocked with tribal drum beats, deep mutterings of the resurgent earth, the lightning scream of piccolos, the spurt of the "rape guero," we went shuffling unconsciously through the antics of an unforgettable "Sacre du Printemps. Times Square and its massed inhabitants performed in ceremonial frenzy at the feet of towering lithic gods who saw nothing out of their thousands of square, glassy eyes. A trip hammer, buffeting away its life against some girders overhead, gave us the rhythm of it, and the ironic ecstacy. For thus did Stravinsky, on Thursday night of the week, strip us all of shirt fronts and send us out so many Calibans.

Such large treatises had been written concerning this now famous novelty, even before Mr. Monteux and his Boston Symphony introduced it to us, little was left to be said afterward. And the best of that little has already been said by our betters. But in our first review of it we did keep dutifully far—as far as possibe—from any but its actually musical aspects. Second thoughts on it, even though they risk dull redundance, may earn the right to play with the fire of this great ballet's drama and philosophy.

Yet those who chanced to see the Diaghileff troupe perform the "Sacre du Printemps" in Paris sometimes say that these orgiastic visualizations of it there seemed totally unnecessary to the music did not come from the idea"—might and mystery. Stravinsky himself claimed, in the manner of several other eminent composers of the day, that his music was constructed objectively, not descriptively. He warns us that "the idea came from the music; the music did not come from the idea"—and here, this once, the protest may be taken at full value. For here is music its own master. Blood brother it may be of all the arts that join with it in ballet—but elder brother, head of the house, and always master.

There is no going behind the music's back, then, to discuss the picturesqueness of its application. The picturesqueness is the music's own. Such a performis the music's own. Such a performance as Thursday night's of it in concert form proved that. No need of prattling, either, of the cruel force of its idea, the pantheistic rapture, the sacramental pageant of its games and dark dances, its throes of human sacrifice. There is the pitiless, physical tread of these things in the accentuated rhythms of the score itself, in its harmonic barbarity, its diatonic countenance crisscrossed with thin, sharp, purplish veins of ancient melody. It needs but this music itself to make the scadp of civilization prickle with fears and impulses as old as man. All the thunderous planet turns round and round in the roar to which its orchestration mounts, and steams and drips with sap in turning.

Such concepts as this one—this worship of the dust of old Slavonia by those who tilled it, slept in it, printed their heels on it in patterns of ritualistic dance, patted it, personified it, begged miracles of it, washed down its barrenness with sacrificial blood, the while they moaned to it of the death of their Spring deity and shrieked for her rebirth from it: "Come to life, come to life, has our Kostrubonko! Come to life, to life has our dear one.."—such concepts as this one belong to the Stravinskian day in music. The music of no other day could have embodied them.

The music of no other day would have dared try. Or have wanted to try, perhaps. For here in the gorgeous notes of one Russian is the answer to the gorgeous prose of his contemporary and compatriot, Balmont: "I give myself to the Universal, and the Universal invades me. Stars and valleys and the mountains are near to me. The beautiful and the unbeautiful are near to me."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE ROANOKE
VA.
Times
ISSUE OF
JAN 3 192

Longs For Reign Of "Absolute" Music

When the Boston Symphony recently announced program for its concert in New York which was scheduled for last Thursday evening, Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps," was included. With this as a text, Mr. Henderson, of the New York Herald, rises again to the subject of modern music and particularly music that has to be programmed for any sort of an understanding:

Mr. Henderson is one who holds that the modernists must be heard and has hopes that some day the movement will bear luscious fruit, although he holds that about all the "windfalls" he has tasted were a little bitter around the core and the meat of poor grain.

Speaking of the wish for Absolute music, Mr. Henderson says:

> Some day there will arise a mighty master who will proclaim to the world the true gospel of this loftiest of the arts—that it needs no aid from literature or painting, vocal vociferation or pantomime, but that it is a proud and independent creation of the human mind, capable of forming and uttering its own message of incomparable beauty.
>
> When that time comes, as come it surely will, the whole shop full of manikins and tinsel costumes and silly literature twaddle will be hurled violently down a steep place into the sea. Music will be rid of the shams which have wrapped themselves about her lovely limbs and she will once more stride forth into the sunlight robed in all her own naked beauty. The ugliness and the posturings and the spoutings and pretendings will all be gone and music will be just music, heavenly made, and nothing else.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD
FEB 3 - 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Varied Program Is Given at Carnegie Hall.

The Boston Symphony gave a program of varied fare in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. Mr. Monteux's musical excursions ranged the plane of existence from the serene retreats of nature through the mystical realms of the human spirit to the triumph of eternal death. His offerings consisted of Beethoven's sixth symphony, four excerpts from Claude Debussy's music for Gabriele d'Annunzio's tragedy "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian" and Liszt's rather seldom played but familiar "Dance of Death," a paraphrase on the "Dies Irae," for piano with orchestra. Alexander Siloti was the soloist.

Mr. Siloti's performance was brilliant, finely tempered and intelligent. It revealed his thorough understanding of the master's work. His tone was often hard and his touch lacked resiliency. Yet these very qualities lent added conviction to his stirring portrayal of the scythe of death. The cadenzas and variations on Liszt's principal theme were beautifully executed.

Yet the lion's share of the honors yesterday afternoon must go to Mr. Monteux and his men.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N Y Post
FEB 4 - 1924

WAGNER SCORES AT METROPOLITAN

Revival of "Siegfried" Arouses Enthusiasm—Star Cast Gives Satisfaction

OTHER WEEK-END MUSIC

By HENRY T. FINCK

The revival of Wagner's "Siegfried" at the Metropolitan on Saturday was the gala event of the whole opera season. A packed audience listened with bated breath as the dramatic and musical wonders of this the greatest of Wagner's operas (that is, of all operas) were unfolded, and at the end there was a great demonstration of applause, heightened by the gloriously emotional singing of Florence Easton in the love duo with Siegfried Taucher, who had climbed through the volcanic fires to awaken with a long kiss the virgin Bruennhilde after her long sleep. What a joy to hear once more in this great part a genuine soprano instead of a screwed-up contralto trying to force her voice to the high C at the final climax. Mme. Easton has seldom risen to such heights of opulent and emotional singing as she did on this occasion. She is growing in artistic stature from year to year—nay from month to month.

An Excellent Cast Presented

The whole cast was excellent relecting great honor on Manager Gatti-Casazza, while the orchestra under Bodanzky did its best—a very good best indeed—to reveal the glories of Wagner's miraculously inspired score. Mr. Taucher was reported to be suffering from a cold. If he was it was a mighty good thing for he sang better than at any time last year. His Siegfried did not dim memories of Max Alvary or Jean de Reszke, but it was an enjoyable impersonation.

All fears that the hideous malicious, odious Nibelung dwarfs, Alberich and Mime, would never have justice done them after the retirement of Goritz and Reiss were dispelled by the really admirable vociferations (no real singing is expected of them: Wagner was sometimes a twentieth century futurist) of Gustav Schutzendorff and George Meader. Their quarrel over the dragon's gold was in true caveman style, they were, literally, cavemen): Alberich fairly jumped on Mime with both feet; and how detestably mean and nasty Meader was to poor Siegfried who, thanks to having tasted the dragon's blood, read his though of "why, I memely want to chop off your head after I have given you a drugged drink after your sword has slain the dragon." In details there is much yet for Mr. Meader to learn. His "Siegfried und Fafner, Fafner und Siegfried, O, rechten beide sich um" was not half as intelligible and maliciously forceful as Reiss made it.

It will be better, no doubt, next time. And Miss Sabanieva will learn to sing the forest bird's song in a more telling way.

Whitehill's Wanderer Superb

Whitehill never sang any of the Wotans as superbly as he did the Wanderer on this occasion. He and Meader made the question scene—which sums up the Rheingold story about dwarfs, giants, and gods—actually seem too short—quite an achievement. And Marguerite Matzenauer deserves credit for taking the short role of Erda—short but grand in its music.

Concerning the Fafner of William Gustavson I was going to add a pleasant word, but refrain because he neglected a detail which is of great importance. When the hero, after stabbing the big brute, tells him "Siegfried I am called," the dragon should rise on its haunches and in loud tones of agonized surprise echo the word "Siegfried!"

As done at the Wagner festival in Bayreuth in 1876, which I attended, according to Wagner's special directions, that final word was thrilling. At the "Siegfried" performances under Seidl that tradition was preserved. Mr. Bodanzky would earn the gratitude of Wagner fans by restoring this impressive detail.

The Fight With the Dragon

The fight with the dragon might be made more gruesome. More of the monster's body should be shown, and the brush which stupidly hides him should be removed. I had a boy of nine with me on Saturday; he enjoyed the opera immensely, but did wish he could see more of the dragon. Also, he wondered why, in the second act, the bird which tells Siegfried about the maiden lying [illegible] are important, not only to boys of nine, but also to men who like this writer have heard "Siegfried" fifty times. I herewith swear solemnly that I was as deeply moved and thrilled by this music and the poetic exciting play as when I first heard it forty-eight years ago. One of things scenic that gave me most pleasure was the volcanic fire which looms up in the background as Siegfried begins to climb the mountain, after shattering the impeding spear of Wotan, king of gods. It's a great story, ladies and gentlemen, and the music is immortal.

A Strange Novelty

While Walter Damrosch added Chopin's funeral march, or the dirge part of it, to his Aeolian Hall concert yesterday, as a tribute to Woodrow Wilson, Josef Stransky needed no dirge except the doleful opening and closing parts of the Pathetic Symphony which was on his program. Ossip Gabrilowitsch gave a poetic performance of the Schumann concerto and there was a novelty by Bernard Rogers, called Prelude to "The Faithful." It proved to be agreeable music of no epochmaking importance.

An Early Debussy

Beethoven at his most melodious, an earlier Debussy, entirely unsweetened, and sounding more modern than usual because of the somewhat fragmentary nature of the composition, and a danse macabre by Liszt made up the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon, with Alexander Siloti as soloist in the well-known paraphrase of "Dies Irae." The symphony was the Pastoral. The Debussy was

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM ROCHESTER
N. Y.
TIMES UNION
FEB 4 - 1924

Meeting Regarding Orchestral Deficits Held In New York

Suggestion that big business merger methods may be necessary to stop growing orchestra deficits is being considered by several Rochester men in conjunction with other prominent patrons of the leading symphony orchestras of the United States at a meeting in New York. George W. Todd, Albert Coats, conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra; Arthur M. See, secretary of the Eastman School of Music, and Eric Thatcher Clarke, manager of the Eastman Theater, are among those who are attending the conference.

It has been announced that the annual deficits of the 13 orchestras in the United States approximated $1,250,000 on an annual expenditure of no less than $5,000,000.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is not represented at the meeting, supposedly because the program calls for a discussion of unions and a suggestion that a circulating library be established among the symphony orchestras of the country. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has established the open shop and is said to oppose the library plan because it has one of the finest musical libraries in the United States.

One reason given for the deficit of the orchestras is the increased cost of production and the fact that many orchestra leaders now are receiving salaries comparable to those given captains of industry. The players, too, are earning comfortable incomes by their efforts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
-1924

George Schneevoigt, the Stockholm conductor, is due on the Adania tomorrow. He will lead the Boston Symphony on March 7 and 8.

The Choral Club of Flushing will be the first large organization competing in the music week contests in Queens Borough next week.

49

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BROCKTON
MASS.
ENTERPRISE
FEB 1924

the subject.

...Frederick Tillotson, noted pianist, will appear in the concert here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Feb. 10, and will give Brockton music lovers an opportunity to hear another of the country's best artists. Mr. Tillotson has met with marked success in other large cities of the country.

...Building Inspector Roderick A. McKay and Assistant Inspector Walter N. Hardy will inspect the

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
AMERICAN
FEB 5 - 1924

* * *

Debussy's symphonic excerpts from "The Martyrdom of San Sebastian" formed the outstanding novel feature of the Boston symphony matinee at Carnegie Hall. It is not of the finest flowering of Debussy's genius, but it is music sufficiently arresting to stimulate the fancy lightly and please the ear mildly.

The orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, played the number exceptionally well.

Beethoven's Sixth, or "Pastoral," Symphony, opened the programme. The soloist of the occasion was Alexander Siloti, who played Liszt's "Dies Irae" paraphrase, known as "The Dance of Death."

It is brilliant and cerebral pianomusic and Siloti made the most of it, with the result that the auditors made the most of him.

* * *

106-110 SEVENTH
NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From - 1924
JOURNAL
Providence, R. I.

* * *

In the quarterly bulletin of the Public Library for January is a list of "Programme music of the season." Since the bulletin went to press, the library announces, the following music, which has been given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall this season, has been added: Concerto for violoncello, by Boccherini; Concerto in A-minor for violin and violoncello with orchestra, op. 102, by Brahms; "Polyeucte" (overture to Corneille's tragedy) by Dukas; "The Sirens," symphonic poem, op. 33, by Gliere; Concerto grosso No. 6, in C-minor, by Handel; "Second episode from Lenau's 'Faust' (Mephisto waltz)," by Liszt; "The Waltz: a Choregraphic Poem," by Ravel; "Old Dances and Airs for the Lute," Respighi; Symphony in E-minor, No. 1, op. 39, by Sibelius; and "Le Sacre du Printemps," by Stravinsky.

* * *

Proposes [illegible] of Orchestras at New York Session

Suggestion that big business merger methods may be necessary to stop growing orchestra deficits is being considered by several Rochester men in conjunction with other prominent patrons of the leading symphony orchestras of the United States at a meeting in New York. George W. Todd, Albert Coates, conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra; Arthur M. See, secretary of the Eastman School of Music, and Eric Thatcher Clarke, manager of the Eastman Theater, are among those who are attending the conference.

It was announced that the annual deficits of the thirteen orchestras in the United States approximated $1,250,000 on an annual expenditure of no less than $5,000,000.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is not represented at the meeting, supposedly because the program called for a discussion of unions and a suggestion that a circulating library be established among the symphony orchestras of the country. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has established the open shop and is said to oppose the library plan because it has one of the finest musical libraries in the United States.

One reason given for the deficit of the orchestras was the increased cost of production and the fact that many orchestra leaders now are receiving salaries comparable to those given captains of industry. Even players are establishing comfortable incomes by their efforts, it was said.

[192]

FEB 3 1924
York City

"Sebastian" at Boston Symphony

Debussy and Liszt made up of the Boston Symphony afternoon in Carne- "Pastoral" symphony, pieces of descriptive was beautifully from "The Martyrdom by Debussy—for the which again after too one must be exceedingly Monteux—followed, in learned Philip Hale concert added nothing understanding of little excursion into not be done. For "bastian," written for purpose of ex- and pantomime of play, clarity of was unattainpeople who heard these had ever seen and play—their misfor- fault—so that they the episodes of life and death, as listening to the Fire "Walkuere" recalls and smoke-encircled Bruenn- stage rocks. It was Debussy's "Saint Sebasbefore them—a great pure sound. seemed Liszt's a paraphrase of the piano and orchestra, it was by Alexander

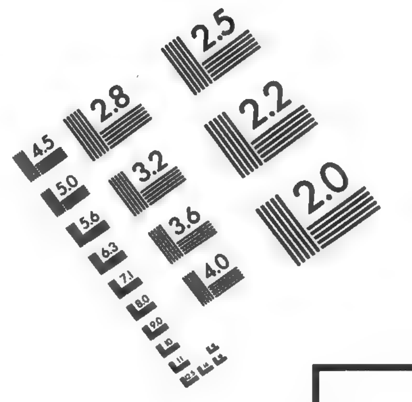
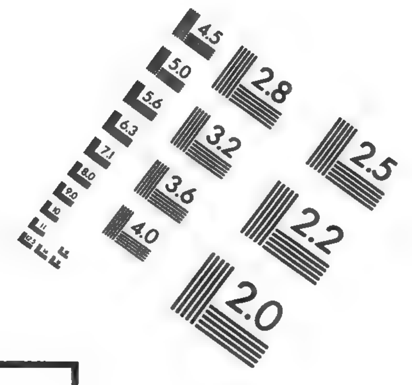
REDUCTION
RATIO
12x

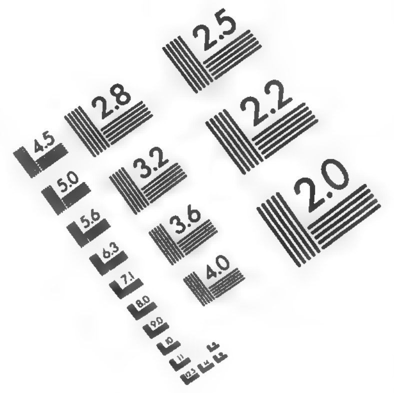
PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



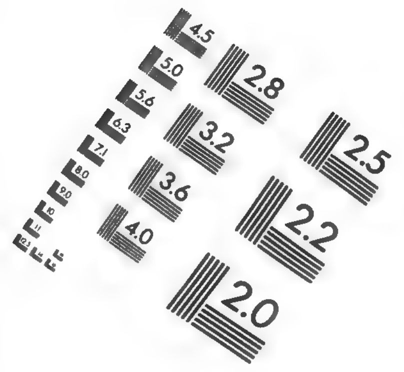
2.5
2.8
2.2
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6



4.5
5.0
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
2.5
2.2
2.0



2.5
2.8
2.2
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3

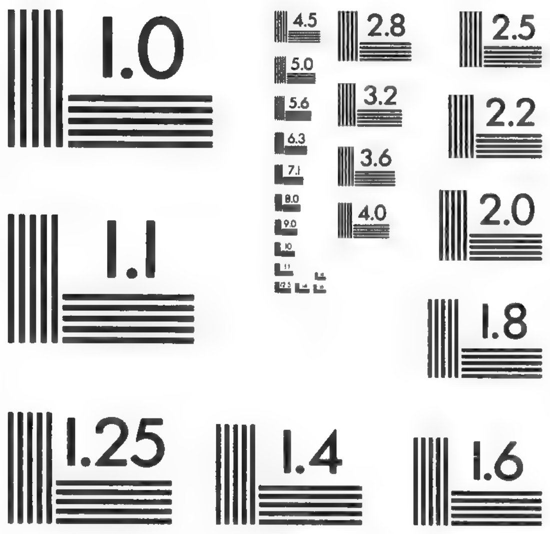


4.5
5.0
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
2.5
2.2
2.0

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm



1.0
4.5
2.8
2.5
5.0
5.6
3.2
2.2
6.3
3.6
4.0
2.0
1.1
1.8
1.25
1.4
1.6

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

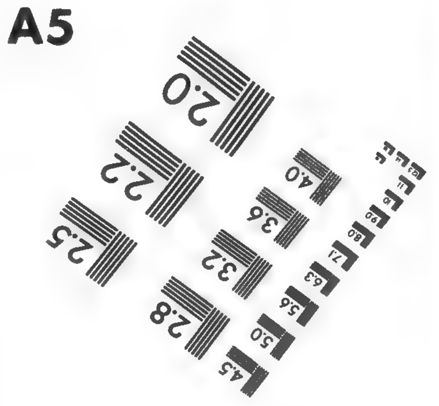
1.0 mm

1.5 mm

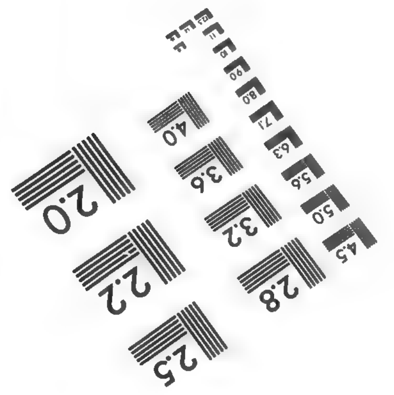
2.0 mm

2.5 mm

A5



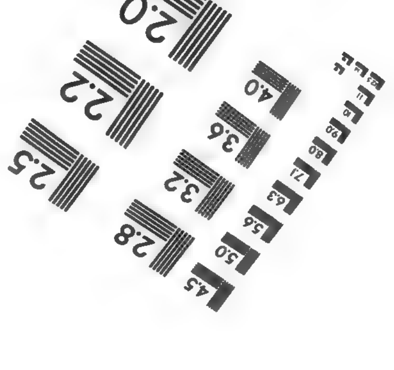
2.0
2.2
2.5
4.0
3.6
3.2
2.8
4.5



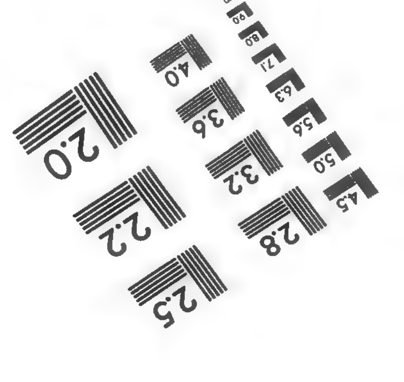
2.0
4.0
3.6
3.2
2.2
2.8
2.5
5.0
4.5

A4

A3



2.0
4.0
2.2
3.6
2.5
3.2
2.8
4.5



4.0
2.0
3.6
5.0
4.5
3.2
2.2
2.8
2.5

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
TELEGRAM
New York City
FEB 6 - 192

Stravinsky and Roland Hayes.

What a Stravinsky season of it we are having! First, Walter Damrosch brought us the Chinese "Nightingale," and played it three times over; next, the International Composers' Guild, with Leopold Stokowski as master of the buck-hounds, hunted down the "Fox"; the Philharmonic did its bit with the newer suite from the "Fire Bird"; and while the town is still ringing with the fame of the Boston Symphony's "Consecration of Spring" last Thursday night, Mr. Stokowski comes over from Philadelphia again and at a regular Carnegie Hall concert of his Philadelphia Orchestra makes known to us New Yorkers the "Symphonies for Wind Instruments to the Memory of Claude Achille Debussy," composed by Stravinsky in 1920 and therefore one of the Russian master's recent works, though not so recent as the "Fox."

Europeans might taunt us again with our lateness in the field. Paris heard the "Consecration of Spring" in May 1913 and London shortly afterwards. The "Nightingale's Song" is almost as old story across the Atlantic. But if belated, we are at least thorough. To Meredith's remark that every dinner table has its topic as every age its reputation might be added the observation that every season has its composer. I only wish one of the busy leagues or guilds would up and give us now "Mavra" and the "Noces."

First of all, a word of definition as to the "Symphonies" player last night. Stravinsky specifically warns that this short piece for three-and twenty instruments—twelve wood-wind; eleven brass—is in no sense a symphony in the ordinary eighteenth and nineteenth century sense of the term, but is a "concordance of sounds" after the meaning of the original Greek word—that is, a sounding together.

The work was performed in London in 1921 and in Paris the following year. In London it was received, acording to Ernest Newman, "with a good deal of laughter and some hisses. Had not Mr. Stravinsky himself been pushed upon the platform at the psychological moment, there would probably have been a demonstration of the sort one rarely sees in an English concert-hall. The composer took the unusual course of publicly blaming the conductor for the bad impression the work had made. Koussevitzky, he said, tried to put expression into the music, whereas it is intended to be played without any old-fashioned nonsense of that sort. This called forth a spirited rejoinder from Koussevitzky, who pointed out that even if he had wanted to put his own interpretation upon the music, he could not have done so, as the little time he had for rehearsing it allowed of no more than just playing it through."

The audience last night did not approach a demonstration, though at first the drastic crowing of clarinets and flutes did evoke some laughter. That soon subsided entirely, but at the end the general attitude of the house could be summed up in the words, "This thing out of the way, now we are going to hear some real music!" for was not the rest of the program devoted to Rimsky-Korsakoff's mellifluous and well-beloved suite, "Scheherazade"? And yet that very suite in question a quarter of a century ago won sneers and contumely from the doubting Thomases of that fin de siecle day.

These memorial "Symphonies" to Debussy invite rather to random considerations than to a definite finality of impression. That, of course, will come in time. For the moment, one recalls the marvellous clarity of the scoring, the passionate emphasis on the timbre and color of the individual instruments. In the musical substance, the Chinese lilting of a familiar nightingale severs the indeterminate darkness of Debussy's own "Pelleas et Melisande"; some hearers remember, too, Ravel, and across the dubious fabric of the new emerges the sober trail of familiar diatonic harmonies.

As a funeral emblem this music has a naked solemnity that is as untutored as the wailing of a child. Some will punish it as a child is punished, but lightly to scoff were dangerous. For Stravinsky is neither untutored nor a child; he is one of the most adroit and masterful of composers, who has perfectly the secret of hiding his revenge among the coming years. The would-be slayers of the "Consecration of Spring" at its Paris "premiere" learned later to bow adoring knees. And so for these "Symphonies" we shall see what we shall see.

The other number on the Philadelphia program last night, besides the "Symphonies" and "Scheherazade," was Ernest Bloch's Hebrew rhapsody "Schelomo" (Solomon) for 'cello and orchestra. Seven years ago I found this work impressive; last night it sounded imitative, eclectic, loosely knit, and unmistakably "dated." Such is the way of the whirling seasons. Mr. Stokowski led an eloquent orchestral performance; Hans Kindler played the solo part with devotion, if little else.

Buffalo Nov 9

BOSTON SYMPHONY AND MME. CAHIER

By MARY M. HOWARD.

The Musical Arts series of five concerts, Bessie Bellanca, manager, opened triumphantly last evening in Elmwood Music hall with the concert given by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the baton of Pierre Monteux. The French conductor deepened the remarkably favorable impression that he made in this city last season by his splendid gifts and accomplishments, and it is sincerely regretted that his present tour is his farewell one in the United States, particularly as his successor, except through the medium of the press, is as yet an unknown quantity on this side of the ocean.

It was an unusually interesting and unhackneyed programme that Mr. Monteux chose for presentation in Buffalo, comprising Weber's overture to Der Freischutz; the E minor symphony, No. 1, by Sibelius; Dance of Salome, from the Strauss opera, Salome, and Liszt's symphonic poem, The Lament and Triumph of Tasso. The familiar overture was given a performance in which was disclosed the absolute unity of attack and finish, the transparently clear utterance, the fascinating charm of ever changing color, which marked the playing of the orchestra throughout the programme, and the audience responded at once, falling into a receptive mood of pleasure which lasted during the evening.

Special interest centered in the symphony, an epitome of the spirit and life of Finland. It is music fresh from the soil, with the ruggedness, the melancholy, the primitiveness of that country and people. It has, at times, a bit of the Oriental tinge which marks the music also of the Magyar and the Slav. There is a frequent dual singing of melodies, like the primal folk music of untutored races, and the incisive accents and striking rhythms enhance this effect. The work is full of inherently lovely themes, varying in mood from gentle pathos to wild abandon, another trait of folk music. Its performance by the Boston orchestra was such as to rivet attention and compel great admiration. The symphony offers uncounted opportunities to the various solo instruments, and the tonal quality revealed in the solo phrases was, in most cases, delightful to the ear. From the clarinet monody of the introduction, through the violins and 'cellos of the main theme, the flute duet over the string and harp tremolos, the horns in the second motive of the andante, to the close of the finale, the beauty of tone was a thing to rejoice in. Mr. Monteux played upon his orchestra as a plastic instrument in his hands.

The Strauss dance, which some one has cleverly dubbed "glorified midway music," pleased those who like that kind of music. The Liszt composition, as its title suggests, is one of contrasting moods. Its Tasso motive in C minor is one pregnant with tragedy, and is interwoven even with the more jubilant passages, but at the close it appears as a noble hymn, intoned by full orchestra.

The pleasure of the evening was heightened by the soloist, Mme. Cahier, contralto, an artist of whom her American compatriots may justly be proud. In Tschaikowsky's Adieu, Forets, from Jeanne d'Arc, and in the rarely heard La Captive, by Berlioz, Mme. Cahier displayed a voice of luscious quality, especially in the middle and lower range, and interpretive gifts which would sweep her to favor even with far less vocal equipment than she possesses. Especially in the grateful Berlioz air, did Mme. Cahier impress by the subtlety of her art. She colored her tones most skillfully to project every line of the verse, and her facial expression also served to intensify the eloquence of her song. A charming simplicity and dignity of manner are added assets to win her audience, which last evening gave her a reception of the utmost warmth. The finely proportioned accompaniments supplied by the orchestra deserve more than a word of praise.

Trans Feb 4

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Symphony Orchestra

FOR the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Mr. Monteux has assembled a promising miscellany: Gluck's Overture to his opera, "Iphigenia in Aulis"; Lalo's "Spanish Symphony" for violin and orchestra with Mr. Thibaud to play the solo-part; the Orchestral Suite of Deems Tayor, suggested by "Alice in Wonderland"; Chaikovsky's Overture-Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet." Since no symphony in the usual sense of the word stands on the list, possibly Mr. Thibaud and Mr. Monteux will play Lalo's piece without the usual and not too warrantable excision of one movement. The divisions of Mr. Taylor's Suite, about which more will be printed in this place, are "Dedication," "The Garden of Live Flowers," "Jabberwocky," "Looking-Glass Insects," "The White Knight." As for Mr. Thibaud, no music could better suit his adept hand and fine sensibilities than these pages of Lalo.

Daily Item Feb 6

BOSTON SYMPHONY MECHANICS HALL

Pierre Monteux, Its Famous Leader, Is Now Making His Final Appearance in That Capacity

The coming concert to be given in Mechanics hall, Worcester, on Tuesday evening, Feb. 12, by the Boston Symphony orchestra will probably constitute the last appearance in Worcester of Pierre Monteux, its celebrated conductor. The great Frenchman is completing his five-year term at his present post and expects in the Spring to return to France.

The Boston Symphony orchestra is not only the leading musical institution in New England. It has long been ranked with the very finest organizations of its kind in the world. Its present leader has wrought new glories in the quality of performances and made new achievements in the matter of programs and the general success of the concerts wherever the orchestra has played. This conductor has compiled a program of especial beauty for this concert, which will have direct appeal and yet represent the finest achievements in the symphonic repertory. The symphony will be the famous Seventh of Beethoven, and the other numbers Richard Strauss' tone poem "Death and Transfiguration"; Debussy's two nocturnes "Clouds" and "Festivals," and Wagner's Overture to "Tannhauser."

PIERRE MONTEUX
Conductor.

The program which Mr. Monteux is to conduct in Worcester is such as to reveal to particular advantage his genius as a leader and the miraculous qualities of the virtuoso orchestra which he commands.

Daily Item Feb 7

Mechanics Hall, Worcester.
Next Tues. Evening, Feb. 12th,
at 8.15.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Pierre Monteux, Conductor.
104 Musicians.
Tickets now on sale at Steinert's,
308 Main St., Worcester.
$2.50, $2, $1.50 (no tax).

Programmes in Prospect

Mr. Monteux has assembled a promising miscellany for the Symphony Concerts of next week: Gluck's Overture to his opera, "Iphigenia in Aulis"; Lalo's "Spanish Symphony" for violin and orchestra with Mr. Thibaud to play the solo-part; the Orchestral Suite of Deems Taylor, suggested by "Alice in Wonderland"; Chaikovsky's Overture-Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet." Since no symphony in the usual sense of the word stands on the list, possibly Mr. Thibaud and Mr. Monteux will play Lalo's piece without the usual and not too warrantable excision of one movement.. The divisions of Mr. Taylor's Suite, about which more will be printed in this place, are "Dedication." "The Garden of Live Flowers," "Jabberwocky," "Looking-Glass Insects," "The White Knight."

Gazette [illegible] Feb 7

MECHANICS HALL, WORCESTER
Next Tuesday Eve., Feb. 12, at 8.15.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Pierre Monteux, Conductor

104 MUSICIANS
Tickets now on sale at Steinert's, 308 Main Street, Worcester.
$2.50, $2, $1.50 (no tax)

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
TELEGRAM
New York City

FEB 6 - 192

Stravinsky and Roland Hayes.

What a Stravinsky season of it we are having! First, Walter Damrosch brought us the Chinese "Nightingale," and played it three times over; next, the International Composers' Guild, with Leopold Stokowski as master of the buck-hounds, hunted down the "Fox"; the Philharmonic did its bit with the newer suite from the "Fire Bird"; and while the town is still ringing with the fame of the Boston Symphony's "Consecration of Spring" last Thursday night, Mr. Stokowski comes over from Philadelphia again and at a regular Carnegie Hall concert of his Philadelphia Orchestra makes known to us New Yorkers the "Symphonies for Wind Instruments to the Memory of Claude Achille Debussy," composed by Stravinsky in 1920 and therefore one of the Russian master's recent works, though not so recent as the "Fox."

Europeans might taunt us again with our lateness in the field. Paris heard the "Consecration of Spring" in May 1913 and London shortly afterwards. The "Nightingale's Song" is almost as old story across the Atlantic. But if belated, we are at least thorough. To Meredith's remark that every dinner table has its topic as every age its reputation might be added the observation that every season has its composer. I only wish one of the busy leagues or guilds would up and give us now "Mavra" and the "Noces."

First of all, a word of definition as to the "Symphonies" player last night. Stravinsky specifically warns that this short piece for three-and twenty instruments—twelve wood-wind; eleven brass—is in no sense a symphony in the ordinary eighteenth and nineteenth century sense of the term, but is a "concordance of sounds" after the meaning of the original Greek word—that is, a sounding together.

The work was performed in London in 1921 and in Paris the following year. In London it was received, acording to Ernest Newman, "with a good deal of laughter and some hisses. Had not Mr. Stravinsky himself been pushed upon the platform at the psychological moment, there would probably have been a demonstration of the sort one rarely sees in an English concert-hall. The composer took the unusual course of publicly blaming the conductor for the bad impression the work had made. Koussevitzky, he said, tried to put expression into the music, whereas it is intended to be played without any old-fashioned nonsense of that sort. This called forth a spirited rejoinder from Koussevitzky, who pointed out that even if he had wanted to put his own interpretation upon the music, he could not have done so, as the little time he had for rehearsing it allowed of no more than just playing it through."

The audience last night did not approach a demonstration, though at first the drastic crowing of clarinets and flutes did evoke some laughter. That soon subsided entirely, but at the end the general attitude of the house could be summed up in the words, "This thing out of the way, now we are going to hear some real music!" for was not the rest of the program devoted to Rimsky-Korsakoff's melifluous and well-beloved suite, "Scheherazade"? And yet that very suite in question a quarter of a century ago won sneers and contumely from the doubting Thomases of that fin de siecle day.

These memorial "Symphonies" to Debussy invite rather to random considerations than to a definite finality of impression. That, of course, will come in time. For the moment, one recalls the marvellous clarity of the scoring, the passionate emphasis on the timbre and color of the individual instruments. In the musical substance, the Chinese lilting of a familiar nightingale severs the indeterminate darkness of Debussy's own "Pelleas et Melisande"; some hearers remember, too, Ravel, and across the dubious fabric of the new emerges the sober trail of familiar diatonic harmonies.

As a funeral emblem this music has a naked solemnity that is as untutored as the wailing of a child. Some will punish it as a child is punished, but lightly to scoff were dangerous. For Stravinsky is neither untutored nor a child; he is one of the most adroit and masterful of composers, who has perfectly the secret of hiding his revenge among the coming years. The would-be slayers of the "Consecration of Spring" at its Paris "premiere" learned later to bow adoring knees. And so for these "Symphonies" we shall see what we shall see.

The other number on the Philadelphia program last night, besides the "Symphonies" and "Scheherazade," was Ernest Bloch's Hebrew rhapsody "Schelomo" (Solomon) for 'cello and orchestra. Seven years ago I found this work impressive; last night it sounded imitative, eclectic, loosely knit, and unmistakably "dated." Such is the way of the whirling seasons. Mr. Stokowski led an eloquent orchestral performance; Hans Kindler played the solo part with devotion, if little else.

[illegible] Feb 7

MECHANICS HALL, WORCESTER
Next Tuesday Eve., Feb. 12, at 8.15.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Pierre Monteux, Conductor

104 MUSICIANS
Tickets now on sale at Steinert's, 308 Main Street, Worcester.
$2.50, $2, $1.50 (no tax)

Buffalo Nov 9

BOSTON SYMPHONY AND MME. CAHIER

By MARY M. HOWARD.

The Musical Arts series of five concerts, Bessie Bellanca, manager, opened triumphantly last evening in Elmwood Music hall with the concert given by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the baton of Pierre Monteux. The French conductor deepened the remarkably favorable impression that he made in this city last season by his splendid gifts and accomplishments, and it is sincerely regretted that his present tour is his farewell one in the United States, particularly as his successor, except through the medium of the press, is as yet an unknown quantity on this side of the ocean.

It was an unusually interesting and unhackneyed programme that Mr. Monteux chose for presentation in Buffalo, comprising Weber's overture to Der Freischutz; the E minor symphony, No. 1, by Sibelius; Dance of Salome, from the Strauss opera, Salome, and Liszt's symphonic poem, The Lament and Triumph of Tasso. The familiar overture was given a performance in which was disclosed the absolute unity of attack and finish, the transparently clear utterance, the fascinating charm of ever changing color, which marked the playing of the orchestra throughout the programme, and the audience responded at once, falling into a receptive mood of pleasure which lasted during the evening.

Special interest centered in the symphony, an epitome of the spirit and life of Finland. It is music fresh from the soil, with the ruggedness, the melancholy, the primitiveness of that country and people. It has, at times, a bit of the Oriental tinge which marks the music also of the Magyar and the Slav. There is a frequent dual singing of melodies, like the primal folk music of untutored races, and the incisive accents and striking rhythms enhance this effect. The work is full of inherently lovely themes, varying in mood from gentle pathos to wild abandon, another trait of folk music. Its performance by the Boston orchestra was such as to rivet attention and compel great admiration. The symphony offers uncounted opportunities to the various solo instruments, and the tonal quality revealed in the solo phrases was, in most cases, delightful to the ear. From the clarinet monody of the introduction, through the violins and 'cellos of the main theme, the flute duet over the string and harp tremolos, the horns in the second motive of the andante, to the close of the finale, the beauty of tone was a thing to rejoice in. Mr. Monteux played upon his orchestra as a plastic instrument in his hands,

The Strauss dance, which some one has cleverly dubbed "glorified midway music," pleased those who like that kind of music. The Liszt composition, as its title suggests, is e of contrasting moods. Its Tasso tive in C minor is one pregnant th tragedy, and is interwoven even th the more jubilant passages, but the close it appears as a noble mn, intoned by full orchestra. The pleasure of the evening was ightened by the soloist, Mme. hier, contralto, an artist of whom r American compatriots may justly proud. In Tschaikowsky's Adieu, rets, from Jeanne d'Arc, and in the rely heard La Captive, by Berlioz, me. Cahier displayed a voice of scious quality, especially in the iddle and lower range, and interpretive gifts which would sweep her to favor even with far less vocal uipment than she possesses. Espeally in the grateful Berlioz air, did me. Cahier impress by the subtlety her art. She colored her tones ost skillfully to project every line of the verse, and her facial expression also served to intensify the eloquence of her song. A charming simplicity and dignity of manner are added assets to win her audience, which last evening gave her a reception of the utmost warmth. The finely proportioned accompaniments supplied by the orchestra deserve more than a word of praise.

Trans Feb 4

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Symphony Orchestra

FOR the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Mr. Monteux has assembled a promising miscellany: Gluck's Overture to his opera, "Iphigenia in Aulis"; Lalo's "Spanish Symphony" for violin and orchestra with Mr. Thibaud to play the solo-part; the Orchestral Suite of Deems Tayor, suggested by "Alice in Wonderland"; Chaikovsky's Overture-Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet." Since no symphony in the usual sense of the word stands on the list, possibly Mr. Thibaud and Mr. Monteux will play Lalo's piece without the usual and not too warrantable excision of one movement. The divisions of Mr. Taylor's Suite, about which more will be printed in this place, are "Dedication," "The Garden of Live Flowers," "Jabberwocky," "Looking-Glass Insects," "The White Knight." As for Mr. Thibaud, no music could better suit his adept hand and fine sensibilities than these pages of Lalo.

[illegible] Feb 6

BOSTON SYMPHONY MECHANICS HALL

Pierre Monteux, Its Famous Leader, Is Now Making His Final Appearance in That Capacity

The coming concert to be given in Mechanics hall, Worcester, on Tuesday evening, Feb. 12, by the Boston Symphony orchestra will probably constitute the last appearance in Worcester of Pierre Monteux, its celebrated conductor. The great Frenchman is completing his five-year term at his present post and expects in the Spring to return to France.

The Boston Symphony orchestra is not only the leading musical institution in New England. It has long been ranked with the very finest organizations of its kind in the world. Its present leader has wrought new glories in the quality of performances and made new achievements in the matter of programs and the general success of the concerts wherever the orchestra has played. This conductor has compiled a program of especial beauty for this concert, which will have direct appeal and yet represent the finest achievements in the symphonic repertory. The symphony will be the famous Seventh of Beethoven, and the other numbers Richard Strauss' tone poem "Death and Transfiguration"; Debussy's two nocturnes "Clouds" and "Festivals," and Wagner's Overture to "Tannhauser."

PIERRE MONTEUX
Conductor.

The program which Mr. Monteux is to conduct in Worcester is such as to reveal to particular advantage his genius as a leader and the miraculous qualities of the virtuoso orchestra which he commands.

[illegible] Feb 7

Mechanics Hall, Worcester.
Next Tues. Evening, Feb. 12th,
at 8.15

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Pierre Monteux, Conductor.
104 Musicians.
Tickets now on sale at Steinert's,
308 Main St., Worcester.
$2.50, $2, $1.50 (no tax).

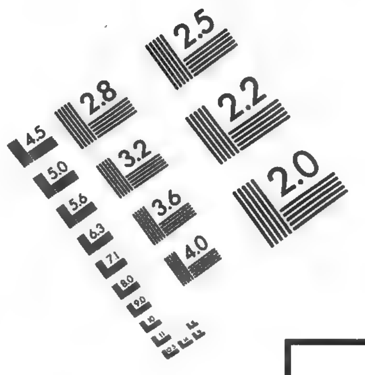
Programmes in Prospect

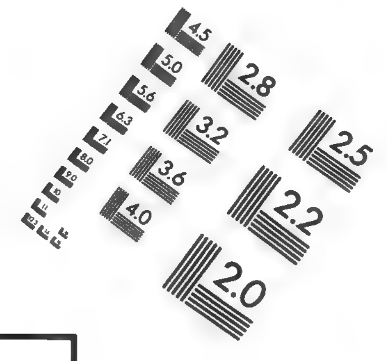
Mr. Monteux has assembled a promising miscellany for the Symphony Concerts of next week: Gluck's Overture to his opera, "Iphigenia in Aulis"; Lalo's "Spanish Symphony" for violin and orchestra with Mr. Thibaud to play the solo-part; the Orchestral Suite of Deems Taylor, suggested by "Alice in Wonderland"; Chaikovsky's Overture-Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet." Since no symphony in the usual sense of the word stands on the list, possibly Mr. Thibaud and Mr. Monteux will play Lalo's piece without the usual and not too warrantable excision of one movement.. The divisions of Mr. Taylor's Suite, about which more will be printed in this place, are "Dedication." "The Garden of Live Flowers," "Jabberwocky," "Looking-Glass Insects," "The White Knight."

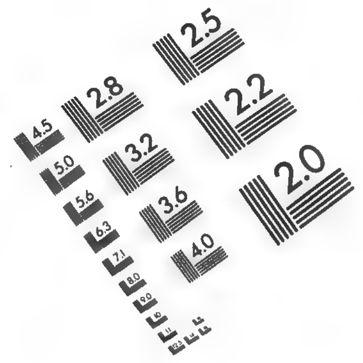
[193]

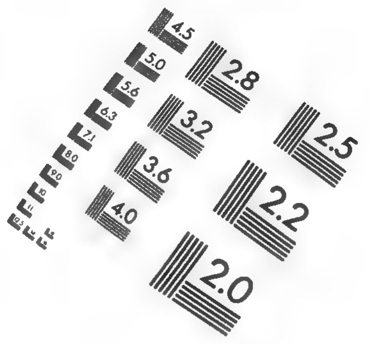
REDUCTION
RATIO
13x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC





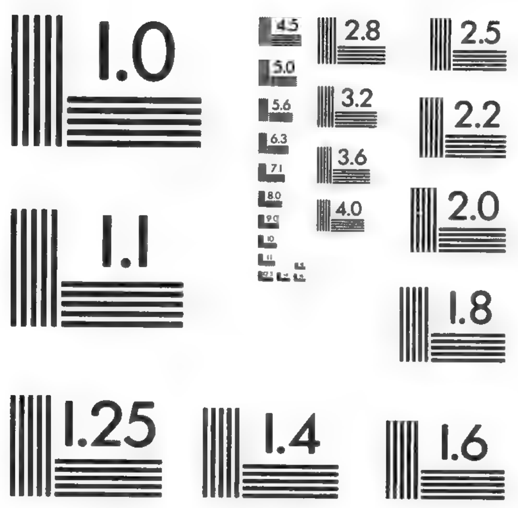




200 mm

150 mm

100 mm



ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

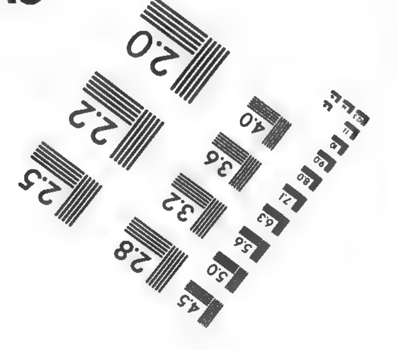
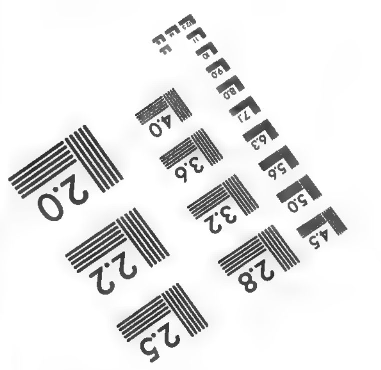
2.5 mm

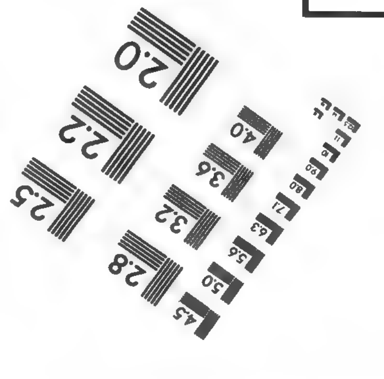
A5





A4

A3



PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

Feb 7

Hall, Worcester.
vening, Feb. 12th.
at 8.15.

SYMPHONY
CHESTRA

Monteux, Conductor.
104 Musicians.
ow on sale at Steinert's,
Main St., Worcester.
$2. $1.50 (no tax).

in Prospect

eux has assembled a promising for the Symphony Concerts of Gluck's Overture to his opera, in Aulis"; Lalo's "Spanish Sym-violin and orchestra with Mr.
play the solo-part; the Orches-Deems Taylor, suggested by nderland"; Chaikovsky's Over-a, "Romeo and Juliet." Since ny in the usual sense of the on the list, possibly Mr. Thi-Mr. Monteux will play Lalo's ut the usual and not too war-cision of one movement.. The Mr. Taylor's Suite, about which be printed in this place, are
"The Garden of Live
Jabberwocky," "Looking-Glass
he White Knight."

Trans Feb 9

BRAHMS AND MUSIC, LOEFFLER THE POET, STRAUSS FOR POWER

MR. MONTEUX MARSHALS THREE COMPOSERS

Old and New Beauties in Brahms's Symphony in F Major—"A Pagan Poem" and Over-Subtle Melody—Once More the Strauss of "Death and Transfiguration"

THREE modern, but not ultra-modern, orchestral works of heroic build are presented on the programme of the regular Symphony Concerts this week. "Wasn't it a perfectly lovely concert?" you heard as you left the hall yesterday afternoon, but you may have felt as if you had climbed three mountains in one day. In a more ideally arranged world than this there will be no such artificial arrangements as "programmes"; while to insure vividness of impressions each separate work will be performed on its own separate occasion. One of the strongest points of a good opera is the unity of the entertainment.

The orchestra, in superb form, gave an impressive reading of each work under Mr. Monteux's leadership. The concert began with the third symphony of Brahms, so much the most romantic and orchestrally colorful of his symphonies that it has forced the surrender of many an anti-Brahmsite, though it has plenty of the more rugged Brahmsian virtues. In this piece Brahms has paid more audible homage to Wagner than in any other, not only by the bit from "Tannhauser" in the first movement, but in the Rhine-maidenly harmonies and sensuous shimmering of muted violins in the coda of the last movement. But Wagner borrowed this as well, namely from "The Fair Melusine" of Mendelssohn whom he looked down upon. The violent antipathy of certain Brahmsites to Wagner was not shared by Brahms himself, who took delight in performances of Wagner's operas and knew the scores intimately.

To return to the symphony; it was played yesterday with such finish, sympathy and freedom from exaggeration that its melody stood out in perfect clarity. Greatness reveals itself in a hundred phrases of this symphony, pharses which fit into the logical plan of the whole, but which can be dwelt upon separately like lines from Shakspeare. Those who love them cannot imagine music as existing without them. Brahms's sober orchestration is exactly right for leaving the fine fibre of the melodic thought free from distracting sensuous elements, but there are many exquisite subtleties of orchestral combination, and when the musical ideas themselves become more colorfully romantic, as in parts of this symphony, the orchestration follows suit. There are lovely passages for solo clarinet in the first two movements which Mr. Sand played with fine phrasing, and in fact all the solo wood-wind and solo horn passages were beautifully done.

The third movement is one of the best lyric pieces which Brahms ever wrote. Its main theme, Hungarian in character, is suggestive of one sung by the gypsy singers in the Chauve-Souris, and one could readily believe it to be a real folk-song. It is filled with a genuine sadness, but the melody is so sustained and deeply satisfying as melody that there is no pain in its sadness. The last movement opens with another Hungarian theme, rapid and of a suppressed fierceness. Brahms breaks off from this theme sooner than Beethoven might have done, certainly sooner than Beethoven did in the last movement of the Appassionata which is similar in key and mood. Beethoven took enormous risks with monotony, winning thereby some of his broadest effects, and becoming boresome at other times. Brahms is less liable to bore by monotony than by a choppy avoidance of it. After this opening Hungarian theme he gives us several melodic ideas in quick succession, involving a number of difficult rhythmic tricks, as if he were fulfilling some heroic vow of musical self-torment in which the listener must participate.

Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" followed after the intermission. The programme basis of this work was taken from verses of Virgil in which a maiden weaves spells and sings songs to bring back her truant lover, and succeeds. The music begins mysteriously, with a potent suggestion of ancient rites and human longing. Soon the piano breaks in with slow, clanging, modal chords against a tremolo of strings. This entrance of the piano is original and memorable, stirring the imagination with pictures of the "grandeur that was Rome." Throughout the work the piano has an important part as one of the instruments, enriching the orchestra by its peculiar sonority and percussive brilliance, at times rising to a concerto-like prominence. The piano part is full of intricacies of rhythm and figure, all of which were so mastered by Mr. Motte-Lacroix that he gave a performance of admirable precision and smoothness. Perhaps he was too conscientious in subordinating his part to the whole so that in certain places an appropriate brilliance was lost.

The whole score, like the piano part, is worked out with elaborate finesse. The inner parts are nowhere mechanically filled in but are contrapuntal and rhythmically supple. Mr. Loeffler has an extraordinary sense of orchestral tone-values. Here he is very happy in his use of trumpets behind the scenes, both for their dramatic effect and their beauty of tone which cuts gently through the accompaniment of the piano and the English horn, expressively played by Mr. Speyer. The varied richness of tone combinations and the dazzling brilliance of the final exultant pages were enhanced by the conducting of Mr. Monteux. In response to enthusiastic applause Mr. Loeffler, invisible to many, bowed from his seat in the balcony. Then followed a graceful pantomime of bowing on the part of Mr. Motte-Lacroix, Mr. Speyer, Mr. Monteux and the composer, each modestly rejecting the applause as belonging to the other three.

In the "Pagan Poem" Mr. Loeffler avoids the commonplace so fastidiously that the average listener is liable to become lost. If Strauss could trade some of his banality for some of Loeffler's fastidiousness it would be an advantage to both composers. We would not go so far as to recommend the incorporation of "Bring Back My Bonnie to Me" into the melodic web, appropriate as that might be to the programme, but a more spontaneous type of modern melody would interpret the passion of the heroine more faithfully than so many themes initative of ancient chants, and secure for the "Pagan Poem" a more general popularity than it now has. Wagner did not try to suggest ancient Celtic music in Tristan and Isolde but who can think of those characters without his music?

The concert closed with Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration," played con amore and con furore. Time seems to be showing that the weakness of Strauss does not lie in the things that at first so shocked his critics—his dissonance (now so mild), his noisiness, and his extremes of realism—but rather in the cheapness and carelessness of much of his melodic material. Few of his themes have great intrinsic originality or beauty; their power comes from their orchestral presentation and dramatic treatment. But the themes of this work are of a higher quality than those of some other tone-poems of Strauss. The very opening takes us into the midst of a "hushed and holy interval of death." The emotion affects us as if we were taking part in the drama. But as soon as the scene changes and there is a musical representation of struggle, we become as spectators. The music seems apt enough, but fails really to frighten us. And the theme of the ardor of living has not a fraction of the ardor of the first theme of Brahms's symphony. One sits through all of the storm and stress for the sake of the great ending, which needs such a furious prelude to throw it into relief.

This Transfiguration movement is one of the greatest splendors of modern orchestral writing, and the most intensely emotional piece of music since Wagner. Beginning in the lowest tones of the orchestra it rises like a great tide with many polyphonic undercurrents, flooding the ears with the richest imaginable sound, so that finally we are conscious of nothing but waves of sound and emotion. Few can resist the enthralment, but it gives us little permanent satisfaction, rather a craving for a renewal of the experience. Is it not a magnificent expression of despair taking refuge in a sensuous mysticism, in trance-figuration? There is more real serenity in the sym-

---

Herald Feb 9

LOEFFLER MUSIC AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

"Pagan Poem" Revived With Success

Mr Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem," composed as chamber music in 1901 and revised for orchestral performance in 1906, was played at yesterday's symphony concert, with Motte Lacroix, pianist, assisting. Mr Speyer played the English horn solo. The composer rose in his place in the first balcony and bowed repeated acknowledgment of the hearty applause at the conclusion.

This music is a fantasy suggested by portions of Vergil's eighth eclogue. The tenuous thread of imagination that binds it together is Mr Loeffler's and not second hand Vergil, however. The musical idiom of the piece was surprisingly modern 20 years ago, in pre-Stravinsky days. It is personal to Mr Loeffler in many respects, and well suited to convey the rather sombre delicacy of his moods. One felt yesterday that probably the original version for piano and a small group of orchestra instruments, a version adapted to drawing room performances, was best suited to the music.

There was some ambiguity in the position of Mr Motte-Lacroix, one of the faculty at the New England Conservatory, at this concert. He was not named as "Soloist," in the program where a sketch of his life was, however, given as is only done in the case of accredited "Soloists." His position and behavior on the platform were those of a man to whom the much coveted title and honor had fallen. Mr Monteux saw to it that Mr Speyer, a member of the orchestra, shared the applause. Since rightly or wrongly it is thought of importance to be "Soloist" and so named in the program of these concerts, there should have been no room left for doubt in the minds of audience and public as to Mr Motte-Lacroix' status.

His name was given in small type as playing an incidental solo, which

---

In the Doldrums

Slow Progress Again With Subscriptions to the Annual Deficit of the Symphony Concerts

FOR the first time within a fortnight, the progress of the Guarantee Fund to meet the expenses of the Symphony Orchestra for the current season, was reported in the programme-book of yesterday's concert. The sum total of subscriptions is now $78,993.34, leaving a round $16,000 to be pledged for full security on the financial side. By these signs, the fund is again increasing too slowly. Half the musical year has passed; and with it more than half the Symphony Concerts. A far-sighted and prudent management is already laying plans for next season; yet hesitates before an uncompleted guarantee for the season now ending. Hence the need of more pledges and immediate pledges.

The Trustees of the Orchestra have lately reaffirmed their resolution to go a free and independent way, in the face of conferences designed to cut to one model and in "quantity production" the symphony concerts of the United States. To maintain this liberty and self-reliance, guarantee funds are necessary—fully subscribed—from an upholding public. The more numerous the guarantors, the more comfortable the sense of support. Subscribers of the past fortnight are:

Beach, John P.
Bemis, Mr. and Mrs. A. Farwell.
Carr, Cornelia P.
Chapin, Mary G., Providence, R. I.
Clark, Mrs. Myron H.
Dana, Dr Harold W.
Dowse, Wm. B. H.
DuBois, Mrs. L. G.
Farnsworth, Wm.
Holbrook, Mary S.
Hutchins, Mr. and Mrs. Edward.
Little, Mrs. David M.
Metcalf, Mr. and Mrs. Jesse H., Providence, R. I.
Milliken, Lois H.
Palmer, Marion C.
Platner, Mrs. John Winthrop.
Ripley, Edward L.
Selfridge, Mrs. G. S.
Shattuck, Lillian.
Sibley, Mrs. Henry C.
Steedman, Mrs. C. J., Providence, R. I.
Thayer, Mrs. John E.

Monitor Feb 9

Fourteenth Program of Boston Orchestra

The program of the fourteenth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was:

Brahms—Symphony No. 3 in F major.
Loeffler—"A Pagan Poem."
Strauss—"Death and Transfiguration."

The playing of the orchestra throughout the afternoon was unusually brilliant. It was one of those performances in which audience and orchestra seemed peculiarly sensitive to each other. If the playing aroused the audience to a degree of enthusiasm out of the ordinary, it was also this quick response on the part of the audience which seemed to inspire the players. It was one of those rare occasions on which a perfect sympathy reigned in all parts of the auditorium and the result was one of those memorable performances for which both listeners and players deserve an equal share of credit.

Such an atmosphere was particularly favorable to Brahms' symphony, of which Mr. Monteux gave a fine reading. It has been said by some that only a man of Teutonic blood can properly understand this music. On the contrary, it has often seemed during the last few years that only a man of Latin race and training has been able to reveal its inner beauties and meaning. Mr. Monteux's readings of Beethoven, Brahms, and Strauss have certainly been cases in point, and no one who had the good fortune to hear it is likely to forget Mr. Toscanini's "Tristan."

So too with Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration." It may not be denied that much of the thematic material of this piece is vulgar and commonplace, its harmonies often trite, as harmonies go at the present time; and that the orchestration, which at first seemed marvelous (and is so, as a matter of fact) cannot entirely conceal these defects as its novelty wears off; but the lofty conception which inspired the work, the tremendous imaginative power and sincerity which lie back of it make it one of the most appealing and affecting of the composer's works. It is impossible to listen to it unmoved.

Mr. Motte-Lacroix was the pianist in Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem." He made his first appearance here last fall at a recital before the faculty and students of the New England Conservatory of Music, with which institution he is connected. At that time it was said of him in these columns: "Mr. Motte-Lacroix's playing revealed an artist of the highest type. His technical mastery of the instrument is complete, and, more than this, he possesses poetic imagination and musicianly insight." This opinion was not only confirmed, but strengthened, by his playing of yesterday. To be sure, the piano part of Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" did not offer him abundant opportunities for the display of his talents, but only a pianist and musician of his caliber could have played this difficult music with such complete understanding and effectiveness.

S. M.

Post Feb 10

Symphony Concerts

At this week's pair of Symphony Concerts will be heard for the first time in Boston in its present orchestral form Deems Taylor's suite, "Through the Looking Glass." In an arrangement for nine instruments this suite was played in this city a few years ago by the New York Chamber Music Society, and it then made most agreeable entertainment. In its orchestral version it has been played by the New York Symphony Orchestra to much applause. Deems Taylor, besides being a composer of considerable reputation, is at present critic of music for the New York World.

In addition to Mr. Taylor's suite the programme for this week lists Gluck's Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," and Tchaikovsky's Overture-Fantasy "Romeo and Juliet," while Jacques Thibaud, soloist, will play with the orchestra Lalo's "Spanish Symphony."

-/10

loud in praise of the performanc the Boston Symphony Orchestra le ice of that extraordinary work in rchestra played the work with incredible

the orchestra was an amazing feat of endid Boston orchestra gave a super-ng Post.

imes.
of Mr. Monteux. In the face of every and trained it.
has in the opinion of critics, visiting ched this high state of perfection, Mr.
he season.
t!
to put an orchestra in the first rank, recision, plasticity and euphony within n Mr. Nikisch, a "virtuoso" conductor,

Trans Feb 9

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

Virtuosity and Transfiguration

CAMBRIDGE audiences especially seem glad to welcome in the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra a member of that organization—such as Mr. Burgin or Mr. Bedetti—as the soloist of the evening. Last night at Sanders Theatre it was Mr. Bedetti, appearing in the concert for Violoncello (A minor, Opus 33) by Saint--Saëns, that tolerably difficult affair—and tolerably dull. Mr. Bedetti, let it be said in the beginning, played in fine fashion and style, bolstering up the flaccid measures and heightening the good; and for that his auditors went to great length to show their approval. Not for a good many years has there been a more significant demonstration in that hall. Certainly it was to the player's credit, and to that of Mr. Monteux and the orchestra, because Saint-Saëns, here laying on thematic laminae, wasnot in his best melodic mood, and there has resulted material for considerable sawing which is not always agreeable. Set down, however, the fact that one lonely little theme flowers to perfection, coloring chamelion-like in its transition from muted strings to wind instruments and to the basses. Set down, too, a certain galloping dance figure for the violoncello, and you have marked the best. Mr. Bedetti played with understanding and taste. He made the most of the principal melodic idiom and gave it very apparent enthusiasm. Diminuendos melted for him, resonance abounded. He is most effective in legato passages, for the lower register.

At the head of the programme came Brahms's third symphony in F major, a rich and complex unit, confusing at times and baffling—so call it Germania or a Forest Idyll, as you will. Much of its conflicting qualities are in the first (allegro con brio) of the four movements. Much of the most elevating and stimulating arise in the final (allegro) movement. The second and andante movement contains equal measures of fervor and exaltation. It is, in addition, rich in the combination of horns and strings. Mr. Monteux, proceeding with characteristic vision, so blended his instruments here as to impart a brass-like Wagnerian thickness to it which spread subsequent moments. Movement th (poco allegretto) drops away from all into a more sympathetic mood whe recurs a simple little melody gai through repetition. For the last Br reserved good thunder and tempest much vibrating for the bass. The c sion, summoning back theme one of ment one, is most delightful for the ant harmony of a potent woodwind and embellished by a few random on the strings.

Far and away the best music of the e ing was Strauss's well-liked tone-poe "Tod und Verklärung," heard many tim in Boston. Strauss, the orchestral coloris in this composition has forged one of the most dramatic and vividly pictorial pieces in the literature of orchestral music. Death and things macabre are, after all, not difficult to paint, for a fine clear smash of the kettle-drum will accomplish wonders. To delineate the momentary struggle between death and a man reluctant to die, to uncover, that is, the elemental, surging passions is another matter. Sturm und Drang, the quiet of exhaustion, reflective interludes, ambition, disappointment, failures, new faith, recurrent mockery—of such are the warp and woof. Openly Mr. Monteux attacked it, and, indeed, th have been few moments of his Boston leadership when such radiant clarity has pervaded the music at hand. Waving, guttering like the symbolical candle, peak followed depression with nuances of brilliance, the figures for death now halted by the most reverent of largos. A lull before the storm and the dull drone of basses and kettle-drums; lastly a pinioned rush to the end, to the vrai apotheosis of man, to translation and transfiguration; to all the outpourings of the heart gathered in one tympanum blast and shrilling of violins; clarity intensified—Mr. Monteux cannot hope ever to express it more perfectly.

D. T. W. McC.

Youth and Promise

Her Feb 10

THIBAUD, SOLOIST

Jacques Thibaud, the admirable violinist, will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony hall. Mr. Thibaud will play Lalo's Spanish Symphony. Mr. Monteux will present Gluck's Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis";Deems Taylor's suite, "Through the Looking Glass," based on Lewis Carroll's book; Dedication, The Garden of Live Flowers, Jabberwocky, Looking Glass Insects and The White Knight, Fantasia and Tchalkovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" Overture.

Her Feb 9

14TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Program Includes, Among Others, Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" (After Virgil)

BRILLIANTLY AND ELOQUENTLY GIVEN

By PHILIP HALE

The 14th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program comprised these compositions: Brahms, Symphony, No. 3, F major; Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" (after Virgil) for orchestra, piano (L. Motte-Lacroix), English horn (Louis Speyer), and three trumpets obbligati; Strauss, tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration."

The compositions by Mr. Loeffler played at the symphony concerts from 1891 to 1898 were pieces for solo instruments, violin or violoncello, with orchestra. The first of his symphonic poems, "The Death of Tintagiles," was performed on Jan. 7, 1898. The three pieces that preceded it, with Mr. Loeffler's chamber music of the early years, were considered by the conservative as strange, if not revolutionary and dangerous. Some spoke of an unwarrantable avoidance of commonplace harmonies, of a "lack of melody"—meaning by this, that aggressive or sugary tunes were missing. Some regretted that there was no "direct appeal" in the nature of an applause-trap. And there were some who deplored what they were pleased to call a "macabre" quality in his music.

Not for some years were the conservative reconciled to his music; but he went on his lonely path, undismayed, rejoicing. He was in those years ahead of his time, as far as this country was concerned. Every composer, every poet, every dramatist worthy of attention has been more or less influenced by a predecessor or a contemporary. No doubt in certain details of harmony and of instrumentation there were in these earlier compositions of Mr. Loeffler, hints at the influence of Chabrier. He also knew the chamber music of Gabriel Faure. But Mr. Loeffler had a voice and an expression of his own.

In the earlier years regarded as an ultra-modern, a "futurist," he is today modern, but not extravagantly radical, for from the very beginning he has worshipped at the altar of Beauty. Charles Lamb told Dr. Parr, when the latter asked him how he could smoke the strongest tobacco, that he had toiled after it as other men toiled after virtue. Mr. Loeffler, whether he was moved to compose by tales of Gogol, thought of the "Dies Irae," a tragedy by Maeterlinck, verses by Rollinat, Verlaine, or Yeats, an Eclogue of Virgil, or the Plain Song of the Church, whether he wrote in fantastical, lyric ironical, dramatic or religious mood, strove after beauty in form and expression. He was not tempted into extravagance for the sake of effect. When he invented ingenious combinations of instruments, it was not to excite wonder, to cause surprise, but to make real and audible his vision of the beautiful. Perhaps this devotion caused him for a time to be misunderstood; to incur the reproach of fastidiousness; of not being sufficiently emotional. For there are many who cannot find emotion in music unless the composer sobs, whines or shrieks.

And in these days when laborious eccentricity is held to be the distinguishing mark of genius; when percussion instruments are thought to be the most expressive in the orchestra; when savage rhythms and cross-rhythms are considered to be the only true expression of dramatic feeling; when any frequent use of consonants is sneered at as old-fashioned, betraying poverty of invention; when this or that instrument is made to play illegitimately, without regard to its natural use or quality; when "color" is pronounced to be the one thing needful, whether it be blue, pea-green, magenta, or yellow, a composition like Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," which is in turn dramatic, lyrical, emotional and always beautiful in its purity of thought and expression, vital, yet polished as the Ellogue of Virgie that inspired it, is reassuring; for it shows that a composer can be modern without affectation or grimace and yet profoundly move an audience.

The "Pagan Poem" was brilliantly and eloquently performed. The composer, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra, Mr. Speyer and Mr. Motte-Lacroix were warmly applauded by the very large audience.

Nor did the performance of the music by Brahms and Strauss leave anything to be desired. It is not given to every conductor to interpret three works, so decidedly different in character, with so pronounced ability, power and understanding.

The concert will be repeated this evening. The program for next week is as follows: Gluck, Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis"; Lalo, Spanish Symphony for violin and orchestra (Jacques Thibaud, violinist); Deems Taylor, Suite, "Through the Looking Glass"; Five Pictures from Lewis Carroll (first time in Boston); Tchakovsky, Overture-Fantasia "Romeo and Juliet" (after Shakespeare).

[194]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Worcester
ening, Feb. 12th
YMPHONY ESTRA

nteux, Conductor.
Musicians.
on sale at Steinert's,
St., Worcester.
$1.50 (no tax).

Prospect

as assembled a promising he Symphony Concerts of ck's Overture to his opera, Aulis"; Lalo's "Spanish Symolin and orchestra with Mr. e solo-part; the Orches- ms Taylor, suggested by erland"; Chaikovsky's Over- "Romeo and Juliet." Since the usual sense of the he list, possibly Mr. Thi- Monteux will play Lalo's usual and not too war- of one movement.. The Taylor's Suite, about which rinted in this place, are "The Garden of Live erwocky," "Looking-Glass White Knight."

Trans Feb 9

BRAHMS AND MUSIC, LOEFFLER THE POET, STRAUSS FOR POWER

MR. MONTEUX MARSHALS THREE COMPOSERS

Old and New Beauties in Brahms's Symphony in F Major—"A Pagan Poem" and Over-Subtle Melody—Once More the Strauss of "Death and Transfiguration"

THREE modern, but not ultra-modern, orchestral works of heroic build are presented on the programme of the regular Symphony Concerts this week. "Wasn't it a perfectly lovely concert?" you heard as you left the hall yesterday afternoon, but you may have felt as if you had climbed three mountains in one day. In a more ideally arranged world than this there will be no such artificial arrangements as "programmes"; while to insure vividness of impressions each separate work will be performed on its own separate occasion. One of the strongest points of a good opera is the unity of the entertainment.

The orchestra, in superb form, gave an impressive reading of each work under Mr. Monteux's leadership. The concert began with the third symphony of Brahms, so much the most romantic and orchestrally colorful of his symphonies that it has forced the surrender of many an anti-Brahmsite, though it has plenty of the more rugged Brahmsian virtues. In this piece Brahms has paid more audible homage to Wagner than in any other, not only by the bit from "Tannhauser" in the first movement, but in the Rhine-maidenly harmonies and sensuous shimmering of muted violins in the coda of the last movement. But Wagner borrowed this as well, namely from "The Fair Melusine" of Mendelssohn whom [illegible] down upon. The violent committee of arrangements consists o William E. Chamberlain, George A. Dil Charles B. Earle, Fred Holdsworth, Charle Howe, Charles E. Lee, secretary, Arthur N. Maddison, Harold W. Read, Rober S. Wayland and Parker Webb, chairman.

The Special Machinery Company, Inc. of Bridgeport; capital, $50,000.

Increases in capital stock have been made as follows: The Hartford Special Machinery Company, of Hartford, by issuing thirty shares, to $250,000; the Rasmussen Manufacturing Company, of Waterbury, by issuing 2200 shares, to $32,000, authorized $100,000.

Probate Notices

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS. SUFFOLK, SS. SUPERIOR COURT. January Sitting, A. D. 1924. To wit: February 7, 1924. ESTHER RAFFERTY of Boston in said County of Suffolk, Plaintiff, versus FRANK J. CLARK of South Berwick, in the County of York and State of Maine, Defendant. This is an action of contract or tort to recover five thousand dollars, alleged to be due to the Plaintiff from the defendant on the twelfth day of November, A. D. 1923, as set forth in the plaintiff's writ of that date. And it appearing to the court by the suggestion of the plaintiff and on inspection of the officer's return on the plaintiff's writ, that the defendant is not an inhabitant of this Commonwealth, nor resident therein at the time of the service of said writ, and that he has no last and usual place of abode, tenant, agent or attorney in this Commonwealth known to the plaintiff or to said officer, and that no personal service of said writ has been made upon the defendant:

IT IS ORDERED BY THE COURT, that the plaintiff give notice to the defendant of the pendency of this action, and to appear before said court to be held at Boston, within and for said County of Suffolk, on the first Monday of March next, to answer to the same, by causing an attested copy of this order to be published in the Boston Evening Transcript, a newspaper printed in Boston, once in a week, three weeks successively, the last publication to be at least fourteen days before the said first Monday of March; and by mailing to said Defendant, postage prepaid, by registered letter, an attested copy of this order, addressed to his last known address; and that this action be continued to the next sitting of this Court, and so from sitting to sitting, until notice shall be given to the Defendant agreeably to this order.

FRANCIS A. CAMPBELL, Clerk.
A true copy: Attest,
FRANK H. HALLETT, Asst. Clerk.
f 9,11,18

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS. MIDDLESEX, SS. PROBATE COURT. To all persons interested in the estate of AMANDA E. DWIGHT, of Melrose, in said County, an insane person: Whereas, N. EMMONS PAINE, the guardian of said ward, has presented for allowance his fifth account as guardian upon the estate of said ward: You are hereby cited to appear at a Probate Court, to be held at Cambridge, in said County, on the twenty-seventh day of February, A. D. 1924, at ten o'clock in the forenoon, to show cause, if any you have, why the same should not be allowed. And said guardian is ordered to serve this citation by delivering a copy thereof to all persons interested in the estate fourteen days at least before said Court, or by publishing the same once in each week, for three successive weeks, in the Boston Evening Transcript, a newspaper published in Boston, the last publication to be one day at least before said Court, and by mailing, post-paid, a copy of this citation to all known persons interested in the estate seven days at least before said Court. Witness GEORGE F. LAWTON, Esquire, First Judge of said Court, this eighth day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and twenty-four.

F. M. ESTY, Register.
fe 9,11,18

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS. SUFFOLK SS. At a Probate Court holden at Boston in and for said County of Suffolk, on the sixth day of February in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and twenty-four. On the petition of HELEN ISABELLE PORTER of Boston in said County, praying that her name may be changed to that of HELEN ISABELLE MAY, public notice having been given, according to the order of Court, that all persons might appear and show cause, if any they had, why the same should not be granted and it appearing that the reasons given therefor are sufficient, and consistent with the public interest, and being satisfactory to the Court, and no objection being made. It is decreed that her name be changed, as prayed for, to that of Helen Isabelle May which name she shall hereafter bear, and which shall be her legal name, and that she give public notice of said change by publishing this decree once in each week for three successive weeks in the gently through the accompaniment of the piano and the English horn, expressivel played by Mr. Speyer. The varied ricl ness of tone combinations and the dazzlin brilliance of the final exultant pages were enhanced by the conducting of Mr. Monteux. In response to enthusiastic applause Mr. Loeffler, invisible to many, bowed from his seat in the balcony. Then followed a graceful pantomime of bowing on the part of Mr. Motte-Lacroix, Mr. Speyer, Mr. Monteux and the composer, each modestly rejecting the applause as belonging to the other three.

In the "Pagan Poem" Mr. Loeffler avoids the commonplace so fastidiously that the average listener is liable to become lost. If Strauss could trade some of his banality for some of Loeffler's fastidiousness it would be an advantage to both composers. We would not go so far as to recommend the incorporation of "Bring Back My Bonnie to Me" into the melodic web, appropriate as that might be to the programme, but a more spontaneous type of modern melody would interpret the passion of the heroine more faithfully than so many themes initative of ancient chants, and secure for the "Pagan Poem" a more general popularity than it now has. Wagner did not try to suggest ancient Celtic music in Tristan and Isolde but who can think of those characters without his music?

The concert closed with Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration," played con amore and con furore. Time seems to be showing that the weakness of Strauss does not lie in the things that at first so shocked his critics—his dissonance (now so mild), his noisiness, and his extremes of realism—but rather in the cheapness and carelessness of much of his melodic material. Few of his themes have great intrinsic originality or beauty; their power comes from their orchestral presentation and dramatic treatment. But the themes of this work are of a higher quality than those of some other tone-poems of Strauss. The very opening takes us into the midst of a "hushed and holy interval of death." The emotion affects us as if we were taking

---

Herald Feb 9

LOEFFLER MUSIC AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

"Pagan Poem" Revived With Success

Mr Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem," composed as chamber music in 1901 and revised for orchestral performance i 1906, was played at yesterday's symphony concert, with Motte Lacroix, pianist, assisting. Mr Speyer played th English horn solo. The composer ros in his place in the first balcony an bowed repeated acknowledgment of th hearty applause at the conclusion.

This music is a fantasy suggested by portions of Vergil's eighth éclogue. The tenuous thread of imagination that binds it together is Mr Loeffler's and not second hand Vergil, however. The musical idiom of the piece was surprisingly modern 20 years ago, in pre-Stravinsky days. It is personal to Mr Loeffler in many respects, and well suited to convey the rather sombre delicacy of his moods. One felt yesterday that probably the original version for piano and a small group of orchestra instruments, a version adapted to drawing room performances, was best suited to the music.

There was some ambiguity in the position of Mr Motte-Lacroix, one of the faculty at the New England Conservatory, at this concert. He was not named as "Soloist," in the program where a sketch of his life was, however, given as is only done in the case of accredited "Soloists." His position and behavior on the platform were those of a man to whom the much coveted title and honor had fallen. Mr Monteux saw to it that Mr Speyer, a member of the orchestra, shared the applause. Since rightly or wrongly it is thought of importance to be "Soloist" and so named in the program of these concerts, there should have been no room left for doubt in the minds of audience and public as to Mr Motte-Lacroix' status.

His name was given in small type as playing an incidental solo, which was just what he did. As far as one ould judge from his discreetly subdued are of the performance he is a competent and musicianly pianist, but it ould be unfair to regard yesterday's erformance as in any sense a display his skill.

Brahms' Third Symphony, not well layed except for the third movement gan the concert, and Strauss' "Tod d Verklaerung" ended it in a blaze glory, thanks to Mr Monteux' skillful d enthusiastic conducting of it. The uble with the Brahms was sluggish ythm, uncertain phrasing and wrong bordination of detail in both first vement and finale; and sentimental ng of the slow movement, which is t a triumph of Brahms' genius any w.

The Strauss piece dates from five ars only later than the Brahms, but belongs not to the 1880's, but to the st decade of the present century, spirtually and stylistically speaking. The eath" of the title is imaginatively ggested by the music, with compelg emotional power. One can readily cept the gist of the program cornts, authorized, it is claimed, by the mposer. The hero is dying, thinking f his past life, and one can feel the oods demanded by the situation without seeking for the insignificant details at clutter little minds.

ut "Transfiguration," when it finally mes, after a marvelous transition ssage, sounds like Liszt trying to Wagner, as in "Tasso." It is a rather vulgar theme orchestrated for brass ad lib and then damnably reiterated.

Next week Thibaud will play Lalo's Spanish Symphony. The other numbers are Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Deems Taylor's "Through the Looking Glass" and Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet." P. R.

Ad. 10

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Jacques Thibaud will be the soloist at the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, appearing with the orchestra in Lalo's Spanish Symphony. Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," the suite "Through the Looking Glass" by Deems Taylor, and Tchaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture are also on the program.

Monitor Feb 9

Fourteenth Program of Boston Orchestra

The program of the fourteenth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was:

Brahms—Symphony No. 3 in F major.
Loeffler—"A Pagan Poem."
Strauss—"Death and Transfiguration."

The playing of the orchestra throughout the afternoon was unusually brilliant. It was one of those performances in which audience and orchestra seemed peculiarly sensitive to each other. If the playing aroused the audience to a degree of enthusiasm out of the ordinary, it was also this quick response on the part of the audience which seemed to inspire the players. It was one of those rare occasions on which a perfect sympathy reigned in all parts of the auditorium and the result was one of those memorable performances for which both listeners and players deserve an equal share of credit.

Such an atmosphere was particularly favorable to Brahms' symphony, of which Mr. Monteux gave a fine reading. It has been said by some that only a man of Teutonic blood can properly understand this music. On the contrary, it has often seemed during the last few years that only a man of Latin race and training has been able to reveal its inner beauties and meaning. Mr. Monteux's readings of Beethoven, Brahms, and Strauss have certainly been cases in point, and no one who had the good fortune to hear it is likely to forget Mr. Toscanini's "Tristan."

So too with Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration." It may not be denied that much of the thematic material of this piece is vulgar and commonplace, its harmonies often trite, as harmonies go at the present time; and that the orchestration, which at first seemed marvelous (and is so, as a matter of fact) cannot entirely conceal these defects as its novelty wears off; but the lofty conception which inspired the work, the tremendous imaginative power and sincerity which lie back of it make it one of the most appealing and affecting of the composer's works. It is impossible to listen to it unmoved.

Mr. Motte-Lacroix was the pianist in Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem." He made his first appearance here last fall at a recital before the faculty and students of the New England Conservatory of Music, with which institution he is connected. At that time it was said of him in these columns: "Mr. Motte-Lacroix's playing revealed an artist of the highest type. His technical mastery of the instrument is complete, and more than this, he possesses poetic imagination and musicianly insight." This opinion was not only confirmed, but strengthened, by his playing of yesterday. To be sure, the piano part of Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" did not offer him abundant opportunities for the display of his talents, but only a pianist and musician of his caliber could have played this difficult music with such complete understanding and effectiveness.

S. M.

Post Feb 10

Symphony Concerts

At this week's pair of Symphony Concerts will be heard for the first time in Boston in its present orchestral form Deems Taylor's suite, "Through the Looking Glass." In an arrangement for some ten instruments this suite was played in this city a few years ago by the New York Chamber Music Society and it then made most agreeable entertainment. In its orchestral version it has been played by the New York Symphony Orchestra to much applause Deems Taylor, besides being a compose of considerable reputation, is at presen the critic of music for the New Yo World.

In addition to Mr. Taylor's suite th programme for this week lists Gluck Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis" an Tchaikovsky's Overture-Fantasy "R meo and Juliet," while Jacques Thibau as soloist will play with the orchest Lalo's "Spanish Symphony."

Trans Feb 9

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

Virtuosity and Transfiguration

CAMBRIDGE audiences especially seem glad to welcome in the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra a member of that organization—such as Mr. Burgin or Mr. Bedetti—as the soloist of the evening. Last night at Sanders Theatre it was Mr. Bedetti, appearing in the concert for Violoncello (A minor, Opus 33) by Saint-Saëns, that tolerably difficult affair—and tolerably dull. Mr. Bedetti, let it be said in the beginning, played in fine fashion and style, bolstering up the flaccid measures and heightening the good; and for that his auditors went to great length to show their approval. Not for a good many years has there been a more significant demonstration in that hall. Certainly it was to the player's credit, and to that of Mr. Monteux and the orchestra, because Saint-Saëns, here laying on thematic laminae, wasnot in his best melodic mood, and there has resulted material for considerable sawing which is not always agreeable. Set down, however, the fact that one lonely little theme flowers to perfection, coloring chamelion-like in its transition from muted strings to wind instruments and to the basses. Set down, too, a certain galloping dance figure for the violoncello, and you have marked the best. Mr. Bedetti played with understanding and taste. He made the most of the principal melodic idiom and gave it very apparent enthusiasm. Diminuendos melted for him, resonance abounded. He is most effective in legato passages, for the lower register.

At the head of the programme came Brahms's third symphony in F major, a rich and complex unit, confusing at times and baffling—so call it Germania or a Forest Idyll, as you will. Much of its conflicting qualities are in the first (allegro con brio) of the four movements. Much of the most elevating and stimulating arise in the final (allegro) movement. The second and andante movement contains equal measures of fervor and exaltation. It is, in addition, rich in the combination of horns and strings. Mr. Monteux, proceeding with characteristic vision, so blended his instruments here as to impart a brass-like Wagnerian thickness to it which spreac subsequent moments. Movement th (poco allegretto) drops away from all into a more sympathetic mood whe recurs a simple little melody gai through repetition. For the last Br reserved good thunder and tempest much vibrating for the bass. The c sion, summoning back theme one of ment one, is most delightful for the ant harmony of a potent woodwind and embellished by a few random on the strings.

Far and away the best music of the e ing was Strauss's well-liked tone-poe "Tod und Verklärung," heard many tim in Boston. Strauss, the orchestral coloris in this composition has forged one of the most dramatic and vividly pictorial pieces in the literature of orchestral music. Death and things macabre are, after all, not difficult to paint, for a fine clear smash of the kettle-drum will accomplish wonders. To delineate the momentary struggle between death and a man reluctant to die, to uncover, that is, the elemental, surging passions is another matter. Sturm und Drang, the quiet of exhaustion, reflective interludes, ambition, disappointment, failures, new faith, recurrent mockery—of such are the warp and woof. Openly Mr. Monteux attacked it, and, indeed, the have been few moments of his Boston leadership when such radiant clarity has pervaded the music at hand. Waving, guttering like the symbolical candle, peak followed depression with nuances of brilliance, the figures for death now halted by the most reverent of largos. A lull before the storm and the dull drone of basses and kettle-drums; lastly a pinioned rush to the end, to the vrai apotheosis of man, to translation and transfiguration; to all the outpourings of the heart gathered in one tympanum blast and shrilling of violins; clarity intensified—Mr. Monteux cannot hope ever to express it more perfectly.

D. T. W. McC.

Youth and Promise

Her Feb 14

THIBAUD, SOLOIST

Jacques Thibaud, the admirable violinist, will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony hall. Mr. Thibaud will play Lalo's Spanish Symphony. Mr. Monteux will present Gluck's Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis";Deems Taylor's suite, "Through the Looking Glass," based on Lewis Carroll's book; Dedication, The Garden of Live Flowers, Jabberwocky, Looking Glass Insects and The White Knight, Fantasia and Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" Overture.

Her Feb 9

14TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Program Includes, Among Others, Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" (After Virgil)

BRILLIANTLY AND ELOQUENTLY GIVEN

By PHILIP HALE

The 14th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program comprised these compositions: Brahms, Symphony, No. 3, F major; Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" (after Virgil) for orchestra, piano (L. Motte-Lacroix), English horn (Louis Speyer), and three trumpets obbligati; Strauss, tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration."

The compositions by Mr. Loeffler played at the symphony concerts from 1891 to 1898 were pieces for solo instruments, violin or violoncello, with orchestra. The first of his symphonic poems, "The Death of Tintagiles," was performed on Jan. 7, 1898. The three pieces that preceded it, with Mr. Loeffler's chamber music of the early years, were considered by the conservative as strange, if not revolutionary and dangerous. Some spoke of an unwarrantable avoidance of commonplace harmonies, of a "lack of melody"—meaning by this, that aggressive or sugary tunes were missing. Some regretted that there was no "direct appeal" in the nature of an applause-trap. And there were some who deplored what they were pleased to call a "macabre" quality in his music.

Not for some years were the conservative reconciled to his music; but he went on his lonely path, undismayed, rejoicing. He was in those years ahead of his time, as far as this country was concerned. Every composer, every poet, every dramatist worthy of attention has been more or less influenced by a predecessor or a contemporary. No doubt in certain details of harmony and of instrumentation there were in these earlier compositions of Mr. Loeffler, hints at the influence of Chabrier. He also knew the chamber music of Gabriel Faure. But Mr. Loeffler had a voice and an expression of his own.

In the earlier years regarded as an ultra-modern, a "futurist," he is today modern, but not extravagantly radical, for from the very beginning he has worshipped at the altar of Beauty. Charles Lamb told Dr. Parr, when the latter asked him how he could smoke the strongest tobacco, that he had toiled after it as other men toiled after virtue. Mr. Loeffler, whether he was moved to compose by tales of Gogol, thought of the "Dies Irae," a tragedy by Maeterlinck, verses by Rollinat, Verlaine, or Yeats, an Eclogue of Virgil, or the Plain Song of the Church; whether he wrote in fantastical, lyric ironical, dramatic or religious mood, strove after beauty in form and expression. He was not tempted into extravagance for the sake of effect. When he invented ingenious combinations of instruments, it was not to excite wonder, to cause surprise, but to make real and audible his vision of the beautiful. Perhaps this devotion caused him for a time to be misunderstood; to incur the reproach of fastidiousness; of not being sufficiently emotional. For there are many who cannot find emotion in music unless the composer sobs, whines or shrieks.

And in these days when laborious eccentricity is held to be the distinguishing mark of genius; when percussion instruments are thought to be the most expressive in the orchestra; when savage rhythms and cross-rhythms are considered to be the only true expression of dramatic feeling; when any frequent use of consonants is sneered at as old-fashioned, betraying poverty of invention; when this or that instrument is made to play illegitimately, without regard to its natural use or quality; when "color" is pronounced to be the one thing needful, whether it be blue, pea-green, magenta, or yellow, a composition like Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," which is in turn dramatic, lyrical, emotional and always beautiful in its purity of thought and expression, vital, yet polished as the Ellogue of Virgic that inspired it, is reassuring; for it shows that a composer can be modern without affectation or grimace and yet profoundly move an audience.

The "Pagan Poem" was brilliantly and eloquently performed. The composer, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra, Mr. Speyer and Mr. Motte-Lacroix were warmly applauded by the very large audience.

Nor did the performance of the music by Brahms and Strauss leave anything to be desired. It is not given to every conductor to interpret three works, so decidedly different in character, with so pronounced ability, power and understanding.

The concert will be repeated this evening. The program for next week is as follows: Gluck, Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis"; Lalo, Spanish Symphony for violin and orchestra (Jacques Thibaud, violinist); Deems Taylor, Suite, "Through the Looking Glass"; Five Pictures from Lewis Carroll (first time in Boston); Tchakovsky, Overture-Fantasia "Romeo and Juliet" (after Shakespeare).

Herald Feb 10

The New York critics were loud in praise of the performanc Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra le Mr. Monteux, the first performance of that extraordinary work in city.

"Mr. Monteux and his superb orchestra played the work with incredible virtuosity."—The Tribune.

"The playing of 'Le Sacre' by the orchestra was an amazing feat of virtuosity."—The World.

"Pierre Monteux and his splendid Boston orchestra gave a superlatively fine performance."—Evening Post.

"Superbly executed."—N. Y. Times.

This orchestra is the creation of Mr. Monteux. In the face of every sort of discouragement he formed and trained it.

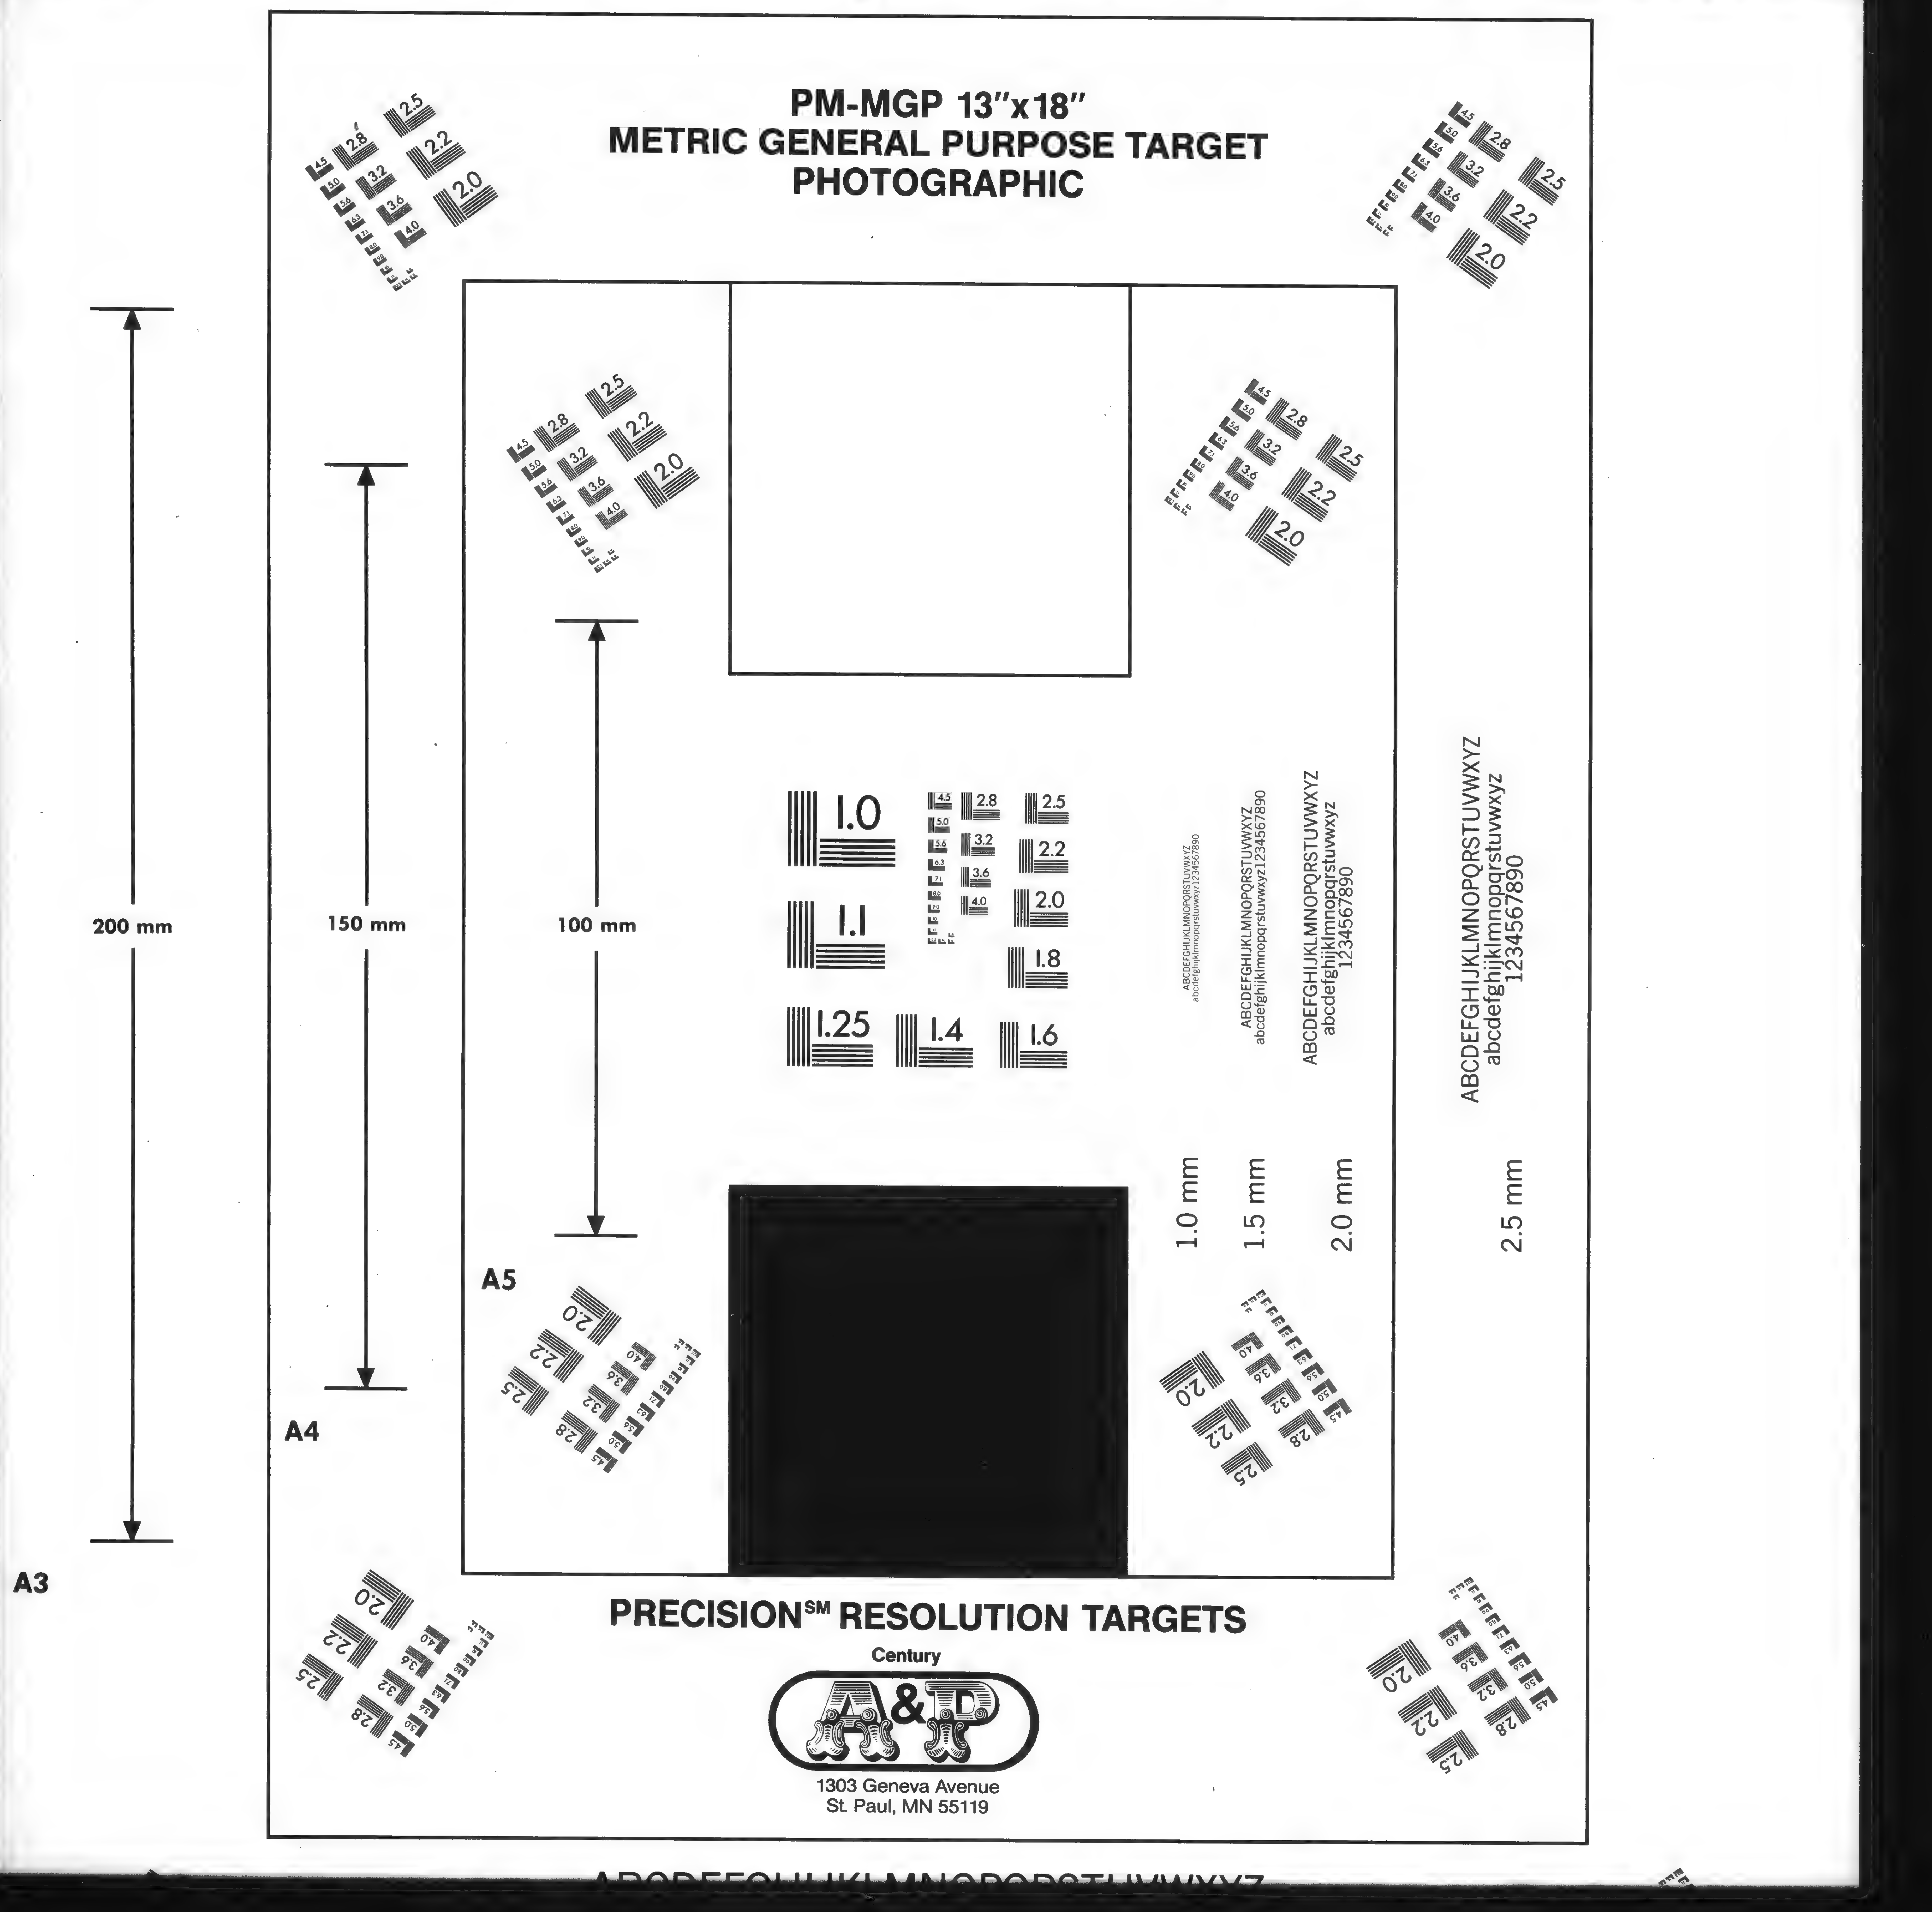
And now that this orchestra has in the opinion of critics, visiting artists, and the Boston public, reached this high state of perfection, Mr. Monteux will leave at the end of the season.

The pity of it! The pity of it!

For if it takes time and skill to put an orchestra in the first rank, that same orchestra may lose in precision, plasticity and euphony within a year.

This was proved in Boston when Mr. Nikisch, a "virtuoso" conductor, succeeded Mr. Gericke.

REDUCTION
RATIO
12x



PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC
200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A3
A4
A5
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm
PRECISIONSM RESOLUTION TARGETS
Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

Worcester Jan 19

SALLE MECHANICS MARDI SOIR 12 FEVRIER

L'EVENEMENT MUSICAL DE LA SAISON

De Retour Après Trois Années d'Absence

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Pierre Monteux, Directeur

La Saison d'Adieu du Grand Directeur Français

LES COMMANDES PAR LA POSTE à W. H.Brennan, Gérant, Salle Symphony, Boston, Accompagnées d'un Chèque, Rempli Contre Reçu du Montant. .BILLETS: $2.50, $2.00, $1.50 ET $1.00 (Pas de Taxe de Guerre)

Brockton Jan 12

Monteux's Final Appearance Here

Boston Symphony Orchestra Coming Feb. 10.

PIERRE MONTEUX.

It is announced that the Boston Symphony orchestra of 104 musicians is to revisit Brockton for the fourth successive annual concert in this city. The concert will be given in the City Theatre on Sunday afternoon, Feb. 10.

Pierre Monteux, the celebrated conductor, was the first to bring this great organization to Brockton, where his genius has had immediate recognition and won unqualified praise. The present season is his fifth and last at the head of the orchestra, and therefore the coming concert will be in the nature of a farewell visit by this foremost French conductors. In the spring, his contract having expired, he expects to return to France, where his talents are in high demand. His five seasons at the head of the orchestra have proved a remarkable record of gradual perfection of ensemble and eloquence of performance.

Of the distinguished list of conductors who have been the upbuilders of the orchestra's fame, Pierre Monteux has shown himself to be one of the most capable and one of the most inspired. For his Brockton farewell he is planning a programme which will equal, if not exceed his former programmes here in brilliance, diversified interest and popular appeal. The soloist of the occasion will be Frederic Tillston, the noted pianist.

Brockton Enterprise Jan 26

First Symphony Principal Piece

Young Pianist to Appear Here With Boston Orchestra.

Remarkable beauty and direct appeal will characterize the fourth programme to be given in Brockton by the Boston Symphony orchestra with Pierre Monteaux. This concert will take place in the City Theatre Sunday afternoon, Feb. 10, at 3 o'clock. In one number Frederick Tillotson, the talented young pianist, will appear as soloist with the orchestra. The chosen score is the Wanderer Fantasy of Schubert which was originally written for the pianoforte and which was subsequently arranged by Franz Liszt for pianoforte and orchestra. This will be the farewell to Brockton of the great French conductor.

Probably no score of Brahms is more widely known and generally loved as his First Symphony, which will be the principal piece. The fact is scarcely disputed, that of Brahms' four symphonies, his first first is the most dramatic in its concept; the most uplifting in its exultant finale, a principal theme of which suggests the great choral theme of the Beethoven Ninth Symphony. The beautiful solo passages and other wonders of the score are too numerous to mention. The slow movement is one of the finest ever written. There is a famous French horn solo in the last movement.

Mr. Monteaux will include the music of his own people on the programme by performing the two numbers "Clouds" and "Festivals" by the late French master, Debussy. The interpretation of the nocturnes at the hand of the French conductor and the great orchestra under him, is said to be unrivalled. Indeed, Pierre Monteaux was a close collaborator with Debussy in the early production of his scores.

Borodin's dances from "Prince Igor" represent the Russian school of music as eloquently as do the nocturnes of the French school of music. Mr. Monteaux conducted them when they were performed by Diaghileff's "Ballet Russe." The themes have a certain dark, oriental magnificence. The performing orchestra becomes taut and electric with the fierce barbarac rythms.

Springfield Rep Jan 7

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA GIVES SPLENDID CONCERT

Pierre Monteux Conducts Satisfying Program in Auditorium Before Large and Appreciative Audience

By FRANCIS REGAL

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave its 30th concert in Springfield yesterday afternoon in the Auditorium for the crowning feature of the season of Young Men's Christian association entertainments. As always, the demand for places exceeded the supply; not all could get in, many who could not find seats, stood unwearied through a long, but stimulating, program.

Of the 30 concerts which this famous orchestra has given here in something like 30 years, this was one of the best, and it was pleasant to have the last concert in the city which Pierre Monteux is to conduct, so satisfying in every respect. As a conducter, during the past four years, he has had trying experiences, due to circumstances over which he had no control, and has come through with honor and distinction. There were times when it seemed a question whether Boston's glorious orchestra would survive, and it was a great relief to music lovers when it was at last seen to be regaining its old place. It is not the old orchestra; the changes of personnel and of leadership could not fail to modify its character profoundly, but it is a very fine orchestra indeed, and its performance yesterday was in most respects highly finished and quite exceptionally interesting.

The program was all that a program for such an occasion should be—fresh and vital, with no dead spots and no music that is better than it sounds; it made room for a great classic, for several great favorites and for an interesting novelty. First came Beethoven's seventh symphony, the majestic power and exhilarating rhythms of which set the key for this afternoon. After the intermission, the orchestra played Smetana's symphonic tone poem, "The Moldan," Ravel's "La Valse," and two Wagner numbers, the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the overture to "Tannhauser."

Such a performance as was given of the A major symphony would in itself make the fortune of a concert. In the interpretation there was nothing novel or sensational, and in technical excellence it would be impossible to surpass some performances of the past. Nor did Mr Monteux make the slightest visible effort to stir the players to an extraordinary effort; indeed the modest simplicity and quietness of his manner is one of the attractive qualities of his conducting. There are conductors who try, perhaps with unconscious egotism, to make the audience think they are pulling every melody by main force out of the sulky and reluctant instruments; of this charlatanism Mr Monteux has not a trace. He and the orchestra work together and work together very well; his successor will have to work hard to surpass yesterday's performance.

Something may have been due to the occasion. To the Boston Symphony orchestra in its 43d season the seventh symphony is a very old story indeed, but it is an unusual experience to play it in a fine and acoustically perfect auditorium to an audience of over 4000 people, to the majority of whom it is quite fresh. Something of this freshness seemed to communicate itself to the players, and from the very opening the performance was full of life. In popularity this ranks second only to the fifth, and rivals that in geniality if not in concentrated power. If it ever seems heavy and dull it is because musicians or auditors, or both, are for the moment not keyed up to the bubbling vivacity of the dance rhythms out of which this great symphonic structure is built. Yesterday everyone was in the mood, the keen bright day gave snap and brilliance to the strings, and every note was inspiring.

There was no falling off in the beau-

(Continued on Third Page)

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA GIVES SPLENDID CONCERT

(Continued From First Page)

tiful symphonic poem by Smetana, a Bohemian composer, who carries heavier metal than his gifted and better-known compatriot, Dvorak. Not less thoroughly Czech, Smetana is even more original and has a streak of genius of almost the highest order, which developed somewhat roughly and carelessly, yet produced a few masterpieces, among which this symphonic poem from the set called "My Country" must certainly be ranked; in its own kind of poetic charm it has few rivals. In this much depends on the first violins, and it was pleasing to see to what extent this section, for which the orchestra used to be specially famous, has recovered its old standing. The quality of its pianissimo was always lovely, though one had the feeling that many of the players were going through the motions and letting the specially beautiful soft tones of Mr Burgin color the whole.

The novelty of the afternoon and an interesting one, was Ravel's "choreographic poem," "The Waltz." Ravel is put among the fashionable rather than the popular composers, and is known chiefly by rather advanced chamber music at which the classicists still shake their heads. But "The Waltz" is capital jazz, including such eccentricities as having the 'cellists slide their fingers rapidly up and down the strings in grotesque portamento. Musically it may cause more head shaking than the chamber music, but as a feat of virtuosity in orchestration it commands the admiration of the most classical. If it is trashy there is at hand the plausible excuse that it does not depict the tawdry splendor of the empire of Napoleon II with the waltz craze taken as a symbol. Will composers of the future be able to do as well with the 20th century and the fox trot? The work was played with great zest, and was hugely enjoyed, the printed moral compiled by Philip Hale making its Bacchanalian revelry perfectly correct for a Sunday afternoon.

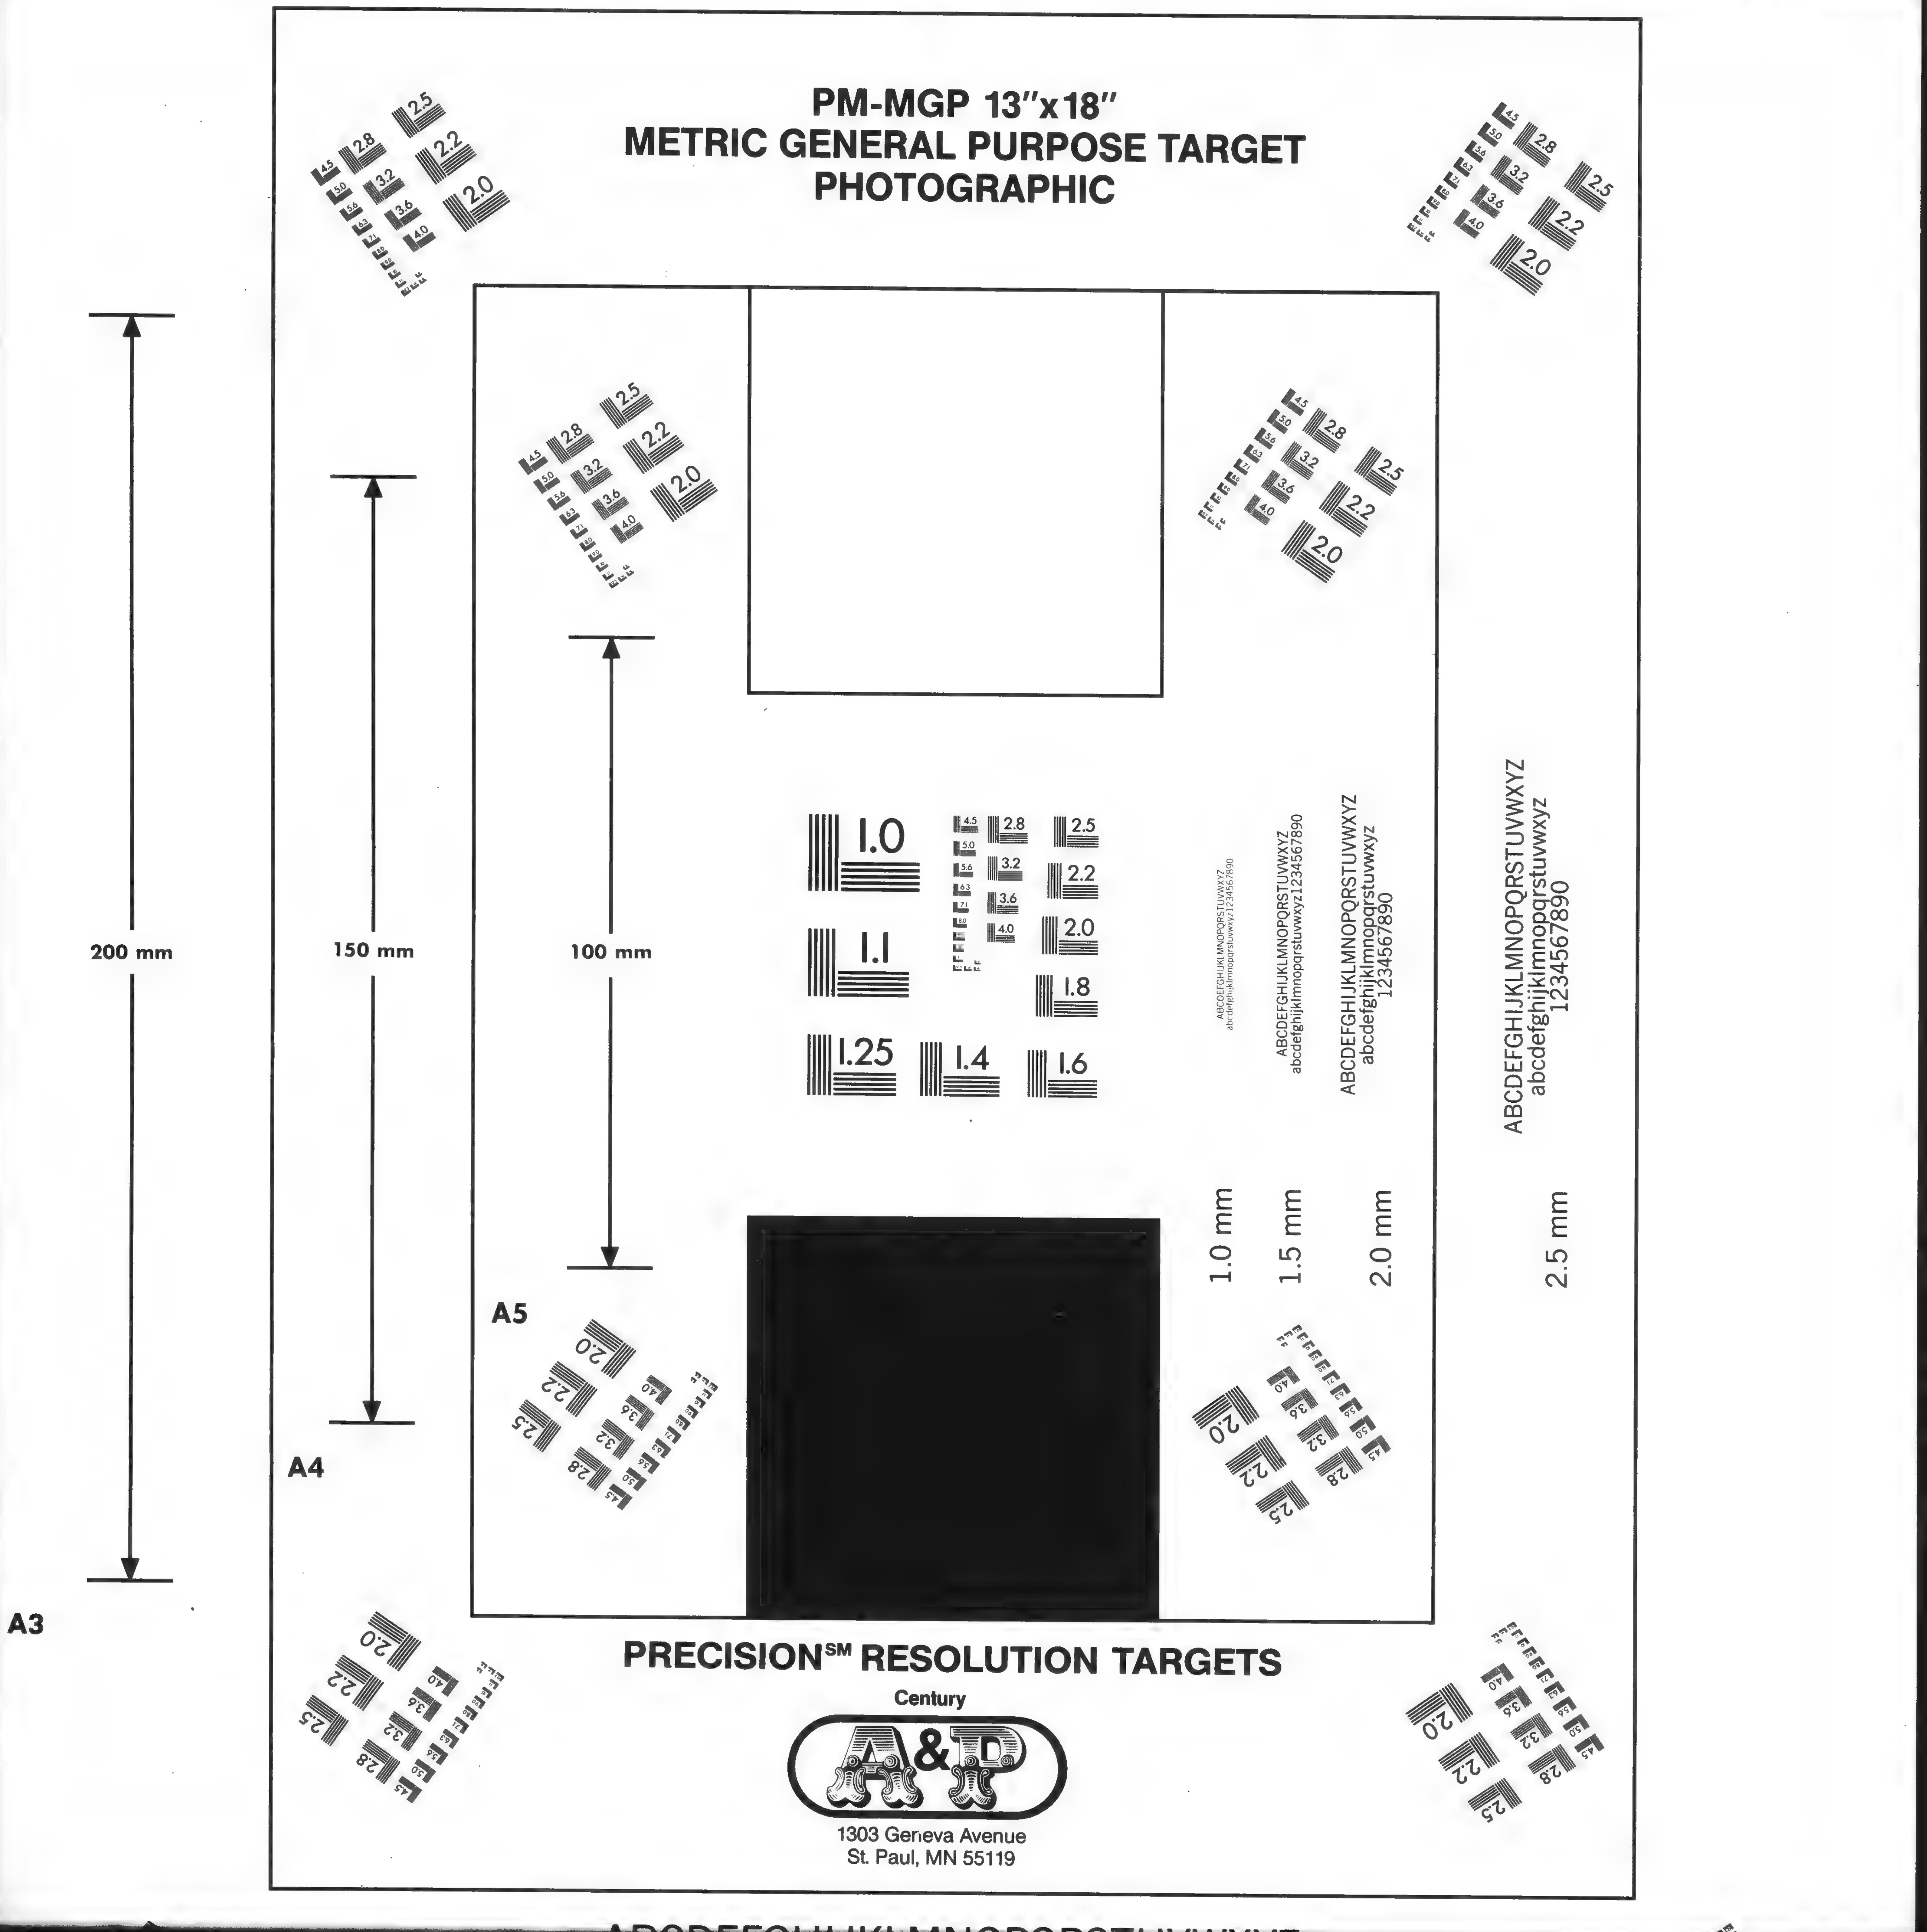
With the two Wagner numbers we were back on familiar ground, and both of the overtures were finely played. Possibly a pair of overtures is not an ideal ending, but these are sufficiently different in form as in everything else to make such an objection rather hypercritical. When he composed "Tannhaeuser" Wagner had not yet evolved his theory applied in "Lohengrin," that it is illogical to make the overture a kind of musical compendium of a music drama which the audience is not yet supposed to know. If there is not so much in the theory as he thought at the time it at any rate sharply differentiates the prelude to "Lohengrin" from the conventional overture. Does it stand wear and tear as well? Sometimes it seems to have gone stale, yet yesterday this, too, had much of its old freshness—partly, no doubt, because of the great force of strings which is indispensable for the slow and massive building up to a climax which is the raison d'etre of the composition. And of course in the "Tannhaeuser" overture the vast reserve force of the great orchestra had a splendid chance to bring an inspiring concert to a tremendous close.

With the programs was distributed an appeal for support of the orchestra from its trustees, giving some interesting figures to show its income and expenditures for the past three years. The expenses for those years were roundly $665,000, $633,000 and $644,000, and the net loss $119,000, $92,000 and $76,000. This is encouraging progress toward a balanced budget, and it is said that of all American orchestras of the first grade this one is burdened with the smallest deficit. Since the death of Maj Higginson the deficit has been met by an increasingly large number of individual supporters and this help must be continued "ultimately by the community as a whole." With this splendid concert fresh in mind Springfield music lovers will hope all the more strongly that the support needed to maintain the organization in its renewed perfection will be forthcoming.

Rev Thomas Tyrie, a retired Methodist minister, now assistant pastor of Wesley church, speaking before the concert, recited verses from the 15th and 16th chapters of I Chronicles. The parts of the Bible he selected to quote were well suited to the program which followed. Mr Tyrie has spoken on four similar occasions in the Auditorium, each time quoting passages from the Scriptures relative to music. He has, however, used different passages each year.

REDUCTION
RATIO
14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A5
A4
A3
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

N.Y. HERLAD JAN 27

MODERN MUSIC A

Mistakes Made by Conductors in Framing Their Programs

Boston Symphony This Week to Play Stravinsky Last Instead of First When Hearers Are Fresh and Mentally Alert.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

M. PIERRE MONTEUX, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is not a celebrated constructor of good programs. Next Thursday evening he will present for the first time in this city Igor Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps," but before permitting his audience to hear it he will do all and the best he can to surcharge every listener's mind with the "Jupiter" symphony of Mozart and a concerto for violin and orchestra, with Richard Burgin, concert master of the orchestra, as solo player.

M. Monteux's theory of the psychology of concert audiences is in accord with that held apparently by most of the other conductors. They are evidently of the opinion that novelties should be placed late in programs in order to hold the listeners in their seats. Or in the case of such a work as that of Stravinsky it may be that the eminent dispenser of sounds is afraid that after hearing it no one would believe it worth while to remain and enjoy a little quiet rest and refreshment in the shape of a Mozart symphony.

Or possibly, as Capt. Coffin's skipper who harnessed the whale to pull his ship remarked, "A marciful man is marciful to his beast," and M. Monteux wishes to give fearful persons an opportunity to escape before the "Consecration of Spring" breaks loose.

Serious Part of Program Should Come First.

But no matter what reason may be offered, a badly made program cannot be excused. The most serious part of a program of music should be the first part, performed when an audience is fresh, mentally alert, open to receive and assimilate something new or satisfying. The lighter part of the entertainment should follow, just as salads follow the roasts. But conductors will probably continue to create program plans out of their own self-sufficient minds without due consideration of the minds of those who are to listen.

The first performance of the "Sacre du Printemps," which in its original form was a ballet, took place at the Theatre des Champs Elysees, Paris, on May 29, 1913, the actors being the members of the Diaghileff Ballet Russe, and the conductor M. Monteux.

There was a rumpus which must have stirred even M. Varese to greenest envy. The audience yelled and bawled. Even the fortissimo passages, which are generously provided by the distinguished composer, were drowned out. Missiles were thrown upon the stage. The police had to defend the right. Stravinsky, who is tall, nevertheless managed to escape unrecognized, but his priceless high hat was ignominiously smashed in the melee.

In spite of the riot there were four more performances in France and one in London. M. Monteux later produced the work in concert form. So perhaps next Friday morning we may be able to tell the world that on the previous evening "an enjoyable time was had by all."

Will Become Worth While.

The musical editor of THE NEW YORK HERALD, "doddering into the twilight of a misspent life," as William Winter once phrased it, intends to pursue the modern movement as long as nature permits him to do so. It is not to be dismissed by invective or ridicule. It is an expression, confused and uncertain up to this moment, of a vital impulse which will forward the progress of musical art. Much will have to be abandoned, much clarified and much yet discovered before the movement discloses or indeed knows its own direction. But experiments in the development of new scale materials, new harmonic developments and new methods of representation will produce in the end something worth while.

In the meantime we need not painfully alarm ourselves about the doings of the ambitious "musikanten" (to borrow the only significant term) who are desperately hitching their wagons to the stars and hoping thus to be hauled into the glory of the new dawn. These gentlemen have nothing to say. And they seize every opportunity to prove it. They are shouting their distorted platitudes from every stage that can be hired for a Sunday night dispensation of their fulminations. They are applauding each other and boosting their wares like experienced logrollers and they are attracting audiences which go to gratify curiosity and that quick recognition of the ludicrous which contributes so much to the native born American's joy of living.

At Concert Performance.

M. Henry Prunieres, writing in the Chesterian on the "Chant du Rossignol," declared that this work, like the Sacre du Printemps," could "[illegible] its full value and significance only at a concert performance. It is not too well suited to dancing, and the exigencies of the choregraphy inflict more than one distortion on it." This is encouraging at any rate. We shall not miss the mimes of the Diaghileff company. As to the work without the dancers, M. Prunieres said: "The music of the 'Sacre du Printemps' impressed us with the brutality of an elemental phenomenon. It filled us with a kind of horror struck awe and agitated our minds and our nerves too violently to leave us amateurish admiration."

It was undoubtedly the rebellion of the peace loving Parisians that was expressed in the outbreak at the first performance of the gentle spring song. What right had this Russian Til Eulenspiegel to ride rough shod into the world's market place and upset all the old apple carts? There is aplenty of this sort of criticism right here in "little old New York," but it will construct no logical ramparts for the progressives to scale.

There will remain but one thing to be determined. Has the composer anything to say, and has he said it well? With the ultimate question, "Is this new kind of music beautiful?" We are not obliged to trouble ourselves yet. Certainly it is not all beautiful according to our old fashioned standards. But we have learned to love many things in music which seemed repulsive to us years ago that we may eventually enjoy the daily instatement of two minor seconds to mortal combat and may become perfect musical optimists so that at bedtime we can make ourselves refreshing drinks out of the musical lemons which have been handed to us in the course of the day.

And once and for all none of these things will be settled soon. Up to the present time only a very few of these modernists have made the impression of being worth while. They have simply seized upon a manner to conceal their own poverty of ideas. And some of them are not even honest. Their compositions reek with intellectual deceit. They select song texts and set them to music which palpably has nothing to do with them. And they are unmistakably doing this for the sheer sake of causing people to sit up.

Mr. Montague-Nathan in his "History of Russian Music" has a few words about Stravinsky's spring song. He says, "In this work Stravinsky has manifested a conviction that, despite the prevailing bias in favor of things as they are, music is an art which must progress, and that its evolution, like that of mankind, to whom it ministers, is a natural condition of its existence." Having unloaded this package of bromide, Mr. Montague-Nathan proceeds with suddenly awakened intelligence to inform us that "The Crowning of Springs" has been described as the ritual of an imaginary religion, but there is a touch of actuality which connects the subject matter with the beliefs of pagan Russia. It has two scenes, in which the rites devoted to the sun god Yarilo [for further particulars about this divinity see Rimsky-Korsakov's "Snow Maiden"] are celebrated. In setting this subject Stravinsky has turned his back on everything in the nature of conventional music and has given us a score which at the first hearing appears to confine itself to a rhythmical commentary on the stage movement. In criticizing this work the mistake was made of suggesting that Stravinsky's music had gone back to an elemental stage in an endeavor to provide an appropriate setting for the prehistoric. In reality, of course, the movement was forward, in that music was used in a sphere to which it hitherto had been strange."

Awaits a Mighty Master.

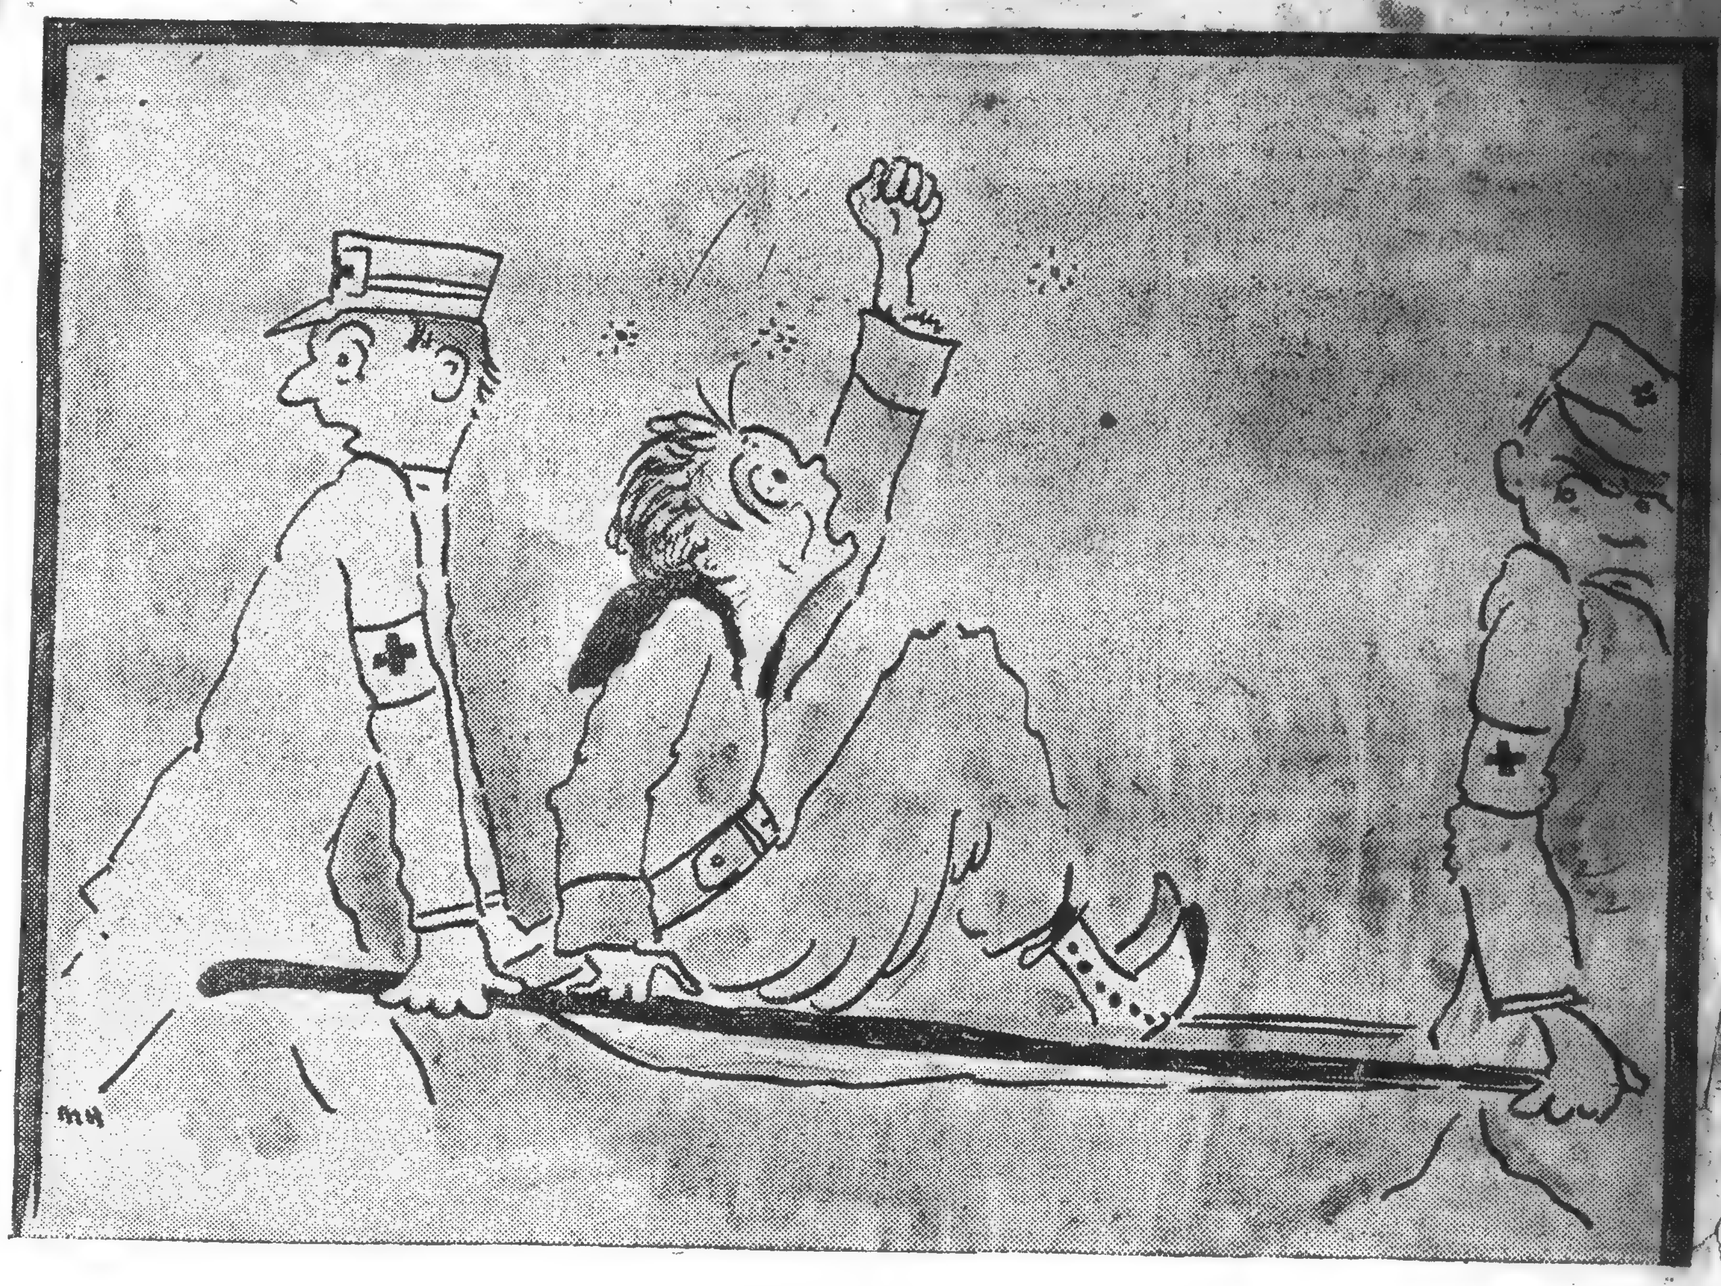
All of which fills us with dazzling enlightenment as to the artistic character of this composition. What it principally does is once more to demonstrate the futility of all literary description of music. The lyric art has always defied the forcible embraces of words, and it continues to preserve its chastity in spite of the violent efforts of the whole race of modern composers to subjugate it to the [illegible] historical story, the legend or the poem. Some day there will arise a mighty master who will proclaim to the world the true gospel of this loftiest of the arts—that it needs no aid from literature or painting, vocal vociferation or pantomime, but that it is a proud and independent creation of the human mind, capable of forming and uttering its own message of incomparable beauty.

When that time comes, as come it surely will, the whole shop full of manikins and tinsel costumes and silly literary twaddle will be hurled violently down a steep place into the sea. Music will be rid of the shams which have wrapped themselves about her lovely limbs and she will once more stride forth into the sunlight robed in all her own naked beauty. The ugliness and the posturings and the spoutings and pretendings will all be gone and music will be just music, heavenly maid, and nothing else.

But we are far from that happy state just now. We shall have to listen to many strange sounds justified by the marvelous meanings which are to be found in the tales or the action which they represent. For if you take away from the contemporaneous composer his story or his pantomime he is as helpless as a baby without his baby carriage.

TRANS JAN 28

"Now, Stravinsky, See What You've Done!"



Clinical Report

From the Symphony Concerts of Last Friday and Saturday

TRANS FEB 2

"LE SACRE" IN NEW YORK

Mr. Monteux and the Boston Orchestra There Repeat Stravinsky's Ballet as Tone-Poem—Again Music and Performance Prevail—With One Accord a Masterpiece Remarkably Played

An audience that filled Carnegie Hall awaited "The Rite of Spring" in New York on Thursday evening; while, by every account, long and loud was the applause lavished upon Mr. Monteux and the Boston Orchestra when they had done with the music. They had, indeed, earned it. "The playing of 'La Sacre,'" writes Mr. Taylor in The World, "was an amazing feat of virtuosity." "Superb" is the adjective that Mr. Gilman of The Tribune finds for the orchestra and to virtuosity he prefixes "incredible." To Mr. Finck in The Evening Post, "the performance was superlatively fine." So forth and so onward through the other newspapers. Never before in New York has Mr. Monteux worn greener laurels or the orchestra, by him restored at last to its best estate, been more warmly praised.

Likewise of one mind are the reviewers about Stravinsky's music, heard for the first time in New York as in Boston a week ago. With one voice they salute "Le Sacre du Printemps" as a masterpiece. To quote one is virtually to quote all. Yet three shall have hearing. Says Mr. Gilman in The Tribune:

> The music is essentially a barbaric and stupendous spring song. The spring that is celebrated is not, as Mr. Evans has truly pointed out, the poetic conception that has lured the romantics in all ages and in all countries, but "Spring stripped of its literary associations and presented bare, with a naked directness that is the secret of the music's compelling force." He might have gone further, and said that if this music is anything, it is a glorification of spring as the supreme expression of the creative impulse—a primordial spring, savage, elemental, ruthless. Music has long been in love with death—the greatest music in the world, indeed, is music of the ecstasy of death. Here, for the first time, is music of the ecstasy of birth; music [illegible] which is forever rending and tearing, not in order to destroy but in order to emerge. It is not the sound of death battering down and in, but of life hewing and tearing apart, that a new birth may issue out."
>
> What Stravinsky has made of this conception is one of the marvelous things of art, and we fancy it will remain so—a thing of gigantic strength, of terrifying intensity, of overwhelming imaginative veracity. Stravinsky may transcend it, may outgrow it, may disown it; but it will remain a lonely and incomparable achievement, an authentic masterpiece.

Mr. Taylor in The World "can find no word short of masterpiece to describe 'Le Sacre.' It is music of almost unbelievable complexity of orchestral texture, yet essentially as stark and primitive in outline as the wall pictures of a cave-man. It is not beautiful, in any external sense of the word; but it has a power and truth that strike deep, that awaken age-old emotions and desires, almost terrifying in their unfamiliarity. This is great music."

Even Mr. Finck of The Evening Post, commonly counted the reactionary of reactionaries, tosses his cap in the air and exults: "What Stravinsky does with this battery of drums and his other forces transcends belief. Even the Parisian bacchanale in 'Tannhäuser' seems a trifle civilized compared with the orgiastic noises made when the maiden, who has been chosen as the victim of the rites of spring, dances herself to death. . . . What makes all this the more noteworthy is that the audience received only one side of this great work—the music. Stravinsky has reduced it to two dramatic tone-poems with the simple titles, 'The Adoration of the Earth' and 'The Sacrifice.' If this music was so enchanting by itself, what must it be when heard in connection with the action and the dancing! Surely Mr. Gatti cannot withhold 'Le Sacre' from the Metropolitan after this tremendous Stravinsky triumph. There were only two hissers in Carnegie Hall. The rest of the audience was enthusiastic."

Mr. Henderson of The Herald confines himself to sympathetic description of the piece; while The Times slops about bye and large, finally deciding that "the inspiration of this music seems profound and genuine. . . . What stands out technically and emotionally in 'Le Sacre,' and gives it a place significant, as it seems today, in the history of the modern development of an art, is its unprecedented energy, definiteness and power. No orchestra throws off such heat, such sonorities, such galvanizing, rhythmical force as this orchestra of Stravinsky."

POST FEB 3

CONCERTS TO COME

Symphony Concerts

On Monday evening Claudio Arrau, oung Chilean pianist, will make his Boston debut with the Symphony Orhestra in the third of the series of Monday evening concerts. Mr. Arrau, who has made a considerable impresion in various European cities, will be heard in Chopin's Second Concerto. The remaining numbers on the programme are Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony and Charpentier's "Impressions f Italy."

At the regular pair of Symphony Conerts this week Brahms' Third Symhony will begin and Strauss' toneoem, "Death and Transfiguration," will onclude the programme. Between will me Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," with rdinand Motte Lacroix playing the no part

---

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
EAGLE

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

That naïve and delightful bit early program music, the Pasto Symphony, sixth of Beethoven's mortal nine, was chosen by Pierre Monteux to open the third Brooklyn concert of the Boston Symphony, given last evening at the Academy

The choice was a happy one, for the pastoral, inexplicably enough, is among the least often heard of Beethoven's symphonies, though it one of the most enjoyable, recalling the fresh charm of Mozart perhaps more than any other. The first movement is graceful, buoyant; and what a charming storm in miniatu is that of the third! No obstreperou Rossini or self-conscious Berlio composed these delicately descrip tive pages with their murmurin basses and shrill flutes. The secon movement, "Scene by the Brookside with its birdlike woodwinds a facile melodies, was beautifully don for Mr. Monteux is no less adept with Beethoven of the pastoral and Mozart of the "Jupiter" than he is with Debussy or Ravel.

The water coloring of the Pastoral Symphony was emphasized as it [illegible] might have been "La Mere" or Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe," which followed after the intermission.

Ravel's ballet is one of the be and surely the most popular of th things he has done. The wind ma chine of the "Nocturne" is surpri ingly musical in effect—quite diffe ent is the treatment of this mechar ical contrivance in Strauss' "Don Quixote." Monteux's sympathe treatment of modern French is too well established a fac necessitate further comment.

The soloist of the evening wa pianist Alexander Siloti, whose mas terly performance of the Lisz "Dance of Death" served to recal his association as the last of tha virtuoso-composer's great pupils. Mr. Siloti is an artist one can alwa enjoy, for his playing is sincere betrays a thorough understanc both of the music and of the ins ment upon which he plays. studied the "Dance of Death" u Liszt himself, and his memorie the famous pianist have serve make a valuable and entertai little pamphlet.

Mr. Monteux closed the even with Dvorak's "Carnival" overt now seldom heard in concert, haps fortunately, for this work la the interest of the composer's m familiar compositions. The pla of the band, however, left no to be desired, and a [illegible]

[196]

REDUCTION

RATIO

16x

2.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

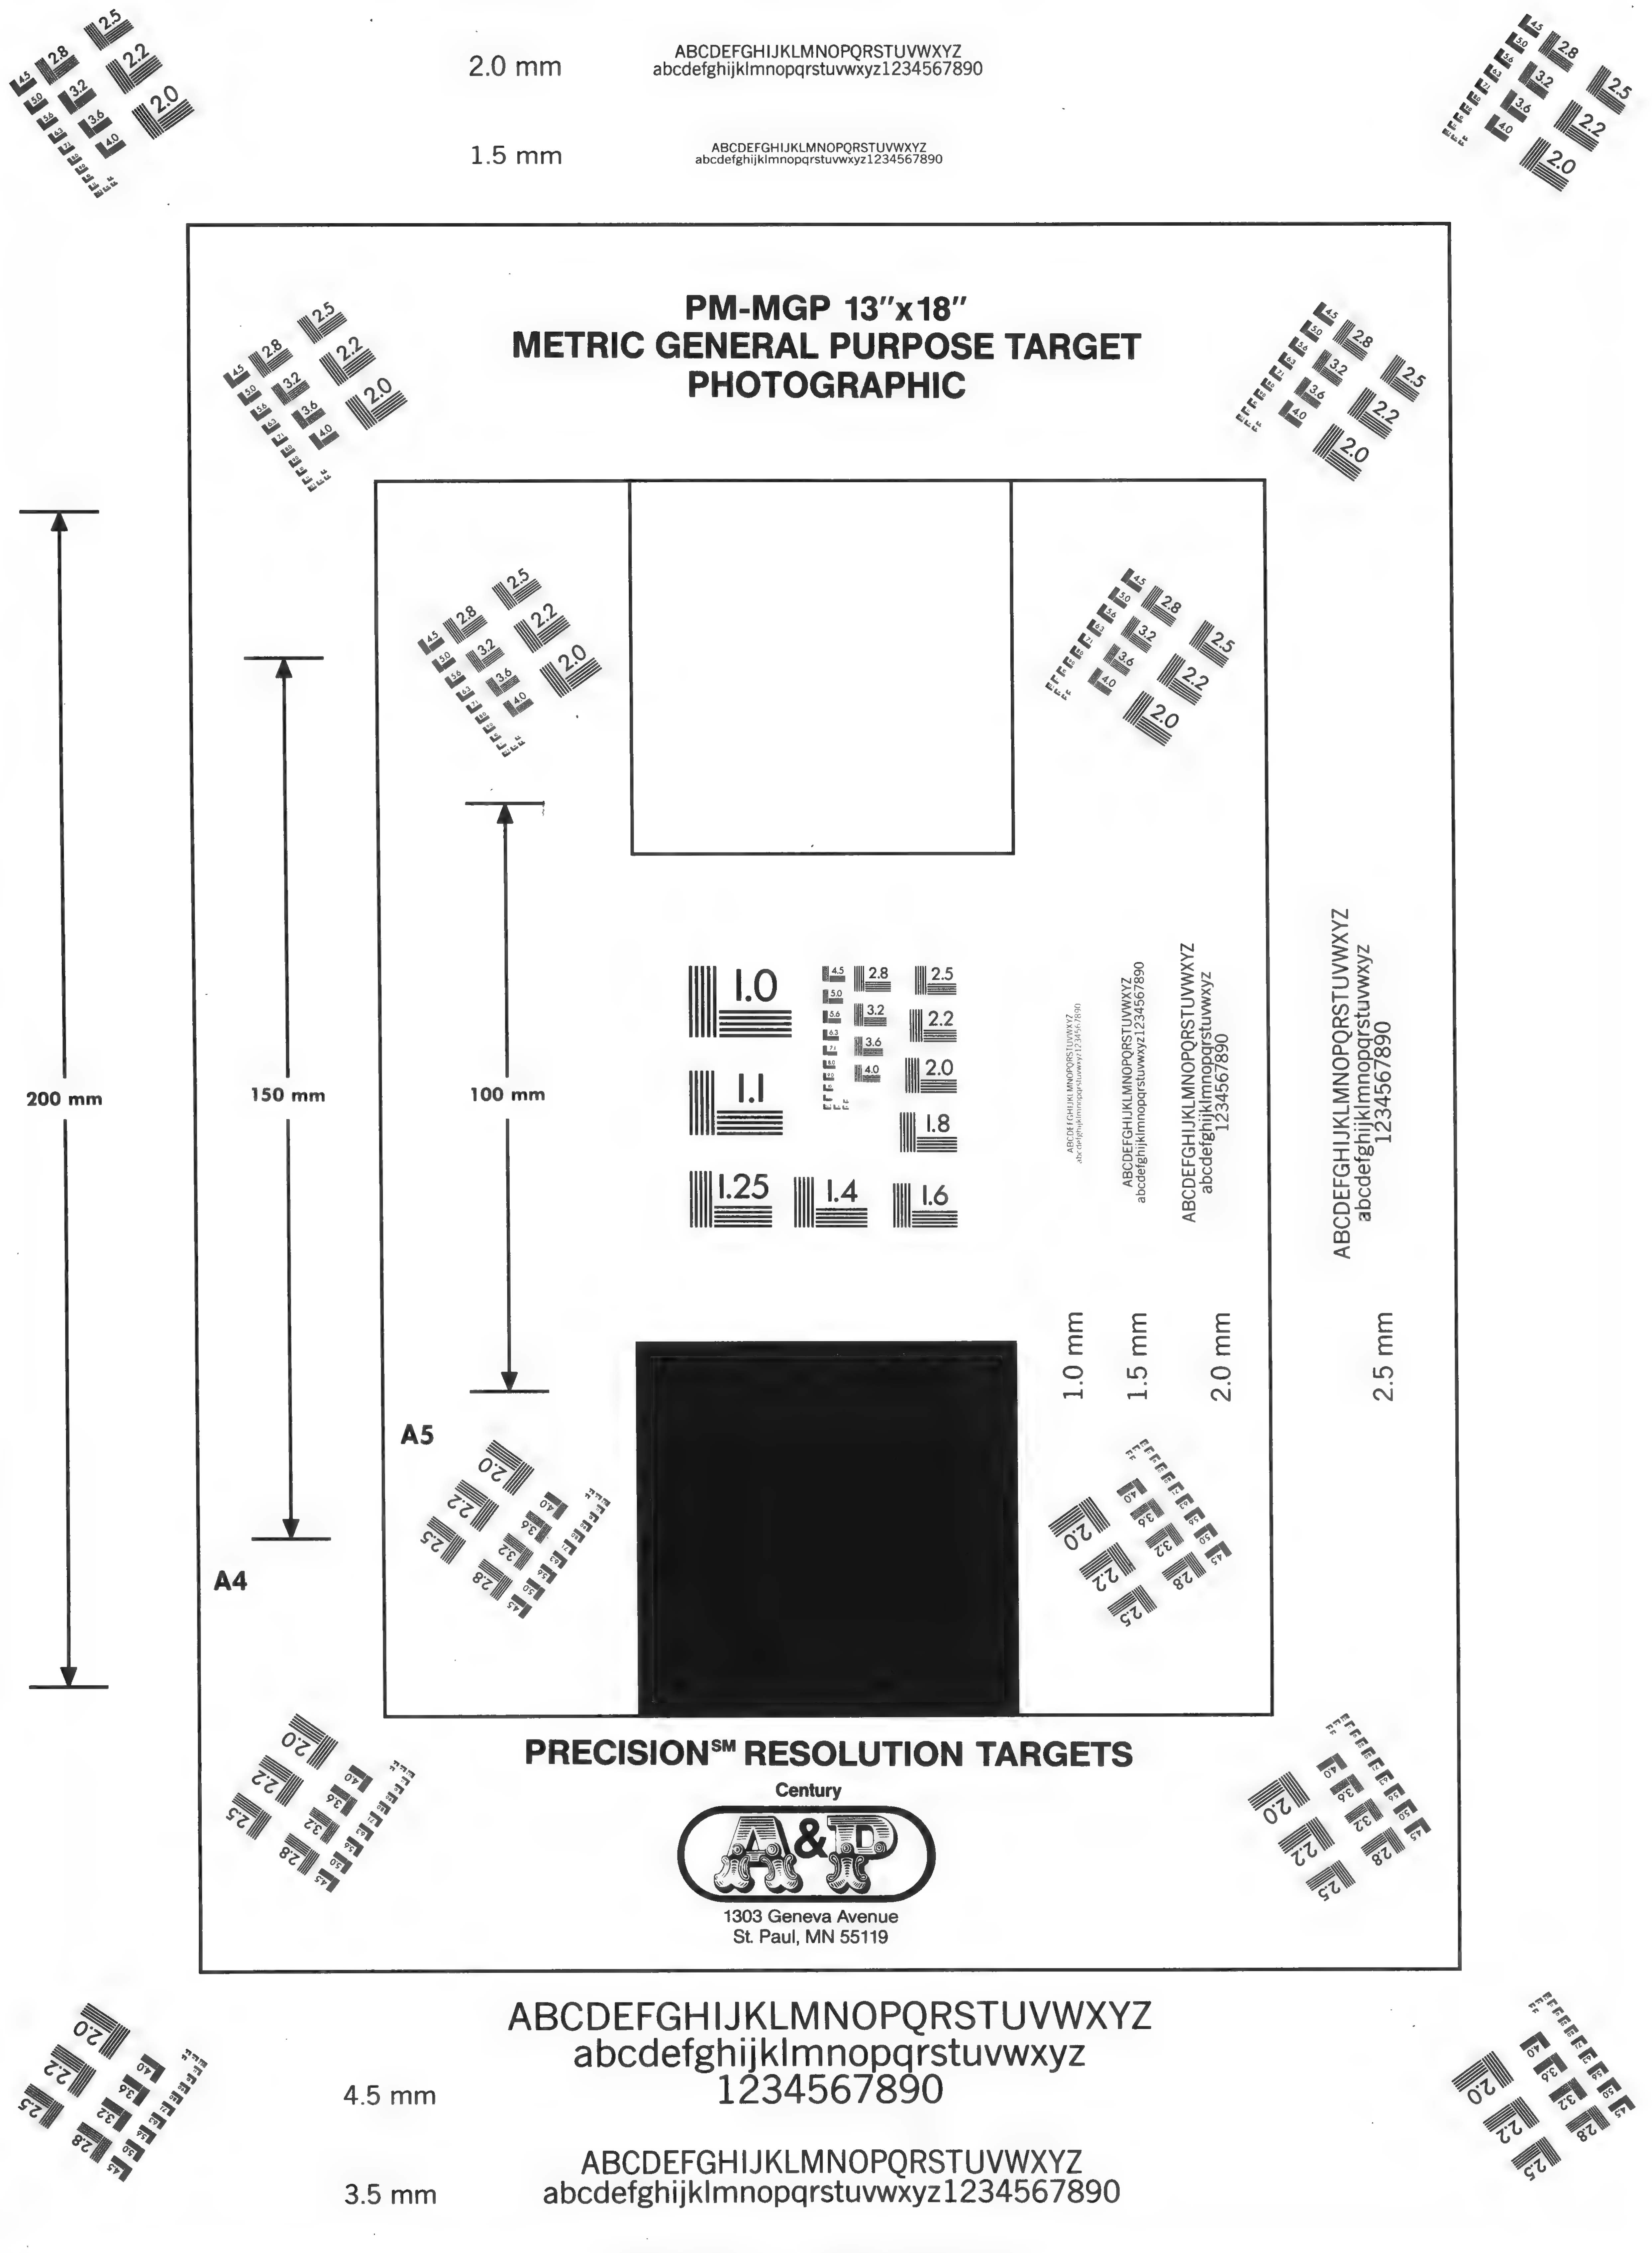
2.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

3.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

INFORMATION OBSCURED

RIBUNE FEB 3

ebussy's Mu to D'Annunzio Play Given by Monteux

Beethoven Pastoral and Liszt "Danse Macabre," With Siloti as Soloist, Included on Boston Symphony Bill

After serving "Le Sacre du Printemps" on Thursday night, Pierre Monteux led the Boston Symphony Orchestra in less pungent music yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. The opening number, Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, marked the opposite pole from Stravinsky, with a sedative charm. It was pleasant in the hands of the Bostonians, who played with a smooth, rich tone that has become characteristic of the organization—but that final thanksgiving in the Pastoral Symphony appears longer at every performance. This one brought prolonged plaudits and a rising orchestra.

A comparative novelty was the suite of four symphonic excerpts from Debussy's music for D'Annunzio's mystery play, "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian." Some of this music, as Mr. Hale reminds us, was performed here twelve years ago by the MacDowell Chorus under Kurt Schindler, and the first movement of this particular orchestral suite, "The Court of the Lilies," opened a Carnegie Hall program of the Philadelphia Orchestra under Mr. Stokowski last season. Yesterday's performance apparently was the first of the suite in full here. The second movement, the most colorful of the four, is the music of the dance of ecstasy and the finale of the first act, while the last two, "Passion" and "The Good Shepherd," which were played without an intervening pause, are cast in a sober, contemplative mood. It is music of a certain plaintiveness, rising to considerable eloquence, but not Debussy at his best. The last two movements, especially, were somewhat monotonous.

Alexander Siloti was the soloist, playing Liszt's paraphrase on the "Dies Iræ" entitled "Todtentanz," or "Danse Macabre," with variations on its theme of every mood, from the dignified and ominous to the light and ornate. Mr. Siloti was in excellent form in a performance of varied color, with fluent lightness and precision in his decorative passages and depth and sonority for h loudest ones, while M. Monteux and musicians gave a spirited accom iment, with thorough unity in the nbined performance of soloist and orchestra. A good sized, though not overflowing, audience waxed most enthusiastic.

THE SYMPHONY RETURNING

TRAN

Mozart, Chopin, Charpentier at the Third " Concert—Brilliant Direction—Changing Light of Modernism

T ze and enthusiasm of the audi t the third of the Monday even ncerts of the Boston Symphony Orch gave continued proof that these are n a permanent institution. At the openi of the concert, as a tribute to the memo of Woodrow Wilson, came an impressi performnace of the Funeral March from Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, Moza s C major Symphony, the second pianof rte Concerto of Chopin and Charpentie s "Impressions of Italy," constituted he announced programme, with Claudi Arrau making his first appearance in Bos n as soloist.

Mr. Monteux's reading of the Symphony was brilliant. The restless tendency to hurry the tempo in tutti passages, often felt in his performances of Mozart and Beethoven, was noticeable only in the last movement, where it could not but impair the clarity of the fugal polyphony. In the slow movement, in spite of an impatience of the ends of phrases, his interpretation was one of serenity and great beauty. It is remarkable that the orchestra can give such performances immediately after the fatigues and interruption of rehearsals, of a tour.

Ideas and treatment of them in the Chopin concerto do not succeed in transcending salon stature and for this reason the piece may be considered an unforunate choice upon which to begin a reputation. Mr. Arrau is a young man of somewhat diffident bearing but decidedly sincere and free from affected mannerisms. He has much to recommend him as an artist, notably a fine rhythmic sense and poetic feeling. He was again unfortunate in the instrument upon which he played. An audience loes not understand that the pianoforte and not the performer was responsible for the metallic tones he sometimes produced. It would be interesting to hear Mr. Arrau play a great work on a beautiful instrument.

Charpentier's picturesque "Italian Impressions" gave the audience unmistakable enjoyment. This music makes no pretensions to greatness and is not ashamed of being merely beautiful at times and at others imitative. It is instructive to note that at its first performance in this country, in 1893, a Chicago critic complained that, in the last movement, "Napoli," the composer, "employs every known means of making a noise." How modest and conservative Charpentier's employment of these resources sounds after Stravinsky's savage assault of ten days ago! The performance of the suite was in every respect artistic and satisfying. The solo for viola in the serenade was played by Mr. Fourel behind the scenes, with a fine, rich, viola tone, and that for 'cello in the last movement by Mr. Bedetti in true Italian style.

W. H. P.

POST FEB 3

WARREN STOREY SMITH

avinsky's fearsome "Sacre du emps" has come and gone at Symphony concerts; and now it behooves Mr. Monteux to the piece at another pair of before many weeks have by the practised listener once so complicated and removed from ordinary experi may not be fully comprehended adequately appreciated at a sin hearing. On repetition much hat was baffling may become clear d much that was uncomfortably scordant may lose its sting.

As heard a second time at the ncert of Saturday evening, the acre du Printemps" made new and more definite impressions. Freed the excitements attendant on the st performance of so important a ce and already familiarized with avinsky's methods and inured to dissonances, the listener might d in the music a deal more of auty, of imagination and of ex essiveness, of design and of cohe nce. On Saturday the "Sacre du intemps" seemed appreciably less rmidable.

To be sure, a few ear-splitting still stabbed the tympanum. ut the human ear is a marvelously laptable mechanism; indeed, the hole istory of music is summed up n the inescapable fact that the dis onances of one generation are the nsonances of the next.

History Repeats Itself

In his ertaining biography of Grieg, Henry T. Finck recalls a conversation with Dvorak in which the composer of the "New World" symphony said that Edouard Hanslick had found certain discords in his (Dvorak's) music "unbearable." Imagine anyone finding today unbearable discords in the music of Dvorak!

Hanslick, as it happened, had an unusually sensitive ear, and it is clear his insensate hatred of the music Wagner, Liszt and Tschaikovsky was less to esthetic differences than to actual physical discomfort that music caused him. We who, in neration, revel in the suave mel and warm harmonies of Tschai y's violin concerto, which Hanslick declared to be music that "stunk e ear," may laugh at the futile gs of that caustic Viennese critic. e in our turn may squirm at the of keys and chords in Milhaud's second suite, in Honegger's "Horace Victorieux," or in Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps," that will in all probability be the harmonic A B C of our grandchildren.

For many the recent performance of the "Sacre du Printemps" was a rarely stimulating experience. That others found Stravinsky's wellnigh incessant dissonance intensely disagreeable may not be doubted. Yet before these wholly condemn Stravinsky's music they should consider the case of 18th century musician who tore up parts of one of Mozart's string quartets when he found that the "wrong notes were written in the music," or of his successor who in a fit of rage trampled upon his copies of Chopin's first set of mazurkas.

Instances such as these may be indefinitely multiplied, and they are forever instructive. It will be remembered that some liberal-minded English reviewer compored the charming melodies in Weber's "Der Freischutz" to wind whistling through a keyhole. Fetis, the most famous French critic of his day, declared that Stephen Heller, not Chopin, was the true poet of the piano, and he pronounced the "Pilgrims' Chorus" in "Tannheuser" a "poor choral, badly harmonized."

"Tannhauser," of course, came in for many a hard knock, while "Tristan and Isolde" and the "Ring" were still more roundly abused. Even Berlioz found the Prelude to "Tristan" an "enigma," and Rossini is said to have remarked that the "Tannhauser" Overture made more sense to him when he turned the score upside down.

When Milhaud's Second Suite was performed in Chicago recently some in the audience hissed. Perhaps the Chicagoans will hiss, too, the "Sacre du Printemps" when it comes their turn to hear it. But in Boston there was no audible protest against Stravinsky's music either on Friday afternoon or on Saturday evening, although many in both audiences did "walk out on it," not only in the pauses between the two parts, but even while the music was still in progress.

No doubt, as in the case of Bliss "Color Symphony" lately played at the Symphony concerts, there have been and will be complaining letters from certain "indignant subscribers." These indignant subscribers are ever with us. When Franck's glorious Symphony was first given here one of them found that music "immoral"—a charge, by the way, that was once brought by the estimable M Apthrop against Tschaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony.

Thus does history endlessly repeat itself. Meantime Mr. Monteux, man of courage that he is, holds fast to his purpose to give to his audiences, whether they like it or no, the new music of importance. And in this he does rightly and wisely. When some wellwisher told good old Carl Zerrahn that Bostonians did not like Wagner, that conductor of the Harvard Musical Association concerts made the memorable reply: "Then they must hear him until they do."

NEW YORK
HERALD

FEB 1-1924

Boston Orchestra Plays Stravinsky's Impressive Ballet

'Le Sacre du Printemps,' Much Discussed Music, Has Performance Here.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The third concert of the Thursday evening series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last evening in Carnegie Hall. The program consisted of Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, the Sibelius violin concerto, with Richard Burgin, concert master of the orchestra, as the soloist, and Igor Stravinsky's ballet "Le Sacre du Printemps." Before this last composition, which was the novelty of the evening, the other two works must shrink into impenetrable shadow. The Stravinsky ballet (given last evening in its concert form, of course) is one of the most vehemently discussed musical creations of this time, and to it alone any consideration—and that too brief—must be accorded this morning.

The ballet is divided into two parts—first, "The Adoration of the Earth," and second, "The Sacrifice." A slow introduction leads the first part to "Omens of Spring." Then follow "Dances of the Youths and Maidens," a rite of incantation with vigorous stamping on the ground. Dance tune for flutes, while trumpets chant a harmonized theme used later. A mock abduction is part of this ritual.

Then come the "Spring Rounds," introduced by a tune for clarinet. The main portion of the dance is based on the theme already announced by the trumpets. Another ceremony: "Games of Rival Towns." An old man, wise, white haired, bearded, enters. He is the celebrant. He prostrates himself. All kiss the ground. A sacred dance follows.

The second part also begins with a slow introduction, which leads to the "Mystic Circle of the Adolescents." Girls dance and play. One must be sacrificed to Spring. The victim is chosen. "Her Glorification." "Evocation of Ancestors." "Ritual Performance of the Ancestors." The chosen victim begins her sacrificial act. She must dance herself to death.

The rhapsodists and the scoffers both have written much mystifying matter about the composition. Stravinsky himself averred that the embryonic theme of the music came to him after he had finished "L'Oiseau de Feu," a brutal theme which suggested to him as a pretext for the developments the prehistoric era of Russia, the age of the primitive man with pagan rites, partly imaginary. Two Russian folk tunes are employed. Other subjects are Russian in character but original with the composer.

The music is the last word in modernism, but in some respects reactionary. It is built upon the polytonal system, which means that melodies in different keys, each resting upon its own harmonies, are heard simultaneously. There is much of the new "dissonant" counterpoint, in which the sum total of harmonization consists of disharmonies produced by the opposition of different sets of chords.

A fact which has been noticed, but whose pregnant significance has not been recognized is that unlike some the French composers whose different sets of chords have equal value, Stravinsky makes one set fundamental and superimposes the others upon it. This fact has a technical importance, though it does not yet sharply impress its difference upon the ear. Stravinsky makes considerable use of the old major and m s, but always in more tha at a time. He also does o write pure melody. Ryth the score is powerful and ofte savage. The subject demanded that kind of treatment. Indeed this work has been called a glorification of rhythm.

The ballet is scored for an orchestra such as Wagner and Strauss have employed, but the composer has shown overwhelming skill in his instrumentation. He plays upon his orchestra as a veritable virtuoso. Many of his most violent harmonies are softened and made to sound rich by his cunning in scoring.

Only a swift impressionistic summary of the work can be given this morning. It is undoubtedly a masterpiece of modernistic music. Stravinsky writes as one to whom these new materials had long been familiar. His outline is sharp. His form is clear. His treatment is intelligible. Nothing apparently is done for the sake of sensationalism. Is the music beautiful? Much of it is very beautiful even to ears trained to old melodic and harmonic formulæ. Some of it is ugly, but the purpose of the ugliness is unmistakable. At times it reaches a sheer brutality and a savage fury, but Stravinsky produces these effects with amazing directness and with the sure hand of a master.

There is much elemental rhythm hammered into the ears pitilessly. There is much suave and almost naive melody possessing the peculiar character of Russian folksong. The polytonal effects stand out stridently in some passages, where their object is manifest. In many other pages the superimposition of tonalities is wrought with inconceivable cunning into a shimmering web of harmony.

It is all music of a kind to which old music lovers will raise passionate objection. Those who have kept abreast of late progress will probably agree with the European critics who declared the work reactionary. But there can be no question about its importance as a demonstration. It is the example par excellence of what the new school stands for and what it can accomplish.

Such music is physical, it is delineative, it is scenic, it is tempestuously irresistible. Whether the calmer heights of spiritual glory are accessible to the thods of composition remains t They are not likely to be sca vinsky, who is a stark rea ve man of music and a mighty giant among his kind.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW YORK
N. Y.
EVENING JOURNAL

-24

STRAVINSK 'SPRING RITE' IN PREMIERE

Boston Orchestra Gives First Local Performance of Music at Carnegie Hall.

For more than ten years those of us who look upon Igor Stravinsky as the most original and powerful creative talent in contemporary music have been waiting for some one to give a performance here of his "Le sacre de printemps," or "The Consecration to Spring." All sorts of comment upon it, following performances in Paris and London, where it was roundly hissed, have floated over to this side of the ocean; some of this comment was weird enough, some of it was very plainly mere nonsense, but a good deal of it whetted one's appetite for the thing itself.—Pierre Monteux and the Boston Orchestra finally played it last night at Carnegie Hall. There were a few self-conscious hisses heard here, too, but the music was so overwhelming in its brutal force that it appeared to leave most of the intending hissers breathless.

The piece is really a pantomime-ballet and was first heard as such, with the stage action done by Serge Diaghilev's Russians, including Vladimir Nijinsky, in Paris in May, 1913. But Stravinsky, on conceived it as symphonic programme music, the way it was played last night. Leopold Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra did it in Philadelphia two years ago, but for some unknown reason they never brought it to New York on any of their visits.

Russia and Beyond.

As programme music, it needs stage action perhaps less than anything else written by Stravinsky for the dance. Some of it, indeed, scarcely needs even programme notes. It is divided into two parts, "The Adoration of the Earth" and "The Sacrifice," and purports to be "A Picture agan Russia." But the music except for the introductio of genuine Russia to its texture, a at a Russian w belo to Russia It touches and depicts d are some of the fundamental primitive emotional that exist anywhere—among the masses to be found every day in New York's subway, in East Africa or in Harlem, and even in Carnegie Hall.

To give you some more definite idea of what the music is about it is perhaps best to print here Stravinsky's own designations of the segments into which it is subdivided. They are these:

I. Introduction—Harbingers of Spring, Dance of the Adolescents—Abduction—Spring Rounds—Games of the Rival Towns—The Procession of the Wise Men—The Adoration of the Earth (The Wise Men) Dance of the Earth.

II. Introduction—Mystic Circles of the Adolescents—Glorification of the Chosen One—Evocation of the Ancestors—Ritual of the Ancestors—The Sacrificial Dance of the Chosen One.

From Terror to Frenzy

In this music some of Stravinsky's more passionate enigmatists have found various matters that seem to us to be very considerably profound nonsense. One of them thinks it is a study of adolescence, another that it is philosophical consideration of the primal energy that is supposed to symbolize life itself. There are more, and similarly. Listening to the music itself, you laugh at them. Tosh, all this sort of thing. Stravinsky has written music that has to do with the expression of that primitive, orgiastic impulse that makes a religion of germination as the animal fact that is at the bottom of all life. It ranges from mystic terror to physical frenzy. And no one has expressed either in music with such terrific force as Stravinsky has here.

We haven't the opportunity now to go into the thing as we should like to. We found a few dull spots in the piece, particularly the two preludes and some of the pages preceding the beginning of the "Dance of Death." But perhaps we were getting a bit tired (the Stravinsky music came at the end of the programme) or perhaps Mr. Monteux didn't do these parts as well as he did some—most—of the others. However, the dull spots, if indeed they are that, are pretty nearly negligible in the face of the rest.

The Super-Dance.

The "Dance of Death" makes all other dances in music seem to be puny exhibitions of a mincing and hypocritical thing. This is what dancing means and dancing is—an expression of fierce emotion with the body. And it is a curious reflection that the dances of to-day are more like this thing than anything we have known about in a couple of centuries or more. Stravinsky's music, as a fact, flings one's mind back to the Elizabethans; to the earlier Italian Renaissance. But after all, the "Dance of Death" and some of the earlier episodes as well in the "Sacre du printemps" are indescribable.

Stravinsky speaks through an enormous orchestra, and sometimes, contrary to his more recent practice, all the instrum are going at once. Of course the e is cacophony; a beating din of it every now and again, pierced with shrieks of pain or of exultation from a piccolo or a trumpet; growls and chortles of spasmodic pleasure, a rage of exultation, all in episodic climax that stops for sheer shortness of breath and physical exhaustion. And at the end there is a glut of rhythm that beats through your ears, through your brain, through your emotions, so that you, too, are left with your heart beating like a triphammer. We saw old men leaning forward in their seats last night as that "Dance of Death" got into its swing—old men came to hiss Stravinsky and stayed to applaud.

Before Stravinsky came—Mozart! Mr. Monteux did this with malice prepense, of course, but the malice would have had more point if he had played Mozart (the "Jupiter" symphony) better. He played it as abominab as he played part of Stravinsky his music of Mozart of pain and its he heart. There w violin concerto betw he two, with Richard Burgin, the concertmaster, as solo violinist—well played technically (its difficulties are gruelling), but not so well otherwise.

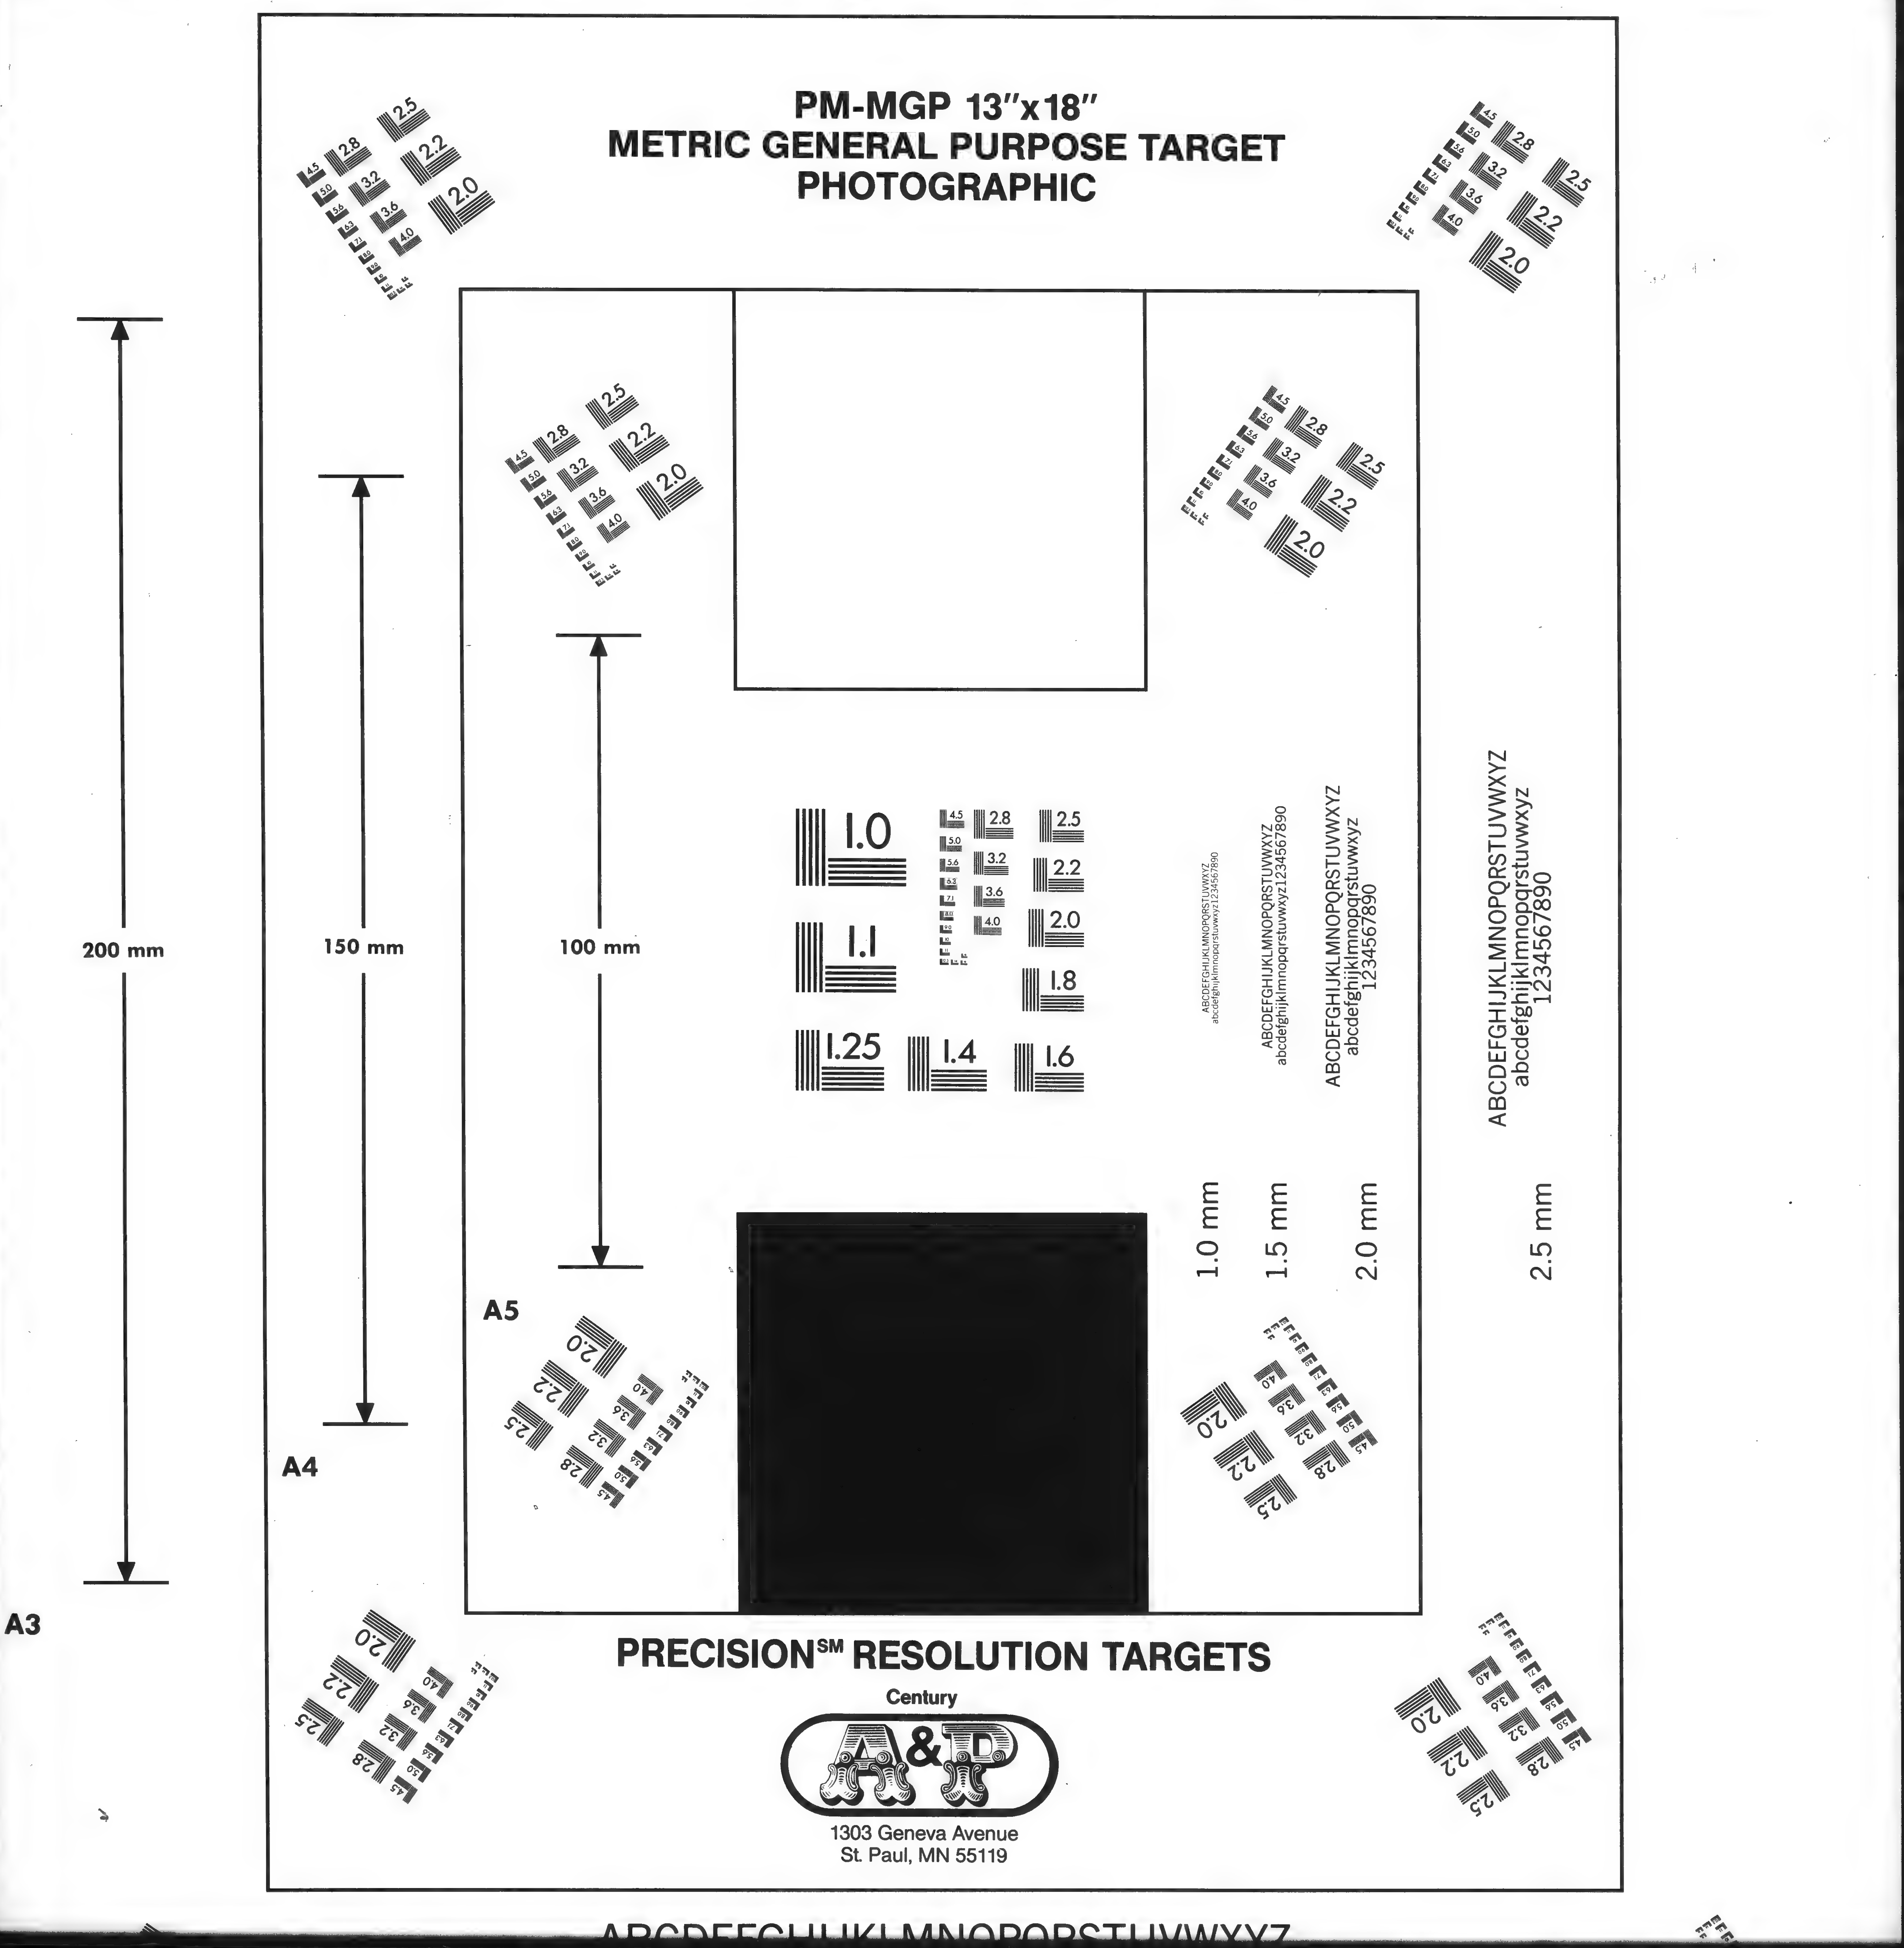
[197]

REDUCTION

RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
2.5
2.2
2.0
1.8
1.6
1.4
1.25
1.1
1.0
200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A3
A4
A5
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

INFORMATION OBSCURED

TRIBUNE FEB 3

ebussy's Music to D'Annunzio Play Given by Monteux

Beethoven Pastoral and Liszt "Danse Macabre," With Siloti as Soloist, Included on Boston Symphony Bill

After serving "Le Sacre du Printemps" on Thursday night, Pierre Monteux led the Boston Symphony Orchestra in less pungent music yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. The opening number, Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, marked the opposite pole from Stravinsky, with a sedative charm. It was pleasant in the hands of the Bostonians, who played with a smooth, rich tone that has become characteristic of the organization—but that final thanksgiving in the Pastoral Symphony appears longer at every performance. This one brought prolonged plaudits and a rising orchestra.

A comparative novelty was the suite of four symphonic excerpts from Debussy's music for D'Annunzio's mystery play, "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian." Some of this music, as Mr. Hale reminds us, was performed here twelve years ago by the MacDowell Chorus under Kurt Schindler, and the first movement of this particular orchestral suite, "The Court of the Lilies," opened a Carnegie Hall program of the Philadelphia Orchestra under Mr. Stokowski last season. Yesterday's performance apparently was the first of the suite in full here. The second movement, the most colorful of the four, is the music of the dance of ecstasy and the finale of the first act, while the last two, "Passion" and "The Good Shepherd," which were played without an intervening pause, are cast in a sober, contemplative mood. It is music of a certain plaintiveness, rising to considerable eloquence, but not Debussy at his best. The last two movements, especially, were somewhat monotonous.

Alexander Siloti was the soloist, playing Liszt's paraphrase on the "Dies Iræ" entitled "Todtentanz," or "Danse Macabre," with variations on its theme of every mood, from the dignified and ominous to the light and ornate. Mr. Siloti was in excellent form in a performance of varied color, with fluent lightness and precision in his decorative passages and depth and sonority for h[illegible] loudest ones, while M. Monteux and [illegible] musicians gave a spirited accompaniment, with thorough unity in the combined performance of soloist and orchestra. A good sized, though not overflowing, audience waxed most enthusiastic.

TRAN[illegible]

THE SYMPHONY RETURNING

Mozart, Chopin, Charpentier at the Third [illegible]" Concert—Brilliant Direction—Changing Light of Modernism

The size and enthusiasm of the audience at the third of the Monday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave continued proof that these are now a permanent institution. At the opening of the concert, as a tribute to the memory of Woodrow Wilson, came an impressive performnace of the Funeral March from Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony. Mozart's C major Symphony, the second pianoforte Concerto of Chopin and Charpentier's "Impressions of Italy," constituted the announced programme, with Claudio Arrau making his first appearance in Boston as soloist.

Mr. Monteux's reading of the Symphony was brilliant. The restless tendency to hurry the tempo in tutti passages, often felt in his performances of Mozart and Beethoven, was noticeable only in the last movement, where it could not but impair the clarity of the fugal polyphony. In the slow movement, in spite of an impatience of the ends of phrases, his interpretation was one of serenity and great beauty. It is remarkable that the orchestra can give such performances immediately after the fatigues and interruption of rehearsals, of a tour.

Ideas and treatment of them in the Chopin concerto do not succeed in transcending salon stature and for this reason the piece may be considered an unforunate choice upon which to begin a reputation. Mr. Arrau is a young man of somewhat diffident bearing but decidedly sincere and free from affected mannerisms. He has much to recommend him as an artist, notably a fine rhythmic sense and poetic feeling. He was again unfortunate in the instrument upon which he played. An audience does not understand that the pianoforte and not the performer was responsible for the metallic tones he sometimes produced. It would be interesting to hear Mr. Arrau play a great work on a beautiful instrument.

Charpentier's picturesque "Italian Impressions" gave the audience unmistakable enjoyment. This music makes no pretensions to greatness and is not ashamed of being merely beautiful at times and at others imitative. It is instructive to note that at its first performance in this country, in 1893, a Chicago critic complained that, in the last movement, "Napoli," the composer, "employs every known means of making a noise." How modest and conservative Charpentier's employment of these resources sounds after Stravinsky's savage assault of ten days ago! The performance of the suite was in every respect artistic and satisfying. The solo for viola in the serenade was played by Mr. Fourel behind the scenes, with a fine, rich, viola tone, and that for 'cello in the last movement by Mr. Bedetti in true Italian style.

W. H. P.

POST FEB 3

WARREN STOREY SMITH

avinsky's fearsome "Sacre du emps" has come and gone at Symphony concerts; and now [illegible] it behooves Mr. Monteux to epea the piece at another pair of once before many weeks have asse wn by the practised listener [illegible] once so complicated and removed from ordinary experience may not be fully comprehended adequately appreciated at a single hearing. On repetition much hat was baffling may become clear d much that was uncomfortably scordant may lose its sting.

As heard a second time at the ncert of Saturday evening, the acre du Printemps" made new and more definite impressions. Freed the excitements attendant on the st performance of so important a ece and already familiarized with avinsky's methods and inured to dissonances, the listener might d in the music a deal more of auty, of imagination and of expressiveness, of design and of coherence. On Saturday the "Sacre du intemps" seemed appreciably less midable.

o be sure, a few ear-splitting [illegible] still stabbed the tympanum. t the human ear is a marvelously aptable mechanism; indeed, the hole history of music is summed up n the inescapable fact that the dissonances of one generation are the nsonances of the next.

History Repeats Itself

In his entertaining biography of Grieg, Henry T. Finck recalls a conversation with Dvorak in which the composer of the "New World" symphony said that Edouard Hanslick had found certain discords in his (Dvorak's) music "unbearable." Imagine anyone finding today unbearable discords in the music of Dvorak!

Hanslick, as it happened, had an unusually sensitive ear, and it is clear [illegible] his insensate hatred of the music [illegible] Wagner, Liszt and Tschaikovsky was [illegible] less to esthetic differences than to [illegible] actual physical discomfort that [illegible] music caused him. We who, in [illegible] generation, revel in the suave melodies and warm harmonies of Tschaikovsky's violin concerto, which Hanslick declared to be music that "stunk [illegible] ear," may laugh at the futile [illegible] of that caustic Viennese critic. [illegible] in our turn may squirm at the [illegible] of keys and chords in Milhaud's econd suite, in Honegger's "Horace ictorieux" or in Stravinsky's "Sacre u Printemps," that will in all probability be the harmonic A B C of our [illegible]children.

For many the recent performance of [illegible] "Sacre du Printemps" was a rarely [illegible]mulating experience. That others [illegible] Stravinsky's wellnigh incessant [illegible] intensely disagreeable may be doubted. Yet before these [illegible] wholly condemn Stravinsky's [illegible] they should consider the case of 18th century musician who tore up parts of one of Mozart's string quartets when he found that the "wrong notes were written in the music," or of his successor who in a fit of rage trampled upon his copies of Chopin's first set of mazurkas.

Instances such as these may be indefinitely multiplied, and they are forever instructive. It will be remembered that some liberal-minded English reviewer compored the charming melodies in Weber's "Der Freischutz" to wind whistling through a keyhole. Fetis, the most famous French critic of his day, declared that Stephen Heller, not Chopin, was the true poet of the piano, and he pronounced the "Pilgrims' Chorus" in "Tannheuser" a "poor choral, badly harmonized."

"Tannhauser," of course, came in for many a hard knock, while "Tristan and Isolde" and the "Ring" were still more roundly abused. Even Berlioz found the Prelude to "Tristan" an "enigma," and Rossini is said to have remarked that the "Tannhauser" Overture made more sense to him when he turned the score upside down.

When Milhaud's Second Suite was performed in Chicago recently some in the audience hissed. Perhaps the Chicagoans will hiss, too, the "Sacre du Printemps" when it comes their turn to hear it. But in Boston there was no audible protest against Stravinsky's music either on Friday afternoon or on Saturday evening, although many in both audiences did "walk out on it," not only in the pauses between the two parts, but even while the music was still in progress.

No doubt, as in the case of Bliss' "Color Symphony" lately played at the Symphony concerts, there have been and will be complaining letters from certain "indignant subscribers." These indignant subscribers are ever with us. When Franck's glorious Symphony was first given here one of them found that music "immoral"—a charge, by the way, that was once brought by the estimable M. Apthrop against Tschaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony.

Thus does history endlessly repeat itself. Meantime Mr. Monteux, man of courage that he is, holds fast to his purpose to give to his audiences, whether they like it or no, the new music of importance. And in this he does rightly and wisely. When some wellwisher told good old Carl Zerrahn that Bostonians did not like Wagner, that conductor of the Harvard Musical Association concerts made the memorable reply: "Then they must hear him until they do."

NEW YORK
HERALD

FEB 1-1924

Boston Orchestra Plays Stravinsky's Impressive Ballet

'Le Sacre du Printemps,' Much Discussed Music, Has Performance Here.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The third concert of the Thursday evening series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last evening in Carnegie Hall. The program consisted of Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, the Sibelius violin concerto, with Richard Burgin, concert master of the orchestra, as the soloist, and Igor Stravinsky's ballet "Le Sacre du Printemps." Before this last composition, which was the novelty of the evening, the other two works must shrink into impenetrable shadow. The Stravinsky ballet (given last evening in its concert form, of course) is one of the most vehemently discussed musical creations of this time, and to it alone any consideration—and that too brief—must be accorded this morning.

The ballet is divided into two parts—first, "The Adoration of the Earth," and second, "The Sacrifice." A slow introduction leads the first part to "Omens of Spring." Then follow "Dances of the Youths and Maidens," a rite of incantation with vigorous stamping on the ground. Dance tune for flutes, while trumpets chant a harmonized theme used later. A mock abduction is part of this ritual.

Then come the "Spring Rounds," introduced by a tune for clarinet. The main portion of the dance is based on the theme already announced by the trumpets. Another ceremony: "Games of Rival Towns." An old man, wise, white haired, bearded, enters. He is the celebrant. He prostrates himself. All kiss the ground. A sacred dance follows.

The second part also begins with a slow introduction, which leads to the "Mystic Circle of the Adolescents." Girls dance and play. One must be sacrificed to Spring. The victim is chosen. "Her Glorification." "Evocation of Ancestors." "Ritual Performance of the Ancestors." The chosen victim begins her sacrificial act. She must dance herself to death.

The rhapsodists and the scoffers both have written much mystifying matter about the composition. Stravinsky himself averred that the embryonic theme of the music came to him after he had finished "L'Oiseau de Feu," a brutal theme which suggested to him as a pretext for the developments the prehistoric era of Russia, the age of the primitive man with pagan rites, partly imaginary. Two Russian folk tunes are employed. Other subjects are Russian in character but original with the composer.

The music is the last word in modernism, but in some respects reactionary. It is built upon the polytonal system, which means that melodies in different keys, each resting upon its own harmonies, are heard simultaneously. There is much of the new "dissonant" counterpoint, in which the sum total of harmonization consists of disharmonies produced by the opposition of different sets of chords.

A fact which has been noticed, but whose pregnant significance has not been recognized is that unlike some the French composers whose different sets of chords have equal value, Stravinsky makes one set fundamental and superimposes the others upon it. This fact has a technical importance, though it does not yet sharply impress its difference upon the ear. Stravinsky makes considerable use of the old major and [illegible], but always in more tha[illegible] at a time. He also does [illegible] o write pure melody. Ryth[illegible] the score is powerful and often savage. The subject demanded that kind of treatment. Indeed this work has been called a glorification of rhythm.

The ballet is scored for an orchestra such as Wagner and Strauss have employed, but the composer has shown overwhelming skill in his instrumentation. He plays upon his orchestra as a veritable virtuoso. Many of his most violent harmonies are softened and made to sound rich by his cunning in scoring.

Only a swift impressionistic summary of the work can be given this morning. It is undoubtedly a masterpiece of modernistic music. Stravinsky writes as one to whom these new materials had long been familiar. His outline is sharp. His form is clear. His treatment is intelligible. Nothing apparently is done for the sake of sensationalism. Is the music beautiful? Much of it is very beautiful even to ears trained to old melodic and harmonic formulæ. Some of it is ugly, but the purpose of the ugliness is unmistakable. At times it reaches a sheer brutality and a savage fury, but Stravinsky produces these effects with amazing directness and with the sure hand of a master.

There is much elemental rhythm hammered into the ears pitilessly. There is much suave and almost naive melody possessing the peculiar character of Russian folksong. The polytonal effects stand out stridently in some passages, where their object is manifest. In many other pages the superimposition of tonalities is wrought with inconceivable cunning into a shimmering web of harmony.

It is all music of a kind to which old music lovers will raise passionate objection. Those who have kept abreast of late progress will probably agree with the European critics who declared the work reactionary. But there can be no question about its importance as a demonstration. It is the example par excellence of what the new school stands for and what it can accomplish.

Such music is physical, it is delineative, it is scenic, it is tempestuously irresistible. Whether the calmer heights of spiritual glory are accessible to the n[illegible]thods of composition remains t[illegible] They are not likely to be sca[illegible]vinsky, who is a stark rea[illegible]ave man of music and a mighty giant among his kind.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW YORK
N. Y.
EVENING JOURNAL

STRAVINSKY'S 'SPRING RITE' IN PREMIERE

Boston Orchestra Gives First Local Performance of Music at Carnegie Hall.

For more than ten years those of us who look upon Igor Stravinsky as the most original and powerful creative talent in contemporary music have been waiting for some one to give a performance here of his "Le sacre de printemps," or "The Consecration to Spring." All sorts of comment upon it, following performances in Paris and London, where it was roundly hissed, have floated over to this side of the ocean; some of this comment was weird enough, some of it was very plainly mere nonsense, but a good deal of it whetted one's appetite for the thing itself.—Pierre Monteux and the Boston Orchestra finally played it last night at Carnegie Hall. There were a few self-conscious hisses heard here, too, but the music was so overwhelming in its brutal force that it appeared to leave most of the attending hissers breathless.

The piece is really a pantomime-ballet and was first heard as such, with the stage action done by Serge Diaghilev's Russians, including Vladimir Nijinsky, in Paris in May, 1913. But Stravinsky, one is told, conceived it as symphonic programme music, the way it was played last night. Leopold Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra did it in Philadelphia two years ago, but for some unknown reason they never brought it to New York on any of their visits.

Russia and Beyond.

As programme music, it needs stage action perhaps less than anything else written by Stravinsky for the dance. Some of it, indeed, scarcely needs even programme notes. It is divided into two parts, "The Adoration of the Earth" and "The Sacrifice," and purports to be "A Picture [illegible] agan Russia." But the music [illegible] except for the introducti[illegible] of genuine Russia[illegible] to its texture, a[illegible]at a Russian wh[illegible] not belong to Russia [illegible]. It touches and depicts and arouses some of the fundamental primitive emotional impulses that exist anywhere—among the masses to be found every day in New York's subway, in East Africa or in Harlem, and even in Carnegie Hall.

To give you some more definite idea of what the music is about it is perhaps best to print here Stravinsky's own designations of the segments into which it is subdivided. They are these:

I. Introduction—Harbingers of Spring, Dance of the Adolescents—Abduction—Spring Rounds—Games of the Rival Towns—The Procession of the Wise Men—The Adoration of the Earth (The Wise Man)—Dance of the Earth.

II. Introduction—Mystic Circles of the Adolescents—Glorification of the Chosen One—Evocation of the Ancestors—Ritual of the Ancestors—The Sacrificial Dance of the Chosen One.

From Terror to Frenzy.

In this music some of Stravinsky's more passionate enigmatists have found various matters that seem to us to be very considerably profound nonsense. One of them thinks it is a study of adolescence, another that it is philosophical consideration of the primal energy that is supposed to symbolize life itself. There are more, and similarly. Listening to the music itself, you laugh at them. Tosh, all this sort of thing. Stravinsky has written music that has to do with the expression of that primitive, orgiastic impulse that makes a religion of germination as the animal fact that is at the bottom of all life. It ranges from mystic terror to physical frenzy. And no one has expressed either in music with such terrific force as Stravinsky has here.

We haven't the opportunity now to go into the thing as we should like to. We found a few dull spots in the piece, particularly the two preludes and some of the pages preceding the beginning of the "Dance of Death." But perhaps we were getting a bit tired (the Stravinsky music came at the end of the programme) or perhaps Mr. Monteux didn't do these parts as well as he did some—most—of the others. However, the dull spots, if indeed they are that, are pretty nearly negligible in the face of the rest.

The Super-Dance.

The "Dance of Death" makes all other dances in music seem to be puny exhibitions of a mincing and hypocritical thing. This is what dancing means and dancing is—an expression of fierce emotion with the body. And it is a curious reflection that the dances of to-day are more like this thing than anything we have known about in a couple of centuries or more. Stravinsky's music, as a fact, flings one's mind back to the Elizabethans; to the earlier Italian Renaissance. But after all, the "Dance of Death" and some of the earlier episodes as well in the "Sacre du printemps" are indescribable.

Stravinsky speaks through an enormous orchestra, and sometimes, contrary to his more recent practice, all the instrume[illegible] are going at once. Of course there is cacophony; a beating din of it every now and again, pierced with shrieks of pain or of exultation from a piccolo or a trumpet; growls and

[197]

...n Boston Symphony Bill

After serving "Le Sacre du Printemps" on Thursday night, Pierre Monteux led the Boston Symphony Orchestra in less pungent music yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. The opening number, Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, marked the opposite pole from Stravinsky, with a sedative charm. It was pleasant in the hands of the Bostonians, who played with a smooth, rich tone that has become characteristic of the organization—but that final thanksgiving in the Pastoral Symphony appears longer at every performance. This one brought prolonged plaudits and a rising orchestra.

A comparative novelty was the suite ... the four, is the music of the dance of ecstasy and the finale of the first act, while the last two, "Passion" and "The Good Shepherd," which were played without an intervening pause, are cast in a sober, contemplative mood. It is music of a certain plaintiveness, rising to considerable eloquence, but not Debussy at his best. The last two movements, especially, were somewhat monotonous.

Alexander Siloti was the soloist, playing Liszt's paraphrase on the "Dies Iræ" entitled "Todtentanz," or "Danse Macabre," with variations on its theme of every mood, from the dignified and ominous to the light and ornate. Mr. Siloti was in excellent form in a performance of varied color, with fluent

---

POST FEB 3

WARREN STOREY SMITH

...avinsky's fearsome "Sacre du ...emps" has come and gone at ...Symphony concerts; and now ...behooves Mr. Monteux to repea... the piece at another pair of once... before many weeks have ...sse...

...n by the practised listener ...si... once so complicated and removed from ordinary experi... may not be fully comprehended ...adequately appreciated at a single hearing. On repetition much that was baffling may become clear and much that was uncomfortably ...scordant may lose its sting.

As heard a second time at the ...ncert of Saturday evening, the ...acre du Printemps" made new and ... more definite impressions. Freed ... the excitements attendant on the ...st performance of so important a ...ece and already familiarized with ...avinsky's methods and inured to ... dissonances, the listener might ...d in the music a deal more of ...auty, of imagination and of expressiveness, of design and of coherence. On Saturday the "Sacre du Printemps" seemed appreciably less formidable.

To be sure, a few ear-splitting ... still stabbed the tympanum. ...ut the human ear is a marvelously adaptable mechanism; indeed, the whole history of music is summed up ...n the inescapable fact that the dissonances of one generation are the consonances of the next.

History Repeats Itself

In his entertaining biography of Grieg, Henry T. Finck recalls a conversation with Dvorak in which the composer of the "New World" symphony said that Edouard Hanslick had found certain discords in his (Dvorak's) music "unbearable." Imagine anyone finding today unbearable discords in the music of Dvorak!

Hanslick, as it happened, had an unusually sensitive ear, and it is clear ... his insensate hatred of the music ...Wagner, Liszt and Tschaikovsky was ... less to esthetic differences than to ... actual physical discomfort that ...eir music caused him. We who, in ...neration, revel in the suave mel... and warm harmonies of Tschai...sky's violin concerto, which Han... declared to be music that "stunk ...e ear," may laugh at the futile ...gs of that caustic Viennese critic. ...e in our turn may squirm at the ...as! of keys and chords in Milhaud's ...econd suite, in Honegger's "Horace ...ictorieux" or in Stravinsky's "Sacre ...u Printemps," that will in all probability be the harmonic A B C of our ...andchildren.

For many the recent performance of ... "Sacre du Printemps" was a rarely ...imulating experience. That others ...ound Stravinsky's wellnigh incessant dissonance intensely disagreeable may ... be doubted. Yet before these ...r wholly condemn Stravinsky's ...ic they should consider the case of 18th century musician who tore up parts of one of Mozart's string quartets when he found that the "wrong notes were written in the music," or of his successor who in a fit of rage trampled upon his copies of Chopin's first set of mazurkas.

Instances such as these may be indefinitely multiplied, and they are forever instructive. It will be remembered that some liberal-minded English reviewer compored the charming melodies in Weber's "Der Freischutz" to wind whistling through a keyhole. Fetis, the most famous French critic of his day, declared that Stephen Heller, not Chopin, was the true poet of the piano, and he pronounced the "Pilgrims' Chorus" in "Tannheuser" a "poor choral, badly harmonized."

"Tannhauser," of course, came in for many a hard knock, while "Tristan and Isolde" and the "Ring" were still more roundly abused. Even Berlioz found the Prelude to "Tristan" an "enigma," and Rossini is said to have remarked that the "Tannhauser" Overture made more sense to him when he turned the score upside down.

When Milhaud's Second Suite was performed in Chicago recently some in the audience hissed. Perhaps the Chicagoans will hiss, too, the "Sacre du Printemps" when it comes their turn to hear it. But in Boston there was no audible protest against Stravinsky's music either on Friday afternoon or on Saturday evening, although many in both audiences did "walk out on it," not only in the pauses between the two parts, but even while the music was still in progress.

No doubt, as in the case of Bliss "Color Symphony" lately played at the Symphony concerts, there have been and will be complaining letters from certain "indignant subscribers." These indignant subscribers are ever with us. When Franck's glorious Symphony was first given here one of them found that music "immoral"—a charge, by the way, that was once brought by the estimable M. Apthrop against Tschaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony.

Thus does history endlessly repeat itself. Meantime Mr. Monteux, man of courage that he is, holds fast to his purpose to give to his audiences, whether they like it or no, the new music of importance. And in this he does rightly and wisely. When some wellwisher told good old Carl Zerrahn that Bostonians did not like Wagner, that conductor of the Harvard Musical Association concerts made the memorable reply: "Then they must hear him until they do."

Changing Light of Modernism

The ...ze and enthusiasm of the audi... at the third of the Monday even... concerts of the Boston Symphony Orche... gave continued proof that these are n... a permanent institution. At the openi... of the concert, as a tribute to the memo... of Woodrow Wilson, came an impressi... performnace of the Funeral March from Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, Mozar...s C major Symphony, the second pianof...rte Concerto of Chopin and Charpentie...s "Impressions of Italy," constituted the announced programme, with Claudi... Arrau making his first appearance in Bos...n as soloist.

Mr. Monteux's reading of the Symphony was brilliant. The restless tendency to hurry the tempo in tutti passages, often felt in his performances of Mozart and Beethoven, was noticeable only in the last movement, where it could not but impair the clarity of the fugal polyphony. In the slow movement, in spite of an impatience of the ends of phrases, his interpretation was one of serenity and great beauty. It is remarkable that the orchestra can give such performances immediately after the fatigues and interruption of rehearsals, of a tour.

Ideas and treatment of them in the Chopin concerto do not succeed in transcending salon stature and for this reason the piece may be considered an unforunate choice upon which to begin a reputation. Mr. Arrau is a young man of somewhat diffident bearing but decidedly sincere and free from affected mannerisms. He has much to recommend him as an artist, notably a fine rhythmic sense and poetic feeling. He was again unfortunate in the instrument upon which he played. An audience does not understand that the pianoforte and not the performer was responsible for the metallic tones he sometimes produced. It would be interesting to hear Mr. Arrau play a great work on a beautiful instrument.

Charpentier's picturesque "Italian Impressions" gave the audience unmistakable enjoyment. This music makes no pretensions to greatness and is not ashamed of being merely beautiful at times and at others imitative. It is instructive to note that at its first performance in this country, in 1893, a Chicago critic complained that, in the last movement, "Napoli," the composer, "employs every known means of making a noise." How modest and conservative Charpentier's employment of these resources sounds after Stravinsky's savage assault of ten days ago! The performance of the suite was in every respect artistic and satisfying. The solo for viola in the serenade was played by Mr. Fourel behind the scenes, with a fine, rich, viola tone, and that for 'cello in the last movement by Mr. Bedetti in true Italian style.

W. H. P.

[197]

...Discussed Music, Has Performance Here.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The third concert of the Thursday evening series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last evening in Carnegie Hall. The program consisted of Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, the Sibelius violin concerto, with Richard Burgin, concert master of the orchestra, as the soloist, and Igor Stravinsky's ballet "Le Sacre du Printemps." Before this last composition, which was the novelty of the evening, the other two works must shrink into impenetrable shadow. The Stravinsky ballet (given last evening in its concert form, of course) is one of the most vehemently discussed musical creations of this time, and to it alone any consideration—and that too brief—must be accorded this morning.

The ballet is divided into two parts—first, "The Adoration of the Earth," and second, "The Sacrifice." A slow introduction leads the first part to "Omens of Spring." Then follow "Dances of the Youths and Maidens," a rite of incantation with vigorous stamping on the ground. Dance tune for flutes, while trumpets chant a harmonized theme used later. A mock abduction is part of this ritual.

Then come the "Spring Rounds," introduced by a tune for clarinet. The main portion of the dance is based on the theme already announced by the trumpets. Another ceremony: "Games of Rival Towns." An old man, wise, white haired, bearded, enters. He is the celebrant. He prostrates himself. All kiss the ground. A sacred dance follows.

The second part also begins with a slow introduction, which leads to the "Mystic Circle of the Adolescents." Girls dance and play. One must be sacrificed to Spring. The victim is chosen. "Her Glorification." "Evocation of Ancestors." "Ritual Performance of the Ancestors." The chosen victim begins her sacrificial act. She must dance herself to death.

The rhapsodists and the scoffers both have written much mystifying matter about the composition. Stravinsky himself averred that the embryonic theme of the music came to him after he had finished "L'Oiseau de Feu," a brutal theme which suggested to him as a pretext for the developments the prehistoric era of Russia, the age of the primitive man with pagan rites, partly imaginary. Two Russian folk tunes are employed. Other subjects are Russian in character but original with the composer.

The music is the last word in modernism, but in some respects reactionary. It is built upon the polytonal system, which means that melodies in different keys, each resting upon its own harmonies, are heard simultaneously. There is much of the new "dissonant" counterpoint, in which the sum total of harmonization consists of disharmonies produced by the opposition of different sets of chords.

A fact which has been noticed, but whose pregnant significance has not been recognized is that unlike some the French composers whose different sets of chords have equal value, Stravinsky makes one set fundamental and superimposes the others upon it. This fact has a technical importance, though it does not yet sharply impress its difference upon the ear. Stravinsky makes considerable use of the old major and m[illegible], but always in more tha[illegible] at a time. He also does [illegible] o write pure melody. Ryth[illegible] the score is powerful and often savage. The subject demanded that kind of treatment. Indeed this work has been called a glorification of rhythm.

The ballet is scored for an orchestra such as Wagner and Strauss have employed, but the composer has shown overwhelming skill in his instrumentation. He plays upon his orchestra as a veritable virtuoso. Many of his most violent harmonies are softened and made to sound rich by his cunning in scoring.

Only a swift impressionistic summary of the work can be given this morning. It is undoubtedly a masterpiece of modernistic music. Stravinsky writes as one to whom these new materials had long been familiar. His outline is sharp. His form is clear. His treatment is intelligible. Nothing apparently is done for the sake of sensationalism. Is the music beautiful? Much of it is very beautiful even to ears trained to old melodic and harmonic formulæ. Some of it is ugly, but the purpose of the ugliness is unmistakable. At times it reaches a sheer brutality and a savage fury, but Stravinsky produces these effects with amazing directness and with the sure hand of a master.

There is much elemental rhythm hammered into the ears pitilessly. There is much suave and almost naive melody possessing the peculiar character of Russian folksong. The polytonal effects stand out stridently in some passages, where their object is manifest. In many other pages the superimposition of tonalities is wrought with inconceivable cunning into a shimmering web of harmony.

It is all music of a kind to which old music lovers will raise passionate objection. Those who have kept abreast of late progress will probably agree with the European critics who declared the work reactionary. But there can be no question about its importance as a demonstration. It is the example par excellence of what the new school stands for and what it can accomplish.

Such music is physical, it is delineative, it is scenic, it is tempestuously irresistible. Whether the calmer heights of spiritual glory are accessible to the n[illegible]thods of composition remains t[illegible] They are not likely to be sca[illegible]vinsky, who is a stark rea[illegible]ive man of music and a mighty giant among his kind.

...IN PREMIERE

Boston Orchestra Gives First Local Performance of Music at Carnegie Hall.

For more than ten years those of us who look upon Igor Stravinsky as the most original and powerful creative talent in contemporary music have been waiting for some one to give a performance here of his "Le sacre de printemps," or "The Consecration to Spring." All sorts of comment upon it, following performances in Paris and London, where it was roundly hissed, have floated over to this side of the ocean; some of this comment was weird enough, some of it was very plainly mere nonsense, but a good deal of it whetted one's appetite for the thing itself. Pierre Monteux and the Boston Orchestra finally played it last night at Carnegie Hall. There were a few self-conscious hisses heard here, too, but the music was so overwhelming in its brutal force that it appeared to leave most of the intending hissers breathless.

The piece is really a pantomime-ballet and was first heard as such, with the stage action done by Serge Diaghilev's Russians, including Vladimir Nijinsky, in Paris in May, 1913. But Stravinsky, one is told, conceived it as symphonic programme music, the way it was played last night. Leopold Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra did it in Philadelphia two years ago, but for some unknown reason they never brought it to New York on any of their visits.

Russia and Beyond.

As programme music, it needs stage action perhaps less than anything else written by Stravinsky for the dance. Some of it, indeed, scarcely needs even programme notes. It is divided into two parts, "The Adoration of the Earth" and "The Sacrifice," and purports to be "A Picture [illegible] agan Russia." But the music [illegible] except for the introducti[illegible] of genuine Russia[illegible] to its texture, a[illegible] at a Russian wh[illegible] belon to Russia [illegible]. It touches and depicts [illegible] some of the fundamental primitive emotional [illegible] that exist anywhere—among the masses to be found every day in New York's subway, in East Africa or in Harlem, and even in Carnegie Hall.

To give you some more definite idea of what the music is about it is perhaps best to print here Stravinsky's own designations of the segments into which it is subdivided. They are these:

I. Introduction—Harbingers of Spring, Dance of the Adolescents—Abduction—Spring Rounds—Games of the Rival Towns—The Procession of the Wise Men—The Adoration of the Earth (The Wise Man)—Dance of the Earth.

II. Introduction—Mystic Circles of the Adolescents—Glorification of the Chosen One—Evocation of the Ancestors—Ritual of the Ancestors—The Sacrificial Dance of the Chosen One.

From Terror to Frenzy.

In this music some of Stravinsky's more passionate enigmatists have found various matters that seem to us to be very considerably profound nonsense. One of them thinks it is a study of adolescence, another that it is philosophical consideration of the primal energy that is supposed to symbolize life itself. There are more, and similarly. Listening to the music itself, you laugh at them. Tosh, all this sort of thing. Stravinsky has written music that has to do with the expression of that primitive, orgiastic impulse that makes a religion of germination as the animal fact that is at the bottom of all life. It ranges from mystic terror to physical frenzy. And no one has expressed either in music with such terrific force as Stravinsky has here.

We haven't the opportunity now to go into the thing as we should like to. We found a few dull spots in the piece, particularly the two preludes and some of the pages preceding the beginning of the "Dance of Death." But perhaps we were [illegible] getting a bit tired (the Stravinsky music came at the end of the programme) or perhaps Mr. Monteux didn't do these parts as well as he did some—most—of the others. However, the dull spots, if indeed they are that, are pretty nearly negligible in the face of the rest.

The Super-Dance.

The "Dance of Death" makes all other dances in music seem to be puny exhibitions of a mincing and hypocritical thing. This is what dancing means and dancing is—an expression of fierce emotion with the body. And it is a curious reflection that the dances of to-day are more like this thing than anything we have known about in a couple of centuries or more. Stravinsky's music, as a fact, flings one's mind back to the Elizabethans; to the earlier Italian Renaissance. But after all, the "Dance of Death" and some of the earlier episodes as well in the "Sacre du printemps" are indescribable.

Stravinsky speaks through an enormous orchestra, and sometimes, contrary to his more recent practice, all the instrum[illegible] are going at once. Of course the[illegible] cacophony; a beating din of it every now and again, pierced with shrieks of pain or of exultation from a piccolo or a trumpet; growls and chortles of spasmodic pleasure, a rage of exultation, all in episodic climax that stops for sheer shortness of breath and physical exhaustion. And at the end there is a glut of rhythm that beats through your ears, through your brain, through your emotions, so that you, too, are left with your heart beating like a triphammer. We saw old men leaning forward in their seats last night as that "Dance of Death" got into its swing—old men who came to hiss Stravinsky and stayed to applaud.

Before Stravinsky came—Mozart! Mr. Monteux did this with malice prepense, of course, but the malice would have had more point if he had played Mozart (the "Jupiter" symphony) better. He played it as abominab[illegible] as he played part of Stravinsky [illegible] his music of Mozart [illegible] of pain and its [illegible] the heart. There w[illegible] violin concerto betw[illegible] the two, with Richard Burgin, the concertmaster, as solo violinist—well played technically (its difficulties are gruelling), but not so well otherwise.

THE RK
URNAL

1924
SK
RITE' IERE

ives First of Music Hall.

ears those ct or Stravinsky and powerful contemporary ing for some nance here of Printemps," or Spring." All it, following and London.
hissed, have side of the comment was of it was very e, but a good one's appetite
Pierre Monon Orchestra night at Car-ere a few self-heard here, too, so overwhelm-
e that it ap-of the intend-

a pantomimeheard as such,
one by Serge
s, including Paris in May.
one is told,
phonic pro-ay it was opold Sto elphia Or elphia two unknown ght it to visits.

nd.
it needs than any-

Stravinsky
, indeed, programme
e Stra-
end of ps Mr. parts as
—of the ll spots, e pretty e of the akes all m to be cing and is what g is—an on with ious re-to-day an any-ut in a Stravgs one's ans; to ce. But th" and as well ps" are ugh an metimes, nt pracre going aco it every th shrieks rom a pic-owls and leasure, a n episodic heer shortysical ex-d there is ts through our brain

o that you heart beat
We saw old their seats
e of Death men and stayed

e—Mozart!
ith malice
the malice point if he e "Jupiter" played it as ed part of is music of of pain
he heart.
with Richrtmaster, as yed techni-
his gruelling)

---

w York Tribune Jan 21

re du Printemps," New to w York, To Be Played Here

Stravinsky's Famous Work on Forthcoming Pro- ms of Two Orchestras; A Description of the Music and the Original Ballet

By Lawrence Gilman

THE announcement that both Mr. Mengelberg, with the Philharmonic, and Mr. Monteux, with the Boston Symphony, are to exhibit to us before long Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" revives in us an old perplexity. We have often thought that it would be difficult to explain to an inquiring guest critic from Mars why it is that one of the most famous scores of our time has never been heard in New York. The concert version of "Le Sacre du Printemps" has been repeatedly performed abroad by Pierre Monteux, Sergei Koussevitzky, Eugène Goossens and others. In London, indeed, the work is almost as old a story as the C minor Symphony of Brahms; but New York, the most backward of musical capitals, has yet to hear it. The sleepless Mr. Stokowski, who lets few things escape him, performed "Le Sacre du Printemps" in Philadelphia, for the first time in America, two seasons ago (March 3, 1922); but, for reasons best known to himself, he did not disclose it to New York. There are doubtless good reasons why Mr. Damrosch, Mr. Mengelberg, Mr. Stransky, Mr. Monteux and our other orchestral providers have withheld the work from their respective publics, though we are unable to guess what those reasons may be. Our alert conductors cannot have felt any doubt as to the artistic importance of the work. For even musicians who do not belong to the Extreme Left have frankly recognized the extraordinary power and originality of the music.

In view of the approaching performances of the work, it may not be amiss to take a look at it in this place, since no detailed description of it has ever been made generally available for American music-lovers. The orchestral score is published, and may be had in the convenient pocket edition issued by the Russische Musik Verlag.

* * *

Stravinsky's unprecedented work, in its original incarnation as a ballet, was designated by its sub-title as "Tableaux of Pagan Russia, in Two Parts." It was produced for the first time by Diaghileff at the Théâtre des Champs Elysées, Paris, on May 29, 1913, with a scenario by Nicholas Roerich and choreography by Nijinsky. Stravinsky composed the music in 1912-'13, shortly before he finished "Le Rossignol." Its reception at Paris was uproarious, with an obbligato of hissing, cat-calls and fisticuffs, and counter demonstrations by the well disposed. The ballet was given in London during the summer of 1913, and there was a concert performance of the music the following year in Paris, under Pierre Monteux. On June 7, 1921, Eugène Goossens produced the work in concert form at Queen's Hall, London, for the first time in England, causing extraordinary public excitement and a cloud of critical, expository and dialectical dust the like of which had not been known since the almost forgotten days when Richard Strauss's "Zarathustra" and "Heldenleben" and "Don Quixote" were new and strange.

* * *

Although the music of "Le Sacre du Printemps" in its original form as a ballet was obviously devised to express an imaginative conception, those who speak authoritatively for Stravinsky insist that the score, which remains unchanged in the concert version, "is to be regarded as abstract music." They insist that it is, "in all but name, a modern symphony." Yet in the published score the titles and superscriptions associated with the ballet in the original version are retained, and Mr. Edwin Evans, who was the official expounder of the work in London, used them in his description and blandly discussed the work as if it were not "abstract music" at all, but the most out-and-out order of program music. And indeed the music as a concert piece would be utterly unintelligible were not this method used in elucidating it.

* * *

"Le Sacre du Printemps," or "The Rite of Spring," as it was called in London (Stravinsky's Russian title means literally "Spring's Consecration"), deals with the worship of the forces of Nature by primitive man. On the surface it is a representation, conceived in terms of the dance, of a prehistoric religious ritual, devoted to the mystical adoration of Spring as the sign of fertility, and culminating in a propitiatory sacrifice. It is perhaps not inappropriate to recall here that one of the principles of what Frazer in "The Golden Bough" calls "sympathetic magic" (which plays a large part in most systems of superstition) is that "any effect may be produced by imitating it. . . . If it is desired to kill a person, an image of him is made and then destroyed." The decay of vegetation in Winter was readily interpreted by pagan man as an enfeeblement of the impulse of fertility. "The spirit (he thought) had grown old and weak, and must therefore be renovated by being slain and brought to life in a younger and fresher form. . . . Thus, the killing of a representative of the tree-spirit in Spring was regarded as a means to promote icken the growth of vegetation."

* * *

Stravinsky "knows that life is energy," wrote Edith Sitwell, "and that the very fact of that life will eventually push us over the abyss, into the waiting and intolerable darkness. In the 'Sacre du Printemps' he gives us the beginning of energy, the enormous and terrible shaping of the visible and insensible world through movement."

Not only the unseen forces, said another commentator at the time of the first London performances, "but also all tangible and visible things in nature, all the various aspects of animal, vegetable and mineral life participate in the spring rite. Stravinsky's genius divests his instruments of their usual literary and sentimental associations and makes them instead expressions of the essence from which they spring. He recaptures the significance of their origins in the world of nature and makes audible that conflict which is forever rending and tearing, not in order to destroy, but in order to emerge. It is not the sound of death battering down and in, but of life knocking, hewing and tearing apart that a new birth may issue out."

Mr. Evans preferred to find in Stravinsky's ballet, behind the outward pretext of a Rite, the deeper thought of "the marvelous power inherent in all nature to grow, to develop, and to assume new forms. This power is so great that it affects nature herself with a tremor, expressing itself in uneasiness at the critical period of adolescence in all living things. It is that tremor, that inner disturbance, which is the underlying thought of 'Le Sacre du Printemps.'"

*

The work is in two parts. The subject of the first part is the fertility of the earth; that of the second part is concerned with the sacrifice.

There is first an Introduction, a section of seventy-five bars in slow tempo, designed to suggest "the mystery of the physical world in spring." The orchestral color here is derived chiefly from the woodwind, for Stravinsky is said to mistrust the strings because of their "facile expressiveness," and to prefer the "dryness" of the woodwind as conveying a "more austere" variety of truth. Some, hearing certain passages in this Introduction, will conclude that there were fauns and naiads in prehistoric Russia, as well as in the pagan Gallic world of Mallarmé and Debussy.

* * *

At this point in the original ballet the curtain rises and the action begins ("Dances of the Adolescents": Tempo giusto 2-4). The Adolescents perform a rite of incantation, which consists of stamping heavily upon the ground, and the strings reiterate, forte, with unevenly placed accents emphasized by the horns, a chord that is half in A flat and half in E natural. Youths and maidens participate in this ceremonial worship of the Earth, costumed in robes of contrasting colors against a scenic background which "might well have been designed to suggest laconicism in painting." Under a charming dance tune for the flutes, four trumpets chant a simply harmonized theme which will be heard again later. A mock abduction follows as part of the ritual, accompanied by an agitated passage (presto) in rapidly changing rhythms —9-8, 4-8, 5-8, 12-8, 7-8. Then comes a "Horovod" entitled, in the score, "Rondes Printanières," introduced (Tranquillo, A flat, 5-4) by a clarinet with a captivating tune in the style of a Russian folksong, under flute trills on E flat, with the time changing constantly.

After this preluding comes the main portion of the dance, based on the chant-like theme previously played by the trumpets (Sostenuto e pesante, at first in 4-4 time), now scored for strings, horns and woodwind, later for the full orchestra. The harmonization at the start is in no degree suggestive of the procedures of the ungodly, although the tonal atmosphere becomes increasingly acrid. Another ceremonial follows, a sort of community contest ("Jeux des Cités Rivals": molto allegro, in rapidly changing rhythms); the principal motif is a phrase harmonized for the most part in blameless thirds.

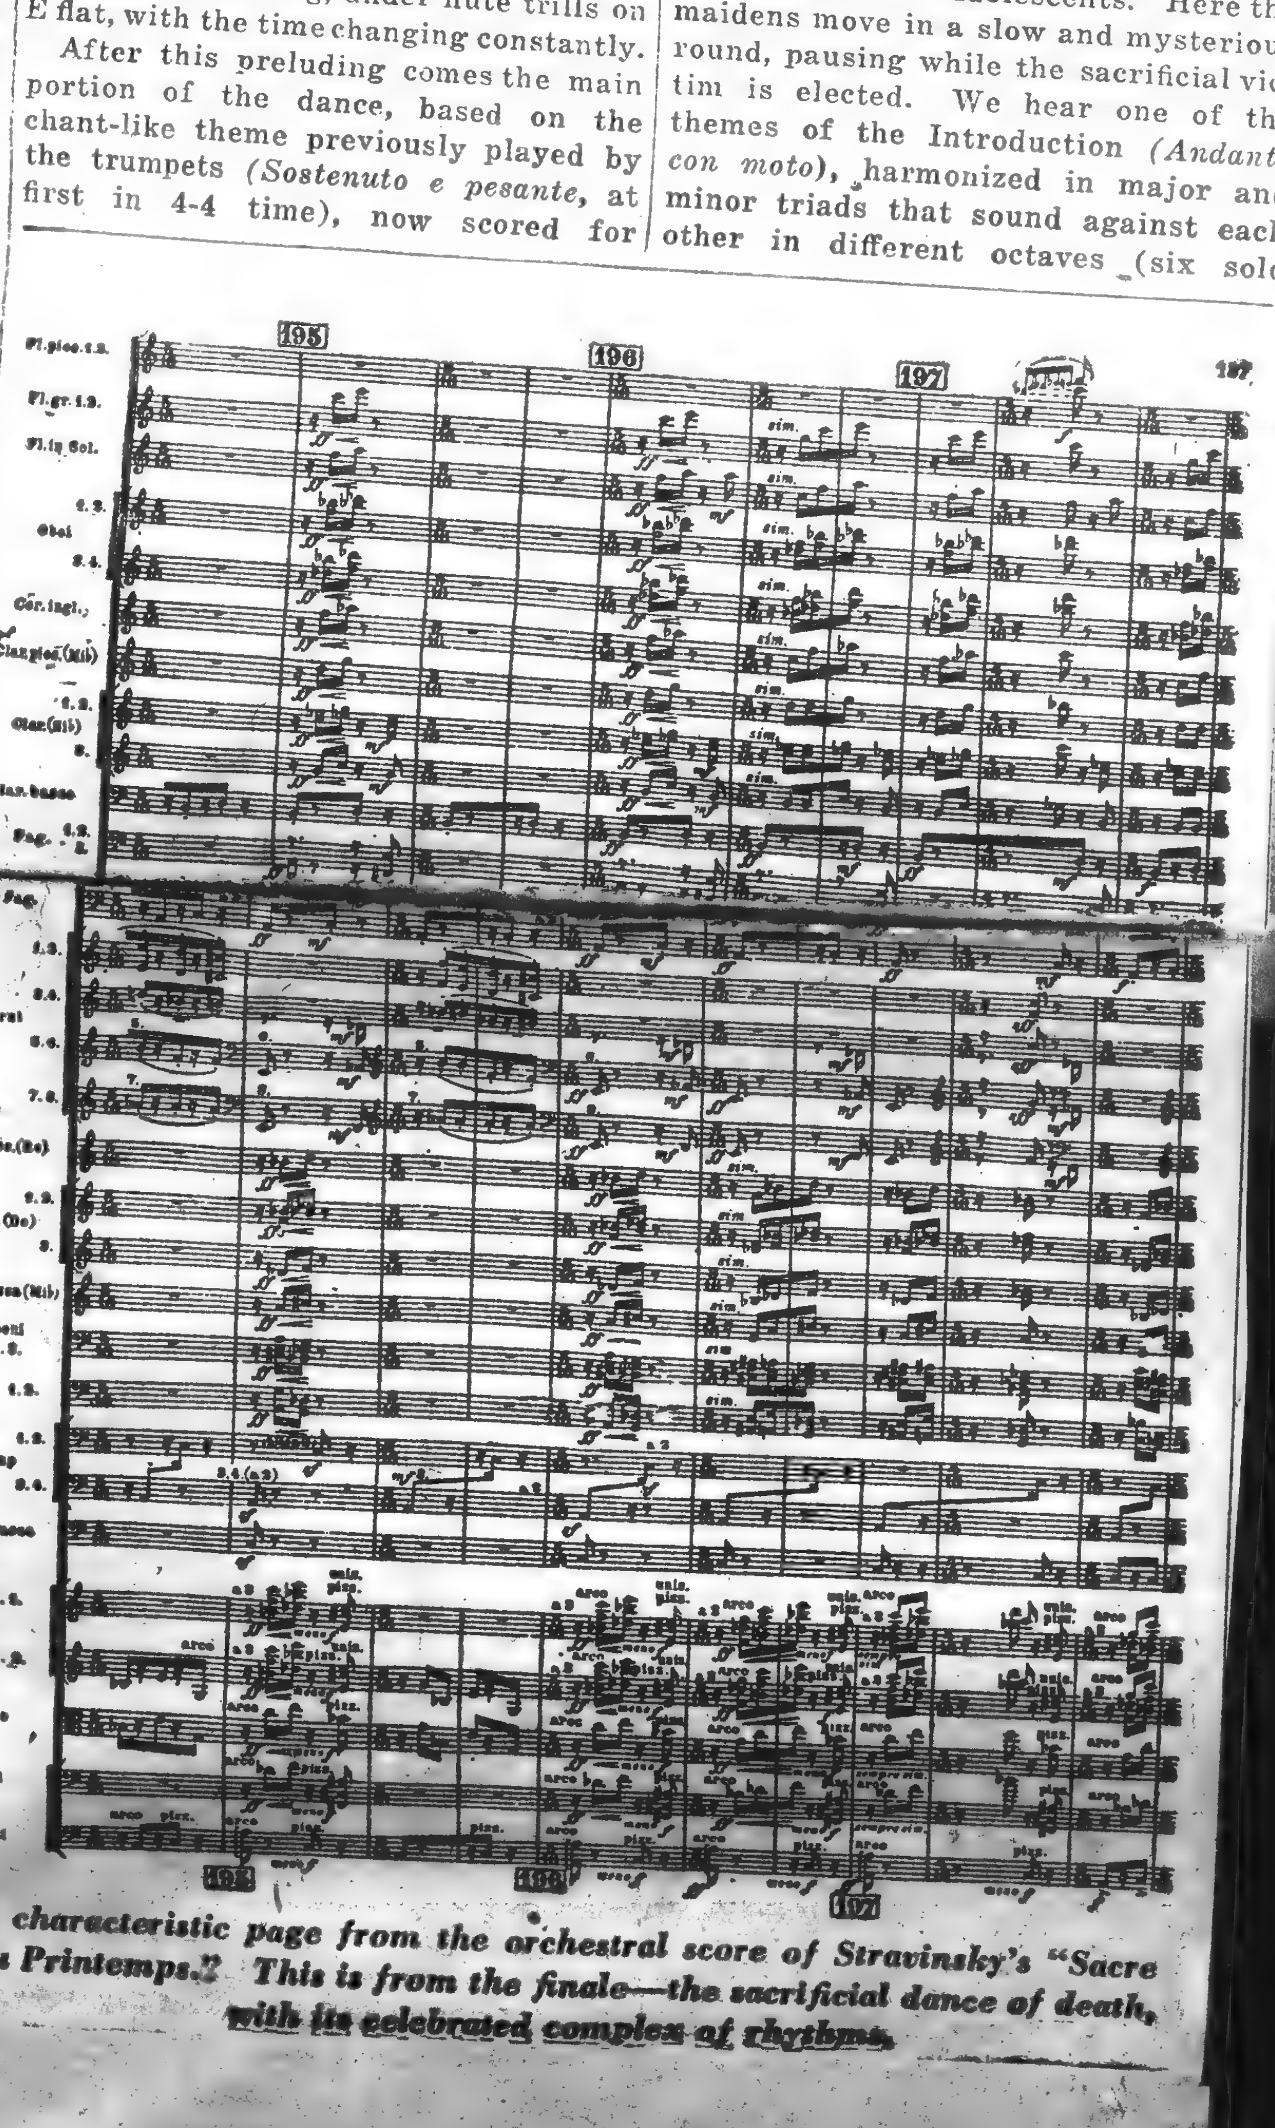
Then appears, with processional solemnity, the Sage, the most venerable member of the tribe. He is the Celebrant, whose function it is to consecrate the soil for its coming renewal. Announced by four tubas, bass drums, timpani, tam-tam, low strings, horns and woodwind, he enters imposingly, bearded to his feet, his white locks brushing his elbows. He prostrates himself, blesses the soil and invokes its rejuvenation. A "Dance de la Terre" (Prestissimo) carries the first part of the ballet to a tumultuous and abrupt conclusion.

* * *

The second part opens with an Introduction (Largo) to which Stravinsky is said to have given the title, "The Pagan Night," though this does not appear in the score. "A deep sadness pervades it, but this sadness is physical, not sentimental. . . . It is gloomy with the oppression of the vast forces of nature, pitiful with the helplessness of living creatures in their presence," observed Mr. Evans; and he added, somewhat superfluously, that the music "eschews all elegance." It does. But if the music lacks "elegance" (which hardly seems called for in the circumstances), it is marvelously imagined, marvelously scored. Dark-hued chords for flutes and clarinets, chiefly in C sharp minor, brood above a sustained horn chord in D minor, and the strings (harmonics) foreshadow the theme of the following section. Two muted trumpets have a dual motif, for the most part unaccompanied, which recalls the far-away days of "Pelléas et Mélisande."

* * *

The Prelude, which is harmonized throughout with extraordinary poignancy, leads to a section headed, "Mystical Circle of the Adolescents." Here the maidens move in a slow and mysterious round, pausing while the sacrificial victim is elected. We hear one of the themes of the Introduction (Andante con moto), harmonized in major and minor triads that sound against each other in different octaves (six solo



A characteristic page from the orchestral score of Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps." This is from the finale—the sacrificial dance of death, with its celebrated complex of rhythms.

Brockton Times Jan 12

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA COMING TO BROCKTON FOR FOURTH CONCERT

Occasion Will Be Farewell for Pierre Monteux, Whose Engagement as Conductor Expires This Year.

Pierre Monteux, the greatest of French conductors, and the noted leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, first brought this famous organization to Brockton three years ago. Brockton's recognition of his genius and the eloquent beauty of the Boston Symphony concert under his leadership was so immediate that an annual visit of the orchestra here and a capacity attendance has become established.

The orchestra is to make its fourth successive visit to Brockton on Sunday afternoon, February 10, in the City theatre, when the French leader will bid farewell to this city in what may well be the most brilliant and impressive of the four concerts. Pierre Monteux's five-year contract expires this season, and in the spring he expects to return to his own country where the demand for him is insistent.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has been for years considered one of the most remarkable organizations of its kind in the world. Its name has long stood for the utmost perfection in musical performance. In ensemble, in glow of tone, in clear-cut unanimity and delicate balance of choirs lies its distinction. These qualities are primarily due to the genius of the leader.

Mr. Monteux is preparing for his farewell concert in Brockton a program of direct appeal which will likewise include the greatest achievements in the field of orchestral music of different nations. Frederic Tillotson, the noted pianist will appear as soloist with the orchestra. It may well be the most brilliant of the four Boston Symphony concerts in Brockton.

The mail order sale, which may exhaust all tickets available, begins with this announcement.

Brockton Enterprise Jan 19

Monteux Prepares Unusual Numbers

Tillotson, Pianist, Coming With Symphony Orchestra.

The programme is announced which is to be performed by the Boston Symphony orchestra in its annual visit to Brockton, in the City Theatre on Sunday afternoon, Feb. 10. Pierre Monteaux has compiled for what will probably be his last appearance in this city an unusual programme.

The principal number will be the First Symphony of Brahms in C minor. This score, often called the masterpiece of its composer, is one of the most impressive and exciting in its chromatic contrasts, and exhilirating in the jubilant finale. Music of an entirely different sort will be Debussy's Two Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," which have been called the most characteristic scores of the late French master impressionist. The brilliant closing number will be the barbaric Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor," a score of much Oriental splendor. The orchestra fairly sways under the impact of its rhythmic beat.

Schubert's "Wanderer's Fantasy" as transcribed for pianoforte and orchestra by Franz Liszt, will be the score in which Frederic Tillotson, the soloist of the afternoon, will appear with the orchestra. This virtuoso has taken a conspicuous place among the newer generation of American pianists. He spent his youth in the west, where he attracted attention not only as a pianist but as a conductor of light opera. He has given recitals recently in Boston, New York and other eastern cities, which have excited favorable comment.

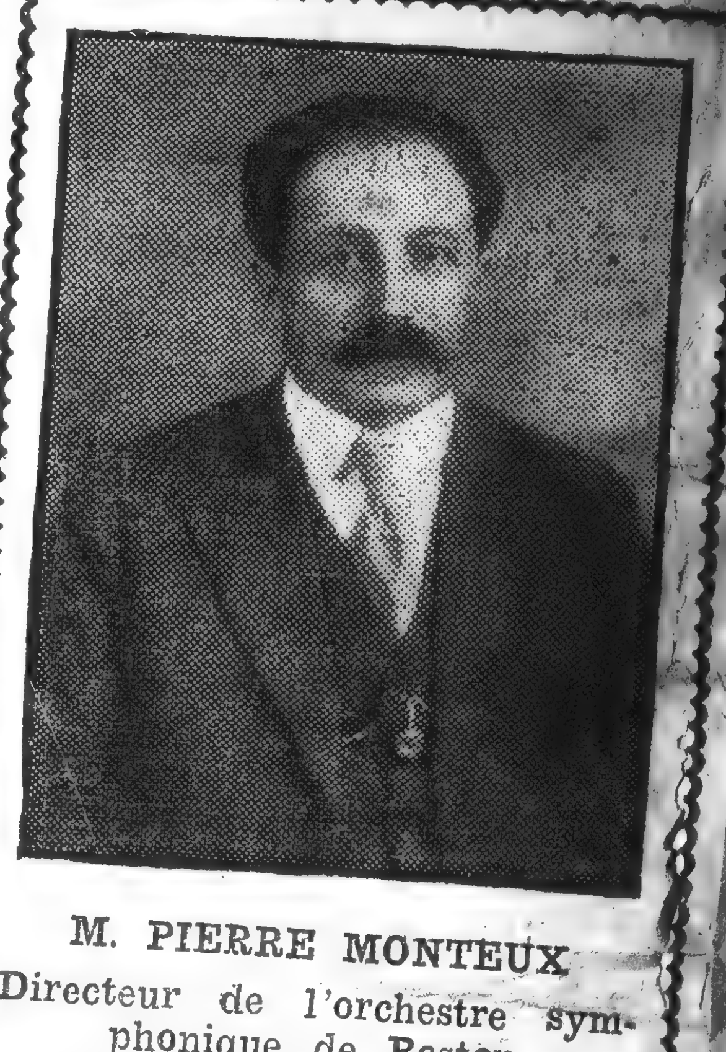
It will be remembered that the famous French leader of the orchestra, Pierre Monteaux, first brought the Boston Symphony orchestra to Brockton in 1921. This, the fourth successive concert by the great orchestra here, may well prove the most brilliant and notable of them all.

Worcester Jan 19

ON SERA HEUREUX DE LE REVOIR ICI

M. Pierre Monteux sera à la salle Mechanics le 12 février prochain

Le public franco-américain de notre ville apprendra avec autant d'intérêt que de plaisir que M. Pierre Monteux qui vient de terminer ses cinq années comme directeur de l'orchestre symphonique de Boston, va venir donner un concert d'adieux au Mechanics Hall, le mardi soir 12 février prochain.



M. PIERRE MONTEUX
Directeur de l'orchestre symphonique de Boston

M. Pierre Monteux a dirigé l'orchestre symphonique ici à divers concerts de la Société Philharmonique, et il possède à Worcester un bon cercle d'amis ainsi que de nombreux admirateurs.

La dernière fois que M. Monteux est venu ici, c'était il y a trois ans.

Il viendra cette fois avec ses 104 musiciens; c'est dire que l'on peut s'attendre à quelque chose de tout à fait supérieur.

L'orchestre rendra notamment:

La "Symphonie No. 7 en A majeur", de Beethoven;

Le poëme musical "Mort et Transfiguration", de Strauss;

"Nuages" et "Festival", des "Nocturnes" de Debussy;

Et l'ouverture de "Tannhauser", de Wagner.

L'interprétation de ces beaux airs sous la direction de M. Pierre Monteux est tout simplement unique. Relativement aux Nocturnes, M. Monteux a été un intime collaborateur de Debussy dans la production initiale de ces œuvres.

Sous la direction de M. Pierre Monteux, l'orchestre symphonique de Boston a accompli de merveilleux progrès, et cela n'est guère étonnant, car M. Monteux avait déjà fait plusieurs tournées mondiales et avait dirigé les principaux orchestres de Paris ainsi que ceux de plusieurs autres capitales européennes.

Il est hors de doute que le public franco-américain se portera en foule au concert du 12 février, à la salle Mechanics.

Au grand regret de tous, M. Pierre Monteux retourne à Paris au printemps.

TIGHT BINDING

[198]

New York Eve Post Feb 9

Stravinsky, Monteux and The Boston Orchestra

Who Will Be Its Next Conductor, Kussevitzky or Schneevoigt?—Stravinsky's Past, Present and Future

By HENRY T. FINCK

Who will be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season?

It has been understood for some time that the admirable but rather wild and woolly Russian, Kussevitzky, had been chosen for that great position, but apparently the directors are still in an experimental stage, for here is Professor Georg Schneevoigt (whose engaging face is pictured on another page) coming over today at the special invitation of the directors of the Boston orchestra to conduct its regular concerts on March 7 and 8.

Professor Schneevoigt enjoys a reputation abroad not unlike that of Willem Mengelberg, and every artist of international note has appeared under his baton with his famous orchestra in Stockholm; among them have been Mme. Cahier, Rachmaninoff, Hubermann, Hofmann, and Melba. Like many other famous conductors, Professor Schneevoigt gained a name for himself as an instrumentalist and was solo 'cellist with European orchestras with whom he later appeared as conductor.

Whether the new conductor is to be Kussevitzky or Schneevoigt, many will be sorry to have Pierre Monteux go back to Paris. He has not always struck twelve, or even eleven; but as an interpreter of French music he has excelled, and still more in the modern Russian repertory. New York came to know him first in conection with the Ballet Russe, which gave such admirable performances, particularly of Stravinsky's "Petroushka" and "The Fire Bird."

It is therefore not singular that M. Monteux's greatest triumph—at least in this city—during the five years of his leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra came last week, when he brought out Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring" (La Sacre de Printemps). It aroused unbounded enthusiasm and the critics were practically unanimous in proclaiming it a masterpiece, not a few heralding it as epoch making.

Glorious "Petroushka"

Personally, I think that Stravinsky's epoch-making work was his "Petroushka." I "point with pride" to the following paragraphs I wrote about that in the EVENING [illegible] in the year 1919:

"Stravinsky's music is as fantastic, as droll, as grotesque as the action. It is epoch-making music; the first successful attempt to infuse a whole musical score with humor—a quality so rare in this art that some have denied its existence. Here it is, life size; humor and fun as genuine as Mark Twain's or Artemus Ward's, and [illegible] what a relief and a delight to hear something really new in the tonal art! What Schoenberg, Ornstein, and other de[illegible] cacophonists have tried to do and [illegible] Stravinsky has done with success; with huge success he has cut a new path [illegible] the jungle of dissonances and in so [illegible] has opened vistas of new melodic, harmonic, rhythmic, and orchestral delights.

"He doesn't fling pots of paint in the public's face, but paints new pictures with [illegible] tints. No padding in this music; he [illegible] straight to the point every time; [illegible] calls a spade a spade and not an agricultural instrument; he lets the instruments discourse singly or in new simple [illegible]; instead of sentimental Mascagnian intermezzos he has the jumbo drums fill the scenic interstices with lusty, thunderous ruffles; he brings in the piano, as well as the celesta, the triangle, the xylophone, the metallophone—who cares? Why could not they have their innings? Liszt's [illegible] and forecasts are coming into [illegible] own.

"Great is Stravinsky's "Petroushka" the [illegible] thing that has come out of Russia [illegible] Tchaikovsky's pathetic swan song. [illegible] you note the gripping rhythms of the [illegible] music when the puppets come [illegible] and begin to dance? Did you—but [illegible] things cannot be described; words [illegible] only words and music begins where [illegible] end."

Bold, but Not Bad

[illegible] by this enthusiastic tribute, [illegible] the right to proclaim myself a [illegible] of Stravinsky?

[illegible] do I reconcile this claim with the [illegible] I have achieved as a fierce, ir[illegible] opponent of the "futurists" or [illegible] world. The head [illegible]

[illegible]tions there would soon be in our midst hundreds of epoch-making geniuses—and not a drop to drink!

The Future of Stravinsky

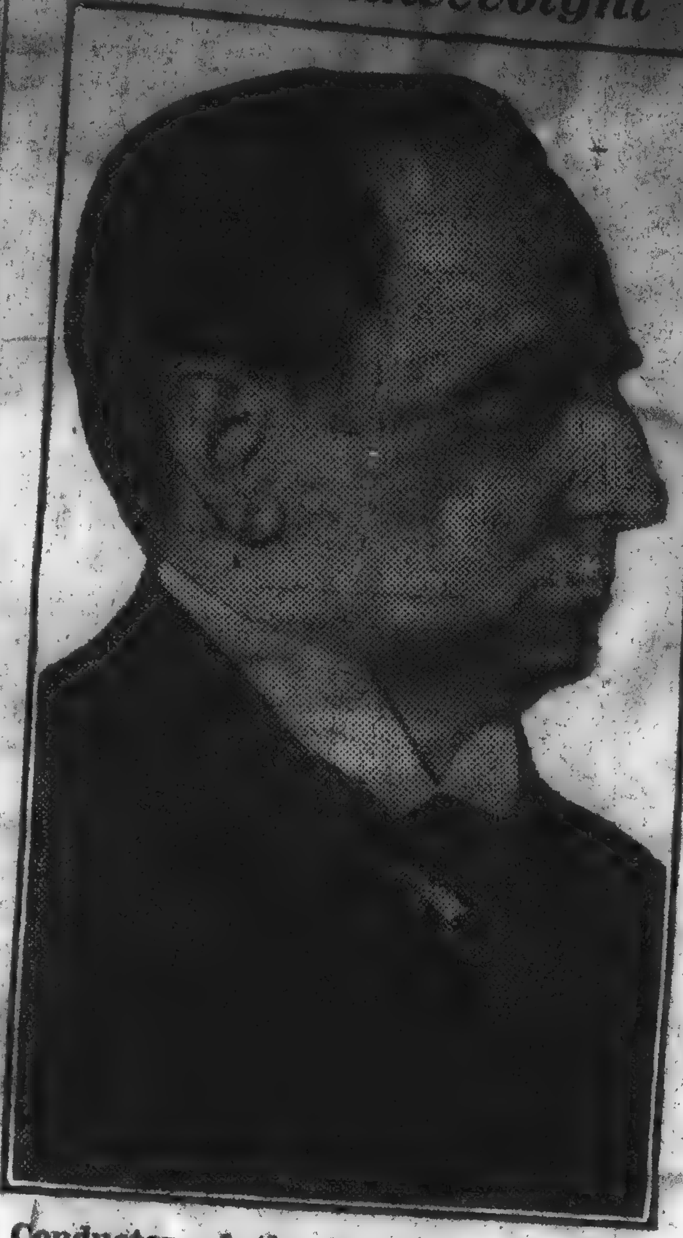
There is one discouraging thing about Stravinsky which depresses me. He is so original and delectable a composer that we should hear as much of him as possible. But how can we? His best music is associated with ballets: "Fire Bird," "Petroushka," "Rites of Spring." But artistic ballet of this kind is a thing Russian which it will be extremely difficult to acclimate in this country.

To be sure, we can have the music of the Stravinsky ballets given as absolute music in our concert halls. But then we get only one side of it, missing the delightful congruity with the action which is half its charm.

There are also some pieces which this composer wrote directly for the concert hall. I recall three that have been heard here: some one-minute pieces played by the Flonzaley Quartet, a ridiculous clarinet solo, and the "Symphonies for Wind Instruments," played here by the Philadelphia Orchestra last Tuesday. None of these comes in inspiration within a mile of the ballets; which suggests the sad thought that Stravinsky needs the stage scenery and action to fertilize his imagination, and these we can seldom have.

Remains the opera "The Nightingale." Let us have that, please.

Prof. Schneevoight



Conductor of the Konsertfoereningen in Stockholm, who will lead the Boston Symphony in two concerts, March 7 and 8, as guest conductor.

Dr. NEHEMIAH MOSESSOHN
Founder-Editor

HERMAN BERNSTEIN
Editor

The Jewish Tribune
and
THE HEBREW STANDARD
The American Jewish Weekly
MARBRIDGE BUILDING
PUBLISHED WEEKLY New York $4 A YEAR

The following appeared in THE JEWISH TRIBUNE of

FEB 1924

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra again demonstrated that one can play an unhackneyed program in New York and attract an audience of good size.

Mr. Monteux's third Thursdav night program at Carnegie Hall embraced, besides Mozart's ever fresh "Jupiter" Symphony, Sibelius violin-concerto, admirably played by Richard Burgin, the concert-master of the organization, and, for the first time in this city, Stravinsky's "Consecration of Spring." It was the event of the season!

Stravinsky's work is the most exciting music we have ever heard. It may be Russian in character, but it suggests the mystic atmosphere of the Far East, of India, of howling dervishes, and the fanaticism of a by-gone age.

Mr. Monteux and his orchestra of virtuosi achieved a triumph.

D'Ann
Given Beethoven
"Danse Siloti as on Bost

WARREN

New York Eve Post Feb 9

Stravinsky, Monteux and The Boston Orchestra

Who Will Be Its Next Conductor, Kussevitzky or Schneevoigt?—Stravinsky's Past, Present and Future

By HENRY T. FINCK

Who will be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season? It has been understood for some time that the admirable but rather wild and woolly Russian, Kussevitzky, had been chosen for that great position, but apparently the directors are still in an experimental stage, for here is Professor Georg Schneevoigt (whose engaging face is pictured on another page) coming over today at the special invitation of the directors of the Boston orchestra to conduct its regular concerts on March 7 and 8.

Professor Schneevoigt enjoys a reputation abroad not unlike that of Willem Mengelberg, and every artist of international note has appeared under his baton with his famous orchestra in Stockholm; among them have been Mme. Cahier, Rachmaninoff, Hubermann, Hofmann, and Melba. Like many other famous conductors, Professor Schneevoigt gained a name for himself as an instrumentalist and was solo 'cellist with European orchestras with whom he later appeared as conductor.

Whether the new conductor is to be Kussevitzky or Schneevoigt, many will be sorry to have Pierre Monteux go back to Paris. He has not always struck twelve, or even eleven; but as an interpreter of French music he has excelled, and still more in the modern Russian repertory. New York came to know him first in conection with the Ballet Russe, which gave such admirable performances, particularly of Stravinsky's "Petroushka" and "The Fire Bird."

It is therefore not singular that Mr. Monteux's greatest triumph—at least in this city—during the five years of his leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra came last week, when he brought out Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring" (La Sacre de Printemps). It aroused unbounded enthusiasm and the critics were practically unanimous in proclaiming it a masterpiece, not a few heralding it as epoch making.

Glorious "Petroushka"

Personally, I think that Stravinsky's epoch-making work was his "Petroushka." I "point with pride" to the following paragraphs I wrote about that in the EVENING POST in the year 1919:

"Stravinsky's music is as fantastic, as droll, as grotesque as the action. It is epoch-making music; the first successful attempt to infuse a whole musical score with humor—a quality so rare in this art that some have denied its existence. Here it is, life size; humor and fun as genuine as Mark Twain's or Artemus Ward's, and [illegible]! what a relief and a delight to hear something really new in the tonal art! [illegible] Schoenberg, Ornstein, and other de[illegible] cacophonists have tried to do and [illegible] Stravinsky has done with success; [illegible] huge success he has cut a new path [illegible] the jungle of dissonances and in so [illegible] has opened vistas of new melodic, [illegible]rmonic, rhythmic, and orchestral de[illegible].

"[illegible] doesn't fling pots of paint in the [illegible] face, but paints new pictures with [illegible] tints. No padding in this music; he [illegible] straight to the point every time; [illegible] calls a spade a spade and not an agricultural instrument; he lets the instruments discourse singly or in new simple groups; instead of sentimental Mascagnian intermezzos he has the jumbo drums fill the scenic interstices with lusty, thunderous ruffles; he brings in the piano, as well as the celesta, the triangle, the xylophone, the metallophone—who cares? Why would not they have their innings? Liszt's [illegible]mple and forecasts are coming into [illegible]ir own.

"Great is Stravinsky's "Petroushka" the [illegible] thing that has come out of Russia [illegible]ce Tchaikovsky's pathetic swan song. [illegible] you note the gripping rhythms of the [illegible]lodious music when the puppets come [illegible] life and begin to dance? Did you—but [illegible] things cannot be described; words [illegible] only words and music begins where [illegible]ds end."

Bold, but Not Bad

[illegible] by this enthusiastic tribute, [illegible] the right to proclaim myself a [illegible] of Stravinsky? [illegible] do I reconcile this claim with the [illegible]tion I have achieved as a fierce, ir[illegible] opponent of the "futurists" or [illegible]

[illegible] The head [illegible]

tions there would soon be in our midst hundreds of epoch-making geniuses—and not a drop to drink!

The Future of Stravinsky

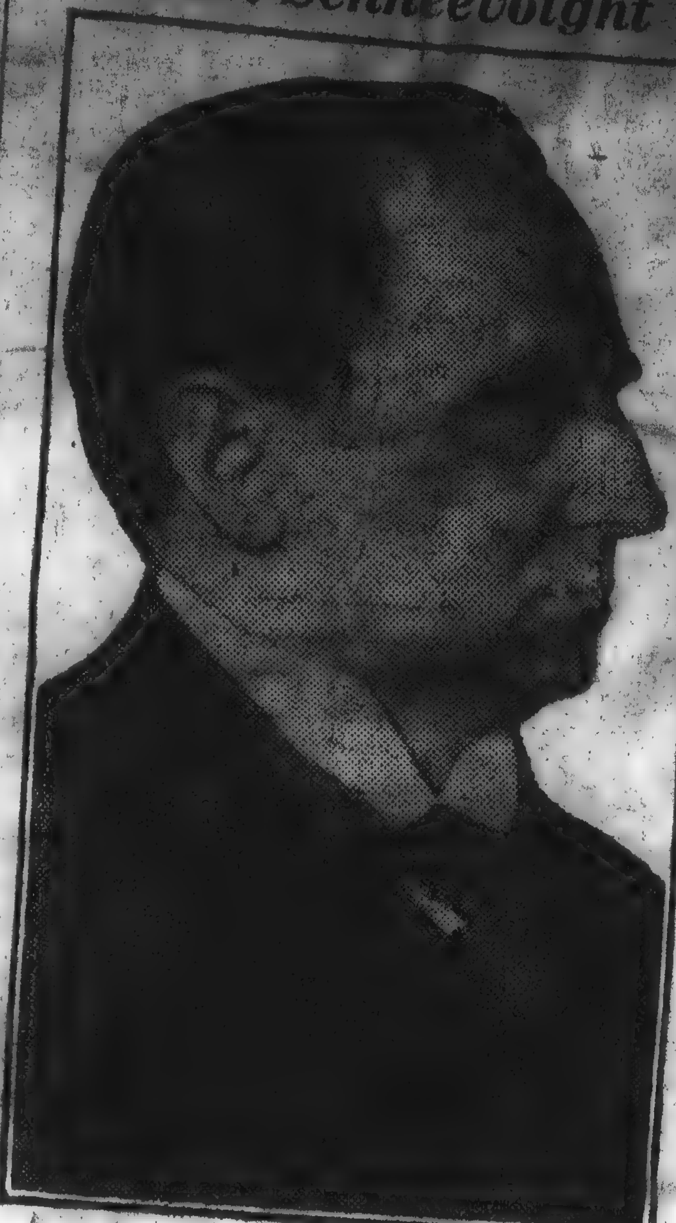
There is one discouraging thing about Stravinsky which depresses me. He is so original and delectable a composer that we should hear as much of him as possible. But how can we? His best music is associated with ballets: "Fire Bird," "Petroushka," "Rites of Spring." But artistic ballet of this kind is a thing Russian which it will be extremely difficult to acclimate in this country.

To be sure, we can have the music of the Stravinsky ballets given as absolute music in our concert halls. But then we get only one side of it, missing the delightful congruity with the action which is half its charm.

There are also some pieces which this composer wrote directly for the concert hall. I recall three that have been heard here: some one-minute pieces played by the Flonzaley Quartet, a ridiculous clarinet solo, and the "Symphonies for Wind Instruments," played here by the Philadelphia Orchestra last Tuesday. None of these comes in inspiration within a mile of the ballets; which suggests the sad thought that Stravinsky needs the stage scenery and action to fertilize his imagination, and these we can seldom have.

Remains the opera "The Nightingale." Let us have that, please.

Prof. Schneevoigt



Conductor of the Konsertfoereningen in Stockholm, who will lead the Boston Symphony in two concerts, March 7 and 8, as guest conductor.

Dr. NEHEMIAH MOSESSOHN
Founder - Editor
HERMAN BERNSTEIN
Editor
The Jewish Tribune
and
THE HEBREW STANDARD
The American Jewish Weekly
MARBRIDGE BUILDING
PUBLISHED WEEKLY New York
$4 A YEAR

The following appeared in THE JEWISH TRIBUNE of

FEB 1924

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra again demonstrated that one can play an unhackneyed program in New York and attract an audience of good size.

Mr. Monteux's third Thursdav night program at Carnegie Hall embraced, besides Mozart's ever fresh "Jupiter" Symphony, Sibelius violin-concerto, admirably played by Richard Burgin, the concert-master of the organization, and, for the first time in this city, Stravinsky's "Consecration of Spring." It was the event of the season!

Stravinsky's work is the most exciting music we have ever heard. It may be Russian in character, but it suggests the mystic atmosphere of the Far East, of India, of howling dervishes, and the fanaticism of a by-gone age.

Mr. Monteux and his orchestra of virtuosi achieved a triumph.

[199]

New York Evening Post Feb 9

Stravinsky, Monteux and The Boston Orchestra

Who Will Be Its Next Conductor, Kussevitzky or Schneevoigt?—Stravinsky's Past, Present and Future

By HENRY T. FINCK

Who will be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season?

It has been understood for some time that the admirable but rather wild and woolly Russian, Kussevitzky, had been chosen for that great position, but apparently the directors are still in an experimental stage, for here is Professor Georg Schneevoigt (whose engaging face is pictured on another page) coming over today at the special invitation of the directors of the Boston orchestra to conduct its regular concerts on March 7 and 8.

Professor Schneevoigt enjoys a reputation abroad not unlike that of Willem Mengelberg, and every artist of international note has appeared under his baton with his famous orchestra in Stockholm; among them have been Mme. Cahier, Rachmaninoff, Hubermann, Hofmann, and Melba. Like many other famous conductors, Professor Schneevoigt gained a name for himself as an instrumentalist and was solo 'cellist with European orchestras with whom he later appeared as conductor.

Whether the new conductor is to be Kussevitzky or Schneevoigt, many will be sorry to have Pierre Monteux go back to Paris. He has not always struck twelve, or even eleven; but as an interpreter of French music he has excelled, and still more in the modern Russian repertory. New York came to know him first in conection with the Ballet Russe, which gave such admirable performances, particularly of Stravinsky's "Petroushka" and "The Fire Bird."

It is therefore not singular that M. Monteux's greatest triumph—at least in this city—during the five years of his leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra came last week, when he brought out Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring" (La Sacre de Printemps). It aroused unbounded enthusiasm and the critics were practically unanimous in proclaiming it a masterpiece, not a few heralding it as epoch making.

Glorious "Petroushka"

Personally, I think that Stravinsky's epoch-making work was his "Petroushka." I "point with pride" to the following paragraphs I wrote about that in the EVENING POST in the year 1919:

"Stravinsky's music is as fantastic, as droll, as grotesque as the action. It is epoch-making music; the first successful attempt to infuse a whole musical score with humor—a quality so rare in this art that some have denied its existence. Here it is, life size; humor and fun as genuine as Mark Twain's or Artemus Ward's, and oh! what a relief and a delight to hear something really new in the tonal art! What Schoenberg, Ornstein, and other deliberate cacophonists have tried to do and failed Stravinsky has done with success; with huge success he has cut a new path through the jungle of dissonances and in so doing has opened vistas of new melodic, harmonic, rhythmic, and orchestral delights.

"He doesn't fling pots of paint in the public's face, but paints new pictures with new tints. No padding in this music; he goes straight to the point every time; he calls a spade a spade and not an agricultural instrument; he lets the instruments discourse singly or in new simple groups; instead of sentimental Mascagnian intermezzos he has the jumbo drums fill the scenic interstices with lusty, thunderous ruffles; he brings in the piano, as well as the celesta, the triangle, the xylophone, the metallophone—who cares? Why should not they have their innings? Liszt's example and forecasts are coming into their own.

"Great is Stravinsky's "Petroushka" the greatest thing that has come out of Russia since Tchaikovsky's pathetic swan song. Did you note the gripping rhythms of the melodious music when the puppets come to life and begin to dance? Did you—but these things cannot be described; words only words and music begins where words end."

Bold, but Not Bad

[illegible]ropped by this enthusiastic tribute, [illegible] I not the right to proclaim myself a [illegible] priest of Stravinsky?

[illegible]ow do I reconcile this claim with the [illegible]itation I have achieved as a fierce, irreconcilable opponent of the "futurists" [illegible]?

[illegible]thing in the world. The head [illegible] which I have just [illegible] "STRAVINSKY: BOLD BUT NOT [illegible] sums up in four words [illegible]

tions there would soon be in our midst hundreds of epoch-making geniuses—and not a drop to drink!

The Future of Stravinsky

There is one discouraging thing about Stravinsky which depresses me. He is so original and delectable a composer that we should hear as much of him as possible. But how can we? His best music is associated with ballets: "Fire Bird," "Petroushka," "Rites of Spring." But artistic ballet of this kind is a thing Russian which it will be extremely difficult to acclimate in this country.

To be sure, we can have the music of the Stravinsky ballets given as absolute music in our concert halls. But then we get only one side of it, missing the delightful congruity with the action which is half its charm.

There are also some pieces which this composer wrote directly for the concert hall. I recall three that have been heard here: some one-minute pieces played by the Flonzaley Quartet, a ridiculous clarinet solo, and the "Symphonies for Wind Instruments," played here by the Philadelphia Orchestra last Tuesday. None of these comes in inspiration within a mile of the ballets; which suggests the sad thought that Stravinsky needs the stage scenery and action to fertilize his imagination, and these we can seldom have.

Remains the opera "The Nightingale." Let us have that, please.

Prof. Schneevoight

Conductor of the Konsertfoereningen in Stockholm, who will lead the Boston Symphony in two concerts, March 7 and 8, as guest conductor.

Dr. NEHEMIAH MOSESSOHN
Founder-Editor

HERMAN BERNSTEIN
Editor

The Jewish Tribune
and
THE HEBREW STANDARD
The American Jewish Weekly
MARBRIDGE BUILDING
PUBLISHED WEEKLY New York
$4 A YEAR

The following appeared in THE JEWISH TRIBUNE of

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra again demonstrated that one can play an unhackneyed program in New York and attract an audience of good size.

Mr. Monteux's third Thursday night program at Carnegie Hall embraced, besides Mozart's ever fresh "Jupiter" Symphony, Sibelius violin-concerto, admirably played by Richard Burgin, the concert-master of the organization, and, for the first time in this city, Stravinsky's "Consecration of Spring." It was the event of the season!

Stravinsky's work is the most exciting music we have ever heard. It may be Russian in character, but it suggests the mystic atmosphere of the Far East, of India, of howling dervishes, and the fanaticism of a by-gone age.

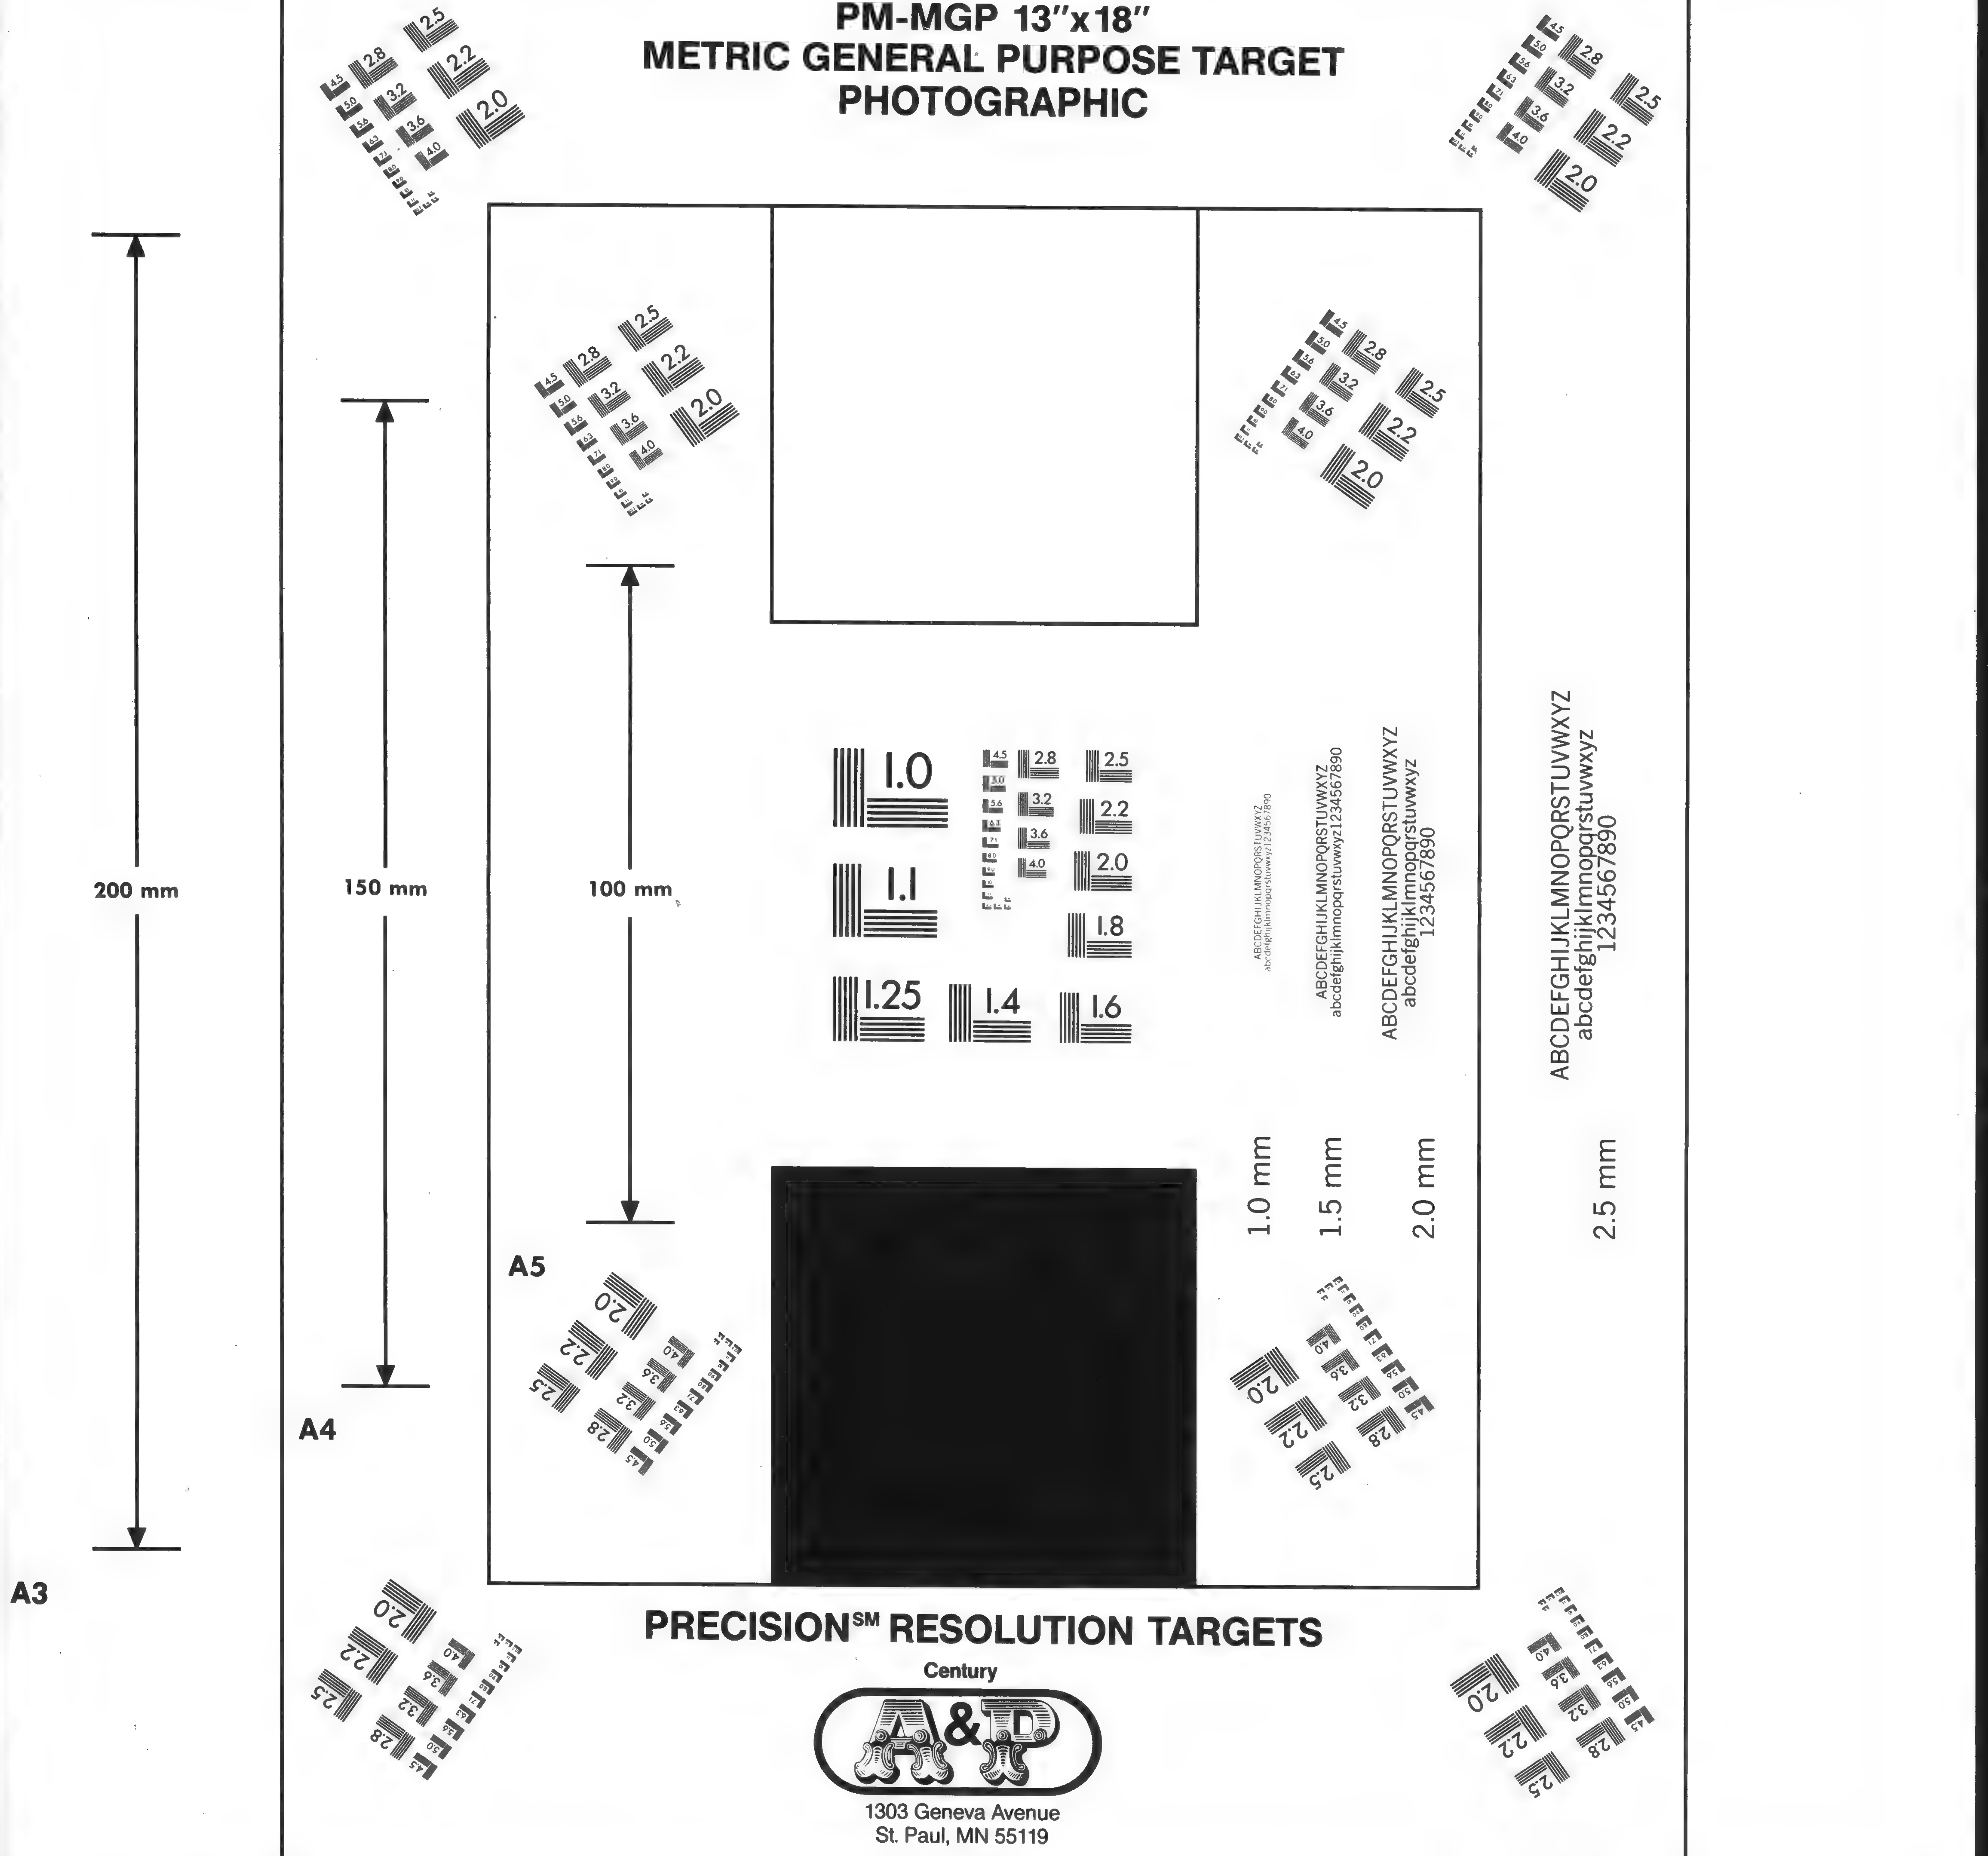
Mr. Monteux and his orchestra of virtuosi achieved a triumph.

REDUCTION

RATIO

14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
5.0
3.2
2.0
5.6
3.6
6.3
4.0
7.1
200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
A5
A4
A3

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps": Milestone in the Progress of Music

Modernist Masterpiece for the First Time Here

ONLY the future may decide with finality which among the compositions so far written since the dawn of the twentieth century has most of genuine significance. But regarded in the light of present knowledge there appears little reason to doubt that Stravinsky's ballet-pantomime, "Le Sacre du Printemps" has the strongest claim to that distinction. For to many it seems that "Le Sacre" is one of the milestones along the way of musical progress, taking its place with the "Mass of Pope Marcellus," the "Well-Tempered Clavichord," "Alcestis," the "Eroica," the "Fantastic Symphony," "Tristan" and "Pelléas." In "Le Sacre" we find a deliberate and well-nigh complete denial of the impressionism of Debussy and of the neo-romanticism of Strauss, and at the same time a recapturing of classical aloofness and objectivity. Already in "Pétrouchka" Stravinsky had shown a disposition to turn his back upon his immediate predecessors, to shun anything that might be considered a musical cliché, and likewise to foreswear all vagueness of outline, all exaggeration of sentiment. Closely following "The Fire-Bird," "Pétrouchka" was a startling apparition upon the tonal horizon. Yet only with the succeeding "Sacre du Printemps" did Stravinsky definitely and finally affirm his faihts.

It is never the way of reformers to do things by halves, and when Stravinsky took it upon himself to revolt against the existing musical tendencies, to deny all distortion, whether through excess or through under-statement; in short, to present stark reality as he saw and felt it, he did so with an astonishing and overwhelming completeness. In "Le Sacre," a representation of pagan rites that would induce fertility, Stravinsky purposed to show Man, not as the lord of creation, not as a figure of romance nor as a dreamer of dreams. but rather as one element of the universe, as much a part of Nature as a rock or a tree, a mere cog in the cosmic machine. From such impersonality the composer has since somewhat reacted. In "Les Noces Villageois," which followed four years after "Le Sacre," is already evidenced a less drastic attitude. Stravinsky had scored his point. At a single blow he had discredited all false emotionalism, all fustian and flummery. He could then afford to approach more nearly to a just equilibrium. A sort of intellectual and æsthetic purgative was "Le Sacre"—a bitter dose against which many rebelled, though more perhaps on account of the uncompromising character of the music itself than because of the idea behind these "Scenes from Pagan Russia."

"Here," writes Rudhyar D. Chennevière (as translated by Frederick H. Martens in The Musical Quarterly), "music, carrying along beyond the borders of romanticism the tragic thought of Beethoven, is essentially elementary or cosmic. In the mad hammering out of themes of primordial simplicity, born of the people, in some sort out of man's purely animal spontaneity; in the prodigious orchestral inflations the notes of which bourgeon forth like seed beneath the germinating urge of spring; in the violent superposition of a hundred incongruous voices—cosmic voices of the winds, the forests, the birds, of all these living forces exalted by the nuptial hour; in the delimium of the final dance of terror, in which the woman, hunted like a beast, dances the spasmodic dance of agonizing flesh; everywhere there leaps forth a primordial vitality, cynical, tragic; life not anti-human, but an-human. . . . As in 'Pétrouchka' the great passion drama of humanity had already been cynically staged as a tragic farce where marionettes mysteriously disport themselves, manipulated by the finger of ironic fate, so in 'Le Sacre du Printemps' man is no more than some sort of animal, tossed about and crushed by indifferent cosmic forces."

Stage and Concert-Hall

Stravinsky is said to have declared that the initial conception of "Le Sacre" was a purely musical one, that the pantomime serves but to explain and clarify his method of composition—and that the music is by no means a mere enhancing background of the scene and action. Within the last hundred years the threads of life have become firmly woven in the warp of music. Thus it was in terms of life that Stravinsky must needs work his musical revolution. In his later days, notably in his Symphony for Wind Instruments, he has written music that is pure abstraction, and in this his example has been widely followed. But for all its architectural solidity and its thematic exfoliation, and for all the claims of [illegible] made for it by certain of its [illegible] champions, [illegible] remains [illegible] as absolute music, without thought of programme, "Le Sacre" may not be heard to full understanding. There seems little likelihood that within the next decade or two any American city will witness a stage-performance of the piece; and not to know this music is to have missed an educating and—given the proper receptivity—a rarely stimulating experience. Happily it may, however, be heard as programme-music, outside the theatre. A year after the initial representation of the ballet in Paris, to be exact on April 5, 1914, "Le Sacre" was played in that city as an orchestral piece, under the direction of Mr. Monteux. In 1921 this concert-version reached London, where the ballet itself was already known. Two years ago it was played by Mr. Stokowski and the Philadephia Orchestra. Finally at the Symphony Concerts of this week, in fulfillment of a promise made long ago by Mr. Monteux, it will belatedly be heard in Boston. Next week, likewise for the first time, he will bear it to New York.

A Ritual Music

"Le Sacre du Printemps" has been called, though not with entire accuracy, a ritual of an imaginary religion. Beyond doubt neither Stravinsky nor his collaborator, Nicholas Roerich, the painter, intended the piece to serve as an archæological document, yet all its forms and ceremonials have some foundation in fact and in the final tableau it is possible to discern an analogue of the ancient Russian "Funeral Ceremonies" of Kostrubonkó, the Goddess of Spring, described at length in Frazer's "The Golden Bough." To those who have read or even dipped into that treasure-house of ritualistic lore, the workings of what Frazer terms "sympathetic magic" are of course familiar. Among many primitive peoples the belief existed that the killing of a human being, designated as the earthly representative of a god, permitted that god's spirit to pass to a newer and fresher body, and thereby kept him lusty and strong. By a somewhat more circuitous method of reasoning, it was held that the putting to death of an individual identified with the spirit of vegetation—or with the spring, as a symbol of the annual death of flower and fruit—would result in the revival of this fertility and in the renewed blossoming of the earth. Possibly, then, there was in the mind of Stravinsky or of Roerich some connection between the sacrifice of "The Chosen Maiden" at the conclusion of "Le Sacre" and one or another of these manifestations of "sympathetic magic." Perchance again this episode is to be interpreted as an instance of propitiation of some dreaded and powerful deity. In any event such speculations have chiefly an academic interest.

Part One

"Le Sacre" falls into two divisions: "The Adoration of the Earth" and "The Sacrifice." According to Pierre Lalo, writing in Le Temps of the original performance of the ballet, the setting for the first part was "a brilliant, almost violent picture, of which the sharpness and crudity, with the atmosphere of spring solitude, the intense green of the grassy heights, and the red and white of the dancers' costumes" were "appropriate." "But," he continued, "if the color effects of this picture are somewhat novel, the principles of the decoration are the same that we have seen applied in other Russian Spectacles." The dancing, by the way, he found to be "the negation, the destruction of art and of the style of the dance"—a point of view, it is hardly necessary to say, which was not shared by all his fellow critics, although each factor in "Le Sacre," music, dancing and settings, aroused an almost unprecedented storm of opposition.

The action of "Le Sacre" is in reailty a series of disconnected episodes, bound together by a common ritualistic intent, but in no sense logically related. After an introduction of seventy-five measures, designed to typify "the mystery of the physical world in spring," the curtain rises, and the pantomime begins with "The Spring Auguries," upon which follows immediately "The Dance of the Adolescents." The initial rite of incantation consists of a heavy treading of the ground, mirrored in the music by a reiteration of a single ponderous chord for strings, now and then reinforced by the four horns, and consisting of a superimposing on the triad of F-flat major of the dominant seventh of A-flat. In The Adolescents' graceful Dance the principal theme, a charming and natural melody, is first played by a flute over a theme for muted trumpets that later assumes prominence. This Dance leads to a "Jeu de Rapt," and this "pretended abduction' is mimed to a music both rapid and violent, with constant change of time-signature.

Succeeding the "Jeu de Rapt" comes a dance termed in the score "Rondes Printaniéres." Here the music, broad and dignified, is at the outset by no means revolutionary, though as it progresses it waxes increasingly dissonant. Here, incidentally, reappears in most imposing fashion, the trumpet-theme from "The Dance of the Adolescents." In his programme-notes for the Philadelphia Orchestra, Lawrence Gilman has described the ensuing episode, "Jeux des Cités Rivales," as "a sort of community contest," and felicitously h[illegible] states that the principal motif in the music is a phrase harmonized for the most part in "blameless thirds." Yet this music is not so altogether innocent as Mr. Gilman's comment might suggest, since these thirds always appear simultaneously in two separate and distinct keys. In other words, the music of "Le Sacre" tends to be polytonal—and of that, more anon. Now as a strepitous and breath-taking conclusion to the First Part comes an exciting "Dance of the Earth"; while in preparation for this dance the soil must be consecrated. In this rite The Celebrant is The Sage, "the patriarch of the tribe," bearded to his feet, his white locks brushing his elbows. Entering to the accompaniment of portentous music, The Sage "prostrates himself, blesses the soil and invokes its rejuvenation."

Igor Fedorovitch Stravinsky

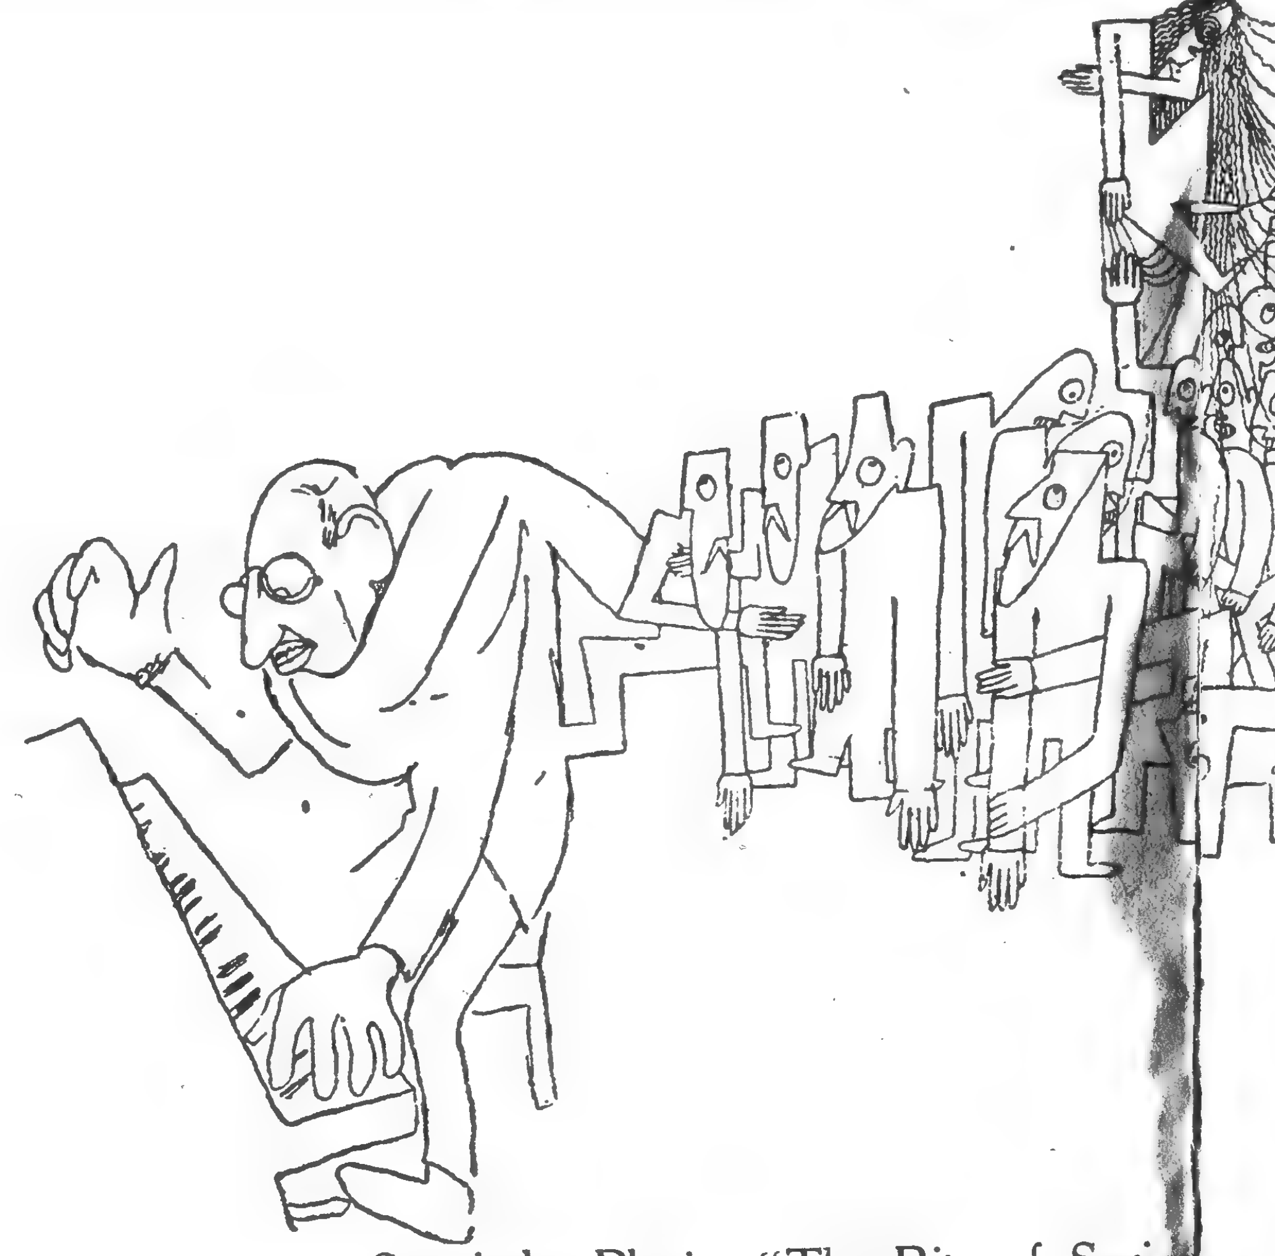
From a Photograph of 1922, Gift of the Composer to Mr. Monteux

Part Two

To the slow and solemn Introduction to the Second Part Stravinsky is said to have given the name, "The Pagan Night." In this music Edwin Evans finds a "deep sadness," a sadness that is "physical, not sentimental," and he adds: "It is gloomy with the oppression of the vast forces of Nature, pitiful with the helplessness of living creatures in their presence." In this Introduction, as in that to the First Part, Stravinsky writes music that has unmistakable mood and atmosphere. The one is poetic; the other poignant. Not here has he written the unfeeling and impersonal music that it was so clearly his aim to write for the ballet as a whole. The thought of this pagan world that he would create has too much quickened his imagination, has made it impossible for him wholly to deny his æsthetic and emotional heritage.

With the rising of the curtain on this Second Part comes the "Mystic Circle of the Adolescents," in which the maidens "move in a slow and mysterious round, pausing while the sacrificial victim is chosen." A theme of haunting beauty that dominates the Introduction is here repeated with a strange and piercing harmonization by six solo-violas. A second theme, announced by a bass flute beneath violin-trills, is repeated by two clarinets a major seventh apart, the upper one playing in C minor, the lower in D-flat minor—a procedure which humorously suggests that one of the players has inadvertently substituted an A clarinet for one in B-flat, or vice versa. Continuing, and to quote Mr. Gilman once more: "The chosen victim is then glorified and the music achieves a thrilling rhythmic ecstasy. The action passes through scenes of progressive intensity, interrupted by moments of hieratic solemnity. There is an 'Evocation of the Ancestors' (ponderous chords for the wood and brass), and their ritual is introduced by reiterated chords for the horns and strings pizzicato, punctuated by tambourine, bass drum and tympani. Later there is a new theme for muted trumpets.

"Now the elected victim, who has thus far remained motionless throughout these activities, begins her sacrifice; for the final act of propitiation has been demanded and she must dance herself to death. This she proceeds to do, while the music expresses the mystical rapture of this invocation of vernal fertility in rhythms that attain an overwhelming climax of paroxysmal frenzy. There is nothing in music like [illegible] stupendous "Finale" of "Le Sacre du Printemps,' with its audacious and indescribably exciting alternations of metre—bars of 5-16, 3-16, 2-16, 4-16—and its delirious culmination as the victim falls dead."



Stravinsky Playing "The Rite of Spring"

Caricature by Jean Cocteau in "La Revue Musicale"

Methods

In the ten years that have passed since "Le Sacre" was written the world has grown accustomed, if not wholly reconciled, to the musical idiom that Stravinsky here began. No new thing today are Stravinsky's polytony, his tonal "planes," his counterpoint of chords, his polyphony of timbres. In the music of The Six in France, of Casella and Malipiero in Italy, and of Bártók and Kodály in Hungary these things are of common occurrence, though to timid ears and to conservative minds they are still an affront, 'tis true. Not for some time to come will they be accepted as calmly as the once radical procedures of Strauss and Debussy are today accepted, even by pedagogues. But at least such means of expression as these modernists use no longer call for exclamations of surprise or even for extended comment and explanation. And whether or not we like them, they are here; and by every token they have come to stay.

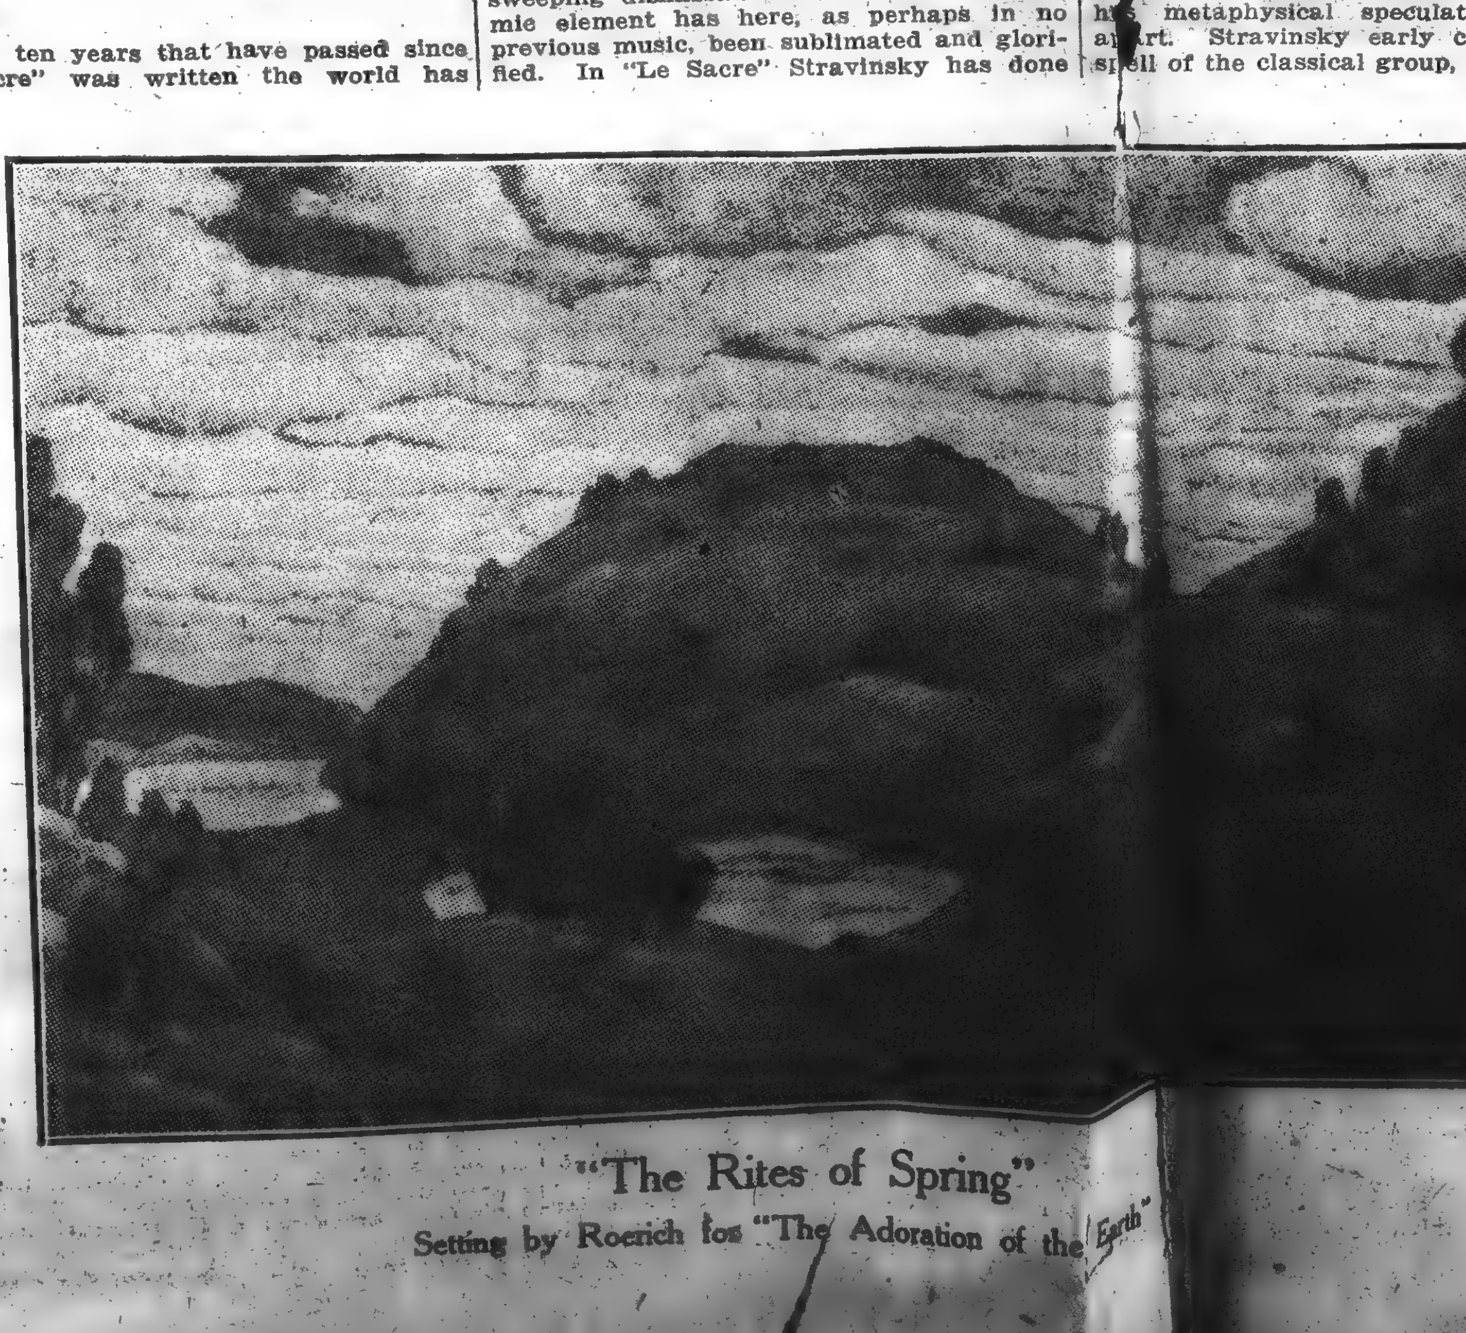
Not wholly revolutionary was the music of "Le Sacre," however, even in the day of its writing, but rather revulsive. With justice it has been claimed that Stravinsky was here a champion of that diatonic system which the music of The Impressionists was tending to undermine. It is in this attitude that his example has been followed by The Six in France, by Arthur Bliss in England, and by many another modernist. Rebuking the atonality of Schönberg and the harmonic "shifting sands" of The Impressionists, the score of "Le Sacre" often honors the claims of the erstwhile almost discarded major and minor scales, but with this reservation: If Stravinsky permits himself to use a more or less definite tonality as a foundation-plane, he imposes upon it, always in a contrasted timbre, a second tonality. To cite a characteristic example, in the Introduction to Part Two the underlying harmonies for the brass and the upper voices, carried by violins in harmonies for the first twenty-two bars, are clearly in D minor, A minor and A major. Between these extremes woodwind instruments play chromatic chords that hint, first of C-sharp minor and then of G minor, although in these chords the "key feeling" is by no means strongly emphasized. Again, in one section of the "Jeux des Cités Rivales," which throughtout its length is relentlessly polytonal, the chief theme runs in thirds in C major, against an "ostinato" bass in E major.

For the reassurance of the conservative it may be stated that not all of "Le Sacre" is thus polytonal, although it must be added that nearly all of it is "dissonant" in the older acceptance of that once formidable term. But much in this music that might seem excruciating were it played upon the pianoforte is softened through Stravinsky's ingenious employment of contrasting tone-colors. Between the polytonality of Stravinsky and that of Milhaud and his brethren there is, moreover, a discoverable difference. Whereas in the music of The Six the juxtaposed keys stand, as it were, upon an equal footing, in the polytonal passages of "Le Sacre" one key, as we have already seen, is generally the fundamental key upon which another is superposed.

Matter and Means

"Le Sacre" is an extraordinary music which may be more fully and aptly described when it has been heard in actual performance, yet in preliminary discussion three characteristics remain to be noted: amazing rhythmic life, indebtedness to Russian [illegible]-song, and orchestration. It has been said that in a first hearing this music seems to confine itself to a rhythmic commentary upon the stage movement. That, of course, is a palpable exaggeration. The score is too rich in harmonic counterpoint and melody to deserve any such sweeping dismissal. Nevertheless the rythmic element has here, as perhaps in no previous music, been sublimated and glorified. In "Le Sacre" Stravinsky has done for rhythm that which Wagner did in "Tristan" for chromatic harmony. At times these rhythms are set one against another; again they receive a strangely compelling force through a constant change of time-signature, as in the final dance; and yet again they have an elemental yet irresistible directness and simplicity.

In an article in the current number of "La Revue Musicale" Boris de Schloezer, in a discerning and eulogistic appraisal of Stravinsky's music, has pointed out a d[illegible] th[illegible] difference between Stravinsky and Co[illegible]ve composers that made the "Mighty [illegible]." For Balakirev and his fellows, The[illegible]n music was not a native speech. idiom assimilated certain of its forms and Kors[illegible] but, except in the case of Rimsky-thoro[illegible]ov, this assimilation was far from has [illegible]n. Stravinsky, on the other hand, he h[illegible] merely mastered European forms: ackn[illegible]eated them; and today he is the of [illegible]ged generalissimo of one camp berg all [illegible]sm. Either to him or to Schoen-[illegible]es jeunes," of whatever country, [illegible]wear allegiance. And incidentally of [illegible]ese two leaders it is Stravinsky who has [illegible]ast broken with the fundamental tradi[illegible]ons of his art. Without due reason, [illegible] do the [illegible] hold him in suspicion. [illegible]pon the death of Rimsky-Korsakov the Nationalist tradition in Russian music was threatened with extinction. Supplanting it came the Teutonized neo-classicism of Glazunov, of Arensky and of Rakhmaninov, while the mystical Skriabin, absorbed in his metaphysical speculations, remained apart. Stravinsky early came under the spell of the classical group, and those leanings found expression in his Symphony in B-minor. In "The Fire-Bird," however, he proved himself in truth the artistic heir of his teacher Rimsky-Korsakov; for the roots of that delightful ballet run deep into the fertile soil of Russian folk-song and Russian legend. Less specifically Slavic was its successor, "Pétrouchka," but again in "Le Sacre" as in certain subsequent pieces, Stravinsky has deliberately celebrated the land of his birth. The score of "Le Sacre," like that of "The Fire-Bird." is rich in Russian folk-tunes. Yet we look here in vain for the quasi-Oriental Tartar melodies so dear to Balakirev and his associates. Of those Oriental leanings the music of Stravinsky shows no trace. When it is Russian, it is Slavic to the core.



"The Rites of Spring"

Setting by Roerich for "The Adoration of the Earth"

Forces

Lastly, in one important respect "Le Sacre du Printemps" is less revolutionary than many another of Stravinsky's pieces. Of later years this ever-resourceful composer has been a fertile experimenter with novel and at the same time meagre instrumental combinations; witness the four pianos, the instruments of percussion and the chorus (stationed in the orchestra-pit) that sound the score of "Les Noces." In "Le Sacre" Stravinsky has used the orchestra, not of Debussy, but of Wagner's "Ring," of the symphonies of Mahler, and of the later tone-poems of Strauss. Here are to be found woodwind instruments in fours, an octet of horns, and even a quartet of tubas. This is not to say that his use of this orchestra has any marked affinity with that of Wagner, or of the later Germans. Despite the array of instruments employed Stravinsky's orchestration is never cumbersome or inflated, and pages might be written concerning its well-nigh inexhaustible variety of effect, its superlative, its almost miraclous, command of means. For each of the instruments Stravinsky writes as though he were himself a virtuoso upon it, and frequently he causes one or another of them to yield timbres hitherto unperceived, as in the treble melody for bassoon with which "Le Sacre" begins. For the woodwinds he has an especial predilection, and in this same beautifully conceived Introduction they bear almost the whole burden of the music. A favorite device, too, is the use of the stringed instruments of a single kind in elaborate subdivision. Towards the end of this Introduction there occurs a six-part chord for double-basses in harmonics, and the lovely phrase that begins the "Rapturous Round of the Adolescents" is assigned to six solo-violas.

With Courage

Here concludes an attempt, necessarily imperfect, to prepare the hearer for the surprises, the shocks, the manifold and bewildering sensations and—if he will but perceive them—the penetrating beauties and torrential eloquences to be revealed to him in the impending performances of "Le Sacre du Printemps." Yet to one with open ears, an unprejudiced mind and a tithe of imagination the music itself should seem, even on first hearing, suffici[illegible] clear and convin[illegible] [illegible]. Despite all that has been written of it, t[illegible]he score of "Le Sacre" is after all not so v[illegible]ery formidable. Often it is astonishingly simple and direct. Stravinsky paints here in bold and broad strokes and the greatest obstacle to an appreciation of his music will be, not unfamiliarity with modern musical procedures, but prejudice against them.

WARREN STOREY SMITH

Marya Freund

New Singer at the Symphony Concert Tomorrow Afternoon

ITEMS ABOUT MUSIC

Mr. Hadley to Conduct at the Worcester Festival—More Stravinsky—Hisses for Milhaud—The Japanese and Bach—A "Jazz" Symposium

CHOOSING wisely, the Worcester County Musical Association has engaged Mr. Henry Hadley to be conductor of its annual festivals from next October onward. He is thoroughly practised; accustomed to the handling of both orchestra and chorus; an energetic drill-master; open-minded to modern as well as classic music. The Worcester Festivals have long needed such an invigorating leader.

A piece by Stravinsky, altogether in his "later manner" will be played in New York by Mr. Stokowski and eight members of the Philadelphia Orchestra on Tuesday evening, Feb. 5—the Octet for Wind Instruments first heard in Paris last autumn at one of Mr. Kusevitzky's concerts.

It is credibly and pleasingly reported that when Mr. Stock and the Chicago Orchestra played parts of Milhaud's Second Suite, scattered but audible hisses resented the music. That an audience in America should take any music so seriously, either for blame or praise, is good cause for rejoicing.

According to The Morning Post of London, Sir Edward Elgar, now in his sixties, is planning his final music of large dimensions—an oratorio to round the trilogy begun in "The Apostles" and continued in "The Kingdom." Not for many years has he written such a piece.

Mr. Heifetz, returning from a series of concerts in Japan, has discovered in the Japanese a clear and persistent predilection for the music of Bach. In Tokio, where no halls or theatres had been rebuilt since the earthquake, the violinist played out-ordoors to audiences "sitting on the ground in little basket-affairs with trays on the side so that they could make tea during the intermission."

To the League of Composers and its guests in New York on Sunday afternoon, Feb. 10, Vincent Lopez, the familiar leader of syncopating orchestras; Gilbert Seldes, reviewer and essayist about music, and Professor Edward Burlingame Hill of Harvard are to discourse informally upon Jazz and its place in music of today. The communiqué declares Mr. Hill the composer of a "Jazz Scherzo" for piano and orchestra as well as the familiar Fox-Trot for two pianos.

Mr. Mengelberg, now in regained health, has returned to New York to be conductor once more of the Philharmonic Society—and to go the hackneyed round of the classic and romantic pieces of which he seems never to tire. By the signs of last winter, the public may prove less patient.

It is written that Mr. Hayes will take leave of his increasing public in New York at a concert in Carnegie Hall on Tuesday afternoon, Feb. 5; that Ravel is at work upon a Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, and a Sonata for Piano and Violin; that Mr. Stock in Chicago is about to revive a deserving and neglected piece, Granados's tone-poem, "Dante."

SOUNDS

The sound of the sea in my ears
Is like the swelling chords
In a symphony of love and anguish;
And your voice,
The passionate note of the first violin, Intensifying the whole . . .
[Le Baron Cooke, in Town and Country

H. T. P.

[illegible] tonal [illegible]ashes because [illegible]as big tragic or comic ideas which call for them.

Almost all the other futurists are like barnacles on the Stravinsky ship. What I have been trying to do is to scrape them off.

They are funny fellows, these barnacles are. What they need most is copies of the textbooks on logic by Jevons or John Stuart Mill. All their reasoning is based on the ludicrous fallacy that because some foolish, narrow critics abused masters like Wagner, Chopin and Liszt for dissonances which are now liked by everybody, therefore any kind of composerling who now perpetrates any kind of cacophonic atrocity will by and by be hailed as a genius! It is to laugh.

As a matter of fact, it is almost as easy [illegible]o manufacture this futuristic "music" as [illegible] is to blow a steam whistle. Anybody [illegible]an do it, and if all the fellows who are [illegible]ing it were right in their vain assump-

Stravinsky's "

ONLY the future may decide with finality which among the compositions so far written since the dawn of the twentieth century has most of genuine significance. But regarded in the light of present knowledge there appears little reason to doubt that Stravinsky's ballet-pantomime, "Le Sacre du Printemps" has the strongest claim to that distinction. For to many it seems that "Le Sacre" is one of the milestones along the way of musical fruit—would res fertility and in t

the earth. Pos
the mind of Stra connection betw Chosen Maiden" Sacre" and one festations of "
chance again th

...at in a first hearing this ...
...nfine its ...

...ashes because ...as big tragic or comic ideas which call for them.

Almost all the other futurists are like barnacles on the Stravinsky ship. What I have been trying to do is to scrape them off.

They are funny fellows, these barnacles are. What they need most is copies of the textbooks on logic by Jevons or John Stuart Mill. All their reasoning is based on the ludicrous fallacy that because some foolish, narrow critics abused masters like Wagner, Chopin and Liszt for dissonances which are now liked by everybody, therefore any kind of composerling who now perpetrates any kind of cacophonic atrocity will by and by be hailed as a genius! It is to laugh.

As a matter of fact, it is almost as easy to manufacture this futuristic "music" as it is to blow a steam whistle. Anybody can do it, and if all the fellows who are ...ing it were right in their vain assumpchampions, [illegible] its absolute music, without thought of programme, "Le Sacre" may not be heard to full understanding. There seems little likelihood that within the next decade or two any American city will witness a stage-performance of the piece; and not to know this music is to have missed an educating and—given the proper receptivity—a rarely stimulating experience. Happily it may, however, be heard as programme-music, outside the theatre. A year after the initial representation of the ballet in Paris, to be exact on April 5, 1914, "Le Sacre" was played in that city as an orchestral piece, under the direction of Mr. Monteux. In 1921 this concert-version reached London, where the ballet itself was already known. Two years ago it was played by Mr. Stokowski and the Philadephia Orchestra. Finally at the Symphony Concerts of this week, in fulfillment of a promise made long ago by Mr. Monteux, it will belatedly be heard in Boston. Next week, likewise for the first time, he will bear it to New York.

A Ritual Music

"Le Sacre du Printemps" has been called, though not with entire accuracy, a ritual of an imaginary religion. Beyond doubt neither Stravinsky nor his collaborator, Nicholas Roerich, the painter, intended the piece to serve as an archæological document, yet all its forms and ceremonials have some foundation in fact and in the final tableau it is possible to discern an analogue of the ancient Russian "Funeral Ceremonies" of Kostrubonko, the Goddess of Spring, described at length in Frazer's "The Golden Bough." To those who have read or even dipped into that treasure-house of ritualistic lore, the workings of what Frazer terms "sympathetic magic" are of course familiar. Among many primitive peoples the belief existed that the killing of a human being, designated as the earthly representative of a god, permitted that god's spirit to pass to a newer and fresher body, and thereby kept him lusty and strong. By a somewhat more circuitous method of reasoning, it was held that the putting to death of an individual identified with the spirit of vegetation—or with the spring, as a symbol of the annual death of flower and states that the principal motif in the music is a phrase harmonized for the most part in "blameless thirds." Yet this music is not so altogether innocent as Mr. Gilman's comment might suggest, since these thirds always appear simultaneously in two separate and distinct keys. In other words, the music of "Le Sacre" tends to be polytonal—and of that, more anon. Now as a strepitous and breath-taking conclusion to the First Part comes an exciting "Dance of the Earth"; while in preparation for this dance the soil must be consecrated. In this rite The Celebrant is The Sage, "the patriarch of the tribe," bearded to his feet, his white locks brushing his elbows. Entering to the accompaniment of portentous music, The Sage "prostrates himself, blesses the soil and invokes its rejuvenation."

Part Two

To the slow and solemn Introduction to the Second Part Stravinsky is said to have given the name, "The Pagan Night." In this music Edwin Evans finds a "deep sadness," a sadness that is "physical, not sentimental," and he adds: "It is gloomy with the oppression of the vast forces of Nature, pitiful with the helplessness of living creatures in their presence." In this Introduction, as in that to the First Part, Stravinsky writes music that has unmistakable mood and atmosphere. The one is poetic; the other poignant. Not here has he written the unfeeling and impersonal music that it was so clearly his aim to write for the ballet as a whole. The thought of this pagan world that he would create has too much quickened his imagination, has made it impossible for him wholly to deny his æsthetic and emotional heritage.

With the rising of the curtain on this Second Part comes the "Mystic Circle of the Adolescents," in which the maidens "move in a slow and mysterious round, pausing while the sacrificial victim is chosen." A theme of haunting beauty that dominates the Introduction is here repeated with a strange and piercing harmonization by six solo-violas. A second theme, announced by a bass flute beneath violin-trills, is repeated by two clarinets a major seventh apart, the upper one playing in ready been cynically staged [illegible] farce where marionettes mysteriously disport themselves, manipulated by the finger of ironic fate, so in 'Le Sacre du Printemps' man is no more than some sort of animal, tossed about and crushed by indifferent cosmic forces."

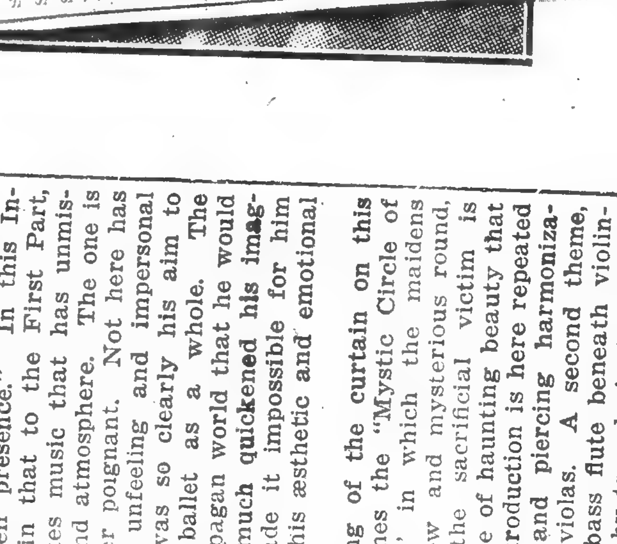
Stage and Concert-Hall

Stravinsky is said to have declared that the initial conception of "Le Sacre" was a purely musical one, that the pantomime serves but to explain and clarify his method of composition—and that the music is by no means a mere enhancing background of the scene and action. Within the last hundred years the threads of life have become firmly woven in the warp of music. Thus it was in terms of life that Stravinsky must needs work his musical revolution. In his later days, notably in his Symphony for Wind Instruments, he has written music that is pure abstraction, and in this his example has been widely followed. But for all its architectural solidity and its thematic exfoliation, and for all the claims of [illegible] made for it by certain of its



Igor Fedorovitch St
From a Photograph of 1922, Gi to Mr. Monteu

man has described the ensuing episode, "Jeux des Cités Rivales," as "a sort of community contest," and felicitously [illegible] frenzy.

tion of ve[illegible]
tain an overwhelming clima
There is nothing

...child.

SPORTS RESULTS

HOCKEY

Harvard Second 1.
...men 14, Belmont High 0.
...Huntington 0.
...e School 0.
...ummer Academy 0.
...ols 5, Rivers School 0.
...Thayer Academy 1.
...den High 0.
...7, Kent School 2.
...2, Noble & Greenough 0.
...6, Boston Latin High 0.
...3, Providence (R. I.) Tech
Swampscott High 2.

BASKETBALL

...3, Norwood High 22.
Salem High 27, Boston College High 24.
St. John's Prep 21, Bryant & Stratton (...dence, R. I.) 17.
Beverly High 22, Salem Normal School 16.
Lexington High 49, Belmont High 8.
Lynn English High 26, Revere High 12.

TRACK

Brockton High 59 2-3, Boston Commerce 17 1-3.
Boston College High Intermediates, 64, ...Latin High Intermediates 38 and ...High Intermediates 37.

SWIMMING

Cambridge Latin High 40, Boston English 22.

Good Skating In Boston Contin

Skating in the city of Boston con... and this afternoon the Park Depa... reports that surface conditions on ... the ponds and playgrounds are ... Franklin Field, the Boston Comm... the Public Gardens are said to be in ... condition. At Carter Playground, ... Playground, Fallon Field and Marin... the report is only "fair."

—The Pacific Amateur Athletic ... ation of Manila will endeavor to ac... site for the new Jose Rizel Memor... dium in Harrison Park, Manila. ... planned to rush the big structure ... pletion so as to have it in shape ... seventh Far Eastern Olympic Ga... 1925. The Philippines is the only ... of the Far Eastern A. A. without a ... nent stadium. China has one in ... and Japan constructed one at Os... this year's renewal of the games.

Result of Winchester-Chelsea Game Will Not Disturb Leader of Suburban Basketball League

Brockton is sure of holding its leadership in the Suburban Basketball League in spite of the result of the Winchester-Chelsea game tomorrow evening. That game, however, will settle for the time being the second place in the League standing and make the leader's position much easier.
Winchester and Chelsea are tied for second place at the present time and have won four games each. Winchester has lost one game, however. Brockton has five straight victories. Chelsea will send Davis, Kepris, Martin, McCarthy and Perkins into the game, while Winchester will use Flaherty, Lynch, Fitzgerald, Tansey and O'Donnell.

Other games of the day are Winthrop High at Natick, Wakefield High at Framingham, Quincy High at Milton Academy, Milton High at Norwood, Arlington High at Wellesley, Sharon High at Mansfield, Boston College High at Dedham, Watertown High at Gardner.

St. Louis Releases Del Gainer

St. Louis, Mo., Jan. 24—Del Gainer, first baseman, reinstated by Commissioner Landis after his desertion last season from the St. Louis Nationals, when he feared he was going to be traded, was released unconditionally today.

RINDGE HAS FAINT GLIMMER OF HOPE AGAINST MEDFORD

Track Meet at Medford Gymnasium Tomorrow Finds Latter Team a High Favorite

NEWTON VISITS HUNTINGTON

"600" Race at Boston "Y" Tomorrow Is Apt to Be Thrilling Ag...

...st place distance of the ...r of the Huntington- ...ever, inasmuch as not ... weight tosser could ...ance it is reasonable ...n has something bet- ...nce in the shot with ... William Kearnan as ...event. Frank Wood ...ington.

...should go to whoever ...greater than five feet ...ngton is weak and Ne... ...called upon to sh... its ...although ...chs and ...been improving almost ... start at 2.30.

...TITLE TINGE

...oro Between St. Mark's ...Private School Hockey

...emy St. Mark's School ...uthboro next Saturday ...the fea ure of the early ...hool season. Victories ...school by identically the ...nd Milton's 2-0 triumph ...le & Greenough's strong ...to the contest. ...was the second that ...in any branch of sport ... of the school from ... The first reversal ... Dedham High School won from Noble's at football. Eliot Putnam and Nathaniel Clifford scored the goals that won the game for Milton. The academy showed a well-knit offence that often baffled the Noble's defence. Able stick work and passing repeatedly brought the puck into a scoring position, only to be staved off when Henry Newell in the Noble's net blocked a shot. His efforts in the goal were brilliant. Harold Whittemore and Robert Summers starred for Noble's.

Exeter and Andover both won their games yesterday, the former having an easy time with Stone School, which it defeated 13-0, and the latter administered Malden's first defeat of the season by a 5-0 margin. Exeter used fourteen players during the game, in which Captain James scored seven goals. Vaughn of Andover opened the Malden game by skating the length of the Brothers Field rink and scoring in the first half-minute of play.

Middlesex opened its season successfully ... Dummer Academy, mainly through ... Hopkins of Chestnut ... of his team's total of ... Day also added to its

---

BOSTON EV

S

Hoover Plans Unique Training S

Walter Hoover (Wide World Photo)

...th Sculler Off for South to Row 350 Miles Around Florida Coast

...th, Minn., Jan. 24. ...ER, former world's ...pion, plans to row his training equipment the Florida coast from ...mi before starting his ...r exercises preliminary ...its. ...eaves here tomorrow accompanied by Al Rodin, his und... who is training to row with Hoove... doubles sculling event. They ex... make 35 miles a day on their ... excursion.

As long as the harbor here ... frozen over, Hoover and Rodin wil... the South. The former champion ... he will be in top form by spring

NEWTON SWIMS RIND...

High School Teams Meet at Cam... Y. M. C. A. Pool Tomorrow

Newton High, victorious in its swimming meet with English High 9, will encounter Rindge Tech tomo... the Cambridge "Y" pool. Rindge ... aw... from Boston College High on... winning 38 to 20, then one week la... swamped by Brookline High, 46 to ...

Rindge is relying on McKelvie ... "200," St. Clair in the "40," Szaw... and St. Clair in the plunge, Cona... Anthony in the "100" and Hardy a... in the fancy dive. The Rindge Tec... team will be composed of Anthony, ... Conant and St. Claire. Newton's ma... are Phelps in the "40," Clark and ... in the "100," Perry and Patterson ... "200," Hammond in the plunge, Per... Patterson in the dive. The Newton ... Team will be Perry, Patterson, Ale... and Phelps.

REPLACES HUNTINGTON ...

Arthur Johnson Donates Trophy f... terscholastic Meet—Medford Wins ... mer One Permanently

Mr. Arthur Johnson, who donate... Huntington Interscholastic meet cu... season, won permanently by Medford ... School, has placed another trophy in ... petition for the Feb. 23 meet. The na... the meet this year is to be calle... Greater Boston Interscholastics. William Whiting announces that tw... three schools have assured him of ... intention to send athletes to the m... at the Boston "Y" this season.

B. & N. HOPES TO RECOU...

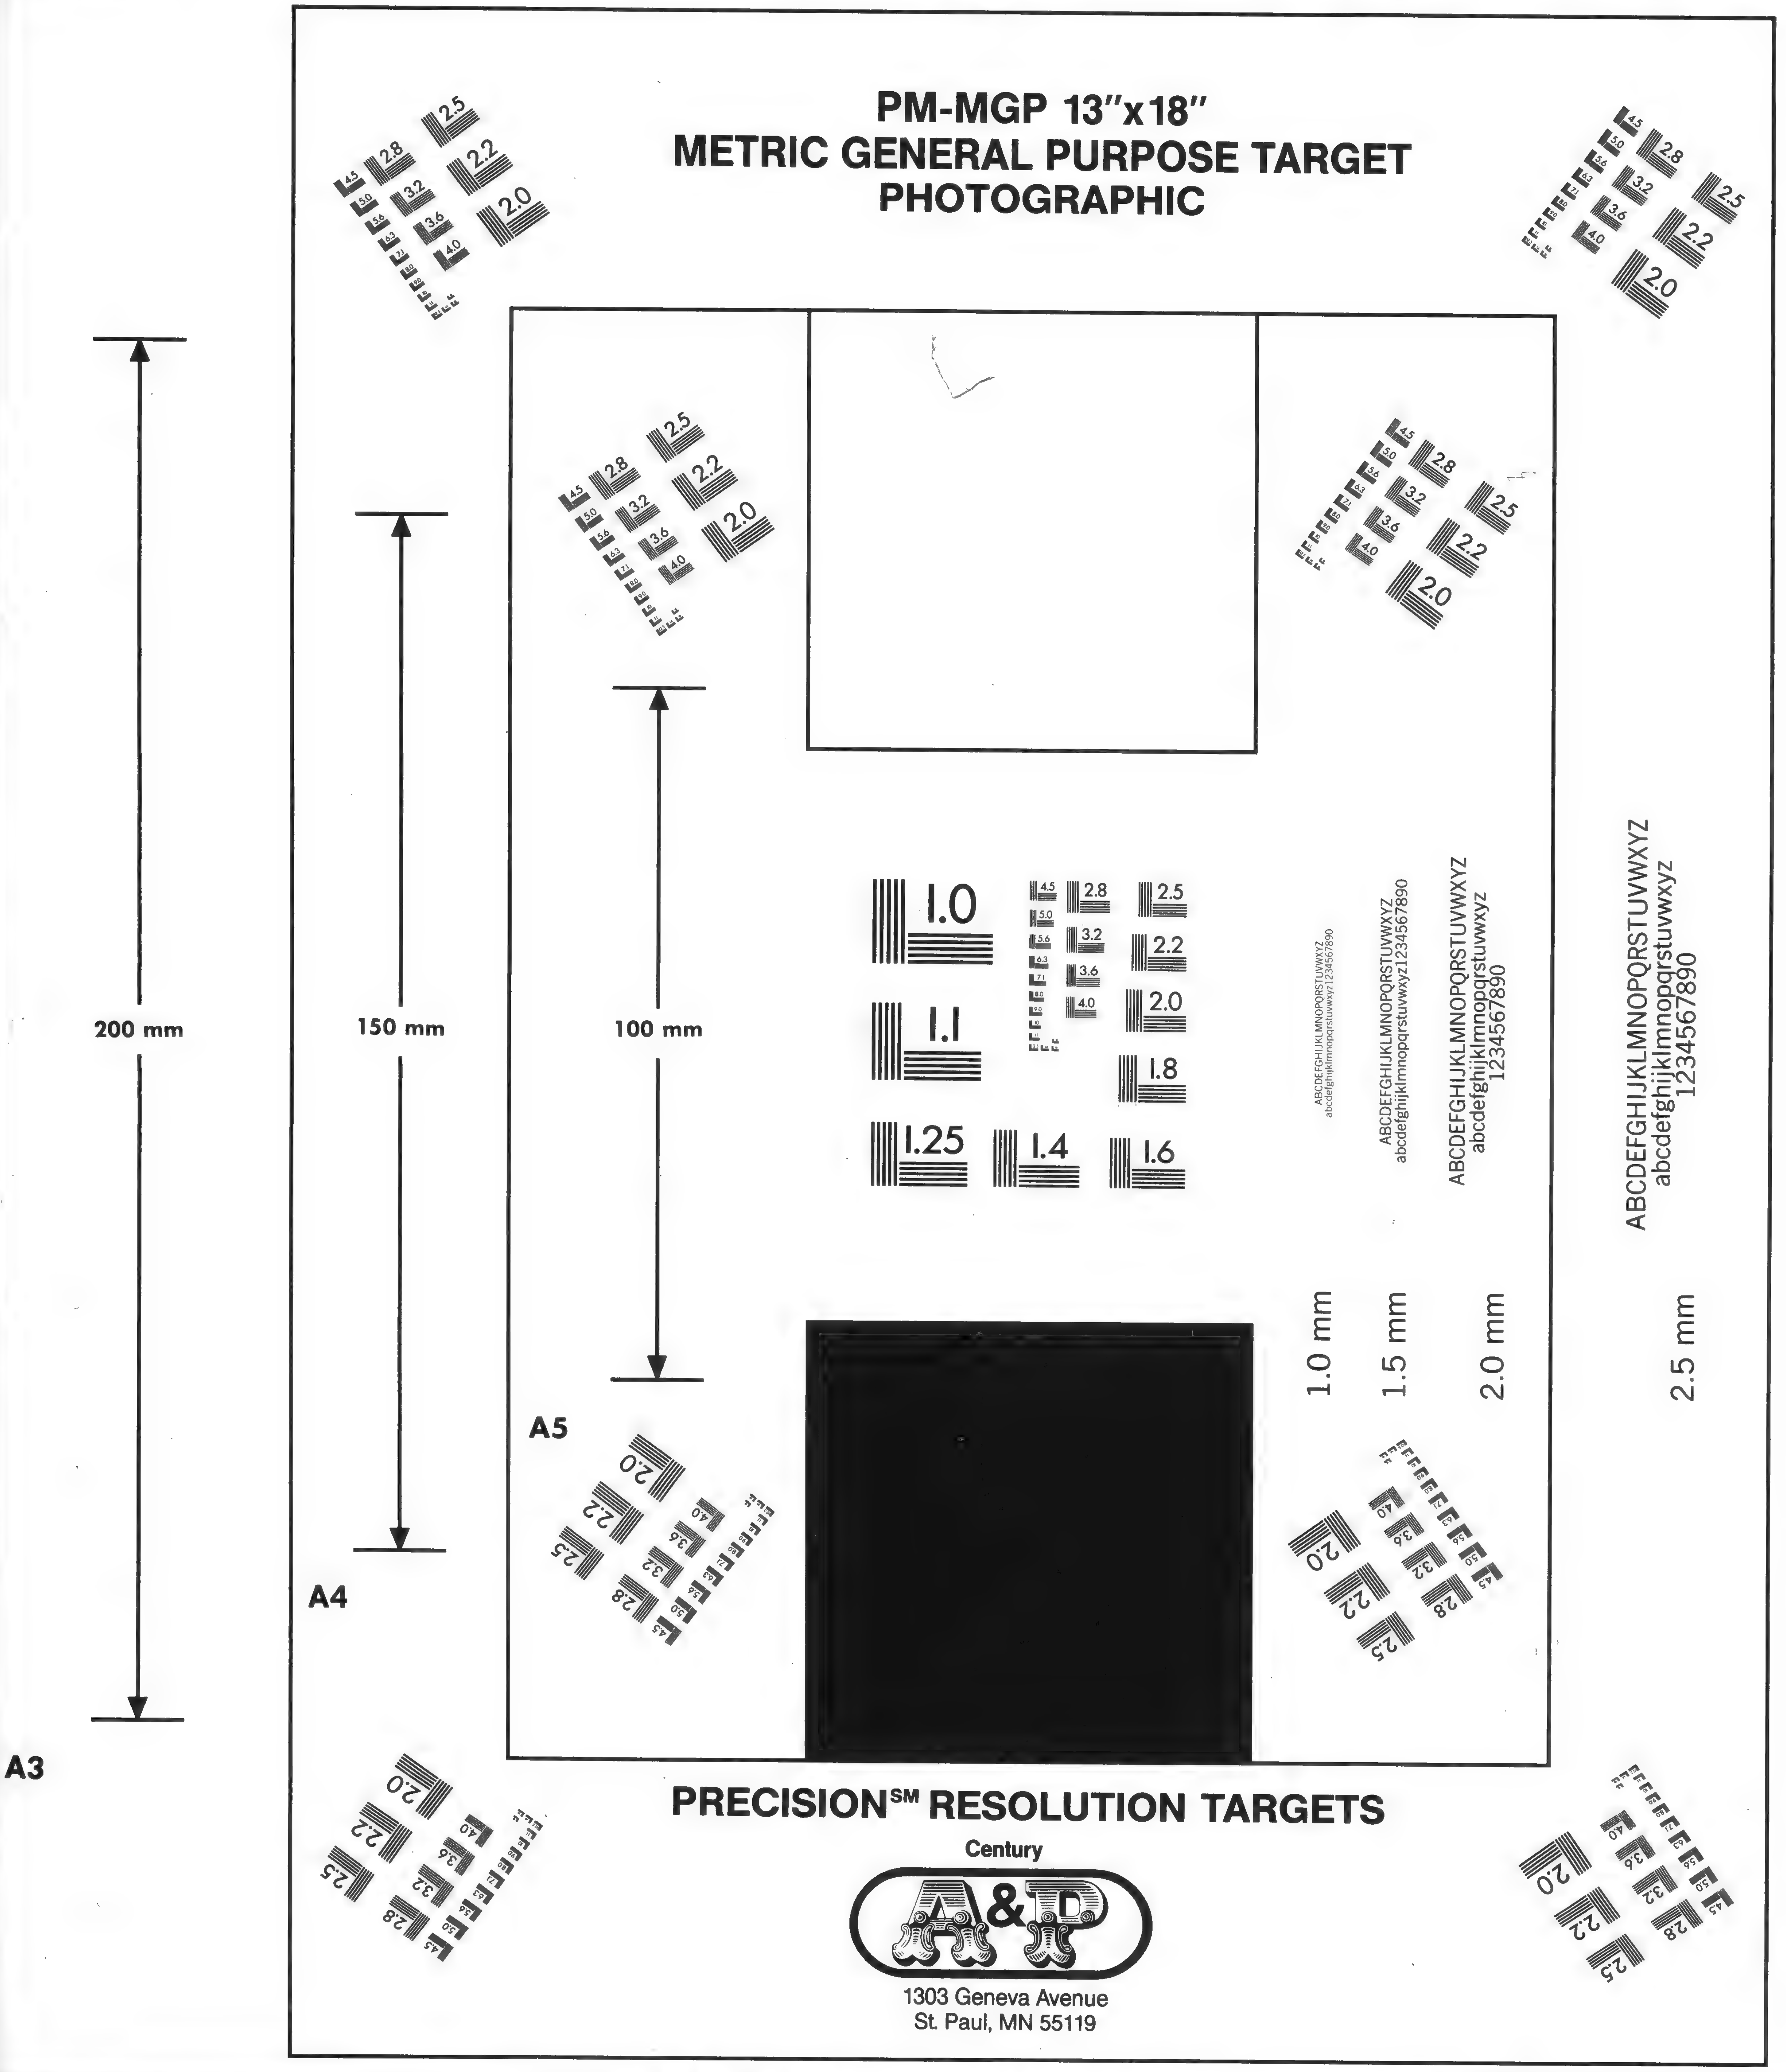
Cambridge Private School Meets ...throp High After Crushing Defea... Newton Last Week

Browne & Nichols tomorrow will mee... track team of Winthrop High at Ni... Field, Cambridge. The private school ... undiscouraged by the showing of its a... letes against the powerful Newton H... team last week is looking to Roger Sh... man, George Barnes and Norman Smith ... the "40," Roger Spaulding in the "30... Norman Smith and Robert Child in ... "600"; [illegible]

[200]

REDUCTION
RATIO
12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
8.0
3.2
3.6
4.0
2.0
200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm
A5
A4
A3

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

INFORMATION OBSCURED

PPING ... THE NTREAL
CANADA
ISSUE OF
JAN 26 1924

Boston Symphony With Pierre Monteux Coming To Montreal

Some orchestral leaders have the reputation of tyrants—of controlling the musicians under them by being abusive, and of "educating" reluctant audiences by defiantly hurling unwelcome scores at their heads.

Pierre Monteux, the great conductor who is now fulfilling his fifth season as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is not of this sort: his method is rather that of quiet persistency. At rehearsals his criticism is unfailingly courteous, if unsparing. He knows precisely what he wants, makes his desire clear, and patiently insists until that effect is obtained to a hair's breadth of exactitude. The players under him perpetually marvel at his wonderfully accurate ear. If a single one of the hundred instruments plays too sharp or too flat the erring musician is politely but firmly called to task.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play in Montreal during February. Managament—Louis Bourdon.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
WORCESTER
MASS.
TELEGRAM
FEB 2 1924

Mechanics Hall

The pending return concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which is to take place in Mechanics hall on Tuesday evening, Feb. 12, will probably be the occasion of the last visit to Worcester of Pierre Monteux, the illustrious conductor. This French celebrity is now completing his fifth year at the head of the orchestra, and expects at its conclusion to return to France.

Pierre Monteux toured Europe several times, both as conductor of opera and as conductor of Diaghileff's Ballet Russe. With this organization he first came to America. Previous to his present engagement, he served a year as one of the principal conductors of the Metropolitan Opera House.

The program for the Worcester concert will reveal to particular advantage the genius of the leader and the miraculous qualities of the virtuoso orchestra which he commands. The symphony will be the famous Seventh of Beethoven, and the other numbers Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," Debussy's two nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," and Wagner's overture to "Tannhauser."

Strand Theater

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WORCESTER
MASSACHUSETTS
GAZETTE
FEB 2 1924

Boston Symphony Plays Here, Feb. 12

The concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Mechanics hall, Tuesday evening, Feb. 12, will probably be the occasion of the last visit to Worcester of Pierre Monteux, the illustrious conductor. This French celebrity is now completing his fifth year at the head of the orchestra and expects at its conclusion to return to France.

Pierre Monteux is making a precedent in the Boston Symphony concerts and in the symphony concerts of America which will be remembered long after he returns to his own country at the conclusion of the present season. He toured Europe several times, both as conductor of opera and as conductor of Diaghileff's Ballet Russe. With this organization he first came to America and toured this country. Previous to his present engagement, he served a year as one of the principuapal conductors of the Metropolitan Opera house.

Eleano oardman, Goldwyn lead

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE SALEM
MASS.
NEWS
FEB 1924

Boston Symphony Orchestra of 104 Musicians Feb. 17

There is unusual interest in the concert at the Empire theatre, Salem, a week from Sunday afternoon when the full Boston Symphony orchestra of 104 musicians gives a concert there.

Although the tickets were not ready early Saturday morning when the sale opened and many people who had to get early trains were unable to buy, the sale for the opening day was over $600. Ordinarily this would indicate that when the famous orchestra comes to Salem under the able direction of Pierre Monteux, it will play to a capacity audience.

Local people who have not yet bought tickets would do well to remember that this week the concert is being actively pushed in Beverly, Peabody, Gloucester, Lynn, Danvers and Newburyport. This means that Salem will be the mecca for all music lovers from these places as well as from the towns on the North Shore.

The selection of Miss Edith Thompson as soloist has struck a popular chord. She is a tremendous favorite on the North Shore. When she played as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra in Lynn two years ago many local people attended the concert and were delighted with the splendid way in which she rose to the occasion.

For the Salem concert Miss Thompson will play Tchaikowsky's concerto in B-flat (No. 2). It is a brilliant number and well calculated to test her splendid powers. The rest of the program includes Dvorak's "New World" symphony; two of Debussy's Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals;" and Wagner's Prelude to the "Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra again demonstrated that one can play an unhackneyed program in New York and attract an audience of good size.

Mr. Monteux's third Thursday night program at Carnegie Hall embraced, besides Mozart's ever fresh "Jupiter" Symphony, Sibelius violin-concerto, admirably played by Richard Burgin, the concert-master of the organization, and, for the first time in this city, Stravinsky's "Consecration of Spring." It was the event of the season!

Stravinsky's work is the most exciting music we have ever heard. It may be Russian in character, but it suggests the mystic atmosphere of the Far East, of India, of howling dervishes, and the fanaticism of a by-gone age.

Mr. Monteux and his orchestra of virtuosi achieved a triumph.

Tran Feb 8

"Le Sacre" Again

But Not Until the Symphony Concerts of Next April

SINCE requests have come in numbers to Mr. Monteux for a repetition at the Symphony Concerts of Stravinsky's tone-poem, "The Rite of Spring," he has definitely decided to play the piece again in both Boston and New York. In Boston, it will be heard anew at a pair of concerts in April, while in New York, during the same month, it will reappear at a Saturday matinée. Of all the notable new pieces that Mr. Monteux has undertaken through five years as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, none has so stirred its public in both cities. Few have been the protests; in flood has come praise, alike upon music and performance. A masterpiece, messieurs, a masterpiece.

Trans Feb 8

MUSIC TO LEWIS CARROLL

Deems Taylor's Suite, "Alice in Wonderland," for the First Time in Boston at the Symphony Concert Tomorrow—Music of Humor, Fancy and American Quality—Course and Content

DEEMS TAYLOR'S Orchestral Suite, "Through the Looking Glass," which will be played for the first times in Boston at the Symphony Concerts this week, promises to make a charming diversion from the solemnity or furious modernity of the usual programme. It was a bright idea for Mr. Taylor to summon Lewis Carroll's whimsical creations into the service of programme-music. The mere thought of them takes the audience happily into a child-world where acoustics are finer and ears are keener. These pieces by a talented young American composer, who is also the reviewer of The New York World, contain much that is serious, but they will excite curiosity mainly because of their humor, thereby raising the difficult question of what is meant by humor in music. In literature and drawing the possibilities of humor are infinitely richer. The playfulness of Haydn and the "cosmic humor" of Beethoven appeal more to our sense of beauty than to our sense of the absurd. Music which actually makes us smile or laugh is most apt to be purposely connected with some extra-musical idea as in comic songs, operas, incidental music for the stage and programme-music. To words and actions music adds exciting movement, emphasis, and a merriment almost imitating the sound of chuckling and laughing. The humor often consists in a surprising suitability of the music to the idea, or in a contrast between solemn music and trivial situations—in either case without anything intrinsically laughable in the music itself. We take it for granted that wood-wind instruments should play runs and arpeggios; but when we are told that these will be buckets of water poured by

's Apprentice," we a amor in those cascades of notes. the groan, the squeak, the sudden pause or sudden crash, the queer unmusical noises possible on various instruments, all these do brave service in humorous music, but in themselves, or at any length, they are liable to become merely annoying. And these same effects are also used for dramatic purposes in serious pieces. Perhaps this is why it is so easy to parody the rhetoric of opera. Besides, our idea of what is a funny sound varies tremendously with different people and different periods of musical history. It is so hard for many of us to tell the difference between what is funny and what is ultra-modern. There is another type of musical humor which consists in caricatured imitations of other music as in the "A la Manière de . . ." by Ravel and Casella.

Mr. Taylor makes use of the normal modern orchestra, and according to a growing custom uses the piano as a voice in the orchestra, supplying its own effects and those of the harp, which is omitted. There is a xylophone, and the double-bassoon has a prominent part. Used with the whole orchestra, this instrument adds depth and grandeur, but used alone its cavernous tones make a comic effect. Mr. Taylor's general style shows most plainly the influence of Wagner and MacDowell. Beyond the use of the whole-tone scale, which is no longer French property, there is not much trace of modern French idioms. Mr. Taylor shows courage in not trying for any more boldness than comes natural to him. Musicians in search of new tricks will not be very curious about this Suite, but audiences will enjoy its sentiment, humor and telling orchestration. They will also be grateful that when Mr. Taylor begins a nice tune he does not snip it off before it has fulfilled its promise. With these qualities and the advantage of being available in printed form, the piece should win many performances.

The first part of the first movement is entitled "Dedication," the text taken from Carroll's dedicatory verses to a

Child of pure unclouded brow
And dreaming eyes of wonder.

A violin solo opens with an Andante song-like theme of unmistakably American character. There is a contrasting strain where "the shadow of a sigh may tremble through the story." The original theme returns in the whole orchestra. Then there comes a mysterious transition to the second part of the first movement which is entitled "The Garden of Live Flowers." Not content with "saying it with themselves," these flowers can and do talk. In Mr. Taylor's music they indulge in a great deal of staccato laughter after the manner o ballet flower-maidens. Then in a passag of contrast, Lento e Languido, floral yearn ing, expresses itself through Wagneria seventh-chords and chromatic progression until the gay laughter returns.

The second movement is devoted to th ballad of "Jabberwocky," which Mr. Tay lor has interpreted effectively, though i is such a tremendous subject that som may be disappointed. Stravinsky would have given us a more terrifying Jabberwock which, however, a true Stravinskite would embrace as a gentle herald of spring. ("The Rite of Spring House-Cleaning" is to be repeated ere long.) Mr Taylor gives the Jabberwock a Wagnerian leading-motiv in the bass, such a motiv as might serve in a serious symphonic poem to represent the "powers of evil." Here with the subject in mind, the effect is comic. After a "mimsy" chord in harmonics comes one of the most imaginative pages in the suite. A fantastic clarinet solo with Oriental flourishes in D major against a Moussorgsky-like ostinato accompaniment, seems to create a fairy-story atmosphere and to express an im inent courage on the part of the hero the same time the double-bassoo atens with the Jabberwock moti the music breaks into a jaunty marc the hero pauses "in uffish thought" he sound of slow augmented sixt
. The "whiffling and burbling"

pro of the
by a comic fugue with a sion of the leading motiv a is an effective "stunt"— humor to the musician who the difficulties of fugal wri avoided by use of the whole which every note harmonizes with every other. The march part in working up the climax with glissandos on the xylo the "vorpal blade goes s
The last writhings of the depicted by a cadenza for ba hero goes "galumphing back" tune with chime-chords
When the "chortling" subsides, return to "uffish thought"
the fantastic clarinet, in the that the ballad returns to stanza. The movement ende

The third movement, "Looking-sects," deals with such wonders a the size of a chicken, a snapdrag a bread-and-butter fly." (Here for a problem for students in mu position. Write thirty-two measur will describe a gnat the size of a
In order to make an insect-like Mr. Taylor has tissue paper la strings of the piano—a clever instrumentation. This movement i built on the whole-tone scale. " Debussy," some may say, but there good deal more to Debussy than w tone scales. We have heard more delic organized insects in some modern F pieces, although not instructed lo them. They flit through "The Aftern a Faun," and then "Pelléas and Méli living in that old, old castle

In the fourth movement we have White Knight of "gentle face and mild eyes," whose habit of falling of horse is here depicted by glissandos trombone. The opening theme of the vision is purposely ungainly. Later solo 'cello announces a lyric theme of M Dowell-like character which ify the sentimental side of the Knight. It becomes Wagnerian in ress. The ungainly first theme and the Knight slides off his horse wards the end the sentimental theme taken up by the whole orchestra worked up to a paroxysm like that Prelude to "Tristan." Is Mr. Taylor oping suggestions from Carroll, or merely releasing a Wagnerian co
But composers and orchestras have rights as well as programmes. His p spent, the Knight ambles away to sound of the awkward theme, and pizzicato tweak from the strings p end to the vision.

Programmes in Prospect

For a second time, Mr. Monteux sets a programme for a pair of Symphony Concerts upon which there is no Symphony. None will be played tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening; none will be heard at the concerts of Feb. 22 and 23. For them the conductor proposes Mendelssohn's Overture to Shakspeare's comedy, "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; the Fourth Concerto of Beethoven for Piano and Orchestra; Mr. Hadley's new tone-poem, "The Ocean"; d'Indy's symphonic piece, "Summer Day on the Mountain," since Dr. Muck's time unheard in Boston, yet music of imaginative beauty and ardent course. In the Concerto, Edouard Risler, able Parisian pianist of the elder generation, now on visit to America, will play the solo-part. In his own tone-poem, the practised Mr. Hadley will conduct.

The programme for the fourth of the Monday Evening Concerts by the Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall on March 10, traverses Brahms's Second Symphony, smiling and songful amongst his four; Schumann's Concerto for Piano and Orchestra with Mr. Félix Fox playing the solo-part; and Lalo's Overture to his opera, "The King of Ys." A year indeed is this for Brahms. To his Second Symphony Mr. Monteux has lately added the Third; while on March 7 and 8, the First will lead Mr. Schneevoigt's programme.

Skriabin's symphony, "The Divine Poem," will soon go into active rehearsal at Symphony Hall. Mr. Monteux purposes to play this singular piece of ecstatic music-making at the concerts of Feb. 29 and March 1. A week later he will repeat it in New York.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

MONTREAL
CANADA
Standard
ISSUE OF
JAN 26 1924

Boston Symphony With Pierre Monteux Coming To Montreal

Some orchestral leaders have the reputation of tyrants—of controlling the musicians under them by being abusive, and of "educating" reluctant audiences by defiantly hurling unwelcome scores at their heads.

Pierre Monteux, the great conductor who is now fulfilling his fifth season as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is not of this sort; his method is rather that of quiet persistency. At rehearsals his criticism is unfailingly courteous, if unsparing. He knows precisely what he wants, makes his desire clear, and patiently insists until that effect is obtained to a hair's breadth of exactitude. The players under him perpetually marvel at his wonderfully accurate ear. If a single one of the hundred instruments plays too sharp or too flat the erring musician is politely but firmly called to task.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play in Montreal during February. Managament—Louis Bourdon.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

WORCESTER
MASS.
TELEGRAM

FEB 2 1924

Mechanics Hall

The pending return concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which is to take place in Mechanics hall on Tuesday evening, Feb. 12, will probably be the occasion of the last visit to Worcester of Pierre Monteux, the illustrious conductor. This French celebrity is now completing his fifth year at the head of the orchestra, and expects at its conclusion to return to France.

Pierre Monteux toured Europe several times, both as conductor of opera and as conductor of Diaghileff's Ballet Russe. With this organization he first came to America. Previous to his present engagement, he served a year as one of the principal conductors of the Metropolitan Opera House.

The program for the Worcester concert will reveal to particular advantage the genius of the leader and the miraculous qualities of the virtuoso orchestra which he commands.

The symphony will be the famous Seventh of Beethoven, and the other numbers Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," Debussy's two nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," and Wagner's overture to "Tannhauser."

Strand Theater

THIS CLIPPING FROM

WORCESTER
MASSACHUSETTS
GAZETTE
FEB 7 1924

happy circus days.

Boston Symphony Plays Here, Feb. 12

The concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Mechanics hall, Tuesday evening, Feb. 12, will probably be the occasion of the last visit to Worcester of Pierre Monteux, the illustrious conductor. This French celebrity is now completing his fifth year at the head of the orchestra and expects at its conclusion to return to France.

Pierre Monteux is making a precedent in the Boston Symphony concerts and in the symphony concerts of America which will be remembered long after he returns to his own country at the conclusion of the present season. He toured Europe several times, both as conductor of opera and as conductor of Diaghileff's Ballet Russe. With this organization he first came to America and toured this country. Previous to his present engagement, he served a year as one of the princiupal conductors of the Metropolitan Opera house.

Eleano[illegible] Boardman, Goldwyn lead

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

SALEM
MASS.
NEWS

FEB 1924

Boston Symphony Orchestra of 104 Musicians Feb. 17

There is unusual interest in the concert at the Empire theatre, Salem a week from Sunday afternoon when the full Boston Symphony orchestra of 104 musicians gives a concert there.

Although the tickets were not ready early Saturday morning when the sale opened and many people who had to get early trains were unable to buy, the sale for the opening day was over $600. Ordinarily this would indicate that when the famous orchestra comes to Salem under the able direction of Pierre Monteux, it will play to a capacity audience.

Local people who have not yet bought tickets would do well to remember that this week the concert is being actively pushed in Beverly, Peabody, Gloucester, Lynn, Danvers and Newburyport. This means that Salem will be the mecca for all music lovers from these places as well as from the towns on the North Shore.

The selection of Miss Edith Thompson as soloist has struck a popular chord. She is a tremendous favorite on the North Shore. When she played as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra in Lynn two years ago many local people attended the concert and were delighted with the splendid way in which she rose to the occasion.

For the Salem concert Miss Thompson will play Tchaikowsky's concerto in B-flat (No. 2). It is a brilliant number and well calculated to test her splendid powers. The rest of the program includes Dvorak's "New World" symphony; two of Debussy's Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals;" and Wagner's Prelude to the "Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra again demonstrated that one can play an unhackneyed program in New York and attract an audience of good size.

Mr. Monteux's third Thursday night program at Carnegie Hall embraced, besides Mozart's ever fresh "Jupiter" Symphony, Sibelius violin-concerto, admirably played by Richard Burgin, the concert-master of the organization, and, for the first time in this city, Stravinsky's "Consecration of Spring." It was the event of the season!

Stravinsky's work is the most exciting music we have ever heard. It may be Russian in character, but it suggests the mystic atmosphere of the Far East, of India, of howling dervishes, and the fanaticism of a by-gone age.

Mr. Monteux and his orchestra of virtuosi achieved a triumph.

Trans Feb 8

"Le Sacre" Again

But Not Until the Symphony Concerts of Next April

SINCE requests have come in numbers to Mr. Monteux for a repetition at the Symphony Concerts of Stravinsky's tone-poem, "The Rite of Spring," he has definitely decided to play the piece again in both Boston and New York. In Boston, it will be heard anew at a pair of concerts in April, while in New York, during the same month, it will reappear at a Saturday matinée. Of all the notable new pieces that Mr. Monteux has undertaken through five years as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, none has so stirred its public in both cities. Few have been the protests; in flood has come praise, alike upon music and performance. A masterpiece, messieurs, a masterpiece.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Trans Feb 8

MUSIC TO LEWIS CARROLL

Deems Taylor's Suite, "Alice in Wonderland," for the First Time in Boston at the Symphony Concert Tomorrow—Music of Humor, Fancy and American Quality—Course and Content

DEEMS TAYLOR'S Orchestral Suite, "Through the Looking Glass," which will be played for the first times in Boston at the Symphony Concerts this week, promises to make a charming diversion from the solemnity or furious modernity of the usual programme. It was a bright idea for Mr. Taylor to summon Lewis Carroll's whimsical creations into the service of programme-music. The mere thought of them takes the audience happily into a child-world where acoustics are finer and ears are keener. These pieces by a talented young American composer, who is also the reviewer of The New York World, contain much that is serious, but they will excite curiosity mainly because of their humor, thereby raising the difficult question of what is meant by humor in music. In literature and drawing the possibilities of humor are infinitely richer. The playfulness of Haydn and the "cosmic humor" of Beethoven appeal more to our sense of beauty than to our sense of the absurd. Music which actually makes us smile or laugh is most apt to be purposely connected with some extra-musical idea as in comic songs, operas, incidental music for the stage and programme-music. To words and actions music adds exciting movement, emphasis, and a merriment almost imitating the sound of chuckling and laughing. The humor often consists in a surprising suitability of the music to the idea, or in a contrast between solemn music and trivial situations—in either case without anything intrinsically laughable in the music itself. We take it for granted that wood-wind instruments should play runs and arpeggios; but when we are told that these will be buckets of water poured by [illegible] relentless broomstick, as [illegible] Sorcerer's Apprentice," we at once [illegible] humor in these cascades of notes. The grunt, the groan, the squeak, the sudden pause or sudden crash, the queer unmusical noises possible on various instruments, all these do brave service in humorous music, but in themselves, or at any length, they are liable to become merely annoying. And these same effects are also used for dramatic purposes in serious pieces. Perhaps this is why it is so easy to parody the rhetoric of opera. Besides, our idea of what is a funny sound varies tremendously with different people and different periods of musical history. It is so hard for many of us to tell the difference between what is funny and what is ultra-modern. There is another type of musical humor which consists in caricatured imitations of other music as in the "A la Manière de . . ." by Ravel and Casella.

Mr. Taylor makes use of the normal modern orchestra, and according to a growing custom uses the piano as a voice in the orchestra, supplying its own effects and those of the harp, which is omitted. There is a xylophone, and the double-bassoon has a prominent part. Used with the whole orchestra, this instrument adds depth and grandeur, but used alone its cavernous tones make a comic effect. Mr. Taylor's general style shows most plainly the influence of Wagner and MacDowell. Beyond the use of the whole-tone scale, which is no longer French property, there is not much trace of modern French idioms. Mr. Taylor shows courage in not trying for any more boldness than comes natural to him. Musicians in search of new tricks will not be very curious about this Suite, but audiences will enjoy its sentiment, humor and telling orchestration. They will also be grateful that when Mr. Taylor begins a nice tune he does not snip it off before it has fulfilled its promise. With these qualities and the advantage of being available in printed form, the piece should win many performances.

The first part of the first movement is entitled "Dedication," the text taken from Carroll's dedicatory verses to a

> Child of pure unclouded brow
> And dreaming eyes of wonder.

A violin solo opens with an Andante song-like theme of unmistakably American character. There is a contrasting strain where "the shadow of a sigh may tremble through the story." The original theme returns in the whole orchestra. Then there comes a mysterious transition to the second part of the first movement which is entitled "The Garden of Live Flowers." Not content with "saying it with themselves," these flowers can and do talk. In Mr. Taylor's music they indulge in a great deal of staccato laughter after the manner o ballet flower-maidens. Then in a passag of contrast, Lento e Languido, floral yearning, expresses itself through Wagneria seventh-chords and chromatic progression until the gay laughter returns.

The second movement is devoted to th ballad of "Jabberwocky," which Mr. Taylor has interpreted effectively, though i is such a tremendous subject that som may be disappointed. Stravinsky would have given us a more terrifying Jabberwock which, however, a true Stravinskite would embrace as a gentle herald of spring. ("The Rite of Spring House-Cleaning" is to be repeated ere long.) Mr Taylor gives the Jabberwock a Wagnerian leading-motiv in the bass, such a motiv as might serve in a serious symphonic poem to represent the "powers of evil." Here with the subject in mind, the effect is comic. After a "mimsy" chord in harmonics comes one of the most imaginative pages in the suite. A fantastic clarinet solo with Oriental flourishes in D major against a Moussorgsky-like ostinato accompaniment, seems to create a fairy-story atmosphere and to express an im[illegible]inent courage on the part of the hero [illegible] the same time the double-bassoo [illegible]atens with the Jabberwock moti [illegible] the music breaks into a jaunty marc [illegible] the hero pauses "in uffish thought" [illegible] sound of slow augmented sixt[illegible]. The "whiffling and burbling" approach of the Jabberwock [illegible] by a comic fugue with [illegible] sion of the leading motiv as [illegible] is an effective [illegible] of humor to the musician who [illegible] the difficulties of fugal writing [illegible] avoided by use of the whole-tone [illegible] which every note harmonizes [illegible] with every other. The march [illegible] part in working up the climax [illegible] with glissandos on the xylophone [illegible] the "vorpal blade goes [illegible]." The last writhings of the [illegible] depicted by a cadenza for bass[illegible] hero goes "galumphing back" to [illegible] tune with chime-chords on the [illegible] When the "chortling" subsides, there [illegible] return to "uffish thought" and the [illegible] the fantastic clarinet, in the same [illegible] that the ballad returns to its open[illegible] stanza. The movement ends dreamily.

The third movement, "Looking-Glass Insects," deals with such wonders as [illegible] the size of a chicken, a snap-dragon [illegible] a bread-and-butter fly." (Here [illegible] for a problem for students in musical composition. Write thirty-two measures [illegible] will describe a gnat the size of a chicken.) In order to make an insect-like [illegible] Mr. Taylor has tissue paper laid [illegible] strings of the piano—a clever stroke [illegible] instrumentation. This movement is a[illegible] built on the whole-tone scale. "Just Debussy," some may say, but there [illegible] good deal more to Debussy than w[illegible] tone scales. We have heard more delic[illegible] organized insects in some mode[illegible] pieces, although not instructed [illegible] them. They flit through "The A[illegible] a Faun," and then "Pelléas and Mélisande" living in that old, old castle.

In the fourth movement we have [illegible] White Knight of "gentle face and [illegible] mild eyes," whose habit of falling off [illegible] horse is here depicted by glissandos on [illegible] trombone. The opening theme of the vision is purposely ungainly. Later a solo 'cello announces a lyric theme of MacDowell-like character which [illegible] ify the sentimental side of the [illegible] Knight. It becomes Wagnerian [illegible] ress. The ungainly first theme [illegible] and the Knight slides off his horse. [illegible] wards the end the sentimental theme [illegible] taken up by the whole orchestra [illegible] worked up to a paroxysm like that [illegible] Prelude to "Tristan." Is Mr. Taylor [illegible] oping suggestions from Carroll or merely releasing a Wagnerian [illegible] But composers and orchestras [illegible] rights as well as programmes. F[illegible] spent, the Knight ambles away [illegible] sound of the awkward theme and [illegible] pizzicato tweak from the strings p[illegible] end to the vision.

Programmes in Prospect

For a second time, Mr. Monteux sets a programme for a pair of Symphony Concerts upon which there is no Symphony. None will be played tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening; none will be heard at the concerts of Feb. 22 and 23. For them the conductor proposes Mendelssohn's Overture to Shakspeare's comedy, "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; the Fourth Concerto of Beethoven for Piano and Orchestra; Mr. Hadley's new tone-poem, "The Ocean"; d'Indy's symphonic piece, "Summer Day on the Mountain," since Dr. Muck's time unheard in Boston, yet music of imaginative beauty and ardent course. In the Concerto, Edouard Risler, able Parisian pianist of the elder generation, now on visit to America, will play the solo-part. In his own tone-poem, the practised Mr. Hadley will conduct.

The programme for the fourth of the Monday Evening Concerts by the Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall on March 10, traverses Brahms's Second Symphony, smiling and songful amongst his four; Schumann's Concerto for Piano and Orchestra with Mr. Félix Fox playing the solo-part; and Lalo's Overture to his opera, "The King of Ys." A year indeed is this for Brahms. To his Second Symphony Mr. Monteux has lately added the Third; while on March 7 and 8, the First will lead Mr. Schneevoigt's programme.

Skriabin's symphony, "The Divine Poem," will soon go into active rehearsal at Symphony Hall. Mr. Monteux purposes to play this singular piece of ecstatic music-making at the concerts of Feb. 29 and March 1. A week later he will repeat it in New York.

TIGHT BINDING

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK,
N. Y.
TIMES
[illegible]10 1924

The First Excitements of New Music And the Reckoning Ten Days After

By OLIN DOWNES.

A NEW composition, masterly in its technic and of a highly exciting nature, is performed for the first time in a big American city. Thereafter the musical paragraphers are seen rushing wildly to the office, coattails flapping in the wind, brows knitted, lips already coining words and phrases to flourish in tomorrow's column. It is the sharpshooter's hour. Every one is going to take a potshot, knowing that concerning such strange music nobody can prove anybody's guess to be wrong, hoping that ten months later one may be able to say "I told you so." And ten months is a good long time! Ten years? A quarter of a century? Only critics keep scrapbooks, and even they only glance over them occasionally. The future is far away, and we who are about to die are writing for the waste basket. On then! On, and the devil take the hindmost! There is much delirious scribbling. The next morning a delighted public learns that last night a masterpiece was revealed to the waiting world.

It is ten days since Strawinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" was heard for the first time in New York City. Every writer then present took the work to heart. Elgar's "Dream of Gerontius" was called an enduring masterpiece less than twenty years ago. [illegible] way, when was it last given here?

The amazing performance of "Sacre du Printemps" by Mr. Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought all kinds of revelations. First of all, it explained a whole chapter of musical development of the last ten years in Europe, just as it shed much light on some composers nearer to us, who figure frequently, for example, in the programs of local guilds and societies which, hereabout, favor ultra-modern music. Knowing Strawinsky's beautiful "Oiseau de Feu" and his far more individual "Petrouchka," works which have become standard compositions in the eyes of the present generation, one had long suspected that he had also become a treasure house for those who know a good thing when they hear it, and do not hesitate too long or conscientiously before the deed of appropriation. But when "Sacre du Printemps" came on the scene a great veil was lifted from one's eyes. Before hearing this work, which is ten years old, one had marveled, for example, at the superb audaciousness of certain pages by Darius Milhaud. Milhaud has now, in a large measure, been explained—by Strawinsky. Others, too, have been explained. We are frank to say that the great bulk of Arthur Bliss's "Color Symphony" has been well explained, and other compositions. And the truest flattery is imitation. Let us speak of the things in "Sacre du Printemps" which make the work lonely and incomparable in its sea[illegible].

These things are perfectly astounding. We are the very last in the world to attempt to minimize them. It seems incontrovertible that the score of "Sacre du Printemps" enlarges materially the expressive capacities of music, not only as regards "poly-harmony," which, with Strawinsky, means bodies of chords moving about independently of each other in the manner not of harmony but of counterpoint, but also and above all of rhythm. The rhythms in this composition seem fit at times to rive the very ancient earth. New sounds are heard, sounds no one ever imagined, and, by the god of music, they seem to be sounds that we have always loved and that always existed in the consciousness. But here one should be careful. There is entirely too much in a name. "Spring Consecration," or whatever translation one chooses of Strawinsky's title, and the story of the ballet seen when the work is performed on the stage, which no one, in the midst of the enormous Strawinsky propaganda, may hope not to read, are bad for the imaginations of that wild tribe who love music or write about it—or both. It was known long in advance that the score celebrated primitive rites, elemental experiences. Could one avoid looking for them? Several suspicions arise, thinking over that thoroughly upsetting and exhilarating performance of Strawinsky.

One or two of these are directly concerned with the music. Is it not a little long, at least for concert performances? Do not certain passages, apart from the stage, drop a little? And, what is more important, what percentage of this music is merely a sensorial expression, one that attacks most successfully the nerve centres, just as jazz music of even obviously poor description may deprive a learned commentator temporarily of such faculties of reason as he likes to think he possesses? And if this is the case with the intensely nervous art of Strawinsky, how will it appear to us in a decade or a generation?

Then comes a question fundamental to the future of Strawinsky. It is caused by the second sensation his music provoked within one week's time in New York—the performance, last Tuesday night by the Philadelphia Orchestra, Leopold Stokowski, conductor, of the "Symphonies for Wind Instruments," composed in 1920, but heard here, like "Sacre du Printemps," under Mr. Monteux, for the first time.

This work was not successful with either press or public. At best its reception was luke-warm, although its idiom was no more novel, if as much so, as that of "Sacre du Printemps," which had such an electrical effect upon everybody. The fact in itself proves nothing at all, because most of the snap judgments of press and public have been reversed by time, but then again it may prove something, for this reason: that it was not merely unaccustomed sounds which dismayed the listener last Tuesday, but the apparent absence of the intense life felt in the score of "Sacre du Printemps." Here again the audience may have been completely off the track. Strawinsky may be hot on the scent of a more beautiful and intense expression of life than we can at present comprehend. But this much is certain, that there is infinitely more suppression of subjective feeling in the "Symphonies for Wind Instruments" than in Strawinsky's earlier scores known here, and that he himself now inveighs continually against subjective emotion on the part of the composer or the performer of music. That is not a completely new departure on the part of this singularly gifted composer, though it be ominous. It is perhaps the instinctive reaction against sentimentality, which he abhors, of a man whose mental processes are as keen and as piercing in the analysis of life as his nature is nervous, highly organized, energetic, and sensual. Always, Strawinsky has tended to discard whatever was soft or romantic in favor of a thing more stark and stern. Truth to him is seldom lovely, often grim. So that the genesis of his recent declarations in favor of complete objectivity in his art, of a music which shall be organic within itself and have nothing whatever to do with human relations, is perhaps a passionate and well-justified reaction against the slush, mush, and "uplift" of the times. And, technically, there are plenty of indications of the "Symphonies for Wind Instruments" in the "Sacre du Printemps," and even in earlier Strawinsky.

But here is the point. Is it not the second-rank man, and, fundamentally, the weaker man and the smaller man, too, who consciously dreads rather than instinctively rises superior to human cheapnesses or failings? Is there not something over-refined and even a little hysterical in this attempt—and we believe it to be an unsuccessful attempt anyhow—at complete negation of that which is commonly human, or sensuously beautiful or healthily emotional in our existence? We say "commonly" with purpose. The man who expects or is expected to produce immortal music welcomes and adores even the most "common" results of life. And here is Strawinsky, composing with an almost terrifying creative spirit in "Sacre du Printemps," presenting us, seven years later in date of composition, with a work that seems at best ascetic, and at the worst disdainful, and which causes anxiety on the part of those who know how the very existence of the spirit of mankind depends on its being nourished by genius.

Is this artist, like almost every other modern of his period, beginning to fear life, or hate it, which is the same thing? We ask questions. It is too early to do more than speculate in such a direction. But it is also too soon to unqualifiedly acclaim Igor Strawinsky.

There is another consideration. On the same program with the "Symphonies for Wind Instruments" was a composition for 'cello and orchestra, "Schelomo" ("Solomon"), by one Ernest Bloch, who has not been as fortunate in the number and dexterity of his propagandists as Strawinsky, but whose music steadily grows in the estimation of the public. That music had no particular theories, except the thing which is not a theory, but a consuming passion with Mr. Bloch, the making of music, and, in the making of music, the true and inevitable expression of the Jewish race as well as the soul of a Jewish individual. That music was all that the music of Strawinsky avowedly is not—all passion, color, ancient grandeur and fury. It is fairly flung on the page, with a sincerity amounting to violence, with an emotional force that comes back not only to the mind but to the feelings as one writes of it. We are too near this music, also, to affront common sense by reckoning its ultimate value. But for us the promise of the future is overwhelmingly with compositions—unhappily too few—like those of Bloch, and not with such a cerebrally written piece of music as that of Strawinsky. In the one a mighty inspiration, a half chaotic power as tremendous and vitalizing as it is disdainful of delicate arrangement is felt. In the other one is only able at this time to discover a technic of incomparable smoothness and precision, a wonderful arrangement of lines, proportions, coherency perfectly attained, at least on paper, and — a forgetfulness of humanity. The news of the day after the Philadelphia concert was of Strawinsky's new composition. The news of a week later is that "Schelomo" dominated everything else on the program. It is well to go slow, however, in estimating either Bloch or Strawinsky.

B R U N O • W A L T E R

Today's Guest Conductor With the Symphony Society.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK,
N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 10 1924

WHEN Czechoslovakia celebrates the one-hundredth birthday of Bedrich Smetana, the Czechoslovaks of New York will hold a public meeting at the Town Hall on Saturday, March 8. A special committee has been appointed in his native town, Litomysl, to honor the memory of the composer by reproducing his works. They will arrange the room in which he was born, restoring many articles once used by him. A monument also will be erected in the Bohemian city. The fame of Smetana in America is second only to that of Dvorak. He is best known in America through his opera "The Bartered Bride," in which Emmy Destinn appeared when it was produced at Prague and later in New York. Selections from his opera "Dalibor" have been played at local concerts. "The Bartered Bride" has just been given in Hungary, where it will be listed in the regular rèpertoire of the Bucharest Opera Company.

Philadelphia is to have a music conservatorium intended to equal the best of the German schools and the Conservatoire in Paris, subventioned by the French Government.

It will be called the Curtis Institute of Music, endowed by the Curtis Foundation, which has taken over the Conservatory Department of the Settlement Music School, with John Grolle as its director.

Carl Flesch will head the violin department and Louis Svecenski will be the ensemble teacher. Students of Philadelphia will be given every opportunity of developing their musical talent under the best instructors.

The Pierian Sodality of Harvard is an ambitious organization. Besides the conventional program it gave opportunity to student composers to appear. Mr. Foote offered "The Pierian," a string quartet; Mr. Ballentine a tone poem, "By a Lake in Russia." George Newell showed ability in a waltz for orchestra.

The subscriptions to meet the deficit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra now amount to $68,479 of the required $95,000. At present there are about 2,000 subscribers to the guarantee fund, and as 4,000 people attend the concerts weekly, there are still plenty of possible subscribers.

Alfredo Casella, who will make his third American tour this season, will introduce at some of his orchestral appearances his own orchestration of the Chopin Concerto in F minor, opus 21. Last season Casella played his own arrangement of Albeniz's Spanish Rhapsody with the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Georges Enesco, when he plays with the Cleveland Orchestra Feb. 21 and 23, will do so as conductor, composer and soloist. He will conduct his own Rumanian Rhapsody as well as his Symphony in E, and will star in the Brahms concerto. He will perform in Indianapolis under the auspices of the Maennerchor. Georges Enesco is quoted as saying that he chose Brahms as his model to start with. He long ago ceased to imitate him, but he hopes that his music still bears the imprint of the past out of which it grew.

Glob Feb-16

THIBAUD SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Deems Taylor's Suite Is Well Received

Jacques Thibaud, noted French violinist, played the solo part in Lalo's "Spanish Symphony" at yesterday's Symphony concert with unusual sweetness of tone, and a slightly saccharine sentimentality of style well suited to the music. As a violin show-piece this music surpasses most others. Bruch, Vieuxtemps, and even Saint-Saens never equalled it.

As a substitute on a symphony concert program for the expected classic symphony it is annoyingly lacking in imaginative power and dignity of style. Mr Thibaud's performance was ingratiating, almost effeminate in quality, with no trace of the grand manner. His technique is not phenomenal, though it is far beyond that of the average fiddler. He was cordially applauded.

A suite inspired by Lewis Carroll's "Through the Looking Glass" introduced Deems Taylor, well known to many Bostonians as the musical reviewer of the New York World, as a composer. No important piece of his has hitherto been performed in Boston. It has been rather a fashion of late years to produce pseudo-juvenile music, written, like many children's books, for the grownups. Debussy's "Children's Corner," Ravel's "Mother Goose," and John Alden Carpenter's "Adventures in a Perambulator" are familiar examples.

Mr Taylor's suite has a refreshing absence of artificiality and insincerity. He has thrown himself into the spirit of the thing, as Lewis Carroll did, and forgotten while he composed that after all ingenuousness is the last extravagance of the oversophisticated. The music is spontaneously imagined and worked out with a cleverness that is not self conscious.

It is a perfect piece of program music at its best. The program notes make the music more charming, and even without them it would not be ineffective. He has not striven for a modernity beyond what comes naturally to him, a merit all too rare. The music for the Jabberwocky and for the White Knight was particularly delightful. The audience applauded long and loudly at the end. If the composer was present he gave no sign.

The one great classic on the program was Gluck's overture to his opera "Iphigenia in Aulis," music so splendidly dramatic that one bemoaned anew the strange ways of opera companies which revive "L'Africana" and "La Juive" and "L'Amico Fritz" and never think of producing anything by Gluck. Mr Monteux gave an unusually sympathetic interpretation of this number, though in most 18th-century music he does not excel.

Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture fantasy, played, as Mr Monteux always plays Tschaikovsky, without hysteria or melodrama, again seemed one of the few tolerable serious works of this once-overrated composer. The love theme in it escapes benality without losing in intensity, a distinction it shares among all Tchaikovsky's lyric outbursts with the "Letter Scene" in the opera "Eugen Oniegin" alone. The Capulets and Montagues battle in a way that makes one sigh for Berlioz, whose "Romeo and Juliet" music is the only score yet written that is imaginatively comparable with Shakspere. At least Tchaikovsky can claim that his music outclasses Gounod's opera "Romeo and Juliet." P. R.

From TIMES
Address: St. Louis, Mo.
Date FEB 9 - 1924
Establish

NEW YORK LISTENS TO RUSSIAN MUSIC

Stravinsky's "Le Sacre Du Printemps" Heard; Errolle Has Fine Voice.

By FRANCES S. BURKE,
The Times' New York Musical Correspondent.

NEW YORK, Feb. 9.—A glorious week for the music lover. Almost unbearably full of great works and great performances; experiences that keyed the sensibilities too high, drained the emotions too completely. A year from now one might describe them. At present one feels unequal to the task. Maria Ivogun's concert was thoroughly reviewed a hundred years ago by Percy Bysshe Shelley, when he wrote his lines "To a Skylark." Words less ecstatic fail to express her performance, and its effect upon her audience. Generally speaking, colorature voices are my pet aversion, and the music which exists for them is my bete noir. But here is a colorature singer whose voice is the embodiment of "music sweet as love," whose noble musicianship leads her to the best songs written for her type, and whose art saves them from being amazing vocal feats only. In such songs as "Lo, Here the Gentle Lark," the radiant warmth of her voice almost shamed the pearly tones of the accompanying flute—it was "like an unbodied joy whose race is just begun." "O Sleep, Why Dost Thou Leave Me," was a marvel of breath control, of matchless phrasing and of beautiful tones "flowing in a crystal stream." In Bach's "Patron, das macht der Wind," Ivogun's diamond-point enunciation became super-diction. Wedded to tones, winged words flew like the wind, Eolus-driven—racing, mischievous, gusty winds, piping as they played. Subtle, sparkling and hypnotic! At the close of the song it seemed as if Aeolian Hall had been swept by a rush of pure, invigorating air.

Ivogun does not look like a coloratura. A simple and unaffected personality, with a youthful appeal that is almost wistful. So it does not seem strang that Ivogun, formerly the pride of the Munich opera, sings quite incomparably, with a most delicate refinement, old English songs like "Where the Bee Sucks" and "The Lass With the Delicate Air."

But it really is stupefying when this small person, without an atom of pretense or affectation or effort, begins to toss about the rockets and Roman candles of Kreisler's "Liebesfreud." Put on your Kreisler record and you will know exactly how it sounded, the moving warmth of the legato passages, the crisp staccato portion, crisply repeated an octave higher, the dizzying altitude of those harmonics—Shelley has no line for this performance—his lark was no daredevil!

At this point I fall back on my first reaction to Ivogun, when she reminded me of an aviator up in the clouds, doing nose dives and tail spins and gaily looping the loop while the crowd below wonders. No wonder her audience was half frenzied and wanted her to repeat it! The wonder was that she did, as easily as making a curtesy, and that to the end of the program, including the "Blue Danube" and some quiet, lovely encores, her voice never lost a jot of its beautiful quality, or its flawless purity of intonation.

• • •

The Boston Symphony made his- ory when it produced Stravinsky's 'Le Sacre du Printemps" (The Rite of Spring) on Thursday, somewhat lisarranging the plans of the Phil- harmonic which has announced the vork for a "first New York per- ormance" in March. "A Picture of Pagan Russia," the composer calls t. A reader of Frazer's "The Golden Bough," will find in it a picture of pagan Greece as well—of what spring nagic meant to primitive peoples renerally. The history of "Le Sacre u Printemps" is also a history of the eceptance of Strawinsky and mod- rn music. It was first produced in aris by Diaghilef's Ballet in 1913, when it was conducted by Monteux, at present conductor of the Boston orchestra. There was much hissing, and also much applause, as there was again later that year when Monteux directed the work in London. In Carnegie Hall the other night there was not one openly dissenting voice, but Mr. Monteux received a thunderous ovation that lasted many minutes. He gave a great performance of a prodigious work. A work [illegible] the excess, the emphasis and the [illegible] of genius—the genius which te down and obliterates old worlds builds new ones.

The naked eloquence of the thing rally shook the audience. "The roduction represents 'The mystery the physical world in spring'— w often one has felt that on the Western coast, where nature is so xuberant, so voluptuous, so tri- mphant in the vernal march of new fe, new growth, toward bloom and ruition—one seemed almost to hear the green things spraying, vining, unfolding, leaving, budding. • • • All this mystery Strawinsky has put into the first part of the work called "The Fertility of Earth"—with more —Dances of Youths and Maidens, The Spring Rounds, Games of Rival Towns and the Kiss to the Earth. The second part, called "The Sacrifice," opens with the physical sadness of "The Pagan Night," "pitiful with the helplessness of living crea tures in the presence of the forc of nature." It leads to the Mys Circle of the Adolescents and fin to the dance of the maiden who sacrificed to spring by dancin self to death. Nothing as the excitement an sacrificial danc ceived.

Her Feb-16

STORY OF ALICE TOLD IN MUSIC

Deems Taylor's "'Through the Looking Glass" Feature of Symphony Concert

HIS WORK SHOWS GENUINE FANCY

By PHILIP HALE

The 15th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Gluck, Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis"; Lalo, Spanish Symphony for violin and orchestra (Jacques Thibaud, violinist); Taylor, Suite, "Through the Looking Glass: Five Pictures from Lewis Carroll (first time in Boston); Tschaikovsky, Overture-Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet" (after Shakespeare).

Mr. Deems Taylor's Suite was performed here for the first time. He chose these episodes in the adventures of the adorable little Alice: Her talk with the chattering flowers in the garden; how she was puzzled by the poem about the Jabberwock; her dialogue with the gnat about various insects; and her encounter with the pathetic White Knight, who kept falling out of the saddle. These movements are prefaced by one entitled "Dedication."

It is a pleasure to find an American composer of talent who is willing to write music that is cheerful, not portentous; whose fancy is delicate; who uses a large orchestra discreetly, not chiefly to make a thunderous noise. Mr. Taylor, for his inspiration, went to a book that for years has pleased children from the tender age to that of white hairs; he did not ransack the Grecian or the Scandinavian mythology; he had no Thesis, no exposition of colors; he did not attempt to portray in music cave life and the rude rites of primitive man. Nor did he strive painfullyto be ultra-modern in the French, Italian, or German manner. He remembered Lewis Carroll's story: pleasant and amusing musical thoughts came into his head and he expressed them musically, without laboring after transliteration. Even his narration of the Jabberwock's fate is not too realistic, and in this movement the measures that may be taken to picture the peaceful scene while the hero waited with "vorpal sword" in hand by the Tum tum tree the approach of the fearsome monster are charged with poetic beauty. Charming also is the "Dedication." The whole work shows genuine fancy, a gift of expression in an individual manner. Whether without the titles the music would identify this or that episode is not to the point. The Suite is frankly program music, but of the better kind; natural, not pretentious; amusing, but as a man of talent amuses first himself, then those who are privileged to be with him. The performance was a sympathetic and effective one in every way. Mr. Laus, the first bassoon, and Mr. Piller, the double bassoon, covered themselves with glory. The audience evidently enjoyed the Suite hugely.

Mr. Thibaud's interprètation of Lalo's Spanish Symphony cannot be too warmly praised. We have heard many violinists, and among them the greatest, play this music; no one with so marked grace, brilliance, sensuous feeling when the measures called for it, and above all, elegance. When Mr. Tribaud is wholly in the vein, as he was yesterday afternoon, he is incomparable. His hearers were quick to recognize the supreme merit of the performance. The orchestral portion of the Symphony was superbly played under Mr. Monteux's direction. There the two stood, the two who, in 1896, were awarded first prizes for violin playing at the Paris Conservatory.

Gluck's overture loses nothing by the flight of the years. It will undoubtedly be heard when the "Elektra" of Richard Strauss is only a title in a catalogue; for Gluck, consciously or unconsciously, caught the old Grecian spirit. The music is passionate, pathetic, tragic, as a page of Sophocles. Think for a moment how an ultra-modern composer with an enormous band would treat this subject. Remember what M. Honegger did to the poor Horatii and Curiatii.

Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" brought the concert to an end. The love measures, especially the great palpitating theme, and those associated with Friar Laurence, are still moving, impressive. The music for the contending families no longer thrills.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Rossini, Overture to "The Barber of Seville;" Beethoven, Concerto for piano, No. 4 (Edouard Risler, pianist (his first appearance here); Hadley, "Ocean," symphonic poem (first time here; conducted by the composer); d'Indy, Suite, "A Summer Day on the Mountain."

[203]

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK,
N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 10 1924

WHEN Czechoslovakia celebrates the one-hundredth birthday of Bedrich Smetana, the Czechoslovaks of New York will hold a public meeting at the Town Hall on Saturday, March 8. A special committee has been appointed in his native town, Litomysl, to honor the memory of the composer by reproducing his works. They will arrange the room in which he was born, restoring many articles once used by him. A monument also will be erected in the Bohemian city. The fame of Smetana in America is second only to that of Dvorak. He is best known in America through his opera "The Bartered Bride," in which Emmy Destinn appeared when it was produced at Prague and later in New York. Selections from his opera "Dalibor" have been played at local concerts. "The Bartered Bride" has just been given in Hungary, where it will be listed in the regular répertoire of the Bucharest Opera Company.

Philadelphia is to have a music conservatorium intended to equal the best of the German schools and the Conservatoire in Paris, subventioned by the French Government.

It will be called the Curtis Institute of Music, endowed by the Curtis Foundation, which has taken over the Conservatory Department of the Settlement Music School, with John Grolle as its director.

Carl Flesch will head the violin department and Louis Svecenski will be the ensemble teacher. Students of Philadelphia will be given every opportunity of developing their musical talent under the best instructors.

The Pierian Sodality of Harvard is an ambitious organization. Besides the conventional program it gave opportunity to student composers to appear. Mr. Foote offered "The Pierian," a string quartet; Mr. Ballentine a tone poem, "By a Lake in Russia." George Newell showed ability in a waltz for orchestra.

The subscriptions to meet the deficit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra now amount to $68,479 of the required $95,000. At present there are about 2,000 subscribers to the guarantee fund, and as 4,000 people attend the concerts weekly, there are still plenty of possible subscribers.

Alfredo Casella, who will make his third American tour this season, will introduce at some of his orchestral appearances his own orchestration of the Chopin Concerto in F minor, opus 21. Last season Casella played his own arrangement of Albeniz's Spanish Rhapsody with the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Georges Enesco, when he plays with the Cleveland Orchestra Feb. 21 and 23, will do so as conductor, composer and soloist. He will conduct his own Rumanian Rhapsody as well as his Symphony in E, and will star in the Brahms concerto. He will perform in Indianapolis under the auspices of the Maennerchor. Georges Enesco is quoted as saying that he chose Brahms as his model to start with. He long ago ceased to imitate him, but he hopes that his music still bears the imprint of the past out of which it grew.

Globe Feb-16

THIBAUD SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Deems Taylor's Suite Is Well Received

Jacques Thibaud, noted French violinist, played the solo part in Lalo's "Spanish Symphony" at yesterday's Symphony concert with unusual sweetness of tone, and a slightly saccharine sentimentality of style well suited to the music. As a violin show-piece this music surpasses most others. Bruch, Vieuxtemps, and even Saint-Saens never equalled it.

As a substitute on a symphony concert program for the expected classic symphony it is annoyingly lacking in imaginative power and dignity of style. Mr Thibaud's performance was ingratiating, almost effeminate in quality, with no trace of the grand manner. His technique is not phenomenal, though it is far beyond that of the average fiddler. He was cordially applauded.

A suite inspired by Lewis Carroll's "Through the Looking Glass" introduced Deems Taylor, well known to many Bostonians as the musical reviewer of the New York World, as a composer. No important piece of his has hitherto been performed in Boston. It has been rather a fashion of late years to produce pseudo-juvenile music, written, like many children's books, for the grownups. Debussy's "Children's Corner," Ravel's "Mother Goose," and John Alden Carpenter's "Adventures in a Perambulator" are familiar examples.

Mr Taylor's suite has a refreshing absence of artificiality and insincerity. He has thrown himself into the spirit of the thing, as Lewis Carroll did, and forgotten while he composed that after all ingenuousness is the last extravagance of the oversophisticated. The music is spontaneously imagined and worked out with a cleverness that is not self conscious.

It is a perfect piece of program music at its best. The program notes make the music more charming, and even without them it would not be ineffective. He has not striven for a modernity beyond what comes naturally to him, a merit all too rare. The music for the Jabberwocky and for the White Knight was particularly delightful. The audience applauded long and loudly at the end. If the composer was present he gave no sign.

The one great classic on the program was Gluck's overture to his opera "Iphigenia in Aulis," music so splendidly dramatic that one bemoaned anew the strange ways of opera companies which revive "L'Africana" and "La Juive" and "L'Amico Fritz" and never think of producing anything by Gluck. Mr Monteux gave an unusually sympathetic interpretation of this number, though in most 18th-century music he does not excel.

Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture fantasy, played, as Mr Monteux always plays Tschaikovsky, without hysteria or melodrama, again seemed one of the few tolerable serious works of this once-overrated composer. The love theme in it escapes benality without losing in intensity, a distinction it shares among all Tchaikovsky's lyric outbursts with the "Letter Scene" in the opera "Eugen Oniegin" alone. The Capulets and Montagues battle in a way that makes one sigh for Berlioz, whose "Romeo and Juliet" music is the only score yet written that is imaginatively comparable with Shakspere. At least Tchaikovsky can claim that his music outclasses Gounod's opera "Romeo and Juliet."

P. R.

From TIMES
Address: St. Louis, Mo.
Date FEB 9 - 1924
Establish

NEW YORK LISTENS TO RUSSIAN MUSIC

Stravinsky's "Le Sacre Du Printemps" Heard; Errolle Has Fine Voice.

By FRANCES S. BURKE,
The Times' New York Musical Correspondent.

NEW YORK, Feb. 9.—A glorious week for the music lover. Almost unbearably full of great works and great performances; experiences that keyed the sensibilities too high, drained the emotions too completely. A year from now one might describe them. At present one feels unequal to the task. Maria Ivogun's concert was thoroughly reviewed a hundred years ago by Percy Bysshe Shelley, when he wrote his lines "To a Skylark." Words less ecstatic fail to express her performance, and its effect upon her audience. Generally speaking, coloratura voices are my pet aversion, and the music which exists for them is my bete noir. But here is a coloratura singer whose voice is the embodiment of "music sweet as love," whose noble musicianship leads her to the best songs written for her type, and whose art saves them from being amazing vocal feats only. In such songs as "Lo, Here the Gentle Lark," the radiant warmth of her voice almost shamed the pearly tones of the accompanying flute—it was "like an unbodied joy whose race is just begun." "O Sleep, Why Dost Thou Leave Me," was a marvel of breath control, of matchless phrasing and of beautiful tones "flowing in a crystal stream." In Bach's "Patron, das macht der Wind," Ivogun's diamond-point enunciation became super-diction. Wedded to tones, winged words flew like the wind, Eolus-driven—racing, mischievous, gusty winds, piping as they played. Subtle, sparkling and hypnotic! At the close of the song it seemed as if Aeolian Hall had been swept by a rush of pure, invigorating air.

Ivogun does not look like a coloratura. A simple and unaffected personality, with a youthful appeal that is almost wistful. So it does not seem strang that Ivogun, formerly the pride of the Munich opera, sings quite incomparably, with a most delicate refinement, old English songs like "Where the Bee Sucks" and "The Lass With the Delicate Air."

But it really is stupefying when this small person, without an atom of pretense or affectation or effort, begins to toss about the rockets and Roman candles of Kreisler's "Liebesfreud." Put on your Kreisler record and you will know exactly how it sounded, the moving warmth of the legato passages, the crisp staccato portion, crisply repeated an octave higher, the dizzying altitude of those harmonics—Shelley has no line for this performance—his lark was no daredevil!

At this point I fall back on my first reaction to Ivogun, when she reminded me of an aviator up in the clouds, doing nose dives and tail spins and gaily looping the loop while the crowd below wonders. No wonder her audience was half frenzied and wanted her to repeat it! The wonder was that she did, as easily as making a curtesy, and that to the end of the program, including the "Blue Danube" and some quiet, lovely encores, her voice never lost a jot of its beautiful quality or its flawless purity of intonation.

• • •

The Boston Symphony made history when it produced Strawinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps" (The Rite of Spring) on Thursday, somewhat disarranging the plans of the Philharmonic which has announced the work for a "first New York performance" in March. "A Picture of Pagan Russia," the composer calls it. A reader of Frazer's "The Golden Bough," will find in it a picture of pagan Greece as well—of what spring magic meant to primitive peoples generally. The history of "Le Sacre du Printemps" is also a history of the acceptance of Strawinsky and modern music. It was first produced in Paris by Diaghilef's Ballet in 1913, when it was conducted by Monteux, at present conductor of the Boston orchestra. There was much hissing, and also much applause, as there was again later that year when Monteux directed the work in London. In Carnegie Hall the other night there was not one openly dissenting voice, but Mr. Monteux received a thunderous ovation that lasted many minutes. He gave a great performance of a prodigious work. A work full of the far-reaching [illegible] the excess, the emphasis and the daring of genius—the genius which tears down and obliterates old worlds and builds new ones.

The naked eloquence of the thing literally shook the audience. The introduction represents "The mystery of the physical world in spring"—How often one has felt that on the Western coast, where nature is so exuberant, so voluptuous, so triumphant in the vernal march of new life, new growth, toward bloom and fruition—one seemed almost to hear the green things spraying, vining, unfolding, leaving, budding. * * * All this mystery Strawinsky has put into the first part of the work called "The Fertility of Earth"—with more —Dances of Youths and Maidens, The Spring Rounds, Games of Rival Towns and the Kiss to the Earth. The second part, called "The Sacrifice," opens with the physical sadness of "The Pagan Night," "pitiful with the helplessness of living crea tures in the presence of the forc of nature." It leads to the Mys Circle of the Adolescents and fin to the dance of the maiden who sacrificed to spring by dancin self to death. Nothing as the excitement an sacrificial danc ceived.

Herald Feb-16

STORY OF ALICE TOLD IN MUSIC

Deems Taylor's "Through the Looking Glass" Feature of Symphony Concert

HIS WORK SHOWS GENUINE FANCY

By PHILIP HALE

The 15th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Gluck, Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis"; Lalo, Spanish Symphony for violin and orchestra (Jacques Thibaud, violinist); Taylor, Suite, "Through the Looking Glass: Five Pictures from Lewis Carroll (first time in Boston); Tschaikovsky, Overture-Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet" (after Shakespeare).

Mr. Deems Taylor's Suite was performed here for the first time. He chose these episodes in the adventures of the adorable little Alice: Her talk with the chattering flowers in the garden; how she was puzzled by the poem about the Jabberwock; her dialogue with the gnat about various insects; and her encounter with the pathetic White Knight, who kept falling out of the saddle. These movements are prefaced by one entitled "Dedication."

It is a pleasure to find an American composer of talent who is willing to write music that is cheerful, not portentous; whose fancy is delicate; who uses a large orchestra discreetly, not chiefly to make a thunderous noise. Mr. Taylor, for his inspiration, went to a book that for years has pleased children from the tender age to that of white hairs; he did not ransack the Grecian or the Scandinavian mythology; he had no Thesis, no exposition of colors; he did not attempt to portray in music cave life and the rude rites of primitive man. Nor did he strive painfullyto be ultra-modern in the French, Italian, or German manner. He remembered Lewis Carroll's story: pleasant and amusing musical thoughts came into his head and he expressed them musically, without laboring after transliteration. Even his narration of the Jabberwock's fate is not too realistic, and in this movement the measures that may be taken to picture the peaceful scene while the hero waited with "vorpal sword" in hand by the Tum tum tree the approach of the fearsome monster are charged with poetic beauty. Charming also is the "Dedication." The whole work shows genuine fancy, a gift of expression in an individual manner. Whether without the titles the music would identify this or that episode is not to the point. The Suite is frankly program music, but of the better kind: natural, not pretentious; amusing, but as a man of talent amuses first himself, then those who are privileged to be with him. The performance was a sympathetic and effective one in every way. Mr. Laus, the first bassoon, and Mr. Piller, the double bassoon, covered themselves with glory. The audience evidently enjoyed the Suite hugely.

Mr. Thibaud's interpretation of Lalo's Spanish Symphony cannot be too warmly praised. We have heard many violinists, and among them the greatest, play this music; no one with so marked grace, brilliance, sensuous feeling when the measures called for it, and above all, elegance. When Mr. Tribaud is wholly in the vein, as he was yesterday afternoon, he is incomparable. His hearers were quick to recognize the supreme merit of the performance. The orchestral portion of the Symphony was superbly played under Mr. Monteux's direction. There the two stood, the two who, in 1896, were awarded first prizes for violin playing at the Paris Conservatory.

Gluck's overture loses nothing by the flight of the years. It will undoubtedly be heard when the "Elektra" of Richard Strauss is only a title in a catalogue; for Gluck, consciously or unconsciously, caught the old Grecian spirit. The music is passionate, pathetic, tragic, as a page of Sophocles. Think for a moment how an ultra-modern composer with an enormous band would treat this subject. Remember what M. Honegger did to the poor Horatii and Curiatii.

Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" brought the concert to an end. The love measures, especially the great palpitating theme, and those associated with Friar Laurence, are still moving, impressive. The music for the contending families no longer thrills.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Rossini, Overture to "The Barber of Seville;" Beethoven, Concerto for piano, No. 4 (Edouard Risler, pianist (his first appearance here); Hadley, "Ocean," symphonic poem (lrst time here; conducted by the composer); d'Indy, Suite, "A Summer Day on the Mountain."

[203]

REDUCTION
RATIO
19x

2.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

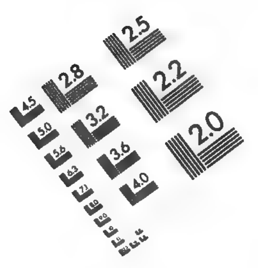
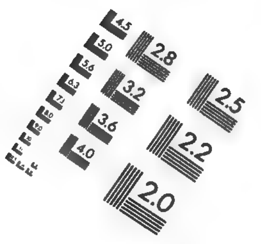
2.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

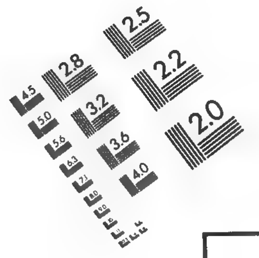


2.5
2.8
2.2
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6

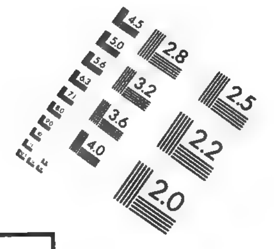


2.5
2.8
2.2
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6

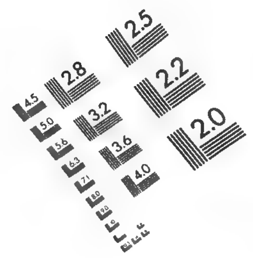
PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



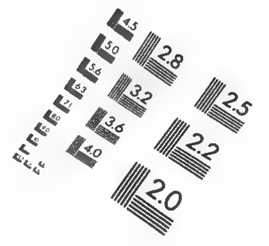
2.5
2.8
2.2
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6



2.5
2.8
2.2
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6



2.5
2.8
2.2
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6

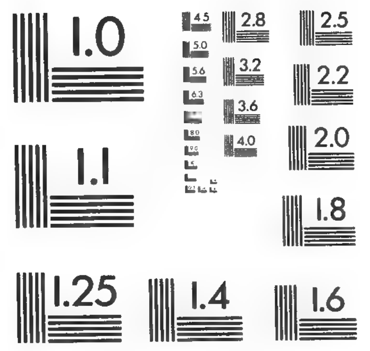


2.5
2.8
2.2
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm



1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
8.0

1.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

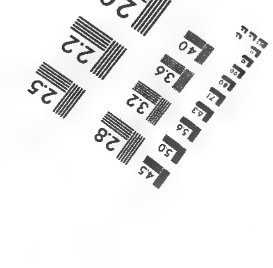
A5

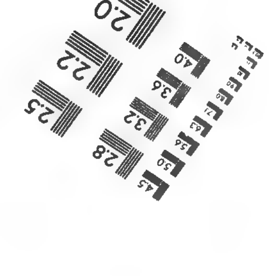


2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6

2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6

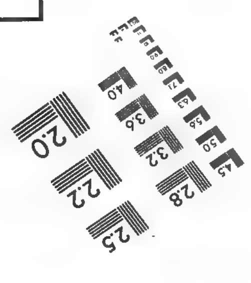
A4

A3



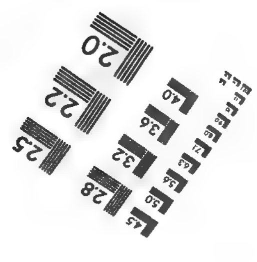
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS



2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119



2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6

2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
3.0 mm

NEW YORK WORLD

1) '24

+ v 11

WORDS AND MUSI

By Deems Taylor

SCARCELY had the critical babel subsided that followed the Bo Symphony performance of Igor Stravinsky's stupendous "Le S du Printemps" when Mr. Strokowski brought his Philadel Orchestra to town last Tuesday night to play the same compos "Symphonies d'Instruments a Vent" and start the critical tongues wagging more furiously than ever. For the "Symphonies," despite brevity and the comparatively modest instrumental personnel it mands, is the work of a Stravinsky who is seven years older than composer of "Le Sacre," and seven years further advanced in his jour across the no-man's land of aesthetic experimentation. Furthermore, hearer is asked to receive it in a new frame of mind, one that, sim as it sounds, is rarefied far beyond anything that has been heretof demanded of concert-goers. "The Rites of Spring," according to composer, was written as absolute music, and is to be taken as su in other words, we are simply asked to listen to it as music, with thinking of pictures or a story. Whether or not the score is as ab lute" as Stravinsky appears to think it is, is not important here, point being that listening to music without any arriere pensee i simple, understandable and rather customary request.

But the "Symphonies" are quite another story. Stravinsky prese them—or it—as a study in sound, a purely abstract "arrangement," a modernist painter would call it, of contrasted, juxtaposed tone-sen tions. He looks at on this music as something analogous to a piece sculpture, and insists that "the tonal masses are to be regarde jectively by the ear." Now these are hard words, and I am not al sure that I know precisely what they mean. On the surface they sou as if Stravinsky were again asking that his work be regarded as ab lute music; but if that were all, he would not have to go to such ela orate pains to elucidate his request. He must want something mo and that something more is, I believe, that the listener approach t "Symphonies" with complete detachment, with purely intellectual cu osity, deriving satisfaction, not from the emotional effect of the mus (he is specifically enjoined from looking for any such thing) but fro the pleasure he takes in observing the clash and concord of rhythn and sounds. In other words, the hearer is requested to appreciat rather than [illegible]

* * *

LEAVING aside for a moment the actual effect of this music in pe formance, what about the [illegible] upon which it is based? I seems to me to have two defects: first, the difficulty of putting it in effect, and second, its dubious value if it could be realized. Stravinsk speaks of his music as being "sculptured in marble." Now music is great many things, but it is not sculpture or painting or architectur (though it is closer to architecture than the first two). It bears a re tion to time that sculpture and painting do not recognize. It is quit possible to look at a painting or a statue dispassionately, admirin certain qualities that distinguish it [illegible] to get away from it, s to speak, observing it merely as an arrangement of colors or masses There is no time limit upon such scrutiny. You may glance at th Winged Victory for three seconds, or you may gaze at her for a ful hour. If your grasp of design is immediate, a minute's time may su fice for you to absorb the essentials of a Rembrandt, or, if your ap prehensive power works more slowly, you may spend a morning upon it. You may consider details in any order you wish, spending as much or as little time upon any one of them as you please. You can walk around the statue, studying it from any angle or elevation, and you can scrutinize the painting from left to right, or from top to bottom, even turning it upside down if you like. In brief, the method or the amount of time you employ in studying a work of plastic or graphic art is determined wholly by yourself.

Time enters into the reading of a book or the hearing of a play, but only insomuch as it determines the order in which you receive your first impressions. You can turn back the pages of the book in order better to assimilate a passage that has eluded you, or you can buy a copy of the play and read the scenes in any order whatsoever. You can, in fact, even read the play without [illegible] at all.

*

BUT none of these things is completely possible with music. For the moment a single note of musical composition has been heard it has begun to die: another note succeeds it, and it has vanished utterly. The order of these successions is vitally important, for the effect of music is almost entirely contextual; the major seventh chord that opens the second act of "Tristan" never sounds quite the same again, when it recurs between other chords. Nor can you stop the music, or turn it back, the better to grasp it; for not only the order but the spe of the sound successions is one of its essential elements. The mom you hasten to retard its speed, the music becomes different mus . The effect of music, in other words, is not immediate, as in the case of painting or sculpture, but cumulative. People speak of "reading" printed music as if the process were analogous to that of reading printed words. Words, either spoken or written, are a medium, a medium for ideas and images. A printed word does double duty. It is, first of all, a set of directions to the reader, directing him to utter certain sounds. If he obeys these directions he utters words, which in turn convey ideas to himself and others. But printed words are also the direct symbols of ideas. You may read a play without ever once imagining the sound of its speeches. You may have a perfect reading knowledge of the French language without being able to pronounce one word of it. You may be born stone deaf and still learn to write and read words without associating them with any aural concept whatsoever.

That is not true of printed music. It is a set of directions pure and simple, ordering the violinist to draw the bow across a certain string, or the trumpeter to press certain valves and blow into a metal tube; or the singer to produce certain sounds with his vocal cords. If you derive any satisfaction from reading a printed score it is only because you have acquired the ability to imagine the sounds resulting from these actions. What you receive is a series of mental images, so to speak, of the sounds. But they are not the sounds themselves; nor any complete equivalent of them, any more than a photograph of Stravinsky is actually the composer. You form some idea of what the music is going to sound like, just as you gain some idea of a projected building from looking at the architect's blueprints. The musical symbols mean nothing in themselves, in the sense that printed words do. I know of nothing in music that really and completely corresponds with an abstract idea. What you get from music is what you get, not through your mind, primarily, but through your emotions. You m "Le Sacre du Printemps," just as you n

[illegible] Debussy"—and if those words do not convey an emotional connotation, what do they convey? Parts of the music were very beautiful, in other words—which Mr. Stravinsky will not like—they aroused emotion in the listener. Other parts were decidedly uninteresting. Still others did, perhaps, carry out their composer's program: one admired their workmanship, without experiencing any emotion at all. A few passages aroused a definite feeling of repulsion. Here were fou [illegible] of music; and the second and third kinds evoked not the slig[illegible] desire ever to hear them again. The interesting part of the

---

Second Section

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1924.

Boston Symph

MUSIC LOVERS ENTHUSIASTIC OVER FOURTH CONCERT HERE

Remarkable Handling of Schubert's "Wanderer Fantasy" by Frederic Tillotson, Pianist, and Enthusiastic Reception to Pierre Monteux, Conductor, Are Features.

FREDERIC TILLOTSON
Talented Pianist Who Aroused Audience.

PIERRE MONTEUX
Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

WITH greater brilliance and magnetic charm than ever before at any local concert, the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 100 pieces at its fourth appearance here Sunday afternoon in City Theatre, thrilled an audience which engaged every seat. At once an entertainment and inspiration, it cast one into the mood to reflect on the finer things of life, especially during Brahms' Symphony No. 1 with its wonderful tonality and effects.

Of course, Pierre Monteux, conductor, who was making his final appearance here as he is soon to leave the organization, was the real centre of interest but perhaps no more remarkable tribute has been paid to any artist to appear here than to Frederic Tillotson—a genius in his chosen line, the piano.

Again and again, in response to the tremendous clamor from the inspired audience, he appeared to acknowledge the praise, while he received an uncommon tribute from Conductor Monteux, a clasp of the hand in mid-stage. Mr. Tillotson's handling of the piano during Schubert's "Wanderer Fantasy," arranged by Liszt, well deserves the use of seperlative terms for it was a remarkable exhibition of pianistic ability.

It was a representative audience that is, practically every musician and vocalist in the district was present. And the persons most intimately acquainted with what is good and what is medicore music acclaimed the loudest. Mayor and Mrs. William A. Bullivant and party were prominent, occupying a main floor box.

The musicians made the trip here in a special train from Boston, arriving shortly after 2 o'clock.

✣

Brahms' Symphony Opens.

~~Symphony No. 1 in C~~

This is certainly what the episode recalls to any one who has ever heard those poetic tones and their echoes. A short, solemn, even ecclesiastical interruption by the trombones and bassoons is of more thematic importance. As the horn-tones gradually die away, and the cloud-like harmonies in the strings sink lower and lower—like a mist veiling the landscape—an impressive pause ushers in the allegro non troppo, ma con brio. The introductory adagio has already given us mysterious hints at what is to come; and now there bursts forth in the strings the most joyous, exuberant Volkslied melody, a very Hymn to Joy, which in some of its phrases, as it were unconsciously and by sheer affinity of nature, flows into strains from the similar melody in the finale of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. One cannot call it plagiarism; it is two men saying the same thing."

After a brief intermission Debussy's Two Nocturnes: "Clouds" and "Festivals," were presented. In the former the unchangeable appearance of the sky, with the slow and solemn march of clouds dissolving in gray agony tinted with white, is presented. With that thought in mind one could easily follow various moods as interpreted by the orchastra.

"Festivals" is described as follows: Movement, rythm dancing in the atmosphere, with burst of brusque light. There is also the episode of a procession (a dazzling and wholly idealistic vision) passing through the festival and blended with it; but the main idea and substance obstinately remain—always the festival and its blended music.

✣

Tillotson An Artist.

Mr. Tillotson, a young man with admirable stage presence, made his only appearance in the next offering, Schubert's "Wanderer Fantasy," arranged for pianoforte and orchestra by Liszt. Combined with a technique equal to that of the [illegible] now ~~before the public~~ he

---

istic Triumph

Pages 9 to 16

PRICE TWO CENTS.

Audience

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

At the beginning of this review of yesterday's Symphony concert may well be set that expressive phrase dear to rural journalism, "A pleasant time was had by all." Singularly attractive was the programme made by Mr. Monteux on this occasion, a programme that listed Gluck's noble overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis"; Lalo's "Spanish Symphony" for violin and orchestra, in which the admirable Jacques Thibaut played the solo part; Tchaikovsky's ever-eloquent overture "Romeo and Juliet"; and, to give especial zest to the whole, Deems Taylor's "Through the Looking Glass" is pictured here, wearing the latest ordinary walking skirt, covered by is into plus-fours.

PAUL GORDON IN BOSTON STOCK

Joins St. James Theatre

[illegible] with its "brillig" introduction, its vivid yet discreet representation of the combat and the irresistible and mirth-inspiring monologue for the bassoon, completed by the contra-bassoon, that so graphically suggests the monster's death-struggles, clearly gave the most pleasure to the audience. But it is in the "White Knight" that Mr. Taylor [illegible] [illegible] harmonies that [illegible] they were torn out of [illegible] palpitating earth, efface every previous musical impress[illegible] for the time.

Only once before has music affected me so—my first hearing of Tristan and Isolde.

Richard Burgin increased the interest of a very distinguished concert by playing the Sibelius violin concerto. Mr. Burgin, who is concert master of the Boston Symphony and a [illegible] equipped artist, gave a superb [illegible] of the concerto, which was [illegible] 1907 by Maud Powell [illegible] The work of [illegible] difficulties for [illegible] as well as for soloist and the impossibility of getting enough rehearsals probably accounts for its being so seldom heard. It certainly is, as Godfrey Turner characterized it the other night, "a man's concerto," and Mr. Monteux gave the most diligent and sympathetic attention to the accompaniment, thereby adding to a very beautiful performance.

[illegible] received a bit of applause as the result of this major operation, but we had a feeling that it was the piano which should have come down to the footlights and bowed.

Anyway, if this new school of caveman music becomes popular, there won't be any further trouble about making little Willie do his afternoon practicing. With no bars put on elbow, fist, foot and nose work, Willie can have as much fun on the piano stool as he could on the sand lots.

---

capture and cremate [illegible]

The Manhattan squad [illegible] rat cup last year with a [illegible] 9,103. Brooklyn was second [illegible] 6,328, Queens third with 3,18[illegible] Bronx fourth with 1,951 and Richmond trailing with 1,024.

The trappers report the discovery of one woman who has made pets of nearly 100 rats.

"Pet rats?" asked Health Commissioner Monaghan, who heard the story.

"Yes, sir, rats."

"Rats!" echoed the Health Commissioner.

I have one glass eye," said the banker, on the final visit. "If you can tell me which one it is, I'll see what I can do about the loan."

After a careful scrutiny of the banker's countenance, the Canadian said: "Your left eye!"

"You're right," answered the baker, "but tell me how did you discover it?"

"Well," was the reply of the Canadian, "I thought I saw a little sympathy in the glass one."

Another was a story of two

By the Rev. Charles A. Eaton—A colored preacher, who years before had been justly or unjustly incarcerated in prison, was trying to forget the past when one day he discovered a former jail pal in his congregation. Afraid his prison mate might betray him, the preacher picked up a book and in a low, solemn voice said:

"Brethern, I will now read form chapter 144 of the Bible, entitled:

"'Dem wot knows mah past and says nothin', Ise see later.'" [201]

NEW YORK WORLD

+ [illegible] 11

WORDS AND MUSI

By Deems Taylor

SCARCELY [illegible] critical [illegible] Boston Symphony performance [illegible] stupendous [illegible] du Printemps [illegible] Orchestra [illegible] "Symphony [illegible] critical tongues wagging [illegible] brevity [illegible] mands, [illegible] Stravinsky [illegible] composer [illegible] across the [illegible] hearer [illegible] mind, [illegible] as it [illegible] demand [illegible] Spring" according to composer, [illegible] in other [illegible] asked to listen [illegible] thinking [illegible] a story [illegible] lute" [illegible] point [illegible] without any arriere pensee [illegible] simple, [illegible]

But [illegible] them [illegible] a modern [illegible] tions. [illegible] sculpture, [illegible] jectively [illegible] words, and I am not sure that [illegible] they sound as if [illegible] lute mu[illegible] orate pal[illegible] and that [illegible] "Sympho[illegible] intellectual [illegible] sity, [illegible] (he is [illegible] the pleasure he takes in [illegible] and sounds. In other words, [illegible] rather than [illegible]

LEAVING [illegible] formance [illegible] seems to [illegible] two defects [illegible] effect, and [illegible] value [illegible] speaks of [illegible] tured in [illegible] great many [illegible] or pain [illegible] (though [illegible] two). [illegible] sion to [illegible] possible [illegible] certain [illegible] to speak, [illegible] colors or masses. There is no [illegible] "Winged Victory [illegible] hour. If [illegible] fice for [illegible] prehensive [illegible] it. You [illegible] or as little [illegible] them to your pleasure [illegible] around the [illegible] can scrut[illegible] even turning [illegible] amount of [illegible] art is [illegible]

Three [illegible] but only [illegible] first [illegible] better [illegible] copy of [illegible] can [illegible]

B[illegible]

[illegible] "Le Sacre du Printemps," [illegible]

Second Section

Brockton Daily Evening Enterprise.

Pages 9 to 16

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1924. BROCKTON'S HOME NEWSPAPER. PRICE TWO CENTS.

Boston Symphony Orchestra and Pianist Score Artistic Triumph

MUSIC LOVERS ENTHUSIASTIC OVER FOURTH CONCERT HERE

Remarkable Handling of Schubert's "Wanderer Fantasy" by Frederic Tillotson, Pianist, and Enthusiastic Reception to Pierre Monteux, Conductor, Are Features.

FREDERIC TILLOTSON

[illegible]

PIERRE MONTEUX

Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra

W[illegible] before at any local concert, the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 100 pieces at its fourth appearance here Sunday afternoon [illegible] City Theatre [illegible] audience which engaged every seat. At once an entertainment and in[illegible]

[illegible] A short, solemn, even ecclesiastical interruption by the trombones and bassoons is of more thematic importance. As the horn [illegible] gradually die away and the [illegible] the landscape [illegible]

[illegible] dazzling [illegible] vision [illegible]

Tillotson A[illegible] Artist

[illegible] combined with a [illegible]

[illegible] Symphony One [illegible]

[illegible] the beloved [illegible] moment [illegible] Brahms, 19th [illegible] critic [illegible] compare with [illegible] holding a place nearly equal to Beethoven's Ninth, one of the most perfect compositions ever produced.

The requirements of the Symphony No. 1 demand artists of the first class, instrumentalists who can delve into the mind of the great composer for the hidden secrets contained in the work. Few can say that the Boston Symphony Orchestra failed to present on the City Theatre stage what Brahms intended when he composed the symphony about 1875. It was in four movements: Un peco sostenuto—allegro; andante sostenuto; un poco allegrette, E grazioso; adagio-allegra non troppe, ma con brio. After each movement was concluded there was a tremendous acclamation and deservedly so.

A great critic has written of the finale: "With the 30th measure the tempo changes to piu andante, and we come upon one of the most poetic episodes in all Brahms. Amid hushed, tremulous harmonies in the strings, the horn and afterwards the flute pour forth an utterly original melody, the character of which ranges from passionate pleading to a sort of wild exultation according to the instrument that plays it. The coloring is enriched by the solemn tones of the trombones, which appear for the first time in this movement. It is ticklish work trying to dive down into a composer's brain, and surmise what special outside source his inspiration may have had; but one cannot help feeling that this whole wonderful episode may have been suggested to Brahms by the tones of the Alpine horn, as it awakens the echoes from mountain after mountain on some of the high passes in the Bernese Oberland [illegible] rapid for the eye to follow, an observer retains only an impression of flying hands and a melody such as only a great artist is capable of producing. Mr. Tillotson received [illegible] again and again he was recalled, the audience being hopeful of an encore, but the programme would not permit it.

The number was a triumph alike for Mr. Monteux and the pianist.

Pelovtsian Dances from the opera, "Prince Igor" was the concluding selection by the orchestra. These dances form the final of the second act of the opera. In the opera, with some of the dances, a choral song is joined. In the introduction, the oboe supported by harp and violincellos plays the melody of the women's chorus. Then follows a "dance of savage men, allegro vive, with a lively tune for clarinet with which the former song is joined. Then follow other dances, each with distinctive themes.

At the conclusion of this brilliantly rendered composition the concert was brought to an end, after Conductor Monteux had returned several times to recognize the sustained applause of the audience.

QUINCY MAN APPOINTED SEC[illegible] LIEUTENANT

Quincy, Feb. 11.—It was announced Saturday that Edward P. Cook has been appointed a lieutenant in the Massachusetts National Guard and has been made company officer of the new Third Battalion Headquarters Company of the 101st Infantry, which is to be quartered in the new armory rapidly nearing completion.

EXAMINATIONS FOR PLYMPTON POSTMA[illegible]R.

Washington, Feb. 11.—Postmaster examinations will be held soon at Plympton, announces the civil service commission

---

Audience

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

At the beginning of this review of yesterday's Symphony concert may well be set that expressive phrase dear to rural journalism, "A pleasant time was had by all." Singularly attractive was the programme made by Mr. Monteux on this occasion, a programme that listed Gluck's noble overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis"; Lalo's "Spanish Symphony" for violin and orchestra, in which the admirable Jacques Thibaut played the solo part; Tchaikovsky's ever-eloquent overture "Romeo and Juliet"; and, to give especial zest to the whole, Deems Taylor's "Through the Looking Glass."

CHARM OF TAYLOR'S SUITE

[illegible] years ago Mr. Taylor's diverting [illegible] was played here in its original [illegible] for chamber orchestra, by the New York Chamber Music Society, and at that time, as again at yesterday's performance, the [illegible] pleasure both by reason of its intrinsic charm and through its [illegible] appropriateness to the episodes in Lewis Carroll's fantasy [illegible] it was inspired.

Since Carroll was an Englishman [illegible] of the [illegible] American [illegible] Mr. Taylor's [illegible] any [illegible] Surely [illegible] would have [illegible] Carroll was a [illegible] music bristling with esoteric [illegible] would distort rather than reflect his gentle and humorsome fancies.

"White Knight" Impresses

[illegible] make Mr. Taylor's Suite [illegible] the fanciful [illegible] tender [illegible] "White Knight" are [illegible]

[illegible] graphic [illegible] best [illegible]

[illegible] harping [illegible] harmonies that [illegible] torn out of [illegible] earth, efface every [illegible] musical impression [illegible]

[illegible] discloses himself a composer of feeling and imagination.

Characteristically American

[illegible] after all it is when the American composer views life not too seriously that he is most true to his endowment and to what may be broadly termed his artistic heritage. In Chadwick's "Jubilee" and "Vagrom Ballad" [illegible] the Symphonic Sketches, in Carpenter's "Adventures in a Perambulator" [illegible] Mr. Taylor's [illegible] an Anglo-Saxon [illegible] a native American [illegible] Not [illegible] known as a [illegible] are the [illegible] pieces [illegible] of mere burlesque [illegible] But as a people [illegible] certain blend of humor and sentiment that is all our own and that is perhaps our most characteristic utterance.

Mr. Monteux's Caress

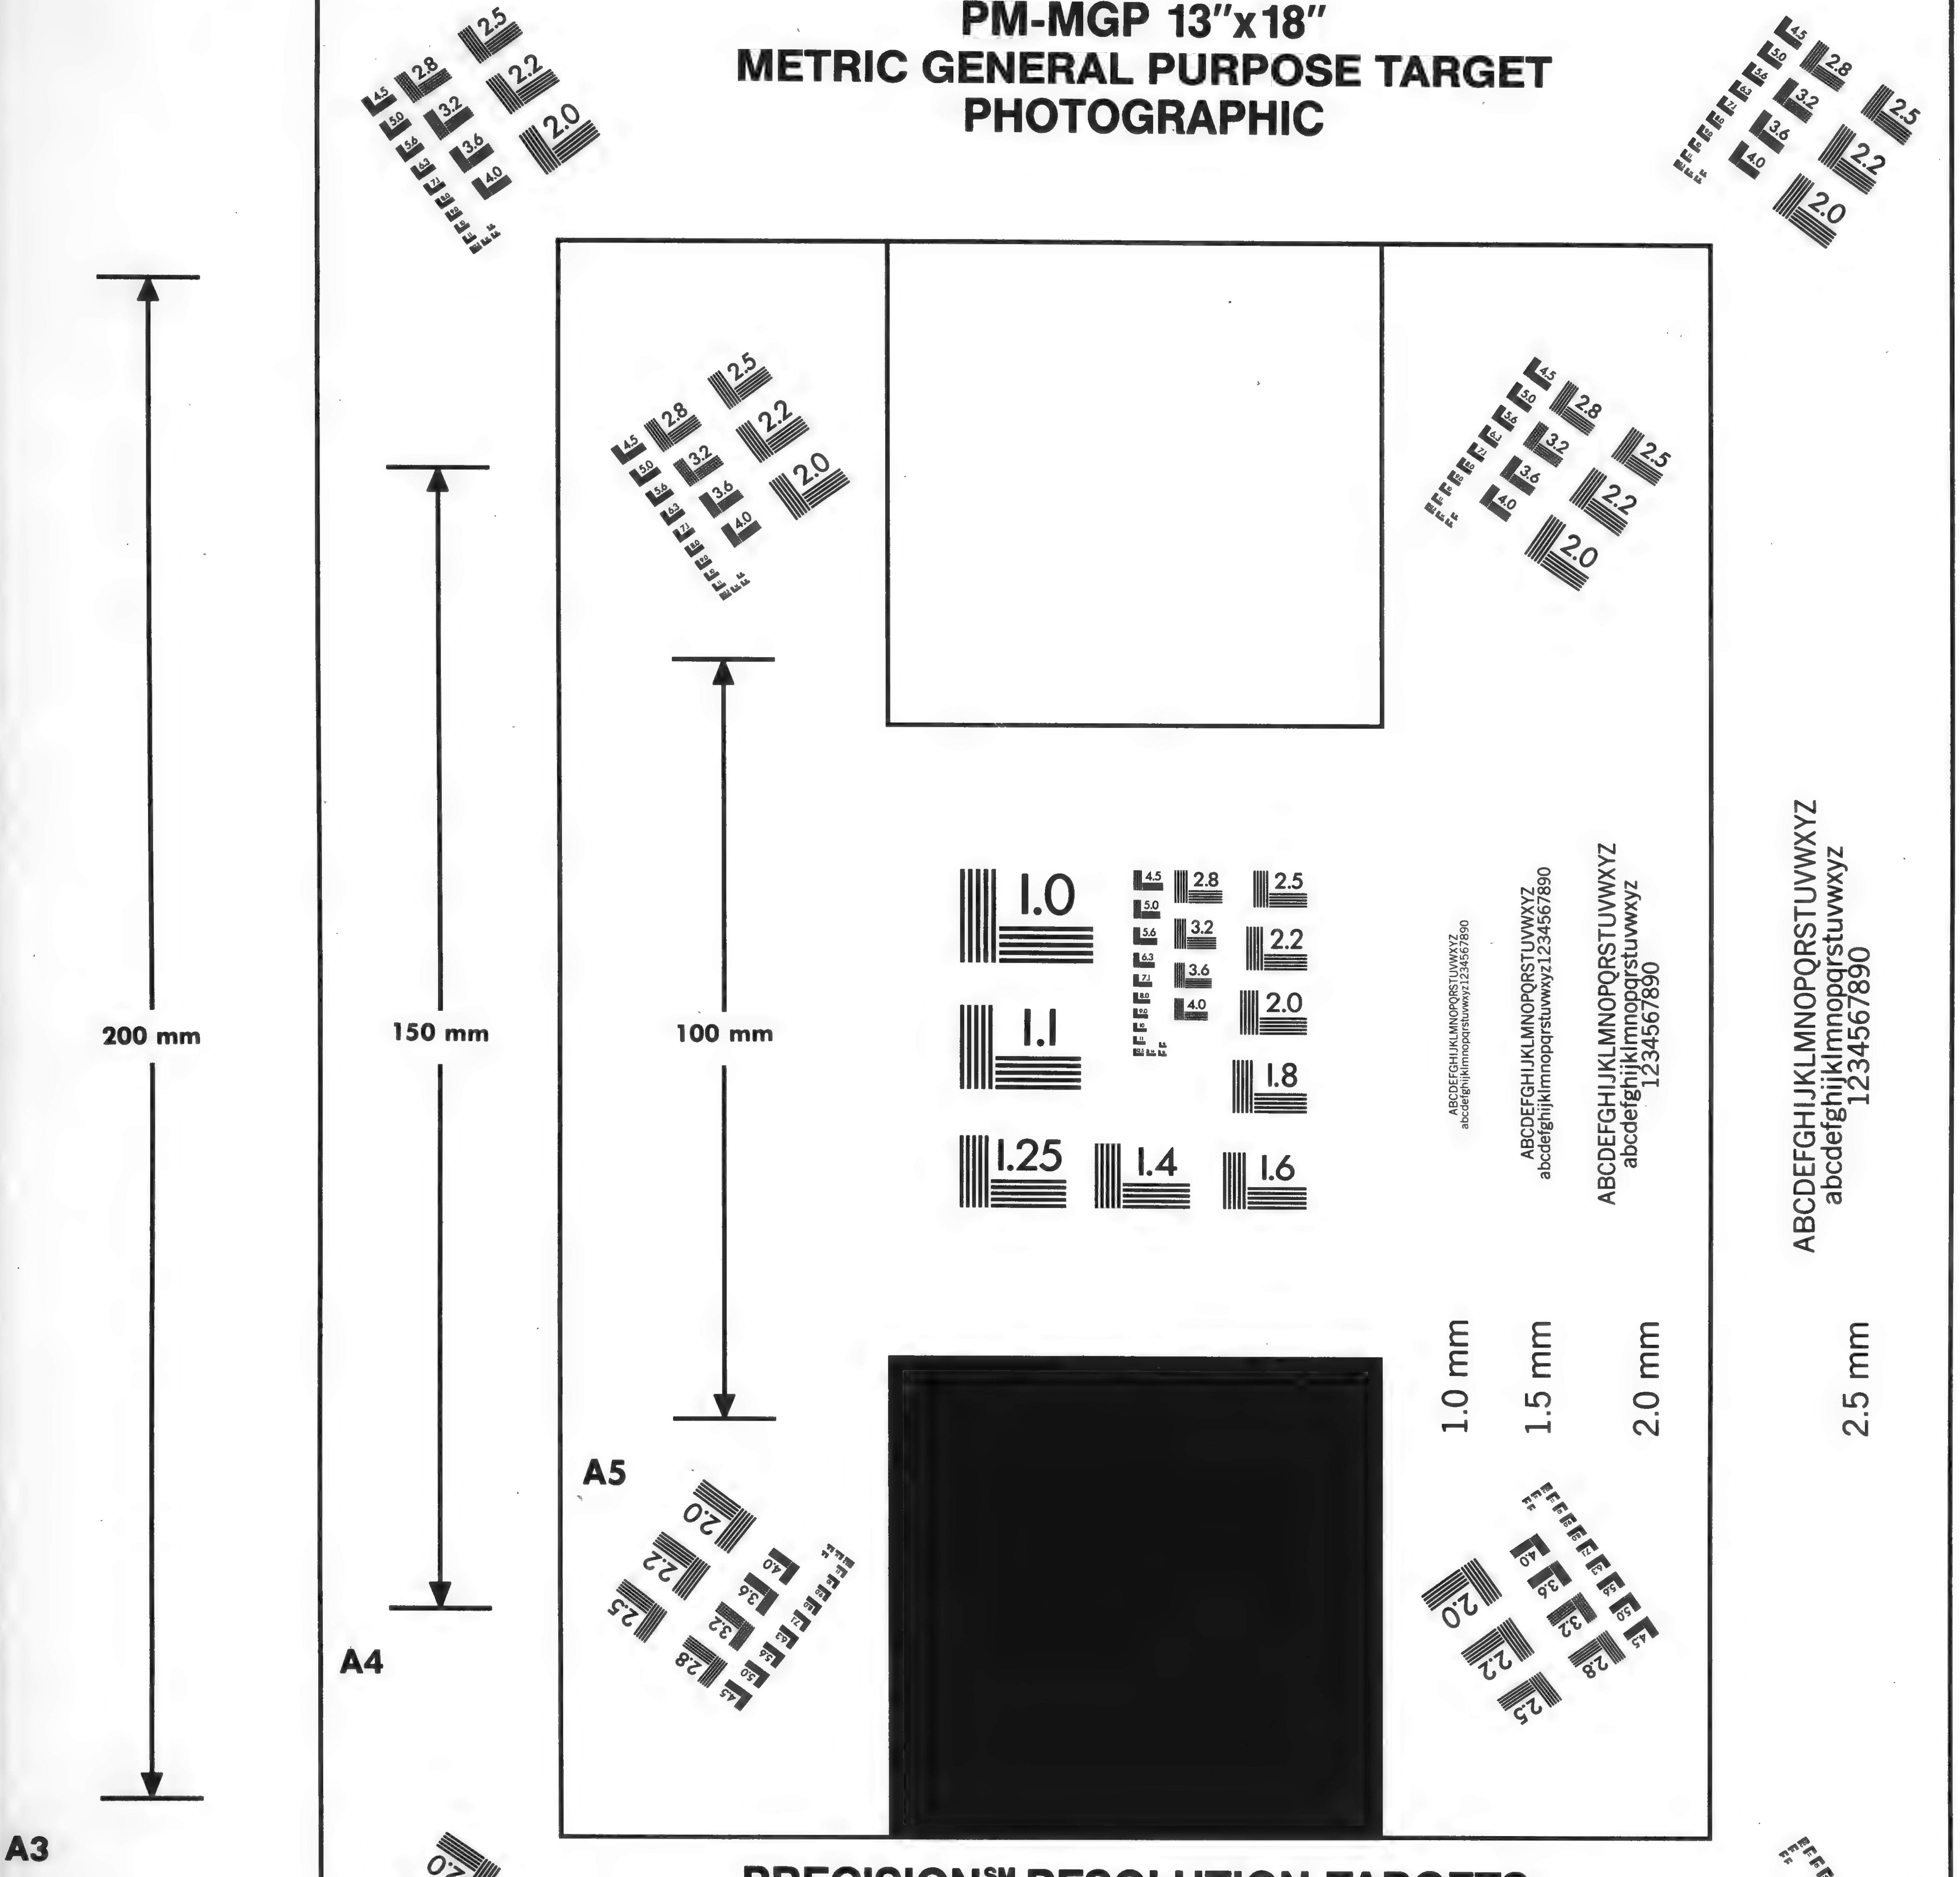
[illegible] is one thing and [illegible] Mr. Monteux [illegible] Mr. Taylor's [illegible] performance [illegible] applause [illegible]

And that [illegible] likewise did [illegible] Gluck's Overture [illegible] The loves of Romeo and Juliet [illegible] raptuously, fervently [illegible] Thibaut [illegible] the "Spanish [illegible] brought to ideal perfection [illegible] Mr. Thibaut plays [illegible] played [illegible] the touch.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A5
A4
A3
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

NEW YORK
WORLD

FEB 10 1924

WORDS AND MUSI

—By Deems Taylor—

SCARCELY had the critical babel subsided that followed the Bo Symphony performance of Igor Stravinsky's stupendous "Le S du Printemps" when Mr. Strokowski brought his Philadelp Orchestra to town last Tuesday night to play the same compos "Symphonies d'Instruments a Vent" and start the critical tongues wagging more furiously than ever. For the "Symphonies," despite brevity and the comparatively modest instrumental personn l it mands, is the work of a Stravinsky who is seven years older han composer of "Le Sacre," and seven years further advanced in his jour across the no-man's land of aesthetic experimentation. Furthermore, hearer is asked to receive it in a new frame of mind, one that, sim as it sounds, is rarefied far beyond anything that has been heretof demanded of concert-goers. "The Rites of Spring," according to composer, was written as absolute music, and is to be taken as su in other words, we are simply asked to listen to it as music, with thinking of pictures or a story. Whether or not the score is as ab lute" as Stravinsky appears to think it is, is not important here, point being that listening to music without any arriere pensee i simple, understandable and rather customary request.

But the "Symphonies" are quite another story. Stravinsky prese them—or it—as a study in sound, a purely abstract "arrangement," a modernist painter would call it, of contrasted, juxtaposed tone-sen tions. He looks upon this music as something analogous to a piece sculpture, and insists that "the tonal masses are to be regarded jectively by the ear." Now these are hard words, and I am not at sure that I know precisely what they mean. On the surface they sou as if Stravinsky were again asking that his work be regarded as ab lute music; but if that were all, he would not have to go to such ela orate pains to elucidate his request. He must want something mo and that something more is, I believe, that the listener approach t "Symphonies" with complete detachment, with purely intellectual cu osity, deriving satisfaction, not from the emotional effect of the mus (he is specifically enjoined from looking for any such thing) but fro the pleasure he takes in observing the clash and concord of rhythn and sounds. In other words, the hearer is requested to appreciat rather than feel.

* * *

LEAVING aside for a moment the actual effect of this music in pe formance, what about the theory upon which it is based? seems to me to have two defects: first, the difficulty of putting it int effect, and second, its dubious value if it could be realized. Stravinsk speaks of his music as being "sculptured in marble." Now music is great many things, but it is not sculpture or painting or architectur (though it is closer to architecture than the first two). It bears a rela tion to time that sculpture and painting do not recognize. It is quit possible to look at a painting or a statue dispassionately, admirin certain qualities that distinguish it as a whole, to get away from it, s to speak, observing it merely as an arrangement of colors or masses There is no time limit upon such scrutiny. You may glance at th Winged Victory for three seconds, or you may gaze at her for a ful hour. If your grasp of design is immediate, a minute's time may suf fice for you to absorb the essentials of a Rembrandt; or, if your ap prehensive power works more slowly, you may spend a morning upon it. You may consider details in any order you wish, spending as much or as little time upon any one of them as you please. You can walk around the statue, studying it from any angle or elevation, and you can scrutinize the painting from left to right, or from top to bottom, even turning it upside down if you like. In brief, the method or the amount of time you employ in studying a work of plastic or graphic art is determined wholly by yourself.

Time enters into the reading of a book or the hearing of a play, but only insomuch as it determines the order in which you receive your first impressions. You can turn back the pages of the book in order better to assimilate a passage that has eluded you, or you can buy a copy of the play and read the scer in any order whatsoever. You can, in fact, even read the play without seeing it at all.

* * *

BUT none of these things is completely possible with music. For the moment a single note of musical composition has been heard it has begun to die: another note succeeds it, and it has vanished utterly. The order of these successions is vitally important, for the effect of music is almost entirely contextual; the major seventh chord that opens the second act of "Tristan" never sounds quite the same again, when it recurs between other chords. Nor can you stop the music, or turn it back, the better to grasp it; for not only the order but the speed of the sound-successions is one of its essential elements. The moment you hasten to retard this speed, the music becomes different music. The effect of music, in other words, is not immediate, as in the case of painting or sculpture, but cumulative. People speak of "reading" printed music as if the process were analogous to that of reading printed words. Words, either spoken or written, are a medium, a medium for ideas and images. A printed word does double duty. It is, first of all, a set of directions to the reader, directing him to utter certain sounds. If he obeys these directions he utters words, which in turn convey ideas to himself and others. But printed words are also the direct symbols of ideas. You may read a play without ever once imagining the sound of its speeches. You may have a perfect reading knowledge of the French language without being able to pronounce one word of it. You may be born stone deaf and still learn to write and read words without associating them with any aural concept whatsoever.

That is not true of printed music. It is a set of directions pure and simple, ordering the violinist to draw the bow across a certain string, or the trumpeter to press certain valves and blow into a metal tube, or the singer to produce certain sounds with his vocal cords. If you derive any satisfaction from reading a printed score it is only because you have acquired the ability to imagine the sounds resulting from these actions. What you receive is a series of mental images, so to speak, of the sounds. But they are not the sounds themselves, nor any complete equivalent of them, any more than a photograph of Stravinsky is actually the composer. You form some idea of what the music is going to sound like, just as you gain some idea of a projected building from looking at the architect's blueprints. The musical symbols mean nothing in themselves, in the sense that printed words d I know of nothing in music that really and completely corresponds w an abstract idea. What you get from music is what you get, through your mind, primarily, but through your emotions. You n "Le Sacre du Printemps," j st as you p

---

Brockton Enterprise Feb 11

SE—MONDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1924.

capped with this nose trouble, but has made a creditable showing.

Cochrane is the first Bridgewater boy to sign with a fast baseball team in a decade, and local fans who have watched his progress in the past eight years, predict that he will more than make good.

KARL BILLHARDT SHINES.

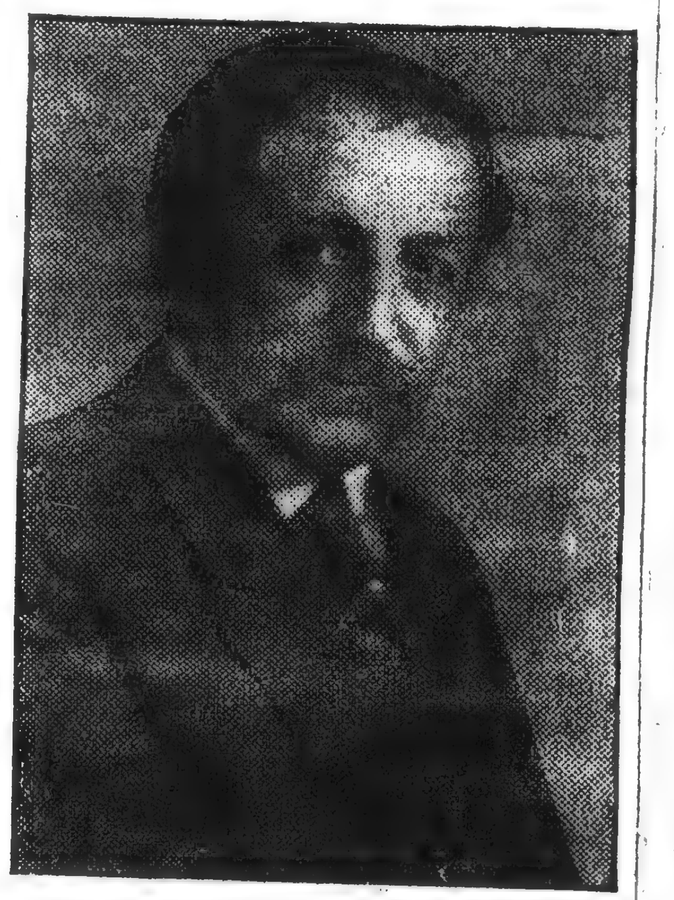
Karl Billhardt was one of the star performers in the Andover-Worcester Academy game Saturday night, Andover winning in an overtime period, 31 to 28. Billhardt scored five baskets from the floor and one from the foul line. He shared with Mumby, his teammate

Sails

MUSIC LOVERS ENTHUSIASTIC OVER FOURTH CONCERT HERE

Remarkable Handling of Schubert's "Wanderer Fantasy" by Frederic Tillotson, Pianist, and Enthusiastic Reception to Pierre Monteux, Conductor, Are Features.

FREDERIC TILLOTSON
Talented Pianist Who Aroused Audience.



PIERRE MONTEUX
Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

WITH greater brilliance and magnetic charm than ever before at any local concert, the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 100 pieces at its fourth appearance here Sunday afternoon in City Theatre, thrilled an audience which engaged every seat. At once an entertainment and inspiration, it cast one into the mood to reflect on the finer things of life, especially during Brahms' Symphony No. 1 with its wonderful tonality and effects.

Of course, Pierre Monteux, conductor, who was making his final appearance here as he is soon to leave the organization, was the real centre of interest but perhaps no more remarkable tribute has been paid to any artist to appear here than to Frederic Tillotson—a genius in his chosen line, the piano.

Again and again, in response to the tremendous clamor from the inspired audience, he appeared to acknowledge the praise, while he received an uncommon tribute from Conductor Monteux, a clasp of the hand in mid-stage. Mr. Tillotson's handling of the piano during Schubert's "Wanderer Fantasy," arranged by Liszt, well deserves the use of seperlative terms for it was a remarkable exhibition of pianistic ability.

It was a representative audience—that is, practically every musician and vocalist in the district was present. And the persons most intimately acquainted with what is good and what is medicore music acclaimed the loudest. Mayor and Mrs. William A. Bullivant and party were prominent, occupying a main floor box.

The musicians made the trip here in a special train from Boston, arriving shortly after 2 o'clock.

✣

Brahms' Symphony Opens.

Brahms' Symphony No. 1 in C minor opened the programme. With the initial appearance of Conductor Monteux there was an outburst of hand-clapping, testifying to the great popularity he enjoys here. He bowed graciously and a moment later 100 artists were weaving into a finished product the wonderful symphony by Johannes Brahms, 19th cen German. Critics agree th can compare with holding a place nearly equal to Beethoven's Ninth, one of the most perfect compositions ever produced.

The requirements of the Symphony No. 1 demand artists of the first class, instrumentalists who can delve into the mind of the great composer for the hidden secrets contained in the work. Few can say that the Boston Symphony Orchestra failed to present on the City Theatre stage what Brahms intended when he composed the symphony about 1875. It was in four movements: Un poco sostenuto—allegro; andante sostenuto; un poco allegretto, E grazioso; adagio-allegra non troppo, ma con brio. After each movement was concluded there was a tremendous acclamation—and deservedly so.

A great critic has written of the finale: "With the 30th measure the tempo changes to piu andante, and we come upon one of the most poetic episodes in all Brahms. Amid hushed, tremulous harmonies in the strings, the horn and afterwards the flute pour forth an utterly original melody, the character

This is certainly what the episode recalls to any one who has ever heard those poetic tones and their echoes. A short, solemn, even ecclesiastical interruption by the trombones and bassoons is of more thematic importance. As the horntones gradually die away, and the cloud-like harmonies in the strings sink lower and lower—like a mist veiling the landscape—an impressive pause ushers in the allegro non troppo, ma con brio. The introductory adagio has already given us mysterious hints at what is to come; and now there bursts forth in the strings the most joyous, exuberant Volkslied melody, a very Hymn to Joy, which in some of its phrases, as it were unconsciously and by sheer affinity of nature, flows into strains from the similar melody in the finale of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. One cannot call it plagiarism; it is two men saying the same thing."

After a brief intermission Debussy's Two Nocturnes: "Clouds" and "Festivals," were presented. In the former the unchangeable appearance of the sky, with the slow and solemn march of clouds dissolving in gray agony tinted with white, is presented. With that thought in mind one could easily follow various moods as interpreted by the orchastra.

"Festivals" is described as follows: Movement, rythm dancing in the atmosphere, with burst of brusque light. There is also the episode of a procession (a dazzling and wholly idealistic vision) passing through the festival and blended with it; but the main idea and substance obstinately remain—always the festival and its blended music.

✣

Tillotson An Artist.

Mr. Tillotson, a young man with admirable stage presence, made his only appearance in the next offering, Schubert's "Wanderer Fantasy," arranged for pianoforte and orchestra by Liszt. Combined with a technique equal to that of the masters now before the public, he has a touch and musicinaly interpretation as distinctive as his own personalty. When his fingers flash along the keyboard the flight is too rapid for the eye to follow—an observer retains only an impression of clashing hands and a melody such as only a great artist is capable of producing. Mr. Tillotson received again he was recalled. Again and being hopeful of an encore, but the programme would not permit it.

The number was a triumph alike for Mr. Monteux and the pianist.

Pelovtsian Dances from the opera, "Prince Igor" was the concluding selection by the orchestra. These dances form the final of the second act of the opera. In the opera, with some of the dances, a choral song is joined. In the introduction, the oboe supported by harp and violincellos plays the melody of the women's chorus. Then follows a "dance of savage men, allegro vive, with a lively tune for clarinet with which the former song is joined. Then follow other dances, each with distinctive themes.

At the conclusion of this brilliantly rendered composition the concert was brought to an end, after Conductor Monteux had returned several times to recognize the sustained applause of the audience.

QUINCY MAN APPOINTED

Post Feb 16.

TAYLOR'S SUITE BY SYMPHONY

"Through the Looking Glass" Delights Audience

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

At the beginning of this review of yesterday's Symphony concert may well be set that expressive phrase dear to rural journalism, "A pleasant time was had by all." Singularly attractive was the programme made by Mr. Monteux on this occasion, a programme that listed Gluck's noble overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis"; Lalo's "Spanish Symphony" for violin and orchestra, in which the admirable Jacques Thibaut played the solo part; Tchaikovsky's ever-eloquent overture "Romeo and Juliet"; and, to give especial zest to the whole, Deems Taylor's "Through the Looking Glass."

CHARM OF TAYLOR'S SUITE

Four years ago Mr. Taylor's diverting Suite was played here in its original form for chamber orchestra, by the New York Chamber Music Society, and at that time, as again in yesterday's performance, the music gave pleasure both by reason of its intrinsic charm and through its felicitous appropriateness to the episodes in Lewis Carroll's fantasy by which it was inspired.

Since Carroll was an Englishman it may seem an over-statement of the case to declare that only an American could have produced Mr. Taylor's score. Yet it is not easy to picture any one of the present-day English composers as the author of it. Surely Bliss, Berners or Goossens would have been too much preoccupied with the serious business of being ultramodern to catch so aptly as did Mr. Taylor the precise spirit and flavor of Carroll's whimsical imaginings. For after all Carroll was a bit of a Victorian, and music bristling with dissonance and replete with esoteric tone-colors would distort rather than reflect his gentle and humorsome fancies.

"White Knight" Impresses

Five pieces make Mr. Taylor's Suite as it now stands, of which one, "The Garden of Live Flowers," has been added in the orchestral version. The others, the poetic "Dedication," the amusing "Jabberwocky," the fanciful "Looking Glass Insects" and the tenderly humorous "White Knight," are essentially as they were before, yet considerably intensified and enhanced in their new instrumental dress.

Of the five, the "Jabberwocky," with its "brillig" introduction, its vivid yet discreet representation of the combat and the irresistible and mirth-inspiring monologue for the bassoon, completed by the contra-bassoon, that so graphically suggests the monster's death-struggles, clearly gave the most pleasure to the audience. But it is in the "White Knight" that Mr. Taylor best discloses himself a composer of feeling, wit and imagination.

Characteristically American

Perhaps after all it is when the American composer views life not too seriously that he is most true to his environment and to what may be broadly termed his artistic heritage. In Chadwick's "Jubilee" and "Vagrom Ballad" from the Symphonic Sketches, in Carpenter's "Adventures in a Perambulator" and in this suite of Mr. Taylor's is music that assuredly only an Anglo-Saxon and presumably only a native American could have written.

Not that we are to be known as a nation of fun-makers, nor are the pieces here listed compact of mere burlesque and slap-stick comedy. But as a people we do possess a certain blend of humor and sentiment that is all our own and that is perhaps our most characteristic utterance.

Mr. Monteux's Caress

Creation, however, is one thing and interpretation another, and Mr. Monteux is not too much the Frenchman to miss the peculiar flavor of Mr. Taylor's music. Had the composer heard this performance surely he too would have applauded and approved it.

And that which Mr. Monteux did for the novel music of the afternoon he likewise did for the familiar pieces. Gluck's Overture that so strikingly foreshadowed Beethoven's greatest achievements in the form had due stride and power. The loves of Romeo and Juliet were sung rapturously, fervently; and, with Mr. Thibaut to aid, the "Spanish Symphony" was brought to ideal performance. To say that Mr. Thibaut plays this music as well as it may be played is to say not one whit too much.

[204]

The bass notes struck slowly with the composer's arm seemed to give the effect of water moving rhythmically through chaos.

As one of his final numbers Mr. Cowell played the piano both inside and out. Not satisfied with turning the black and white notes into black and blue ones, he

a bit of applause as the result of this major operation, but we had a feeling that it was the piano which should have come down to the footlights and bowed.

Anyway, if this new school of caveman music becomes popular, there won't be any further trouble about making little Willie do his afternoon practicing. With no bars put on elbow, fist, foot and nose work, Willie can have as much fun on the piano stool as he could on the sand lots.

---

year captured 21,590 of these re dents in this city, has this year redoubled the vigor of its rat campaign.

It was not generally known until figures of the 1922 campaign were made public that the Sanitary Bureau maintain squad capture and cremate rats.

The Manhattan squad won rat cup last year with a bag 9,103. Brooklyn was second w 6,328, Queens third with 3,184, Bronx fourth with 1,951 and Ric mond trailing with 1,024.

The trappers report the d covery of one woman who h made pets of nearly 100 rats.

"Pet rats?" asked Health Com missioner Monaghan, who hear the story.

"Yes, sir, rats."

"Rats!" echoed the Health Com missioner.

have nker, o tell n at I ca
After a nker's
n said:
You're
nker, "b cover it Well," nadian,
pathy

Second Section

Brockton Daily Evening Enterprise.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1924.

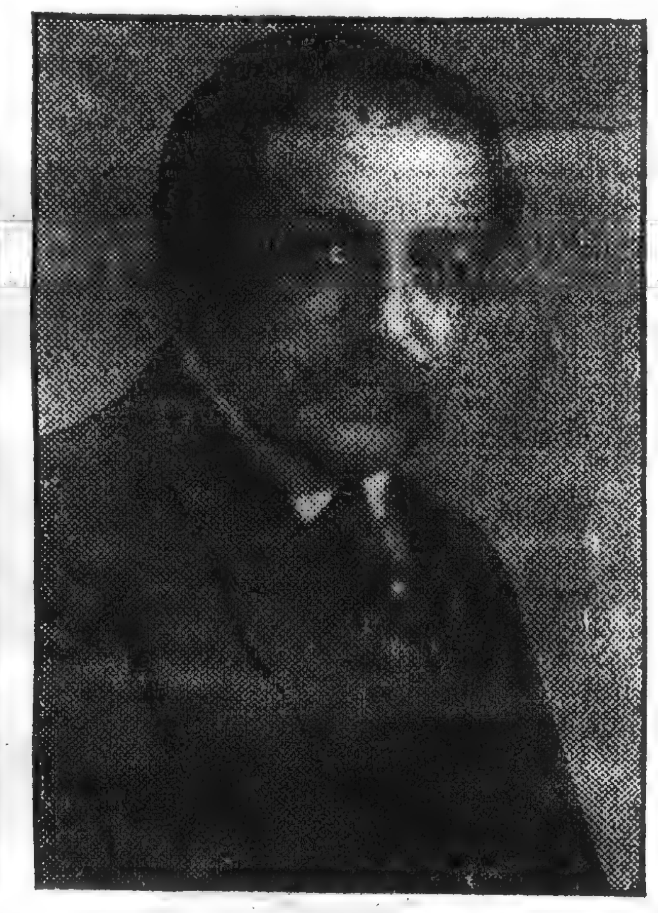
BROCKTON'S HOME NEWSPAPER.

Boston Symphony Orchestra and Pianist Score Artistic

MUSIC LOVERS ENTHUSIASTIC OVER FOURTH CONCERT HERE

Remarkable Handling of Schubert's "Wanderer Fantasy" by Frederic Tillotson, Pianist, and Enthusiastic Reception to Pierre Monteux, Conductor, Are Features.

FREDERIC TILLOTSON
Talented Pianist Who Aroused Audience.



PIERRE MONTEUX
Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

WITH greater brilliance and magnetic charm than ever before at any local concert, the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 100 pieces at its fourth appearance here Sunday afternoon in City Theatre, thrilled an audience which engaged every seat. At once an entertainment and inspiration, it cast one into the mood to reflect on the finer things of life, especially during Brahms' Symphony No. 1 with its wonderful tonality and effects.

Of course, Pierre Monteux, conductor, who was making his final appearance here as he is soon to leave the organization, was the real centre of interest but perhaps no more remarkable tribute has been paid to any artist to appear here than to Frederic Tillotson—a genius in his chosen line, the piano.

Again and again, in response to the tremendous clamor from the inspired audience, he appeared to acknowledge the praise, while he received an uncommon tribute from Conductor Monteux, a clasp of the hand in mid-stage. Mr. Tillotson's handling of the piano during Schubert's "Wanderer Fantasy," arranged by Liszt, well deserves the use of seperlative terms for it was a remarkable exhibition of pianistic ability.

It was a representative audience—that is, practically every musician and vocalist in the district was present. And the persons most intimately acquainted with what is good and what is medicore music acclaimed the loudest. Mayor and Mrs. William A. Bullivant and party were prominent, occupying a main floor box.

The musicians made the trip here in a special train from Boston, arriving shortly after 2 o'clock.

✣

Brahms' Symphony Opens.

Brahms' Symphony No. 1 in C minor opened the programme. With the initial appearance of Conductor Monteux there was an outburst of hand-clapping, testifying to the great popularity he enjoys here. He bowed graciously and a moment later 100 artists were weaving into a finished product the wonderful symphony by Johannes Brahms, 19th century German. Critics agree [illegible] few symphonies can compare with [illegible] holding a place nearly equal to Beethoven's Ninth, one of the most perfect compositions ever produced.

The requirements of the Symphony No. 1, demand artists of the first class, instrumentalists who can delve into the mind of the great composer for the hidden secrets contained in the work. Few can say that the Boston Symphony Orchestra failed to present on the City Theatre stage what Brahms intended when he composed the symphony about 1875. It was in four movements: Un peco sostenuto—allegro; andante sostenuto; un poco allegrette. E grazioso; adagio-allegra non troppe, ma con brio. After each movement was concluded there was a tremendous acclamation—and deservedly so.

A great critic has written of the finale: "With the 30th measure the tempo changes to piu andante, and we come upon one of the most poetic episodes in all Brahms. Amid hushed, tremulous harmonies in the strings, the horn and afterwards the flute pour forth an utterly original melody, the character of which ranges from passionate pleading to a sort of wild exulta-

This is certainly what the episode recalls to any one who has ever heard those poetic tones and their echoes. A short, solemn, even ecclesiastical interruption by the trombones and bassoons is of more thematic importance. As the horn-tones gradually die away, and the cloud-like harmonies in the strings sink lower and lower—like a mist veiling the landscape—an impressive pause ushers in the allegro non troppo, ma con brio. The introductory adagio has already given us mysterious hints at what is to come; and now there bursts forth in the strings the most joyous, exuberant Volkslied melody, a very Hymn to Joy, which in some of its phrases, as it were unconsciously and by sheer affinity of nature, flows into strains from the similar melody in the finale of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. One cannot call it plagiarism; it is two men saying the same thing."

After a brief intermission Debussy's Two Nocturnes: "Clouds" and "Festivals," were presented. In the former the unchangeable appearance of the sky, with the slow and solemn march of clouds dissolving in gray agony tinted with white, is presented. With that thought in mind one could easily follow various moods as interpreted by the orchastra.

"Festivals" is described as follows: Movement, rythm dancing in the atmosphere, with burst of brusque light. There is also the episode of a procession (a dazzling and wholly idealistic vision) passing through the festival and blended with it; but the main idea and substance obstinately remain—always the festival and its blended music.

✣

Tillotson An Artist.

Mr. Tillotson, a young man with admirable stage presence, made his only appearance in the next offering, Schubert's "Wanderer Fantasy," arranged for pianoforte and orchestra by Liszt. Combined with a technique equal to that of the masters now before the public, he has a touch and musicinaly interpretation as distinctive as his own personalty. When his fingers flash along the keyboard the flight is too rapid for the eye to follow—an observer retains only an impression of clashing hands and a melody such as only a great artist is capable of producing. Mr. Tillotson received [illegible] tribute [illegible]. Again and again he was recalled, the audience being hopeful of an encore, but the programme would not permit it.

The number was a triumph alike for Mr. Monteux and the pianist.

Pelovtsian Dances from the opera, "Prince Igor" was the concluding selection by the orchestra. These dances form the final of the second act of the opera. In the opera, with some of the dances, a choral song is joined. In the introduction, the oboe supported by harp and violincellos plays the melody of the women's chorus. Then follows a "dance of savage men, allegro vive, with a lively tune for clarinet with which the former song is joined. Then follow other dances, each with distinctive themes.

At the conclusion of this brilliantly rendered composition the concert was brought to an end, after Conductor Monteux had returned several times to recognize the sustained applause of the audience.

QUINCY MAN APPOINTED SEC[illegible] LIEUTENANT

Quincy, Feb. 11.—It was an-

Audience

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

At the beginning of this review of yesterday's Symphony concert may well be set that expressive phrase dear to rural journalism, "A pleasant time was had by all." Singularly attractive was the programme made by Mr. Monteux on this occasion, a programme that listed Gluck's noble overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis"; Lalo's "Spanish Symphony" for violin and orchestra, in which the admirable Jacques Thibaut played the solo part; Tchaikovsky's ever-eloquent overture "Romeo and Juliet"; and, to give especial zest to the whole, Deems Taylor's "Through is pictured here, wearing the latest ordinary walking skirt, covered by is into plus-fours.

PAUL GORDON IN BOSTON STOCK

Joins St. James Theatre

its "brillig" introduction, its vivid yet discreet representation of the combat and the irresistible and mirth-inspiring monologue for the bassoon, completed by the contra-bassoon, that so graphically suggests the monster's death-struggles, clearly gave the most pleasure to the audience. But it is in the "White Knight" that Mr. Taylor best

[204]

Brockton Daily Evening Enterprise.

BROCKTON'S HOME NEWSPAPER.

Pages 9 to 16

PRICE TWO CENTS.

Symphoy Orchestra and Pianist Score Artistic Triumph

THUSIASTIC CONCERT HERE

Schubert's "Wander-ric Tillotson, Pianist, ption to Pierre Mon-
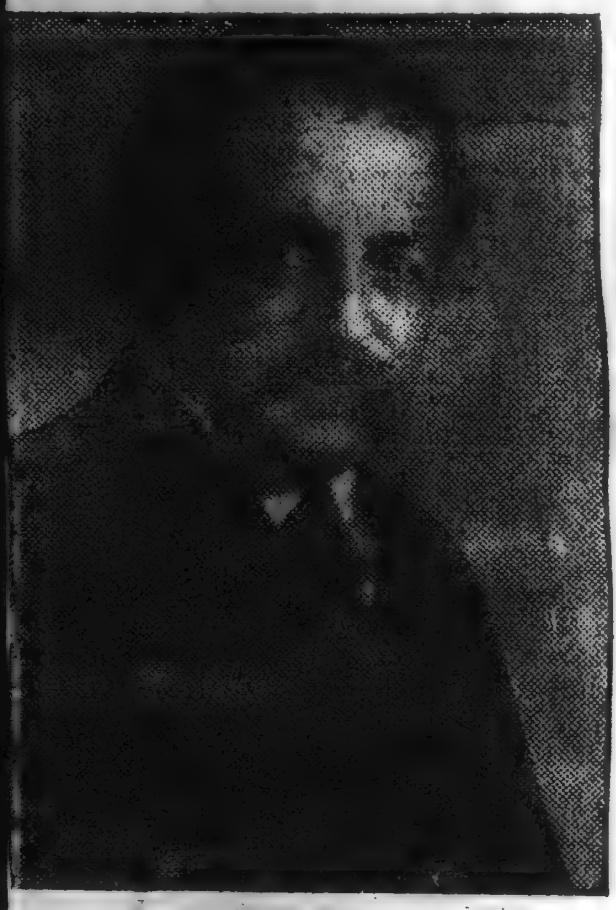
Features.



PIERRE MONTEUX
Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This is certainly what the episode recalls to any one who has ever heard those poetic tones and their echoes. A short, solemn, even ecclesiastical interruption by the trombones and bassoons is of more thematic importance. As the horn-tones gradually die away, and the cloud-like harmonies in the strings sink lower and lower—like a mist veiling the landscape—an impressive pause ushers in the allegro non troppo, ma con brio. The introductory adagio has already given us mysterious hints at what is to come; and now there bursts forth in the strings the most joyous, exuberant Volkslied melody, a very Hymn to Joy, which in some of its phrases, as it were unconsciously and by sheer affinity of nature, flows into strains from the similar melody in the finale of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. One cannot call it plagiarism; it is two men saying the same thing."

After a brief intermission Debussy's Two Nocturnes: "Clouds" and "Festivals," were presented. In the former the unchangeable appearance of the sky, with the slow and solemn march of clouds dissolving in gray agony tinted with white, is presented. With that thought in mind one could easily follow various moods as interpreted by the orchastra.

"Festivals" is described as follows: Movement, rythm dancing in the atmosphere, with burst of brusque light. There is also the episode of a procession (a dazzling and wholly idealistic vision) passing through the festival and blended with it; but the main idea and substance obstinately remain—always the festival and its blended music.

✣

Tillotson An Artist.

Mr. Tillotson, a young man with admirable stage presence, made his only appearance in the next offering, Schubert's "Wanderer Fantasy," arranged for pianoforte and orchestra by Liszt. Combined with a technique equal to that of the masters now before the public, he has a touch and musicinaly interpretation as distinctive as his own personalty. When his fingers flash along the keyboard the flight is too rapid for the eye to follow—an observer retains only an impression of clashing hands and a melody such as only a great artist is capable of producing. Mr. Tillotson received

---

Audience

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

At the beginning of this review of yesterday's Symphony concert may well be set that expressive phrase dear to rural journalism, "A pleasant time was had by all." Singularly attractive was the programme made by Mr. Monteux on this occasion, a programme that listed Gluck's noble overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis"; Lalo's "Spanish Symphony" for violin and orchestra, in which the admirable Jacques Thibaut played the solo part; Tchaikovsky's ever-eloquent overture "Romeo and Juliet"; and, to give especial zest to the whole, Deems Taylor's "Through is pictured here, wearing the latest ordinary walking skirt, covered by as into plus-fours.

---

PAUL GORDON IN BOSTON STOCK

Joins St. James Theatre

---

its "brillig" introduction, its vivid yet discreet representation of the combat and the irresistible and mirth-inspiring monologue for the bassoon, completed by the contra-bassoon, that so graphically suggests the monster's death-struggles, clearly gave the most pleasure to the audience. But it is in the "White Knight" that Mr. Taylor best

[204]

Again and again he was recalled, the audience being hopeful of an encore, but the programme would not permit it.

The number was a triumph alike for Mr. Monteux and the pianist.

Pelovtsian Dances from the opera, "Prince Igor" was the concluding selection by the orchestra. These dances form the final of the second act of the opera. In the opera, with some of the dances, a choral song is joined. In the introduction, the oboe supported by harp and violincellos plays the melody of the women's chorus. Then follows a "dance of savage men, allegro vive, with a lively tune for clarinet with which the former song is joined. Then follow other dances, each with distinctive themes.

At the conclusion of this brilliantly rendered composition the brought to an end, arles A. Eaton—r, who years bestly or unjustly son, was trying when one day rmer jail pal in fraid his prison

ray him, the a book and in said:
now read form
Bible entitled:

"The Rites of Spring," according to composer, was written as absolute music, and is to be taken as su in other words, we are simply asked to listen to it as music, with thinking of pictures or a story. Whether or not the score is as ab lute" as Stravinsky appears to think it is, is not important here, point being that listening to music without any arriere pensee is simple, understandable and rather customary request.

But the "Symphonies" are quite another story. Stravinsky prese them—or it—as a study in sound, a purely abstract "arrangement," a modernist painter would call it, of contrasted, juxtaposed tone-sen tions. He looks upon this music as something analogous to a p ece " and insists that "the tonal masses are to be regarded jectively by the ear." Now these are hard words, and I am not at sure that I know precisely what they mean. On the surface they sou as if Stravinsky were again asking that his work be regarded as abs lute music; but if that were all, he would not have to go to such ela orate pains to elucidate his request. He must want something mo and that something more is, I believe, that the listener approach t "Symphonies" with complete detachment, with purely intellectual cu osity, deriving satisfaction, not from the emotional effect of the mus (he is specifically enjoined from looking for any such thing) but fro the pleasure he takes in observing the clash and concord of rhythm and sounds. In other words, the hearer is requested to appreciat rather than feel.

* * *

LEAVING aside for a moment the actual effect of this music in pe formance, what about the theory upon which it is based? seems to me to have two defects: first, the difficulty of putting it int effect, and second, its dubious value if it could be realized. Stravinsk speaks of his music as being "sculptured in marble." Now music is great many things, but it is not sculpture or painting or architectur (though it is closer to architecture than the first two). It bears a rela tion to time that sculpture and painting do not recognize. It is quit possible to look at a painting or a statue dispassionately, admirin certain qualities that distinguish it as a whole, to get away from it, s to speak, observing it merely as an arrangement of colors or masses There is no time limit upon such scrutiny. You may glance at th Winged Victory for three seconds, or you may gaze at her for a ful hour. If your grasp of design is immediate, a minute's time may suf fice for you to absorb the essentials of a Rembrandt; or, if your ap prehensive power works more slowly, you may spend a morning upon it. You may consider details in any order you wish, spending as much or as little time upon any one of them as you please. You can walk around the statue, studying it from any angle or elevation, and you can scrutinize the painting from left to right, or from top to bottom, even turning it upside down if you like. In brief, the method or the amount of time you employ in studying a work of plastic or graphic art is determined wholly by yourself.

Time enters into the reading of a book or the hearing of a play, but only insomuch as it determines the order in which you receive your first impressions. You can turn back the pages of the book in order better to assimilate a passage that has eluded you, or you can buy a copy of the play and read the scenes in any order whatsoever. You can, in fact, even read the play without seeing it at all.

* * *

BUT none of these things is completely possible with music. For the moment a single note of musical composition has been heard it has begun to die: another note succeeds it, and it has vanished utterly. The order of these successions is vitally important, for the effect of music is almost entirely contextual; the major seventh chord that opens the second act of "Tristan" never sounds quite the same again, when it recurs between other chords. Nor can you stop the music, or turn it back, the better to grasp it; for not only the order but the speed of the sound-successions is one of its essential elements. The moment you hasten to retard this speed, the music becomes different music. The effect of music, in other words, is not immediate, as in the case of painting or sculpture, but cumulative. People speak of "reading" printed music as if the process were analogous to that of reading printed words. Words, either spoken or written, are a medium, a medium for ideas and images. A printed word does double duty. It is, first of all, a set of directions to the reader, directing him to utter certain sounds. If he obeys these directions he utters words, which in turn convey ideas to himself and others. But printed words are also the direct symbols of ideas. You may read a play without ever once imagining the sound of its speeches. You may have a perfect reading knowledge of the French language without being able to pronounce one word of it. You may be born stone deaf and still learn to write and read words without associating them with any aural concept whatsoever.

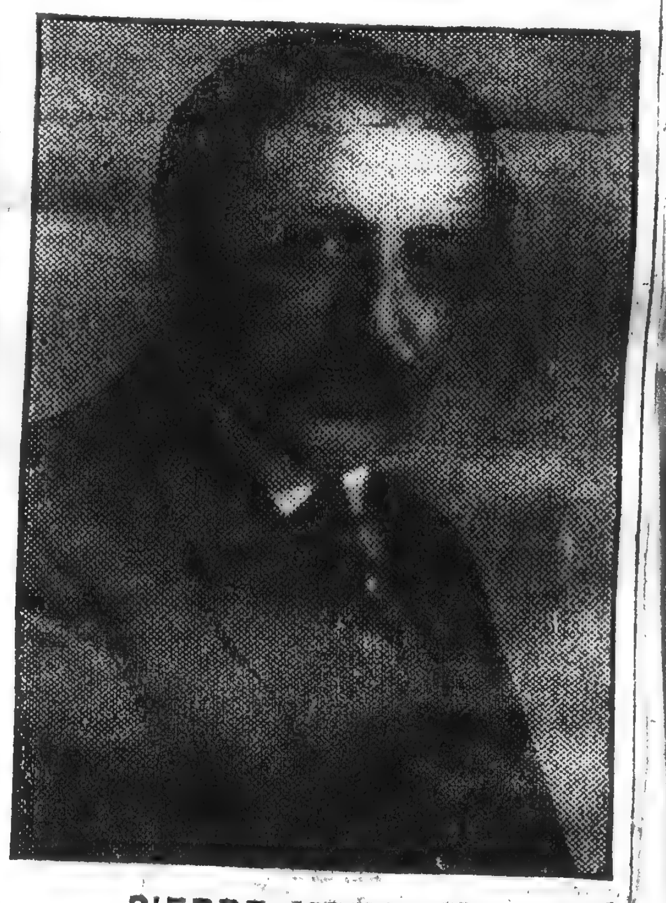
That is not true of printed music. It is a set of directions pure and simple, ordering the violinist to draw the bow across a certain string, or the trumpeter to press certain valves and blow into a metal tube, or the singer to produce certain sounds with his vocal cords. If you derive any satisfaction from reading a printed score it is only because you have acquired the ability to imagine the sounds resulting from these actions. What you receive is a series of mental images, so to speak, of the sounds. But they are not the sounds themselves, nor any complete equivalent of them, any more than a photograph of Stravinsky is actually the composer. You form some idea of what the music is going to sound like, just as you gain some idea of a projected building from looking at the architect's blueprints. The musical symbols mean nothing in themselves, in the sense that printed words d I know of nothing in music that really and completely corresponds w an abstract idea. What you get from music is what you get, through your mind, primarily, but through your emotions. You n "Le Sacre du Printemps," just as you n

---

OVER FOURTH CONCERT HERE

Remarkable Handling of Schubert's "Wanderer Fantasy" by Frederic Tillotson, Pianist, and Enthusiastic Reception to Pierre Monteux, Conductor, Are Features.

FREDERIC TILLOTSON
Talented Pianist Who Aroused Audience.



PIERRE MONTEUX
Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

WITH greater brilliance and magnetic charm than ever before at any local concert, the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 100 pieces at its fourth appearance here Sunday afternoon in City Theatre, thrilled an audience which engaged every seat. At once an entertainment and inspiration, it cast one into the mood to reflect on the finer things of life, especially during Brahms' Symphony No. 1 with its wonderful tonality and effects.

Of course, Pierre Monteux, conductor, who was making his final appearance here as he is soon to leave the organization, was the real centre of interest but perhaps no more remarkable tribute has been paid to any artist to appear here than to Frederic Tillotson—a genius in his chosen line, the piano.

Again and again, in response to the tremendous clamor from the inspired audience, he appeared to acknowledge the praise, while he received an uncommon tribute from Conductor Monteux, a clasp of the hand in mid-stage. Mr. Tillotson's handling of the piano during Schubert's "Wanderer Fantasy," arranged by Liszt, well deserves the use of seperlative terms for it was a remarkable exhibition of pianistic ability.

It was a representative audience —that is, practically every musician and vocalist in the district was present. And the persons most intimately acquainted with what is good and what is medicore music acclaimed the loudest. Mayor and Mrs. William A. Bullivant and party were prominent, occupying a main floor box.

The musicians made the trip here in a special train from Boston, arriving shortly after 2 o'clock.

✣

Brahms' Symphony Opens.

Brahms' Symphony No. 1 in C minor opened the programme. With the initial appearance of Conductor Monteux there was an outburst of hand-clapping, testifying to the great popularity he enjoys here. He bowed graciously and a moment later 100 artists were weaving into a finished product the wonderful symphony by Johannes Brahms, 19th century German. Critics agre[illegible] sym- [illegible] can compare with [illegible] holding a place nearly equal to Beethoven's Ninth, one of the most perfect compositions ever produced.

The requirements of the Symphony No. 1 demand artists of the first class, instrumentalists who can delve into the mind of the great composer for the hidden secrets contained in the work. Few can say that the Boston Symphony Orchestra failed to present on the City Theatre stage what Brahms intended when he composed the symphony about 1875. It was in four movements: Un peco sostenuto—allegro; andante sostenuto; un poco allegrette. E grazioso; adagio-allegra non troppe, ma con brio. After each movement was concluded there was a tremendous acclamation—and deservedly so.

A great critic has written of the finale: "With the 30th measure the tempo changes to piu andante, and we come upon one of the most poetic episodes in all Brahms. Amid hushed, tremulous harmonies in the strings, the horn and afterwards the flute pour forth an utterly original melody, the character of which ranges from passionate pleading to a sort of wild exultation according to the instrument that plays it. The coloring is enriched by the solemn tones of the trombones, which appear for the first time in this movement. It is ticklish work trying to dive down into a composer's brain, and surmise what special outside source his inspiration may have had; but one cannot help feeling that this whole wonderful episode may have been suggested to Brahms by the tones of the Alpine horn, as it awakens the echoes from mountain after mountain on some of the high passes in the Bernese Oberland. This is certainly what the episode recalls to any one who has ever heard those poetic tones and their echoes. A short, solemn, even ecclesiastical interruption by the trombones and bassoons is of more thematic importance. As the horn-tones gradually die away, and the cloud-like harmonies in the strings sink lower and lower—like a mist veiling the landscape—an impressive pause ushers in the allegro non troppo, ma con brio. The introductory adagio has already given us mysterious hints at what is to come; and now there bursts forth in the strings the most joyous, exuberant Volkslied melody, a very Hymn to Joy, which in some of its phrases, as it were unconsciously and by sheer affinity of nature, flows into strains from the similar melody in the finale of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. One cannot call it plagiarism; it is two men saying the same thing."

After a brief intermission Debussy's Two Nocturnes: "Clouds" and "Festivals," were presented. In the former the unchangeable appearance of the sky, with the slow and solemn march of clouds dissolving in gray agony tinted with white, is presented. With that thought in mind one could easily follow various moods as interpreted by the orchastra.

"Festivals" is described as follows: Movement, rythm dancing in the atmosphere, with burst of brusque light. There is also the episode of a procession (a dazzling and wholly idealistic vision) passing through the festival and blended with it; but the main idea and substance obstinately remain—always the festival and its blended music.

✣

Tillotson An Artist.

Mr. Tillotson, a young man with admirable stage presence, made his only appearance in the next offering, Schubert's "Wanderer Fantasy," arranged for pianoforte and orchestra by Liszt. Combined with a technique equal to that of the masters now before the public, he has a touch and musicinaly interpretation as distinctive as his own personalty. When his fingers flash along the keyboard the flight is too rapid for the eye to follow—an observer retains only an impression of clashing hands and a melody such as only a great artist is capable of producing. Mr. Tillotson received [illegible] Again and again he was recalled, the audience being hopeful of an encore, but the programme would not permit it.

The number was a triumph alike for Mr. Monteux and the pianist.

Pelovtsian Dances from the opera, "Prince Igor" was the concluding selection by the orchestra. These dances form the final of the second act of the opera. In the opera, with some of the dances, a choral song is joined. In the introduction, the oboe supported by harp and violincellos plays the melody of the women's chorus. Then follows a "dance of savage men, allegro vive, with a lively tune for clarinet with which the former song is joined. Then follow other dances, each with distinctive themes.

At the conclusion of this brilliantly rendered composition the concert was brought to an end, after Conductor Monteux had returned several times to recognize the sustained applause of the audience.

QUINCY MAN APPOINTED SECOND LIEUTENANT

Quincy, Feb. 11.—It was announced Saturday that Edward P. Cook has been appointed a lieutenant in the Massachusetts National Guard and has been made company officer of the new Third Battalion Headquarters Company of the 101st Infantry, which is to be quartered in the new armory rapidly nearing completion.

EXAMINATIONS FOR PLYMPTON POSTMASTER

Washington, Feb. 11.—Postmaster examinations will be held soon at Plympton, announces the civil service commission

---

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

At the beginning of this review of yesterday's Symphony concert may well be set that expressive phrase dear to rural journalism, "A pleasant time was had by all." Singularly attractive was the programme made by Mr. Monteux on this occasion, a programme that listed Gluck's noble overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis"; Lalo's "Spanish Symphony" for violin and orchestra, in which the admirable Jacques Thibaut played the solo part; Tchaikovsky's ever-eloquent overture "Romeo and Juliet"; and, to give especial zest to the whole, Deems Taylor's "Through is pictured here, wearing the latest ordinary walking skirt, covered by s into plus-fours.

PAUL GORDON IN BOSTON STOCK

Joins St. James Theatre

its "brillig" introduction, its vivid yet discreet representation of the combat and the irresistible and mirth-inspiring monologue for the bassoon, completed by the contra-bassoon, that so graphically suggests the monster's death-struggles, clearly gave the most pleasure to the audience. But it is in the "White Knight" that Mr. Taylor best

---

The bass notes struck slowly with the composer's arm seemed to give the effect of water moving rhythmically through chaos.

As one of his final numbers Mr. Cowell played the piano both inside and out. Not satisfied with turning the black and white notes into black and blue ones, he received a bit of applause as the result of this major operation, but we had a feeling that it was the piano which should have come down to the footlights and bowed.

Anyway, if this new school of caveman music becomes popular, there won't be any further trouble about making little Willie do his afternoon practicing. With no bars put on elbow, fist, foot and nose work, Willie can have as much fun on the piano stool as he could on the sand lots.

---

year captured 21,590 of these rodents in this city, has this year redoubled the vigor of its rat campaign.

It was not generally known until figures of the 1922 campaign were made public that the Sanitary Bureau maintain squad

capture and cremate rats.

The Manhattan squad won rat cup last year with a bag 9,103. Brooklyn was second w 6,328, Queens third with 3,184, th Bronx fourth with 1,951 and Rich mond trailing with 1,024.

The trappers report the dis covery of one woman who has made pets of nearly 100 rats.

"Pet rats?" asked Health Com missioner Monaghan, who hear the story.

"Yes, sir, rats."

"Rats!" echoed the Health Commissioner.

[204]

composer, was written as absolute music, and is to be taken as su in other words, we are simply asked to listen to it as music, with thinking of pictures or a story. Whether or not the score is as ab lute" as Stravinsky appears to think it is, is not important here, point being that listening to music without any arriere pensee i simple, understandable and rather customary request.

But the "Symphonies" are quite another story. Stravinsky prese them—or it—as a study in sound, a purely abstract "arrangement," a modernist painter would call it, of contrasted, juxtaposed tone-sen tions. He looks upon this music as something analogous to a piece " and insists that "the tonal masses are to be regarded jectively by the ear." Now these are hard words, and I am not at sure that I know precisely what they mean. On the surface they sou as if Stravinsky were again asking that his work be regarded as ab lute music; but if that were all, he would not have to go to such ela orate pains to elucidate his request. He must want something mo and that something more is, I believe, that the listener approach t "Symphonies" with complete detachment, with purely intellectual cu osity, deriving satisfaction, not from the emotional effect of the mus (he is specifically enjoined from looking for any such thing) but fro the pleasure he takes in observing the clash and concord of rhythm and sounds. In other words, the hearer is requested to appreciat rather than feel.

* * *

LEAVING aside for a moment the actual effect of this music in pe formance, what about the theory upon which it is based? I seems to me to have two defects: first, the difficulty of putting it int effect, and second, its dubious value if it could be realized. Stravinsk speaks of his music as being "sculptured in marble." Now music is great many things, but it is not sculpture or painting or architectur (though it is closer to architecture than the first two). It bears a rela tion to time that sculpture and painting do not recognize. It is quit possible to look at a painting or a statue dispassionately, admirin certain qualities that distinguish it as a whole, to get away from it, s to speak, observing it merely as an arrangement of colors or masses There is no time limit upon such scrutiny. You may glance at th Winged Victory for three seconds, or you may gaze at her for a ful hour. If your grasp of design is immediate, a minute's time may suf fice for you to absorb the essentials of a Rembrandt; or, if your ap prehensive power works more slowly, you may spend a morning upon it. You may consider details in any order you wish, spending as much or as little time upon any one of them as you please. You can walk around the statue, studying it from any angle or elevation, and you can scrutinize the painting from left to right, or from top to bottom, even turning it upside down if you like. In brief, the method or the amount of time you employ in studying a work of plastic or graphic art is determined wholly by yourself.

Time enters into the reading of a book or the hearing of a play, but only insomuch as it determines the order in which you receive your first impressions. You can turn back the pages of the book in order better to assimilate a passage that has eluded you, or you can buy a copy of the play and read the scer in any order whatsoever. You can, in fact, even read the play without seeing it at all.

* * *

BUT none of these things is completely possible with music. For the moment a single note of musical composition has been heard it has begun to die: another note succeeds it, and it has vanished utterly. The order of these successions is vitally important, for the effect of music is almost entirely contextual; the major seventh chord that opens the second act of "Tristan" never sounds quite the same again, when it recurs between other chords. Nor can you stop the music, or turn it back, the better to grasp it; for not only the order but the speed of the sound-successions is one of its essential elements. The moment you hasten to retard this speed, the music becomes different music. The effect of music, in other words, is not immediate, as in the case of painting or sculpture, but cumulative. People speak of "reading" printed music as if the process were analogous to that of reading printed words. Words, either spoken or written, are a medium, a medium for ideas and images. A printed word does double duty. It is, first of all, a set of directions to the reader, directing him to utter certain sounds. If he obeys these directions he utters words, which in turn convey ideas to himself and others. But printed words are also the direct symbols of ideas. You may read a play without ever once imagining the sound of its speeches. You may have a perfect reading knowledge of the French language without being able to pronounce one word of it. You may be born stone deaf and still learn to write and read words without associating them with any aural concept whatsoever.

That is not true of printed music. It is a set of directions pure and simple, ordering the violinist to draw the bow across a certain string, or the trumpeter to press certain valves and blow into a metal tube, or the singer to produce certain sounds with his vocal cords. If you derive any satisfaction from reading a printed score it is only because you have acquired the ability to imagine the sounds resulting from these actions. What you receive is a series of mental images, so to speak, of the sounds. But they are not the sounds themselves, nor any complete equivalent of them, any more than a photograph of Stravinsky is actually the composer. You form some idea of what the music is going to sound like, just as you gain some idea of a projected building from looking at the architect's blueprints. The musical symbols mean nothing in themselves, in the sense that printed words d I know of nothing in music that really and completely corresponds w an abstract idea. What you get from music is what you get, through your mind, primarily, but through your emotions. You n "Le Sacre du Printemps," just as you n

---

OVER FOURTH CONCERT HERE

Remarkable Handling of Schubert's "Wanderer Fantasy" by Frederic Tillotson, Pianist, and Enthusiastic Reception to Pierre Monteux, Conductor, Are Features.

FREDERIC TILLOTSON
Talented Pianist Who Aroused Audience.

PIERRE MONTEUX
Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

WITH greater brilliance and magnetic charm than ever before at any local concert, the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 100 pieces at its fourth appearance here Sunday afternoon in City Theatre, thrilled an audience which engaged every seat. At once an entertainment and inspiration, it cast one into the mood to reflect on the finer things of life especially during Brahms'

This is certainly what the episode recalls to any one who has ever heard those poetic tones and their echoes. A short, solemn, even ecclesiastical interruption by the trombones and bassoons is of more thematic importance. As the horn-tones gradually die away, and the cloud-like harmonies in the strings sink lower and lower—like a mist veiling the landscape—an impressive pause ushers in the allegro non troppo, ma con brio. The introductory adagio has already given

---

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

At the beginning of this review of yesterday's Symphony concert may well be set that expressive phrase dear to rural journalism, "A pleasant time was had by all." Singularly attractive was the programme made by Mr. Monteux on this occasion, a programme that listed Gluck's noble overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis"; Lalo's "Spanish Symphony" for violin and orchestra, in which the admirable Jacques Thibaut played the solo part; Tchaikovsky's ever-eloquent overture "Romeo and Juliet"; and, to give especial zest to the whole, Deems Taylor's "Through is pictured here, wearing the latest ordinary walking skirt, covered by s into plus-fours.

---

PAUL GORDON IN BOSTON STOCK

Joins St. James Theatre

---

its "brillig" introduction, its vivid yet discreet representation of the combat and the irresistible and mirth-inspiring monologue for the bassoon, completed by the contra-bassoon, that so graphically suggests the monster's death-struggles, clearly gave the most pleasure to the audience. But it is in the "White Knight" that Mr. Taylor best

---

The bass notes struck slowly with the composer's arm seemed to give the effect of water moving rhythmically through chaos.

As one of his final numbers Mr. Cowell played the piano both inside and out. Not satisfied with turning the black and white notes into black and blue ones, he

---

year captured 21,590 of these rodents in this city, has this year redoubled the vigor of its rat campaign.

It was not generally known until figures of the 1922 campaign were made public that the Sanitary Bureau maintai quad

---

a bit of applause as the result of this major operation, but we had a feeling that it was the piano which should have come down to the footlights and bowed.

Anyway, if this new school of caveman music becomes popular, there won't be any further trouble about making little Willie do his afternoon practicing. With no bars put on elbow, fist, foot and nose work, Willie can have as much fun on the piano stool as he could on the sand lots.

---

capture and cremate rats.

The Manhattan squad won the rat cup last year with a bag of 9,103. Brooklyn was second with 6,328, Queens third with 3,184, the Bronx fourth with 1,951 and Richmond trailing with 1,024.

The trappers report the discovery of one woman who has made pets of nearly 100 rats.

"Pet rats?" asked Health Commissioner Monaghan, who heard the story.

"Yes, sir, rats."

"Rats!" echoed the Health Commissioner.

I have one glass eye," said the ker, on the final visit. "If you tell me which one it is, I'll see what I can do about the loan."

After a careful scrutiny of the baker's countenance, the Canadian said: "Your left eye!"

You're right," answered the baker, "but tell me how did you discover it?"

'Well," was the reply of the Canadian, "I thought I saw a little sympathy in the glass one."

Another was a story of two

By the Rev. Charles A. Eaton—A colored preacher, who years before had been justly or unjustly incarcerated in prison, was trying to forget the past when one day he discovered a former jail pal in his congregation. Afraid his prison mate might betray him, the preacher picked up a book and in a low, solemn voice said:

"Brethern, I will now read form chapter 144 of the Bible, entitled:

"'Dem wot knows mah past and says nothin', Ise see later.'" [204]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

THIS CLIPPING FROM MILWAUKEE,
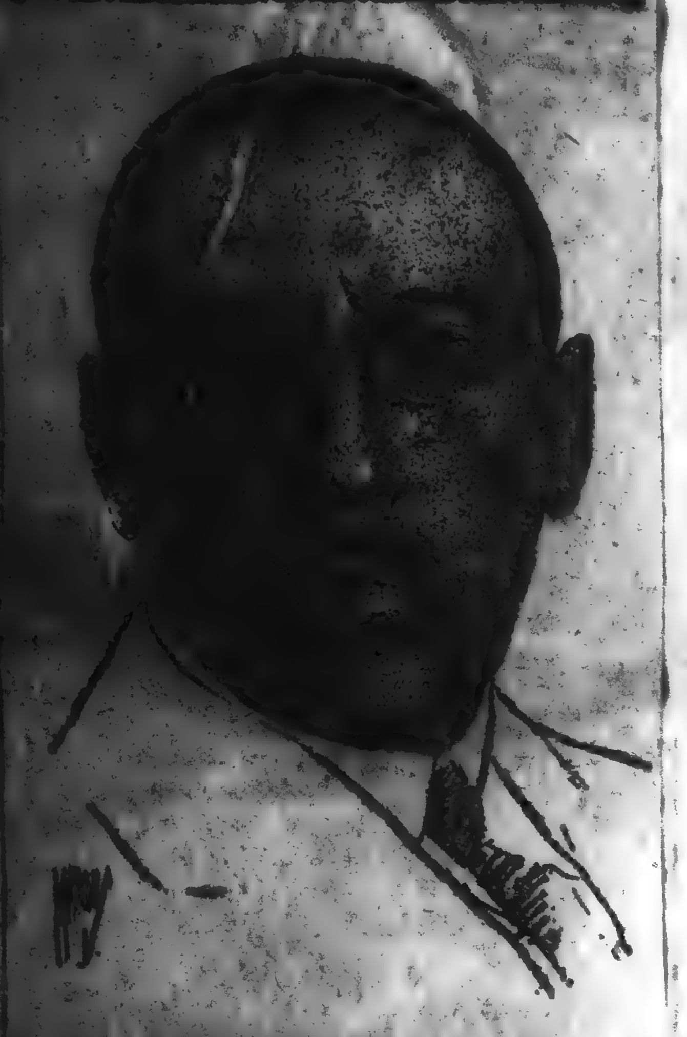
WIS.
LEADER

FEB 9 - 1924

RIALTO NOTES



IGOR STRAVINSKY.

American concert audiences are beginning to believe that Igor Stravinsky has written real music. Several months ago the New York Symphony orchestra performed his Le Chant du Rossignol, and last week the Boston Symphony, under Pierre Monteux, made musical history playing Le Sacre du Printemps (The Rite of Spring). This work, written more than 10 years ago, breathes a stark elementality, and in its entirety "the music smells of the earth." A detailed account of the work and its performance will be found on The Leader's drama and music page Saturday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW BEDFORD,
MASS.
STANDARD 32

FEB [illegible] 1924

Who will be the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra next season? asks Henry T. Finck, and he adds:

It has been understood for some time that the admirable but rather wild and woolly Russian, Kussevitsky, had been chosen for that great position, but apparently the directors are still in an experimental stage, for here is Professor Georg Schneevoigt coming over at the special invitation of the directors of the Boston orchestra to conduct its regular concerts on March 7 and 8.

Professor Schneevoigt enjoys a reputation abroad not unlike that of Willem Mengelberg, and every artist of international note has appeared under his baton with his famous orchestra in Stockholm; among them have been Mme. Cahier, Rachmaninoff, Hubermann, Hofmann, and Melba. Like many other famous conductors, Professor Schneevoigt gained a name for himself as an instrumentalist and was solo 'cellist with European orchestras with whom he later appeared as conductor.

Whether the new conductor is to be Kussevitsky or Schneevoigt, many will be sorry to have Pierre Monteux go back to Paris. He has not always struck twelve, or even eleven; but as an interpreter of French music he has excelled, and still more in the modern Russian repertory. New York came to know him first in connection with the Ballet Russe, which gave such admirable performances, particularly of Stravinsky's "Petroushka" and "The Fire Bird."

It is therefore not singular that M. Monteux's greatest triumph—at least in this city—during the five years of his leadership of the Boston Symphony orchestra came last week, when he brought out Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring" (La Sacre de Printemps). It aroused unbounded enthusiasm and the critics were practically unanimous in proclaiming it a masterpiece, not a few heralding it as epoch making.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MILWAUKEE,
WIS.
LEADER

FEB 10 1924

MUSIC IN NEW YORK

STRAVINSKY DECLARED SANE.

Copyright, 1924.

BY PLAYGIAN.

NEW YORK — Curiously enough, this same year which has brought us Beethoven in unprecedented doses has done as much for Stravinsky. One by one the works of Stravinsky, the much maligned and much exalted, are coming to use after successes elsewhere. Boston, Philadelphia and all of Europe have accepted him; New York is now ready to listen. And it was Pierre Monteux with the Boston Symphony Orchestra who had to bring us Le Sacre du Printemps.

When Mr. Monteux conducted this for the first time with the Russian Ballet in Paris, 1913, they say the indignation of the audience stopped the performance. It was hissed, screeched and peered off the stage. Last week in Carnegie hall—and remember, American audiences are not nearly as open minded as the European—only 17 people, mostly old people, left their seats during its performance. One mature woman, caught midway between her seat and the exit by a virulent Stravinsky chord, made up of four kettledrums, a bass drum, cymbals and assorted instruments, was seen to wince and look to her escort for support. But on the whole the audience was respectful, attentive and highly enthusiastic. Another accusedly insane man of music has officially been declared sane.

Le Sacre du Printemps is translated as The Rite of Spring. It was written originally for ballet and is now played in concert form in two sections, the first describing the primitive gathering for the spring festival and the second the choosing of some young girl who must dance herself to death as a sacrifice to the gods who control the fertility of the earth.

Orchestration a Marvel.

It has been hailed as the greatest of Stravinsky's works by those who say the Russian holds no mystery of chord or melodic progression for them. Well, it may be. A single hearing leaves one with an impression of tremendous music, a work which, if it intends to convey an idea of the barbaric spirit and primitive emotion, does so in an unparalleled way. Composers have often tried to represent barbarism with exotic rythms, but there has been no attempt before this where the clash of notes has worked so successfully toward that end. The parts of this composition in which Stravinsky works up to the dances, and the dances themselves, are overpowering in their effect and volume of sound. It is the music of the war cry, of the ecstatic primitive whose gods of nature demanded blood and the body for their appeasing, of life as it progresses on the purely emotional, instinctive plane.

Stravinsky's orchestration in this, as in his other works, is a marvel. Not one hearing nor anything but an analysis of the score can tell how he gets his combinations of tones and how clear impression is obtained from the melee of sound. Its texture is highly complicated but its difficult construction does not make itself felt in the hearing. Le Sacre marks another step in our musical education.

Mengelberg Given Big Reception.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROCKTON,
MASS.
ENTERPRISE

FEB [illegible] 1924

The large, representative and enthusiastic audience that gathered at the City Theatre on a stormy Sunday afternoon to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra and applaud its work to the echo was proof enough that there are very many in the community who are hungry for the best there is in music. Even the third balcony or gallery was packed with music lovers. We hold to a conviction that the town would be equally appreciative of contemporary musical plays, comedies or dramas, with capable casts, were they put on at intervals at either the City Theatre or at Gordon's. There probably would not be much profit for the local managers, but it would show a disposition to introduce here metropolitan casts and productions our people now have to go to Boston or New York to see, and we have an idea the public would not be unmindful of the effort to add diversity to the season's bill of fare—occasional imported tasty bits to tickle appetites for the spoken drama that are being kept keen by the well seasoned and well served dishes offered by the Brockton Players.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROCKTON,
MASS.
ENTERPRISE

FEB [illegible] 1924

world.

...Hundreds enjoyed one of the finest concerts ever presented in the Shoe City Sunday afternoon when the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the leadership of Pierre Monteux, played at City Theatre. This was the noted leader's final appearance here as he will leave for Paris this spring.

...The drive for $50,000 being waged by the Y. M. H. A. hardly had been under way an hour Sun-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE SALEM
MASS.
NEWS

FEB 14 1924

Boston Symphony Played in Salem In November, 1882

Salem has an unwitting proprietorship in the Boston Symphony orchestra, which is to play here in the Empire theatre next Sunday, for Salem figures in the historical orchestra's earlies days.

The archives of Symphony hall show Salem to have been one of the first cities which the orchestra visited. This initial concert was given in Mechanic hall, Salem, Nov. 24, 1882. The orchestra was then just a year old. The conductor was George Henschel and the program began with Weber's Ded Freischuts overture and otherwise included composers and compositions which have been long since out of fashion. A generation has passed since the Boston Symphony orchestra, New England's great musical organization, has visited Salem.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW YORK
N. Y.
TELEGRAM

FEB 15 1924

Monteux to Repeat 'Le Sacre.'

In response to many requests Pierre Monteux has decided to repeat Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps" at the Carnegie Hall concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the afternoon of Saturday, March 15. Mr. Monteux introduced the work to New York at the Boston Orchestra's Carnegie Hall concert of January 31. In repeating it he will afford those who heard it then the opportunity for further acquaintance with one of the most important of modern scores, besides making it known for the first time to music lovers who have not heard it so far.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WORCESTER
MASSACHUSETTS
GAZETTE

FEB 13 1924

Boston Symphony Orchestra Entertains Lovers of Music

Popular Music Organization Appears Before a Representative Audience in Mechanics Hall in Full Force for the First Time in Several Years

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave a concert last night in Mechanics hall before a large and representative audience of Worcester music lovers.

It was the first performance of the full orchestra here in several years, and the event was a memorable one in the city's musical annals.

To many there is something peculiarly satisfactory about a symphony concert; a completeness and unity about the ensemble of a great body of instruments sending forth its message in a manner that is impossible by any other source. This was especially apparent with the musicians last night, under the conductorship of Pierre Monteux. The first half of the program, presented Beethoven's famous Sventh symphony in four movements. Next to the fifth, by this composer, the seventh in A major, is the best known, and is to many, the more beautiful of the two. From the graceful poco sostenuto of the opening theme it breaks into the familiar strains of the allegretto in a syncopated haunting trend of melody introduced by the first and second violins and carried on by the French horns. Numerous descriptions have been given of this music. Some critics say that it embodies the onward march of fate, others a bridal procession and ceremony leading to the merrymaking music in the last two movements. Like a wonderful landscape vista, analysis is unnecessary; it speaks a different language according to the imagination and appreciation of each person.

Tempo and Rhythm

One can easily understand how Isadora Duncan, the dancer, chose the last two movements of this symphony as best expressing her terpsichorean art. A whirlwind change of mood leaves the audience breathless in following the intricate change of tempo and rhythm. The finale has been called the apotheosis of the dance, and, according to Wagner, "its magic causes tables, benches, cans and cups, the grandmother, the blind and lame, yea, the children in the cradle to fall dancing." The musicians caught the spirit and sent it racing through a fanfare of instruments to a brilliant finale.

One of the most difficult interpretive tone poems ever composed—Strauss "Death and Transfiguration" was a masterly piece of orchestration. It is almost a strain to listen to the wonder and terror of its music, so vividly is the picture drawn. The transitory passages, contrasting tossing, crashing chords of the earthly conflict with the heavenly visionary peace of the transfiguration melody was marvelously wrought by the musicians.

"Clouds" and "Festivals"

Tow Debussy nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals" were interesting bits of orchestral coloring. "Clouds" was an impressionistic shifting of transient melodies; "Festivals" was fantastic and gay, and kept the orchestral members on the qui vive with its rapid fire change of tempo. A fitting climax was the Tannhauser overture. Although perhaps the most often played of any orchestral number, last night's performance stands out unique.

The triumphant glory of the final pilgrim chorus theme, thrilled with its intensity after the last chord not one in the audience stirred to hurry away, but all remained to applaud again and again as Mr. Monteux with his musicians rose to acknoledge the well merited ovation.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE SALEM
MASS.
NEWS

FEB [illegible] 1924

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AT EMPIRE THEATRE SUNDAY AFTERNOON

PIERRE MONTEUX, CONDUCTOR

For the first time in a generation the full Boston Symphony orchestra will give a concert in Salem tomorrow afternoon at 3.15 in the Empire theatre. The concert may well be regarded as the leading event in the current musical season.

When first announced the management stated that it was the hope of the orchestra that Salem would show such interest and support of the undertaking that the concert from now on might be made an annual one as is the case in nearly every large New England city.

On this basis it is safe to say that the great orchestra—unbiased critics still say it is the greatest in the world—will come to Salem soon again. For the sale from the very first day has been splendid. This morning the theatre had but very few seats left on the floor. The first balcony was sold out a week ago, and tickets for the second balcony were moving fast.

There seems to be a misunderstanding in some quarters about the second balcony seats. These are sold for $1 and the tax, but some people think that they are merely admission tickets and do not guarantee a seat. It it against the law to sell admission tickets for standing room in a Salem theatre. Any one who buys the tickets is certain to have a seat in the second balcony.

Pierre Monteux, making his farewell tour with the orchestra, will conduct the concert. Edith Thompson, a great local favorite, will be the soloist. Finally a program that has met both popular and instant appeal will be given.

Sunday morning the box office will open at 10 o'clock. Doors will open at 2.30. Reserved seats must be obtained tonight.

[205]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

THIS CLIPPING FROM MILWAUKEE,
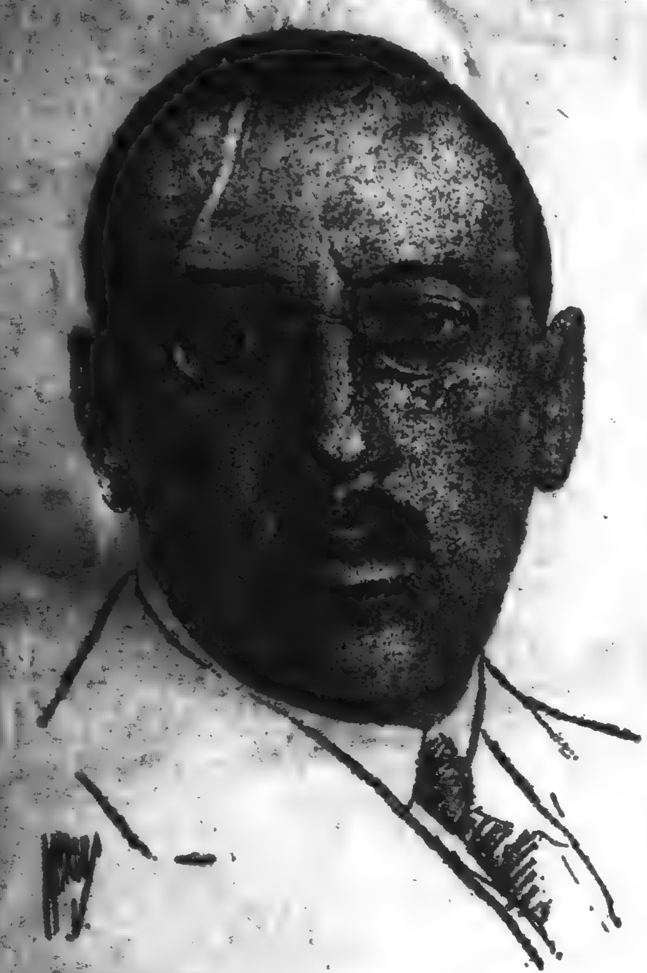
WIS.
LEADER
FEB 9 - 1924

RIALTO NOTES



IGOR STRAVINSKY.

American concert audiences are beginning to believe that Igor Stravinsky has written real music. Several months ago the New York Symphony orchestra performed his Le Chant du Rossignol, and last week the Boston Symphony, under Pierre Monteux, made musical history playing Le Sacre du Printemps (The Rite of Spring). This work, written more than 10 years ago, breathes a stark elementality, and in its entirety "the music smells of the earth." A detailed account of the work and its performance will be found on The Leader's drama and music page Saturday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW BEDFORD,
MASS.
STANDARD 32
FEB 1924

Who will be the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra next season? asks Henry T. Finck, and he adds:

It has been understood for some time that the admirable but rather wild and woolly Russian, Kussevitzky, had been chosen for that great position, but apparently the directors are still in an experimental stage, for here is Professor Georg Schneevoigt coming over at the special invitation of the directors of the Boston orchestra to conduct its regular concerts on March 7 and 8.

Professor Schneevoigt enjoys a reputation abroad not unlike that of Willem Mengelberg, and every artist of international note has appeared under his baton with his famous orchestra in Stockholm; among them have been Mme. Cahier, Rachmaninoff, Hubermann, Hofmann, and Melba. Like many other famous conductors, Professor Schneevoigt gained a name for himself as an instrumentalist and was solo 'cellist with European orchestras with whom he later appeared as conductor.

Whether the new conductor is to be Kussevitsky or Schneevoigt, many will be sorry to have Pierre Monteux go back to Paris. He has not always struck twelve, or even eleven; but as an interpreter of French music he has excelled, and still more in the modern Russian repertory. New York came to know him first in connection with the Ballet Russe, which gave such admirable performances, particularly of Stravinsky's "Petroushka" and "The Fire Bird."

It is therefore not singular that M. Monteux's greatest triumph—at least in this city—during the five years of his leadership of the Boston Symphony orchestra came last week, when he brought out Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring" (La Sacre de Printemps). It aroused unbounded enthusiasm and the critics were practically unanimous in proclaiming it a masterpiece, not a few heralding it as epoch making.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MILWAUKEE,
WIS.
LEADER
FEB 10 1924

MUSIC IN NEW YORK

STRAVINSKY DECLARED SANE.

Copyright, 1924.

BY PLAYGIAN.

NEW YORK — Curiously enough, this same year which has brought us Beethoven in unprecedented doses has done as much for Stravinsky. One by one the works of Stravinsky, the much maligned and much exalted, are coming to use after successes elsewhere. Boston, Philadelphia and all of Europe have accepted him: New York is now ready to listen. And it was Pierre Monteux with the Boston Symphony Orchestra who had to bring us Le Sacre du Printemps.

When Mr. Monteux conducted this for the first time with the Russian Ballet in Paris, 1913, they say the indignation of the audience stopped the performance. It was hissed, screeched and peered off the stage. Last week in Carnegie hall—and remember, American audiences are not nearly as open minded as the European—only 17 people, mostly old people, left their seats during its performance. One mature woman, caught midway between her seat and the exit by a virulent Stravinsky chord, made up of four kettledrums, a bass drum, cymbals and assorted instruments, was seen to wince and look to her escort for support. But on the whole the audience was respectful, attentive and highly enthusiastic. Another accusedly insane man of music has officially been declared sane.

Le Sacre du Printemps is translated as The Rite of Spring. It was written originally for ballet and is now played in concert form in two sections, the first describing the primitive gathering for the spring festival and the second the choosing of some young girl who must dance herself to death as a sacrifice to the gods who control the fertility of the earth.

Orchestration a Marvel.

It has been hailed as the greatest of Stravinsky's works by those who say the Russian holds no mystery of chord or melodic progression for them. Well, it may be. A single hearing leaves one with an impression of tremendous music, a work which, if it intends to convey an idea of the barbaric spirit and primitive emotion, does so in an unparalleled way. Composers have often tried to represent barbarism with exotic rythms, but there has been no attempt before this where the clash of notes has worked so successfully toward that end. The parts of this composition in which Stravinsky works up to the dances, and the dances themselves, are overpowering in their effect and volume of sound. It is the music of the war cry, of the ecstatic primitive whose gods of nature demanded blood and the body for their appeasing, of life as it progresses on the purely emotional, instinctive plane.

Stravinsky's orchestration in this, as in his other works, is a marvel. Not one hearing nor anything but an analysis of the score can tell how he gets his combinations of tones and how clear impression is obtained from the melee of sound. Its texture is highly complicated but its difficult construction does not make itself felt in the hearing. Le Sacre marks another step in our musical education.

Mengelberg Given Big Reception.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROCKTON,
MASS.
ENTERPRISE
FEB 1924

The large, representative and enthusiastic audience that gathered at the City Theatre on a stormy Sunday afternoon to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra and applaud its work to the echo was proof enough that there are very many in the community who are hungry for the best there is in music. Even the third balcony or gallery was packed with music lovers. We hold to a conviction that the town would be equally appreciative of contemporary musical ...ys, comedies or dramas, with ...pable casts, were they put on ... intervals at either the City ...eatre or at Gordon's. There ...obably would not be much profit ...r the local managers, but it ...ould show a disposition to in...oduce here metropolitan casts and ...roductions our people now have to ... to Boston or New York to see, ...nd we have an idea the public ...ould not be unmindful of the ef...ort to add diversity to the sea...on's bill of fare—occasional im...ported tasty bits to tickle ap...petites for the spoken drama that ...re being kept keen by the well seasoned and well served dishes offered by the Brockton Players.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROCKTON,
MASS.
ENTERPRISE
FEB 1924

... the world.

...Hundreds enjoyed one of the finest concerts ever presented in the Shoe City Sunday afternoon when the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the leadership of Pierre Monteux, played at City Theatre. This was the noted leader's final appearance here as he will leave for Paris this spring.

...The drive for $50,000 being waged by the Y. M. H. A. hardly had been under way an hour Sun-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW YORK
N. Y.
TELEGRAM
5 1924

Monteux to Repeat 'Le Sacre.'

In response to many requests Pierre Monteux has decided to repeat Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps" at the Carnegie Hall concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the afternoon of Saturday, March 15. Mr. Monteux introduced the work to New York at the Boston Orchestra's Carnegie Hall concert of January 31. In repeating it he will afford those who heard it then the opportunity for further acquaintance with one of the most important of modern scores, besides making it known for the first time to music lovers who have not heard it so far.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE SALEM
MASS.
NEWS
FEB 1924

Boston Symphony Played in Salem In November, 1882

Salem has an unwitting proprietorship in the Boston Symphony orchestra, which is to play here in the Empire theatre next Sunday, for Salem figures in the historical orchestra's earliest days.

The archives of Symphony hall show Salem to have been one of the first cities which the orchestra visited. This initial concert was given in Mechanic hall, Salem, Nov. 24, 1882. The orchestra was then just a year old. The conductor was George Henschel and the program began with Weber's Ded Freischutz overture and otherwise included composers and compositions which have been long since out of fashion. A generation has passed since the Boston Symphony orchestra, New England's great musical organization, last visited Salem.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WORCESTER
MASSACHUSETTS
GAZETTE
FEB 13 1924

Boston Symphony Orchestra Entertains Lovers of Music

Popular Music Organization Appears Before a Representative Audience in Mechanics Hall in Full Force for the First Time in Several Years

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave a concert last night i Mechanics hall before a large and representative audience of Worceste music lovers.

It was the first performance of the full orchestra here in several years, and the event was a memorable one in the city's musical annals.

To many there is something peculiarly satisfactory about a symphony concert; a completeness and unity about the ensemble of a great body of instruments sending forth its message in a manner that is impossible by any other source. This was especially apparent with the musicians last night, under the conductorship of Pierre Monteux. The first half of the program, presented Beethoven's famous Sventh symphony in four movements. Next to the fifth, by this composer, the seventh in A major, is the best known, and is to many, the more beautiful of the two. From the graceful poco sostenuto of the opening theme it breaks into the familiar strains of the allegretto in a syncopated haunting trend of melody introduced by the first and second violins and carried on by the French horns. Numerous descriptions have been given of this music. Some critics say that it embodies the onward march of fate, others a bridal procession and ceremony leading to the merrymaking music in the last two movements. Like a wonderful landscape vista, analysis is unnecessary; it speaks a different language according to the imagination and appreciation of each person.

Tempo and Rhyt'hm

One can easily understand how Isadora Duncan, the dancer, chose the last two movements of this symphony as best expressing her terpsichorean art. A whirlwind change of mood leaves the audience breathless in following the intricate change of tempo and rhythm. The finale h been called the apothesis of the dan and, according to Wagner, "its ma causes tables, benches, cans a cups, the grandmother, the blind a lame, yea, the children in the crad to fall dancing." The musicia caught the spirit and sent it raci through a fanfare of instruments a brilliant finale.

One of the most difficult inte pretive tone poems ever composed Strauss "Death and Transfiguration was a masterly piece of orchestra tion. It is almost a strain to liste to the wonder and terror of it music, so vividly is the picture drawn. The transitory passages, contrasting, tossing, crashing chords of the earthly conflict with the heavenly visionary peace of the transfiguratio melody was marvelously wrought b the musicians.

"Clouds" and "Festivals"

Tow Debussy nocturnes, "Cloud" and "Festivals" were interesting bit of orchestral coloring. "Clouds" wa an impressionistic shifting of tra sient melodies; "Festivals" was fa tastic and gay, and kept the orche tral members on the qui vive wi its rapid fire change of tempo. fitting climax was the Tannhaus overture. Although perhaps the mo often played of any orchestral num ber, last night's performance stand out unique.

The triumphant glory of the fi pilgrim chorus theme, thrilled with i intensity after the last chord not o in the audience stirred to hurry away, but all remained to applaud again and again as Mr. Monteux with his musicians rose to acknoledge the well merited ovation.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE SALEM
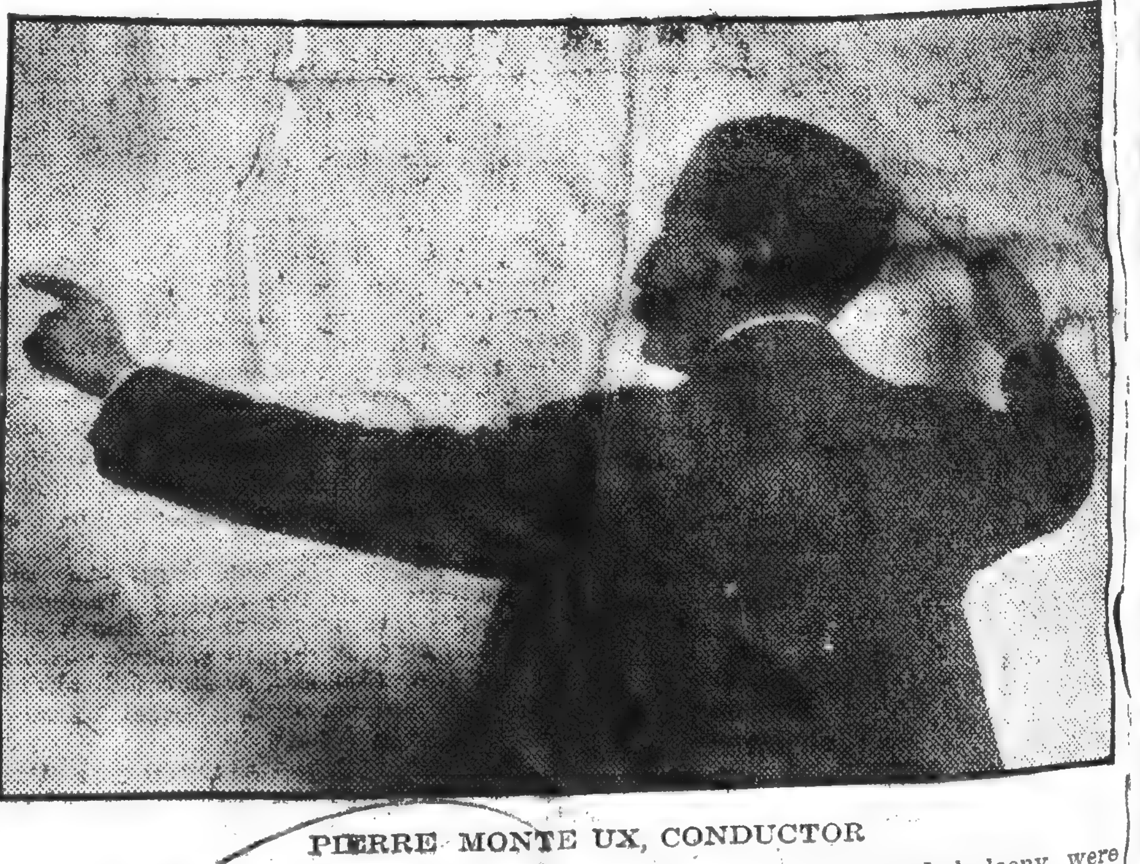
MASS.
NEWS
FEB 1924

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AT EMPIRE THEATRE SUNDAY AFTERNOON



PIERRE MONTEUX, CONDUCTOR

For the first time in a generation the full Boston Symphony orchestra will give a concert in Salem tomorrow afternoon at 3.15 in the Empire theatre. The concert may well be regarded as the leading event in the current musical season.

When first announced the management stated that it was the hope of the orchestra that Salem would show such interest and support of the undertaking that the concert from now on might be made an annual one as is the case in nearly every large New England city.

On this basis it is safe to say that the great orchestra—unbiased critics still say it is the greatest in the world—will come to Salem soon again. For the sale from the very first day has been splendid. This morning the theatre had but very few seats left on the floor. The first balcony was sold out a week ago, and tickets for the second balcony were moving fast.

There seems to be a misunderstanding in some quarters about the second balcony seats. These are sold for $1 and the tax, but some people think that they are merely admission tickets and do not guarantee a seat. It it against the law to sell admission tickets for standing room in a Salem theatre. Any one who buys the tickets is certain to have a seat in the second balcony.

Pierre Monteux, making his farewell tour with the orchestra, will conduct the concert. Edith Thompson, a great local favorite, will be the soloist. Finally a program that has met both popular and instant appeal will be given.

Sunday morning the box office will open at 10 o'clock. Doors will open at 2.30. Reserved seats must be obtained tonight.

[205]

TIGHT BINDING

...hestra ...f Music

...ears Before a ... Mechanics ...Time in Sev-

...oncert last night ... audience of Worces...

...ythm. The finale ... apotheosis of the da... ...g to Wagner, "its m... ...s, benches, can... ...ndmother, the blind ...e children in the cr... ..." The music ...t and sent it ra... ... of instrument... ...nale.

...e most difficult in ... ever compose... ...d Transfigurati... ...piece of orchest... ... a strain to lis... ...nd terror of ... the picture draw... ...ssages, contrastin... ...chords of the earth ...h the heavenly vision ... transfiguration ...arvelously wrought by ...

... and "Festivals"

...sy nocturnes, "Clouds" ...s" were interesting bits ...coloring. "Clouds" was ...nistic shifting of tran- ...es. "Festivals" was fan- ... and kept the orches- ...s on the qui vive with ... change of tempo. A ... was the Tannhauser ...though perhaps the most ... of any orchestral num- ...performance stands

...nt glory of the f'nal ...theme, thrilled with its ... the last chord not one ...nce stirred to hurry ...ll remained to applaud ...again as Mr. Monteux ...icians rose to acknoledge ...rited ovation.

...STRA ...TRE ...RNOON

... balcony were ... misunderstand- ... about the sea- ... are sold fo... some people ... admission ... seat. ... admis- ... om in a ... who buys ... a seat ... his fare- ... will con- ... mpson, a ... the solo- ... at has met ... appeal will ... will ... open ...

CLIPPING FROM THE
WORCESTER
MASS.
~~POST~~
Telegram
FEB 13 1924

MONTEUX GIVES LAST BOW HERE

Distinguished French Musician Leads the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Notable Triumph

BEETHOVEN HAPPILY DONE

Strauss and Wagner Ably Interpreted—"Tannhauser Overture" Well Received by Large Audience

It is conceded that the most nearly perfect instrument for interpreting music is the Symphony orchestra. Given the Boston Symphony orchestra in its present fine mettle, with the program arranged by Conductor Pierre Monteux for last night's concert in Mechanics hall, you have a musical treat seldom offered in Worcester.

The five years that M. Monteux has spent with the Boston orchestra have been unique. Taking it at the lowest musical point of its historical career, he has brought it to a plane as high, if not higher, than has been achieved by any of his predecessors. As a program builder this popular French conductor has always shown great catholicity of taste and has given many contemporary orchestral works their first hearing in this country. In doing this he has not shown favortism to any national school.

The program of last evening contained the happiest of Beethoven's symphonies, the Seventh in A major, which contains in its four movements a carnival of lively rhythms. Throughout the whole of the first movement, after the slow introduction, the listener is carried along by the persistent rhythm as of a galloping horse. In the second, each section of the orchestra sings, in turn, the beautiful suave flowing melody two-part melody. The presto movement paces along with irresistable force and a sure steady rhythm, and the finale is just what it should be, a jubiliant climax to the whole symphony. It seems hardly necessary to say that Monteux and his men gave a performance of this work which was probably as near perfection as any orchestra could attain. There was perfection in technique, but there was by no means lacking a genuine musical feeling which was especially evident in the slower second movement which is one of Bethoven's most tender moments.

Following, came Richard Straus' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration." Practically all the symphonic music composed by Straus is written to a program, in fact he has made the programistic style so much his own that today program music virtually means Richard Strauss's music. His works are extraordinary in many ways. His melodies are very different from melody as the average person understands it. They abound in odd and sometimes ugly turns, in wide jumps impossible to sing and difficult to play, in highly striking and unforgettable rhythms. There is not space for a detailed analysis of the famous German composer's score, which abounds weird and grewsome harmonies descriptive of a dying man in his dismal dimly lighted room. For a time he struggles and fights with death but finally it grips him, and in the orchestra the tom-tam and harp knell the soul's departure. Again did the conductor show splendid control of his able and experienced musicians and in the many changes of rhythm which this score contains he marshaled his forces with complete unanimity.

Of particular interest were the two "Nocturnes" by Debussy, "Clouds" and "Festivals," the former picturing the slow solemn march of the clouds in the sky and the latter full of gay movement and dance rhythms. They proved a very refreshing after the ponderous Strauss number and were given a good reading. This highly enjoyable and rare concert closed with the well known and even popular "Tanhauser Overture," which seems so simple and natural to us nowadays, but which, when Wagner composed it, was dissonant and shocking to all but a few.

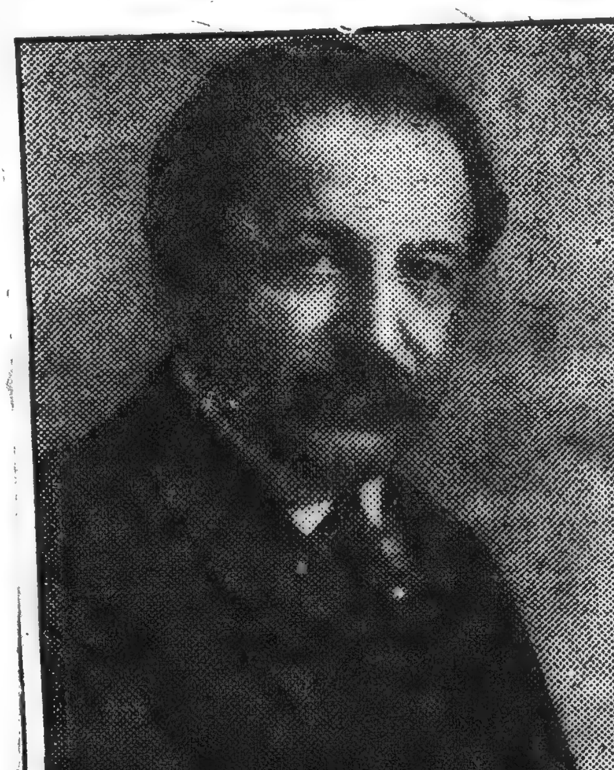
There was a very large audience present which at all times showed keen enjoyment and interest in the work of the splendid men from Huntington avenue and their leader, recalling him several times after each number. All together this was a memorable visit of the orchestra after an absence of three years and dit it doubtless the wish of all those present last evening that no such time shall elapse before its next

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WORCESTER
MASSACHUSETTS
GAZETTE
FEB 9 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY COMING TUESDAY

Famous Orchestra to Give Concert in Evening at Mechanics Hall



PIERRE MONTEAUX
at Mechanics Hall

The famous Boston Symphony orchestra, 104 pieces, Pierre Monteux, conductor, is coming to Worcester, Tuesday night, to give a concert in Mechanics hall at 8.15 o'clock. It will be the final appearance in this city of the conductor, Pierre Monteux, as his five years' contract with the orchestra ends this season. He has brought the organization to a state of perfection that makes it one of the greatest orchestras in the world. The program to be given includes Beethoven's Seventh symphony in A major; Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," Debussey's nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals." The program closes with Wagner's overture from "Tannhauser."

TRANS FEB 16

WEEK-END ROUND OVER BOSTONIAN CONCERT-GIVING

OLD WAYS AND NEW AMONG THE VIOLINISTS

Regret for the Grand Style Vanished—Mr. Chadwick as American Composer Through an Afternoon of His Music—With Reason the People's Orchestra Honors Him—Mme. Sundelius Returns

ONE after another, the renowned violinists of the hour traverse Bostonian cooncert-halls — Mr. Kreisler the other day at the Opera House; Mr. Thibaud with the Symphony Orchestra last Saturday; Mr. Heifetz by himself next Sunday afternoon. There is not a reason to question their titles to note and favor. All three play with adroit command of the finer technique of their instrument, caressing out of it what they—and the composer—will. All three produce a lustrous, silken, supple tone, ever in flowing motion, susceptible to endless modulation and shading—voice to the sensuous song of the violin, voice also to every implication of the chosen music. For these three are musicians as well as violinists. From their hands the composer's measures take shape, progress, character. Through their playing, their minds and spirits reflect and enrich his. It is hard to remember a more nearly perfect performance in kind than Mr. Thibaud's of Lalo's "Spanish Symphony" on Friday and Saturday—unless memory harks back to Mr. Kreisler in Beethoven's Concerto or to Mr. Heifetz in sundry pieces of Bach.

And yet, and yet, it is possible to desire a passion of the violin that not one of these three is minded—or is able—to sound. Not so many years ago, Ysaye in prime traversed these same concert-halls. ... from instrument it was

... to compass it or even to cultivate ... the youngsters—it is said—are warned away, though it tempt them. Upon it has descended the worst of fates. It is out

---

Herald Feb 16

Music for Children's Concerts What Do They Genuinely Enjoy?

HEAVY OR LIGHT?

Orchestral concerts for children are now given in England and in several cities of the United States. The question everywhere is, what do these children really enjoy. The complaint has been made that the programs prepared for the school children in Symphony hall have been of too stiff a nature. Children, according to these observers, care chiefly for compositions in which the rhythm is strongly marked. They are bored by Bach and Mozart; Beethoven leaves them cold; but a piece like "The March to the Scaffold," from the "Fantastic" Symphony of Berlioz, excites them to enthusiasm.

A letter from a correspondent who has heard two children's concerts by the Cleveland Orchestra in that city, led by Arthur Shepherd, the assistant conductor, should interest those concerned with the "musical education" of children.

"I was very much interested in the way Mr. Shepherd took charge. He gave a little talk before the concert, calling attention to the fact that the members of the orchestra could not play well if they talked during the performance, and in the same way the children could not listen well if they talked during the performance. This seemed to appeal to them as a reasonable proposition. Then he went on to speak of the families in the orchestra, wood-wind, strings, etc., and he asked the children (the big hall was full) if any of them could give the names of the wood-wind instruments. A number held up their hands and he asked one, who named them all but a double bassoon. Then he got the leader of each wood-wind set to stand up and show his instrument and play a little phrase on it, so that the children all had the opportunity of discriminating between the sounds of the various instruments. Then he told them about the 'Midsummer Night's Dream' overture which was to be played, and asked them to listen for the instruments which had been played to them. The whole thing was a very interesting and good combination of instruction and pleasure. Before the last number he gave the children the opportunity of singing 'America the Beautiful' with the orchestra, and it was really very well done and made the children feel that they were a part of the performance. A friend of mine happened to be in a car with a lot of children who had just come from the Boston children's Symphony concert, and she said the children were skylarking and acting as though they had just been let out of school. That first program of the children's concert in Boston seemed to me rather heavy for the children, whereas the Cleveland concert was distinctly light and thoroughly enjoyable from their standpoint. They were still as mice and evidently were not bored. The orchestra was the full Cleveland Orchestra, which is very good, though not up to our standards."

Now what were these Cleveland programs? That of the first comprised the overture and "America the Beautiful," mentioned by our correspondent; five dances from Tchaikovsky's "Nut-Cracker"; Suite, The Dance of the Happy Spirits, from Gluck's "Orpheus," and two of Dvorak's Slavonic dances.

The program of the third was as follows: "Roman Carnival" overture, Berlioz; March of the Dwarfs from Grieg's "Lyric Suite'; the Allegretto con moto from one of Mozart's piano concertos, two movements from Ippolitov-Ivanov's Caucasian sketches, and, for singing, the "Battle Hymn of the Republic."

At Edinburgh three concerts for schoo children have been given by an orches tra of about 30 players. The average at tendance at each concert was abou 2000. Next season there will be fo concerts, the orchestra will number and the price of admission will be sev pence.

At the first concert the program i cluded Boccherini's Minuet for t strings; the "Pizzicato" from "Sylvia Gounod's "March of a Marionette" a the overture to "Oberon." At the secc "The Londonderry air from Stanfor "Irish Rhapsody," Walford Davie "Solemn Melody" for strings and or Minuet and trio from one of Moza Divertimentos; the Scherzo from Be hoven's Second Symphony, and Elge "Pomp and Circumstance" No. 1, w played.

On the back of each program wa short description of the constitutior the orchestra, its division into stri wood-wind, brass and percussion. description was illustrated.

As a supplement to these conc there was a young people's holi concert by the Scottish orchestra, strength, led by Sir Landon Ron The program was an excellent Mendelssohn's overture to "Ruy Bl Massenet's "Scenes Pittoresqu Weber's "Invitation to the Wal Sibelius's "Valse Triste," Jarnef Praeludium, Saint-Saen's "Sw Dvorak's Humoresque, Tchaikovs "Nutcracker," Suite and the Ma from "The Prophet."

A concert that would give pleas

in Symphony Hall even on a Friday afternoon or Saturday evening in the regular subscription course.

THE SYMPHONY AUDIENCE

To the Editor of The Herald:

Will you allow me the use of your columns to unburden myself on something which seems to me of importance in regard to standards and sound judgment, especially in the field of music? Much is said nowadays of relativity, but isn't this principle possibly overworked? If everything is relative and everything is more or less as good as the next thing, how are standards ever to be established? As every one knows, the directors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are making an eloquent and, it seems to the writer, a convincing appeal for a guaranty fund so that the Symphony Orchestra for the following season may be kept up on the same high plane as heretofore. Yet, notwithstanding the brilliant rendering of symphonic works, which, in the opinion of people qualified to know, have been given the public this winter, and notwithstanding the superb conducting of Pierre Monteux many people are still backward in doing their plain duty in helping to provide funds for the maintenance of the orchestra. It has been the good for une of the writer to have heard many imes during the last 40 years all the amous conductors and all the leading rchestras of the world, and it is hereby tated without hesitation on his par hat the recent performances by the or hestra of the Brahms Symphony and the Strauss Symphonic Poem were a ne as could be heard anywhere in the orld, both in the clear and brilliant rformance by the members of the or estra and in the inspiring conducting of Mr. Monteux.

HER FEB 17

It should be recognized that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is one of the leading orchestras of the world and that very few such organizations can even compare with it. It is certainly one of the glories of Boston and of America, and how any citizen with any civic pride whatsoever can afford to miss an opportunity of lending support passes understanding. Let us throw overboard all such prejudiced remarks that the orchestra is of no account because it is not led by a German conductor and recognize and back up a fine thing when we hear it.

There is far too much of the American slogan of "I know what I like," but this statement, if it is to settle anything, surely depends on the knowledge of the knower. It is a free world and everybody is entitled to like what pleases him, but those dogmatic people who think that their likes contain a definite standard of taste might well be reminded of James Russell Lowell's epigram: "The right to be a cussed fool is safe from all devices human." As an indication of how little the public is really qualified to judge of orchestral performance or interpretation, I submit the following test: If the Boston Symphony Orchestra were asked to play any standard work of Beethoven, Wagner, Mozart, Brahms, etc., and if the work were played in succession by six of the leading conductors of the world, a screen being placed before the orchestra so that no one could see who was conducting, I submit that this would result: There would be very, very slight difference in any of the renditions, and I do not believe that even 5 per cent. of the professional musicians, that is, men with fine ears and with comprehensive knowledge of symphonic literature and performance, could tell which conductor was the interpreter at any given time. WALTER R. SPALDING

Cambridge.

[206]

TRANS FEB 16

CLASSIC OVERTURE, FADED TONE-POEM, AMERICAN HUMORS

LALO AND THIBAUD IN MATCHED PERFECTIONS

Varied Pleasure at the Symphony Concert—Waning Chaikovsky—Gluck Undimmed—Lewis Carroll's Inventions in Deems Taylor's Tones—Sentimental Pitfalls

NOTHING seemed more significant at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon than the gentle patter of scattered applause descending upon Chaikovsky's Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet." True it was the final item of a longish programme; but even the audience of Friday has been known to linger, clapping a piece that pleased it. As it was, a few hands stirred here; a few there; and only by palpable effort—and some readiness on his part—was Mr. Monteux brought back to the stage. Indeed, Mr. Bliss's recent and resented "Color Symphony" was quite as warmly applauded. Repetition may hardly have staled Chaikowsky's music, since it has been heard but thrice in twelve years at the Symphony Concerts. Nor did performance flag, since many a measure stirred the conductor's dramatizing temperament or put the orchestra to its mettle. Play the Fourth, the Fifth or the Sixth Symphony of Chaikovsky and audiences at Symphony Hall receive it warmly. Return to his Fantasias—say "Romeo and Juliet" or "Francesca da Rimini"—and cool and scanty are the plaudits.

Yet most of us remember days in which these two musics passed for masterpieces; when they excited hearers, stirring eager applause and fervid comment. Then it was the custom to praise the tumults in Chaikovsky's tonal Verona; to thrill to his motiv and measures of love and fate, to follow closely the course of this "Romeo and Juliet," to set it high for invention and facture. Yesterday, Mr. Monteux's orchestra flung out the same furies; repeated the like amorous ardors; renewed the old measures of lamentation. Yet there was no sign of a quickened audience and only the trickle of applause. In music as elsewhere, the times change, and we change with them, hardly noting the process, quite unable to analyze the consequences. Once upon a time Chaikovsky's tumults filled the ear. Now they sound artificial and hollow. Within memory the pages of love and lament fired the imagination. Now they seem faded, remote, passionless, mere music-making to a programme. The accounting is not easy; yet the fact—and a paradox—remain. Out of the three current and applauded Symphonies of Chaikovsky drips the morbid self-consciousness, flares the hysterical self-confession, with which he is usually reproached and belittled. In comparison, "Romeo and Juliet" and "Francesca" are detached, objective pieces. And they are vanishing; while the Symphonies keep lasting place.

If time sifts and thins music, yet may it also affirm and deepen it. A hundred and fifty years ago next April, a first audience in the Opera House at Paris listened to the Overture to Gluck's music-drama, "Iphigenia in Aulis," and forthwith divided sharply in praise or blame. In 1924, it still persists in the concert-hall and none questions either matter or method. The foolish pedant who declared in our eighties that Franck's Symphony was no symphony, must have been lineal descendant of those who, in an earlier Paris, averred that Gluck's Overture was no overture. Enough for us nowadays, that the form seems to take shape and course from his thought and purpose, to bear the musical substance, emotion and imaginings with which he would charge it. Here are measures to summon the gentle maidenhood, the wistful submission of Iphigenia led to sacrificial doom. Now pass the black-browed kings who so condemned her. There Clytemnestra sorrows for her daughter. Again, and the music sighs with the pity of these fates.

Upon a few pages is unrolled the ancient legend, the old tragedy; while out of it Gluck distills into tones the essence of the emotion. For he is writing no measures of programmed suggestion; only measures that shall outbreathe the scope and the spirit of his tragedy. The means seem simple; the methods bare; yet as truly has he written a tender music of pity, a lofty music of fate as though he were luxuriating in the panoply of a Wagner or a Strauss. It is good to return to these simplicities, economics and austerities, to these old secrets of shading, transition

Inching Along

Slight Increase Through the Week of the Guarantee Fund for the Symphony Orchestra

BY no more than $365 has the fund risen in the past week to meet the deficit for the current season in the operation of the Symphony Concerts. Dr. and Mrs. Henry Carmichael; Mr. and Mrs. [illegible] D. Latimer; Charles F. Sampson; and a contributor "in Memory of Albert van Raalte," the violinist, were the subscribers of this sum. The Guarantee Fund now stands at $79,358.34 out of a desired and necessary $95,000. The Endowment Fund, likewise, sticks fast at $156,349.02. A list printed in the programme-book for the current week names nearly 300 contributors to it.

TIGHT BINDING

chestra
f Music

pears Before a Mechanics
Time in Sev-

oncert last night audience of Worces

ythm. The finale apotheosis of the da g to Wagner, "its m s, benches, cans nother, the blind children in the cr
The music and sent it ra of instrument nal
most difficult in ever compose Transfigurati piece of orchest a strain to lis terror of in the picture draw passages, contrastin chords of the earth
the heavenly vision transfiguration marvelously wrought by

"Festivals"

nocturnes, "Clouds" were interesting bits coloring. "Clouds" was shifting of tran
"Festivals" was fan
and kept the orches on the qui vive with change of tempo. A was the Tannhauser though perhaps the most of any orchestral num performance stands

glory of the final theme, thrilled with its
the last chord not one stirred to hurry remained to applaud again as Mr. Monteux
icians rose to acknoledge rited ovation.

STRA
TRE RNOON

balcony were misunderstand-about the sea-

CLIPPING FROM THE
WORCESTER
MASS.
POST
FEB 13 1924

MONTEUX GIVES LAST BOW HERE

Distinguished French Musician Leads the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Notable Triumph

BEETHOVEN HAPPILY DONE

Straus and Wagner Ably Interpreted—"Tannhauser Overture" Well Received by Large Audience

It is conceded that the most nearly perfect instrument for interpreting music is the Symphony orchestra. Given the Boston Symphony orchestra in its present fine mettle, with the program arranged by Conductor Pierre Monteux for last night's concert in Mechanics hall, you have a musical treat seldom offered in Worcester.

The five years that M. Monteux has spent with the Boston orchestra have been unique. Taking it at the lowest musical point of its historical career, he has brought it to a plane as high, if not higher, than has been achieved by any of his predecessors. As a program builder this popular French conductor has always shown great catholicity of taste and has given many contemporary orchestral works their first hearing in this country. In doing this he has not shown favortism to any national school.

The program of last evening contained the happiest of Beethoven's symphonies, the Seventh in A major, which contains in its four movements a carnival of lively rhythms. Throughout the whole of the first movement, after the slow introduction, the listener is carried along by the persistent rhythm as of a galloping horse. In the second, each section of the orchestra sings, in turn, the beautiful suave flowing melody two-part melody. The presto movement paces along with irresistable force and a sure steady rhythm, and the finale is just what it should be, a jubiliant climax to the whole symphony. It seems hardly necessary to say that Monteux and his men gave a performance of this work which was probably as near perfection as any orchestra could attain. There was perfection in technique, but there was by no means lacking a genuine musical feeling which was especially evident in the slower second movement which is one of Bethoven's most tender moments.

Following, came Richard Straus' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration." Practically all the symphonic music composed by Straus is written to a program, in fact he has made the programistic style so much his own that today program music virtually means Richard Strauss's music. His works are extraordinary in many ways. His melodies are very different from melody as the average person understands it. They abound in odd and sometimes ugly turns, in wide jumps impossible to sing and difficult to play, in highly striking and unforgettable rhythms. There is not space for a detailed analysis of the famous German composer's score, which abounds weird and grewsome harmonies descriptive of a dying man in his dismal dimly lighted room. For a time he struggles and fights with death but finally it grips him, and in the orchestra the tom-tam and harp knell the soul's departure. Again did the conductor show splendid control of his able and experienced musicians and in the many changes of rhythm which this score contains he marshaled his forces with complete unanimity.

Of particular interest were the two "Nocturnes" by Debussy, "Clouds" and "Festivals," the former picturing the slow solemn march of the clouds in the sky and the latter full of gay movement and dance rhythms. They proved a very refreshing after the ponderous Strauss number and were given a good reading. This highly enjoyable and rare concert closed with the well known and even popular "Tanhauser Overture," which seems so simple and natural to us nowadays, but which, when Wagner composed it, was dissonant and shocking to all but a few.

There was a very large audience present which at all times showed keen enjoyment and interest in the work of the splendid men from Huntington avenue and their leader, recalling him several times after each number. All together this was a memorable visit of the orchestra after an absence of three years and dit it doubtless the wish of all those present last evening that no such time shall elapse before its next

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WORCESTER
MASSACHUSETTS
GAZETTE
FEB 9 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY COMING TUESDAY

Famous Orchestra to Give Concert in Evening at Mechanics Hall

PIERRE MONTEAUX
at Mechanics Hall

The famous Boston Symphony orchestra, 104 pieces, Pierre Monteux, conductor, is coming to Worcester, Tuesday night, to give a concert in Mechanics hall at 8.15 o'clock. It will be the final appearance in this city of the conductor, Pierre Monteux, as his five years' contract with the orchestra ends this season. He has brought the organization to a state of perfection that makes it one of the greatest orchestras in the world. The program to be given includes Beethoven's Seventh symphony in A major; Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," Debussey's nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals." The program closes with Wagner's overture from "Tannhauser."

TRANS FEB 16

WEEK-END ROUND OVER BOSTONIAN CONCERT-GIVING

OLD WAYS AND NEW AMONG THE VIOLINISTS

Regret for the Grand Style Vanished—Mr. Chadwick as American Composer Through an Afternoon of His Music—With Reason the People's Orchestra Honors Him—Mme. Sundelius Returns

ONE after another, the renowned violinists of the hour traverse Bostonian cooncert-halls—Mr. Kreisler the other day at the Opera House; Mr. Thibaud with the Symphony Orchestra last Saturday; Mr. Heifetz by himself next Sunday afternoon. There is not a reason to question their titles to note and favor. All three play with adroit command of the finer technique of their instrument, caressing out of it what they—and the composer—will. All three produce a lustrous, silken, supple tone, ever in flowing motion, susceptible to endless modulation and shading—voice to the sensuous song of the violin, voice also to every implication of the chosen music. For these three are musicians as well as violinists. From their hands the composer's measures take shape, progress, character. Through their playing, their minds and spirits reflect and enrich his. It is hard to remember a more nearly perfect performance in kind than Mr. Thibaud's of Lalo's "Spanish Symphony" on Friday and Saturday—unless memory harks back to Mr. Kreisler in Beethoven's Concerto or to Mr. Heifetz in sundry pieces of Bach.

And yet, and yet, it is possible to desire a passion of the violin that not one of these three is minded—or is able—to sound. Not so many years ago, Ysaye in prime traversed these same concert-halls. From music and from instrument it was his custom to draw great sweeps or gusts of tone; to make phrases flash and periods flame; to bear the piece in hand from power to power, from magnificence to magnificence. Fervent was this playing and lofty; within it composer, violinist and audience were veritably exalted. The single voice of the violin became as the sound of many voices. A "noble rage," as the old poets named such passion, seemed to possess the violinist. In a musical might, upon an instrument transfigured, outpoured the great body, mind and heart of Eugène Ysaye. "The grand style" went the phrase for this playing. Now there is no violinist to compass it or even to cultivate it. For the youngsters—it is said—are warned away, though it tempt them. Upon it has descended the weight of fates. It is out

---

Herald Feb 16

Music for Children's Concerts What Do They Genuinely Enjoy?

HEAVY OR LIGHT?

Orchestral concerts for children are now given in England and in several cities of the United States. The question everywhere is, what do these children really enjoy. The complaint has been made that the programs prepared for the school children in Symphony hall have been of too stiff a nature. Children, according to these observers, care chiefly for compositions in which the rhythm is strongly marked. They are bored by Bach and Mozart; Beethoven leaves them cold; but a piece like "The March to the Scaffold," from the "Fantastic" Symphony of Berlioz, excites them to enthusiasm.

A letter from a correspondent who has heard two children's concerts by the Cleveland Orchestra in that city, led by Arthur Shepherd, the assistant conductor, should interest those concerned with the "musical education" of children.

"I was very much interested in the way Mr. Shepherd took charge. He gave a little talk before the concert, calling attention to the fact that the members of the orchestra could not play well if they talked during the performance, and in the same way the children could not listen well if they talked during the performance. This seemed to appeal to them as a reasonable proposition. Then he went on to speak of the families in the orchestra, wood-wind, strings, etc., and he asked the children (the big hall was full) if any of them could give the names of the wood-wind instruments. A number held up their hands and he asked one, who named them all but a double bassoon. Then he got the leader of each wood-wind set to stand up and show his instrument and play a little phrase on it, so that the children all had the opportunity of discriminating between the sounds of the various instruments. Then he told them about the 'Midsummer Night's Dream' overture which was to be played, and asked them to listen for the instruments which had been played to them. The whole thing was a very interesting and good combination of instruction and pleasure. Before the last number he gave the children the opportunity of singing 'America the Beautiful' with the orchestra, and it was really very well done and made the children feel that they were a part of the performance. A friend of mine happened to be in a car with a lot of children who had just come from the Boston children's Symphony concert, and she said the children were skylarking and acting as though they had just been let out of school. That first program of the children's concert in Boston seemed to me rather heavy for the children, whereas the Cleveland concert was distinctly light and thoroughly enjoyable from their standpoint. They were still as mice and evidently were not bored. The orchestra was the full Cleveland Orchestra, which is very good, though not up to our standards."

Now what were these Cleveland programs? That of the first comprised the overture and "America the Beautiful," mentioned by our correspondent; five dances from Tchaikovsky's "Nut-Cracker"; Suite, The Dance of the Happy Spirits, from Gluck's "Orpheus," and two of Dvorak's Slavonic dances.

The program of the third was as follows: "Roman Carnival" overture, Berlioz; March of the Dwarfs from Grieg's "Lyric Suite'; the Allegretto con moto from one of Mozart's piano concertos, two movements from Ippolitov-Ivanov's Caucasian sketches, and, for singing, the "Battle Hymn of the Republic."

At Edinburgh three concerts for schoo children have been given by an orches tra of about 30 players. The average at tendance at each concert was abou 2000. Next season there will be fo concerts, the orchestra will number and the price of admission will be sev pence.

At the first concert the program i cluded Boccherini's Minuet for t strings; the "Pizzicato" from "Sylvia Gounod's "March of a Marionette" a the overture to "Oberon." At the secc "The Londonderry air from Stanfor "Irish Rhapsody," Walford Davie "Solemn Melody" for strings and org Minuet and trio from one of Moza Divertimentos; the Scherzo from Be hoven's Second Symphony, and Elge "Pomp and Circumstance" No. 1, w played.

On the back of each program wa short description of the constitution the orchestra, its division into stri wood-wind, brass and percussion. description was illustrated.

As a supplement to these conc there was a young people's holi concert by the Scottish orchestra, strength, led by Sir Landon Ron The program was an excellent Mendelssohn's overture to "Ruy Bl Massenet's "Scenes Pittoresqu Weber's "Invitation to the Wal Sibelius's "Valse Triste," Jarnef Praeludium, Saint-Saen's "Sw Dvorak's Humoresque, Tchaikovs "Nutcracker," Suite and the Ma from "The Prophet."

A concert that would give pleas

in Symphony Hall even on a Friday afternoon or Saturday evening in the regular subscription course.

HERALD FEB 17

rchestra. It has been the good fortune of the writer to have heard many imes during the last 40 years all the amous conductors and all the leading rchestras of the world, and it is hereby tated without hesitation on his part hat the recent performances by the orhestra of the Brahms Symphony and the Strauss Symphonic Poem were as ne as could be heard anywhere in the orld, both in the clear and brilliant rformance by the members of the orcestra and in the inspiring conducting of Mr. Monteux.

It should be recognized that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is one of the leading orchestras of the world and that very few such organizations can even compare with it. It is certainly one of the glories of Boston and of America, and how any citizen with any civic pride whatsoever can afford to miss an opportunity of lending support passes understanding. Let us throw overboard all such prejudiced remarks that the orchestra is of no account because it is not led by a German conductor and recognize and back up a fine thing when we hear it.

There is far too much of the American slogan of "I know what I like," but this statement, if it is to settle anything, surely depends on the knowledge of the knower. It is a free world and everybody is entitled to like what pleases him, but those dogmatic people who think that their likes contain a definite standard of taste might well be reminded of James Russell Lowell's epigram: "The right to be a cussed fool is safe from all devices human." As an indication of how little the public is really qualified to judge of orchestral performance or interpretation, I submit the following test: If the Boston Symphony Orchestra were asked to play any standard work of Beethoven, Wagner, Mozart, Brahms, etc., and if the work were played in succession by six of the leading conductors of the world, a screen being placed before the orchestra so that no

---

TRANS FEB 16

CLASSIC OVERTURE, FADED TONE-POEM, AMERICAN HUMORS

LALO AND THIBAUD IN MATCHED PERFECTIONS

Varied Pleasure at the Symphony Concert—Waning Chaikovsky—Gluck Undimmed—Lewis Carroll's Inventions in Deems Taylor's Tones—Sentimental Pitfalls

NOTHING seemed more significant at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon than the gentle patter of scattered applause descending upon Chaikovsky's Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet." True it was the final item of a longish programme; but even the audience of Friday has been known to linger, clapping a piece that pleased it. As it was, a few hands stirred here; a few there; and only by palpable effort—and some readiness on his part—was Mr. Monteux brought back to the stage. Indeed, Mr. Bliss's recent and resented "Color Symphony" was quite as warmly applauded. Repetition may hardly have staled Chaikowsky's music, since it has been heard but thrice in twelve years at the Symphony Concerts. Nor did performance flag, since many a measure stirred the conductor's dramatizing temperament or put the orchestra to its mettle. Play the Fourth, the Fifth or the Sixth Symphony of Chaikovsky and audiences at Symphony Hall receive it warmly. Return to his Fantasias—say "Romeo and Juliet" or "Francesca da Rimini"—and cool and scanty are the plaudits.

Yet most of us remember days in which these two musics passed for masterpieces; when they excited hearers, stirring eager applause and fervid comment. Then it was the custom to praise the tumults in Chaikovsky's tonal Verona; to thrill to his motiv and measures of love and fate, to follow closely the course of this "Romeo and Juliet," to set it high for invention and facture. Yesterday, Mr. Monteux's orchestra flung out the same furies; repeated the like amorous ardors; renewed the old measures of lamentation. Yet there was no sign of a quickened audience and only the trickle of applause. In music as elsewhere, the times change, and we change with them, hardly noting the process, quite unable to analyze the consequences. Once upon a time Chaikovsky's tumults filled the ear. Now they sound artificial and hollow. Within memory the pages of love and lament fired the imagination. Now they seem faded, remote, passionless, mere music-making to a programme. The accounting is not easy; yet the fact—and a paradox—remain. Out of the three current and applauded Symphonies of Chaikovsky drips the morbid self-consciousness, flares the hysterical self-confession, with which he is usually reproached and belittled. In comparison, "Romeo and Juliet" and "Francesca" are detached, objective pieces. And they are vanishing; while the Symphonies keep lasting place.

If time sifts and thins music, yet may it also affirm and deepen it. A hundred and fifty years ago next April, a first audience in the Opera House at Paris listened to the Overture to Gluck's music-drama, "Iphigenia in Aulis," and forthwith divided sharply in praise or blame. In 1924, it still persists in the concert-hall and none questions either matter or method. The foolish pedant who declared in our eighties that Franck's Symphony was no symphony, must have been lineal descendant of those who, in an earlier Paris, averred that Gluck's Overture was no overture. Enough for us nowadays, that the form seems to take shape and course from his thought and to bear the musical substance, imaginings with which he it. Here are measures to gentle maidenhood, the wist of Iphigenia led to sacrifi pass the black-browed kings nned her. There Clytemnes r her daughter. Again, and with the pity of these fates. pages is unrolled the ancient tragedy; while out of it nto tones the essence of the e is writing no measures of ggestion; only measures eathe the scope and the gedy. The means seem sim, the methods bare; yet as truly has he written a tender music of pity, a lofty music of fate as though he were luxuriating in the panoply of a Wagner or a Strauss. It is good to return to these simplicities, economics and austerities, to these old secrets of shading, transition

Inching Along

Slight Increase Through the Week of the Guarantee Fund for the Symphony Orchestra

BY no more than $365 has the fund risen in the past week to meet the deficit for the current season in the operation of the Symphony Concerts. Dr. and Mrs. Henry Carmichael; Mr. and Mrs. D. Latimer; Charles F. Sampson; and a contributor "in Memory of Albert van Raalte," the violinist, were the subscribers of this sum. The Guarantee Fund now stands at $79,358.34 out of a desired and necessary $95,000. The Endowment Fund, likewise, sticks fast at $156,349.02. A list printed in the programme-book for the current week names nearly 300 contributors to it.

of Best Tint, Holland and Opaque Quality (Not Our Standard Color Line)
e to Measurements, 3'x6'—Guaranteed Rollers TANDARD COLORS, $1.32 each WN SHADE & SCREEN CO.
44 Sudbury St., Boston, Mass.

TIGHT BINDING

Orchestra
…ts of Music

…n Appears Before a …ce in Mechanics …e First Time in Sev-…

…ave a concert last night …ssive audience of Worcest…

…and rhythm. The finale h… …ed the apothesis of the da… …ording to Wagner, "its ma… …tables, benches, cans … …e grandmother, the blind … …the children in the cra… …dancing." The musici… …the spirit and sent it raci… a fanfare of instruments … …nt finale.

…of the most difficult int… tone poems ever composed— "Death and Transfiguration" …masterly piece of orchestr… …is almost a strain to liste… wonder and terror of its … so vividly is the picture drawn. …ansitory passages, contrasting …, crashing chords of the earth… …flict with the heavenly vision… …eace of the transfiguratio… …y was marvelously wrought by… …usicians.

"Clouds" and "Festivals"

Debussy nocturnes, "Clouds" …Festivals" were interesting bits …hestral coloring. "Clouds" was …pressionistic shifting of tran… melodies; "Festivals" was fan… and gay, and kept the orches… …embers on the qui vive with …pid fire change of tempo. A … climax was the Tannhauser …re. Although perhaps the most …played of any orchestral num… …st night's performance stands …ique.

…triumphant glory of the final … chorus theme, thrilled with its …y after the last chord not one … audience stirred to hurry … but all remained to applaud … and again as Mr. Monteux …s musicians rose to acknoledge …ll merited ovation.

…IESTRA
…EATRE
…ERNOON

…cond balcony were …

…e a misunderstand… …ers about the sec… These are sold for …but some people …merely admission …guarantee a seat. … to sell admis… …ding room in a …one who buys … to have a seat …

…taking his fare… …chestra, will con… …dith Thompson, a … will be the solo… …am that has met …stant appeal will …

…e box office will … Doors will open …ts must be ob…

…IPPING FROM THE
WORCESTER
MASS.
POST

FEB 15 1924

…NTEUX GIVES …ST BOW HERE

…nguished French …sician Leads the Bos… Symphy Orchestra to …otable Triumph

…THOVEN … HAPPILY DONE

…s and Wagner Ably …erpreted—"Tann…user Overture" Well …eceived by Large …udience

…is conceded that the most nearly …ect instrument for interpreting …sic is the Symphony orchestra. …en the Boston Symphony orches… in its present fine mettle, with … program arranged by Conductor …r Monteux for last night's con…t in Mechanics hall, you have a …sical treat seldom offered in Wor…ter.

The five years that M. Monteux has …nt with the Boston orchestra have …en unique. Taking it at the low… musical point of its historical …reer, he has brought it to a plane … high, if not higher, than has been …hieved by any of his predecessors. … a program builder this popu… …rench conductor has always shown …reat catholicity of taste and has …iven many contemporary orchestral …orks their first hearing in this …ountry. In doing this he has not …hown favortism to any national …chool.

The program of last evening contained the happiest of Beethoven's symphonies, the Seventh in A major, which contains in its four movements a carnival of lively rhythms. Throughout the whole of the first movement, after the slow introduction, the listener is carried along by the persistent rhythm as of a galloping horse. In the second, each section of the orchestra sings, in turn, the beautiful suave flowing melody two-part melody. The presto movement paces along with irresistable force and a sure steady rhythm, and the finale is just what it should be, a jubiliant climax to the whole symphony. It seems hardly necessary to say that Monteux and his men gave a performance of this work which was probably as near perfection as any orchestra could attain. There was perfection in technique, but there was by no means lacking a genuine musical feeling which was especially evident in the slower second movement which is one of Bethoven's most tender moments.

Following, came Richard Straus' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration." Practically all the symphonic music composed by Straus is written to a program, in fact he has made the programistic style so much his own that today program music virtually means Richard Strauss's music. His works are extraordinary in many ways. His melodies are very different from melody as the average person understands it. They abound in odd and sometimes ugly turns, in wide jumps impossible to sing and difficult to play, in highly striking and unforgettable rhythms. There is not space for a detailed analysis of the famous German composer's score, which abounds weird and grewsome harmonies descriptive of a dying man in his dismal dimly lighted room. For a time he struggles and fights with death but finally it grips him, and in the orchestra the tom-tam and harp knell the soul's departure. Again did the conductor show splendid control of his able and experienced musicians and in the many changes of rhythm which this score contains he marshaled his forces with complete unanimity.

Of particular interest were the two "Nocturnes" by Debussy, "Clouds" and "Festivals," the former picturing the slow solemn march of the clouds in the sky and the latter full of gay movement and dance rhythms. They proved a very refreshing after the ponderous Strauss number and were given a good reading. This highly enjoyable and rare concert closed with the well known and even popular "Tanhauser Overture," which seems so simple and natural to us nowadays, but which, when Wagner composed it, was dissonant and shocking to all but a few.

There was a very large audience present which at all times showed keen enjoyment and interest in the work of the splendid men from Huntington avenue and their leader, recalling him several times after each number. All together this was a memorable visit of the orchestra after an absence of three years and dit it doubtless the wish of all those present last evening that no such time shall elapse before its next

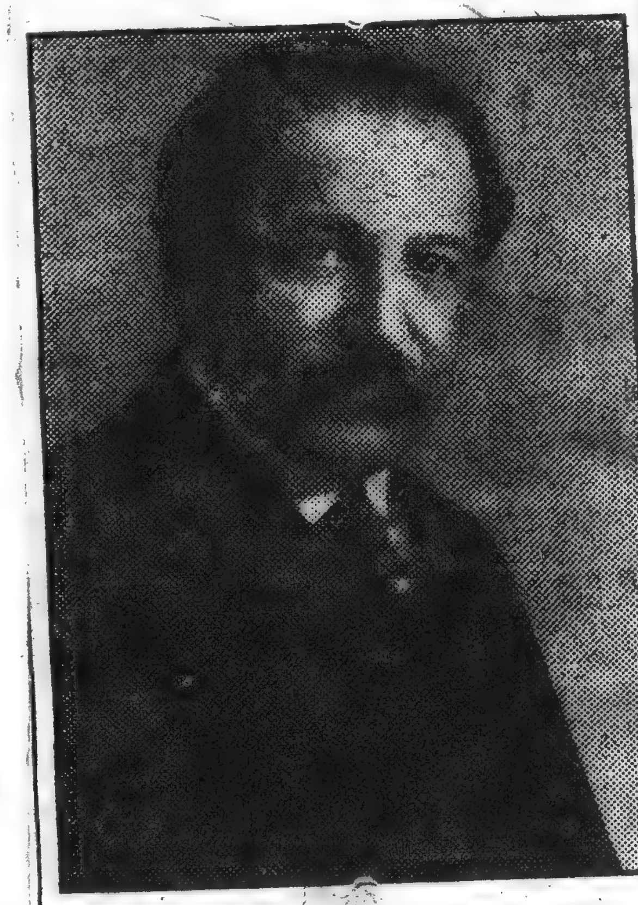
---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WORCESTER
MASSACHUSETTS
GAZETTE

FEB 9 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY COMING TUESDAY

Famous Orchestra to Give Concert in Evening at Mechanics Hall



PIERRE MONTEAUX
at Mechanics Hall

The famous Boston Symphony orchestra, 104 pieces, Pierre Monteux, conductor, is coming to Worcester, Tuesday night, to give a concert in Mechanics hall at 8.15 o'clock. It will be the final appearance in this city of the conductor, Pierre Monteux, as his five years' contract with the orchestra ends this season. He has brought the organization to a state of perfection that makes it one of the greatest orchestras in the world. The program to be given includes Beethoven's Seventh symphony in A major; Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," Debussey's nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals." The program closes with Wagner's overture from "Tannhauser."

TRANSFER 16

WEEK-END ROUND OVER BOSTONIAN CONCERT-GIVING

OLD WAYS AND NEW AMONG THE VIOLINISTS

Regret for the Grand Style Vanished—Mr. Chadwick as American Composer Through an Afternoon of His Music—With Reason the People's Orchestra Honors Him—Mme. Sundelius Returns

ONE after another, the renowned violinists of the hour traverse Bostonian cooncert-halls—Mr. Kreisler the other day at the Opera House; Mr. Thibaud with the Symphony Orchestra last Saturday; Mr. Heifetz by himself next Sunday afternoon. There is not a reason to question their titles to note and favor. All three play with adroit command of the finer technique of their instrument, caressing out of it what they—and the composer—will. All three produce a lustrous, silken, supple tone, ever in flowing motion, susceptible to endless modulation and shading—voice to the sensuous song of the violin, voice also to every implication of the chosen music. For these three are musicians as well as violinists. From their hands the composer's measures take shape, progress, character. Through their playing, their minds and spirits reflect and enrich his. It is hard to remember a more nearly perfect performance in kind than Mr. Thibaud's of Lalo's "Spanish Symphony" on Friday and Saturday—unless memory harks back to Mr. Kreisler in Beethoven's Concerto or to Mr. Heifetz in sundry pieces of Bach.

And yet, and yet, it is possible to desire a passion of the violin that not one of these three is minded—or is able—to sound. Not so many years ago, Ysaye in prime traversed these same concert-halls. From music and from instrument it was his custom to draw great sweeps or gusts of tone; to make phrases flash and periods flame; to bear the piece in hand from power to power, from magnificence to magnificence. Fervent was this playing and lofty; within it composer, violinist and audience were veritably exalted. The single voice of the violin became as the sound of many voices. A "noble rage," as the old poets named such passion, seemed to possess the violinist. In a musical might, upon an instrument transfigured, outpoured the great body, mind and heart of Eugène Ysaye. "The grand style" went the phrase for this playing. Now there is no violinist to compass it or even to cultivate it. For the youngsters—it is said—are warned away, though it tempt them. Upon it has descended the … of fates. It is out

---

Herald Feb 16

Music for Children's Concerts
What Do They Genuinely Enjoy?

HEAVY OR LIGHT?

Orchestral concerts for children are now given in England and in several cities of the United States. The question everywhere is, what do these children really enjoy. The complaint has been made that the programs prepared for the school children in Symphony hall have been of too stiff a nature. Children, according to these observers, care chiefly for compositions in which the rhythm is strongly marked. They are bored by Bach and Mozart; Beethoven leaves them cold; but a piece like "The March to the Scaffold," from the "Fantastic" Symphony of Berlioz, excites them to enthusiasm.

A letter from a correspondent who has heard two children's concerts by the Cleveland Orchestra in that city, led by Arthur Shepherd, the assistant conductor, should interest those concerned with the "musical education" of children.

"I was very much interested in the way Mr. Shepherd took charge. He gave a little talk before the concert, calling attention to the fact that the members of the orchestra could not play well if they talked during the performance, and in the same way the children could not listen well if they talked during the performance. This seemed to appeal to them as a reasonable proposition. Then he went on to speak of the families in the orchestra, wood-wind, strings, etc., and he asked the children (the big hall was full) if any of them could give the names of the wood-wind instruments. A number held up their hands and he asked one, who named them all but a double bassoon. Then he got the leader of each wood-wind set to stand up and show his instrument and play a little phrase on it, so that the children all had the opportunity of discriminating between the sounds of the various instruments. Then he told them about the 'Midsummer Night's Dream' overture which was to be played, and asked them to listen for the instruments which had been played to them. The whole thing was a very interesting and good combination of instruction and pleasure. Before the last number he gave the children the opportunity of singing 'America the Beautiful' with the orchestra, and it was really very well done and made the children feel that they were a part of the performance. A friend of mine happened to be in a car with a lot of children who had just come from the Boston children's Symphony concert, and she said the children were skylarking and acting as though they had just been let out of school. That first program of the children's concert in Boston seemed to me rather heavy for the children, whereas the Cleveland concert was distinctly light and thoroughly enjoyable from their standpoint. They were still as mice and evidently were not bored. The orchestra was the full Cleveland Orchestra, which is very good, though not up to our standards."

Now what were these Cleveland programs? That of the first comprised the overture and "America the Beautiful," mentioned by our correspondent; five dances from Tchaikovsky's "Nut-Cracker"; Suite, The Dance of the Happy Spirits, from Gluck's "Orpheus," and two of Dvorak's Slavonic dances.

The program of the third was as follows: "Roman Carnival" overture, Berlioz; March of the Dwarfs from Grieg's "Lyric Suite'; the Allegretto con moto from one of Mozart's piano concertos, two movements from Ippolitov-Ivanov's Caucasian sketches, and, for singing, the "Battle Hymn of the Republic."

At Edinburgh three concerts for schoo… children have been given by an orches…tra of about 30 players. The average at…tendance at each concert was abou… 2000. Next season there will be fo… concerts, the orchestra will number … and the price of admission will be sev… pence.

At the first concert the program i…cluded Boccherini's Minuet for … strings; the "Pizzicato" from "Sylvia… Gounod's "March of a Marionette" a… the overture to "Oberon." At the sec… "The Londonderry air from Stanfor… "Irish Rhapsody," Walford Davi… "Solemn Melody" for strings and or… Minuet and trio from one of Moza… Divertimentos; the Scherzo from Be…hoven's Second Symphony, and Elg… "Pomp and Circumstance" No. 1, w… played.

On the back of each program wa… short description of the constitutio… the orchestra, its division into stri… wood-wind, brass and percussion. … description was illustrated.

As a supplement to these conc… there was a young people's holi… concert by the Scottish orchestra, … strength, led by Sir Landon Ron… The program was an excellent … Mendelssohn's overture to "Ruy Bl… Massenet's "Scenes Pittoresqu… Weber's "Invitation to the Wal… Sibelius's "Valse Triste," Jarnef… Braeludium, Saint-Saen's "Sw… Dvorak's Humoresque, Tchaikovs… "Nutcracker," Suite and the Ma… from "The Prophet."

A concert that would give …

in Symphony Hall even on a Friday afternoon or Saturday evening in the regular subscription course.

HER… FEB 17

…rchestra. It has been the good fortune of the writer to have heard many …imes during the last 40 years all the …amous conductors and all the leading …rchestras of the world, and it is hereby …tated without hesitation on his par… …hat the recent performances by the or…hestra of the Brahms Symphony and … the Strauss Symphonic Poem were a…he as could be heard anywhere in the …orld, both in the clear and brilliant …erformance by the members of the orchestra and in the inspiring conducting of Mr. Monteux.

It should be recognized that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is one of the leading orchestras of the world and that very few such organizations can even compare with it. It is certainly one of the glories of Boston and of America, and how any citizen with any civic pride whatsoever can afford to miss an opportunity of lending support passes understanding. Let us throw overboard all such prejudiced remarks that the orchestra is of no account because it is not led by a German conductor and recognize and back up a fine thing when we hear it.

There is far too much of the American slogan of "I know what I like," but this statement, if it is to settle anything, surely depends on the knowledge of the knower. It is a free world and everybody is entitled to like what pleases him, but those dogmatic people who think that their likes contain a definite standard of taste might well be reminded of James Russell Lowell's epigram: "The right to be a cussed fool is safe from all devices human." As an indication of how little the public is really qualified to judge of orchestral performance or interpretation, I submit the following test: If the Boston Symphony Orchestra were asked to play any standard work of Beethoven, Wagner, Mozart, Brahms, etc., and if the work were played in succession by six of the leading conductors of the world a screen being placed … tra so that …

TRANS FEB 16

CLASSIC OVERTURE, FADED TONE-POEM, AMERICAN HUMOR…

LALO AND THIBAUD IN MATCHED PERFECTIONS

Varied Pleasure at the Symphony Concert—Waning Chaikovsky—Gluck Undimmed—Lewis Carroll's Inventions in Deems Taylor's Tones—Sentimental Pitfalls

NOTHING seemed more significant at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon than the gentle patter of scattered applause descending upon Chaikovsky's Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet." True it was the final item of a longish programme; but even the audience of Friday has been known to linger, clapping a piece that pleased it. As it was, a few hands stirred here; a few there; and only by palpable effort—and some readiness on his part—was Mr. Monteux brought back to the stage. Indeed, Mr. Bliss's recent and resented "Color Symphony" was quite as warmly applauded. Repetition may hardly have staled Chaikowsky's music, since it has been heard but thrice in twelve years at the Symphony Concerts. N… did performance flag, since many a measure stirred the conductor's dramatizing temperament or put the orchestra to its mettle. Play the Fourth, the Fifth or the Sixth Symphony of Chaikovsky and audiences at Symphony Hall receive it warmly. Return to his Fantasias—say "Romeo and Juliet" or "Francesca da Rimini"—and cool and scanty are the plaudits.

Yet most of us remember days in which these two musics passed for masterpieces; when they excited hearers, stirring eager applause and fervid comment. Then it was the custom to praise the tumults in Chaikovsky's tonal Verona; to thrill to his motiv and measures of love and fate; to follow closely the course of this "Romeo and Juliet," to set it high for invention and facture. Yesterday, Mr. Monteux's orchestra flung out the same furies; repeated the like amorous ardors; renewed the old measures of lamentation. Yet there was no sign of a quickened audience and only the trickle of applause. In music as elsewhere, the times change, and we change with them, hardly noting the process, quite unable to analyze the consequences. Once upon a time Chaikovsky's tumults filled the ear. Now they sound artificial and hollow. Within memory the pages of love and lament fired the imagination. Now they seem faded, remote, passionless, mere music-making to a programme. The accounting is not easy; yet the fact—and a paradox—remain. Out of the three current and applauded Symphonies of Chaikovsky drips the morbid self-consciousness, flares the hysterical self-confession, with which he is usually reproached and belittled. In comparison, "Romeo and Juliet" and "Francesca" are detached, objective pieces. And they are vanishing; while the Symphonies keep lasting place.

If time sifts and thins music, yet may it also affirm and deepen it. A hundred and fifty years ago next April, a first audience in the Opera House at Paris listened to the Overture to Gluck's music-drama, "Iphigenia in Aulis," and forthwith divided sharply in praise or blame. In 1924, it still persists in the concert-hall and none questions either matter or method. The foolish pedant who declared in our eighties that Franck's Symphony was no symphony, must have been lineal descendant of those who, in an earlier Paris, averred that Gluck's Overture was no overture. Enough for us nowadays, that the form seems to take shape and course from his thought and purpose, to bear the musical substance, …otion and imaginings with which he …ld charge it. Here are measures to …mon the gentle maidenhood, the wist… …ubmission of Iphigenia led to sacrifi… …oom. Now pass the black-browed kings …so condemned her. There Clytemnes… …orrows for her daughter. Again, and …music sighs with the pity of these fates. …on a few pages is unrolled the ancient …d, the old tragedy; while out of it …k distills into tones the essence of the …on. For he is writing no measures of …ammed suggestion; only measures … shall outbreathe the scope and the … of his tragedy. The means seem sim…ple; the methods bare; yet as truly has he written a tender music of pity, a lofty music of fate as though he were luxuriating in the panoply of a Wagner or a Strauss. It is good to return to these simplicities, economics and austerities, to those old … of shading, transition …

Inching Along

Slight Increase Through the Week of the Guarantee Fund for the Symphony Orchestra

BY no more than $365 has the fund risen in the past week to meet the deficit for the current season in the operation of the Symphony Concerts. Dr. and Mrs. Henry Carmichael; Mr. and Mrs. George D. Latimer; Charles F. Sampson; and a contributor "in Memory of Albert van Raalte," the violinist, were the subscribers of this sum. The Guarantee Fund now stands at $79,358.34 out of a desired and necessary $95,000. The Endowment Fund, likewise, sticks fast at $156,349.02. A list printed in the programme-book for the current week names nearly 300 contributors to it.

…est Tint, Holland and Opaque Quality
(Not Our Standard Color Line)
Measurements, 3'x6'—Guaranteed Rollers
…NDARD COLORS, $1.32 each
…N SHADE & SCREEN CO.
Sudbury St., Boston, Mass.

[206]

revealing and characterizing office. With them he may even be the surer of beauty and of power, of the integrity and the endurance of his music as such. Will the Prelude to "Tristan" hold its own so well after a hundred and fifty years?

Another beauty, fine-textured and shimmering, sophisticated and subtle, now gentle, now gay, Lalo wove into his "Spanish Symphony" for such a violinist as Mr Thibaud to weave anew upon those who heard them both. A most adroit music is this concerto in disguise, fashioned by light, sure fingers into endless fertility and felicity. The incessant rhythmic motion charms; the contours of the melodies flow from grace to grace. A gentle modulation keeps the measures in rippling transition; while the harmonies enfold its course like the attendant nymphs in ancient fresco. Everywhere fancy plays upon this music—in the capricious turns of the Scherzo, the interlaced motivs of the Finale; through the garlanded melody of the slow division. A super-refined, sedulously studied, even a miniature music; yet by beauty of invention and aptness of workmanship beyond the years to dim and stale. Music, besides, in which Lalo may have heard in imagination the violin of Sarasate as now in our ears sounds the violin of Mr. Thibaud.

Upon the composer's tints and half-tints, the violinist laid the complementary lustres of his own tone. In its flow ran the current of the music, in like incessant and gleaming motion. The modulations were as two-fold impulse in perfection fulfilled. Less prompted than sharing, Mr. Thibaud caught the course, the flavor, of Lalo's moods—caprice and fantasy, revery warming to glow, gayety, light and glancing. Over the felicities that are the grace and the spice of the music, played an equal felicity of performance. Thibaud glamored Lalo, and Lalo, Thibaud. Conductor and orchestra joined with them in shadings, euphonies, refinements of contrast and transition. The audience bathed in the radiance, until it was time for fervor upon fervor of applause. A new generation of reviewers has contrived an ugly yet meaningful word, "musicality," by which they signify the quality of a piece or a performance intrinsic and peculiar to music. It is the word for Lalo's "Symphony" and for Mr. Thibaud's playing. Even the larger voice, the warmer ways, of Ysaye in prime, came not to close to the goal. A Thibaud now, a Sarasate of old, may better reveal Lalo's fineness of ear and imagination for the violin.

Into this illustrious company—the perpetual Gluck, the fading Chaikovsky, the perfect, if limited, Lalo—an American composer, brought also his gift. Characteristically it was humor and the fancy that may compan'on it. Mr. Deems Taylor is not merely composer of incidental music to any and all plays that pass his way. He may write also an independent music of his own. Even reviewing in the concert-halls and opera houses of New York does not quite strip him of leisure and energy for such composition. More remarkably, he remains human, since with pleasure he reads in "Alice in Wonderland" and "Through The Looking Glass"; while on the latter pages he once found suggestion for music. First he shaped it for miniature orchestra of a few wood-winds and a few strings. Next he amplified it into the full-bodied Suite, played yesterday for the first time in Boston. Possibly at the back of his head is the notion of a fantastic opera or operetta with Carroll's caprices for background, matter and dramatis personæ. If so, may he find the mood and the time to accomplish it.

For, by evidence of the Suite, Mr. Taylor excels in music of fantastical humor, pranking over homely and familiar things; in music of grotesquerie made logical; in music of whimsey touched with sentiment. Carroll's Garden of Live Flowers caught his imagination and brightly they blow and babble, whisper and languish, through his orchestra, while the composer is quick to find the apt and suggesting musical means. A mathematical mind was Carroll's; a fantastical mind as well, and the two lobes of that singular brain put to paper the logical absurdities of "Jabberwocky." As logically, as grotesquely Mr. Taylor clothes the ballad with music abounding in delineative humor, ready with suggesting resource. The double-bassoon roars and writhes; a clarinet sings contrast. A serio-comic fugue, chords variously devised—both serve his ends. Next he sees in imagination Carroll's insects of teeming life and monstrous fantasy—the bee-elephant, the gnat "as big as a chicken," the bread-and-butter fly. For them he writes a music of like contours, motion, buzz and humorous reality, yet as well-knit and ordered as orthodox ear would have it. Uses for humor has the whole-tone scale.

Less fortunate is the interplay of the two motivs by which Mr. Taylor would summon the White Knight and set him a journeying; while in this final movement 't is possible to discover measures for padding as well as for progress. (Not at his best Mr. Taylor when he sets to music for i own sweet sake.) The prancing mot springs from the composer's humor, aga in fruitful play. In turn the second mot hints at his pitfall—conventionally mellifl ous measures when sentiment is the wo Even the happy turn at the end may n quite save him; while at the beginning the Suite, when he would poetize through "Dedication," he writes little more tha American balladry—for orchestra inste of voice. Humor is Mr. Taylor's music trade—the humor plus fantasy that M Carpenter signalled into present Americ music with "Adventures in a Peramb lator."

H. T. P.

UNE GRANDE ORGANISATION MUSICALE AMERICAINE

LA CELEBRE SYMPHONIE DE BOSTON qui fera sa troisième visite à Montréal sous la direction de l'impresario LOUIS-H. BOURDON, tout prochainement. Elle donnera son concert au théâtre Saint-Denis. Cet orchestre symphonique est l'un des célèbres de tout l'Amérique et même sa réputation est universelle. Son directeur est l'un des plus renommés du monde, M. PIERRE MONTEUX. Il se compose de 108 musiciens, tous des maîtres.

[207]

revealing and characterizing office. With them he may even be the surer of beauty and of power, of the integrity and the endurance of his music as such. Will the Prelude to "Tristan" hold its own so well after a hundred and fifty years?

Another beauty, fine-textured and shimmering, sophisticated and subtle, now gentle, now gay, Lalo wove into his "Spanish Symphony" for such a violinist as Mr Thibaud to weave anew upon those who heard them both. A most adroit music is this concerto in disguise, fashioned by light, sure fingers into endless fertility and felicity. The incessant rhythmic motion charms; the contours of the melodies flow from grace to grace. A gentle modulation keeps the measures in rippling transition; while the harmonies enfold its course like the attendant nymphs in ancient fresco. Everywhere fancy plays upon this music—in the capricious turns of the Scherzo, the interlaced motivs of the Finale; through the garlanded melody of the slow division. A super-refined, sedulously studied, even a miniature music; yet by beauty of invention and aptness of workmanship beyond the years to dim and stale. Music, besides, in which Lalo may have heard in imagination the violin of Sarasate as now in our ears sounds the violin of Mr. Thibaud.

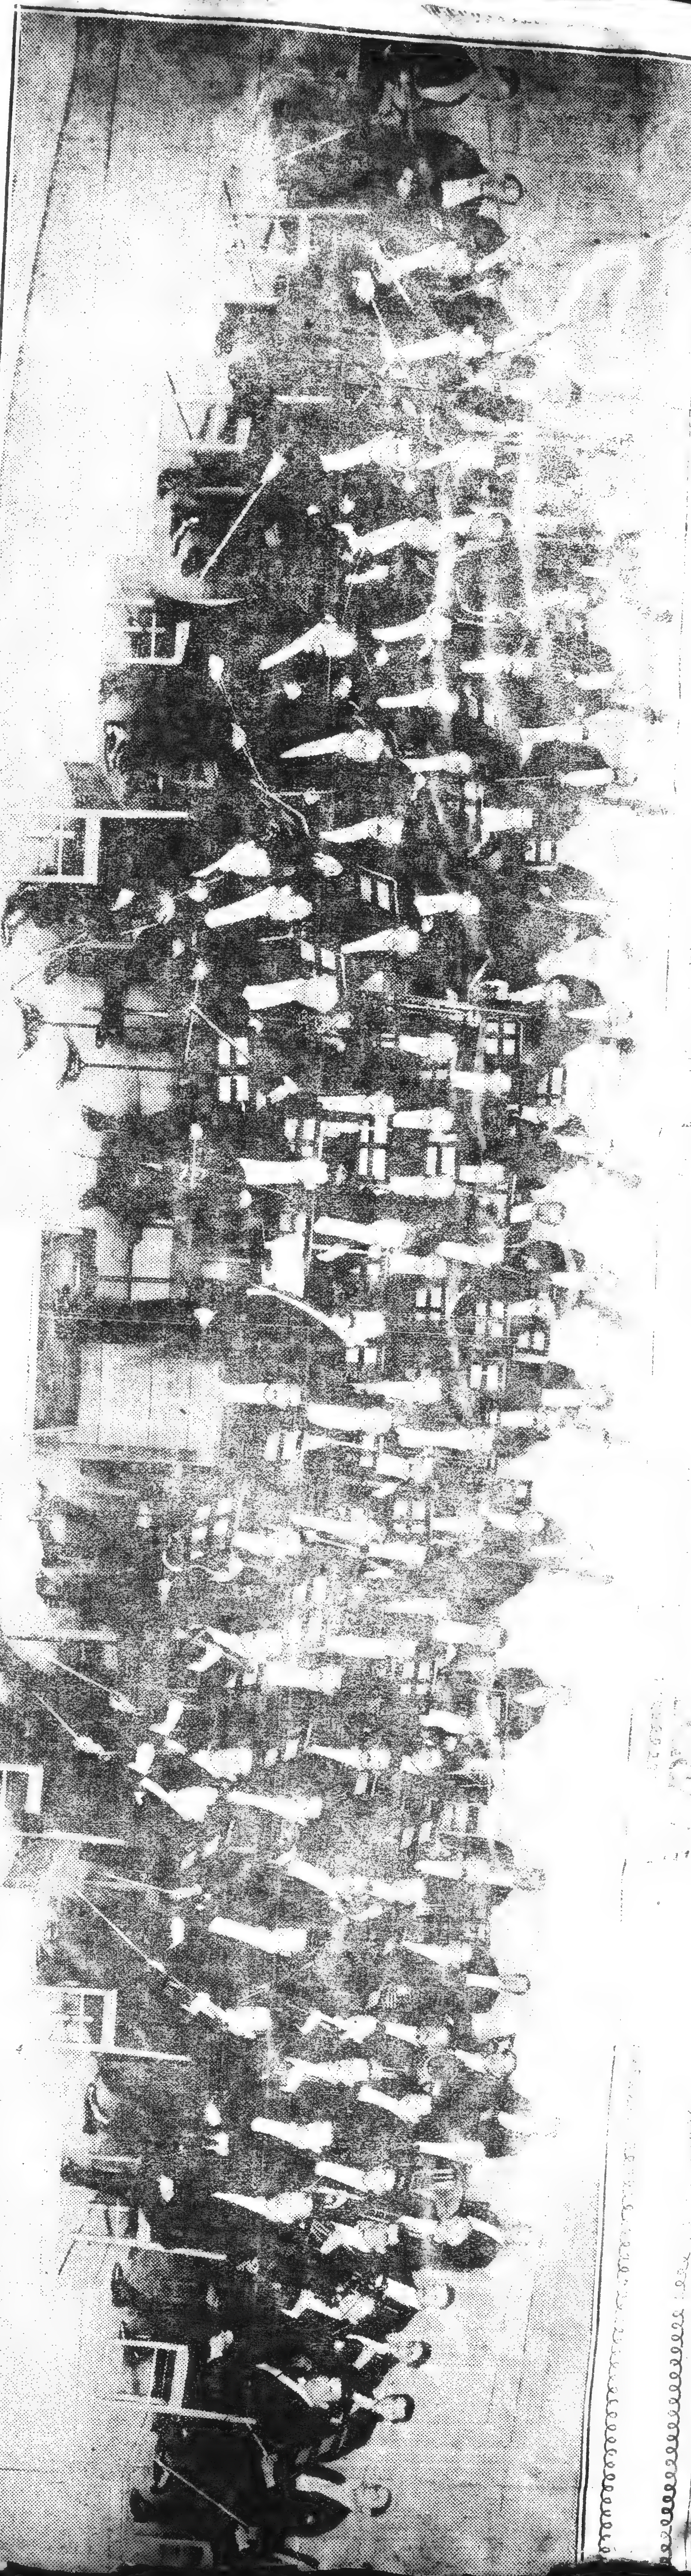
Upon the composer's tints and half-tints, the violinist laid the complementary lustres of his own tone. In its flow ran the current of the music, in like incessant and gleaming motion. The modulations were as two-fold impulse in perfection fulfilled. Less prompted than sharing, Mr. Thibaud caught the course, the flavor, of Lalo's moods—caprice and fantasy, revery warming to glow, gayety, light and glancing. Over the felicities that are the grace and the spice of the music, played an equal felicity of performance. Thibaud glamored Lalo, and Lalo, Thibaud. Conductor and orchestra joined with them in shadings, euphonies, refinements of contrast and transition. The audience bathed in the radiance, until it was time for fervor upon fervor of applause. A new generation of reviewers has contrived an ugly yet meaningful word, "musicality," by which they signify the quality of a piece or a performance intrinsic and peculiar to music. It is the word for Lalo's "Symphony" and for Mr. Thibaud's playing. Even the larger voice, the warmer ways, of Ysaye in primo, came not to close to the goal. A Thibaud now, a Sarasate of old, may better reveal Lalo's fineness of ear and imagination for the violin.

Into this illustrious company—the perpetual Gluck, the fading Chaikovsky, the perfect, if limited, Lalo—an American composer, brought also his gift. Characteristically it was humor and the fancy that may companion it. Mr. Deems Taylor is not merely composer of incidental music to any and all plays that pass his way. He may write also an independent music of his own. Even reviewing in the concert-halls and opera houses of New York does not quite strip him of leisure and energy for such composition. More remarkably, he remains human, since with pleasure he reads in "Alice in Wonderland" and "Through The Looking Glass"; while on the latter pages he once found suggestion for music. First he shaped it for miniature orchestra of a few wood-winds and a few strings. Next he amplified it into the full-bodied Suite, played yesterday for the first time in Boston. Possibly at the back of his head is the notion of a fantastic opera or operetta with Carroll's caprices for background, matter and dramatis personæ. If so, may he find the mood and the time to accomplish it.

For, by evidence of the Suite, Mr. Taylor excels in music of fantastical humor, pranking over homely and familiar things; in music of grotesquerie made logical; in music of whimsey touched with sentiment. Carroll's Garden of Live Flowers caught his imagination and brightly they blow and babble, whisper and languish, through his orchestra, while the composer is quick to find the apt and suggesting musical means. A mathematical mind was Carroll's; a fantastical mind as well, and the two lobes of that singular brain put to paper the logical absurdities of "Jabberwocky." As logically, as grotesquely Mr. Taylor clothes the ballad with music abounding in delineative humor, ready with suggesting resource. The double-bassoon roars and writhes; a clarinet sings contrast. A seriocomic fugue, chords variously devised—both serve his ends. Next he sees in imagination Carroll's insects of teeming life and monstrous fantasy—the bee-elephant, the gnat "as big as a chicken," the bread-and-butter fly. For them he writes a music of like contours, motion, buzz and humorous reality, yet as well-knit and ordered as orthodox ear would have it. Uses for humor has the whole-tone scale.

Less fortunate is the interplay of the two motivs by which Mr. Taylor would summon the White Knight and set him a journeying; while in this final movement it is possible to discover measures for padding as well as for progress. (Not at his best Mr. Taylor when he sets to music for i own sweet sake.) The prancing mot springs from the composer's humor, ag in fruitful play. In turn the second m t hints at his pitfall—conventionally mellifl ous measures when sentiment is the wo Even the happy turn at the end may n quite save him; while at the beginn ng the Suite, when he would poetize through "Dedication," he writes little more tha American balladry for orchestra inste of voice. Humor is Mr. Taylor's music trade—the humor plus fantasy that M Carpenter signalled into present A music with "Adventures in a Per lator."

H.



LA CELEBRE SYMPHONIE DE BOSTON qui fera sa troisième visite à Montréal sous la direction de l'impresario LOUIS-H. BOURDON, tout prochainement. Elle donnera son concert au théâtre Saint-Denis. Cet orchestre symphonique est l'un des célèbres de tout l'Amérique et même sa réputation est universelle. Son directeur est l'un des plus renommés du monde, M. PIERRE MONTEUX. Il se compose de 108 musiciens, tous des maitres.

BLANK PAGE

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
FROM
NEWS,
Providence, R. I.

FOURTH BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM; ROBINSON SOLOIST

The soloist at the fourth concert here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be the last but one of the season, will be Carol Robinson, the celebrated pianist. The concert will take place in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, Feb. 26. Miss Robinson has attracted considerable attention of late by her recitals in New York, Chicago and several eastern cities. The chosen concerto for her appearance with the orchestra will be the great work of Tschaikovsky (in B flat minor No. 1).

Pierre Monteux will divide the remainder of the program between music of the Eighteenth Century and of modern France. The symphony will be the great masterpiece of Mozart in C major, called "Jupiter" which it happens has not been performed here by this orchestra for a number of seasons.

The program will close with Charpentier's suite "Impressions of Italy." This score, which stands with the opera "Louise" as one of the French composer's master-works, was written under the direct influence of the sights and sounds of Italy. The viola solo in the serenade will be played by Georges Fourel. The other movements include "On Mule Back," "On the Summits" and "Naples."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

EB 2-1924

Big Crowd Hears Concert by Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave one of its philharmonic concerts before a large and highly-appreciative audience at the Academy of Music last night.

The orchestra again proved its excellence, both in interpretation and technique. It was evident that this group of half a hundred musicians, generally considered one of the three best symphony orchestras in America, is comprised of artists of the first rank, all men who are lovers of music as well as players of it.

This was rpoved especially by their rendition of "Daphnis et Chloe," by Ravel, of which they gave the nocturne, interlude and "Danse Guerriere," the last of which they made particularly beautiful.

Alexander Siloti's interpretation of the "Dance of Death," by Liszt, in a pianoforte solo, dre wround after round of applause.

Beethoven's "Pastoral,' 'one of the best-known symphonies, was the main number of the program. The entire number was one of the most exquisite things ever heard in Brooklyn. The last half of the third movement of the "Pastoral" was the grand climax of the piece. Pierre Monteux, the conductor, deserves unlimited praise for his direction of the orchestra.

The last number, Dvorak's overture, "Carnival," was unfortunately placed. It is a lovely piece, but of such a light nature that it should have been the first number of the evening, rather than the last, for as the concluding number it seemed somewhat insipid after such sublime music as Liszt's "Dance of Death."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD

EB 3 1924

MUSIC

Another program by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Carnegie Hall yesterday, brought Alexander Siloti to the stage as soloist. With the orchestra he played in Liszt's "Dance of Death" (a paraphrase of the "Dies Irae"). The most important number on the program for the orchestra alone was a group of four symphonic fragments from Debussy's incidental music to D'Annunzio's mystery play. This included "The Court of the Lilies," "Dance of Ecstasy," "The Passion" and "The Good Shepherd."

Beethoven's Sixth Symphony—the "'—completed the program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TRIBUNE

FEB 3 - 1924

Debussy's Music to D'Annunzio Play Given by Monteux

Beethoven Pastoral and Liszt "Danse Macabre," With Siloti as Soloist, Included on Boston Symphony Bill

After serving "Le Sacre du Printemps" on Thursday night, Pierre Monteux led the Boston Symphony Orchestra in less pungent music yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. The opening number, Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, marked the opposite pole from Stravinsky, with a sedative charm. It was pleasant in the hands of the Bostonians, who played with a smooth, rich tone that has become characteristic of the organization—but that final thanksgiving in the Pastoral Symphony appears longer at every performance. This one brought prolonged plaudits and a rising orchestra.

A comparative novelty was the suite of four symphonic excerpts from Debussy's music for D'Annunzio's mystery play, "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian." Some of this music, as Mr. Hale reminds us, was performed here twelve years ago by the MacDowell Chorus under Kurt Schindler, and the first movement of this particular orchestral suite, "The Court of the Lilies," opened a Carnegie Hall program of the Philadelphia Orchestra under Mr. Stokowski last season. Yesterday's performance apparently was the first of the suite in full here. The second movement, the most colorful of the four, is the music of the dance of ecstasy and the finale of the first act, while the last two, "Passion" and "The Good Shepherd," which were played without an intervening pause, are cast in a sober, contemplative mood. It is music of a certain plaintiveness, rising to considerable eloquence, but not Debussy at his best. The last two movements, especially, were somewhat monotonous.

Alexander Siloti was the soloist, playing Liszt's paraphrase on the "Dies Iræ" entitled "Todtentanz," or "Danse Macabre," with variations on its theme of every mood, from the dignified and ominous to the light and ornate. Mr. Siloti was in excellent form in a performance of varied color, with fluent lightness and precision in his decorative passages and depth and sonority for his loudest ones, while M. Monteux and his musicians gave a spirited accompaniment, with thorough unity in the combined performance of soloist and orchestra. A good sized, though not overflowing, audience waxed most enthusiastic.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES

EB 3 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN RARE DEBUSSY WORK

Conductor Monteux Ends His Visit With "Martyrdom of St. Sebastian."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which as exemplar of the exotic had so lately come bringing Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring," ended a midwinter visit at yesterday's Carnegie Hall matinee, going out in a blaze of Debussy's "Martyrdom of St. Sebastian." This second rarity, new as a four-part orchestral suite, had once had full concert performance here, the first anywhere and so recognized in Debussy's cable to Kurt Schindler, who gave it with Maggie Teyte, the MacDowell Chorus and the Philharmonic, in 1912, a year after the completer premiere mimed by dancers and sung at the Paris Chatelet.

Conductor Monteux preceded it yesterday with Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony of silvery harmony at the hands of his band. He closed with Alexander Siloti in the "Dance of Death" that Liszt dreamed eighty-five years ago amid churchly frescoes of the Campo of Pisa. Mr. Siloti, gigantic among the hundred men, towered mentally as he did physically in the grim, sardonic play of piano and orchestra, conjuring the now angelic, now diabolic, dancers.

Debussy's still fascinating score, as at least the first pair of his four "symphonic excerpts" may be described, is happiest in its selections from the first act; the "Court of Lilies," plangent pallor of mellow brass and plucked harpstrings, and the "Dance of Ecstasy," of mingled pain and paean, with glowing finale. The later "Passion" and "The Good Shepherd" are mood-music of subtle beauty, more frankly needing action as the saint portrays Christ's march to Calvary.

The "Sebastian" music was heard with interest by a matinee audience of more than usual distinction. Besides the former producer, Mr. Schindler, there were present many of the financiers and managers of other American or-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TELEGRAPH

1924

With the Symphony.

Thomas, by the way, will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony in Providence shortly. His concert bookings have yielded unusually good results this season and he is listed to sing in as far distant points as Lexington, Elmira and Brooklyn this week.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From FEB 7 - 1924
Town Topics
New York City

of "Sacre du Printemps."

To Mr. Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony and intelligent advocate of musical progress, fell the honor of presenting "Sacre" to New York for the first time. Monteux as well conducted Strawinsky's score at its première in Paris when presented as a ballet by Serge Diaghileff and the Ballet Russe. The tale is now famous for its inception in the French capital, of the riot that ensued, inexplicable to one who heard the work on Thursday last at Carnegie Hall. We do not feel that "Sacre" depends upon the attending action of the ballet for a complete understanding. It is symphonic in character and must, I believe, sound to best advantage in concert form. Strawinsky named his score "The Rites of Spring, a Picture of Pagan Russia," and it is intended as an evocation of primeval instincts, of the barbarism of early religion.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW BEDFORD
MASS.

EB 1924

cerebral subtleties.

This new work is written for twenty-three wind instruments and was first performed at Queen's Hall, London, June 10, 1921, under the direction of Sergei Koussevitzky, who is to come across the Roaring Forties next fall to conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra. He tried to put expression into the work and deeply annoyed its composer.

To understand it you must think about nothing at all. It is simply a study in choral groupings of wind instrument tones. There is no continuous melodic line, no development, no beginning, no middle and no inevitable end. It is not a composition. It is not even a tone painting of externals. It is merely a shameless public exposition of a tone painter's method of settling his palette.

The work contains some extraordinarily beautiful combinations of tones, and these will doubtless find their way into the works of other musicians. Other combinations are acidulous and at this moment offensive to the ear. But even in this piece itself one finds a warning against pronouncing any musical effect permanently offensive.

The acrid chords for trumpets and trambones fall upon the ear of today without annoyance, merely because the modernists used this type of instrumental dissonance before any of the others in their stock and we became accustomed to it long ago.

Stravinsky in his "Symphonies for Wind Instruments" has merely mixed some ingredients. He has not given us a composition any more than a kaleidoscope gives us a stained glass window. But he has presented us with materials in the unshaped state.

It is a singular experiment, an almost swaggering piece of effrontery. You are invited to watch a modernist in his laboratory putting together minor seconds and minor ninths in two different keys and making the result sound like music. Or perhaps you may view Stravinsky as a pharmacist compounding a prescription to be taken four bars in a tablespoonful of Debussy and water after meals to make you a more youthful music lover.

ANOTHER "IF."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE MONTREAL
CANADA Standard
ISSUE OF

FEB 9 1924

Boston Symphony, With Monteux, To Play In Montreal

It is announced that the Boston Symphony Orchestra acknowledged to be one of the very finest in the world, is to visit Montreal shortly, the concert to be given at the Saint Denis Theatre. This occasion will be of additional importance in that Montreal will then hear Pierre Monteux, the great French conductor, for the last time at the head of this Orchestra. He is now completing his fifth and farewell season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and at its conclusion will return to France. The musicians of the orchestra, numbering one hundred and eight, will make the long journey from Boston for this great gala event. Louis H. Bourdon, who is bringing here this celebrated Symphony has decided that the most expensive seat for this concert will be only three dollars and fifty cents, which is quite an innovation, as the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the most expensive orchestra in the world.

could be found [illegible]where. Already [illegible] bea[illegible] won her fame, and she is well-known as a dancer.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
FROM
NEWS,
Providence, R. I.

FOURTH BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM; ROBINSON SOLOIST

The soloist at the fourth concert here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be the last but one of the season, will be Carol Robinson, the celebrated pianist. The concert will take place in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, Feb. 26. Miss Robinson has attracted considerable attention of late by her recitals in New York, Chicago and several eastern cities. The chosen concerto for her appearance with the orchestra will be the great work of Tschaikovsky (in B flat minor No. 1).

Pierre Monteux will divide the remainder of the program between music of the Eighteenth Century and of modern France. The symphony will be the great masterpiece of Mozart in C major, called "Jupiter" which it happens has not been performed here by this orchestra for a number of seasons.

The program will close with Charpentier's suite "Impressions of Italy." This score, which stands with the opera "Louise" as one of the French composer's master-works, was written under the direct influence of the sights and sounds of Italy. The viola solo in the serenade will be played by Georges Fourel. The other movements include "On Mule Back," "On the Summits" and "Naples."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

FEB 2-1924

Big Crowd Hears Concert by Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave one of its philharmonic concerts before a large and highly-appreciative audience at the Academy of Music last night.

The orchestra again proved its excellence, both in interpretation and technique. It was evident that this group of half a hundred musicians, generally considered one of the three best symphony orchestras in America, is comprised of artists of the first rank, all men who are lovers of music as well as players of it.

This was rpoved especially by their rendition of "Daphnis et Chloe," by Ravel, of which they gave the nocturne, interlude and "Danse Guerriere," the last of which they made particularly beautiful.

Alexander Siloti's interpretation of the "Dance of Death," by Liszt, in a pianoforte solo, dre wround after round of applause.

Beethoven's "Pastoral,' 'one of the best-known symphonies, was the main number of the program. The entire number was one of the most exquisite things ever heard in Brooklyn. The last half of the third movement of the "Pastoral' was the grand climax of the piece. Pierre Monteux, the conductor, deserves unlimited praise for his direction of the orchestra.

The last number, Dvorak's overture, "Carnival," was unfortunately placed. It is a lovely piece, but of such a light nature that it should have been the first number of the evening, rather than the last, for as the concluding number it seemed somewhat insipid after such sublime music as Liszt's "Dance of Death."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD

FEB 3 1924

MUSIC

Another program by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Carnegie Hall yesterday, brought Alexander Siloti to the stage as soloist. With the orchestra he played in Liszt's "Dance of Death" (a paraphrase of the "Dies Irae"). The most important number on the program for the orchestra alone was a group of four symphonic fragments from Debussy's incidental music to D'Annunzio's mystery play. This included "The Court of the Lilies," "Dance of Ecstasy," "The Passion" and "The Good Shepherd."

Beethoven's Sixth Symphony—the ''' —completed the program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES

FEB 3 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN RARE DEBUSSY WORK

Conductor Monteux Ends His Visit With "Martyrdom of St. Sebastian."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which as exemplar of the exotic had so lately come bringing Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring," ended a midwinter visit at yesterday's Carnegie Hall matinee, going out in a blaze of Debussy's "Martyrdom of St. Sebastian." This second rarity, new as a four-part orchestral suite, had once had full concert performance here, the first anywhere and so recognized in Debussy's cable to Kurt Schindler, who gave it with Maggie Teyte, the MacDowell Chorus and the Philharmonic, in 1912, a year after the completer premiere mimed by dancers and sung at the Paris Chatelet.

Conductor Monteux preceded it yesterday with Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony of silvery harmony at the hands of his band. He closed with Alexander Siloti in the "Dance of Death" that Liszt dreamed eighty-five years ago amid churchly frescoes of the Campo of Pisa. Mr. Siloti, gigantic among the hundred men, towered mentally as he did physically in the grim, sardonic play of piano and orchestra, conjuring the now angelic, now diabolic, dancers.

Debussy's still fascinating score, as at least the first pair of his four "symphonic excerpts" may be described, is happiest in its selections fom the first act; the "Court of Lilies," plangent pallor of mellow brass and plucked harpstrings, and the "Dance of Ecstasy," of mingled pain and paean, with glowing finale. The later "Passion" and "The Good Shepherd" are mood-music of subtle beauty, more frankly needing action as the saint portrays Christ's march to Calvary.

The "Sebastian" music was heard with interest by a matinee audience of more than usual distinction. Besides the former producer, Mr. Schindler, there were present many of the financiers and managers of other American or-

---

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From FEB 7 - 1924
Town Topics
New York City

of "Sacre du Printemps."

To Mr. Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony and intelligent advocate of musical progress, fell the honor of presenting "Sacre" to New York for the first time. Monteux as well conducted Strawinsky's score at its première in Paris when presented as a ballet by Serge Diaghileff and the Ballet Russe. The tale is now famous for its inception in the French capital, of the riot that ensued, inexplicable to one who heard the work on Thursday last at Carnegie Hall. We do not feel that "Sacre" depends upon the attending action of the ballet for a complete understanding. It is symphonic in character and must, I believe, sound to best advantage in concert form. Strawinsky named his score "The Rites of Spring, a Picture of Pagan Russia," and it is intended as an evocation of primeval instincts, of the barbarism of early religion.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE MONTREAL
CANADA Standard
ISSUE OF
FEB 9 1924

Boston Symphony, With Monteux, To Play In Montreal

It is announced that the Boston Symphony Orchestra acknowledged to be one of the very finest in the world, is to visit Montreal shortly, the concert to be given at the Saint Denis Theatre. This occasion will be of additional importance in that Montreal will then hear Pierre Monteux, the great French conductor, for the last time at the head of this Orchestra. He is now completing his fifth and farewell season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and at its conclusion will return to France. The musicians of the orchestra, numbering one hundred and eight, will make the long journey from Boston for this great gala event. Louis H. Bourdon, who is bringing here this celebrated Symphony has decided that the most expensive seat for this concert will be only three dollars and fifty cents, which is quite an innovation, as the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the most expensive orchestra in the world.

could be found anywhere. Already [illegible] won her fame, and she is well-known as a dancer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TRIBUNE

FEB 3 - 1924

Debussy's Music to D'Annunzio Play Given by Monteux

Beethoven Pastoral and Liszt "Danse Macabre," With Siloti as Soloist, Included on Boston Symphony Bill

After serving "Le Sacre du Printemps" on Thursday night, Pierre Monteux led the Boston Symphony Orchestra in less pungent music yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. The opening number, Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, marked the opposite pole from Stravinsky, with a sedative charm. It was pleasant in the hands of the Bostonians, who played with a smooth, rich tone that has become characteristic of the organization—but that final thanksgiving in the Pastoral Symphony appears longer at every performance. This one brought prolonged plaudits and a rising orchestra.

A comparative novelty was the suite of four symphonic excerpts from Debussy's music for D'Annunzio's mystery play, "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian." Some of this music, as Mr. Hale reminds us, was performed here twelve years ago by the MacDowell Chorus under Kurt Schindler, and the first movement of this particular orchestral suite, "The Court of the Lilies," opened a Carnegie Hall program of the Philadelphia Orchestra under Mr. Stokowski last season. Yesterday's performance apparently was the first of the suite in full here. The second movement, the most colorful of the four, is the music of the dance of ecstasy and the finale of the first act, while the last two, "Passion" and "The Good Shepherd," which were played without an intervening pause, are cast in a sober, contemplative mood. It is music of a certain plaintiveness, rising to considerable eloquence, but not Debussy at his best. The last two movements, especially, were somewhat monotonous.

Alexander Siloti was the soloist, playing Liszt's paraphrase on the "Dies Iræ" entitled "Todtentanz," or "Danse Macabre," with variations on its theme of every mood, from the dignified and ominous to the light and ornate. Mr. Siloti was in excellent form in a performance of varied color, with fluent lightness and precision in his decorative passages and depth and sonority for his loudest ones, while M. Monteux and his musicians gave a spirited accompaniment, with thorough unity the combined performance of soloist and orchestra. A good sized, though not overflowing, audience waxed mo enthusiastic.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TELEGRAPH

[illegible] 1924

With the Symphony.

Thomas, by the way, will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony in Providence shortly. His concert bookings have yielded unusually good results this season and he is listed to sing in as far distant points as Lexington, Elmira and Brooklyn this week.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW BEDFORD
MASS.

FEB 1924

cerebral subtleties.

This new work is written for twenty-three wind instruments and was first performed at Queen's Hall, London, June 10, 1921, under the direction of Sergei Koussevitzky, who is to come across the Roaring Forties next fall to conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra. He tried to put expression into the work and deeply annoyed its composer.

To understand it you must think about nothing at all. It is simply a study in choral groupings of wind instrument tones. There is no continuous melodic line, no development, no beginning, no middle and no inevitable end. It is not a composition. It is not even a tone painting of externals. It is merely a shameless public exposition of a tone painter's method of settling his palette.

The work contains some extraordinarily beautiful combinations of tones, and these will doubtless find their way into the works of other musicians. Other combinations are acidulous and this moment offensive to the ear. But even in this piece itself one finds a warning against pronouncing any musical effect permanently offensive.

The acrid chords for trumpets and trambones fall upon the ear of today without annoyance, merely because the modernists used this type of instrumental dissonance before any of the others in their stock and we became accustomed to it long ago.

Stravinsky in his "Symphonies for Wind Instruments" has merely mixed some ingredients. He has not given us a composition any more than a kaleidoscope gives us a stained glass window. But he has presented us with materials in the unshaped state.

It is a singular experiment, an almost swaggering piece of effrontery. You are invited to watch a modernist in his laboratory putting together minor seconds and minor ninths in two different keys and making the result sound like music. Or perhaps you may view Stravinsky as a pharmacist compounding a prescription to be taken four bars in a tablespoonful of Debussy and water after meals to make you a more youthful music lover.

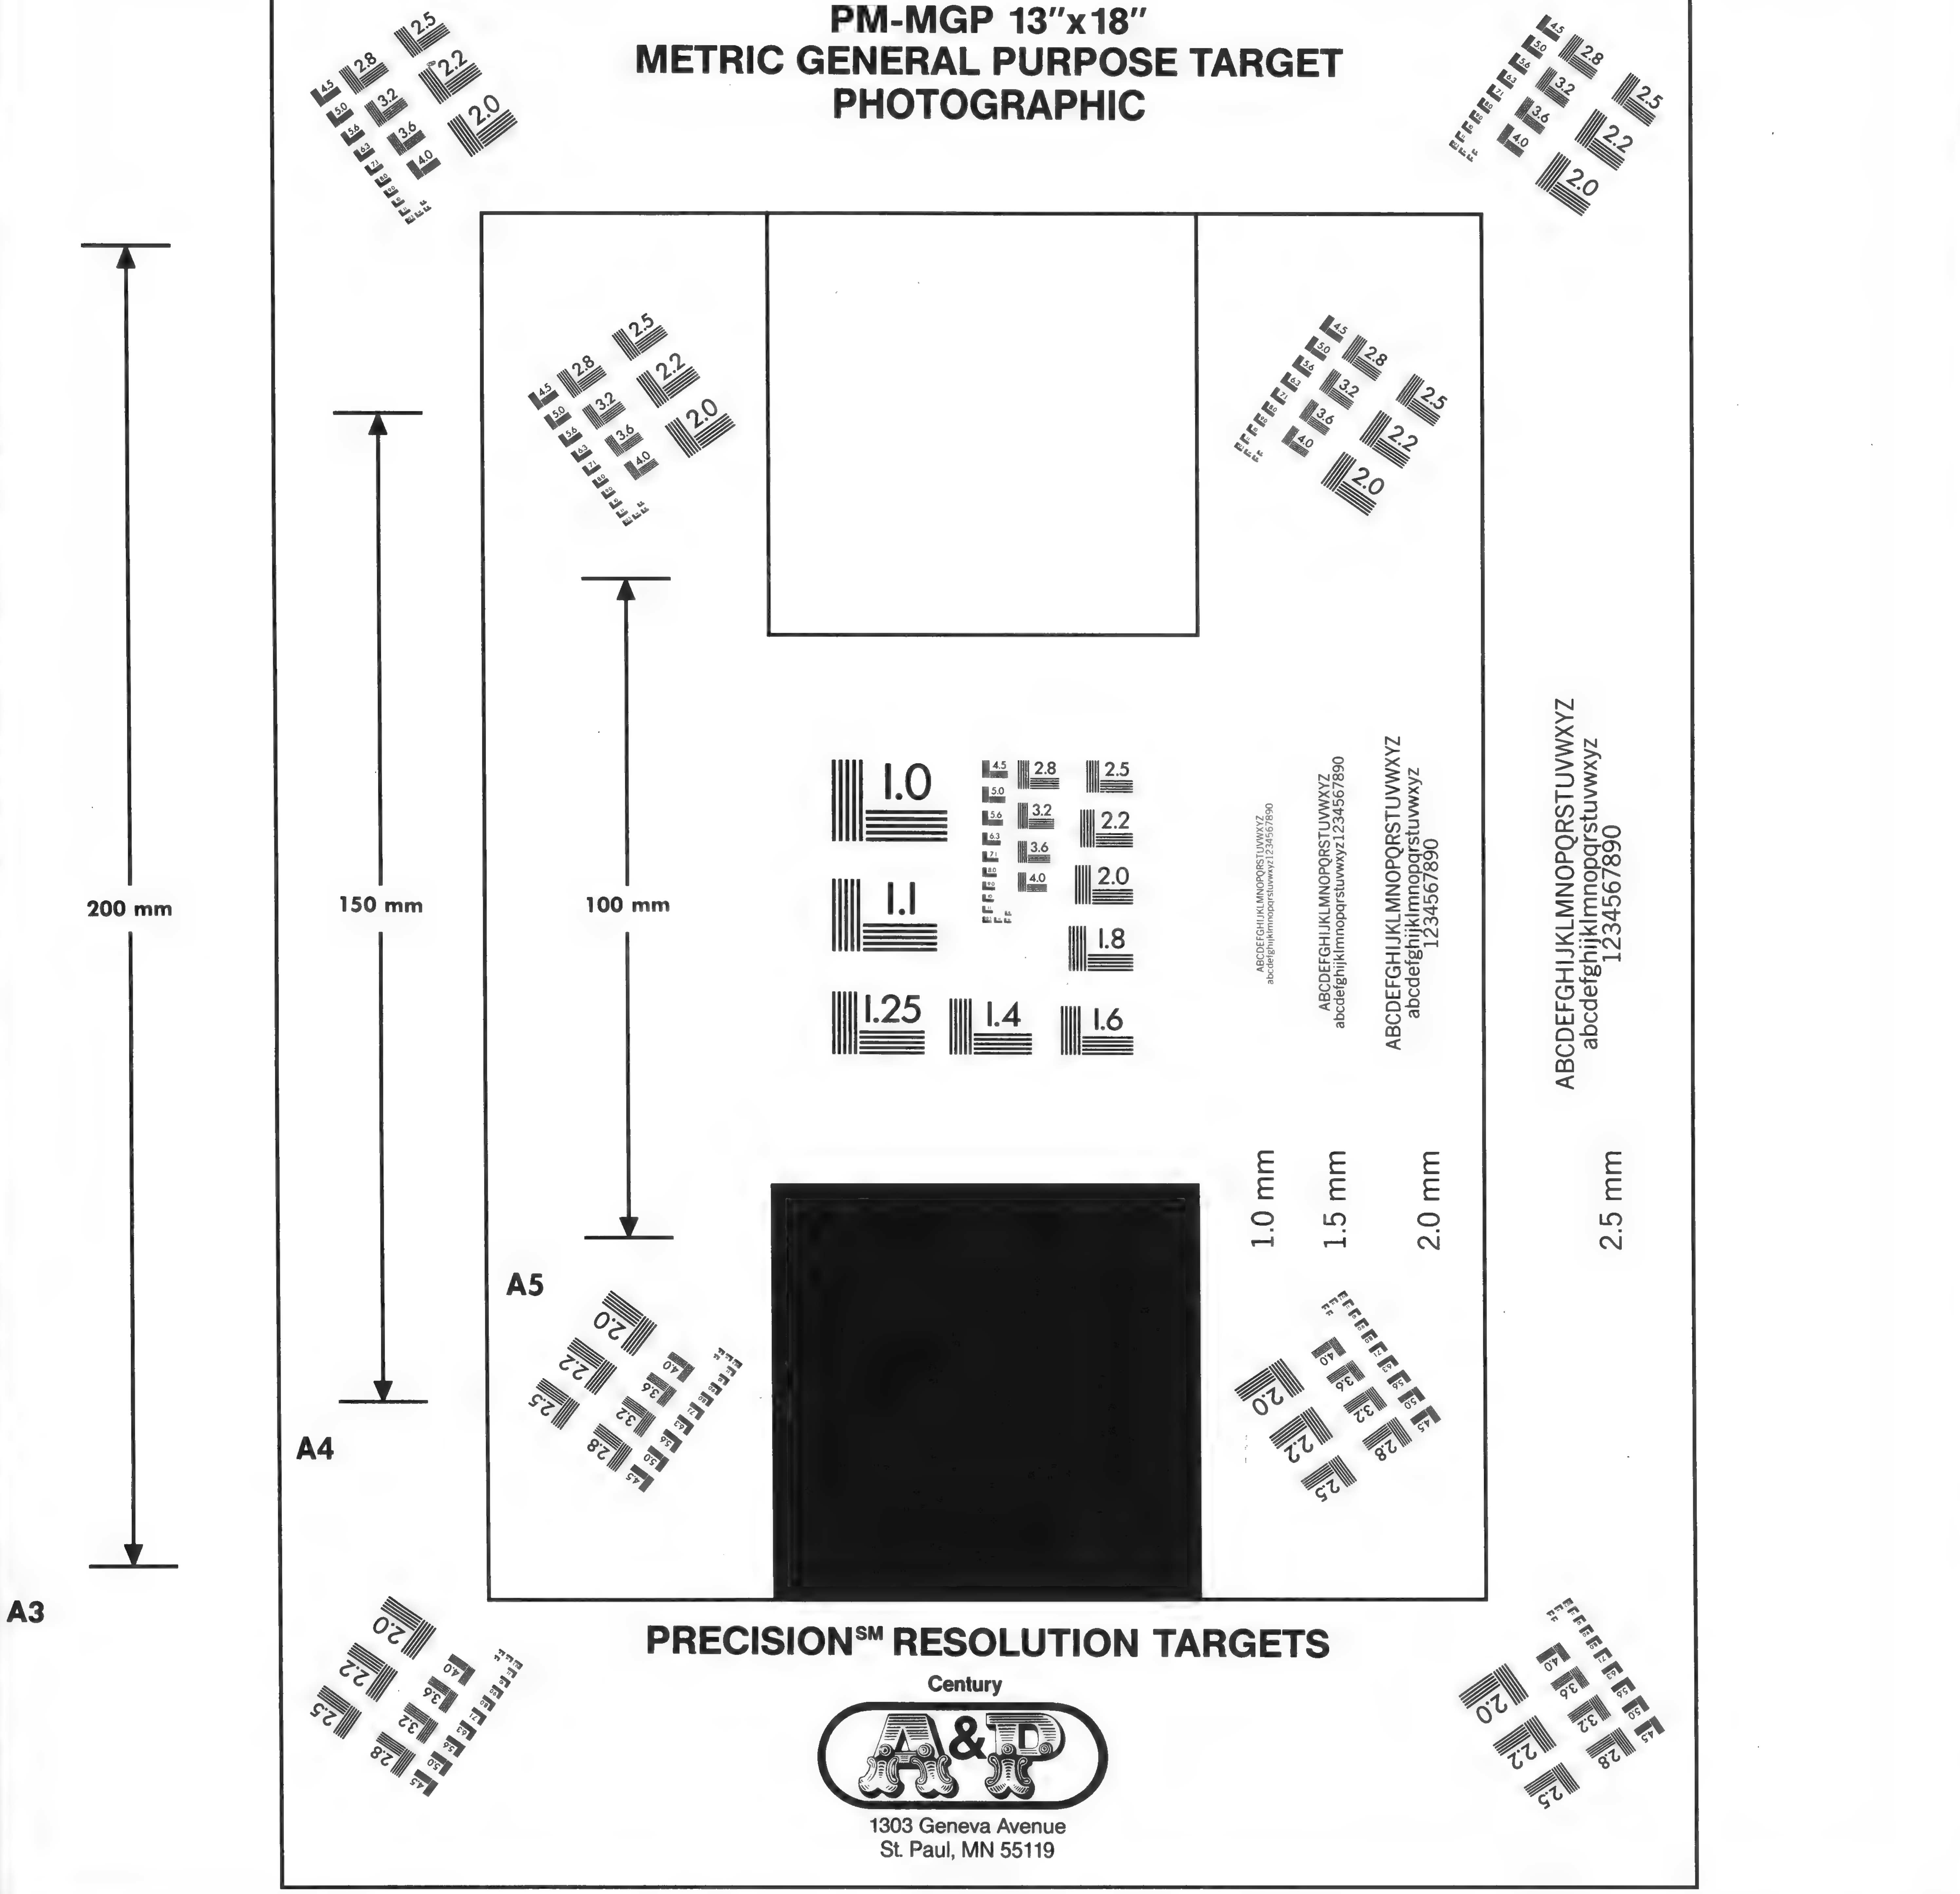
ANOTHER "IF."

REDUCTION

RATIO

14x

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A3
A4
A5
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

depth, and sonority
s, while M. Monteux gave a spirited ac-thorough unity in formance of soloi good sized, thoug
udience waxed mo

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD

FEB 3 1924

WORDS and MUSIC

By Deems Taylor

ANY ONE who has ever heard the prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" or "The Afternoon of a Faun" must have wondered, at one time or another, how it would have felt to be present at the first performance of a masterpiece. How did the people respond who heard it first? Did they recognize its greatness at once, or did they accept it as just another novelty, something to be heard with polite interest, briefly discussed, and then forgotten? For a long time I have been asking this question. Hearing the constant, steady trickle of new music that wanders through any New York music season, would I ever have the luck to be present at the first performance of a real masterwork, something destined to be a landmark in musical history? And if I ever should, would I realize it at the time, and how would I feel and behave about it?

Well, I have heard one. I heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra play Igor Stravinsky's "The Rites of Spring" in Carnegie Hall last Thursday night, and I believe that it is the most important piece of contemporary music since "The Afternoon of a Faun" and "Pelleas and Melisande," a work that, half a century hence, will be found to have begun a new epoch in music. So far as the rest of the world is concerned, this cannot be termed a momentous or even important discovery. "The Rites of Spring" is eleven years old, and a good many people have found out long before this that it [illegible] great [illegible] of art, and have said so; but it is extremely important to me to have made that discovery, however belatedly for myself.

* * *

AS for the emotions aroused by the hearing of a masterpiece for the first time, they are, as might have been expected, a bit unsatisfactory—or, rather, one's efforts to describe and justify them are unsatisfactory. This hearer, like many others at Carnegie Hall last Thursday, left the performance in what can best be described as a state of dazed exhilaration. For this music of Stravinsky's is no intellectual tidbit, to be enjoyed and appraised in a state of judicial calm or gentle reverie. It is, as all real music fundamentally is, a direct assault on the emotions through the medium of intuitively arranged sounds. Consequently its effect, although powerful in the extreme, is almost impossible to describe in words.

First of all, the greatness of the music lies in its essentially musical, rather than literary, character. Stravinsky's own explanation of its genesis is very much to the point: "The embryo is a theme that came to me when I had completed the 'Fire-Bird.' As this theme with that which followed was conceived in a strong, brutal manner, I took as a pretext for development, for the evocation of this music, the Russian prehistoric epoch, since I am a Russian. But note well that this idea came from the music; the music did not come from the idea. My work is architectonic, not anecdotal; objective, not [illegible]tive construction." And it is just this impression that his mu[illegible]nveys. He is not trying to illustrate a story, or to prove anything. He is not even experimenting, except in so f[illegible] every work of ar[illegible] is an experiment. He has conceived [illegible] terms of itself, [illegible]d has worked it out as the protago[illegible] [illegible]enery of his dra[illegible].

*

NATURALLY, he has a definite moo[illegible] [illegible]s of moods, to convey. Music is a backward art, compa[illegible] with literature and the plastic arts, but it is becoming increasingly articulate with every decade, and it is no longer possible, as it was a century ago, to treat it simply as a pleasing combination of m[illegible]less sounds. The very fact that dissonance is so rapidly taking it[illegible]e in the composer's vocabulary is proof of the art's present-da[illegible]pressiveness. When music was merely a sound-pattern immediate beauty was one of its primary attributes, as it is of any purely decorative design. But music to-day is coming to have as definite a meaning as words have (although these meanings are by no means interchangeable), and what is commonly called "beauty" is no more to be demanded of it than "beauty" is demanded of Rodin's "Le Penseur." It is inevitable that a modern composer have some definite thing to say in his music, although that thing may not necessarily be describable in words. In "The Rites of Spring," Stravinsky, as he hints, sought to convey—or to re-create—the emotions that stirred primitive man when he performed strange and terrible rites to welcome the fertile spring and placate his powerful and terrifying gods. That, of course, is quite different from taking a prepared scenario for a ballet, and setting music to it.

* * *

IN one respect The Rites of Spring" does not represent the furthest point reached by Stravinsky in his art. In this work he employs the orchestra of Richard Strauss and Gustav Mahler—an immense organization enlisting triple and quintuple combinations of woodwinds, eight horns, six trumpets, four trombones and two tubas, five kettledrums and numerous other percussion instruments—as well as the usual augmented string choirs. Since "Le Sacre" he has steadily reduced his instrumental demands, striving—as in "Le Rossignol" and notably in the "Symphonie Pour Instruments a Vent"—to gain his ends with steadily diminishing orchestral means. In sheer musical worth, however, in naked, elemental power, "The Rites of Spring" stands unique among those of his works that have been heard here.

What makes the work so tremendously satisfying is the absolute faith Stravinsky has kept with himself and his age. Confronted with the problem of conveying primitive emotions to a twentieth century audience, he has solved it in the only way it could be solved—interms of the twentieth century. The effect of his music is certainly primitive: out of the orchestra come rentless, thudding rhythms that beat into the ears like the sound of naked feet upon baked earth, like the thump and howl of war drums in a tropic forest. The music sings, and shrieks, and snarls, until one's heart beats with something of the nameless terror that must have oppressed the Piltdown man as he lay listening to the noises of the primeval night. And this is all done by music, in terms of music, without the shadow of any suggestion by associative or imitative devices. There are one or two Russian folk-tunes in the score, but they are indistinguishable from those of Stravinsky's own devising. And primitive as its rhythms are, in their effect, they are as far as the pole from anything that a primitive man's intelligence would be likely to invent. A striking evidence of Stravinsky's artistic integrity, I think, lies in the fact that, although he employs five kettledrums in the score, he uses no tomtom or any other form of savage drum that might evoke the primitive past by mere association of ideas.

Certain things, of course, are not in the work, although one is convinced that, did he need them, Stravinsky could supply them. There is little gayety in it, for one thing, and almost nothing suggesting tenderness or any lyric quality. They are not there simply because there is no place for them. Primitive man, as Stravinsky sees him—and rightly no doubt—did not smile and did not love. His life was anger, and bewilderment, and fear, and lust, and "The Rites of Spring" is the very essence of that life. Monstrous, hairy and terrible, it stalks through the orchestra like some obscene pagan god. And as one listens one feels the stirring of old emotions, and old, dim thoughts and fears. And strange, familiar, age-old figures rise out of the past and shamble by, mute, threatening, grotesque and pitiful.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE SPRINGFIELD,
MASS.
NEWS

FEB 3 - 1924

When You Hear Music

By
Jennie Irene Mix

When they were building Symphony hall in Boston some wag suggested through the newspaper that over each exit be placed a sign reading—"This way out in case of Brahms."

The satire had in it as much truth as humor. In those days—the year was 1900—if a Brahms number was placed on a Boston symphony program a large majority of the subscribers made it a point to have other engagements on the day of the concert. Those who went because there were certain other compositions they wanted to hear lost their courage during the Brahms and fled in such numbers that, to quote DeWolfe Howe, historian of the orchestra, "At the close of a Brahms symphony there were more people on the stage than in the audience."

Today one of the most compelling drawing cards on an orchestra program in Boston is a Brahms symphony. At last Brahms has found his place in that city where for many years he was not only ignored, but derided. Many a champion fighting in his defense fell on the field of combat suffering as much derision as the composer for whom he gave battle.

If Boston, during the years when the city's reputation for culture was at its high, repudiated Brahms as a stolid heavy bore, the individual of today need make no apology if, for a time, he fails to respond to his music. The qualifying, "for a time," is herein set down with deliberate intention. For, given sufficient opportunity to hear Brahms, the discerning music lover is bound to yield to his influence. If this does not come to pass then let the music lover look within himself for the fault.

There is no surface beauty in Brahms, no emotion of ephemeral who said that Tschaikowsky's music always sounds better than it is. Of Brahms it may be said that his music it always better than it sounds—upon value. It was Edward MacDowell a first hearing.

But why this digression from Beethoven to Brahms? Because on the program of this concert we are all attending the Beethoven "Appassionata" sonata is followed by a group of three Brahms numbers.

A Titan Among Composers

These three pieces by Brahms, a scherzo, an intermezzo and a rhapsodie, make a more direct appeal than does the majority of this Titan's work. For Brahms was indeed a Titan among the composers. In stature not equal to Bach and Beethoven, although Hans von Buelow classed them as "the three Bs," an exaggeration founded on truth. At any rate, it can be said that no composer since Beethoven has proved himself as worthy as has Brahms of being called his legitimate successor.

Establishing acquaintance with a Titan is a more difficult and fearsome undertaking than establishing acquaintance with a person of normal stature and strength. The Titan, being capable of hurling thunderbolts, inspires dread. How do we know but that he has a thunderbolt up his sleeves even as we approach him? Or that he may not block our passage by standing in our way, as forbidding and impregnable as a granite mountain?

Having seen these Titanic qualities in Brahms many turn aside from what seems to them a mountain of difficulty in their progress toward musical appreciation and seek more easily traversed roads to their goal. Had they taken the trouble to examine the mountain closely they would have found that its granite surface contains spots of entrancing beauty; joyous sunshine; flowering meadows; haunts for lovers' trysts. And here and there lakes of clear water; gorges through which thunder angry turbulent streams; again—woods dark with mysteries that are never solved.

All this and much else of grandeur, beauty, tenderness, is missed by those who either refuse to listen to Brahm or, listening, do so with mind ar heart prejudiced against him. O[illegible] through a few of his songs doe make a quick appeal to the pul But, after one has learned to unde stand this Titan of thunderbolts and tenderness, allegiance to his ideals and achievements is thereafter unfailing.

An Age of Giants

"There were giants in those days," when Johannes Brahms lived. At the time he was born, (1833). Wagner was 20 years of age, Liszt 22, Schumann 23, Chopin 24. Beethoven had died but six years before. Tschaikowsky was born when Brahms was seven.

When Brahms was 20, he tramped all day to reach Duesseldorf (or was it two days?) that he might see Robert Schumann, great artist and critic. The reason he walked was because he had no money with which to ride. He arrived at Schumann's door, dusty, hungry, spent, the score of his first work, the C major sonata, under his arm. Schumann, always hospitable to youthful talent, received the stockily built, shy, awkward young man with cordiality. When he heard the sonata he exclaimed, "A genius!" In published articles he proclaimed the youthful Brahms as one who, more than any musician then living, would worthily sustain the fame of the great ones who had gone before him. Schumann saw instantly that here was not only a fresh and splendid genius bristling with originality, but one who even at this early age of 20, had a mastery of the technic of composition that would have done credit to the great Bach himself.

But for all this praise from Schumann and other musicians such as Liszt, Brahms's road to recognition was traveled as laboriously as his tramp to the home of Schumann. His champions rebelled at this, and in their eagerness to hasten his success did him more harm than good. As for Brahms, he seemed the only one unconcerned with what the public thought of him. He was an inflexible idealist, satisfied if he could measure up to his aims in writing a composition and willing to let the composition speak for itself until it gained recognition. As for changing his aims the quicker to gain recognition, such a thought seemed never to enter his mind. In comparison with other composers of his day he lived a reticent quiet life. And, like Beethoven, he never married.

Looking For Syncopation

A man who shall here be nameless but whose name would instantly be recognized if it were set down, was heard to say after a recital composed wholly of songs by Brahms:

Certainly, one cannot call that diabolical, hair-raising scherzo in B minor by Chopin humorous. Nor can we call this scherzo by Brahms on our program—it is the one in E flat minor—humorous, although it is light-hearted and captivating. The harmonic foundation is one that only a composer learned in the technic of his art could construct. From it is developed the airiest and most graceful of music, that goes soaring along as easily as a bird on the wing. Yet it has that quality found in all Brahms music, no matter how spirited it may be—the quality of never letting the heart run away with the head.

The Man of Tender Sentiment

An intermezzo in A flat, as dreamy and loverlike as anything [illegible] by Chopin, shows us in the second number of this group Brahms [illegible] of tender sentiment. But wo[illegible] to the pianist who turns this sentiment into sentimentality! The intermezzo is but two pages long—a masterpiece in miniature. It would be futile to speak in terms of analysis of this lyric gem.

Then comes the magnificent rhapsodie in G minor which from first note to last is Brahms, the Titan. He is riding a storm of passionate emotional intensity, carried swiftly onward through masses of tone that tell of tragedy, triumph, supreme daring. Sheer elementalism. But cast into a faultless form. The structure as bare of the superfluous as the skeleton of a skyscraper.

What about the austere, self-contained, reticent Brahms, one asks after hearing this tremendous outburst. It was written when he was well toward the close of life, yet has in it the full-gloried vitality of youth. Who was it—James Gibbons Huneker?—who said that in this tone-picture Brahms, the philosopher, burns the boats of his old age behind him and becomes for a time a youthful Faust in search of a sensation.

If you are among those who have thought Brahms staid and colorless, throw this prejudice aside as you listen to this rhapsodie. If you do not respond to its dynamic intensity, its glorious freedom—well—if you do not respond—.

Beethoven and Brahms—noble company for the beginning of a recital. But will a man who has been able to play the "Appassionata" and these Brahms numbers as this pianist has played them interpret Chopin with equal understanding? He is about to answer this question. For now we have on our program the inevitable Chopin group.

[Copyright, 1924, by Jennie Irene Mix]

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN FRANCISCO,
CAL.
CHRONICLE

FEB 3 - 1924

New York Fetes Scotti, Montemezzi, Hofmann

With the New Year has come much new music. The promised production of Laparra's "Habenara," at the Metropolitan, was part of a double bill, with a trifle of Richetelli's "Il Compagnacci," music of light weight. We had the Scotti benefit, in which the veteran baritone celebrated his twenty-fifth anniversary as a member of the opera company (a record which, it is said, is unique), by the performance of "L'Amore dei Tre Re." With the orchestra, too we celebrated new music, as well as New Year. The Boston symphony gave us Bliss' Color Symphony, Hadley and Van Hoogstraten, American novelties of less importance, however, than the Bliss work. Damrosch is going on with the cycle—and Spalding played the concerto.

Probably the Scotti party, as one may term it, was the most important event of the month. A record such as his, is rare. His consummate acting, his finished phrase, and his fine musical feeling, make him a rare artist, one who never disappoints his public. There is no Scarpia like his, and that is why the benefit performance was "Tosca." Fleta and Jeritz were the fellow artists. The house was packed, at top prices, and the monde musicale and those of social light as well, assembled to do Scotti honor. There were speeches, presentations, all the marks of loving respect—a gala night for everybody. Later there was a dinner and more speeches at the Biltmore.

The Montemezzi tribute, too, was unique. It is seldom we single out the man who wrote the music. The performance was fine—Miss Bori, the first Fiora, was in the part—Didur, too, as Archibaldo, as at the premiere here ten years ago. There was the unusual acknowledgment of the American and Italian anthems being played between the first and second acts—and the few words of Mr. Cravath expressed much of the esteem in which the musical public honor the composer, as one of Italy's foremost composers.

Laparra's "Haberna" is a gloomy, but very dramatic work in which Miss Easton, Danise and Tokatyan participated. Its three short acts are of a different Spain than we are accustomed to. It has the dark shadows of a Zuloago painting. There is a fatefulness in the tragic story, which grips. Musically, it is very interesting. The composer won a Prix de Rome, is one of the middle group of French composers, one whose message is personal and very sincere. The opera was well mounted, excellently sung, and deserving of a great success.

Of the Germans over on Thirty-fourth street, one is happy to say that they are giving a fine account of themselves. While there are no star performers, there are no poor casts. The average is unusually high. The spirit is excellent. The choral ensemble, in attack as in phrase, are well schooled. Performances of "The Flying Dutchman," "Tristan," and the "Walkure" were uniformly good. One cannot easily forget the dominating Isolde of Mme. Elsa Alsen, comparable, one hears on good authority, with Nordica's and Fremstad's. Elsa Gentner Fischer, who was the heroine in the premiere of D'Albert's "Tote Augen," has a Jeritza voice, evenly and well produced, and colorful throughout its great range. This new opera, in a prologue and a long act (divided into two sections), is very beautiful, and extraordinarily effective on the stage. It has to do with an ancient Christ-miracle. The religious atmosphere is reverently held, and heightens the dramatic interest. The opera was a genuine success.

Listing the interesting concerts—and there certainly are enough of them to satisfy the divertigent tastes of even the New York public—let me comment briefly on a few of the unforgettable ones. McCormack's appearance at the Manhattan was an anniversary affair—fourteen years since he made his first American appearance, at the recommendation of Mme. Tetrazzini. In honor of the event, many of the old guard, as well as people prominent in all walks of wild temperament, which is assoc ated with such locks. But that h is a finer artist, is gospel truth.

The Boston Symphony introduce a Color Symphony of Arthur Blis
—a young Englishman now visiti here. The name implies an arb trary color feeling—a matter rea individual. Outside the fact that has this color sense, it is a brillia clever music, the work of a man w thoroughly understands his mediu but that it is original, or extraordi ary, is not my opinion. Its signi cance lies rather in the fact that is the work of a young man of tale whose name will bear remembranc
On its own account it is less impor ant.

The Philadelphia men gave an a Hofmann program—introducing pianist under his own name as co
poser—leaving the nom de plum Dvorsky aside. An early [illegible] and a symphonic [illegible] Castle," were given, as also a wo for piano and orchestra, "Chroma con." The music has no genuine i spiration—is modern, because that the pose, and is not even well score
But as the work of Hofmann it g by, and the personal reaction of th audience to the composer was mark of affection, rather than o recognition of his merit as compos

The Beethoven Association ag left its namesake off the progra and presented a Brahms trio op 1 with Samaroff, Kindler and Rich a beautiful ensemble. Francis Roger in a Tudor group of songs show plainly how far we have grow away. In a work of Schumann's f two pianos, Mme. Mero was t other artist.

A new Hindemith quartet, repr sentative of the latest German te dencies, presented by the New Y Quartet, is a work, uneven texture, but significant in its re against old convention. He kn what he wants to say and says
The same reaction is noticeable, t in the new music presented by t League of Composers at their seco concert. They gave us Bax (a qu tet with piano—not particularly i dividual, perhaps an early work) Bartok sonato for violin and pia played beautifully by Stoessel a Mme. Mero. My reaction is that t is the most important work heard
New York in months. A Schoenbe work introduced a voice (with tex in two of its four movements. T first was rather conventional. P haps that is why it was so bea tiful. The rest was a seeking, a rather an unsuccessful search. T final music was by Lord Bern who, no matter what else he l has a mordant sense of humor.
three valses parodied, and ra cleverly, the worst of Chopin, Str etc, and were genuine amusem after the rest.

Pianists have held forth—Do nanyi—Friedberg (all Chopin time), the twins—Maier and Pat son—Mme. Elly Ney. The Dam Beethoven cycle has reached sixth and seventh symphonies.
the Philharmonic programs we Ravelu's Rhapsodie Espagnole fascinating orchestral timbres, a the ever refreshing "Apprenti" Dukas. Of course, there were Brah and other "stabilizers"—and t proof of Van Hoogstraten's pop larity is full houses and much si cere enthusiasm.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD

FEB 3 1924

WORDS and MUSIC

By Deems Taylor

ANY ONE who has ever heard the prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" or "The Afternoon of a Faun" must have wondered, at one time or another, how it would have felt to be present at the first performance of a masterpiece. How did the people respond who heard it first? Did they recognize its greatness at once, or did they accept it as just another novelty, something to be heard with polite interest, briefly discussed, and then forgotten? For a long time I have been asking this question. Hearing the constant, steady trickle of new music that wanders through any New York music season, would I ever have the luck to be present at the first performance of a real masterwork, something destined to be a landmark in musical history? And if I ever should, would I realize it at the time, and how would I feel and behave about it?

Well, I have heard one. I heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra play Igor Stravinsky's "The Rites of Spring" in Carnegie Hall last Thursday night, and I believe that it is the most important piece of contemporary music since "The Afternoon of a Faun" and "Pelleas and Melisande," a work that, half a century hence, will be found to have begun a new epoch in music. So far as the rest of the world is concerned, this cannot be termed a momentous or even important discovery. "The Rites of Spring" is eleven years old, and a good many people have found out long before this that it [illegible] great [illegible] of art, and have said so; but it is extremely important to me to have made that discovery, however belatedly for myself.

* * *

AS for the emotions aroused by the hearing of a masterpiece for the first time, they are, as might have been expected, a bit unsatisfactory—or, rather, one's efforts to describe and justify them are unsatisfactory. This hearer, like many others at Carnegie Hall last Thursday, left the performance in what can best be described as a state of dazed exhilaration. For this music of Stravinsky's is no intellectual tidbit, to be enjoyed and appraised in a state of judicial calm or gentle reverie. It is, as all real music fundamentally is, a direct assault on the emotions through the medium of intuitively arranged sounds. Consequently its effect, although powerful in the extreme, is almost impossible to describe in words.

First of all, the greatness of the music lies in its essentially musical, rather than literary, character. Stravinsky's own explanation of its genesis is very much to the point: "The embryo is a theme that came to me when I had completed the 'Fire-Bird.' As this theme with that which followed was conceived in a strong, brutal manner, I took as a pretext for development, for the evocation of this music, the Russian prehistoric epoch, since I am a Russian. But note well that this idea came from the music; the music did not come from the idea. My work is architectonic, not anecdotal; objective, not [illegible] tive construction." And it is just this impression that his music conveys. He is not trying to illustrate a story, or to prove anything. He is not even experimenting, except in so far [illegible] every work of art is an experiment. He has conceived [illegible] terms of itself, and has worked it out as the protago [illegible] enery of his drama.

*

NATURALLY, he has a definite mood, [illegible] of moods, to convey. Music is a backward art, compa[illegible] with literature and the plastic arts, but it is becoming increasingly articulate with every decade, and it is no longer possible, as it was a century ago, to treat it simply as a pleasing combination of me[illegible]ess sounds. The very fact that dissonance is so rapidly taking its [illegible] in the composer's vocabulary is proof of the art's present-day expressiveness. When music was merely a sound-pattern immediate beauty was one of its primary attributes, as it is of any purely decorative design. But music to-day is coming to have as definite a meaning as words have (although these meanings are by no means interchangeable), and what is commonly called "beauty" is no more to be demanded of it than "beauty" is demanded of Rodin's "Le Penseur." It is inevitable that a modern composer have some definite thing to say in his music, although that thing may not necessarily be describable in words. In "The Rites of Spring," Stravinsky, as he hints, sought to convey—or to re-create—the emotions that stirred primitive man when he performed strange and terrible rites to welcome the fertile spring and placate his powerful and terrifying gods. That, of course, is quite different from taking a prepared scenario for a ballet, and setting music to it.

* * *

IN one respect The Rites of Spring" does not represent the furthest point reached by Stravinsky in his art. In this work he employs the orchestra of Richard Strauss and Gustav Mahler—an immense organization enlisting triple and quintuple combinations of woodwinds, eight horns, six trumpets, four trombones and two tubas, five kettledrums and numerous other percussion instruments—as well as the usual augmented string choirs. Since "Le Sacre" he has steadily reduced his instrumental demands, striving—as in "Le Rossignol" and notably in the "Symphonie Pour Instruments a Vent"—to gain his ends with steadily diminishing orchestral means. In sheer musical worth, however, in naked, elemental power, "The Rites of Spring" stands unique among those of his works that have been heard here.

What makes the work so tremendously satisfying is the absolute faith Stravinsky has kept with himself and his age. Confronted with the problem of conveying primitive emotions to a twentieth century audience, he has solved it in the only way it could be solved—in terms of the twentieth century. The effect of his music is certainly primitive; out of the orchestra come rentless, thudding rhythms that beat into the ears like the sound of naked feet upon baked earth, like the thump and howl of war drums in a tropic forest. The music sings, and shrieks, and snarls, until one's heart beats with something of the nameless terror that must have oppressed the Piltdown man as he lay listening to the noises of the primeval night. And this is all done by music, in terms of music, without the shadow of any suggestion by associative or imitative device. There are one or two Russian folk-tunes in the score, but they are indistinguishable from those of Stravinsky's own devising. And primitive as its rhythms are, in their effect, they are as far as the pole from anything that a primitive man's intelligence would be likely to invent. A striking evidence of Stravinsky's artistic integrity, I think, lies in the fact that, although he employs five kettledrums in the score, he uses no tomtom or any other form of savage drum that might evoke the primitive past by mere association of ideas.

Certain things, of course, are not in the work, although one is convinced that, did he need them, Stravinsky could supply them. There is little gayety in it, for one thing, and almost nothing suggesting tenderness or any lyric quality. They are not there simply because there is no place for them. Primitive man, as Stravinsky sees him—and rightly no doubt—did not smile and did not love. His life was anger, and bewilderment, and fear, and lust, and "The Rites of Spring" is the very essence of that life. Monstrous, hairy and terrible, it stalks through the orchestra like some obscene pagan god. And as one listens one feels the stirring of old emotions, and old, dim thoughts and fears. And strange, familiar, age-old figures rise out of the past and shamble by, mute, threatening, grotesque and pitiful.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE SPRINGFIELD,
MASS.
NEWS

FEB 3 - 1924

When You Hear Music

By
Jennie Irene Mix

When they were building Symphony hall in Boston some wag suggested through the newspaper that over each exit be placed a sign reading:—"This way out in case of Brahms."

The satire had in it as much truth as humor. In those days—the year was 1900—if a Brahms number was placed on a Boston symphony program a large majority of the subscribers made it a point to have other engagements on the day of the concert. Those who went because there were certain other compositions they wanted to hear lost their courage during the Brahms and fled in such numbers that, to quote DeWolfe Howe, historian of the orchestra, "At the close of a Brahms symphony there were more people on the stage than in the audience."

Today one of the most compelling drawing cards on an orchestra program in Boston is a Brahms symphony. At last Brahms has found his place in that city where for many years he was not only ignored, but derided. Many a champion fighting in his defense fell on the field of combat suffering as much derision as the composer for whom he gave battle.

If Boston, during the years when the city's reputation for culture was at its high, repudiated Brahms as a stolid heavy bore, the individual of today need make no apology if, for a time, he fails to respond to his music. The qualifying, "for a time," is herein set down with deliberate intention. For, given sufficient opportunity to hear Brahms, the discerning music lover is bound to yield to his influence. If this does not come to pass then let the music lover look within himself for the fault.

There is no surface beauty in Brahms, no emotion of ephemeral who said that Tschaikowsky's music always sounds better than it is. Of Brahms it may be said that his music it always better than it sounds—upon value. It was Edward MacDowell a first hearing.

But why this digression from Beethoven to Brahms? Because on the program of this concert we are all attending the Beethoven "Appassionata" sonata is followed by a group of three Brahms numbers.

A Titan Among Composers

These three pieces by Brahms, a scherzo, an intermezzo and a rhapsodie, make a more direct appeal than does the majority of this Titan's work. For Brahms was indeed a Titan among the composers. In stature not equal to Bach and Beethoven, although Hans von Buelow classed them as "the three Bs," an exaggeration founded on truth. At any rate, it can be said that no composer since Beethoven has proved himself as worthy as has Brahms of being called his legitimate successor.

Establishing acquaintance with a Titan is a more difficult and fearsome undertaking than establishing acquaintance with a person of normal stature and strength. The Titan, being capable of hurling thunderbolts, inspires dread. How do we know but that he has a thunderbolt up his sleeves even as we approach him? Or that he may not block our passage by standing in our way, as forbidding and impregnable as a granite mountain?

Having seen these Titanic qualities in Brahms many turn aside from what seems to them a mountain of difficulty in their progress toward musical appreciation and seek more easily traversed roads to their goal. Had they taken the trouble to examine the mountain closely they would have found that its granite surface contains spots of entrancing beauty; joyous sunshine; flowering meadows; haunts for lovers' trysts. And here and there lakes of clear water; gorges through which thunder angry turbulent streams; again—woods dark with mysteries that are never solved.

All this and much else of grandeur, beauty, tenderness, is missed by those who either refuse to listen to Brahms or, listening, do so with mind and heart prejudiced against him. Only through a few of his songs does he make a quick appeal to the public. But, after one has learned to understand this Titan of thunderbolts and tenderness, allegiance to his ideals and achievements is thereafter unfailing.

An Age of Giants

"There were giants in those days," when Johannes Brahms lived. At the time he was born, (1833). Wagner was 20 years of age, Liszt 22, Schumann 23, Chopin 24. Beethoven [illegible] but [illegible]

in "The Hunchback of Notre Dame" Last Two Times Today

strenuous. Miss Murray herself is a scintillating as usual, doing the re quisite amount of wild Russian danc ing with incidental mujik. During he moments of repression as [illegible] meek li tle sister, she displays a [illegible] prising ability as an actress.

WOULD DYNAMITE UGLY FRENCH MONUMENT

Paris, Jan. 21—The dynamiting large numbers of French monume is recommended by several artistic ly inclined newspaper contributors the surest method of beautifying Pa and France. One of these writers cently issued a public call for vol teers to blow up some admittedly u buildings and statues, such as tha Jules Simon in front of the Com Francaise, that of Gambetta in Tuileries Gardens, the Troca Palace, the Opera Comique and tain department stores. His appar ly serious proposal excited wide retical approval, but many of [illegible] would instantly recognized if it were set down, was heard to say after a recital composed wholly of songs by Brahms:

Certainly, one cannot call that diabolical, hair-raising scherzo in B minor by Chopin humorous. Nor can we call this scherzo by Brahms on our program—it is the one in E flat minor—humorous, although it is light-hearted and captivating. The harmonic foundation is one that only a composer learned in the technic of his art could construct. From it is developed the airiest and most graceful of music, that goes soaring along as easily as a bird on the wing. Yet it has that quality found in all Brahms music, no matter how spirited it may be—the quality of never letting the heart run away with the head.

The Man of Tender Sentiment

An intermezzo in A flat, as dreamy and loverlike as anything ever penned by Chopin, shows us in the second number of this group, Brahms, the man of tender sentiment. But wee

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN FRANCISCO,
CAL.
CHRONICLE

FEB 3 - 1924

New York Fetes Scotti, Montemezzi, Hofmann

With the New Year has come much new music. The promised production of Laparra's "Habenera," at the Metropolitan, was part of a double bill, with a trifle of Richetelli's "Il Compagnacci," music of light weight. We had the Scotti benefit, in which the veteran baritone celebrated his twenty-fifth anniversary as a member of the opera company (a record which, it is said, is unique), by the performance of "L'Amore dei Tre Re." With the orchestra, too we celebrated new music, as well as New Year. The Boston symphony gave us Bliss' Color Symphony, Hadley and Van Hoogstraten, American novelties of less importance, however than the Bliss work. Damrosch is going on with the cycle—and Spalding played the concerto.

Probably the Scotti party, as one may term it, was the most important event of the month. A record such as his, is rare. His consummate acting, his finished phrase, and his fine musical feeling, make him a rare artist, one who never disappoints his public. There is no Scarpia like his, and that is why the benefit performance was "Tosca." Fleta and Jeritz were the fellow artists. The house was packed, at top prices, and the monde musicale and those of social light as well, assembled to do Scotti honor. There were speeches, presentations, all the marks of loving respect—a gala night for everybody. Later there was a dinner and more speeches at the Biltmore.

The Montemezzi tribute, too, was unique. It is seldom we single out the man who wrote the music. The performance was fine—Miss Bori, the first Fiora, was in the part—Didur, too, as Archibaldo, as at the premiere here ten years ago. There was the unusual acknowledgment of the American and Italian anthems being played between the first and second acts—and the few words of Mr. Cravath expressed much of the esteem in which the musical public honor the composer, as one of Italy's foremost composers.

Laparra's "Haberna" is a gloomy, but very dramatic work in which Miss Easton, Danise and Tokatyan participated. Its three short acts are of a different Spain than we are accustomed to. It has the dark shadows of a Zuloago painting. There is a fatefulness in the tragic story, which grips. Musically, it is very interesting. The composer won a Prix de Rome, is one of the middle group of French composers, one whose message is personal and very sincere. The opera was well mounted, excellently sung, and deserving of a great success.

Of the Germans over on Thirty-fourth street, one is happy to say that they are giving a fine account of themselves. While there are no star performers, there are no poor casts. The average is unusually high. The spirit is excellent. The choral ensemble, in attack as in phrase, are well schooled. Performances of "The Flying Dutchman," "Tristan," and the "Walkure" were uniformly good. One cannot easily forget the dominating Isolde of Mme. Elsa Alsen, comparable, one hears on good authority, with Nordica's and Fremstad's, Elsa Gentner Fischer, who was the heroine in the premiere of D'Albert's "Tote Augen," has a Jeritza voice, evenly and well produced, and colorful throughout its great range This new opera, in a prologue and a long act (divided into two sections), is very beautiful, and extraordinarily effective on the stage. It has to do with an ancient Christ-miracle. The religious atmosphere is reverently held, and heightens the dramatic interest. The opera was a genuine success.

Listing the interesting concerts—and there certainly are enough of them to satisfy the divertigent tastes of even the New York public—let me comment briefly on a few of the unforgettable ones. McCormack's appearance at the Manhattan was an anniversary affair—fourteen years since he made his first American appearance, at the recommendation of Mme. Tetrazzini. In honor of the event, many of the old guard, as well as people prominent in all walks of life, were present. The growth of a real artist is always a joy and a matter of one's artistic pride.

Mischa Elman, who played at the Settlement Music school concert, shows, at least as far as my personal observation goes, added poise and assurance. There is less sticky sentimentality and more of the warmth with restraint, which mark artistic stature. He has, perhaps in losing his hair (alas, the truth, he is becoming bald), lost some of that wild temperament, which is assoc ated with such locks. But that h is a finer artist, is gospel truth.

The Boston Symphony introduce a Color Symphony of Arthur Blis —a young Englishman now visitin here. The name implies an arb trary color feeling—a matter rea individual. Outside the fact that has this color sense, it is a brillia clever music, the work of a man w thoroughly understands his mediu but that it is original, or extraordi ary, is not my opinion. Its signi cance lies rather in the fact that is the work of a young man of tale whose name will bear remembranc On its own account it is less import ant.

The Philadelphia men gave an a Hofmann program—introducing pianist under his own name as co poser—leaving the nom de plume Dvorsky aside. An early [illegible] and a symphon[illegible] Castle," were given, as also a wo for piano and orchestra, "Chroma con." The music has no genuine i spiration—is modern, because that the pose, and is not even well score But as the work of Hofmann it go by, and the personal reaction of th audience to the composer was mark of affection, rather than recognition of his merit as compos

The Beethoven Association ag left its namesake off the progra and presented a Brahms trio op 1 with Samaroff, Kindler and Rich a beautiful ensemble. Francis Roger in a Tudor group of songs show plainly how far we have grow away. In a work of Schumann's f two pianos, Mme. Mero was t other artist.

A new Hindemith quartet, repr sentative of the latest German te dencies, presented by the New Yo Quartet, is a work, uneven texture, but significant in its re against old convention. He kn what he wants to say and says The same reaction is noticeable, t in the new music presented by t League of Composers at their seco concert. They gave us Bax (a qu tet with piano—not particularly i dividual, perhaps an early work) Bartok sonata for violin and pia played beautifully by Stoessel a Mme. Mero. My reaction is that t' is the most important work heard New York in months. A Schoenbe work introduced a voice (with tex in two of its four movements. T first was rather conventional. P haps that is why it was so be tiful. The rest was a seeking, a rather an unsuccessful search. T final music was by Lord Bern who, no matter what else he l has a mordant sense of humor. three valses parodied, and ra cleverly, the worst of Chopin, Str etc, and were genuine amusen after the rest.

Pianists have held forth—Do nanyi—Friedberg (all Chopin t time), the twins—Maier and Pat son—Mme. Elly Ney. The Dam Beethoven cycle has reached sixth and seventh symphonies. the Philharmonic programs we Ravelu's Rhapsodie Espagnole fascinating orchestral timbres, a the ever refreshing "Apprenti" Dukas. Of course, there were Brah and other "stabilizers"—and t proof of Van Hoogstraten's pop arity is full houses and much si cere enthusiasm.

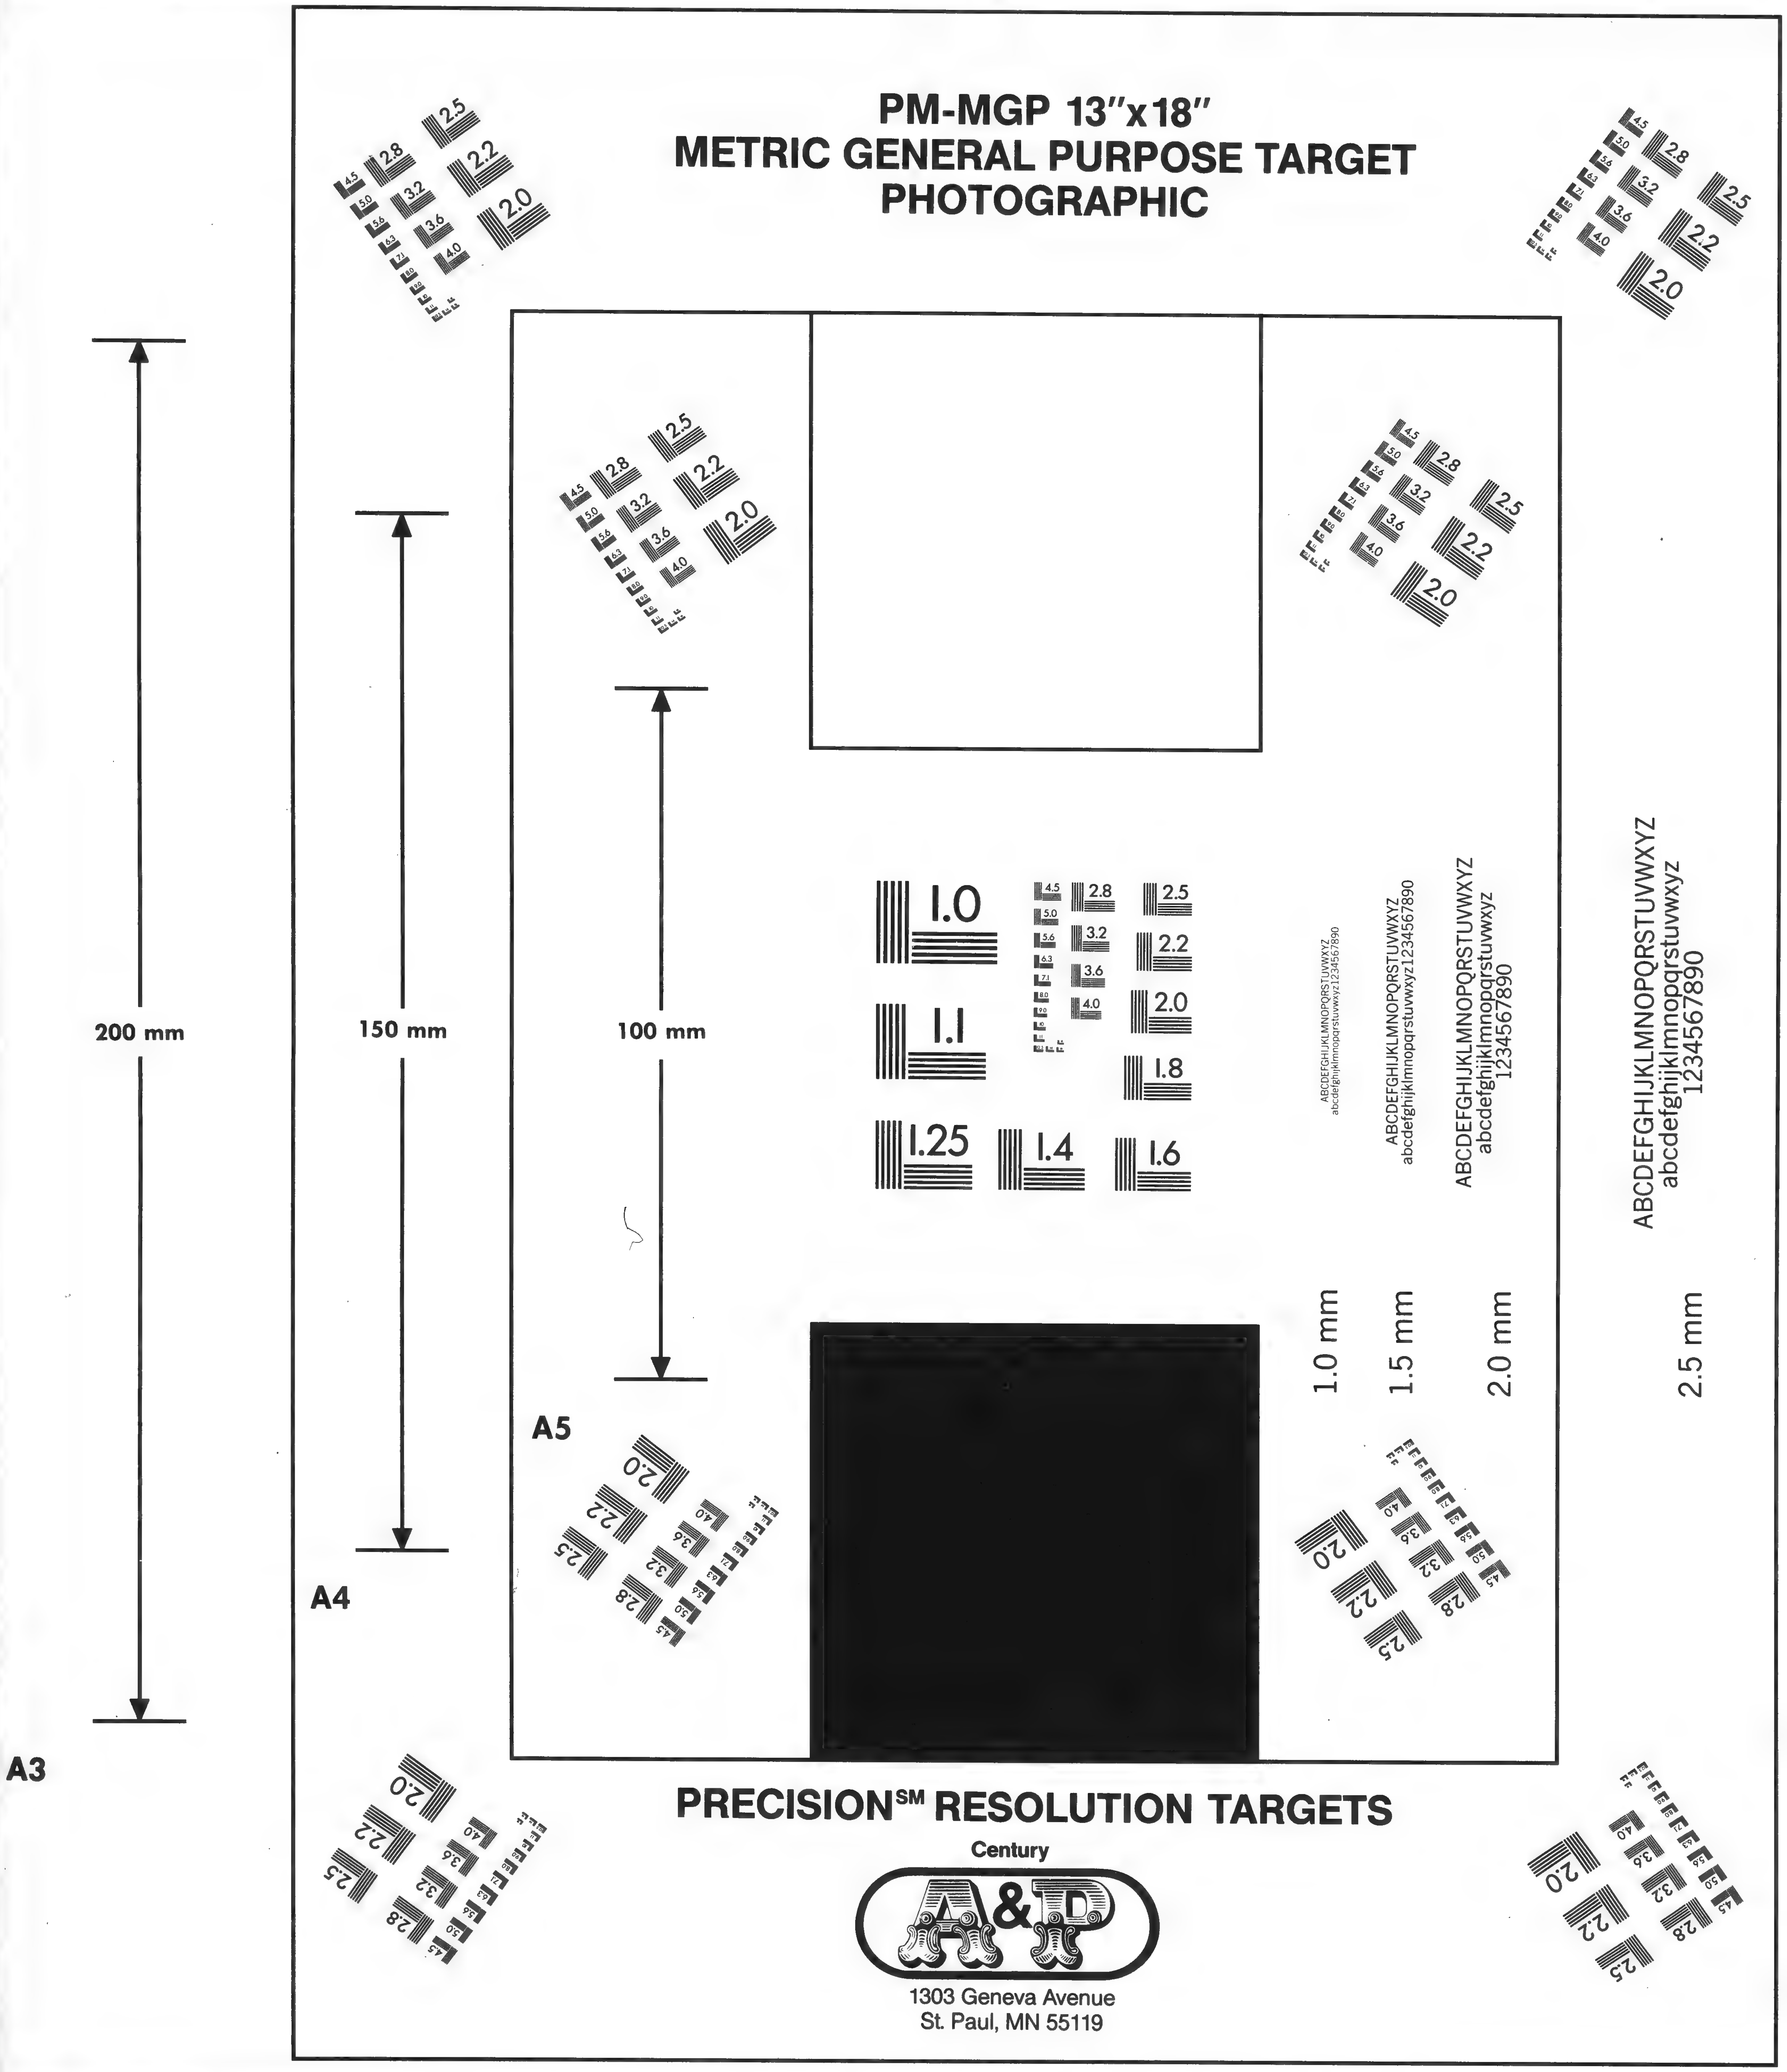
---

depth, and sonority s, while M. Monteux gave a spirited thorough unity ormance of solois good sized, thoug udience waxed mo

[210]

REDUCTION
RATIO
12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A3
A4
A5
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
8.0
9.0
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ING POST

FEB 9 - 1924

Stravinsky, Monteux and The Boston Orchestra

Who Will Be Its Next Conductor, Kussevitzky or Schneevoigt?—Stravinsky's Past, Present and Future

By HENRY T. FINCK

Who will be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season?

It has been understood for some time that the admirable but rather wild and woolly Russian, Kussevitzky, had been chosen for that great position, but apparently the directors are still in an experimental stage, for here is Professor Georg Schneevoigt (whose engaging face is pictured on another page) coming over today at the special invitation of the directors of the Boston orchestra to conduct its regular concerts on March 7 and 8.

Professor Schneevoigt enjoys a reputation abroad not unlike that of Willem Mengelberg, and every artist of international note has appeared under his baton with his famous orchestra in Stockholm; among them have been Mme. Cahier, Rachmaninoff, Hubermann, Hofmann, and Melba. Like many other famous conductors, Professor Schneevoigt gained a name for himself as an instrumentalist and was solo 'cellist with European orchestras with whom he later appeared as conductor.

Whether the new conductor is to be Kussevitzky or Schneevoigt, many will be sorry to have Pierre Monteux go back to Paris. He has not always struck twelve, or even eleven; but as an interpreter of French music he has excelled, and still more in the modern Russian repertory. New York came to know him first in conection with the Ballet Russe, which gave such admirable performances, particularly of Stravinsky's "Petroushka" and "The Fire Bird."

It is therefore not singular that M. Monteux's greatest triumph—at least in this city—during the five years of his leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra came last week, when he brought out Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring" (La Sacre de Printemps). It aroused unbounded enthusiasm and the critics were practically unanimous in proclaiming it a masterpiece, not a few heralding it as epoch making.

Glorious "Petroushka"

Personally, I think that Stravinsky's epoch-making work was his "Petroushka." I "point with pride" to the following paragraphs I wrote about that in the EVENING POST in the year 1919:

"Stravinsky's music is as fantastic, as droll, as grotesque as the action. It is epoch-making music; the first successful attempt to infuse a whole musical score with humor—a quality so rare in this art that some have denied its existence. Here it is, life size; humor and fun as genuine as Mark Twain's or Artemus Ward's, and oh! what a relief and a delight to hear something really new in the tonal art! What Schoenberg, Ornstein, and other deliberate cacophonists have tried to do and failed Stravinsky has done with success; with huge success he has cut a new path in the jungle of dissonances and in so doing has opened vistas of new melodic, harmonic, rhythmic, and orchestral delights.

"He doesn't fling pots of paint in the public's face, but paints new pictures with new tints. No padding in this music; he goes straight to the point every time; he calls a spade a spade and not an agricultural instrument; he lets the instruments discourse singly or in new simple groups; instead of sentimental Mascagnian intermezzos he has the jumbo drums fill up the scenic interstices with lusty, thunderous ruffles; he brings in the piano, as well as the celesta, the triangle, the xylophone, the metallophone—who cares? Why should not they have their innings? Liszt's example and forecasts are coming into their own.

"Great is Stravinsky's "Petroushka" the best thing that has come out of Russia since Tchaikovsky's pathetic swan song. Did you note the gripping rhythms of the melodious music when the puppets come to life and begin to dance? Did you—but no, these things cannot be described; words are only words and music begins where words end."

Bold, but Not Bad

Propped by this enthusiastic tribute, have I not the right to proclaim myself high priest of Stravinsky?

How do I reconcile this claim with the reputation I have achieved as a fierce, irreconcilable opponent of the "futurists" or cacophonists?

Easiest thing in the world. The head over the article from which I have just quoted was "STRAVINSKY: BOLD BUT NOT BAD."

That sums up in four words the difference between Stravinsky and most of the others of the motley crew of "modernists." They are bold and bad.

They specialize in dissonance because they have nothing new to say, using strange and ugly sounds as a smoke screen to hide their sterility; whereas Stravinsky uses new tonal clashes because he has big tragic or comic ideas which call for them.

Almost all the other futurists are barnacles on the Stravinsky ship. What I have been trying to do is to scrape them off.

They are funny fellows,

Those there would soon be in our midst hundreds of epoch-making geniuses—and not a drop to drink!

The Future of Stravinsky

There is one discouraging thing about Stravinsky which depresses me. He is so original and delectable a composer that we should hear as much of him as possible. But how can we? His best music is associated with ballets: "Fire Bird," "Petroushka," "Rites of Spring." But artistic ballet of this kind is a thing Russian which it will be extremely difficult to acclimate in this country.

To be sure, we can have the music of the Stravinsky ballets given as absolute music in our concert halls. But then we get only one side of it, missing the delightful congruity with the action which is half its charm.

There are also some pieces which this composer wrote directly for the concert hall. I recall three that have been heard here: some one-minute pieces played by the Flonzaley Quartet, a ridiculous clarinet solo, and the "Symphonies for Wind Instruments," played here by the Philadelphia Orchestra last Tuesday. None of those comes in inspiration within a mile of the ballets; which suggests the sad thought that Stravinsky needs the stage scenery and action to fertilize his imagination, and these we can seldom have.

Remains the opera "The Nightingale." Let us have that, please.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
FEB 14 1924
From
JOURNAL,
Chicago, Ill.

MUSIC

By EUGENE STINSON

The Chicago Civic Opera sends word from Cleveland, where it is singing, of arrangements which will make one Toti Dal Monte its guest coloratura soprano for next season. Dal Monte is now singing in Paris, and will soon be heard in Australia with Nellie Melba's opera company. Frank St. Leger, one of the Chicago Opera's assistant conductors, will also take part in Dame Melba's enterprime.

Of all progressive composers, Igor Stravinsky, the Russian, is the most distinguished. In his virtues he combines the farthest goal and the best aim. He tries for as much as any other living writer of music, and more than most. His work is received with universal respect, even in those quarters where patience for the new is seldom possessed.

Stravinsky's music called "Spring Consecration" was recently given its first New York hearing by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting. Monteux conducted the first performance of the music when Serge Diaghileff, that Reinhardt of the ballet, staged it in Paris. The date was May 29, 1913. Nijinsky had devised the steps, Nicholas Roerich the scene. The Paris audience contributed a riot. All in all the affair was a conspicuous one.

"Spring Consecration" was played in concert form in Paris ten years ago. It was first heard in America at the hands of the Philadelphia Symphony orchestra March 3, 1922, when the enterprising Leopold Stokowski directed it. The Boston Symphony has also performed the piece in its own sanctuary.

More Stravinsky music revealed to eager New Yorkers, and this time by the Philadelphian Stokowski, is his "Symphonies for Wind Instruments."

The "symphonies" was first played in Queen's hall, London, June 10, 1921. Sergei Koussevitsky, who next season will succeed Monteux as leader of the famous Boston orchestra, was conductor. London was distressed.

Chicago has had as yet only innocent experiences with Stravinsky's early music.

Prof. Schneevoight

Conductor of the Konsertfoereningen in Stockholm, who will lead the Boston Symphony in two concerts, March 7 and 8, as guest conductor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE MONTREAL
CANADA
ISSUE OF Star

FEB 9 1924.

MUSIC IN NEW YORK

New oYrk, Feb. 8.

Curiously enough, this same year which has brought us Beethoven in unprecedented doses, has done as much for Stravinsky. One by one the works of Stravinsky, the much maligned and much exalted, are coming to us after successes elsewhere. Boston, Philadelphia and all of Europe have accepted him; New York is now ready to listen. And it was Pierre Monteux, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who had to bring us Le Sacre du Printemps.

When Mr. Monteux conducted this for the first time with the Russian Ballet in Paris, 1913, they say the indignation of the audience stopped the performance. It was hissed, screeched and jeered off the stage. Last week in Carnegie Hall—and remember, American audiences are not nearly as open-minded as the European—only seventeen people, mostly old people, left their seats during its performance. One mature woman, caught midway between her seat and the exit by a virulent Stravinsky chord, made up of four kettledrums, a bass drum, cymbals and assorted instruments, was seen to wince and look to her escort for support. But on the whole the audience was respectful, attentive and highly enthusiastic. Another accusedly insane man of music has officially been declared sane.

Le Sacre du Printemps is translated as The Rite of Spring. It was written originally for ballet and is now played in concert form in two sections, the first describing the primitive gathering for the spring festival, and the second the choosing of some young girl who must dance herself to death as a sacrifice to the gods who control the fertility of the earth.

It has been hailed as the greatest of Stravinsky's works by those who say the Russian holds no mystery of chord or melodic progression for them. Well it may be. A single hearing leaves one with an impression of tremendous music, a work which, if it intends to convey an idea of the barbaric and primitive emotion, does so in an unparalleled way. Composers have often tried to represent barbarism with exotic rythms, but there has been no attempt before this where the clash of notes has worked so successfully toward that end. The parts of this composition in which Stravinsky works up to the dances, and the dances themselves, are overpowering in their effect and volume of sound. It is the music of the war cry, of the ecstatic primitive whose gods of nature demanded blood and the body for their appeasing, of life as it progresses on the purely emotional, instinctive plane.

Stravinsky's orchestration in this, as in his other works, is a marvel. Not one hearing nor anything but an analysis of the score can tell how he gets his combinations of tones and how a clear impression is obtained from the melee of sound. Its texture is highly complicated, but its difficult construction does not make itself felt in the hearing. Le Sacre marks another step in our musical education.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE GLOUCESTER
MASS.
TIMES
AUG 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Famous Organization to Give Concert at Salem, Sunday Afternoon.

An event of prime importance will be the coming visit of the internationally celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra of 100 musicians, which is ssociation.

ODAY'S CALENDAR OF SPORTS:
Racing—Meeting of Business Men's
3.15 o'clock.

This orchestra has been for years considered one of the most remarkable organizations of its kind in the world. Its name stands for the utmost perfection in musical performance. These supreme qualities are the outcome of more than 40 years of endeavor.

The history of the orchestra makes a fine record of high purpose, administrative wisdom, and munificence on the part of its founder. Every effort was directed toward artistic supremacy. One after another of the world's greatest conductors devoted their best towards the further refinement of the ensemble. Nothing was spared to bring the first musicians of Europe to make up the ranks.

Hence the ensemble, in glow of tone, in clear cut unanimity and delicate balance of choirs, is the envy of all orchestras. It requires a remarkable leader to shape this ensemble and to evoke from it a wondrously eloquent performance.

Such a leader is Pierre Monteux. This, his fifth season as conductor, will also be his last, and promises to be one of the finest, artistically speaking, of them all. The Boston symphony concerts have never been

---

BOSTON,
MASS.
Christian Science Monitor
FEB 1 1924

Fifteenth Program of Boston Symphony

The fifteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program:

Gluck—Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis."
Lalo—"Spanish Symphony," for violin and orchestra.
Taylor—Suite, "Through the Looking Glass."
Tschaikowsky—Overture-Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet."

Deems Taylor's suite, "Through the Looking Glass," had been played here by the New York Chamber Music Society, but the performance yesterday was the first in Boston of the version for orchestra. Rarely is it the good fortune of the audiences of the symphony concerts to hear so interesting, imaginative and withal skillfully constructed a composition by an American composer, and indeed they have often listened to music by many a foreigner which was far less worthy of a hearing. Mr. Taylor's music is originally conceived; it is not in its translation of Lewis Carroll's whimsical story into tones and it shows an extraordinarily fine command of the technic of musical composition and orchestration. This is music of which Americans may indeed be proud.

Previous to the playing of this Suite Jacques Thibaud gave a remarkably fine performance of Lalo's "Spanish Symphony." Such an interpretation of this work was necessary to restore it to the good graces of the public hereabouts, which has too often heard it played by violinists who, whatever their technical attainments or their understanding of other styles of music may have been, were eminently unfitted to play this delicate, refined music. And this concerto is decidedly not a show piece, designed to tickle the ears of the multitude. In it is to be found a wealth of poetic fancy and a depth of sentiment which only an artist of Mr. Thibaud's quality can bring out. In the mad rush for technic it is fast being forgotten that the violin is a musical instrument and that the mission of the violinist is after all to make music. Such a state of affairs has long existed among pianists. Mr. Thibaud's playing serves to call the attention to the fact that a great technic may be employed for artistic ends; that the possessor of it may still remain susceptible to the real beauties of music; that the violinist may still sing a melody with feeling and thereby move his auditors, and that music does not after all exist primarily for the display of mere personal prowess.

Mr. Monteux's playing of Gluck's overture was among the most remarkable of his more recent accomplishments. As time goes on his versatility in the music of different schools and periods seems more and more astounding. In this overture of severe and chaste design, with its restrained emotion, he was as much at home as in Deems Taylor's light and fanciful conceits, or in the passionate measures of Tschaikowsky. Truly a conductor of unusual insight and exceptionally sympathetic understanding.

S. M.

ING POST

FEB 9 - 1924

Stravinsky, Monteux and The Boston Orchestra

Who Will Be Its Next Conductor, Kussevitzky or Schneevoigt?—Stravinsky's Past, Present and Future

By HENRY T. FINCK

Who will be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season?

It has been understood for some time that the admirable but rather wild and woolly Russian, Kussevitzky, had been chosen for that great position, but apparently the directors are still in an experimental stage, for here is Professor Georg Schneevoigt (whose engaging face is pictured on another page) coming over today at the special invitation of the directors of the Boston orchestra to conduct its regular concerts on March 7 and 8.

Professor Schneevoigt enjoys a reputation abroad not unlike that of Willem Mengelberg, and every artist of international note has appeared under his baton with his famous orchestra in Stockholm; among them have been Mme. Cahier, Rachmaninoff, Hubermann, Hofmann, and Melba. Like many other famous conductors, Professor Schneevoigt gained a name for himself as an instrumentalist and was solo 'cellist with European orchestras with whom he later appeared as conductor.

Whether the new conductor is to be Kussevitzky or Schneevoigt, many will be sorry to have Pierre Monteux go back to Paris. He has not always struck twelve, or even eleven; but as an interpreter of French music he has excelled, and still more in the modern Russian repertory. New York came to know him first in conection with the Ballet Russe, which gave such admirable performances, particularly of Stravinsky's "Petroushka" and "The Fire Bird."

It is therefore not singular that M. Monteux's greatest triumph—at least in this city—during the five years of his leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra came last week, when he brought out Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring" (La Sacre de Printeinps). It aroused unbounded enthusiasm and the critics were practically unanimous in proclaiming it a masterpiece, not a few heralding it as epoch making.

Glorious "Petroushka"

Personally, I think that Stravinsky's epoch-making work was his "Petroushka." I "point with pride" to the following paragraphs I wrote about that in the Evening Post in the year 1919:

"Stravinsky's music is as fantastic, as droll, as grotesque as the action. It is epoch-making music; the first successful attempt to infuse a whole musical score with humor—a quality so rare in this art that some have denied its existence. Here it is, life size; humor and fun as genuine as Mark Twain's or Artemus Ward's, and oh! what a relief and a delight to hear something really new in the tonal art! What Schoenberg, Ornstein, and other deliberate cacophonists have tried to do and failed Stravinsky has done with success; with huge success he has cut a new path in the jungle of dissonances and in so doing has opened vistas of new melodic, harmonic, rhythmic, and orchestral delights.

"He doesn't fling pots of paint in the public's face, but paints new pictures with new tints. No padding in this music; he goes straight to the point every time; he calls a spade a spade and not an agricultural instrument; he lets the instruments discourse singly or in new simple groups; instead of sentimental Mascagnian intermezzos he has the jumbo drums fill up the scenic interstices with lusty, thun-cies are. What they need most is copie of the textbooks on logic by Jevons John Stuart Mill. All their reasoning is based on the ludicrous fallacy that because some foolish, narrow critics abused masters like Wagner, Chopin and Liszt for dissonances which are now liked by everybody, therefore any kind of composerling who now perpetrates any kind of cacophonic atrocity will by and by be hailed as a genius! It is to laugh.

As a matter of fact, it is almost as easy to manufacture this futuristic "music" as it is to blow a steam whistle. Anybody can do it, and if all the fellows who are doing it were right in their vain assumptions there would soon be in our midst hundreds of epoch-making geniuses—and not a drop to drink!

The Future of Stravinsky

There is one discouraging thing about Stravinsky which depresses me. He is so original and delectable a composer that we should hear as much of him as possible. But how can we? His best music is associated with ballets: "Fire Bird," "Petroushka," "Rites of Spring." But artistic ballet of this kind is a thing Russian which it will be extremely difficult to acclimate in this country.

To be sure, we can have the music of the Stravinsky ballets given as absolute music in our concert halls. But then we get only one side of it, missing the delightful congruity with the action which is half its charm.

There are also some pieces which this composer wrote directly for the concert hall. I recall three that have been heard here: some one-minute pieces played by the Flonzaley Quartet, a ridiculous clarinet solo, and the "Symphonies for Wind Instruments," played here by the Philadelphia Orchestra last Tuesday. None of these comes in inspiration within a mile of the ballets; which suggests the sad thought that Stravinsky needs the stage scenery and action to fertilize his imagination, and these we can seldom have.

Remains the opera "The Nightingale." Let us have that, please.

Prof. Schneevoight

Conductor of the Konsertfoereningen in Stockholm, who will lead the Boston Symphony in two concerts, March 7 and 8, as guest conductor.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From JOURNAL,
Chicago Ill
FEB 14 1924

MUSIC

By EUGENE STINSON

The Chicago Civic Opera sends word from Cleveland, where it is singing, of arrangements which will make one Toti Dal Monte its guest coloratura soprano for next season. Dal Monte is now singing in Paris, and will soon be heard in Australia with Nellie Melba's opera company. Frank St. Leger, one of the Chicago Opera's assistant conductors, will also take part in Dame Melba's enterprime.

Of all progressive composers, Igor Stravinsky, the Russian, is the most distinguished. In his virtues he combines the farthest goal and the best aim. He tries for as much as any other living writer of music, and more than most. His work is received with universal respect, even in those quarters where patience for the new is seldom possessed.

Stravinsky's music called "Spring Consecration" was recently given its first New York hearing by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting. Monteux conducted the first performance of the music when Serge Diaghileff, that Reinhardt of the ballet, staged it in Paris. The date was May 29, 1913. Nijinsky had devised the steps, Nicholas Roerich the scene. The Paris audience contributed a riot. All in all the affair was a conspicuous one.

"Spring Consecration" was played in concert form in Paris ten years ago. It was first heard in America at the hands of the Philadelphia Symphony orchestra March 3, 1922, when the enterprising Leopold Stokowski directed it. The Boston Symphony has also performed the piece in its own sanctuary.

More, Stravinsky music revealed to eager New Yorkers, and this time by the Philadelphian Stokowski, is his "Symphonies for Wind Instruments."

The "symphonies" was first played in Queen's hall, London, June 10, 1921. Sergei Koussevitsky, who next season will succeed Monteux as leader of the famous Boston orchestra, was conductor. London was distressed.

Chicago has had as yet only innocent experiences with Stravinsky's early music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE MONTREAL
CANADA
Star
ISSUE OF 9 1924.

MUSIC IN NEW YORK

New oYrk, Feb. 8.

Curiously enough, this same year which has brought us Beethoven in unprecedented doses, has done as much for Stravinsky. One by one the works of Stravinsky, the much maligned and much exalted, are coming to us after successes elsewhere. Boston, Philadelphia and all of Europe have accepted him; New York is now ready to listen. ~~And it was Pierre~~ Monteux, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who had ~~to bring us Le~~ Sacre du Printemps.

When Mr. Monteux conducted this for the first time with the Russian Ballet in Paris, 1913, they say the indignation of the audience stopped the performance. It was hissed, screeched and jeered off the stage. Last week in Carnegie Hall—and remember, American audiences are not nearly as open-minded as the European—only seventeen people, mostly old people, left their seats during its performance. One mature woman, caught midway between her seat and the exit by a virulent Stravinsky chord, made up of four kettledrums, a bass drum, cymbals and assorted instruments, was seen to wince and look to her escort for support. But on the whole the audience was respectful, attentive and highly enthusiastic. Another accusedly insane man of music has officially been declared sane.

Le Sacre du Printemps is translated as The Rite of Spring. It was written originally for ballet and is now played in concert form in two sections, the first describing the primitive gathering for the spring festival, and the second the choosing of some young girl who must dance herself to death as a sacrifice to the gods who control the fertility of the earth.

It has been hailed as the greatest of Stravinsky's works by those who say the Russian holds no mystery of chord or melodic progression for them. Well it may be. A single hearing leaves one with an impression of tremendous music, a work which, if it intends to convey an idea of the barbaric and primitive emotion, does so in an unparalleled way. Composers have often tried to represent barbarism with exotic rythms, but there has been no attempt before this where the clash of notes has worked so successfully toward that end. The parts of this composition in which Stravinsky works up to the dances, and the dances themselves, are overpowering in their effect and volume of sound. It is the music of the war cry, of the ecstatic primitive whose gods of nature demanded blood and the body for their appeasing, of life as it progresses on the purely emotional, instinctive plane.

Stravinsky's orchestration in this, as in his other works, is a marvel. Not one hearing nor anything but an analysis of the score can tell how he gets his combinations of tones and how a clear impression is obtained from the melee of sound. Its texture is highly complicated, but its difficult construction does not make itself felt in the hearing. Le Sacre marks another step in our musical education.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE GLOUCESTER
MASS.
TIMES
AUG - 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Famous Organization to Give Concert at Salem, Sunday Afternoon.

An event of prime importance will be the coming visit of the internationally celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra of 100 musicians, which is

ssociation.

ODAY'S CALENDAR OF SPORTS:
Racing—Meeting of Business Men's
3.15 o'clock.

This orchestra has been for years considered one of the most remarkable organizations of its kind in the world. Its name stands for the utmost perfection in musical performance. These supreme qualities are the outcome of more than 40 years of endeavor.

The history of the orchestra makes a fine record of high purpose, administrative wisdom, and munificence on the part of its founder. Every effort was directed toward artistic supremacy. One after another of the world's greatest conductors devoted their best towards the further refinement of the ensemble. Nothing was spared to bring the first musicians of Europe to make up the ranks.

Hence the ensemble, in glow of tone, in clear cut unanimity and delicate balance of choirs, is the envy of all orchestras. It requires a remarkable leader to shape this ensemble and to evoke from it a wondrously eloquent performance.

Such a leader is Pierre Monteux. This, his fifth season as conductor, will also be his last, and promises to be one of the finest, artistically speaking, of them all. The Boston symphony concerts have never been

---

BOSTON,
MASS.
Christian Science Monitor
FE[illegible] 1924

Fifteenth Program of Boston Symphony

The fifteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program:

Gluck—Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis"
Lalo—"Spanish Symphony," for violin and orchestra.
Taylor—Suite, "Through the Looking Glass."
Tschaikowsky—Overture-Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet"

Deems Taylor's suite, "Through the Looking Glass," had been played here by the New York Chamber Music Society, but the performance yesterday was the first in Boston of the version for orchestra. Rarely is it the good fortune of the audiences of the symphony concerts to hear so interesting, imaginative and withal skillfully constructed a composition by an American composer, and indeed they have often listened to music by many a foreigner which was far less worthy of a hearing. Mr. Taylor's music is originally conceived; it is apt in its translation of Lewis Carroll's whimsical story into tones and it shows an extraordinarily fine command of the technic of musical composition and orchestration. This is music of which Americans may indeed be proud.

Previous to the playing of this Suite Jacques Thibaud gave a remarkably fine performance of Lalo's "Spanish Symphony." Such an interpretation of this work was necessary to restore it to the good graces of the public hereabouts, which has too often heard it played by violinists who, whatever their technical attainments or their understanding of other styles of music may have been, were eminently unfitted to play this delicate, refined music. Yet this concerto is decidedly not a show piece, designed to tickle the ears of the multitude. In it is to be found a wealth of poetic fancy and a depth of sentiment which only an artist of Mr. Thibaud's quality can bring out. In the mad rush for technic it is fast being forgotten that the violin is a musical instrument and that the mission of the violinist is after all to make music. Such a state of affairs has long existed among pianists. Mr. Thibaud's playing serves to call the attention to the fact that a great technic may be employed for artistic ends; that the possessor of it may still remain susceptible to the real beauties of music; that the violinist may still sing a melody with feeling and thereby move his auditors, and that music does not after all exist primarily for the display of mere personal prowess.

Mr. Monteux's playing of Gluck's overture was among the most remarkable of his more recent accomplishments. As time goes on his versatility in the music of different schools and periods seems more and more astounding. In this overture of severe and chaste design, with its restrained emotion, he was as much at home as in Deems Taylor's light and fanciful conceits, or in the passionate measures of Tschaikowsky. Truly a conductor of unusual insight and exceptionally sympathetic understanding.

S. M.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PAWTUCKET
RHODE ISLAND
TIMES
EB 16 1924

Symphony Concert.

The soloist at the fourth concert here by the Boston Symphony orchestra, which will be the last but one of the season, will be Carol Robinson, the celebrated pianist. The concert will take place in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, Feb. 26. Miss Robinson has attracted considerable attention of late by her recitals in New York, Chicago and several eastern cities. The chosen concerto for her appearance with the orchestra will be the great work of Tschaikovsky (in B flat minor, No. 1).

Pierre Monteux will divide the remainder of the programme between music of the 18th century and of modern France. The symphony will be the great masterpiece of Mozart in C major, called "Jupiter," which, it happens, has not been performed here by this orchestra for a number of seasons.

The programme will close with Charpentier's suite, "Impressions of Italy." This score, which stands with the opera "Louise" as one of the French composer's master works, was written under the direct influence of the sights and sounds of Italy, The viola solo in the serenade will be played by Georges Fourel. The other movements include "On Mule Back," "On the Summits" and "Naples."

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BROCKTON,
MASS.
ENTERPRISE
FEB 16 1924

it just happens that pe dvertisements. But

ESTABLISHED
From FEB 16 1924
TRAVELER
Boston, Mass.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Edouard Risler, the noted French pianist, will appear as soloist at the next regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts, which are to be given in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Feb. 22 and 23. Mr. Risler will appear with the orchestra in Beethoven's Fourth Concerto in G major. Another event of this program will be the performance of Henry Hadley's new symphonic poem, "Ocean," under the direction of the composer. Pierre Monteux will also conduct Mendelssohn's Overture to Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream" and d'Indy's "Summer Day on the Mountain."

THIS CLIPPING FROM

SALT LAKE CITY
UTAH
DESERET SUN

16

"Le Sacre du Printemps," or "The Rite of Spring," a new score by Igor Stravinsky, just produced in this country by the Boston Symphony orchestra, is creating a sensation in the east, noticeably in New York where it was received with demonstrations of favor. However, in Paris and London, there was much opposition to it.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK
TRIBUNE

FEB 17 1924

"Le Sacre du Printemps" Again

In answer to a number of requests for the repetition of Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps," which was played for the first time in New York on January 31 by the Boston Symphony, Pierre Monteux and that orchestra will repeat the Stravinsky work at their next Saturday afternoon concert at Carnegie Hall, on March 15.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PROVIDENCE
RHODE ISLAND
TRIBUNE
FEB 17 1924

MISS CAROL ROBINSON

Young Piano Soloist With the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Infantry Hall on Feb. 26.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

BA TIMORE,
MD.
POST
EB 17 1924

* * *

Undoubtedly the musical event of the past week was the presentation by the Boston Symphony of Strawinsky's "Rites of Spring." Deems Taylor describes the score as "music of almost unbelievable complexity of orchestral texture—yet essentially as stark and primitive as the wall pictures of the caveman. This is great music."

* * *

Pablo Casals will be the soloist

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

PROVIDENCE
R. I.
JOURNAL
EB 18 1924

With Carol Robinson as soloist the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the last but one of the season's series of concerts here in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, Feb. 26. Pierre Monteux will open the programme with the "Jupiter" Symphony of Mozart in C major and close it with Charpentier's suite, "Impressions of Italy." This score, which stands with the opera, "Louise," as one of the French composer's master works, was written under the direct influence of the sights and sounds of Italy. The viola solo in the serenade will be played by Georges Fourel. The other movements include "On Mule Back," "On the Summits" and "Naples."

Carol Robinson will appear with the orchestra in the pianoforte concerto of Tschaikovsky (No. 1 in B flat minor). A pupil of Fannie Bloomfield Ziesler, this young artist is taking an increasingly important place among the younger pianists.

Chaminade Club

THIS CLIPPING FROM

ALBANY
NEW YORK
KNICKERBOCKER PRESS

FEB 17 1924

In a Line or Two

ANOTHER conductor new to this country who is shortly to be heard is Georg Schneevoight, of Sweden. He has just arrived, and it is expected he will conduct a pair of Boston Symphony concerts on March 7 and 8. Schneevoigt is conductor of the Konsertfoereningen orchestra, of Stockholm, and bears an excellent reputation.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

SALEM
MASS.
NEWS
FEB 18 1924

MARKS AN EPOCH IN MUSICAL LIFE OF THIS OLD CITY

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Directed by Pierre Monteux, With Edith Thompson, Soloist, Delighted Audience

The Boston Symphony orchestra, with Pierre Monteux conducting, gave a notable concert at the Empire theatre yesterday (Sunday) afternoon, notable in Salem's musical history by the visit of this world-renowned organization and its famous conductor and by recalling and reviving days when Salem was the recognized musical center for the best in music between Boston and Portland.

In those other days the greatest singers, soloists and choirs and orchestras and military bands were heard here with a pleasing regularity, days when the Salem musical world was wont to boast of Gilmore, Fenollosa, Emilio, Wyatt, Oliver and others among her residents, and a host of artistic visitors who always met a warm welcome from local audiences. The Boston Symphony, under George Henschell in the second year of its existence had Salem on its list because of the educated and discriminating audiences met here.

An equally discriminating audience filled the theatre yesterday, manifesting its pleasure by enthusiastic and prolonged applause.

The orchestra was assisted yesterday by Miss Edith Thompon, who had appeared here several times, a pianist of eminence who was received with a warmth little less than that which greeted Mr. Monteux and his band.

The program was: Symphony No. 5, "From the New World," Dvorak; Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," Debussy; Concerto in B flat (No. 2), Tchaikovsky, Miss Thompson; Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," Wagner.

Long and cordial was the greeting given Mr. Monteux when he took position in front of some 100 recognized artists on their respective instruments.

The Dvorak Symphony

may have been the cause of an animated controversy among critics as to whether its spirit is American or Czechish, but there was contention yesterday among hearers as to its popularity. The "Largo" and the English horn solo by Mr. Muller in the second movement of the largo aroused the audience to a long demonstration of pleasure.

The Debussy sketches continued the audience in the happy mood induced by the symphony, the brilliant and eloquent performance leaving nothing to be desired even by hypocritical listeners.

The brightly gay Wagner number was a most happy conclusion to the elegant program.

The various themes in this composition by the master musicians of the later days, varying from festival gaiety to the pompous and pedantic, seemed to appeal strongly to Mr. Monteux and the band with the result that the orchestra seemed to excel itself and set the audience in a rapture that found some relief in applauding.

Miss Thompson's Playing

demonstrated her right to be a soloist with the band. Although frequently heard by many of yesterday's audience she seemed in an extra musical mood yesterday and her playing demonstrated careful study and punctilious attention to detail. It was a joy to all who heard her and a pleasing contribution to the magnificent concert of Mr. Monteux and the orchestra.

In a recent concert by the orchestra in New York city all the critics waxed eloquent in reviewing the playing, using such expressions as "Incredible virtuosity," "amazing virtuosity," "superlatively fine performance," "superbly executed," and one Boston writer, commenting on the closing of Monteux's engagement, said: "This orchestra is the creation of Mr. Monteux. In the face of every sort of discouragement he formed and trained it. And now that this orchestra has in the opinion of critics, visiting artists and the Boston public, reached this high state of perfection, Mr. Monteux will leave at the end of the season. The pity of it! The pity of it!"

Everyone present at yesterday's concert will adopt the foregoing opinions and comment and add "A pity it is" the orchestra has not been an annual visitor to Salem, with the hope that the management may feel encouraged to offer the local community more concerts and other entertainment of the standard set yesterday.

ATTAC

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

NEW BEDFORD
MASS.

JAN 1924

Bedford is the dupe.

Heywood Broun alludes in the World to the recurring problem in plays of men or women described as geniuses. The audience expects the genius to do his tricks and that is why so many plays about opera singers fail. A marvelous voice is described and the actor or actress cannot give a sample. But in a play produced in New York last week the genius is a composer who is writing a symphony. Incidentally the action of the piece allows him to play the music for a pantomime. This music was composed by Deems Taylor of the World, of whom "F. P. A." recently wrote that if the incidental music of a play in these days was not written by Deems Taylor, it was not incidental. Mr. Broun says: "It is lovely music, quite brilliant enough to convince the audience that the hero, in a more serious moment, might conceivably sit down and compose a symphony of unquestioned genius. And the pantomime around which the music is written is so beautiful and so skilfully played that there is no trouble at all in believing that the young gentleman of the play is perhaps almost worthy of all the lofty praise which has been accorded to him."

There is no reason why this should not be conceivable because Deems Taylor had just composed a suite which the Boston Symphony orchestra has regarded as worthy to play. Of this suite Philip Hale writes: "Mr. Deems Taylor's suite was performed here for the first time. He chose these episodes in the adventures of the adorable little Alice: Her talk with the chattering flowers in the garden; how she was puzzled by the poem about the Jabberwock; her dialogue with the gnat about various insects; and her encounter with the pathetic White Knight, who kept falling out of the saddle. These movements are prefaced by one entitled 'Dedication.' It is a pleasure to find an American composer of talent who is willing to write music that is cheerful, not portentous; whose fancy is delicate; who uses a large orchestra discreetly, not chiefly to make a thunderous noise. Mr. Taylor, for his inspiration, went to a book that for years has pleased children from the tender age to that of white hairs; he did not ransack the Grecian or the Scandinavian mythology; he had no Thesis, no exposition of colors; he did not attempt to portray in music cave life and the rude rites of primitive man. Nor did he strive painfully to be ultra-modern in the French, Italian, or German manner. He remembered Lewis Carroll's story; pleasant and amusing musical thoughts came into his head and he expressed them musically, without laboring after transliteration. Even his narration of the Jabberwock's fate is not too realistic, and in this movement the measures that may be taken to picture the peaceful scene while the hero waited with vorpal sword' in hand by the Tumtum tree the approach of the fearsome monster are charged with poetic beauty. Charming also is the 'Dedication.' The whole work shows genuine fancy, a gift of expression in an individual manner."

THIS CLIPPING FROM

ROCHESTER,
N. Y.
DEMOCRAT

FEB 17 1924

In a Line or Two.

Another conductor new to this country who is shortly to be heard is Georg Schneevoigt, of Sweden. He has just arrived, and it is expected he will conduct a pair of Boston Symphony concerts on March 7th and 8th. Schneevoigt is conductor of the Konsertfoerengen Orchestra, of Stockholm, and bears an excellent reputation.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PAWTUCKET
RHODE ISLAND
TIMES

EB 16 1924

Symphony Concert.

The soloist at the fourth concert here by the Boston Symphony orchestra, which will be the last but one of the season, will be Carol Robinson, the celebrated pianist. The concert will take place in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, Feb. 26. Miss Robinson has attracted considerable attention of late by her recitals in New York, Chicago and several eastern cities. The chosen concerto for her appearance with the orchestra will be the great work of Tschaikovsky (in B flat minor, No. 1).

Pierre Monteux will divide the remainder of the programme between music of the 18th century and of modern France. The symphony will be the great masterpiece of Mozart in C major, called "Jupiter," which, it happens, has not been performed here by this orchestra for a number of seasons.

The programme will close with Charpentier's suite, "Impressions of Italy." This score, which stands with the opera "Louise" as one of the French composer's master works, was written under the direct influence of the sights and sounds of Italy, The viola solo in the serenade will be played by Georges Fourel. The other movements include "On Mule Back," "On the Summits" and "Naples."

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BROCKTON,
MASS.
ENTERPRISE

EB 16 1924

it just happens that pe
dvertisements. But

ESTABLISHED 18
From TRAVELER
Boston, Mass.

FEB 16 1924

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Edouard Risler, the noted French pianist, will appear as soloist at the next regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts, which are to be given in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Feb. 22 and 23. Mr. Risler will appear with the orchestra in Beethoven's Fourth Concerto in G major. Another event of this program will be the performance of Henry Hadley's new symphonic poem, "Ocean," under the direction of the composer. Pierre Monteux will also conduct Mendelssohn's Overture to Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream" and d'Indy's "Summer Day on the Mountain."

THIS CLIPPING FROM

SALT LAKE CITY
UTAH
DESERET SUN

"Le Sacre du Printemps," or "The Rite of Spring," a new score by Igor Stravinsky, just produced in this country by the Boston Symphony orchestra, is creating a sensation in the east, noticeably in New York where it was received with demonstrations of favor. However, in Paris and London, there was much opposition to it.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK
TRIBUNE

FEB 17 1924

"Le Sacre du Printemps" Again

In answer to a number of requests for the repetition of Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps," which was played for the first time in New York on January 31 by the Boston Symphony, Pierre Monteux and that orchestra will repeat the Stravinsky work at their next Saturday afternoon concert at Carnegie Hall, on March 15.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PROVIDENCE
RHODE ISLAND
TRIBUNE

EB 17 1924

MISS CAROL ROBINSON

Young Piano Soloist With the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Infantry Hall on Feb. 26.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

BA TIMORE,
MD.
POST

17 1924

* * *

Undoubtedly the musical event of the past week was the presentation by the Boston Symphony of Strawinsky's "Rites of Spring." Deems Taylor describes the score as "music of almost unbelievable complexity of orchestral texture—yet essentially as stark and primitive as the wall pictures of the caveman. This is great music."

* * *

Pablo Casals will be the soloist

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

PROVIDENCE
R. I.
JOURNAL

18 1924

With Carol Robinson as soloist the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the last but one of the season's series of concerts here in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, Feb. 26. Pierre Monteux will open the programme with the "Jupiter" Symphony of Mozart in C major and close it with Charpentier's suite, "Impressions of Italy." This score, which stands with the opera, "Louise," as one of the French composer's master works, was written under the direct influence of the sights and sounds of Italy. The viola solo in the serenade will be played by Georges Fourel. The other movements include "On Mule Back," "On the Summits" and "Naples."

Carol Robinson will appear with the orchestra in the pianoforte concerto of Tschaikovsky (No. 1 in B flat minor). A pupil of Fannie Bloomfield Ziesler, this young artist is taking an increasingly important place among the younger pianists.

Chaminade Club

THIS CLIPPING FROM

ALBANY
NEW YORK
KNICKERBOCKER PRESS

FEB 17 1924

In a Line or Two

ANOTHER conductor new to this country who is shortly to be heard is Georg Schneevoight, of Sweden. He has just arrived, and it is expected he will conduct a pair of Boston Symphony concerts on March 7 and 8. Schneevoigt is conductor of the Konsertfoereningen orchestra, of Stockholm, and bears an excellent reputation.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

SALEM
MASS.
NEWS

FEB 18 1924

MARKS AN EPOCH IN MUSICAL LIFE OF THIS OLD CITY

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Directed by Pierre Monteux, With Edith Thompson, Soloist, Delighted Audience

The Boston Symphony orchestra, with Pierre Monteux conducting, gave a notable concert at the Empire theatre yesterday (Sunday) afternoon, notable in Salem's musical history by the visit of this world-renowned organization and its famous conductor and by recalling and reviving days when Salem was the recognized musical center for the best in music between Boston and Portland.

In those other days the greatest singers, soloists and choirs and orchestras and military bands were heard here with a pleasing regularity, days when the Salem musical world was wont to boast of Gilmore, Fenollosa, Emilio, Wyatt, Oliver and others among her residents, and a host of artistic visitors who always met a warm welcome from local audiences. The Boston Symphony, under George Henschell in the second year of its existence had Salem on its list because of the educated and discriminating audiences met here.

An equally discriminating audience filled the theatre yesterday, manifesting its pleasure by enthusiastic and prolonged applause.

The orchestra was assisted yesterday by Miss Edith Thompon, who had appeared here several times, a pianist of eminence who was received with a warmth little less than that which greeted Mr. Monteux and his band.

The program was: Symphony No. 5, "From the New World," Dvorak; Nocturnes, "Clouds" and Festivals," Debussy; Concerto in B flat (No. 2), Tchaikovsky, Miss Thompson; Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," Wagner.

Long and cordial was the greeting given Mr. Monteux when he took position in front of some 100 recognized artists on their respective instruments.

The Dvorak Symphony

may have been the cause of an animated controversy among critics as to whether its spirit is American or Czechish, but there was contention yesterday among hearers as to its popularity. The "Largo" and the English horn solo by Mr. Muller in the second movement of the largo aroused the audience to a long demonstration of pleasure.

The Debussy sketches continued the audience in the happy mood induced by the symphony, the brilliant and eloquent performance leaving nothing to be desired even by hypocritical listeners.

The brightly gay Wagner number was a most happy conclusion to the elegant program.

The various themes in this composition by the master musicians of the later days, varying from festival gaiety to the pompous and pedantic, seemed to appeal strongly to Mr. Monteux and the band with the result that the orchestra seemed to excel itself and set the audience in a rapture that found some relief in applauding.

Miss Thompson's Playing

demonstrated her right to be a soloist with the band. Although frequently heard by many of yesterday's audience she seemed in an extra musical mood yesterday and her playing demonstrated careful study and punctilious attention to detail. It was a joy to all who heard her and a pleasing contribution to the magnificent concert of Mr. Monteux and the orchestra.

In a recent concert by the orchestra in New York city all the critics waxed eloquent in reviewing the playing, using such expressions as "Incredible virtuosity," "amazing virtuosity," "superlatively fine performance," "superbly executed," and one Boston writer, commenting on the closing of Monteux's engagement, said: "This orchestra is the creation of Mr. Monteux. In the face of every sort of discouragement he formed and trained it. And now that this orchestra has in the opinion of critics, visiting artists and the Boston public, reached this high state of perfection. Mr. Monteux will leave at the end of the season. The pity of it! The pity of it!"

Everyone present at yesterday's concert will adopt the foregoing opinions and comment and add "A pity it is" the orchestra has not been an annual visitor to Salem, with the hope that the management may feel encouraged to offer the local community more concerts and other entertainment of the standard set yesterday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

NEW BEDFORD
MASS.

JAN 1924

edford is the dupe.

Heywood Broun alludes in the World to the recurring problem in plays of men or women described as geniuses. The audience expects the genius to do his tricks and that is why so many plays about opera singers fail. A marvelous voice is described and the actor or actress cannot give a sample. But in a play produced in New York last week the genius is a composer who is writing a symphony. Incidentally the action of the piece allows him to play the music for a pantomime. This music was composed by Deems Taylor of the World, of whom "F. P. A." recently wrote that if the incidental music of a play in these days was not written by Deems Taylor, it was not incidental. Mr. Broun says: "It is lovely music, quite brilliant enough to convince the audience that the hero, in a more serious moment, might conceivably sit down and compose a symphony of unquestioned genius. And the pantomime around which the music is written is so beautiful and so skilfully played that there is no trouble at all in believing that the young gentleman of the play is perhaps almost worthy of all the lofty praise which has been accorded to him."

There is no reason why this should not be conceivable because Deems Taylor had just composed a suite which the Boston Symphony orchestra has regarded as worthy to play. Of this suite Philip Hale writes: "Mr. Deems Taylor's suite was performed here for the first time. He chose these episodes in the adventures of the adorable little Alice: Her talk with the chattering flowers in the garden; how she was puzzled by the poem about the Jabberwock; her dialogue with the gnat about various insects; and her encounter with the pathetic White Knight, who kept falling out of the saddle. These movements are prefaced by one entitled 'Dedication.' It is a pleasure to find an American composer of talent who is willing to write music that is cheerful, not portentous; whose fancy is delicate; who uses a large orchestra discreetly, not chiefly to make a thunderous noise. Mr. Taylor, for his inspiration, went to a book that for years has pleased children from the tender age to that of white hairs; he did not ransack the Grecian or the Scandinavian mythology; he had no Thesis, no exposition of colors; he did not attempt to portray in music cave life and the rude rites of primitive man. Nor did he strive painfully to be ultra-modern in the French, Italian, or German manner. He remembered Lewis Carroll's story; pleasant and amusing musical thoughts came into his head and he expressed them musically, without laboring after transliteration. Even his narration of the Jabberwock's fate is not too realistic, and in this movement the measures that may be taken to picture the peaceful scene while the hero waited with 'vorpal sword' in hand by the Tum tum tree the approach of the fearsome monster are charged with poetic beauty. Charming also is the 'Dedication.' The whole work shows genuine fancy, a gift of expression of an individual manner."

THIS CLIPPING FROM

ROCHESTER,
N. Y.
DEMOCRAT

FEB 17 1924

In a Line or Two.

Another conductor new to this country who is shortly to be heard is Georg Schneevoigt, of Sweden. He has just arrived, and it is expected he will conduct a pair of Boston Symphony concerts on March 7th and 8th. Schneevoigt is conductor of the Konsertfoerengen Orchestra, of Stockholm, and bears an excellent reputation.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PROVIDENCE
RHODE ISLAND
TRIBUNE

FEB 17 1924

Fourth Boston Symphony

Miss Carol Robinson, the young pianist, who has attracted such considerable attention lately, will appear as soloist at the last concert but one of the Boston Symphony season in Providence, which is to take place in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, Feb. 26. The artist is the foremost pupil of Fannie Bloomfield Ziesler. Her recitals in New York, Chicago and other cities have attracted very favorable attention in the last few seasons. Miss Robinson will appear with the orchestra in the great concerto of Tschaikovsky (No. 1 in B-flat minor).

Pierre Monteux will divide the remainder of the program between the music of the 18th century and of modern France. The symphony will be the great masterpiece of Mozart in C-major, called "Jupiter," which it happens has not been performed here by this orchestra for a number of seasons.

The program will close with Charpentier's suite, "Impressions of Italy." This score, which stands with the opera "Louise" as one of the French composer's master works, was written under the direct influence of the sights and sounds of Italy. The viola solo in the serenade will be played by Georges Fourel. The other movements include "On Mule Back," "On the Summits" and "Naples."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

LYNN
MASS.
TELEGRAM-NEWS

FEB 9 1924

EDITH THOMPSON IN SALEM.

The many admirers of the virtuoso ability of Edith Thompson, than whom no more popular pianist comes to Lynn, will be interested to know that she will be the soloist on the occasion of the appearance of the full Boston Symphony orchestra at the Empire theatre, Salem, on Sunday afternoon, Feb. 17. Miss Thompson will play Tchaikowsky's concerto in B flat (No. 2). It is strikingly brilliant and will test her superb powers. The symphony to be given is Dvorak's "New World;" Debussy's nocturnes "Clouds" and Festivals," and Wagner's prelude to the Mastersingers. Pierre Monteux will conduct.

CHURCH.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From FEB 22 1924
Evening Sun
New York City

WILL CONDUCT BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Photo by Keystone View Co., I

Georg Schneevoight.

Georg Schneevoight of Helsingfors, Finland, well known European conductor, will make his first appearance in the United States in March when he will conduct some of the concerts of Boston Symphony Orchestra in that He is one of the best of the Contine leaders, having received engagem all over Europe.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK,
N. Y.
EVENING POST

Feb 23 1924

VISITING MUSICIAN SEES PERIL IN RADIO

Prof. Schneevoight, of Stockholm, Fears There Will Be Only One Orchestra Eventually

URGES GOVERNMENT CHECK

America has too many orchestras, and through the radio, may go to the other extreme, by having only one, with a national audience.

This opinion was expressed today by Georg Schneevoight, who laid down the baton of his Stockholm orchestra to come here for two performances, as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony. The invitation extended to him has been interpreted to mean that he is considered as a successor to Pierre Monteux, who will return to Paris after the present season.

It is Professor Schneevoight's first visit to America, and, unlike other newcomers, he does not discuss what he sees, but what he hears. Instead of New York's size, its buildings and its tremendous activity, Professor Schneevoight notices its concert halls, its operas, and its musicians.

Capital of All Nations

"They are wonderful," he said in English which belied its age of only three weeks. "You have here the essence of Europe, the greatest singers and musicians in the world. Your opera is more magnificent because you have the money and the command of the best. The musical artists in New York make it the capital of all nations."

As he talks, Professor Schneevoight moves his hands as he would at his conductor's desk. They are amazingly sensitive, broad at the wrist and thick through, tapering into fingers that are so long they give a mistaken impression of thinness. Occasionally one paused as the other seemed to take up the theme of the conversation, moving in quick nuances which defied the recently acquired English.

This barrier to English conversation was at once a challenge and an irritation to the maestro. He is a big, powerful man, not stout, but heavy, with a large head and clean-cut, sensitive features, which give his face a dominating yet flexible and amiable expression. He seemed made to determination, and he was determined to speak English regardless of his handicap. Now and then he slipped into German, snatched a word or two, and ultimately lapsed completely into that language, with a laughing promise to do better next time.

Delighted to Accept

"As for coming back to this country for next season," he said, discussing the report that he would succeed Monteux, "I cannot say. All I know is that I was invited to conduct the Boston Symphony on March 7 and 8 and that I was delighted to accept. Nothing has been said about anything else."

Here he paused and considered the question of the radio, deliberating long and then speaking slowly, calling attention every few minutes to the fact that it was only his personal opinion and perhaps not worth very much.

"But it seems to me," he said, "That this radio, as you call it, is very dangerous to the artist. It is so serious that the Government ought to put some check on it before it brings disaster to the musicians. When everyone can put on an ear-cap and hear a single concert what need is there for more than one?

Will Not Have Food

"If everybody in the country can hear Kreisler or Heifetz when they play in one room, where will they get audiences when they go to other cities? And that is what this means if it develops without restriction. What will the orchestras do all over the country if the audiences find they can hear one great orchestra in New York? The musicians will not have——"

He stopped. It was obvious what he meant, but he wanted the English word for it. "Jobs" was suggested, but he viewed it with disfavor. Then he proposed "bread," which seemed good enough, but didn't suit, and so finally he found what he wanted.

"Food!" he shouted. "Food! The musicians will not have food."

"But," he was asked, "don't you think the radio will spread musical education and make it possible for more people to enjoy good music?

"Ah, perhaps," he admitted; "I don't know. They said that about the gramaphone. One thing, though, must be done. The people who spread the music—as you say, broadcast it—those people must be made to pay the artists enough to make up the loss."

American Composers Interesting

Parting reluctantly with the subject of radio, Professor Schneevoight proceeded to contemporary Americans and the trend of modern music, discussing almost by way of parentheses the influence of Stravinsky, Schonberg, and the Group of Six.

"Your American composers, such as Carpenter and Bloch, are very talented. have played their works and they are mos interesting. Bloch is especially interestin and I think that the development o American music is most impressive, wit such possibilities that in twenty years perhaps it will be very important.

"Of the impressionists and the ultramoderns I do not know what to say. Stravinsky seems to me a technical genius, and I liked Schonberg's earlier work, but this modern composition is not good.

Innovations Up to Public

"I do not believe there is much room for further technical development i music. They may add new instruments t orchestras, but the result is not importan Public taste will have to decide eventuall whether or not the present innovations are worth while."

It was at this point that Professor Schneevoight was asked about the celebrated Group of Six of Paris and its probable influence. Its most recent hearing in New York was when the Swedish ballet was here and compositions reflecting the technical theories of such men as Darius Milhaud were played. Professor Schneevoight made a wry face and laughed as he answered:

"It is terrible, I think. They do nothing but turn things upside down. There is no more sense in it than there is in turning that picture upside down. (He pointed to one of the Hotel Astor's renditions of well behaved kittens lapping discreetly at a comfortable bowl of milk, though he didn't suggest that the milk might be spilled.)

Plays Something Old

"When I hear their compositions," he added, "I rush off and play something old, something really great, to quiet my ears and my mind."

Professor Schneevoight had grown restless under the questioning and continually moved about in his chair. The little drawing room of his suite was crowded with a baby grand piano, beside which, cordonically perhaps, stood a telephone.

There was a great array of potted plants and photographs all over the place, photographs of nearly every notable in music and most of the crowned heads of Europe. All of them were autographed, and once in a vain search for a word Professor Schneevoight had toyed with the picture of a king.

"Come again," he said, graciously, as he ended the interview, "and I shall speak better English; but, anyway, we have always the international language of music."

Louis F. Formon

Symphony Conductor

PROFESSOR SCHNEEVOIGHT

y Co

EVENIN
the Post (

SCHNEEVOIGHT

, are very talent
orks and they are s especially intere
the development
most impressive, in twenty years
important.
onists and the ult
w what to say. St technical genius, a earlier work, but th is not good.

Up to Public

there is much roo cal development i d new instruments t sult is not important to decide eventually present innovations

oint that Professor ked about the cele
of Paris and its prob ost recent hearing in the Swedish ballet sitions reflecting the such men as Darius Professor Schneeface and laughed as

k. They do nothing down. There is no
there is in turning
wn. (He pointed to
's renditions of well ng discreetly at a lk, though he didn't might be spilled.)

hing Old compositions," h play something old,

to quiet my ears

ht had grown resting and continually
r. The little draw-was crowded with a which, cordoni-elephone.
ray of potted plants
the place, photo-notable in music
heads of Europe.
raphed, and once word Professor with the picture

graciously, as he d I shall speak way, we have al
guage of music

rmon

Post Feb 24

BOS

Deems Taylor Is One of Few Critics Succeed in Field of Music

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In the chorus of praise that followed the recent performance at the Symphony concerts of Deems Taylor's delightful suite, "Through the Looking-Glass," one word of interest, if not of deep significance, was omitted. Mr. Taylor is at present music critic of the New York World, a post to which he succeeded upon the death of the late Mr. Huneker; and but rarely have the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought to a hearing the music of an American who was at once both a critic and a composer.

Since the distant days of William Henry Fry, composer of symphonies and operas and also reviewer of music for the New York Tribune, these two functions have in America been occasionally united in one man. For seven years Reginald de Koven served as critic on the paper now graced by Mr. Taylor. In Chicago, Felix Borowski and Eric Delamarter have, so to speak, simultaneously composed and reviewed music, while here in Boston Stuart Mason both covers the Symphony concerts for the Christian Science Monitor and on occasion hears his compositions performed at them.

But these men are the exceptions who prove the rule. With us, as in England, the representative composers have for the most part avoided criticism, and the leading critics have shown little or no disposition to compose.

Composer-Critics

Broadly considered, the great creators, in whatever field of artistic endeavor, have been one set of men and the great critics another. On the one hand are ranged Shakspere, Beethoven, Milton and Michelangelo; on the other, Hazlitt, Saint-Beuve, Hanslick and Ruskin.

Although often repeated, the contention that a man must have within himself the ability to write a drama, a novel or an epic poem, to paint a portrait or to compose a symphony, before he can pass adequate judgment upon such creative achievement from the hand of another is palpably absurd. The instances which disprove it are too numerous for mention. Far more valid is the argument that the significant creator tends to be a biased, narrow-horizoned, generally unsympathetic critic.

Vincent d'Indy, himself an often prejudiced if sometimes discerning judge of other composers, has declared in substance that the opinions of eminent musicians are always of value, while it matters naught to the world what "Mr. So-and-So" thinks. Presumably in M. d'Indy's eyes Mr. So-and-So is a convenient name for Ernest Newman, for Guido Gatti, for Pierre Lalo or for Lawrence Gilman. Yet there are those who hold the critical verdicts of these men to be in the main sounder than M. d'Indy's own evaluations.

Prior to the 19th century the more prominent composers were not given to expressing themselves through the medium of words. To be sure, Gluck wrote notable prefaces to certain of his operas, but Bach, Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven and the rest had scant talent for writing. With the dawning of the Romantic movement there came, however, a new order of musical brain, a brain capable of significant thinking in terms of ideas as well as in terms of tone.

The first of these new geniuses, chronologically speaking, was Hector Berlioz. After him followed, in Robert Schumann, another signally gifted both as writer and as composer. Schumann's critical activities were confined to the Neue Zeitschrift Fur Musik, a semi-weekly journal of musical opinion of which he was the founder and chief editor, while Berlioz was at various times on the staff of no fewer than four Parisian papers.

Of the two, Berlioz was the more brilliant writer, Schumann the more discerning, more liberal-minded reviewer. Berlioz, for example, could speak of Lvov and Onslow as "great composers," and yet deny the genius of Palestrina. For him the Roman's music was "just chords"; Handel he termed a "barrel of pork and beer," and he freely confessed his inability to understand the prelude to "Tristan." For the pianoforte compositions of Schumann Berlioz had a polite word, but he ignored the German's orchestral and chamber music, while the first edition of the songs of Schubert to be published in Paris elicited from him merely a casual word anent "The Erlking," and his sole criticism of Chopin was that he "subordinated the orchestra to the piano."

To counterbalance these omissions and misjudgments stood Berlioz's warm championing of the music of Gluck, of Weber and of Beethoven. His analyses of the last-named composer's nine symphonies are classics of their kind, unsurpassed both in their eloquence and in their discernment.

Against Schumann's door, on the other hand, but one serious charge as critic may be laid; that of his half-contemptuous attitude toward Wagner. On the occasion of the first performance of "Tannhauser" he characterized the music as "weak, often simply amateurish, empty and disagreeable." Yet so fair-minded was he that a year later he could write to his former teacher, Heinrich Dorn, "I wish you could see 'Tannhauser'; it contains deeper, more original and altogether a hundred fold better things than his previous operas, though at the same time much that is musically trivial. In short, Wagner may become of the highest importance to the stage; at any rate he possesses the requisite courage. The instrumentation I consider excellent and the whole workmanship far more masterly than it used to be."

Schumann's initial reception of Chopin, "Hats off, gentlmen! A gen'us!" has become historic; and quite as familiar are his glowing raptures over the youthful Brahms. Towards Mendelssohn he was remarkably generous, considering the fact that the two were in a sense rivals, and he shrewdly discerned both the merits and the defects in the music of his more important contemporaries, of Berlioz, Liszt, Rossini and Spohr. Of Meyerbeer alone was he wholly intolerant; poor, much abused Meyerbeer was, of course, not half so black as Schumann has painted him.

Here, then, was one eminent composer who had, to a rare degree, the gift of impartial criticism. But contrast with Schumann's catholicity the violent partisanship displayed by Hugo Wolf as critic for the "Salonblatt" of Vienna, especially his rabid denunciation of Brahms. And entertaining as they are to read, how little truly sound judgment is to be found in the numerous critiques, reviews and essays of Debussy, who did not hesitate to dismiss both Beethoven and Wagner as insufferable bores.

Finally, outside the field of published criticism are numerous instances of the failure of one composer to appreciate another. Weber and Spohr belittled Beethoven. Tchaikovsky and, with the exception of Rimsky-Korsakov, the Russian Five, disliked intensely both Wagner and Brahms, while neither of those two composers was duly sensible of the other's merits.

To return to Mr. Taylor, it would seem that he at least has proved himself to be both an able composer and a sound reviewer, although it is possible to suspect from his own music as well as from his writings that he is not wholly in sympathy with the newer and more radical tendencies in composition. But far from invalidating him as reviewer, such charming talent and sound skill in composing as Mr. Taylor possesses is for him merely a valuable asset, proving beyond a doubt the extent of his technical knowledge.

M. d'Indy to the contrary notwithstanding, let us beware, however, of accepting without question the critical opinions of composers of strongly marked individuality. Genius is prone to see no great virtue in methods opposed to its own. A certain degree of bigotry and bias, of partiality and of prejudice seems almost inseparable from genuinely original and important creative work. And, at the other extreme, the composer who equally admires all styles and schools of composition may prove to be himself a mere musical chameleon.

Mr. Martino, the conductor, and his band all in appropriate garb; and, for further "atmosphere," Persis Cox to play upon a harpsichord Mozart's Concerto in B Flat, the programme is fittingly drawn from ancient composers—Boccherini, Lulli, Buonamente, Mozart, Haydn, Rameau, Corelli, Purcell, Couperin and Vivaldi.

Herald Feb 24

VERA JANACOPULOS
Soloist at Symphony Concerts This Week.

Adv Feb 24

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Vera Janacoupulos, soprano, is to be the soloist at the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. She will sing Ravel's noted "Scheherazade" suite, three songs with orchestra. Another score to have its first performance in Boston is Scriabin's third symphony, "The Divine Poem." Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture and two short pieces by Ethel Leginska on verses by Tagore are also on the program.

PENSION FUND CONCERT

At the Spring Pension Fund Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Symphony Hall, Sunday afternoon, March 30, Beethoven's Choral Symphony will be performed, with the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and a quartet of soloists assisting.

ROBINSON CONCERT

On Tuesday evening, March 4, Carol Robinson, pianist, will give a recital in Steinert Hall. Miss Robinson comes from the West. She will play the Tschaikowsky B Flat Minor Concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Providence.

MONDAY SYMPHONY

Felix Fox will be the soloist at the fourth Monday evening Symphony concert, March 10. He will play the Schumann concerto. The Second Symphony of Brahms and Lalo's "Le Roi d'Ys" overture will complete the program.

Providence Journal Feb 24

'Jupiter' Symphony to be Featured by Boston Orchestra

Written for the Sunday Journal
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

When Hans von Bulow made his oft-quoted comment that Brahms's First Symphony should be called the Tenth, as the sequel of Beethoven's Ninth, he added another equally striking statement. For him the First Symphony was not Beethoven's somewhat tentative composition in C major but the "Jupiter" Symphony of Mozart.

It is this "Jupiter" Symphony, unheard from the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Providence in the last seven seasons, that Mr. Monteux has set for the chief item of the concert that takes place in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening. With it on this occasion will come but two other pieces, each a masterpiece in kind. Tchaikovsky's B-flat minor Concerto for the Pianoforte and Charpentier's pictorial Suite, "Impressions of Italy." Not since 1899 has the Concerto had place in one of these concerts, while the last previous performance of Charpentier's music was but two years later.

Mozart's brief span of life, that was yet so crowded with creative achievement, stretched from 1756 to 1791. Toward the end of his career he was busy with the composing of operas, and he wrote no symphony after 1788. In the summer of that year, however, Mozart produced no less than three works in that form—each a model of its genre.

The first of those three symphonies, that in E-flat, was played by the Boston Orchestra in Providence of fabric for Spring. For coats, nd dresses. Lot includes the newmong them "Pom-Pom." Comes iety of colors and patterns. Here t a most unusually low 5.88 day Special, a yard...

aintier and Lovelier Than Ever those tempting little wash frocks mmer. A complete showing of m imported.

Everfast "PEEKETTE"
A new fast color smart wash cotton in most unusual check and stripe effects. 36 inches wide. Monday 66 Special

ay. This at his best. The reveals his vein of noble yet tender Lyricism, while the Minuet has characteristic charm. And the Finale, with its fugal development, again exhibits Mozart's skill as composer in its fullest expression. Here, as in the Overture to "The Magic Flute," he seemingly toys with contrapuntal problems that vex the souls of lesser men.

Time is shifting the music of Tchaikovsky, as of every great composer, but among his pieces none seems more certain of perpetuity than does this magnificient Pianoforte Concerto that was composed in 1874, in the thirty-fifth year of its author's life. As Tchaikovsky was himself not a virtuoso he consulted his friend Nicholas Rubinstein, then adjudged the best pianist in Moscow, concerning various technical details in this Concerto. For some reason Rubinstein proved wholly unresponsive to the worth and beauty of the piece, and even condemned it as weak and unplayable. Hurt and astonished, Tchaikovsky resolved to publish the Concerto without altering a single note, and so he did. Moreover, erasing from the score the dedication to Rubinstein that he had inscribed, he re-dedicated the Concerto to Hans von Bulow. That eminent pianist bestowed upon the Concerto the warmest possible praise, and repeatedly played it in concerts throughout Europe.

Notable in the Concerto is the sonorous introduction with its superb theme for strings against ascending pianoforte-chords, and notable also are both the tender slow movement and the frenzied, Cossack-like Finale.

Few composers of eminence have to their credit so brief a list of compositions as that which makes Charpentier's contribution to the art of music. And even among these few pieces are but two upon which his fame in reality rests: one, the vivid and eloquent opera "Louise;" the other, the "Impressions of Italy." The latter was written between 1888 and 1890, while Charpentier was enjoying the privileges that had come to him through the winning of the Prix de Rome. Merely to list the titles of the captivating pieces from this Suite, of which four are to be played at this concert, is to give ample hint of the pleasures that they will bring the hearer. First comes a "Serenade," then follows "On Muleback," a tonal picture of jogging mules with tinkling bells wherein 'cellos and violas give forth the amorous song of the muleteers. "On the Summits" depicts the Desert of Sorrento, in the distance a monastery bell. And finally "Naples" is set forth—its heat and ight and swarming crowds, its love ongs strummed on guitars and a pass g military band, and, as night falls, s skk ablaze with fireworks.

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

After Ten Years, d'Indy's "Summer Day on the Mountain"—Music of His Prime—More Novel Pieces—Forthcoming Programmes

AT the Symphony Concerts of tomorrow and Saturay, Mr. Monteux will revive a notably interesting and characteristic piece by d'Indy—the tone-poem, "Summer Day on the Mountain," last heard at Symphony Hall ten years ago. The music, written in 1905 and 1906, belongs to the composer's prime. To it, he prefixes a "prose poem" of like title, written by Roger de Pampelonne and running, in translation, as follows:

DAYBREAK

> Awake, gloomy phantoms, smile majestically to the sky, for a ray in the Infinite arises and strikes your brow. One by one they unroll the folds of your great mantle, and the first gleams, caressing your lofty wrinkles, spread on them a moment of sweetness and serenity.
>
> Awake, ye mountains, the king of space appears.
>
> Awake, thou valley, which hidest the happy nests and sleeping cottages, awake with song. And if, in thy song, some sighs reach me, may the light wind of the morning hours gather them and bear them to God.
>
> Awake, ye cities, where the pure rays penetrate only to regret. Learning, bustle, human ignominy, awake ye. Arise, artificial worlds! . . .
>
> The shadows gradually vanish before the invading light.

---

8 P. M.—Judge, Dr. [illegible] rows. Collies.
8 P. M.—Judge, Mr. William T. Payne. Cocker spaniels.

or another

By Robert Harron

Judging in the twelfth annual show of the Eastern Dog Club started a bit late this morning but competition was in full swing in four rings before noon.

With the big entry lists, the largest in years in some of the breeds, the judging progressed rather slowly and awards were not compiled for the various classes until well along in the afternoon.

Babe Ruth's bull terrier puppy, Cloudland Dot, made a successful début when the nine-months-old pet of the famous home-run hitter took second in the class for bull terrier puppy bitches. The feat was notable because the field was exceptionally strong in the class. Cloudland White Mist, bred and owned by W. B. Emmons, took first in the class, with T. D. Smith's Bonfire, bred by Mr. Smith, third.

Sunny King Rocket, Airedale Terrier, owned by J. C. Sheehan of Cheshire, Conn., which was the best Airedale dog in the New York show last week, started at og Show

[214]

Providence Journal Feb 24

BOS

One of Few Critics n Field of Music

Towards Mendelsbly generous, cont the two were in he shrewdly dis-its and the defects s more important Berlioz, Liszt, Roof Meyerbeer alone
lerant; poor, much was, of course, wo
umann has painte

e eminent compose degree, the gift o
But contrast wi
ity the violent par
by Hugo Wolf a nblatt" of Vienna
d denunciation, gi taining as they ar truly sound judg
d in the numerou and essays of De hesitate to dismis nd Wagner as in

e field of published us instances of the poser to appreciate nd Spohr belittled
vsky and, with the sky-Korsakov, the iked intensely both s, while neither of s was duly sensible
s.

r. Taylor, it would ast has proved him-ble composer and a ough it is possible own music as well gs that he is no
with the newer and encies in compo
m invalidating him charming talent and posing as Mr. Taylor
m merely a valuable ond a doubt the e al knowledge.

e contrary notwit beware, however, question the critic
posers of strong ty. Genius is prone t in methods oppose in degree of bigotry h
ity and of prejudice o parable from genius y d important creativ e other extreme, th equally admires al s of composition may self a mere musica

Mr. Martino, the conductor, and his band all in appropriate garb; and, for further "atmosphere," Persis Cox to play upon a harpsichord Mozart's Concerto in B Flat, the programme is fittingly drawn from ancient composers—Boccherini, Lulli, Buonamente, Mozart, Haydn, Rameau, Corelli, Purcell, Couperin and Vivaldi.

Herald Feb 24

Under the direction of Pierre Monteux, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its last but one concert of the season here on Tuesday evening in Infantry Hall.

The principal number on the programme will be the "Jupiter" Symphony of Mozart. The other numbers will be Charpentier's "Impressions of Italy" and Tchaikovsky's pianoforte concerto in B flat, in which the soloist will be Carol Robinson. A noteworthy incident in the history of this concerto is that it had its first public performance in Boston in 1875. The pianist was Hans von Bulow, to whom the score was dedicated.

Carol Robinson has attracted a great deal of attention in recent seasons. In 1916 she was the national winner in the contest of the National Federation of Musical Clubs. In another contest of this organization she took the prize for the best song by an American composer. She has appeared in recital and chamber music ensembles in Chicago, New York and other cities.

VERA JAN
Soloist at Symphony Concerts Week.

Feb 24

NY PROGRAM

acoupulos, soprano, is oloist at the Symphony
t Friday afternoon and vening. She will sing oted "Scheherazade"
songs with orchestra.
core to have its first in Boston is Scria-symphony, "The Divine
endelssohn's "Midsum-
's Dream" overture and ieces by Ethel Leginska, by Tagore are also on
m.

PENSION FUND CONCERT

At the Spring Pension Fund Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Symphony Hall, Sunday afternoon, March 30, Beethoven's Choral Symphony will be performed, with the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and a quartet of soloists assisting.

ROBINSON CONCERT

On Tuesday evening, March 4, Carol Robinson, pianist, will give a recital in Steinert Hall. Miss Robinson comes from the West. She will play the Tschaikowsky B Flat Minor Concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Providence.

MONDAY SYMPHONY

Felix Fox will be the soloist at the fourth Monday evening Symphony concert, March 10. He will play the Schumann concerto. The Second Symphony of Brahms and Lalo's "Le Roi d'Ys" overture will complete the program.

'Jupiter' Symphony to be Featured by Boston Orchestra

Written for the Sunday Journal
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

When Hans von Bulow made his oft-quoted comment that Brahms's First Symphony should be called the Tenth, as the sequel of Beethoven's Ninth, he added another equally striking statement. For him the First Symphony was not Beethoven's somewhat tentative composition in C major but the "Jupiter" Symphony of Mozart.

It is this "Jupiter" Symphony, unheard from the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Providence in the last seven seasons, that Mr. Monteux has set for the chief item of the concert that takes place in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening. With it on this occasion will come but two other pieces, each a masterpiece in kind. Tchaikovsky's B-flat minor Concerto for the Pianoforte and Charpentier's pictorial Suite, "Impressions of Italy." Not since 1899 has the Concerto had place in one of these concerts, while the last previous performance of Charpentier's music was but two years later.

Mozart's brief span of life, that was yet so crowded with creative achievement, stretched from 1756 to 1791. Toward the end of his career he was busy with the composing of operas, and he wrote no symphony after 1788. In the summer of that year, however, Mozart produced no less than three works in that form—each a model of its genre.

The first of those three symphonies, that in E-flat, was played by the Boston Orchestra in Providence last season. Following it in order of composition came the "Jupiter," and the last of the three was the beautiful Symphony in G minor. And, incredible as it seems, all were written between the first of June and the tenth of August of that year. At the time Mozart was living in Vienna, and was, as almost always, harassed by poverty. In a letter to his financial benefactor, Michael Puchberg, he wrote in the course of the summer, "If dismal thoughts did not so often intrude (and I strive hard to dismiss them) I should be very well off, here for I live agreeably, comfortably, and, above all cheaply."

A profound sadness does color certain pages of the G minor Symphony, but the "Juptier," presumably deriving its name from its general magnifience is pervadingly vigorous, assertive and cheerful. Some have claimed, however, that the "Jupiter" was so-called because of the heavy chords, plausibly suggestive of the thunderbolts of Jove, with which the first movements begins. Be that as it may, this first movement is Mozart at his best. The Andante in turn reveals his vein of noble yet tender Lyricism, while the Minuet has characteristic charm. And the Finale, with its fugal development, again exhibits Mozart's skill as composer in its fullest expression. Here, as in the Overture to "The Magic Flute," he seemingly toys with contrapuntal problems that vex the souls of lesser men.

Time is shifting the music of Tchaikovsky, as of every great composer, but among his pieces none seems more certain of perpetuity than does this magnificient Pianoforte Concerto that was composed in 1874, in the thirty-fifth year of its author's life. As Tchaikovsky was himself not a virtuoso he consulted his friend Nicholas Rubinstein, then adjudged the best pianist in Moscow, concerning various technical details in this Concerto. For some reason Rubinstein proved wholly unresponsive to the worth and beauty of the piece, and even condemned it as weak and unplayable. Hurt and astonished, Tchaikovsky resolved to publish the Concerto without altering a single note, and so he did. Moreover, erasing from the score the dedication to Rubinstein that he had inscribed, he re-dedicated the Concerto to Hans von Bulow. That eminent pianist bestowed upon the Concerto the warmest possible praise, and repeatedly played it in concerts throughout Europe.

Notable in the Concerto is the sonorous introduction with its superb theme for strings against ascending pianoforte-chords, and notable also are both the tender slow movement and the frenzied, Cossack-like Finale.

Few composers of eminence have to their credit so brief a list of compositions as that which makes Charpentier's contribution to the art of music. And even among these few pieces are but two upon which his fame in reality rests: one, the vivid and eloquent opera "Louise;" the other, the "Impressions of Italy." The latter was written between 1888 and 1890, while Charpentier was enjoying the privileges that had come to him through the winning of the Prix de Rome. Merely to list the titles of the captivating pieces from this Suite, of which four are to be played at this concert, is to give ample hint of the pleasures that they will bring the hearer. First comes a "Serenade," then follows "On Muleback," a tonal picture of jogging mules with tinkling bells wherein 'cellos and violas give forth the amorous song of the muleteers. "On the Summits" depicts the Desert of Sorrento, in the distance a monastery bell. And finally "Naples" is set forth—its heat and light and swarming crowds, its love songs strummed on guitars and a passing military band, and, as night falls, its skk ablaze with fireworks.

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

After Ten Years, d'Indy's "Summer Day on the Mountain"—Music of His Prime—More Novel Pieces—Forthcoming Programmes

AT the Symphony Concerts of tomorrow and Saturay, Mr. Monteux will revive a notably interesting and characteristic piece by d'Indy—the tone-poem, "Summer Day on the Mountain," last heard at Symphony Hall ten years ago. The music, written in 1905 and 1906, belongs to the composer's prime. To it, he prefixes a "prose poem" of like title, written by Roger de Pampelonne and running, in translation, as follows:

DAYBREAK

Awake, gloomy phantoms, smile majestically to the sky, for a ray in the Infinite arises and strikes your brow. One by one they unroll the folds of your great mantle, and the first gleams, caressing your lofty wrinkles, spread on them a moment of sweetness and serenity.

Awake, ye mountains, the king of space appears.

Awake, thou valley, which hidest the happy nests and sleeping cottages, awake with song. And if, in thy song, some sighs reach me, may the light wind of the morning hours gather them and bear them to God.

Awake, ye cities, where the pure rays penetrate only to regret. Learning, bustle, human ignominy, awake ye. Arise, artificial worlds! . . .

The shadows gradually vanish before the invading light.

Laugh or weep, ye creatures who people this world.

Awake, ye harmonies; God listens!

DAY

(Afternoon, under the Pines.)

How sweet it is to lie on the side of the huge steps of the sky!

How sweet it is to dream, far from the tumult of man, in the smiling majesty of the heights!

Let us lift ourselves toward the summit; man forsakes them, and, there where man is no more, the mighty voice of God is heard; let us look from far, that we may be able to serve and love his ephemeral creatures.

Here every earthly noise mounts harmoniously toward my resting heart; here all things are turned to hymn and prayer; Life and Death hold hands to cry out toward heaven: Providence and Goodness. I no longer see that which perishes, but that which is born again on the ruins; the great Guide seems here to reign alone. . . .

Everything is silent. Crossing the country bathed in sunlight, a gentle and artless song comes to me, borne by the wind that steals through the depth of the forest.

Oh, enwrap me completely in your sublime accents, wind whose wild breath gives life to the organ of Creation! Gather the songs of birds of the dark pines; bear to me rustic tinklings, joyous laughter of virgins of the vale, murmur of waves, and breath of plants. Efface in your great sob all sobs of earth; let only the purest harmonies, work of divine Goodness, come to me!

EVENING

Night invades the protecting sky, and the light, fading, throws a fresh quick breath over the wearied hemisphere. The flowers stir; their heads seek a resting place where they may sleep. A last ray caresses the heights, while, happy after the rough work of the day, the mountaineer regains his rustic dwelling, from which smoke rises in a recess of the valley.

The sound of bells, a sign of life, grows fainter and fainter; the lambs rush into the fold, and before the crackling fire the peasant woman puts to sleep her little child, whose timid soul dreams of mists, the wolf, and the dark border of the forest.

Soon everything sleeps beneath the darkness, everything is phantasmal in the valley; yet everything is still alive. . .

O night! eternal Harmony lives beneath thy veil; joy and sorrow are only sleeping.

O night! devouring Life stirs beneath devouring day; it creates itself under the beaded mantle of thy extended arms.

When "Summer Day on the Mountain" was last played here, the following comment was printed in this place: "D'Indy—not Satan but saint—leads his hearers up into a high mountain and shows the vision in tones of sunrise illuminating and reanimating the world. It is not merely gorgeous tonal rhetoric as sometimes the stupendous sunrise of 'Zarathustra' seems and as all the imitations of it surely are. Rather it is very finely observed, imagined and accomplished tone-picturing—the tremulously expectant darkness, the mounting light, the deepening shadows, the darting rays, the answering quiver of the awakening earth, the slow surge of light upon the world, of the world into living again, and of sensation upon him who sees and feels. Therein is the emotion of the song that penetrates d'Indy's imaginative delineation, floods it and sublimates it. In the song is the vision and the emotion of mind and heart watching the daily miracle of a sleeping world waked by the light. Out of the song they possess those that hear.

"It is so again when at the end of the tone-poem, the beholding and feeling composer still stands on the mountain and sees the light recede, the shadows of evening creep over the world, the mantle of silence enwrap it. The tone-picturing is briefer and scantier. A little suggestion suffices at the beginning; for the picture of dark and stillness subduing the world and the sensation of peace are as one in d'Indy's mind and heart, felt so deeply, expressed so intensely and sincerely that they enter no less into the hearer to bring him through tones the emotion of another daily miracle. Between, the composer muses in the afternoon light in the solitudo of the mountain slope, and how vividly on its delineative side the music express physical and spiritual well-being. He muses and now and again the sounds of the daily life in the world below drift up to him. They are half-real and half-idealized and the music is vivid of the twofold sensation that they thus bring. They melt into the composer's musing; the musing intensifies; it becomes the spiritual longing and aspiration, more real than reality in such souls as d'Indy's, and the music is their hymn."

Programmes in Prospect

A single familiar number—Mendelssohn's Overture to Shakspeare's play, "A Midsummer Night's Dream"—stands on the programme for the Symphony Concerts of next week. Otherwise it traverses Skriabin's Symphony, "The Divine Poem," to be played for the first times in Boston; two short pieces written by Mme. Leginska, the pianist, and suggested by poems of Tagore, Ravel's "Asia," three connected songs with orchestra to be sung by Mme. Janacopulos. Separately and with only piano for accompaniment, one or another of these songs—notably "Scheherazade"—has already been heard here.

In Sanders' Theatre at Cambridge on Thursday evening of next week, Mme. Janacopulos will also sing Ravel's songs. At the same concert, the Symphony Orchestra will play Mendelssohn's Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream", the "Jupiter Symphony" of Mozart; Charpentier's graphic "Impressions of Italy."

When Mr. Gabrilowitsch [illegible] phony Hall on Sunday afternoon, March 2, he will play the following numbers:

Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue ....Bach
Sonata in F-minor, Op. 2, No. [illegible] ....Beethoven
Polonaise in C-sharp minor—Nocturne in E major—Mazurka in C-sharp minor—Ballad in G minor..............Chopin Melody in E minor—Caprice-Burlesque.. Gabrilowitsch
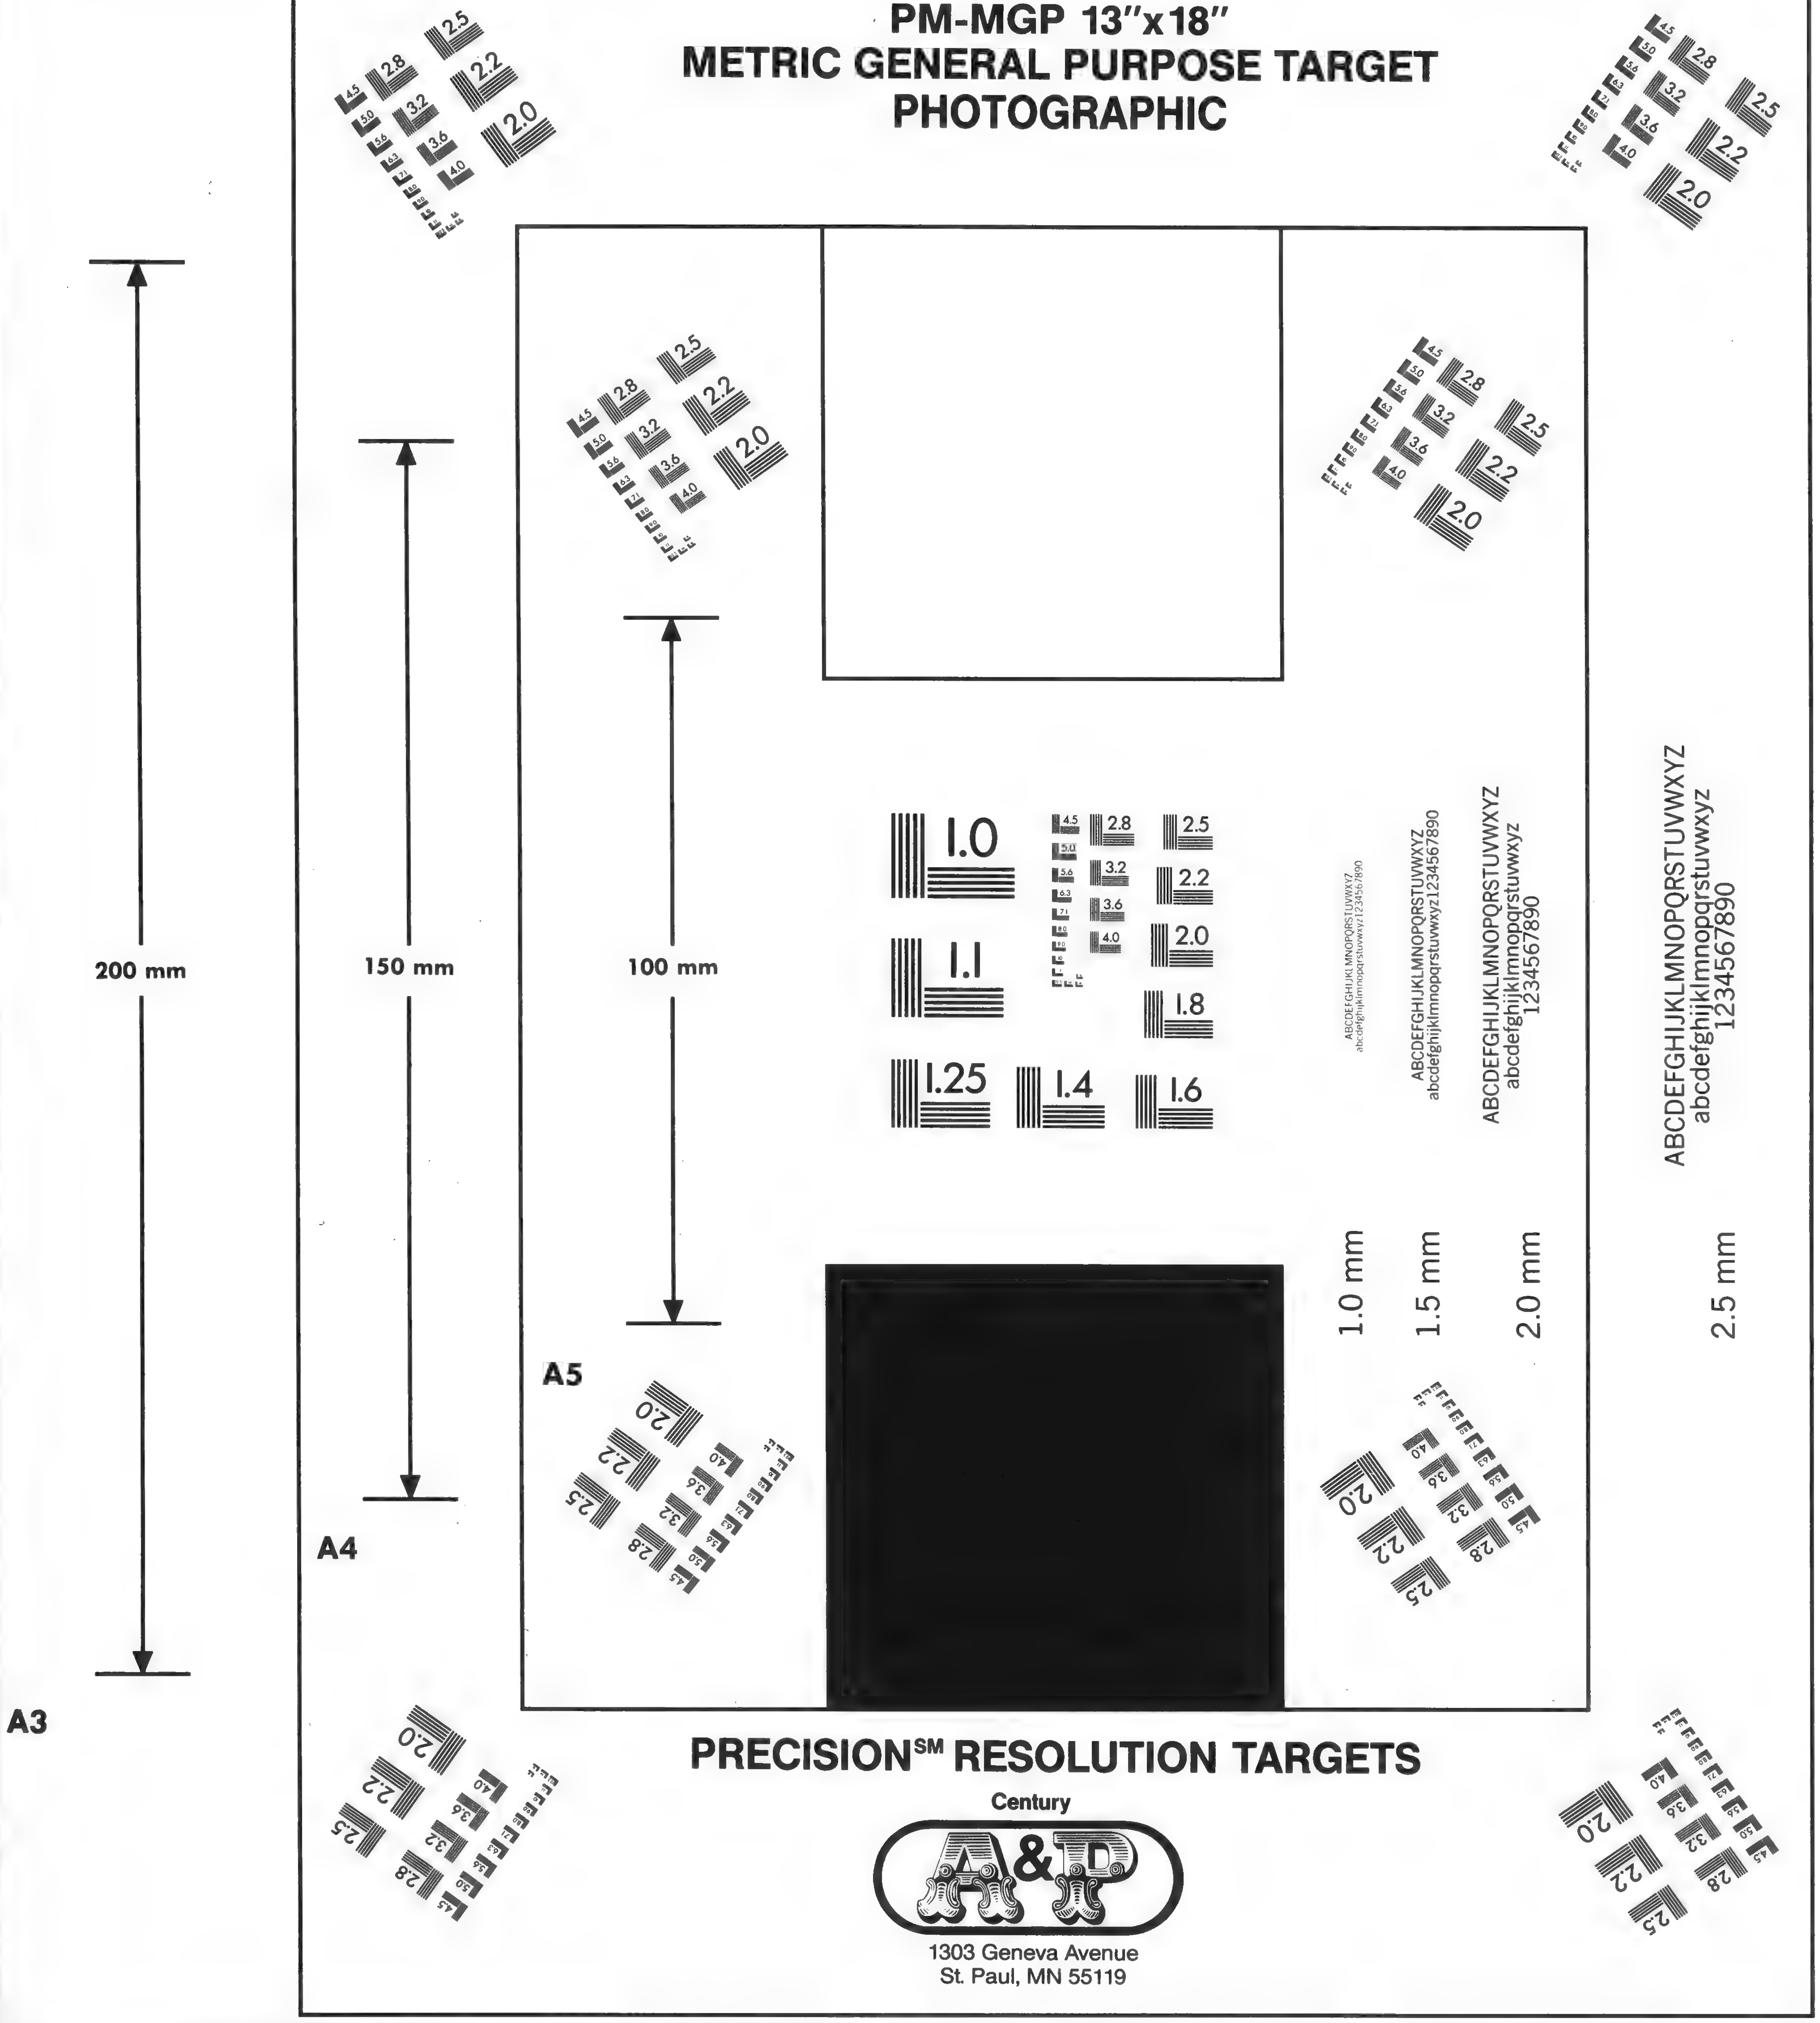
Gavotte ....Glazunov
Shepherd's Hey ....Grainger

[214]

REDUCTION
RATIO
14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
5.0
3.2
2.0
5.6
3.6
6.3
4.0
7.1
8.0
200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm
A5
A4
A3

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

TRANS FEB 23

TWO TONE-POEMS SET IN CONTRAST, RISLER AND ROSSINI

FROM HADLEY TO D'INDY AMONG THE MODERNS

Able Routine Beside Individual Imagination and Expression—Tone-Pictures of the Mountain and Tone-Pictures of the Sea—Beethoven from a Virtuoso—The Overture to "The Barber" Transfigured

As the years pass, Mr. Henry Hadley and his music are becoming institutional. Were there an "Old Farmer's Almanack" for the concert-hall, it might usefully contain the entry: "About this time expect a new tone-poem from Mr. Hadley, with the composer conducting." Here in Boston along came "Salome" in 1907; then in 1910, "The Culprit Fay"; next, in 1916, "Lucifer"; now, in 1924, "The Ocean"; to say nothing of a Symphony or a Symphonic Fantasia slipped, as it were, between. Ostensibly in these pieces, Mr. Hadley ranges widely. Pages of the Dutch poet, Vondel, who was rival to Milton, prompted him to "Lucifer"; pages of the American poet, Joseph Rodman Drake, to "The Culprit Fay"; while the arch-fiend glorious and a wayward fairy prettified are not exactly next of kin. "Salome," panting on the Judæan terrace of Herod the Tetrarch and in the prose of Wilde is not exactly near neighbor to "The Ocean" in storm, calm and an Ode by Mr. Louis Anspacher. Yet, as the ear heard the new tone-poem of the sea, at the Symphony Concert yesterday, and as memory recalled the fiend, the fairy and Herodias's daughter, a family resemblance haunted all this music.

The "poetic basis," as the learned of programme-books say, is discreetly chosen. Out of Vondel, Drake, Wilde or Anspacher, Mr. Hadley runs up a serviceable scaffolding for tones. Friday, for example, we listeners were asked to contemplate the sea in fierce turbulence; in dancing ripple; in silvery calm far-spread. Again, the music upreared upon this frame work is always appropriate. Thus, in "The Ocean," the audience heard measures writhing and raging; while through them and upon the motivs germinating them, the orchestra lashed and tumbled. The "contrasting section" of wavelets and sea-sprites as nicely served. Here were measures in motion, while over them played agreeable melody. Finally, the music expanded as appositely into the broad periods, the long-lined climax, the renewed and tranquil breadths, of the vast ocean calmed. Yet again, all these tone-poems have been well-made. The imaginative design and the musical development unfold as one. The motivs are fructified and set in play. The harmonic background is flowing setting to the melodic progress. Choirs and instruments are used with knowledge and skill. "Salome" and "The Culprit Fay," "Lucifier" and "The Ocean" obey and achieve every prescription of the tone-poem at the turn of the century, say from 1890 through 1910. To aid, Mr. Hadley is an able and practised conductor. An orchestra receives his will, conveys it to the audience.

Yet at these abilities and these virtues, composer, conductor and musician stop. They remain intrinsically of the higher routine, the more expert mechanics, of symphonic music-making. They are on a par with the exercises of the able editorial writer doing his daily stint, of the practised actor weekly repeating his "sound performance." In the day's work they belong—no less to be praised, no more to be belittled. And they are sure of public favor. Yesterday "The Ocean" was long and loudly applauded. As with Glière's "Sirens," the other day, the public of Symphony Hall knows and likes these standardized tone-poems. Mr. Paur and Mr. Gericke schooled it as patiently to them as Mr. Monteux now labors for the modernists.

By the same token, d'Indy's "Summer Day on a Mountain," revived after ten years of strange neglect, was far less warmly received. The piece is also a tone-poem of suggested moods; it was written at the turn of the century, in 1906; but it does not follow the best models, German or Russian. In fact, it is music by a thoroughly individual composer, from first to last resolved upon his own particular course. Incidental are sundry harmonies, timbres, modulations and progressions that in 1924 pierce the ear and prick the imagination even as they did in 1908 or 1914. Much more material are the mind and the spirit of d'Indy as the whole matter and manner of this music discloses him. For it he also ran up an extraneous frame-work—certain "poems in prose" by an obscure Roger de Pampelonne. The first sings a sunrise from the mountain-top—perennial exercise in tones, long since reduced to the sonorous and flooding commonplace, say, of Mascagni's "Iris." Wagner himself could not altogether escape triteness when a moment in "Götterdämmerung" bids him to such measures. Strauss avoids it at the beginning of "Zarathustra" by sheer might and majesty. D'Indy thrusts it away in "Summer Day on the Mountain" by depth and fineness of imagination and sensation. Less is he concerned with the ascendant light from high heaven outpoured than with this earth, stirring from inert slumber into new being. The world outspread quivers with returning life, the world outspread struggles as it were upright, groping, stretching, thrusting away the shadows. The dawn breaks; the world stands erect and alive. It is easy to demur to not a few of d'Indy's later and, as the word goes, more "cerebral" pieces. Here, in this first "tone-picture" is music surcharged with an individual imagination, vital with an individual power.

The other divisions of the tone-poem fall little below this beginning. D'Indy, craving through his working life, long summer-holidays in little-frequented and unpretentious mountains, knows the sheer sensuous delight of vagrant musing, when only the rustling winds stir the silence of the ridge; when the eye wanders from the blue and white of the sky to the green and gold of the earth; when the sounds of the country-side, if they rise at all, mount sublimated. Mood and sensation for music, if ever there were such; yet mood and sensation that most composers, city and suburban-bound, seem to have neither known or expressed. Into tones d'Indy transfuses and transfigures such revery in high places—the sensuous thrill, the desultory musing. So doing he writes a music of deep and illuding beauty even if, for the purposes of the concert-room, he stresses overmuch the passing soldiery of the distant roadside. To some ears, Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony" is no more than suburban beside these measures of mountains. . . .

Possibly the mind rather than the spirit of d'Indy has the upper hand through the music of the summer evening. Logical, symmetrical in good Gallic fashion, he will be at all costs. The stir of the country-side ending the day, rather than the darkening mountain seems to preoccupy him. The life below gradually stills; the landscape takes fantasmal shape in the outline, the background, the paling glow of the music. To the tremors of a world awakening succeed the tremors of a world sinking into the peace and solace of the night. Into silence—for final play of imagination—seeps a music that for some ears, d'Indy has nowhere excelled.

Before these sharply contrasted tone-poems, the audience had taken the amiable and tranquil pleasure of Beethoven's Piano-Concerto in G major, as played by Mr. Risler, and of Rossini's Overture to "The Barber of Seville," worthily reclaimed by Mr. Monteux from band-stand and opera house. There were bound to be tediums in the nearly endless "working-out" of the first movement of the Concerto, but they were materially lessened by Mr. Risler's notion and playing of the music. Plainly, he is clear-sighted, clear-eared, and, therefore, of no mind to regard the concertos for piano or violin as music of "the greater" Beethoven. Indeed, he took this Fourth Concerto as light virtuoso-piece much in the voice and manner of the kindred Concerto for Violin. If the Beethoven who wrought on the grand scale, who thought high and felt deep, appears at all in the Concertos, it is only in "The Emperor." Better than some of the aspiring commentators he knew the limitations of the form; while he was neither wholly above nor wholly aloof, with the musical fashions of his day.

Moreover, Mr. Risler's traits as pianist meet half way such understanding of the chosen music. His touch is light and dry; his tone thin, shallow, scintillant, rather than deep, warm and songful. He plays with precision and circumspection, a ready sense of design and proportion, a scrupulous adjustment of means to ends. He is everywhere intelligent and adept, but nowhere does he quicken the ear, the mind, the heart. The listener hears with polite approval of the pianist's courses. Fortunately this Fourth Concerto of Beethoven asked no more than he could give, even gained by his limitations. It was pleasant to hear that interminable first movement played as light, sparkling, fluent pattern-weaving; the slow division pass as fanciful dialogue between piano and orchestra; the finale come and go in light rhythms and bright ornament. Yet it was hard to understand the great reputation that Mr. Risler enjoys in France and Germany; while it was easy to understand the good will of Mr. Monteux summoning to the Symphony Concerts a pianist to whom the American public has been persistently cold. For once in four depressing months, Mr. Risler found a warm audience.

As for Rossini of "The Barber," he was genial warmth itself. The most diminished and plodding of orchestras in an opera house may not hide the melodious inventions, adroit facture, playful progress and pervading high spirits of his Overture. Here now was the Symphony Orchestra to give to those melodies richness of tone, roundness of phrase, rhythmic life and sentimental elegance. Here also was a conductor who let not a grace of Rossini pass untwinkling, who shared his animation, who caught his smile. Once more the composer was own and enduring brother to that other Italian of all artful gayeties, Boccaccio. Exceptional is it to sit before a piece at a Symphony Concert, be content with "a good time" and have not an after-

Other Times, Other Ways

Edouard Risler (Photograph by Bizio)
From the Elder Generation of European Pianists

HERALD FEB 23

16TH CONCERT OF SYMPHONY

Rossini's Overture to "The Barber of Seville" Well Done

TONE POEM GIVEN FIRST HEARING

By PHILIP HALE

The 16th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Rossini, Overture to "The Barber of Seville"; Beethoven, Piano Concerto, No. 4, G major (Edouard Risler, pianist); Hadley, Tone Poem "Ocean" (first time in Boston); D'Indy, "Summer Day in the Mountain." Mr. Hadley conducted his tone poem. Mr. Monteux conducted the other pieces.

The spirited performance of Rossini's delightful overture that in turn prefaced a story about Aurelian, then served Queen Elizabeth of England and at last was substituted for the lost overture to "The Barber of Seville," pleased the audience greatly. We believe it was the first performance at a subscription concert of this orchestra in Boston. If this is so, the overture should have been played long ago, for it is worthy of this honor. Would that Italians of today could write in Rossini's joyous spirit! They as well as the composers of other countries are inclined to take music too seriously. And in this country, alas, we hear too much about music as an "educational force" and there are solemn lecturers with their "explanations" of this or that work; with their directions how to hear music.

Mr. Hadley's tone poem, suggested by portions of "Ocean Ode," by Louis K. Anspacher, was completed in 1921, and produced by the Philharmonic Society of New York in November of that year under the direction of the composer. It is in three sections. The first is a tempestuous Allegro, for Mr. Anspacher has called the ocean hard names "Million-armed Briareus," "Monster Muddy-Muscled" (which rhymes with "thou hast tussled") and he even went so far as to allude to its "Protean thews." The middle section is in illustration of gracefully slumbering Naiads, dancing Undines, sea-sprites, and other well-known and popular inhabitants of ocean; while in the final section, the sea is quiet, serene, "flowing on through eternity," while the halcyon "breeds its young on the ocean's lull."

Taking the passages containing the sentences quoted, Mr. Hadley wrote picturesque music. The first section is necessarily stormy, suggestive of what Walt Whitman called the spasm and the shatter of the sea, effective in its way, with an ingenious use of a "motto." The middle section has charming passages, and is the most fancifully poetic portion of the work, though the finale is by no means an anti-climax. Mr. Hadley always writes fluently and with technical understanding, but in "Ocean" he has more to say of significance than we have found in his works performed at these concerts since 1905. There is a firmer grip, less euphonious vagueness, less indirection. An experienced conductor, he led a brilliant performance, and was recalled several times.

Mr. Risler, a European pianist of great reputation, played in Boston for the first time and gave a thoughtful, scholarly reading of Beethoven's concerto, the reading of an accomplished musician and well-grounded pianist. That the performance was inspiring cannot be justly said. He played the cadenzas by Hans von Buelow. The one for the first movement was distressingly long and its contents gave no excuse. Neither cadenza was skilfully derived from the foregoing material.

Mr. Monteux gave Mr. Risler a beautiful accompaniment. His interpretation of d'Indy's summer music was poetic. Sea and mountain were thus brought together in one concert. Composers in the past have taken greater, more unwarrantable liberties with the former than with the latter.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Mendelssohn, overture to "Midsummer Night's Dream"; Leginska, "Two Short Pieces for orchestra" (first performance); Ravel, "Scheherazade," three poems for voice and orchestra (Vera Janacopulos, soprano), and Scriabin's "Divine Poem" (first time in Boston).

---

post FEB 23

SYMPHONY DIRECTED BY HADLEY

His "Ocean" Heard for First Time in Boston

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

It is good to find Mr. Monteux placing upon the programmes of the Symphony concerts the overtures of Rossini. Two years ago the overture to "The Italians in Algiers" and last season that to "Semiramide" were thus honored, while the concert of yesterday afternoon began with the overture to "The Barber of Seville."

TWO LIKE PIECES

Time was when these pieces might have been deemed too trivial for a Symphony Concert; but happily that day has passed. There is, of course, no more reason for barring them than there would be for excluding the overtures of Cherubini or even of Mozart. Rossini's music may not be over-serious, but it is a mistake to condemn it as shallow, and his better overtures are soundly made, replete with fresh ideas and scored with remarkable effectiveness.

Upon the work-table of any conductor of a symphony orchestra lie always a considerable number of scores destined for performance during a given season, and as that season draws to a close it may become necessary to "bunch" these intended pieces, whether they be novelties or revivals. Not otherwise, surely, can the fact be accounted for that Mr. Monteux, ever an adroit maker of programmes, placed together at the end of yesterday's concert two pieces so similar in subject and manner, if not in mood and content, as Henry K. Hadley's "Ocean" and d'Indy's "Summer Day on the Mountain."

Defects in Hadley's Poem

Mr. Hadley's tone-poem, played here for the first time, was conducted by the composer. Since Mr. Hadley is a leader of exceptional skill [illegible] sible to suggest [illegible] have done his music better justice [illegible] performance of "Ocean" was, in fact, an admirable one. But if the playing of it left nothing to be desired, the music itself is not free from defects of a sort.

As composer Mr. Hadley knows his trade. He is past master [illegible] details as construction and [illegible] tion, but excellent as his music [illegible] a technical standpoint, it is all [illegible] lacking in significant thematic [illegible] There are imaginative and even powerful measures in this "Ocean" [illegible] where may the listener [illegible] Hadley and none other could have conceived this or that passage. [illegible] traordinarily prolific composer, Mr. Hadley is seemingly the victim of [illegible] dency.

Mr. Risler's Playing

Between the Overture and Mr. Hadley's music came a performance of Beethoven's Fourth Concerto, with Edouard Risler, a Parisian pianist, hitherto unknown to Boston, as the soloist. Rarely have the tender phrases of the Andante been played here so poetically as Mr. Risler yesterday played them. For the rest his performance, though neat, nimble and musicianly, seemed in no way remarkable. Although the Andante still charms, the other [illegible] of this Concerto are wearing thin, and it is not unlikely that Mr. Risler's playing would have made a stronger impression had he set himself a more grateful task.

Not since 1914 had d'Indy's "Summer Day on the Mountain" been heard here, though there was scant justification for such neglect of one of the masterpieces of modern music. A few [illegible] ineffective measures are to be found in this symphonic poem, but the piece as a whole is of uncommon eloquence, a beautiful uttering of noble thoughts. Here d'Indy proves himself a master of landscape, a tone-poet of nature second only to Richard Wagner.

TRAN FEB

Monday afternoon, March 3, in Symphony Hall, a concert for young people by the Symphony Orchestra in full numbers, with Mr. Monteux conducting and Miss Loraine Wyman for assisting singer. She will be heard in three of Hughes's "Mother Goose Parodies." Otherwise the programme traverses Beethoven's Overture to the play, "Egmont"; the Nocturne and Scherzo from Mendelssohn's music to Shakspeare's "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; the "Farandole" from Bizet's music to the play, "The Woman of Arles"; a fragment of Franck's Symphony; the Tartar Dances from Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor." Unless accompanied by one or more children, adults are not admitted. Most of the tickets are privately distributed.

[215]

HER

Mr. Schneevoight will be the guest conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra on March 7 and 8. His program will be eminently conservative: Sibelius's Symphony No. 2; Beethoven's Overture "Lenore" No. 3; Kleine Nacht, Musik by Mozart, and Straus's "Don Juan." Mr. Schneevoight said recently in New York that he and Sibelius are Finns; that one must know Sibelius and Finland to understand thoroughly the music of Sibelius. He may therefore be expected to reveal the "true inwardness" of this symphony, which has been played here several times.

TRANS FEB 23

TWO TONE-POEMS SET IN CONTRAST, RISLER AND ROSSINI

FROM HADLEY TO D'INDY AMONG THE MODERNS

Able Routine Beside Individual Imagination and Expression—Tone Pictures of the Mountain and Tone-Pictures of the Sea—Beethoven from a Virtuoso—The Overture to "The Barber [illegible]

A [illegible] Farmer's Almanack [illegible] cert-hall [illegible] entry [illegible] tone-poem from Mr. Hadley [illegible] poser conducting [illegible] came "Salome" in 1905 [illegible] 1910 [illegible] Culprit Fay" [illegible] 1916 [illegible] now, in 1924 [illegible] of a Symphony [illegible] slipped, as [illegible] these [illegible] Pages of [illegible] rival to M [illegible] pages of the [illegible] man Drake [illegible] the arch-[illegible] fairy pr[illegible] "Salome," [illegible] of Herod the Tetrarch [illegible] Wilde is [illegible] Ocean" in storm [illegible] Louis Anspacher. Yet [illegible] new tone-poem of the sea [illegible] Concert yesterday [illegible] the fiend, the fairy and [illegible] ter, a [illegible] music.

[illegible]

and majesty. D'Indy thirsts [illegible] away [illegible] Summer Day on the Mountain" [illegible] and [illegible] of imagination and sensation [illegible] he [illegible] with the ascendant light from high heaven [illegible] than with this earth [illegible] The world [illegible] the world outspread [illegible] the word [illegible] in this first [illegible]

[illegible] conductor. [illegible] conveys [illegible]

[illegible] Mascagni's "Iris." Wagner [illegible] not altogether escape [illegible] ment in "Götterdämmerung" [illegible] such measures. Strauss avoids [illegible] beginning of "Zarathustra" by [illegible]

HERALD FEB 23

16TH CONCERT OF SYMPHONY

Rossini's Overture to "The Barber of Seville" Well Done

TONE POEM GIVEN FIRST HEARING

By PHILIP HALE

The 16th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Rossini, Overture to "The Barber of Seville"; Beethoven, Piano Concerto No. 4, G [illegible] and [illegible] Hadley, Tone Poem "Ocean" (first time in Boston). D'Indy, "Summer Day on the Mountain." Mr. Hadley conducted his tone poem. Mr. Monteux conducted the other pieces.

The spirited performance of Rossini's delightful overture that in turn prefaced a story about [illegible] served Queen Elizabeth of England and at last was [illegible] for the [illegible] overture to "The Barber of Seville" pleased the audience [illegible] subscription [illegible] in Boston [illegible] should [illegible] is worthy [illegible] Italian [illegible] the composers [illegible] are inclined [illegible] much about [illegible] force" [illegible] with [illegible] that work, with [illegible] to hear music.

Mr. Hadley's tone poem, suggested by portions of "Ocean Ode," by Louis K. Anspacher, was [illegible] produced by the [illegible] Society of New York [illegible] under the [illegible] It is in three [illegible] "Million-armed [illegible] Muddy [illegible] "thou [illegible] so [illegible] there." The middle [illegible] tration of gracefully [illegible] dancing [illegible] well known [illegible] ocean; while [illegible] sea [illegible] eternity" [illegible] young on the [illegible]

[illegible]

The [illegible] program [illegible] will [illegible] Mendelssohn's Overture to "Midsummer Night's Dream"; Leginska, "Five Short Pieces for Orchestra" (first performance); [illegible] "Scheherazade" [illegible] and [illegible] piano), and [illegible] (first time in Boston).

POST FEB 27

SYMPHONY DIRECTED BY HADLEY

His "Ocean" Heard for First Time in Boston

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

[illegible]

TWO LIKE PIECES

[illegible]

TRANS [illegible]

Monday afternoon [illegible] Symphony Hall, a concert for young people by the Symphony Orchestra [illegible] with Mr. Monteux conducting and Miss [illegible] Wieman for assisting singer. She will be heard in three of Hughes's "Mother Goose Parodies." Otherwise the programme traverses Beethoven's Overture to the play, "Egmont"; the Nocturne and Scherzo from Mendelssohn's music to Shakespeare's "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; the "Farandole" from Bizet's music to the play, "The Woman of Arles"; a fragment of Franck's Symphony; the Tartar Dances from Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor." Unless accompanied by one or more children, adults are not admitted. Most of the tickets are privately distributed.

[illegible] Boston Symphony [illegible] Sibelius's Symphony No. [illegible] Overture "Leonore" [illegible] Mozart [illegible] Juan [illegible] New York [illegible] Finns [illegible] know [illegible] and [illegible] music of Sibelius. [illegible] therefore be expected to reveal [illegible] awkwardness" of this symphony, which has been played here several times.

Other Times, Other Ways

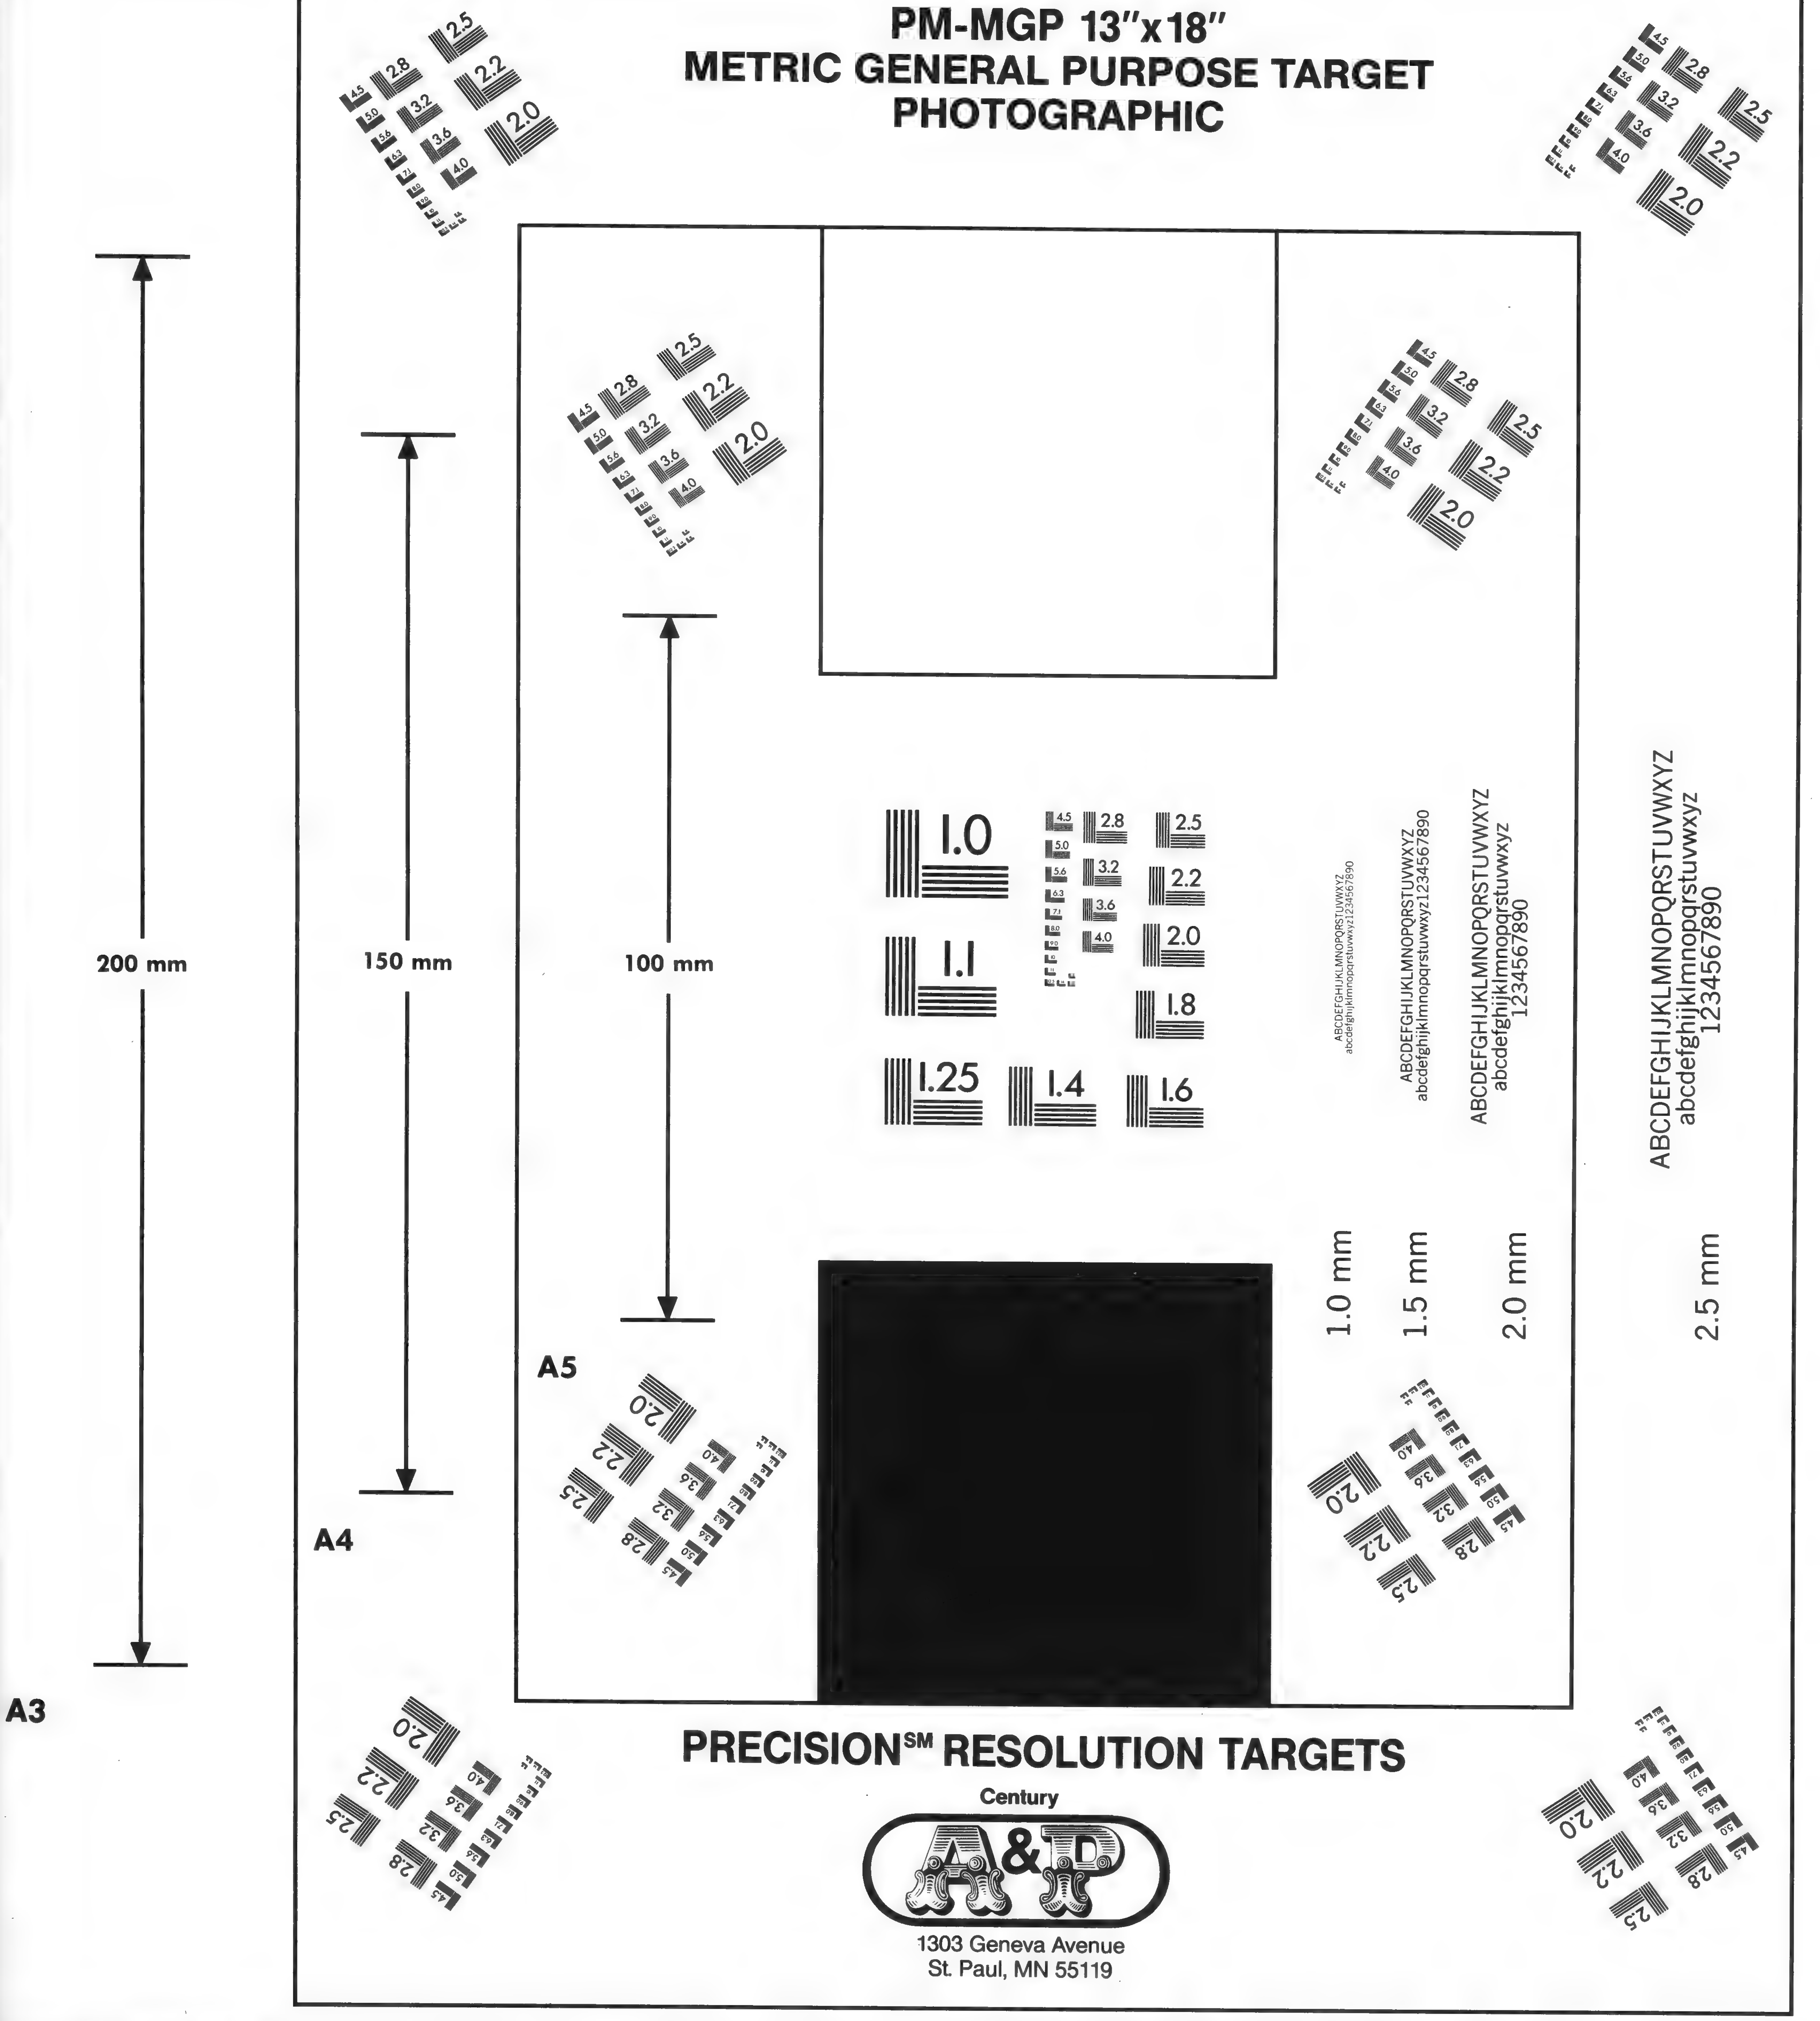
Edouard Risler (Photograph by Bixio)

From the Elder Generation of European Pianists

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A5
A4
A3
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
8.0
9.0
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

GLOBE FEB 23

RISLER SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Henry Hadley Conducts His "The Ocean"

Edouard Risler, long celebrated in France as a pianist, played for the first time in Boston as soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert. His choice of Beethoven's G major concerto, which gives the solo player no chances to tickle the ears of the groundlings, and his musicianly performance alike, betokened the sincere artist.

Mr Risler plainly understands and loves Beethoven's music. He was at his best in the andante con moto where his exquisite piano and pianissimo playing will long be remembered by those to whom this movement is one of the greatest triumphs of Beethoven's genius. A bit more fire and dash in vigorous passages, and a warmer quality of tone when playing forte, would have made Mr Risler's performance superb.

Henry Hadley, well known as both composer and conductor, conducted the first Boston performance of his tone poem, "The Ocean," a musical illustration of portions of an ode by Louis K. Anspacher, best known as the dramatist who wrote "The Unchastened Woman." The first section of the music attempted to "Tear a leaf from the Furies' history, Loosen the wind's hoarse blast, Unroll the scroll of stormy mystery, Over the ocean's vast."

Mr Hadley has contrived plenty of sound and fury, which to one listener conveyed little imaginative suggestion either of the ocean or of anything else. The middle section, dealing with the naiads at play also seemed more conventional than suggestive. The final pages of the score, with a suave horn theme developed effectively to what turns out a disappointingly bombastic climax, gave pleasure.

Mr Hadley might score his music for orchestra with greater delicacy of taste. It would sound more sonorous if he did not seem so anxious to keep every instrument busy as much of the time as possible. He is a competent conductor of the "prima donna" school. This tone poem is not his best work.

The concert began with a brilliant performance of Rossini's overture to "The Barber of Seville," familiar enough in the opera house but seldom heard at Symphony Hall. It is superlatively good light music and as such deserves a place on even the severest style of orchestral program.

Better one good lively tuneful piece of this order than 50 abortive "serious" compositions by musicians of any age or country. Would not the ideal symphony concert program offer the great classics, the best light music, the best of the modernists, and nothing else? From how much of the fourth rate, 1890 sort of thing listeners at Symphony Hall might well be delivered!

D'Indy's "Summer Day of the Mountain" would gain if condensed. The slender but perfectly genuine vein of lyricism in the composer's imagination cannot carry him through so long drawn-out a rhapsody. There are many pages which recall the Wagner of the "Forest Murmurs" in "Siegfried," and others which nobody but d'Indy could have conceived so well. One fears the prose poem which inspired this music appealed too strongly to d'Indy's well-known philosophy of religion. If he would but revise this music it might be more often played. It is now nearly 20 years old and has been heard here but thrice.

Mr Monteux's conducting, except in the Beethoven, was praiseworthy. He did not sufficiently vary the dynamics in the andante of the concerto, nor did one feel that he had imagined the work as a whole. You cannot get the spirit of music like this by noticing only separate pages of the score.

Next week Vera Janacoupolos, soprano, makes her Boston debut as soloist. Music by Skriabin, Leginska and Ravel will be heard for the first time here, with Mendelssohn's "Mid-Summer Night's Dream" overture for classic.

P. R.

GLOBE FEB 2

Music Notes and Comment

Mr Monteux has set for this week's Symphony concert a modern program, with only Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture to represent the standard repertory. Skriabin died in 1915, but only the "Poem of Ecstasy" played here under Dr Muck, and various of his piano pieces, such as the sonata lately played by Mitja Nikisch have been heard here. Now we are to hear the "Divine Poem," otherwise the third symphony of this much debated composer. For an enthusiastic but not discriminating estimate of Skriabin see Dr A. E. Hull's book "Scriabine." Mme Janacoupolos has chosen for her Boston debut as soloist to sing Ravel's setting for soprano and orchestra of three poems by "Tristan Klingsor," called collectively "Scheherezade," and individually "Asie," "The Magic Flute," and "The Indifferent One." "Asie" has been sung here by Miss Ethel Frank and others. Two of Ethel Leginska's pieces for orchestra are also to be given, written presumably, like the piano pieces lately played here by the composer herself, under the influence of such modernists as Leo Ornstein. If Mr Monteux would only give us classic programs like those Dr Muck sometimes set, with say a Mozart symphony, a Gluck-Mottl suite and Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony his resorting to the modernists might more readily be forgiven him by some critically minded auditors.

TRANS FEB 25

MR. HIGGINSON ONCE WROTE

A Newly Published Letter from Him About His Policies, Courses and Fortune with the Boston Symphony Orchestra

THE New York Times and The New York Tribune of yesterday contained an unpublished letter of the late Henry L. Higginson about his policies and courses with the Boston Orchestra. He wrote it to Mrs. Charles Lanier when as moving spirit in the Friends of Music, she was considering a separate orchestra for that society. She now makes it public, though without date. It does not differ materially from similar letters in Mr. Howe's books about the orchestra and about Mr. Higginson. Yet as new Higginsoniana, it may be reprinted here:

> ere is my original plan, which has adhered to: A body of as good icians as I could get, to play under rst-ra conductor, and only under ; the of the orchestra to be wed to p in smaller concerts or clubs that our men have, and give instruction, but not to play in any other orchestral organization. The conductor to have absolute control of his men and require as many rehearsals as he chose, he to select the musicians, to make the programmes, and to be responsible for that whole side; I to provide the means and the management. The latter part has been supplied through the services of Mr. Ellis and then Mr. Brennan, who came later.
>
> I recognized that the concerts would leave a considerable deficit, say $20,000 or more yearly, and it might be much higher.
>
> I very rarely ask for any change in the programme. In two or three cases of a death, I have asked for some notice to be taken of the deceased. We began with twenty concerts in the evening and twenty concerts in the afternoon—the same programme—and a concert or two in Cambridge. After a few years we went to New York, and then farther. We began with a talented singer—Mr. Henschel—as conductor; he had had a little experience. Then came Mr. Gericke, who was a wonderful teacher of his men, he having had much training and a high reputation in Vienna.
>
> I have rarely looked at the bills. I have never shrunk at any price necessary to get the best talent, as I saw it. From early years I had had such knowledge of and connection with high-class musicians in Europe that I learned about men there. It has been a one-man machine, trusting to his assistants—namely, the conductor and the managers. I have had great luck in Mr. Ellis, who is honest as the sun, generous, a good bargainer, much liked everywhere. I have had six conductors and, on the whole, the last is the best.
>
> The union leader came to me and tried to get our men into the union. My only reply was: "There is no advantage to them, as I pay them more than the union pays and in that way get the best." His reply to that was that the union would never lend us extra men when we needed them. My reply to that was that I would double all the wind and had all the strings needed. And there we have stood.
>
> There has been the plan and it has been kept. I have relied on my men and found the reliance was justified. They have relied on me, not only the leading men but all the members of the orchestra, and there has grown up good feeling between us. I have spoken to the men at the beginning and end of each year and said what pleasant things occurred to me, thus fostering the pleasant feeling of comradeship. I have always spoken myself as a member of the orchestra.
>
> We have a pension fund, which is growing, and comes from extra concerts each year.
>
> In one point I have failed. I expected to give the concerts at low prices, and found it impossible, because the speculators took the seats and resold them at higher prices, and because the expenses grew so fast. I should think that the expenses were at least three times as much as they originally were. . . .
>
> I have written out a great deal more than this, but after all, here is the plan. It is nothing but seeking the best, not limiting the costs, and each man—the conductor, Messrs. Ellis and Brennan, and I—minding his own business and not meddling.

Beethoven Choral

His Ninth Symphony at a Special Concert

AFTER seven years Boston is again to hear Beethoven's Choral Symphony—this time to mark the hundredth anniversary of the first performance of the music, at Vienna, in May of 1824, and to round out Mr. Monteux's ending term as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. More than once he has led in the eight earlier Symphonies of Beethoven. Now comes deserved opportunity to conduct in the Ninth, last and, by tradition, most exacting of them all. Since the presence of a large chorus necessitates the removal of four or five rows of seats in Symphony Hall, the piece cannot be included in the regular course of the Symphony Concerts. It will, therefore, be heard at a concert for the Pension Fund of the orchestra on Sunday afternoon, March 30. Possibly other music of Beethoven will precede it. Quite as probably, it will be played and sung by itself. For the final movement, Dr. Davison is training a choir divided between the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. Soon the quartet of solo-singers will be announced.

Providence J Feb 22

BIG AUDIENCE HEARS BOSTON SYMPHONY

Orchestral Suite and Piano Concerto Features Fourth of Season's Concerts.

CAROL ROBINSON SOLOIST

Monteux Leads with Taste and Control, Rendering of Symphony Being Marked by Brilliant Technique

A symphony, an orchestral suite and a piano concerto were played last evening at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fourth concert in Infantry Hall. Although containing but three numbers the programme was much longer than usual, a fact not in the least disturbing to the big audience, for the concert proved one of sustained interest. Not only in the choice of compositions but in performance and in the success of an extremely talented American artist as soloist the orchestra's fourth visit may be said to measure up to the highest artistic standards attained during the present season.

M. Monteux, as usual, led his men with the musicianship, the taste and the sure control that inevitably bring artistic results. The symphony was notably smooth in technical detail and the original and brilliantly orchestrated Charpentier "Impressions of Italy," while revealing one or two slight lapses from perfect ensemble on the part of the 'cello section, as a whole made a delightful finale to the well balanced programme.

It is always pleasant to witness the success of a young American artist and Carol Robinson's appearance as soloist brought much pleasure to her hearers. Her playing of the big Tschaikowsky concerto, was, in fact, a noteworthy performance and spoke volumes for her natural musical gifts and her purely American training.

The programme follows:

Mozart......Symphony in C major, "Jupiter"
  Allegro vivace.
  Andante cantabile.
  Menuetto: Allegretto: Trio.
  Finale: Allegro molto.
Tchaikowsky...Concerto for Pianoforte No. 1, in B-flat minor, Op. 23
  Andante non troppo e molto maestoso: Allegro con spirito.
  Andantino semplice: Allegro vivace assai.
  Allegro con fuoco.
Charpentier............"Impressions of Italy," Orchestral Suite
  Serenade.
  On Muleback.
  On the Summits.
  Naples.

When one tires of modern musical fare or of that which by complexity of structure taxes the mind it is well to return to Mozart and drink from the pure spring of his genius. In the "Jubiter" symphony we find all the freshness and spontaneity so characteristic of his writings. It is music noble in its majestic sweep and freedom, music that speaks intimately of the beauty of nature, music which touches the heart. There is strength in the fine opening allegro and the andante cantabile sings of tranquillity and rest. In this latter movement one easily might visualize Mozart at his pleasant task of composition. At some point of vantage he meditates upon a summer landscape, sun bathed and beautiful. The serenity, the peace that comes with such close communion with nature is to him music. Truthfully he traces in musical language the feelings inspired by the scene outspread before him and the impressions are made permanent for the enjoyment of all.

The entire symphony, under M. Monteux's baton, was performed with fitting understanding and artistry. At the close the conductor responded several times to tremendous and deserved applause.

In his orchestra suite, "Impressions of Italy," Charpentier is successful in creating the desired atmosphere. It is descriptive music of ingenius design and color and without the aid of programme notes would stir the Italian pulse. The orchestration is admirably suggestive of the several scenes and the characteristic rythms and melodies are used in striking and effective manner. A viola solo off stage is one of the devices introduced. The last movement, "Naples," depicts the joyous life of that city. It is a very brilliant finale of considerable length.

The appearance of Carol Rohinson introduced a young player of conspicuous talent. Tall and slight but with abundant physical strength she sits at the piano and accomplishes with ease the grand effects on the Tschaikowsky concerto.

Her technique is well developed; it is clear and dependable, and to this requisite foundation she adds fine musical qualities. The concerto is a good vehicle for the display of a painter's ability both as technician and musician. The orchestra is given a part in the score of greater signficance and merit than is frequently seen in concertos for pianoforte with orchestral accompaniment. M. Monteux gave an excellent performance with his assisting musicians and at the concerto's close the entire orchestra joined in the ovation accorded the young artist.

---

agement to struggling genius.

SINGULAR SKRIABIN

His "Divine Poem" for the First Times at the Symphony Concerts of This Week—A Wide Canvas Stretched and Filled—A Superabundant Music—Forthcoming Programmes—Return of Julia Culp

SKRIABIN will pour at the close of the gatherings in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of this week. Into the "funnels of our ears" he will pour his Third Symphony or "Divine Poem." The stream of sound will be delightful, but the dictates of musical fashion do not compel us to say we like it. If you rave about it to an initiate of the inner cult of Skriabin-worship, he will crush you with the remark that it is merely a transitional piece. Nowadays you do not have to bother about any music which has been long out of Paris, except for genuine antiques; and when you consider how much more dissonant and vital the music of twenty-five years hence is going to be, how completely free from any taint of nineteenth century conventions, it seems foolish to bother about any present-day music at all.

The "Divine Poem" escapes the disgrace of belonging to the nineteenth century as it was written in the summer of 1903. According to Mr. Eaglefield Hull, in his book on Skriabin, this was the "most fruitful season of all the composer's creative work, when he especially felt the joys of a free creative life as compared with the humdrum routine of tutorial work." The "Divine Poem" has less of Skriabin's peculiar style than the "Poem of Ecstasy" of 1908, "played in Boston as early as 1910," and much less than the final "Prometheus" which has not yet been heard here. But there is plenty to identify it as Skriabin's own, probabliy just enough to make it enjoyable to many. After all, it is fortunate for the popularity of many composers that they have to write early and transitional pieces, for the majority of audiences do not relish the later manner of anyone, but prefer to have a dash of individuality diluted with a liberal amount of the familiar.

The "Divine Poem" combines elements of the classical symphony and the symphonic poem. The movements are joine one to another without pause and th themes of the earlier movements ar brought back in the finale. The first and last movements employ the regular sonata form and there are periodic melodies o eight and sixteen measures. Although Skria bin was a Russian, there is no hint of hi native folk-music here. Whether th themes, as Mr. Hull declares, are "mag nificent" and their "birth noteworthy, must be left for the [illegible] to decid The complicated rhythms, such as fiv beats against nine, of the later Skriab are not used in the "Divine Poem."

Skriabin's celebbrated "mystic chord," f-sharp, b-flat, e, a and d appears in th symphony only as if by accident. The ric Wagnerian chords of the ninth, elevent and thirteenth, often chromatically alter are dwelt upon long and fondly. There a few chords in the "Divine Poem" whi would embarrass a teacher of academ harmony. Skriabin, even in more advanc pieces than this, seems to use dissonan to cause a pleasant, massage-like au friction and not as a means of shock Strauss and [illegible] bin's favorite harmonies are technic dissonances, they have the effect of intens fied consonances even to the point of cloy ing.

The "Divine Poem" requires a large o chestra—a quartet in each wood-wi group, an octet of horns, a quintet of trun pets, two harps, and the rest of the instr ments as usual, except that there is shrill percussion and most strange of no pipe organ or angelic choir, the absen of which in a "Divine Poem" seems alm sacrilegious. Skriabin's orchestratio very sonorous, but much less complex tha that of Strauss. The string parts conta about all the polyphony that there Roughly speaking, it seems as if Skkriab had written the whole symphony for th strings and afterwards had reinforced th string parts by the wind instruments varying numbers.

A sense of humor never seems to ha disturbed the blissful seriousness wi which Skriabin took his own work. N content with calling this symphony " Divine Poem" he has labelled speci themes with the adjectives "divine" a "sublime." Besides the conventional Ita ian terms the score is fitted out with Frenc expressions which are not so much di tions for playing, as the composer's ecstatic descriptions of his music, such "joyeux essor," "monstrueux," "profo dément tragique," légendaire," and "av une ivresse débordante." Just how does o play in a "legendary" manner, and wh would happen to the ensemble if th orchestra played with "overflowing drunk enness," to say nothing of a possible ra on Symphony Hall by dry agents?

The first movement has a slow introdu tion, or rather prologue to the whole sym phony beginning with a motiv which Skr abin has labelled "divin, grandiose." Th and two other motivs, called by Mr. Hu

Continued on Following P

the "Summons to Man" and "Fear to A proach, Suggestive of Flight," [illegible] material of the prologue. The first mov ment, Allegro, C minor, is entitled "Stru gles," but the opposing forces do not up a very strenuous fight, leaving a go deal of leisure for "ivresse." To trace course of the various themes would be undertake "the humdrum of tutorial wo from which Skriabin was free when wrote this symphony. Even our good gui Eaglefield, is at a loss to know wh is the "second subject proper" and that it matters little. Perhaps in view all the "ivresse," no one of the subjects proper. Composers who fight battles symphonies are like the United States, that they have never been known to suf defeat. This movement rises to triumpha climaxes.

The second movement, Lento, in E ma lives up to its title of "Sensuous P ures," even if it may not live up to S abin's label of "sublime." It is rich wi harmonic nectar and orchestral ambros The violin has a delectable solo accomp nied by warblings from the wood-winds

The last movement, Allegro, C major, entitled "Jeu Divin," which appears as " vine Activities" in Mr. Hull's translati The opening motiv of its main theme transformed from the theme of "Di Grandeur" so as to resemble the beginn of "We Won't Go Home Until Morning," some acute English critic—not Mr. Hu has pointed out. There is a lyric second th which Mr. Hull calls the "Ego Theme," though it partakes of the Wagnerian as expressed in Elsa's procession in hengrin. Perhaps it is the presence "We Won't Go Home Until Morning" whi brings a little more of the later manner Skriabin into the finale. In the words Mr. Hull the "work is consummated w one of the finest perorations in the wh range of music." In its dazzling orche tral effect it suggests one of Skriabin's vorite pleasures, that of lying upon his ba in the Alps and looking straight up at t sun. The drums hum, but not with "humdrum of tutorial work."

Appreciation of this symphony depe less upon especial intellectual prepara than upon a favorable physical condit It should come at the "end of a pe day"; after exercise, a pacifying b spiring bath, a hearty, leisurely din little black coffee but not too much, smoke which fulfills the advert Then the "Divine Poem" will provi the Volstead Act forbids.

[216]

GLOBE FEB 23

RISLER SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Henry Hadley Conducts His "The Ocean"

Edouard Risler, long celebrated in France as a pianist, played for the first time in Boston as soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert. His choice of Beethoven's G major concerto, which gives the solo player no chances to tickle the ears of the groundlings, and his musicianly performance alike, betokened the sincere artist.

Mr Risler plainly understands and loves Beethoven's music. He was at his best in the andante con moto where his exquisite piano and pianissimo playing will long be remembered by those to whom this movement is one of the greatest triumphs of Beethoven's genius. A bit more fire and dash in vigorous passages, and a warmer quality of tone when playing forte, would have made Mr Risler's performance superb.

Henry Hadley, well known as both composer and conductor, conducted the first Boston performance of his tone poem, "The Ocean," a musical illustration of portions of an ode by Louis K. Anspacher, best known as the dramatist who wrote "The Unchastened Woman." The first section of the music attempted to "Tear a leaf from the Furies' history, Loosen the wind's hoarse blast, Unroll the scroll of stormy mystery, Over the ocean's vast."

Mr Hadley has contrived plenty of sound and fury, which to one listener conveyed little imaginative suggestion either of the ocean or of anything else. The middle section, dealing with the naiads at play also seemed more conventional than suggestive. The final pages of the score, with a suave horn theme developed effectively to what turns out a disappointingly bombastic climax, gave pleasure.

Mr Hadley might score his music for orchestra with greater delicacy of taste. It would sound more sonorous if he did not seem so anxious to keep every instrument busy as much of the time as possible. He is a competent conductor of the "prima donna" school. This tone poem is not his best work.

The concert began with a brilliant performance of Rossini's overture to "The Barber of Seville," familiar enough in the opera house but seldom heard at Symphony Hall. It is superlatively good light music and as such deserves a place on even the severest style of orchestral program.

Better one good lively tuneful piece of this order than 50 abortive "serious" compositions by musicians of any age or country. Would not the ideal symphony concert program offer the great classics, the best light music, the best of the modernists, and nothing else? From how much of the fourth rate, 1890 sort of thing listeners at Symphony Hall might well be delivered!

D'Indy's "Summer Day of the Mountain" would gain if condensed. The slender but perfectly genuine vein of lyricism in the composer's imagination cannot carry him through so long drawn-out a rhapsody. There are many pages which recall the Wagner of the "Forest Murmurs" in "Siegfried," and others which nobody but d'Indy could have conceived so well. One fears the prose poem which inspired this music appealed too strongly to d'Indy's well-known philosophy of religion. If he would but revise this music it might be more often played. It is now nearly 20 years old and has been heard here but thrice.

Mr Monteux's conducting, except in the Beethoven, was praiseworthy. He did not sufficiently vary the dynamics in the andante of the concerto, nor did one feel that he had imagined the work as a whole. You cannot get the spirit of music like this by noticing only separate pages of the score.

Next week Vera Janacoupolos, soprano, makes her Boston debut as soloist. Music by Skriabin, Leginska and Ravel will be heard for the first time here, with Mendelssohn's "Mid-Summer Night's Dream" overture for classic.

P. R.

Music Notes and Comment

Mr Monteux has set for this week's Symphony concert a modern program, with only Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture to represent the standard repertory. Skriabin died in 1915, but only the "Poem of Ecstasy" played here under Dr Muck, and various of his piano pieces, such as the sonata lately played by Mitja Nikisch have been heard here. Now we are to hear the "Divine Poem," otherwise the third symphony of this much debated composer. For an enthusiastic but not discriminating estimate of Skriabin see Dr A. E. Hull's book "Scriabine." Mme Janacoupolos has chosen for her Boston debut as soloist to sing Ravel's setting for soprano and orchestra of three poems by "Tristan Klingsor," called collectively "Scheherezade," and individually "Asie," "The Magic Flute," and "The Indifferent One." "Asie" has been sung here by Miss Ethel Frank and others. Two of Ethel Leginska's pieces for orchestra are also to be given, written presumably, like the piano pieces lately played here by the composer herself, under the influence of such modernists as Leo Ornstein. If Mr Monteux would only give us classic programs like those Dr Muck sometimes set, with say a Mozart symphony, a Gluck-Mottl suite and Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony his resorting to the modernists might more readily be forgiven him by some critically minded auditors.

TRANS FEB 25

MR. HIGGINSON ONCE WROTE

A Newly Published Letter from Him About His Policies, Courses and Fortune with the Boston Symphony Orchestra

THE New York Times and The New York Tribune of yesterday contained an unpublished letter of the late Henry L. Higginson about his policies and courses with the Boston Orchestra. He wrote it to Mrs. Charles Lanier when as moving spirit in the Friends of Music, she was considering a separate orchestra for that society. She now makes it public, though without date. It does not differ materially from similar letters in Mr. Howe's books about the orchestra and about Mr. Higginson. Yet as new Higginsoniana, it may be reprinted here:

ere is my original plan, which has adhered to: A body of as good icians as I could get, to play under rst-ra conductor, and only under ; the n of the orchestra to be wed to p in smaller concerts or clubs that our men have, and give instruction, but not to play in any other orchestral organization. The conductor to have absolute control of his men and require as many rehearsals as he chose, he to select the musicians, to make the programmes, and to be responsible for that whole side; I to provide the means and the management. The latter part has been supplied through the services of Mr. Ellis and then Mr. Brennan, who came later.

I recognized that the concerts would leave a considerable deficit, say $20,000 or more yearly, and it might be much higher.

I very rarely ask for any change in the programme. In two or three cases of a death, I have asked for some notice to be taken of the deceased. We began with twenty concerts in the evening and twenty concerts in the afternoon—the same programme—and a concert or two in Cambridge. After a few years we went to New York, and then farther. We began with a talented singer—Mr. Henschel—as conductor; he had had a little experience. Then came Mr. Gericke, who was a wonderful teacher of his men, he having had much training and a high reputation in Vienna.

I have rarely looked at the bills. I have never shrunk at any price necessary to get the best talent, as I saw it. From early years I had had such knowledge of and connection with high-class musicians in Europe that I learned about men there. It has been a one-man machine, trusting to his assistants—namely, the conductor and the managers. I have had great luck in Mr. Ellis, who is honest as the sun, generous, a good bargainer, much liked everywhere. I have had six conductors and, on the whole, the last is the best.

The union leader came to me and tried to get our men into the union. My only reply was: "There is no advantage to them, as I pay them more than the union pays and in that way get the best." His reply to that was that the union would never lend us extra men when we needed them. My reply to that was that I would double all the wind and had all the strings needed. And there we have stood.

There has been the plan and it has been kept. I have relied on my men and found the reliance was justified. They have relied on me, not only the leading men but all the members of the orchestra, and there has grown up good feeling between us. I have spoken to the men at the beginning and end of each year and said what pleasant things occurred to me, thus fostering the pleasant feeling of comradeship. I have always spoken myself as a member of the orchestra.

We have a pension fund, which is growing, and comes from extra concerts each year.

In one point I have failed. I expected to give the concerts at low prices, and found it impossible, because the speculators took the seats and resold them at higher prices, and because the expenses grew so fast. I should think that the expenses were at least three times as much as they originally were. . . .

I have written out a great deal more than this, but after all, here is the plan. It is nothing but seeking the best, not limiting the costs, and each man—the conductor, Messrs. Ellis and Brennan, and I—minding his own business and not meddling.

Beethoven Choral

His Ninth Symphony at a Special Concert

AFTER seven years Boston is again to hear Beethoven's Choral Symphony—this time to mark the hundredth anniversary of the first performance of the music, at Vienna, in May of 1824, and to round out Mr. Monteux's ending term as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. More than once he has led in the eight earlier Symphonies of Beethoven. Now comes deserved opportunity to conduct in the Ninth, last and, by tradition, most exacting of them all. Since the presence of a large chorus necessitates the removal of four or five rows of seats in Symphony Hall, the piece cannot be included in the regular course of the Symphony Concerts. It will, therefore, be heard at a concert for the Pension Fund of the orchestra on Sunday afternoon, March 30. Possibly other music of Beethoven will precede it. Quite as probably, it will be played and sung by itself. For the final movement, Dr. Davison is training a choir divided between the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. Soon the quartet of solo-singers will be announced.

Providence J Feb 22

BIG AUDIENCE HEARS BOSTON SYMPHONY

Orchestral Suite and Piano Concerto Features Fourth of Season's Concerts.

CAROL ROBINSON SOLOIST

Monteux Leads with Taste and Control, Rendering of Symphony Being Marked by Brilliant Technique

A symphony, an orchestral suite and a piano concerto were played last evening at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fourth concert in Infantry Hall. Although containing but three numbers the programme was much longer than usual, a fact not in the least disturbing to the big audience, for the concert proved one of sustained interest. Not only in the choice of compositions but in performance and in the success of an extremely talented American artist as soloist the orchestra's fourth visit may be said to measure up to the highest artistic standards attained during the present season.

M. Monteux, as usual, led his men with the musicianship, the taste and the sure control that inevitably bring artistic results. The symphony was notably smooth in technical detail and the original and brilliantly orchestrated Charpentier "Impressions of Italy," while revealing one or two slight lapses from perfect ensemble on the part of the 'cello section, as a whole made a delightful finale to the well balanced programme.

It is always pleasant to witness the success of a young American artist and Carol Robinson's appearance as soloist brought much pleasure to her hearers. Her playing of the big Tschaikowsky concerto, was, in fact, a noteworthy performance and spoke volumes for her natural musical gifts and her purely American training.

The programme follows:

Mozart......Symphony in C major, "Jupiter"
Allegro vivace.
Andante cantabile.
Menuetto: Allegretto: Trio.
Finale: Allegro molto.
Tchaikowsky...Concerto for Pianoforte No. 1, in B-flat minor, Op. 23
Andante non troppo e molto maestoso: Allegro con spirito.
Andantino semplice: Allegro vivace assai.
Allegro con fuoco.
Charpentier............"Impressions of Italy," Orchestral Suite
Serenade.
On Muleback.
On the Summits.
Naples.

When one tires of modern musical fare or of that which by complexity of structure taxes the mind it is well to return to Mozart and drink from the pure spring of his genius. In the "Jubiter" symphony we find all the freshness and spontaneity so characteristic of his writings. It is music noble in its majestic sweep and freedom, music that speaks intimately of the beauty of nature, music which touches the heart. There is strength in the fine opening allegro and the andante cantabile sings of tranquillity and rest. In this latter movement one easily might visualize Mozart at his pleasant task of composition. At some point of vantage he meditates upon a summer landscape, sun bathed and beautiful. The serenity, the peace that comes with such close communion with nature is to him music. Truthfully he traces in musical language the feelings inspired by the scene outspread before him and the impressions are made permanent for the enjoyment of all.

The entire symphony, under M. Monteux's baton, was performed with fitting understanding and artistry. At the close the conductor responded several times to tremendous and deserved applause.

In his orchestra suite, "Impressions of Italy," Charpentier is successful in creating the desired atmosphere. It is descriptive music of ingenius design and color and without the aid of programme notes would stir the Italian pulse. The orchestration is admirably suggestive of the several scenes and the characteristic rythms and melodies are used in striking and effective manner. A viola solo off stage is one of the devices introduced. The last movement, "Naples," depicts the joyous life of that city. It is a very brilliant finale of considerable length.

The appearance of Carol Rohinson introduced a young player of conspicuous talent. Tall and slight but with abundant physical strength she sits at the piano and accomplishes with ease the grand effects on the Tschaikowsky concerto.

Her technique is well developed; it is clear and dependable, and to this requisite foundation she adds fine musical qualities. The concerto is a good vehicle for the display of a painter's ability both as technician and musician. The orchestra is given a part in the score of greater signficance and merit than is frequently seen in concertos for pianoforte with orchestral accompaniment. M. Monteux gave an excellent performance with his assisting musicians and at the concerto's close the entire orchestra joined in the ovation accorded the young artist.

---

agement to struggling genius.

SINGULAR SKRIABIN

His "Divine Poem" for the First Times at the Symphony Concerts of This Week —A Wide Canvas Stretched and Filled —A Superabundant Music—Forthcoming Programmes—Return of Julia Culp

SKRIABIN will pour at the close of the gatherings in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of this week. Into the "funnels of our ears" he will pour his Third Symphony or "Divine Poem." The stream of sound will be delightful, but the dictates of musical fashion do not compel us to say we like it. If you rave about it to an initiate of the inner cult of Skriabin-worship, he will crush you with the remark that it is merely a transitional piece. Nowadays you do not have to bother about any music which has been long out of Paris, except for genuine antiques; and when you consider how much more dissonant and vital the music of twenty-five years hence is going to be, how completely free from any taint of nineteenth century conventions, it seems foolish to bother about any present-day music at all.

The "Divine Poem" escapes the disgrace of belonging to the nineteenth century as it was written in the summer of 1903. According to Mr. Eaglefield Hull, in his book on Skriabin, this was the "most fruitful season of all the composer's creative work, when he especially felt the joys of a free creative life as compared with the humdrum routine of tutorial work." The "Divine Poem" has less of Skriabin's peculiar style than the "Poem of Ecstasy" of 1908, "played in Boston as early as 1910," and much less than the final "Prometheus" which has not yet been heard here. But there is plenty to identify it as Skriabin's own, probabliy just enough to make it enjoyable to many. After all, it is fortunate for the popularity of many composers that they have to write early and transitional pieces, for the majority of audiences do not relish the later manner of anyone, but prefer to have a dash of individuality diluted with a liberal amount of the familiar.

The "Divine Poem" combines elements of the classical symphony and the symphonic poem. The movements are joine one to another without pause and th themes of the earlier movements ar brought back in the finale. The first and last movements employ the regular sonata form and there are periodic melodies o eight and sixteen measures. Although Skriabin was a Russian, there is no hint of hi native folk-music here. Whether th themes, as Mr. Hull declares, are "ma nificent" and their "birth noteworthy," must be left for the listeners to [illegible] The complicated rhythms, such as fiv beats against nine, of the later Skri are not used in the "Divine Poem."

Skriabin's celebbrated "mystic chord," f-sharp, b-flat, c, a and d appears in th symphony only as if by accident. The ric Wagnerian chords of the ninth, eleven and thirteenth, often chromatically alter are dwelt upon long and fondly. There a few chords in the "Divine Poem" whic would embarrass a teacher of academ harmony. Skriabin, even in more advanc pieces than this, seems to use dissonan to cause a pleasant, massage-like aur friction and not as a means of shock Strauss and Stravinsky. [illegible] bin's favorite harmonies are technic dissonances, they have the effect of intens fied consonances even to the point of cloy ing.

The "Divine Poem" requires a large o chestra—a quartet in each wood-wi group, an octet of horns, a quintet of trum pets, two harps, and the rest of the instru ments as usual, except that there is shrill percussion and most strange of no pipe organ or angelic choir, the absen of which in a "Divine Poem" seems almo sacrilegious. Skriabin's orchestration very sonorous, but much less complex tha that of Strauss. The string parts conta about all the polyphony that there Roughly speaking, it seems as if Skkriab had written the whole symphony for th strings and afterwards had reinforced th string parts by the wind instruments varying numbers.

A sense of humor never seems to hav disturbed the blissful seriousness wi which Skriabin took his own work. N content with calling this symphony " Divine Poem" he has labelled speci themes with the adjectives "divine" a "sublime." Besides the conventional Ita ian terms the score is fitted out with Frenc expressions which are not so much di tions for playing, as the composer's ecstatic descriptions of his music, such "joyeux essor," "monstrueux," "profo dément tragique," légendaire," and "av une ivresse débordante." Just how does o play in a "legendary" manner, and wh would happen to the ensemble if th orchestra played with "overflowing drunk enness," to say nothing of a possible ra on Symphony Hall by dry agents?

The first movement has a slow introdu tion, or rather prologue to the whole sym phony beginning with a motiv which Skr abin has labelled "divin, grandiose." Th and two other motivs, called by Mr. Hu

Continued on Following Pa

the "Summons to Man" and "Fear to A proach, Suggestive of Flight," [illegible] material of the prologue. The first mov ment, Allegro, C minor, is entitled "Stru gles," but the opposing forces do not up a very strenuous fight, leaving a go deal of leisure for "ivresse." To trace course of the various themes would be undertake "the humdrum of tutorial wor from which Skriabin was free when wrote this symphony. Even our good gui Eaglefield, is at a loss to know wh is the "second subject proper" and that it matters little. Perhaps in view all the "ivresse," no one of the subjects proper. Composers who fight battles symphonies are like the United States, that they have never been known to suff defeat. This movement rises to triumpha climaxes.

The second movement, Lento, in E ma lives up to its title of "Sensuous F ures," even if it may not live up to S abin's label of "sublime." It is rich wi harmonic nectar and orchestral ambros The violin has a delectable solo accomp nied by warblings from the wood-winds

The last movement, Allegro, C major, entitled "Jeu Divin," which appears as "D vine Activities" in Mr. Hull's translati The opening motiv of its main them transformed from the theme of "Di Grandeur" so as to resemble the beginn of "We Won't Go Home Until Morning," some acute English critic—not Mr. Hu has pointed out. There is a lyric second th which Mr. Hull calls the "Ego Theme," though it partakes of the Wagnerian as expressed in Elsa's procession in hengrin. Perhaps it is the presence "We Won't Go Home Until Morning" whi brings a little more of the later manner Skriabin into the finale. In the words Mr. Hull the "work is consummated w one of the finest perorations in the wh range of music." In its dazzling orche tral effect it suggests one of Skriabin's f vorite pleasures, that of lying upon his ba in the Alps and looking straight up at t sun. The drums hum, but not with t "humdrum of tutorial work."

Appreciation of this symphony depen less upon especial intellectual preparat than upon a favorable physical condit It should come at the "end of a pe day"; after exercise, a pacifying bu spiring bath, a hearty, leisurely din little black coffee but not too much, smoke which fulfills the adverti Then the "Divine Poem" will provi the Volstead Act forbids.

Providence Journal Feb 26

CAROL ROBINSON

America's Foremost Pianist

Appearing as Soloist in Infantry Hall

Tuesday Evening, Feb. 26th

With the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Writes of The

STEINERT
PIANOFORTE

"If it 'takes great audiences to make great poets' . . . it certainly takes a great piano to make great music; that piano is THE STEINERT!"

The Steinert Piano, endorsed by leading artists, used in our foremost music schools and colleges, gains constantly in favor with the discriminating musical public

M. Steinert & Sons

Steinert Bldg.
495 Westminster Street

Transcript Feb 29

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

Chabrier and Ravel

MISS VERA JANACOPULOS, of Greek parentage, who has been heard before in Boston, was the soloist last evening at the Cambridge Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. To leave with the audience a very definite impression of her voice was a tolerably difficult undertaking inasmuch as her share of the programme lay in the "Shéhérazade," three poems for voice and orchestra by Ravel. This from the outset is a rich and orchestrally complex series, if not wholly surcharged with the lush flower and spice of the Orient, at least suggesting at every turn the flavor of Afric and of Ind. All of which would in no way preclude the opportunity for a soloist to show her or himself to advantage, had not the composer elected to veil the voice rather closely and keep it, for the most part, subservient to the instruments. Whether under this difficulty Miss Janacopulos succeeded in convincing her listeners of the good quality of her mezzo-soprano is a question. "Asie," the first poem, is freighted well with such stuff as pervades Leconte de Lisle's poem, "la Vérandah." The singer supposedly wishes to visit the Far East and luxuriate in the intoxicating atmosphere; yet the voice that gives utterance to the desire seems lost "dans une musique qui fausse," to borrow a line from the third poem. Miss Janacopulos had good poise and appeared eminently in the spirit of the matter. Her voice was even and suggested power. Perhaps she broke away too abruptly in the moments given to her alone; at least she was successful in playing the wistful, imaginative dreamer. In the last bit of this poem Ravel has tried to be more of a mystic than Rimsky-Korsakov, at the same time he has created a delicate lyric which sustained the soloist in her best measures of the evening.

The second poem, the enchanted flute, offered more scope for the voice, although the closing phrases frequently engulfed the singer's tones in gentle dissonance. Finally, "l'Indifférent"—still marking an exotic Ravel—spread its plaintive, haunting tones in a further maze. Ravel, who now seems so mildly modern in the great shadow of Stravinsky and the lesser ones of Bliss, Milhaud and others, clearly worried in the gallant company of Mendelssohn, Mozart and Charpentier. Here in this one piece it was easy to watch Miss Janacopulos stitching her way in sure fashion. To do the part justice requires no mere modicum of skill, and for that reason the applause seemed less than she deserved.

The programme was altogether one to please. What a very joyful and finished thing is Charpentier's "Impressions of Italy." How sensitive the touch, how fine e execution! Mr. Monteux gave it a ndition unendingly delightful and undingly appreciative. There were the ngers of the Serenade—the high voice, for e time, of all the 'cellos, followed by the utter and thrum of guitar and mandolin, d finally the solitary echo of the violin. here was the sublimity and quiet of that agment, "at the Fountain"; richness of ing, and the almost melodic Charpentier. n Muleback" ran to an adequate thump-, bumping tempo melting into sensuous d songful interludes. "On the Summits" oves the most rounded piece of writing d the most subtle. The gorgeous underne of strings is suggestive of Beethen's pastoral. The sea is there, the sun d the murmur of a thousand voices on summer day. Listening to it one was reinded of something like the wonder that as Orestes's when > Die Welt so weit, so offen vor uns lag.

stly "Naples" and the joyousness of . This is stuff at which Mr. Monteux preëminent, and he interpreted it last ning with unrelenting ardor through eet sounds and cries, native and Span- rhythms, Chabriesque interlude and too saccharine lapses.

Mendelssohn's Overture to Shakspeare's . Midsummer Night's Dream," first on e programme, brought its continued charm. Above all Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony was given a particularly fine rendition and was, probably, the most popularly received of the whole group.

D. T. W. McC.

~~Herald~~
Herlad March 1

17TH CONCERT IN SYMPHONY HALL

Mme. Janacopulos, as Soloist, Sings Admirably with Orchestra

"DIVINE POEM" GIVEN HERE FIRST TIME

By PHILIP HALE

The 17th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Mme. Vera Janacopulos was the singer. The program was as follows: Mendelssohn, Overture to "Midsummer Night's Dream"; Leginska, Two Short Pieces for orchestra (first performance); Ravel, "Scheherazade," Three Poems for voice and orchestra (Asia, The Enchanted Flute, The Indifferent One); Scriabin, Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem" (first time in Boston).

The overture was beautifully played. When the 17-year-old Mendelssohn wrote it, he was a romanticist. What might he not have accomplished if he had been poor and less respectable! He wrote this overture before he had been spoiled by flattery, before he became a composer of priggish formulas. Aubrey Beardsley pictured the later Mendelssohn in that forgotten magazine, the Savoy. There you see the man that was shocked by the resurrection of the nuns in "Robert the Devil," by Zerlina undressing in "Fra Diavolo," by Hugo's "Ruy Blas," although he condescended to write an overture for it: the spotless Mendelssohn who delighted Queen Victoria and her spouse by playing the organ to them. But this overture to Shakespeare's comedy is from another Mendelssohn, the composer of "The Hebrides," portions of the "Walpurgis Night"; not the man of the oratorios and the sentimental "Songs Without Words."

What should be said of Mme. Leginska's pieces inspired by two of Tagore's poems, performed for the first time in an orchestral dress? Must the hearer keep the poems in mind, read them with nose in the program book on account of the funereal lighting of the hall, and endeavor to trace the connection between the sentences of the poet and the composer while the music is playing? The music may be to Mme. Leginska the musical expression of Tagore's sentiments and emotions; but how about the fearless music lovers, Messrs. Brown, Jones and Robinson, and that untiring patroness of the arts, Mrs. Golightly? Then the question comes up, Is the music emotional, contemplative, impressive without reference to any text? We found it for the most part chaotic. There are some charming ideas, melodic scraps, "disjecta membra." There is orchestral treatment that occasionally is interesting, at times ugly without significance; undigested music that now and then shows a trace of indisputable talent, also a too evident desire to be original. The audience applauded half-heartedly the first poem; was warmer after the second, and after Mme. Leginska was seen on the stage it recalled her several times.

"Scheherazade" is one of Ravel's earlier works and it is to be ranked among his best. The poet Klingsor (his name is Leclere) catalogues in "Asia" all that he would fain see in that land of mystery, but his catalogue is by no means dull and dry. Ravel did not foolishly attempt to write music for each wish of the poet; but with a keen sense of beauty he evoked Asia itself with its cities, people, customs, dress, voluptuousness and cruelties: vaporous music of exquisite and haunting beauty without any vain attempt to be oriental by the use of alien tonalities. Beautiful, too, is the music for the other poems. Mme. Janacopulos expressed admirably the thoughts of the poet and the composer, in reverie, longing, amorous meditation and disappointment, but when she forced the dramatic note, her upper tones lacked body and sounded tired or worn.

Scriabin's symphony in one long movement was performed here for the first time. Commentators, fanatical admirers of Scriabin, have written pages of hifalutin about it: how it portrays an audacious spirit sinking into an abyss of mysticism; a soul desiring the ecstatic joy of self-annihilation; the free expression of purified personality, and so on and so on.

They say that the composer's religion, a mixture of theosophy, neoplatonism and Bergsonian philosophy, inspired his music. The question of his musical ideas and his treatment of them is much more to the purpose. There are powerful pages; there is one truly charming episode for wind instruments. The symphony as a whole is irritatingly restless and stormy without sufficient relief. The influence of Wagner is not disturbing. If Scriabin had only said what he had to say in half the time! The performance was superb.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Beethoven, Overture Leonore No. 3; Mozart, Klein Nacht Musik; Strauss, Tone-poem "Don Juan"; Sibelius, Symphony, No. 2. Georg Schneevoight will conduct as a guest.

Transcript March 1

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Symphony Orchestra

AT the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Mr. Schnéevoigt, conductor in Scandinavian, Finnish and Dutch cities, will be guest and leader of the orchestra. Naturally, familiar pieces fill his programme, since otherwise he could not disclose his particular ways with the music. The numbers are: Sibelius's Second Symphony, in major; Beethoven's Third "Leonora" Overture; Mozart's "Little Night-Pieces"; Strauss's tone-poem, "Don Juan"—a list to please with any conductor. Mr. Schnéevoight is a musician of understanding, imagination, experience and executive ability.

On Monday and Tuesday afternoons next fall the final concerts this winter of the Symphony Orchestra to audiences of ung people. They will hear the band full numbers, with Mr. Monteux nducting and Miss Loraine Wyman for assisting singer. She will be heard n three of Hughes's "Mother Goose Parodies." Otherwise the programme raverses Beethoven's Overture to the play, 'Egmont"; the Nocturne and Scherzo from Mendelssohn's music to Shakspeare's "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; the "Farandole" from Bizet's music to the play, "The Woman of Arles"; a fragment of Franck's Symphony; the Tartar Dances from Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor." Unless accompanied by one or more children, adults e not admitted. Most of the tickets are ivately distributed.

Post March 2

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Young People's Concerts

On Monday and Tuesday afternoons the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the third and last pair of Young People's Concerts for the present season and word comes that, contrary to custom, a few seats are available at the box-office. For particular appeal Loraine Wyman will sing, in costume, certain of Hughes's "Mother Goose Parodies," and for the rest of the programme will come Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, the Nocturne and the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," the Farandole from Bizet's Suite "L'Arlesienne," the allegretto from Franck's symphony and the dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor."

Advertiser March

MONDAY SYMPHONY

At the Monday night Symphony concert in Symphony Hall, March 10, Felix Fox, Boston pianist, will appear with the orchestra in a performance of the Schumann concerto. Brahms' second symphony and [illegible] Roi d'Ys" overture also will be played.

GUEST CONDUCTOR AT THE SYMPHONY

The celebrated Finnish maestro, George Schneevoigt, will appear as guest conductor at the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The program includes: Sibelius' second symphony, Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture, Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" and Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan."

NINTH SYMPHONY

Beethoven's Choral Symphony will be presented by Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the pension fund concert to be given in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, March 30. The Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society and a notable quartet of soloists will assist.

Globe March 2

Music Notes and Comment

George Schneevoigt, who will conduct this week's Boston Symphony concerts by invitation of the trustees, as Bruno Walter did last season, at a pair of concerts, has held long-term appointments in Helsingfors, Stockholm and at Scheveningen, Holland. Mr Scheneevoigt's Boston program will give the audience a chance to judge his abilities in the classics and in such moderns as Sibelius and Richard Strauss. So far as this department is officially and unofficially aware there is no truth whatever in the rumors that Mr Schneevoigt may be going to conduct next season here instead of Kusevitsky, whose appointment was announced last September by the trustees as successor to Mr Monteux. There has for several years been little doubt of Mr Schneevoigt's willingness to accept the conductorship of the Boston Symphony if it should be offered him. It is an interesting variation of the routine of these concerts to have an occasional guest conductor, though if it happened often the regular leader would not be so throughly in control, as he should be.

Providence Journal Feb 26

CAROL ROBINSON

America's Foremost Pianist

Appearing as Soloist in Infantry Hall

Tuesday Evening, Feb. 26th

With the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Writes of The

STEINERT PIANOFORTE

"If it 'takes great audiences to make great poets' . . . it certainly takes a great piano to make great music; that piano is THE STEINERT!"

The Steinert Piano, endorsed by leading artists, used in our foremost music schools and colleges, gains constantly in favor with the discriminating musical public

M. Steinert & Sons

Steinert Bldg.
495 Westminster Street

Transcript Feb 29

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

Chabrier and Ravel

MISS VERA JANACOPULOS, of Greek parentage, who has been heard before in Boston, was the soloist last evening at the Cambridge Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. To leave with the audience a very definite impression of her voice was a tolerably difficult undertaking inasmuch as her share of the programme lay in the "Shéhérazade," three poems for voice and orchestra by Ravel. This from the outset is a rich and orchestrally complex series, if not wholly surcharged with the lush flower and spice of the Orient, at least suggesting at every turn the flavor of Afric and of Ind. All of which would in no way preclude the opportunity for a soloist to show her or himself to advantage, had not the composer elected to veil the voice rather closely and keep it, for the most part, subservient to the instruments. Whether under this difficulty Miss Janacopulos succeeded in convincing her listeners of the good quality of her mezzo-soprano is a question. "Asie," the first poem, is freighted well with such stuff as pervades Leconte de Lisle's poem, "la Vérandah." The singer supposedly wishes to visit the Far East and luxuriate in the intoxicating atmosphere; yet the voice that gives utterance to the desire seems lost "dans une musique qui fausse," to borrow a line from the third poem. Miss Janacopulos had good poise and appeared eminently in the spirit of the matter. Her voice was ever [illegible] and suggested power. Perhaps she broke away too abruptly in the moments given to her alone; at least she was successful in playing the wistful, imaginative dreamer. In the last bit of this poem Ravel has tried to be more of a mystic than Rimsky-Korsakov, at the same time he has created a delicate lyric which sustained the soloist in her best measures of the evening.

The second poem, the enchanted flute, offered more scope for the voice, although the closing phrases frequently engulfed the singer's tones in gentle dissonance. Finally, "l'Indifférent"—still marking an exotic Ravel—spread its plaintive, haunting tones in a further maze. Ravel, who now seems so mildly modern in the great shadow of Stravinsky and the lesser ones of Bliss, Milhaud and others, is [illegible] in the gallant company of Mendelssohn, Mozart and Charpentier. Here in this one piece it was easy to watch Miss Janacopulos stitching her way in sure fashion. To do the part justice requires no mere medium of skill, and for that reason the applause seemed less than she deserved.

The programme was altogether one to please. What a very jovial and finished thing is Charpentier's "Impressions of Italy." How sensitive the touch, how fine the execution! Mr. Monteux gave it a ndition unendingly delightful and un dingly appreciative. There were the ngers of the Serenade—the high voice, for e time, of all the 'cellos, followed by the utter and thrum of guitar and mandolin, d finally the solitary echo of the violin. ere was the sublimity and quiet of that gment, "at the Fountain"; richness of ing, and the almost melodic Charpentier. n Muleback" ran to an adequate thump- r, bumping tempo melting into sensuous d songful interludes. "On the Summits" oves the most rounded piece of writing d the most subtle. The gorgeous under- ne of strings is suggestive of Beeth- en's pastoral. The sea is there, the sun d the murmur of a thousand voices on summer day. Listening to it one was re- inded of something like the wonder that as Orestes's when [illegible]

[illegible] "Naples" and the joyousness of . This is stuff at which Mr Monteux preëminent, and he interpreted it last ening with unrelenting ardor through eet sounds and cries, native and Spa- rhythms, [illegible] interludes and too saccharine lapses.

Mendelssohn's Overture to Shakspeare's Midsummer Night's Dream," first on programme, brought its continued charm. Above all Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony was given a particularly fine rendition and was, probably, the most [illegible] received of the whole group.

D. T. W. McC.

~~3~~ Herald March 1

17TH CONCERT IN SYMPHONY HALL

Mme. Janacopulos, as Soloist, Sings Admirably with Orchestra

"DIVINE POEM" GIVEN HERE FIRST TIME

By PHILIP HALE

The 17th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Mme. Vera Janacopulos was the singer. The program was as follows: Mendelssohn, Overture to "Midsummer Night's Dream"; Leginska, Two short Pieces for orchestra (first [illegible]); Ravel, "Scheherazade." Three Poems for voice and orchestra (Asia, The Enchanted Flute, The Indifferent One); [illegible], Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem" (first time in Boston).

The overture was [illegible] played. When the [illegible]-year-old Mendelssohn wrote it, he was a romanticist. What might he not have accomplished if he had been poor and less respectable!

He wrote [illegible] before he had been spoiled [illegible] Aubrey Beardsley [illegible] Mendelssohn [illegible] that was sho[illegible] the man in [illegible] Zerlina undressing [illegible] Hugo's "Ruy Blas," although [illegible] the spotless Mendelssohn [illegible] Queen Victoria [illegible] ing the organ [illegible] ture to Shakespeare's [illegible] another [illegible] "The [illegible] portions of the Wal- [illegible] and the sentimental "On Wings of Song."

[illegible] pieces inspired [illegible] gore's poems, performed for the first time in an orchestral concert [illegible] hearer keep the poem [illegible] them with [illegible] the program book [illegible] the hall [illegible] nection between the fancies of the poet and the composer [illegible] music [illegible] sentiments [illegible] lovers [illegible] Mrs. [illegible] imaginative, inspired [illegible] reference to any text? [illegible] so a too evident desire [illegible] The audience applauded half-heartedly [illegible] the first poem, was [illegible] after the second, and after Mme. [illegible] was [illegible] the stage [illegible]

"Scheherazade" is [illegible] earlier works and it is [illegible] his best. The poet K[illegible] catalogues [illegible] dull and [illegible] attempt to [illegible] of the poet; [illegible] beauty he evoked. As [illegible] cities, [illegible] vaporous [illegible] of exquisite and haunting beauty without any vain [illegible] the use of [illegible] Mme. Janacopulos expressed [illegible] the thoughts of the poet and the composer [illegible] meditation and disappointment [illegible] when she forced the dramatic [illegible] upper [illegible] tired [illegible]

Scriabin's symphony [illegible] movement was performed here [illegible] first time. Commentators, fanatical admirers of Scriabin, have written [illegible] of hifalutin about it: how [illegible] an audacious spirit [illegible] abyss of mysticism [illegible] ecstatic joy of [illegible] free expression of purified [illegible] and so on and so on.

They say that the composer's [illegible] mixture of theosophy, [illegible] and Bergsonian philosophy, inspired his music. The question of his musical ideas and his treatment of them is much more to the purpose. There are powerful pages; there is one truly charming episode for wind instruments. The symphony as a whole is irritatingly restless and stormy without sufficient relief. The influence of Wagner is not disturbing. If Scriabin had only said what he had to say in half the time! The performance was superb.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Beethoven, Overture Leonore No. 3; Mozart, Klein Nacht Musik; Strauss, Tone-poem "Don Juan"; Sibelius, Symphony, No. 2. Georg Schneevoight will conduct as a guest.

Transcript March 1

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Symphony Orchestra

AT the Symphony Concerts of next Friday Schnéevoigt, conductor in Scandina- afternoon and Saturday evening Mr. vian, Finnish and Dutch cities, will be guest and leader of the orchestra. Naturally, familiar pieces fill his programme, since otherwise he could not disclose his particular ways with the music. The numbers are: Sibelius's Second Symphony, in D major; Beethoven's Third "Leonora" Overture; Mozart's "Little Night-Pieces"; Strauss's tone-poem, "Don Juan"—a list to please with any conductor. Mr. Schnéevoight is a musician of understanding, imagination, experience and executive ability.

On Monday and Tuesday afternoons next fall the final concerts this winter of the Symphony Orchestra to audiences of young people. They will hear the band in full numbers, with Mr. Monteux conducting and Miss Loraine Wyman for assisting singer. She will be heard in three of Hughes's "Mother Goose Parodies." Otherwise the programme traverses Beethoven's Overture to the play, "Egmont"; the Nocturne and Scherzo from Mendelssohn's music to Shakspeare's "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; the "Farandole" from Bizet's music to the play, "The Woman of Arles"; a fragment of Franck's Symphony; the Tartar Dances from Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor." Unless accompanied by one or more children, adults are not admitted. Most of the tickets are privately distributed.

Post March 2

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Young People's Concerts

On Monday and Tuesday afternoons the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the third and last pair of Young People's Concerts for the present season and word comes that, contrary to custom, a few seats are available at the box-office. For particular appeal Loraine Wyman will sing, in costume, certain of Hughes's "Mother Goose Parodies," and for the rest of the programme will come Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, the Nocturne and the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," the Farandole from Bizet's Suite "L'Arlesienne," the allegretto from Franck's symphony and the dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor."

Globe March 2

Music Notes and Comment

George Schneevoigt, who will conduct this week's Boston Symphony concerts by invitation of the trustees, as Bruno Walter did last season, at a pair of concerts, has held long-term appointments in Helsingfors, Stockholm and at Scheveningen, Holland. Mr Schneevoigt's Boston program will give the audience a chance to judge his abilities in the classics and in such moderns as Sibelius and Richard Strauss. So far as this department is officially and unofficially aware there is no truth whatever in the rumors that Mr Schneevoigt may be going to conduct next season here instead of Kusevitsky, whose appointment was announced last September by the trustees as successor to Mr Monteux. There has for several years been little doubt of Mr Schneevoigt's willingness to accept the conductorship of the Boston Symphony if it should be offered him. It is an interesting variation of the routine of these concerts to have an occasional guest conductor, though if it happened often the regular leader would not be so throughly in control, as he should be.

Advertiser March

MONDAY SYMPHONY

At the Monday night Symphony concert in Symphony Hall, March 10, Felix Fox, Boston pianist, will appear with the orchestra in a performance of the Schumann concerto. Brahms' second symphony and Lalo's "Le Roi d'Ys" overture also will be played.

GUEST CONDUCTOR AT THE SYMPHONY

The celebrated Finnish maestro, George Schneevoigt, will appear as guest conductor at the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The program includes: Sibelius' second symphony, Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture, Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" and Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan."

NINTH SYMPHONY

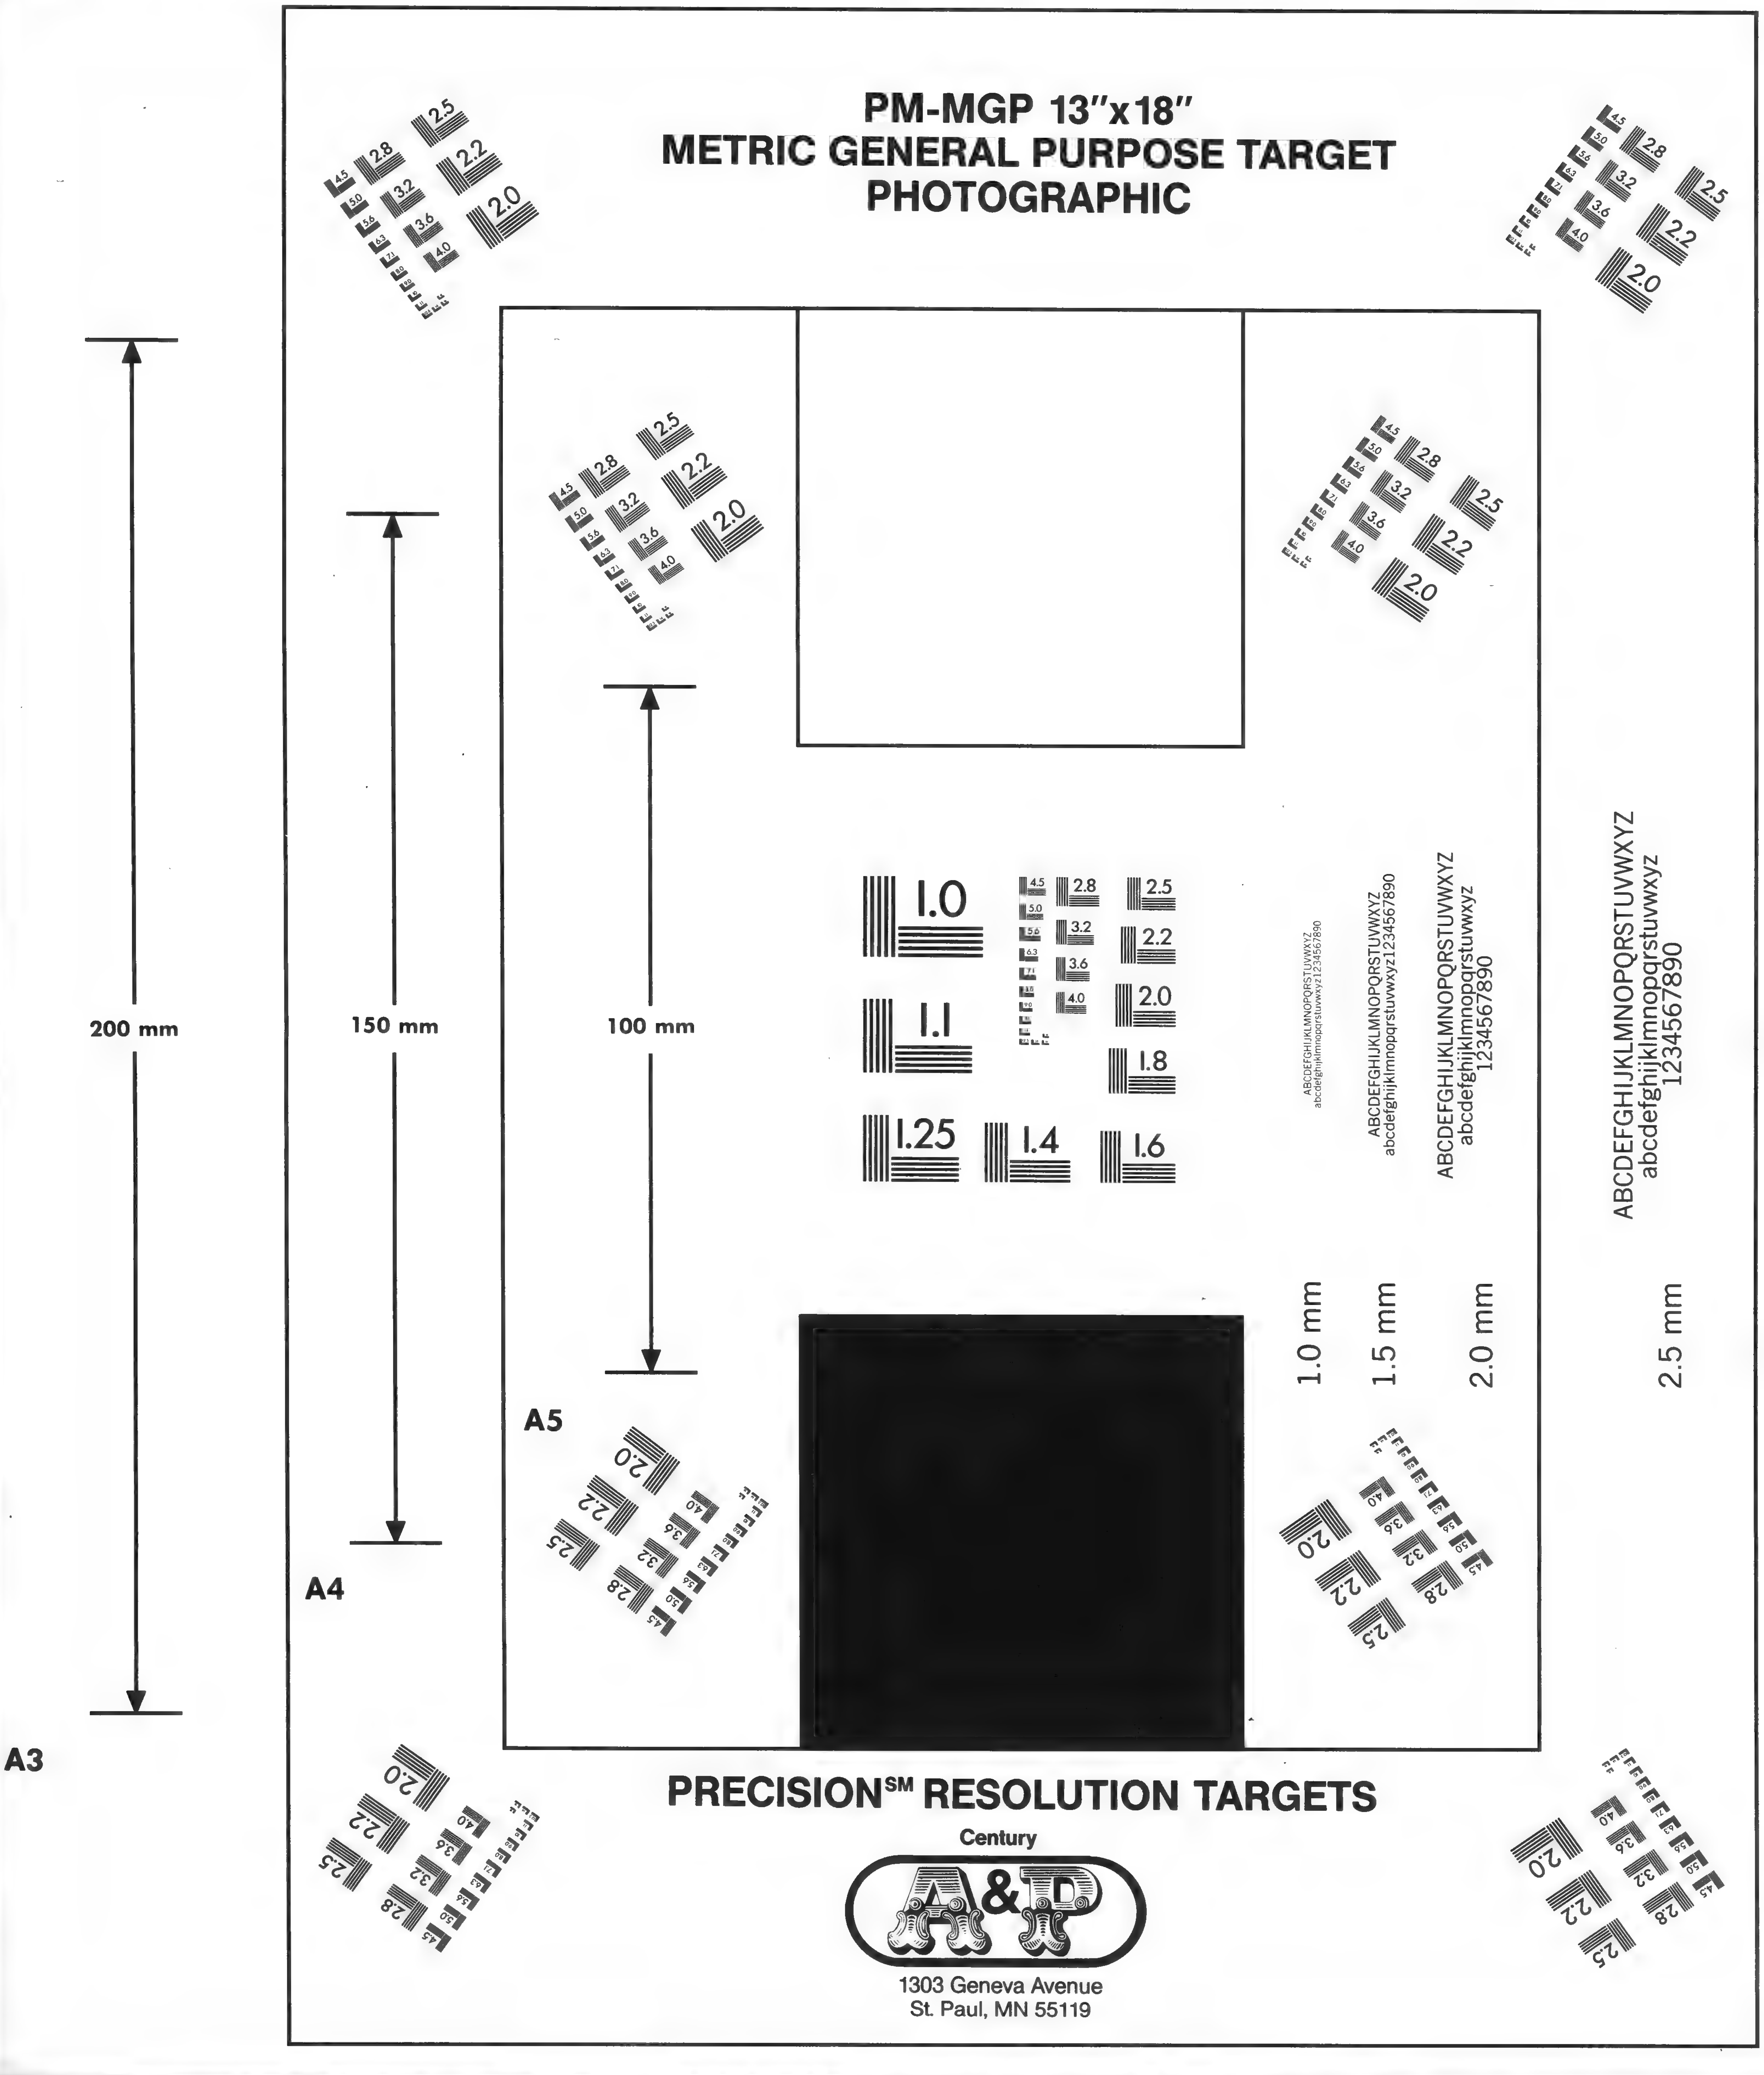
Beethoven's Choral Symphony will be presented by Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the pension fund concert to be given in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, March 30. The Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society and a notable quartet of soloists will assist.

REDUCTION

RATIO

13x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A3
A4
A5
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
8.0
9.0
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

March 1

ERT IN HALL

ios, as Solomirably
estra

M" GIVEN
RST TIME

HALE

he Boston Sym-Monteux, con-
erday afternoon
me. Vera Jana-
. The program
lssohn, Overture Dream"; Le-ces for orchestra
avel, "Schehera-r voice and or-nchanted Flute, Scriabin, Third ne Poem" (first
autifully played.
ld Mendelssohn manticist. What complished if he ess respectable!

re before he had ry, before he be priggish formulas ictured the later forgotten magae you see the man
he resurrection of the Devil," by
"Fra Diavolo," by although he conn overture for it:
ohn, who delighted spouse by play-
But this over-comedy is from the composer of ns of the "Wal-he man of the timental "Songs of Mme. Legin-by two of Tamed for the first dress? Must the s in mind, read

he program book hereal lighting of to trace the con-
sentences of the while the music
may be to Mme.
xpression of Tad emotions; but ss music lovers,
and Robinson,
oness of the arts,
en the question
emotional, con-without refer-found it for the
There are some ic scraps, "dis-
re is orchestral
nally is interest-
out significance;
now and then
isputable talent,
re to be original.
ed half-hearted-
warmer after the
e. Leginska was ecalled her sev-

e of Ravel's ear-
be ranked among rsor (his name is "Asia" all that hat land of mys-
is by no means not foolishly
c for each wish a keen sense of itself with its dress, voluptu-vaporous music
ng beauty with-o be oriental by ties. Beautiful,
he other poems.
essed admirably et and the comnging, amorous pointment, but amatic note, her ly and sounded

in one long ed here for the rs, fanatical ada written pages
ow it portrays nking into an oul desiring the nnihilation; the ied personality.

poser's religion,
y, neoplatonism
h inspired his of his musical nt of them is
ose. There are is one truly
nd instruments.
e is irritatingly
hout sufficient Wagner is not had only said
alf the time!

erb,
eated tonight.
is as follows:
onore" No. 3;
usik; Strauss,
ibelius, Symeevoight will

Transcript March 1

TONAL MASTERY, TONAL VAGARIES, TONAL STRIVINGS

A SYMPHONY CONCERT OF CLEAR CONTRASTS

The Perfections of Mendelssohn and Ravel Beside the Gropings of Leginska and the Struggles of Skriabin—The Parisian's Songs, with Mme Janacopulos for Singer—The Pianist as Composer

MENDELSSOHN wrote precisely and fancifully in his overture to Shakspeare's comedy, "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Ravel wrote precisely yet sensuously in the "Three Poems for Voice and Orchestra" that he named "Shéhérazade." Thereby at the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon, Mendelssohn and Ravel prevailed over Mme. Leginska who wrote gropingly, wanderingly in "Two Short Pieces for Orchestra" suggested by poems of Tagore; and over Skriabin whose "Divine Poem" seemed a vast and hollow flux of sounds. Reading Shakspeare's play, the youthful Mendelssohn would imagine it in music. There should be measures of the fairies and their moonlit coverts; perhaps a hint of the parted, confused lovers wandering also therein; certainly a suggestion of the clumping clowns; as much as may be to summon the romantical and fantastical mood of the whole comedy.

Into an overture the composer would pour this design, and an overture in 1826 and to a docile mind like Mendelssohn's, was still a formal prescription. With ease, he mates and manipulates his medium to his matter until music and imagery advance in entire unity of progress. Mendelssohn was solicitous of method, scrupulous of means. The severest analyst may hardly find a flaw in the development and workmanship of the Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; while to this day pace and rhythm, accent and modulation, harmonic and instrumental color, gain the imagined and desired ends. In themselves Mendelssohn's measures are bright with musical invention, aglow with musical warmth and fancy. The suggestion is as luminous and skilful. A few chords at the beginning, and the fairy forest rises. A few chords at the end, and forthwith it vanishes. Here trip the elves. There romp the clowns. Lovers' fancy is not more nimble and playful than many of these gleaming periods. As Shakspeare wrote a fantasy of youth in his verse, so Mendelssohn renewed it in his tones. The Overture endures in perennial freshness for universal pleasure. With reason an orchestra and a conductor, like Mr. Monteux and the band yesterday, spare not in affectionate pains, as though to brighten beauty and deepen charm. With a clear mind and a sure hand Mendelssohn fulfilled his purpose. There is lasting virtue in such precision.

In turn, Ravel, reading three poems of Tristan Klingsor, had a mind to clothe them with music. The first is "Asia"—verse of conjuring revery. By night a ship of mystery bears away the voyager. Persia, India, China entice him. He wanders among merchants and princes; vizirs and mandarins. He fingers strange stuffs; scrutinizes strange faces; observes strange happenings; twinges with the lusts and the cruelties about him. So does he re-conjure the Asia of The Arabian Nights. So will he also recount his tales. . . . The second poem, of "The Enchanted Flute," is briefer. Upon the drowsy air, the lover plays his passion eagerly, moodily—and there is no other sound. His mistress hears and dreams. . . . The third poem of "The Indifferent Stranger," is but the melancholy of a moment. The fair youth passes and the charm of him enters into her who serves him with wine. He goes his way. For a little, the memory lingers.

Setting music to this poetry, Ravel avoids the pitfall of the too eager, too literal-minded composer who would have the tones reflect every image, bend to every contour in the texts. Clearly he perceives that the mood, the atmosphere, the spiritual sensation of the verse, are the musician's concern. "Asia" is sensuous vision, magic of peopled dream, pageant of the imagination luxuriant with twenty drowsy fancies. The music should be as a drug that caresses the senses, opens the vistas. With "The Enchanted Flute," it should summon the stillness, suffuse and shimmer it with the lover's piping. With "The Indifferent Stranger," it has only to evoke a fleeting glimpse, a passing charm, a wistful instant.

Precisely Ravel's music glamours and intensifies the three poems. It is written with strict economy of means, with expert adaptation of those means to the devised end. The mating of the singing and the instrumental voices is faultless and complete. They move in a single line. Together they weave a single fabric. There is no parting the impression of the one from the impression of the other; while yesterday there was Mme. Janacopulos's singing and Mr. Monteux's conducting to draw closer the bond. Mr. Laurent's flute sings Ravel's melody in the second song. In the singer's tones, the mistress hears and dreams. The orchestra sets in the quivering stillness. The illusion and the beauty of the illusion are unescapable. For Ravel was fortunate in the course of his musical [illegible] vention, the surety of his musical [illegible] edure, the response, yesterday, of the imparting voices.

So, again, with the song of the passing stranger. His grace is in the contours of the music. It moves as irregularly as he. The charm of his presence, the regret of the memory, gently pervade it. It is fleet and tender and melancholy. Yet each inflection, every shading is unmistakable and unerring. Felicities of invention, certainty of means, fulfill every imaginative end. Once more, the singer, the conductor and the composer were as one. Rich can be the sensuous beauty of Mme. Janacopulos's tones, rich yet with a tang to sharpen sweetness—a voice indeed for the dream-pageant, the voluptuous sensation, that exhale from "Asia." Like wine and oil Ravel blends singer and orchestra. His harmonies and timbres are as a strange perfume upon a music of sorcery. It summons anew the spells of the Arabian Nights. Anew the imagination is drugged with them—until some sharp edge lacerates the vision. "Roses and blood" writes Klingsor, and Ravel evokes the two-fold mood. And by no tricks, remembered or contrived, of wilfully Oriental music. The listening ear need summon no memory that associates certain images with certain tones. Ravel prefers a purely sensuous evocation—an "Asia" of vision into music translated, not an "Asia" of tonal fact. Yet every modulation has purpose. No doubt, the concern of music is emotion. Yet, with the mind must it also be written.

In degree Mme. Leginska set herself the task of Ravel. In her "Two Short Pieces" she uses no voice; but with the orchestra she would summon the mood, atmosphere, suggestion of two poems of Tagore. One is lover's rhapsody, evoking vision upon vision of the beloved, and bitter-sweet are these longing dreams. The other sets storm to break upon amorous langours, and in the stress passion awakes anew. Tagore is not the most comprehensible of poets. No more is Mme. Leginska the most comprehensible of composers. Obviously these tone-poems are designed to be "free in form" and plastic of progress. Yet they grope and wander that neither achieves any continuity of design or unity of impression. Here and there drifts the music in a succession of sequences difficult for the ear to follow and relate, leaving the mind baffled, the emotions unstirred. As fitful and diverse is the manner. Now Mme. Leginska is a studious modernist. Again she is nothing loth to long-familiar and thoroughly tested musical procedures. Short in truth are her pieces; yet they dissipate themselves as though the composing mind and imagination were never quite clarified; the writing hand never quite certain of the stroke. Mendelssohn and Ravel discern, decide, accomplish. Mme. Leginska looks in her ambition and sets notes to paper. For her the mysticism and the metaphors of Tagore are too ready stimulant. They encourage these tonal vagaries, as her presence yesterday, alert and strung high, stirred the audience to applause.

Skriabin in "The Poem of Ecstasy," twice and thrice heard at the Symphony Concerts, and in "The Divine Poem," now joined to it, writes in tides, with mind and spirit and hand seemingly transported. The music mounts and mounts in long, sonorous surges. The harmonic and instrumental texture is thick, at moments almost opaque; while through it, the thought and even the emotion seem to push and plough. By every sign of the directing, characterizing phrases that Skriabin set above his staves, he composed in high spiritual excitement and, as he believed, illumination. His was the soul of man, escaping "this muddy vesture of decay," forswearing the pleasures of the senses, rising into lofty and ecstatic bliss. He would begin in darksome depths to end upon heights of celestial radiance. A veritable passion of aspiration possessed him. Pour it forth in music he must and in music sometimes as strangely conceived as the "mystic chord" that haunts his later pages.

Skriabin lacked, however, the conceiving mind, the exalting imagination, the command of means to bring to pass musically "this great argument." He strews his pages with notes. He keeps his orchestra incessantly busy. He rounds every spacious period: heaps sonority upon sonority and ascent upon ascent. He plies every means of musical intensification known to the end of the nineteenth and the beginning of the twentieth century. He would summon splendors. He would sound solemnities. Even sublimities may not daunt him. Not at call answer these glories. Vast but vague; upswelling but hollow; exultant but empty; a music in surge and struggle for an end unattainable, came and went yesterday "The Divine Poem." An overture to a fantastic comedy; a setting for three sensuous songs may be small things beside it—small, but as Mendelssohn and Ravel wrought them, perfect. H. T. P.

Small Sums Welcome

A Word from the Trustees of the Symphony Orchestra

THE programme-book of the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon contained the following note from the Trustees of the Symphony Orchestra:

"The list of subscribers to the operating deficit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 1923-24 was first printed in the programme books of Nov. 16 and 17. Two weeks later, with the names of many new subscribers added in the interval, the pledged amount of $58,706.00 was published. Since then the total has been increased to $79,803.34.

"This has come about through a greatly extended coöperation in the support of the orchestra on the part of its patrons. The Trustees, with much appreciation of what has already been done, would be glad to have it generally understood that subscriptions of small and moderate amounts are warmly welcomed from those who cannot make such contributions as they would like to offer. The widest possible distribution of support is as much to be desired as the support itself."

Subscriptions for the week have come from Mr. and Mrs. Frederick R. Galacar; Mrs. Arthur E. Jackson; Mrs. C. M. Loeffler; Mrs. Wilfred R. Shrigley. Further contributions should be made to the Treasurer, E. B. Dane at 6 Beacon Street.

EXQUISITE VOICE WITH SYMPHONY

Post March 1

Mme. Janacopulos Sings the "Scheherezade" of Ravel

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In Vera Janacopulos' singing of Ravel's "Scheherezade," the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon brought the rare union of eloquent music and revealing performance that is the occasional and sufficient reward of much concert-going.

Nor was it a pleasure altogether unforeseen. For while Mme. Janacopulos, except for a semi-private appearance here a few years ago, was until yesterday unknown to Boston, good report preceded her. And two of the three songs that make the "Scheherezade" has been heard here with piano accompaniment, although this was the first performance in this city of any of them with orchestra.

ALLURING AND COMPELLING

With no music to supplement them, Tristran Klingsor's verses of themselves breathe the mystery, the languor, the fateful charm, the impelling fascination of the East, and for them Ravel has imagined and wrought an immeasureably intensifying and enhancing music. Performed with only a piano for support, these songs may make a deep impression. Sung with orchestra, and by a singer so richly endowed as Mme. Janacopulos, they are transporting, altogether irresistible.

"Asia," the first of the three, recounts at length the allure and the marvels of that wondrous continent, and Ravel's tonal and orchestral setting is now voluptuous, now resplendent. Of its companion pieces, "The Enchanted Flute" has a haunting charm, a rarely exotic fragrance, while "The Indifferent One" throbs with desires half-expressed and passion that may awaken no response.

Ideal Singer for These Songs

Gifted with personal beauty as well as with a voice of luscious quality, responsive to every intention of the poet, sensitive to the slightest inflection of the music, Mme. Janacopulos is indeed the ideal singer for these pieces, and Mr. Monteux, who has earned the praise of Ravel himself as conductor of them, might, and did, ably second her. For the too-brief time that these songs consumed in performance, the listener was conveyed to another world, a world of enchanting and seductive sights and sounds and subtle odors.

Save for Mendelssohn's youthful and ever delightful overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," the concert of yesterday offered nothing to match or even approach in worth or interest the music of Ravel. Between the overture and "Scheherezade" came Two Short Pieces for Orchestra, by Ethel Leginska, performed for the first time anywhere, and the second half of the programme fell to Scriabin's Third symphony, "The Divine Poem," hitherto unheard in Boston.

Mme. Leginska's Playing

An exceptionally able and markedly individual pianist, Mme. Leginska is ambitious to shine also as composer. Already the list of her pieces is of substantial length, and it embraces many compositions of larger mould. The pieces of yesterday, written after poems of Tagore, are in the modern manner. They disclose a facility in the handling of the newer harmonic and orchestral effects, but they offer no illuminating commentary on the poet's verses and it is not easy to find in them anything which may be considered Mme. Leginska's own.

It should be added, however, that Mme. Leginska's music was well received and that the hearty applause brought her repeatedly to the platform to make her acknowledgements.

Flamboyant and Bombastic

Heretofore Boston has known Scriabin as orchestral composer only through his "Poem of Ecstacy." This "Divine Poem," composed five years earlier, and showing strong Wagnerian and even Lisztian influence, is a less original, less significant work. Scored for an orchestra of huge dimensions, this music [illegible] pretentious,

---

Globe March 1

SYMPHONY PROGRAM OFFERS NOVELTIES

New Singer and "Divine Poem" Please Audience

Except for the first number, Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture, yesterday's Symphony program was given over to novelties. Two pieces by Ethel Leginska were played for the first time anywhere, Vera Janacopulos chose for her Boston debut Ravel's "Sheherezade," not heard here as a whole before; and the symphony was Skriabin's Third, also called "The Divine Poem," and new to Boston. This and Miss Janacopulos' fervent singing were cordially received. Miss Leginska was called out on the stage after her pieces had been played by the orchestra, and recalled four times. Her debut here as composer was auspicious.

Ravel's setting of three poems by "Tristan Klingsor" demands the intimate yet artificial atmosphere of the salon if it is to make its full effect. The music is exquisitely sophisticated, beautifully wrought, demanding of the singer an instinct for the exotic and a delicacy of taste great enough to enable her to avoid the bizzarre and the strident. Mr Monteaux conducted with marked sympathy for the music.

Miss Janacopulos sang best the numerous passages marked pianissimo. Her voice is not large enough to enable her to produce beautiful tone in so big a hall and yet sing forte. In a smaller room, where her scale of tonal values would be diminished, her voice might sound fresher and more resonant. She caught and rendered faithfully the mood of the music.

This is the most ingratiating of the early works of Ravel, free from the over-luscious harmonies that disfigure such things as his "Pavane for a Dead Infanta." Yet all of Ravel's work is now passing out of date without acquiring the status of classic which Debussy is winning.

Miss Leginska's two pieces for orchestra are suggested by poems by Tagore, from "The Gardener." Each is short, and written for an orchestra in which exoticism is suggested by the use of an extraordinary array of percussion instruments. The first poem, in fact, cuts down the strings to a double quartet, which is overbalanced by the woodwinds and brasses.

She has taken in each piece a main motive, short and not distinctively melodic, and striven to cast an atmosphere around it by the use of orchestral color. The impression on the hearer's mind was more of strangeness than of beauty. Yet there was a certain, almost morbid, intensity of feeling in the music behind the composer's groping for means of expression she has not mastered the use of.

Skriabin's "Divine Room" was written at least five years before his "Poem of Ecstasy," from which it differs as Wagner's "Lohengrin" does from his "Tristan." In this third symphony he has tried to be luminous, clear, exalted. The second movement, called "voluptes," a word for which "joys" is an inaccurate translation, approaches the banalities of Saint-Saens on the same subject in his "Samson and Delilah." He has caught part of the secret of composing in the grand manner, flooding majestic rhythms with harmonies which change only when an harmonic change is inevitable. But too much brass, too many horns and trumpets, failed to suggest the heavenly hosts as visualized by a theosophist.

The audience was at times nearly deafened. but nowadays the tyro at composition can write deafeningly sonorous pieces. This "Divine Poem" does not convey the extraordinary philosophy of the composer to the listener. It is massive, impressive, uneven music, by a man whose reach plainly far exceeded his grasp. The performance was ponderously eloquent.

[illegible] everything on the program except Mendelssohn's overture was well played. Even in a poor performance that masterpiece ought to convince any hearer that its composer was a great genius even if he has since been unfortunate in his imitators.

Next week Schneevoigt will conduct music by Sibelius, Beethoven, Mozart and Strauss, as guest conductor. P. R.

Herald March 2

GEORG SCHNEEVOIGT

The celebrated Finnish conductor, Georg Schneevoigt, visiting this country for the first time, will appear as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concerts in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The symphony will be the Second in D major by Jan Sibelius, the fellow-countryman of Schneevoigt. The program will also comprise the Third "Leonore" Overture of Beethoven, Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" and Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan."

For many years Mr. Schneevoigt's activities as conductor of the orchestras of Helsingfors, Stockholm and Christiania have given additional musical importance to those cities. He has been the first to perform the greater works of Sibelius. He has attracted considerable attention as guest conductor in the European cities. During the last four seasons he has conducted the symphony concerts at the Kurhaus in Scheveningen.

MONDAY SYMPHONY

The fourth and last but one concert of the Monday evening series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in Symphony hall on March 10, with Felix Fox, pianist, as the soloist of the occasion. Mr. Fox will play the piano concerto of Schumann. Mr. Monteux will also present on this program the Second Symphony of Brahms, D major, and Lalo's Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys."

DE PACHMANN

Vladimir de Pachmann, pianist, will give a third recital in Symphony hall on Sunday afternoon, March 23. Mozart's Sonata in A major, an Impromptu of Schubert; Polonaise, Nocturne, tw azurkas and two Etudes by Chopin; endelssohn's song without words (May reezes) and the 16 waltzes of Brahms will be given.

FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, will give concerts for young people in Symphony hall next Monday and Tuesday afternoons, at 4 o'clock. Loraine Wyman will sing.

Beethoven—Overture to "Egmont."
Mendelssohn—Nocture and Scherzo from music for "Mid-Summer Night's Dream."
Bizet—Farandole from "L'Arlesienne."
Franck—Allegretto from the Symphony in D minor.
Hughes—"Mother Goose Melodies," (a) "Jack and Jill," (b) "Old Mother Hubbard," (c) "Goosey, Goosey, Gander."
Borodin—Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor."

Globe March 4

SYMPHONY CONCERT FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

The third of the young people's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. As at the previous concerts Thomas Whitney Surette spoke about the music to be played. Loraine Wyman was the assisting soloist.

Miss Wyman sang three "Mother Goose Parodies" by Hughes. The "Jack and Jill" nad "Goosey, Goosey Gander," are as Mr Surette predicted, exactly what one should expect them to be. "Old Mother Hubbard," on the other hand, is bizarre. The old Englishwoman seems to have been transformed to an Oriental world. To heighten the effect the soloist sang in reedy tones which might have been satirical comment on the flute obligato of the coloratura soprano, the oboe replacing the flute. The young people were highly amused and were not satisfied until Miss Wyman repeated "Goosey, Goosey Gander."

The children have come to enjoy Mr Surette's remarks with their dry humor and they gave him a cordial reception. He contrasted the work of Mendelssohn in the "Nocturne" and Scherzo from the "Midnight Summer Night's Dream" with that of Beethoven in his overture to "Egmont." He further pointed the way to that form of musical enjoyment which consists in following the development of a theme, using as an example the second movement from the "Symphony in D minor" by Franck.

As before, it was evident that rhythm makes the greatest musical appeal to the young listener. The largest applause for a purely orchestral selection fell to Bizet's rapid pulsating Farandole from the suite, "L'Arlesienne."

The program closed with the Porovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor" by Borodin. Despite their high color and their pronounced rhythm the dances apparently did not please the audience as much as the rest of the fine program. The same program will be repeated this afternoon.

Post [illegible] 11

SYMPHONY PLAYS FOR CHILDREN

Group of Songs Feature Young Peoples' Concert

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

A happy innovation marked the Symphony Orchestra's Young People's Concert at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Like that of the preceding concerts of this comparatively new and highly important series, the programme listed a miscellany of classic and modern orchestral pieces, but for the first time these instrumental numbers were supplemented by a group of songs.

MOTHER GOOSE PARODIES

As befitted the occasion, these songs were three of a set of "Mother Goose Parodies" by the American composer, Herbert Hughes, and the singer was Loraine Wyman, known far and wide as an unexcelled interpreter of folk-songs. Mr. Hughes has made these trifles ingeniously and has orchestrated them in droll but in not too heavily humorous fashion. The first two of these songs, "Jack and Jill" and "Old Mother Hubbard" gave intrinsically as much pleasure as did the third, "Goosey, Goosey Gander," but because that was the last, the youngsters must have it repeated. Indeed, so anxious were they for more of these delights that for a time it seemed as though the concert would not be suffered to resume its projected course.

From Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Bizet, Franck and Borodin came the orchestral pieces and each was interpreted by Mr. Monteux and played by the orchestra with quite as much painstaking care as though the concert had been one of the regular subscription series. Of these pieces, the "Scherzo" from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music and the breath-taking Farandole from Bizet's second "L'Arlesienne" suite seemed to give the greatest pleasure.

As before, Thomas Whitney Surette, who has a positive genius for such stimulating comment, prefaced the performance of each number with a few words of helpful and by no means dryly pedagogical comment.

March 1

ERTIN
Y HALL

tos, as Solomirably
estra

M" GIVEN
ST TIME

---

ranscript March 1

TONAL MASTERY, TONAL VAGARIES, TONAL STRIVINGS

A SYMPHONY CONCERT OF CLEAR CONTRASTS

The Perfections of Mendelssohn and Ravel Beside the Gropings of Leginska and the Struggles of Skriabin—The Parisian's Songs, with Mme Janacopulos for Singer—The Pianist as Composer

MENDELSSOHN wrote precisely and fancifully in his overture to Shakspeare's comedy, "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Ravel wrote precisely yet sensuously in the "Three Poems for Voice and Orchestra" that he named "Shéhérazade." Thereby at the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon, Mendelssohn and Ravel prevailed over Mme. Leginska who wrote gropingly, wanderingly in "Two Short Pieces for Orchestra" suggested by poems of Tagore; and over Skriabin whose "Divine Poem" seemed a vast and hollow flux of sounds. Reading Shakspeare's play, the youthful Mendelssohn would imagine it in music. There should be measures of the fairies and their moonlit coverts; perhaps a hint of the parted, confused lovers wandering also therein; certainly a suggestion of the clumping clowns; as much as may be to summon the romantical and fantastical mood of the whole comedy.

Into an overture the composer would pour this design, and an overture in 1826 and to a docile mind like Mendelssohn's, was still a formal prescription. With ease, he mates and manipulates his medium to his matter until music and imagery advance in entire unity of progress. Mendelssohn was solicitous of method, scrupulous of means. The severest analyst may hardly find a flaw in the development and workmanship of the Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; while to this day pace and rhythm, accent and modulation, harmonic and instrumental color, gain the imagined and desired ends. In themselves Mendelssohn's measures are bright with musical invention, aglow with musical warmth and fancy. The suggestion is as luminous and skilful. A few chords at the beginning, and the fairy forest rises. A few chords at the end, and forthwith it vanishes. Here trip the elves. There romp the clowns. Lovers' fancy is not more nimble and playful than many of these gleaming periods. As Shakspeare wrote a fantasy of youth in his verse, so Mendelssohn renewed it in his tones. The Overture endures in perennial freshness for universal pleasure. With reason an orchestra and a conductor, like Mr. Monteux and the band yesterday, spare not in affectionate pains, as though to brighten beauty and deepen charm. With a clear mind and a sure hand Mendelssohn fulfilled his purpose. There is lasting virtu in such precision.

In turn, Ravel, reading three poems of Tristan Klingsor, had a mind to clothe them with music. The first is "Asia"—verse of conjuring revery. By night a ship of mystery bears away the voyager. Persia, India, China entice him. He wanders among merchants and princes; vizirs and mandarins. He fingers strange stuffs; scrutinizes strange faces; observes strange happenings; twinges with the lusts and the cruelties about him. So does he re-conjure the Asia of The Arabian Nights. So will he also recount his tales. . . . The second poem, of "The Enchanted Flute," is briefer. Upon the drowsy air, the lover plays his passion eagerly, moodily—and there is no other sound. His mistress hears and dreams. . . . The third poem of "The Indifferent Stranger," is but the melancholy of a moment. The fair youth passes and the charm of him enters into her who serves him with wine. He goes his way. For a little, the memory lingers.

Setting music to this poetry, Ravel avoids the pitfall of the too eager, too literal-minded composer who would have the tones reflect every image, bend to every contour in the texts. Clearly he perceives that the mood, the atmosphere, the spiritual sensation of the verse, are the musician's concern. "Asia" is sensuous vision, magic of peopled dream, pageant of the imagination luxuriant with twenty drowsy fancies. The music should be as a drug that caresses the senses, opens the vistas. With "The Enchanted Flute," it should summon the stillness, suffuse and shimmer it with the lover's piping. With "The Indifferent Stranger," it has only to evoke a fleeting glimpse, a passing charm, a wistful instant.

Precisely Ravel's music glamours and intensifies the three poems. It is written with strict economy of means, with expert adaptation of those means to the devised end. The mating of the singing and the instrumental voices is faultless and complete. They move in a single line. Together they weave a single fabric. There is no parting the impression of the one from the impression of the other; while yesterday there was Mme. Janacopulos's singing and Mr. Monteux's conducting to draw closer the band. Mr. Laurent's flute sings Ravel's melody in the second song. In the singer's tones, the mistress hears and dreams. The orchestra sets in the quivering stillness. The illusion and the beauty of the illusion are unescapable. For Ravel was fortunate in the course of his musical invention, the surety of his musical procedure, the response, yesterday, of the imparting voices.

So, again, with the song of the passing stranger. His grace is in the contours of the music. It moves as irregularly as he. The charm of his presence, the regret of the memory, gently pervade it. It is fleet and tender and melancholy. Yet each inflection, every shading is unmistakable and unerring. Felicities of invention, certainty of means, fulfill every imaginative end. Once more, the singer, the conductor and the composer were as one. Rich can be the sensuous beauty of Mme. Janacopulos's tones, rich yet with a tang to sharpen sweetness—a voice indeed for the dream-pageant, the voluptuous sensation, that exhale from "Asia." Like wine and oil Ravel blends singer and orchestra. His harmonies and timbres are as a strange perfume upon a music of sorcery. It summons the spells of the Arabian Nights. Anew the imagination is drugged with them—until some sharp edge lacerates the vision. "Roses and blood" writes Klingsor, and Ravel evokes the two-fold mood. And by no tricks, remembered or contrived, of wilfully Oriental music. The listening ear need summon no memory that associates certain images with certain tones. Ravel prefers a purely sensuous evocation—an "Asia" of vision into music translated, not an "Asia" of tonal fact. Yet every modulation has purpose. No doubt, the concern of music is emotion. Yet, with the mind must it also be written.

In degree Mme. Leginska set herself the task of Ravel. In her "Two Short Pieces" she uses no voice; but with the orchestra she would summon the mood, atmosphere, suggestion of two poems of Tagore. One is lover's rhapsody, evoking vision upon vision of the beloved, and bitter-sweet are these longing dreams. The other sets storm to break upon amorous langours, and in the stress passion awakes anew. Tagore is not the most comprehensible of poets. No more is Mme. Leginska the most comprehensible of composers. Obviously these tone-poems are designed to be "free in form" and plastic of progress. Yet they grope and wander that neither achieves any continuity of design or unity of impression. Here and there drifts the music in a succession of sequences difficult for the ear to follow and relate, leaving the mind baffled, the emotions unstirred.

As fitful and diverse is the manner. Now Mme. Leginska is a studious modernist. Again she is nothing loth to long-familiar and thoroughly tested musical procedures. Short in truth are her pieces; yet they dissipate themselves as though the composing mind and imagination were never quite clarified; the writing hand never quite certain of the stroke. Mendelssohn and Ravel discern, decide, accomplish. Mme. Leginska looks in her ambition and sets notes to paper. For her the mysticism and the metaphors of Tagore are too ready stimulant. They encourage these tonal vagaries, as her presence yesterday, alert and strung high, stirred the audience to applause.

Skriabin in "The Poem of Ecstasy," twice and thrice heard at the Symphony Concerts, and in "The Divine Poem," now joined to it, writes in tides, with mind and spirit and hand seemingly transported. The music mounts and mounts in long, sonorous surges. The harmonic and instrumental texture is thick, at moments almost opaque; while through it the thought and even the emotion seem to push and plough. By every sign of the directing, characterizing phrases that Skriabin set above his staves, he composed in high spiritual excitement and, as he believed, illumination. His was the soul of man, escaping "this muddy vesture of decay," forswearing the pleasures of the senses, rising into lofty and ecstatic bliss. He would begin in darksome depths to end upon heights of celestial radiance. A veritable passion of aspiration possessed him. Pour it forth in music he must and in music sometimes as strangely conceived as the "mystic chord" that haunts his later pages.

Skriabin lacked, however, the conceiving mind, the exalting imagination, the command of means to bring to pass musically "this great argument." He strews his pages with notes. He keeps his orchestra incessantly busy. He rounds every spacious period: heaps sonority upon sonority and ascent upon ascent. He plies every means of musical intensification known to the end of the nineteenth and the beginning of the twentieth century. He would summon splendors. He would sound solemnities. Even sublimities may not daunt him. Not at call answer these glories. Vast but vague; upswelling but hollow; exultant but empty; a music in surge and struggle for an end unattainable, came and went yesterday "The Divine Poem." An overture to a fantastic comedy; a setting for three sensuous songs may be small things beside it—small, but as Mendelssohn and Ravel wrought them, perfect.

H. T. P.

Small Sums Welcome

A Word from the Trustees of the Symphony Orchestra

THE programme-book of the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon contained the following note from the Trustees of the Symphony Orchestra:

"The list of subscribers to the operating deficit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 1923-24 was first printed in the programme books of Nov. 16 and 17. Two weeks later, with the names of many new subscribers added in the interval, the pledged amount of $58,706.00 was published. Since then the total has been increased to $79,803.34.

"This has come about through a greatly extended coöperation in the support of the orchestra on the part of its patrons. The Trustees, with much appreciation of what has already been done, would be glad to have it generally understood that subscriptions of small and moderate amounts are warmly welcomed from those who cannot make such contributions as they would like to offer. The widest possible distribution of support is as much to be desired as the support itself."

Subscriptions for the week have come from Mr. and Mrs. Frederick R. Galacar; Mrs. Arthur E. Jackson; Mrs. C. M. Loeffler; Mrs. Wilfred R. Shrigley. Further contributions should be made to the Treasurer, E. B. Dane at 6 Beacon Street.

EXQUISITE VOICE WITH SYMPHONY

Post March 1

Mme. Janacopulos Sings the "Scheherezade" of Ravel

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In Vera Janacopulos' singing of Ravel's "Scheherezade," the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon brought the rare union of eloquent music and revealing performance that is the occasional and sufficient reward of much concert-going.

Nor was it a pleasure altogether unforeseen. For while Mme. Janacopulos, except for a semi-private appearance here a few years ago, was until yesterday unknown to Boston, good report preceded her. And two of the three songs that make the "Scheherezade" has been heard here with piano accompaniment, although this was the first performance in this city of any of them with orchestra.

ALLURING AND COMPELLING

With no music to supplement them, Tristran Klingsor's verses of themselves breathe the mystery, the languor, the fateful charm, the impelling fascination of the East, and for them Ravel has imagined and wrought an immeasureably intensifying and enhancing music. Performed with only a piano for support, these songs may make a deep impression. Sung with orchestra, and by a singer so richly endowed as Mme. Janacopulos, they are transporting, altogether irresistible.

"Asia," the first of the three, recounts at length the allure and the marvels of that wondrous continent, and Ravel's tonal and orchestral setting is now voluptuous, now resplendent. Of its companion pieces, "The Enchanted Flute" has a haunting charm, a rarely exotic fragrance, while "The Indifferent One" throbs with desires half-expressed and passion that may awaken no response.

Ideal Singer for These Songs

Gifted with personal beauty as well as with a voice of luscious quality, responsive to every intention of the poet, sensitive to the slightest inflection of the music, Mme. Janacopulos is indeed the ideal singer for these pieces, and Mr. Monteux, who has earned the praise of Ravel himself as conductor of them, might, and did, ably second her. For the too-brief time that these songs consumed in performance, the listener was conveyed to another world, a world of enchanting and seductive sights and sounds and subtle odors.

Save for Mendelssohn's youthful and ever delightful overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," the concert of yesterday offered nothing to match or even approach in worth or interest the music of Ravel. Between the overture and "Scheherezade" came Two Short Pieces for Orchestra, by Ethel Leginska, performed for the first time anywhere, and the second half of the programme fell to Scriabin's Third symphony, "The Divine Poem," hitherto unheard in Boston.

Mme. Leginska's Playing

An exceptionally able and markedly individual pianist, Mme. Leginska is ambitious to shine also as composer. Already the list of her pieces is of substantial length, and it embraces many compositions of larger mould. The pieces of yesterday, written after poems of Tagore, are in the modern manner. They disclose a facility in the handling of the newer harmonic and orchestral effects, but they offer no illuminating commentary on the poet's verses and it is not easy to find in them anything which may be considered Mme. Leginska's own.

It should be added, however, that Mme. Leginska's music was well received and that the hearty applause brought her repeatedly to the platform to make her acknowledgements.

Flamboyant and Bombastic

Heretofore Boston has known Scriabin as orchestral composer only through his "Poem of Ecstacy." This "Divine Poem," composed five years earlier, and showing strong Wagnerian and even Lisztian influence, is a less original, less significant work. Scored for an orchestra of huge dimensions, this music is in the main pretentious,

---

Globe March 1

SYMPHONY PROGRAM OFFERS NOVELTIES

New Singer and "Divine Poem" Please Audience

Except for the first number, Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture, yesterday's Symphony program was given over to novelties. Two pieces by Ethel Leginska were played for the first time anywhere, Vera Janacopulos chose for her Boston debut Ravel's "Sheherezade," not heard here as a whole before; and the symphony was Skriabin's Third, also called "The Divine Poem," and new to Boston. This and Miss Janacopulos' fervent singing were cordially received. Miss Leginska was called out on the stage after her pieces had been played by the orchestra, and recalled four times. Her debut here as composer was auspicious.

Ravel's setting of three poems by "Tristan Klingsor" demands the intimate yet artificial atmosphere of the salon if it is to make its full effect. The music is exquisitely sophisticated, beautifully wrought, demanding of the singer an instinct for the exotic and a delicacy of taste great enough to enable her to avoid the bizzarre and the strident. Mr Monteux conducted with marked sympathy for the music.

Miss Janacopulos sang best the numerous passages marked pianissimo. Her voice is not large enough to enable her to produce beautiful tone in so big a hall and yet sing forte. In a smaller room, where her scale of tonal values would be diminished, her voice might sound fresher and more resonant. She caught and rendered faithfully the mood of the music.

This is the most ingratiating of the early works of Ravel, free from the over-luscious harmonies that disfigure such things as his "Pavane for a Dead Infanta." Yet all of Ravel's work is now passing out of date without acquiring the status of classic which Debussy is winning.

Miss Leginska's two pieces for orchestra are suggested by poems by Tagore, from "The Gardener." Each is short, and written for an orchestra in which exoticism is suggested by the use of an extraordinary array of percussion instruments. The first poem, in fact, cuts down the strings to a double quartet, which is overbalanced by the woodwinds and brasses.

She has taken in each piece a main motive, short and not distinctively melodic, and striven to cast an atmosphere around it by the use of orchestral color. The impression on the hearer's mind was more of strangeness than of beauty. Yet there was a certain, almost morbid, intensity of feeling in the music behind the composer's groping for means of expression she has not mastered the use of.

Skriabin's "Divine Room" was written at least five years before his "Poem of Ecstasy," from which it differs as Wagner's "Lohengrin" does from his "Tristan." In this third symphony he has tried to be luminous, clear, exalted. The second movement, called "voluptes," a word for which "joys" is an inaccurate translation, approaches the banalities of Saint-Saens on the same subject in his "Samson and Delilah." He has caught part of the secret of composing in the grand manner, flooding majestic rhythms with harmonies which change only when an harmonic change is inevitable. But too much brass, too many horns and trumpets, failed to suggest the heavenly hosts as visualized by a theosophist.

The audience was at times nearly deafened, but nowadays the tyro at composition can write deafeningly sonorous pieces. This "Divine Poem" does not convey the extraordinary philosophy of the composer to the listener. It is massive, impressive, uneven music, by a man whose reach plainly far exceeded his grasp. The performance was ponderously eloquent.

Everything on the program except Mendelssohn's overture was well played. Even in a poor performance that masterpiece ought to convince any hearer that its composer was a great genius even if he has since been unfortunate in his imitators.

Next week Schneevogit will conduct music by Sibelius, Beethoven, Mozart and Strauss, as guest conductor.

P. R.

Herald March 2

GEORG SCHNEEVOIGT

The celebrated Finnish conductor, Georg Schneevoigt, visiting this country for the first time, will appear as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concerts in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The symphony will be the Second in D major by Jan Sibelius, the fellow-countryman of Schneevoigt. The program will also comprise the Third "Leonore" Overture of Beethoven Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" and Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan."

For many years Mr. Schneevoigt's activities as conductor of the orchestras of Helsingfors, Stockholm and Christiania have given additional musical importance to those cities. He has been the first to perform the greater works of Sibelius. He has attracted considerable attention as guest conductor in the European cities. During the last four seasons he has conducted the symphony concerts at the Kurhaus in Scheveningen.

MONDAY SYMPHONY

The fourth and last but one concert of the Monday evening series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in Symphony hall on March 10, with Felix Fox, pianist, as the soloist of the occasion. Mr. Fox will play the piano concerto of Schumann. Mr. Monteux will also present on this program the Second Symphony of Brahms, D major, and Lalo's Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys."

DE PACHMANN

Vladimir de Pachmann, pianist, will give a third recital in Symphony hall on Sunday afternoon, March 23. Mozart's Sonata in A major, an Impromptu of Schubert; Polonaise, Nocturne, two Mazurkas and two Etudes by Chopin; Mendelssohn's song without words (May Breezes) and the 16 waltzes of Brahms will be given.

FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, will give concerts for young people in Symphony hall next Monday and Tuesday afternoons, at 4 o'clock. Loraine Wyman will sing.

Beethoven—Overture to "Egmont."
Mendelssohn—Nocture and Scherzo from music for "Mid-Summer Night's Dream."
Bizet—Farandole from "L'Arlesienne."
Franck—Allegretto from the Symphony in D minor.
Hughes—"Mother Goose Melodies," (a) "Jack and Jill," (b) "Old Mother Hubbard," (c) "Goosey, Goosey, Gander."
Borodin—Poloutsian Dances from "Prince Igor."

Globe March 4

SYMPHONY CONCERT FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

The third of the young people's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. As at the previous concerts Thomas Whitney Surette spoke about the music to be played. Loraine Wyman was the assisting soloist.

Miss Wyman sang three "Mother Goose Parodies" by Hughes. The "Jack and Jill" nad "Goosey, Goosey Gander," are, as Mr Surette predicted, exactly what one should expect them to be. "Old Mother Hubbard," on the other hand, is bizarre. The old Englishwoman seems to have been transformed to an Oriental world. To heighten the effect the soloist sang in reedy tones which might have been satirical comment on the flute obligato of the coloratura soprano. the oboe replacing the flute. The young people were highly amused and were not satisfied until Miss Wyman repeated "Goosey, Goosey Gander."

The children have come to enjoy Mr Surette's remarks with their dry humor and they gave him a cordial reception. He contrasted the work of Mendelssohn in the "Nocturne" and Scherzo from the "Midnight Summer Night's Dream" with that of Beethoven in his overture to "Egmont." He further pointed the way to that form of musical enjoyment which consists in following the development of a theme, using as an example the second movement from the "Symphony in D minor" by Franck.

As before, it was evident that rhythm makes the greatest musical appeal to the young listener. The largest applause for a purely orchestral selection fell to Bizet's rapid pulsating Farandole from the suite, "L'Arlesienne."

The program closed with the Porovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor" by Borodin. Despite their high color and their pronounced rhythm the dances apparently did not please the audience as much as the rest of the fine program. The same program will be repeated this afternoon.

* * *

Post March 4

SYMPHONY PLAYS FOR CHILDREN

Group of Songs Feature Young Peoples' Concert

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

A happy innovation marked the Symphony Orchestra's Young People's Concert at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Like that of the preceding concerts of this comparatively new and highly important series, the programme listed a miscellany of classic and modern orchestral pieces, but for the first time these instrumental numbers were supplemented by a group of songs.

MOTHER GOOSE PARODIES

As befitted the occasion, these songs were three of a set of "Mother Goose Parodies" by the American composer, Herbert Hughes, and the singer was Loraine Wyman, known far and wide as an unexcelled interpreter of folk-songs. Mr. Hughes has made these trifles ingeniously and has orchestrated them in droll but in not too heavily humorous fashion. The first two of these songs, "Jack and Jill" and "Old Mother Hubbard" gave intrinsically as much pleasure as did the third, "Goosey, Goosey Gander," but because that was the last, the youngsters must have it repeated. Indeed, so anxious were they for more of these delights that for a time it seemed as though the concert would not be suffered to resume its projected course.

From Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Bizet, Franck and Borodin came the orchestral pieces and each was interpreted by Mr. Monteux and played by the orchestra with quite as much painstaking care as though the concert had been one of the regular subscription series. Of these pieces, the "Scherzo" from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music and the breath-taking Farandole from Bizet's second "L'Arlesienne" suite seemed to give the greatest pleasure.

As before, Thomas Whitney Surette, who has a positive genius for such stimulating comment, prefaced the performance of each number with a few words of helpful and by no means dryly pedagogical comment.

March 1

NCERT IN NY HALL

pulos, as Solo-Admirably
rchestra

OEM" GIVEN FIRST TIME

IP HALE
of the Boston Sym-
Mr. Monteux, con-
yesterday afternoon
Mme. Vera Jana-nger. The program ndelssohn, Overture
ght's Dream"; Le-Pieces for orchestra
; Ravel, "Schehera-
s for voice and ore Enchanted Flute,
e); Scriabin, Third Divine Poem" (first

beautifully played.
ar-old Mendelssohn romanticist. What accomplished if he less respectable!
erture before he had ttery, before he be of priggish formulas, pictured the later
at forgotten magaere you see the man y the resurrection of ert the Devil," by in "Fra Diavolo," by
" although he con-
an overture for it:
ssohn, who delighted her spouse by play-
em. But this overe's comedy is from n, the composer of rtions of the "Wal-the man of the sentimental "Songs

d of Mme. Legind by two of Tarmed for the first l dress? Must the ms in mind, read the program book unereal lighting of r to trace the con-
sentences of the er while the music
ic may be to Mme.
expression of Ta-nd emotions; but less music lovers,
es and Robinson,
roness of the arts,
en the question
ic emotional, cone without refer-e found it for the
There are some dic scraps, "dis-
re is orchestral
nally is interest-
hout significance;
t now and then
isputable talent,
re to be original.
ed half-hearted-
warmer after the
e. Leginska was ecalled her sev-

e of Ravel's ear-
e ranked among sor (his name is
"Asia" all that at land of mys-
is by no means id not foolishly for each wish keen sense of itself with its dress, voluptu-vaporous music
g beauty with-be oriental by
ies. Beautiful,
e other poems.
ssed admirably
; and the com-ging, amorous ointment, but natic note, her y and sounded

in one long
d here for the , fanatical ad-written pages
w it portrays king into an l desiring the hilation; the d personality,

ser's religion, neoplatonism inspired his his musical of them is
There are s one truly instruments.
s irritatingly ut sufficient agner is not d only said
f the time!
rb.
ted tonight
s as follows:
ore No. 3;
k; Strauss,
elius Symvoigt will

---

ranscript March 1

ONAL MASTERY, TONAL VAGARIES, TONAL STRIVINGS

A SYMPHONY CONCERT OF CLEAR CONTRASTS

The Perfections of Mendelssohn and Ravel Beside the Gropings of Leginska and the Struggles of Skriabin—The Parisian's Songs, with Mme Janacopulos for Singer—The Pianist as Composer

MENDELSSOHN wrote precisely and fancifully in his overture to Shakspeare's comedy, "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Ravel wrote precisely yet sensuously in the "Three Poems for Voice and Orchestra" that he named "Shéhérazade." Thereby at the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon, Mendelssohn and Ravel prevailed over Mme. Leginska who wrote gropingly, wanderingly in "Two Short Pieces for Orchestra" suggested by poems of Tagore; and over Skriabin whose "Divine Poem" seemed a vast and hollow flux of sounds. Reading Shakspeare's play, the youthful Mendelssohn would imagine it in music. There should be measures of the fairies and their moonlit coverts; perhaps a hint of the parted, confused lovers wandering also therein; certainly a suggestion of the clumping clowns; as much as may be to summon the romantical and fantastical mood of the whole comedy.

Into an overture the composer would pour this design, and an overture in 1826 and to a docile mind like Mendelssohn's, was still a formal prescription. With ease, he mates and manipulates his medium to his matter until music and imagery advance in entire unity of progress. Mendelssohn was solicitous of method, scrupulous of means. The severest analyst may hardly find a flaw in the development and workmanship of the Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; while to this day pace and rhythm, accent and modulation, harmonic and instrumental color, gain the imagined and desired ends. In themselves Mendelssohn's measures are bright with musical invention, aglow with musical warmth and fancy. The suggestion is as luminous and skilful. A few chords at the beginning, and the fairy forest rises. A few chords at the end, and forthwith it vanishes. Here trip the elves. There romp the clowns. Lovers' fancy is not more nimble and playful than many of these gleaming periods. As Shakspeare wrote a fantasy of youth in his verse, so Mendelssohn renewed it in his tones. The Overture endures in perennial freshness for universal pleasure. With reason an orchestra and a conductor, like Mr. Monteux and the band yesterday, spare not in affectionate pains, as though to brighten

Small Sums Welcome

A Word from the Trustees of the Symphony Orchestra

THE programme-book of the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon contained the following note from the Trustees of the Symphony Orchestra:

"The list of subscribers to the operating deficit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 1923-24 was first printed in the programme books of Nov. 16 and 17. Two weeks later, with the names of many new subscribers added in the interval, the pledged amount of $58,706.00 was published. Since then the total has been increased to $79,803.34.

"This has come about through a greatly extended coöperation in the support of the orchestra on the part of its patrons. The Trustees, with much appreciation of what has already been done, would be glad to have it generally understood that subscriptions of small and moderate amounts are warmly welcomed from those who cannot make such contributions as they would like to offer. The widest possible distribution of support is as much to be desired as the support itself."

Subscriptions for the week have come from Mr. and Mrs. Frederick R. Galacar; Mrs. Arthur E. Jackson; Mrs. C. M. Loeffler; Mrs. Wilfred R. Shrigley. Further contributions should be made to the Treasurer, E. B. Dane at 6 Beacon Street.

beauty and deepen charm. With a clear mind and a sure hand Mendelssohn ful-

---

lege song of Amherst, President Coo alma mater. But no one paid mu tion until Mrs. Coolidge began to hands in time with the music, wh marching song. The seven other her table—all New Yorkers with ception of Mrs. Frederick Uph Chicago—also clapped their hands son, and first thing we knew the table was singing the words.

By that time, of course, everyone on that it was Amherst's song and in the chorus. Evidently the Pr was greatly pleased; he smiled up a Coolidge and waved his hand acro hall as if to say: "You're a good old and Mrs. Coolidge waved gaily back was a nice, friendly touch to the eve

Mrs. Coolidge entered into the spi the occasion. The ladies at her table have been almost strangers to her, she chatted and laughed with them in stant conversation. We all watched beaming over that great mass of flowe fastened to the front of the box in w her table was set. Sometimes when orchestra struck up a gay jazz tun moved her head and shoulders in unconscious rhythm of the dance.
political dinner had no terrors for he and everyone liked her the better for th joyousness added to her dignity as Firs Lady.

---

procedures. Short in truth are her pieces; yet they dissipate themselves as though the composing mind and imagination were never quite clarified; the writing hand never quite certain of the stroke. Mendelssohn and Ravel discern, decide, accomplish. Mme. Leginska looks in her ambition and sets notes to paper. For her the mysticism and the metaphors of Tagore are too ready stimulant. They encourage these tonal vagaries, as her presence yesterday, alert and strung high, stirred the audience to applause.

Skriabin in "The Poem of Ecstasy," twice and thrice heard at the Symphony Concerts, and in "The Divine Poem," now joined to it, writes in tides, with mind and spirit and hand seemingly transported. The music mounts and mounts in long, sonorous surges. The harmonic and instrumental texture is thick, at moments almost opaque; while through it the thought and even the emotion seem to push and plough. By every sign of the directing, characterizing phrases that Skriabin set above his staves, he composed in high spiritual excitement and, as he believed,

---

EXQUISITE VOICE WITH SYMPHONY

Post March 1

Mme. Janacopulos Sings the "Scheherezade" of Ravel

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In Vera Janacopulos' singing of Ravel's "Scheherezade," the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon brought the rare union of eloquent music and revealing performance that is the occasional and sufficient reward of much concert-going.

Nor was it a pleasure altogether unforeseen. For while Mme. Janacopulos, except for a semi-private appearance here a few years ago, was until yesterday unknown to Boston, good report preceded her. And two of the three songs that make the "Scheherezade" has been heard here with piano accompaniment, although this was the first performance in this city of any of them with orchestra.

ALLURING AND COMPELLING

With no music to supplement them, Tristran Klingsor's verses of themselves breathe the mystery, the languor, the fateful charm, the impelling fascination of the East, and for them Ravel has imagined and wrought an immeasureably intensifying and enhancing music. Performed with only a piano for support, these songs may make a deep impression. Sung with orchestra, and by a singer so richly endowed as Mme. Janacopulos, they are transporting, altogether irresistible.

"Asia," the first of the three, recounts at length the allure and the marvels of that wondrous continent, and Ravel's tonal and orchestral setting is now voluptuous, now resplendent. Of its companion pieces, "The Enchanted Flute" has a haunting charm, a rarely exotic fragrance, while "The Indifferent One" throbs with desires half-expressed and passion that may awaken no response.

Ideal Singer for These Songs

Gifted with personal beauty as well as with a voice of luscious quality, responsive to every intention of the poet, sensitive to the slightest inflection of the music, Mme. Janacopulos is indeed the ideal singer for these pieces, and Mr. Monteux, who has earned the praise of Ravel himself as conductor of them, might, and did, ably second her. For the too-brief time that these songs consumed in performance, the listener was conveyed to another world, a world of enchanting and seductive sights and sounds and subtle odors.

Save for Mendelssohn's youthful and ever delightful overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," the concert of yesterday offered nothing to match or even approach in worth or interest the music of Ravel. Between the overture and "Scheherezade" came Two Short Pieces for Orchestra, by Ethel Leginska, performed for the first time anywhere, and the second half of the programme fell to Scriabin's Third symphony, "The Divine Poem," hitherto unheard in Boston.

Mme. Leginska's Playing

An exceptionally able and markedly individual pianist, Mme. Leginska is ambitious to shine also as composer. Already the list of her pieces is of substantial length, and it embraces many compositions of larger mould. The pieces of yesterday, written after poems of Tagore, are in the modern manner. They disclose a facility in the handling of the newer harmonic and orchestral effects, but they offer no illuminating commentary on the poet's verses and it is not easy to find in them anything which may be considered Mme. Leginska's own.

It should be added, however, that Mme. Leginska's music was well received and that the hearty applause brought her repeatedly to the platform to make her acknowledgements.

Flamboyant and Bombastic

Heretofore Boston has known Scriabin as orchestral composer only through his "Poem of Ecstacy." This "Divine Poem," composed five years earlier, and showing strong Wagnerian and even Lisztian influence, is a less original, less significant work. Scored for an orchestra of huge dimensions, this music is in the main pretentious, flamboyant and bombastic. Here and there Scriabin finds suitable musical expression for those grandiosely mystical ideas by which he was obsessed, and as sheer sound the end is gorgeous. But the listener, after too long immersion in a sea of tone-sensation, is scarcely in a mood to respond to it. This "Divine Poem," written more than 20 years ago, is already "dated," outmoded. Belatedly it has come to us, and there would seem no valid reason for us to hear it again. Yet, whatever Mr. Monteux's own opinion of the music may be, he had evidently taken great pains with it and seemingly the performance did for it all that might be

---

Globe March 1

SYMPHONY PROGRAM OFFERS NOVELTIES

New Singer and "Divine Poem" Please Audience

Except for the first number, Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture, yesterday's Symphony program was given over to novelties. Two pieces by Ethel Leginska were played for the first time anywhere, Vera Janacopulos chose for her Boston debut Ravel's "Sheherezade," not heard here as a whole before; and the symphony was Skriabin's Third, also called "The Divine Poem," and new to Boston. This and Miss Janacopulos' fervent singing were cordially received. Miss Leginska was called out on the stage after her pieces had been played by the orchestra, and recalled four times. Her debut here as composer was auspicious.

Ravel's setting of three poems by "Tristan Klingsor" demands the intimate yet artificial atmosphere of the salon if it is to make its full effect. The music is exquisitely sophisticated, beautifully wrought, demanding of the singer an instinct for the exotic and a delicacy of taste great enough to enable her to avoid the bizzarre and the strident. Mr Monteaux conducted with marked sympathy for the music.

Miss Janacopulos sang best the numerous passages marked pianissimo. Her voice is not large enough to enable her to produce beautiful tone in so big a hall and yet sing forte. In a smaller room, where her scale of tonal values would be diminished, her voice might sound fresher and more resonant. She caught and rendered faithfully the mood of the music.

This is the most ingratiating of the early works of Ravel, free from the over-luscious harmonies that disfigure such things as his "Pavane for a Dead Infanta." Yet all of Ravel's work is now passing out of date without acquiring the status of classic which Debussy is winning.

Miss Leginska's two pieces for orchestra are suggested by poems by Tagore, from "The Gardener." Each is short, and written for an orchestra in which exoticism is suggested by the use of an extraordinary array of percussion instruments. The first poem, in fact, cuts down the strings to a double quartet, which is overbalanced by the woodwinds and brasses.

She has taken in each piece a main motive, short and not distinctively melodic, and striven to cast an atmosphere around it by the use of orchestral color. The impression on the hearer's mind was more of strangeness than of beauty. Yet there was a certain, almost morbid, intensity of feeling in the music behind the composer's groping for means of expression she has not mastered the use of.

Skriabin's "Divine Room" was written at least five years before his "Poem of Ecstasy," from which it differs as Wagner's "Lohengrin" does from his "Tristan." In this third symphony he has tried to be luminous, clear, exalted. The second movement, called "voluptes," a word for which "joys" is an inaccurate translation, approaches the banalities of Saint-Saens on the same subject in his "Samson and Delilah." He has caught part of the secret of composing in the grand manner, flooding majestic rhythms with harmonies which change only when an harmonic change is inevitable. But too much brass, too many horns and trumpets, failed to suggest the heavenly hosts as visualized by a theosophist.

The audience was at times nearly deafened, but nowadays the tyro at composition can write deafeningly sonorous pieces. This "Divine Poem" does not convey the extraordinary philosophy of the composer to the listener. It is massive, impressive, uneven music, by a man whose reach plainly far exceeded his grasp. The performance was ponderously eloquent.

[illegible] everything on the program except Mendelssohn's overture was well played. Even in a poor performance that masterpiece ought to convince any hearer that its composer was a great genius even if he has since been unfortunate in his imitators.

Next week Schneevoigt will conduct music by Sibelius, Beethoven, Mozart and Strauss, as guest conductor.

P. R.

Herald March 2

GEORG SCHNEEVOIGT

The celebrated Finnish conductor, Georg Schneevoigt, visiting this country for the first time, will appear as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concerts in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The symphony will be the Second in D major by Jan Sibelius, the fellow-countryman of Schneevoigt. The program will also comprise the Third "Leonore" Overture of Beethoven, Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" and Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan."

For many years Mr. Schneevoigt's activities as conductor of the orchestras of Helsingfors, Stockholm and Christiania have given additional musical importance to those cities. He has been the first to perform the greater works of Sibelius. He has attracted considerable attention as guest conductor in the European cities. During the last four seasons he has conducted the symphony concerts at the Kurhaus in Scheveningen.

MONDAY SYMPHONY

The fourth and last but one concert of the Monday evening series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in Symphony hall on March 10, with Felix Fox, pianist, as the soloist of the occasion. Mr. Fox will play the piano concerto of Schumann. Mr. Monteux will also present on this program the Second Symphony of Brahms, D major, and Lalo's Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys."

DE PACHMANN

Vladimir de Pachmann, pianist, will give a third recital in Symphony hall on Sunday afternoon, March 23. Mozart's Sonata in A major, an Impromptu of Schubert; Polonaise, Nocturne, two Mazurkas and two Etudes by Chopin; Mendelssohn's song without words (May Breezes) and the 16 waltzes of Brahms will be given.

FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, will give concerts for young people in Symphony hall next Monday and Tuesday afternoons, at 4 o'clock. Loraine Wyman will sing.

Beethoven—Overture to "Egmont."
Mendelssohn—Nocture and Scherzo from music for "Mid-Summer Night's Dream."
Bizet—Farandole from "L'Arlesienne."
Franck—Allegretto from the Symphony in D minor.
Hughes—"Mother Goose Melodies," (a) "Jack and Jill," (b) "Old Mother Hubbard," (c) "Goosey, Goosey, Gander."
Borodin—Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor."

Globe March 4

SYMPHONY CONCERT FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

The third of the young people's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. As at the previous concerts Thomas Whitney Surette spoke about the music to be played. Loraine Wyman was the assisting soloist.

Miss Wyman sang three "Mother Goose Parodies" by Hughes. The "Jack and Jill" nad "Goosey, Goosey Gander," are, as Mr Surette predicted, exactly what one should expect them to be. "Old Mother Hubbard," on the other hand, is bizarre. The old Englishwoman seems to have been transformed to an Oriental world. To heighten the effect the soloist sang in reedy tones which might have been satirical comment on the flute obligato of the coloratura soprano, the oboe replacing the flute. The young people were highly amused and were not satisfied until Miss Wyman repeated "Goosey, Goosey Gander."

The children have come to enjoy Mr Surette's remarks with their dry humor and they gave him a cordial reception. He contrasted the work of Mendelssohn in the "Nocturne" and Scherzo from the "Midnight Summer Night's Dream" with that of Beethoven in his overture to "Egmont." He further pointed the way to that form of musical enjoyment which consists in following the development of a theme, using as an example the second movement from the "Symphony in D minor" by Franck.

As before, it was evident that rhythm makes the greatest musical appeal to the young listener. The largest applause for a purely orchestral selection fell to Bizet's rapid pulsating Farandole from the suite, "L'Arlesienne."

The program closed with the Porovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor" by Borodin. Despite their high color and their pronounced rhythm the dances apparently did not please the audience as much as the rest of the fine program. The same program will be repeated this afternoon.

Post March 4

SYMPHONY PLAYS FOR CHILDREN

Group of Songs Feature Young Peoples' Concert

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

A happy innovation marked the Symphony Orchestra's Young People's Concert at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Like that of the preceding concerts of this comparatively new and highly important series, the programme listed a miscellany of classic and modern orchestral pieces, but for the first time these instrumental numbers were supplemented by a group of songs.

MOTHER GOOSE PARODIES

As befitted the occasion, these songs were three of a set of "Mother Goose Parodies" by the American composer, Herbert Hughes, and the singer was Loraine Wyman, known far and wide as an unexcelled interpreter of folk-songs. Mr. Hughes has made these trifles ingeniously and has orchestrated them in droll but in not too heavily humorous fashion. The first two of these songs, "Jack and Jill" and "Old Mother Hubbard" gave intrinsically as much pleasure as did the third, "Goosey, Goosey Gander," but because that was the last, the youngsters must have it repeated. Indeed, so anxious were they for more of these delights that for a time it seemed as though the concert would not be suffered to resume its projected course.

From Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Bizet, Franck and Borodin came the orchestral pieces and each was interpreted by Mr. Monteux and played by the orchestra with quite as much painstaking care as though the concert had been one of the regular subscription series. Of these pieces, the "Scherzo" from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music and the breath-taking Farandole from Bizet's second "L'Arlesienne" suite seemed to give the greatest pleasure.

As before, Thomas Whitney Surette, who has a positive genius for such stimulating comment, prefaced the performance of each number with a few words of helpful and by no means dryly pedagogical comment.

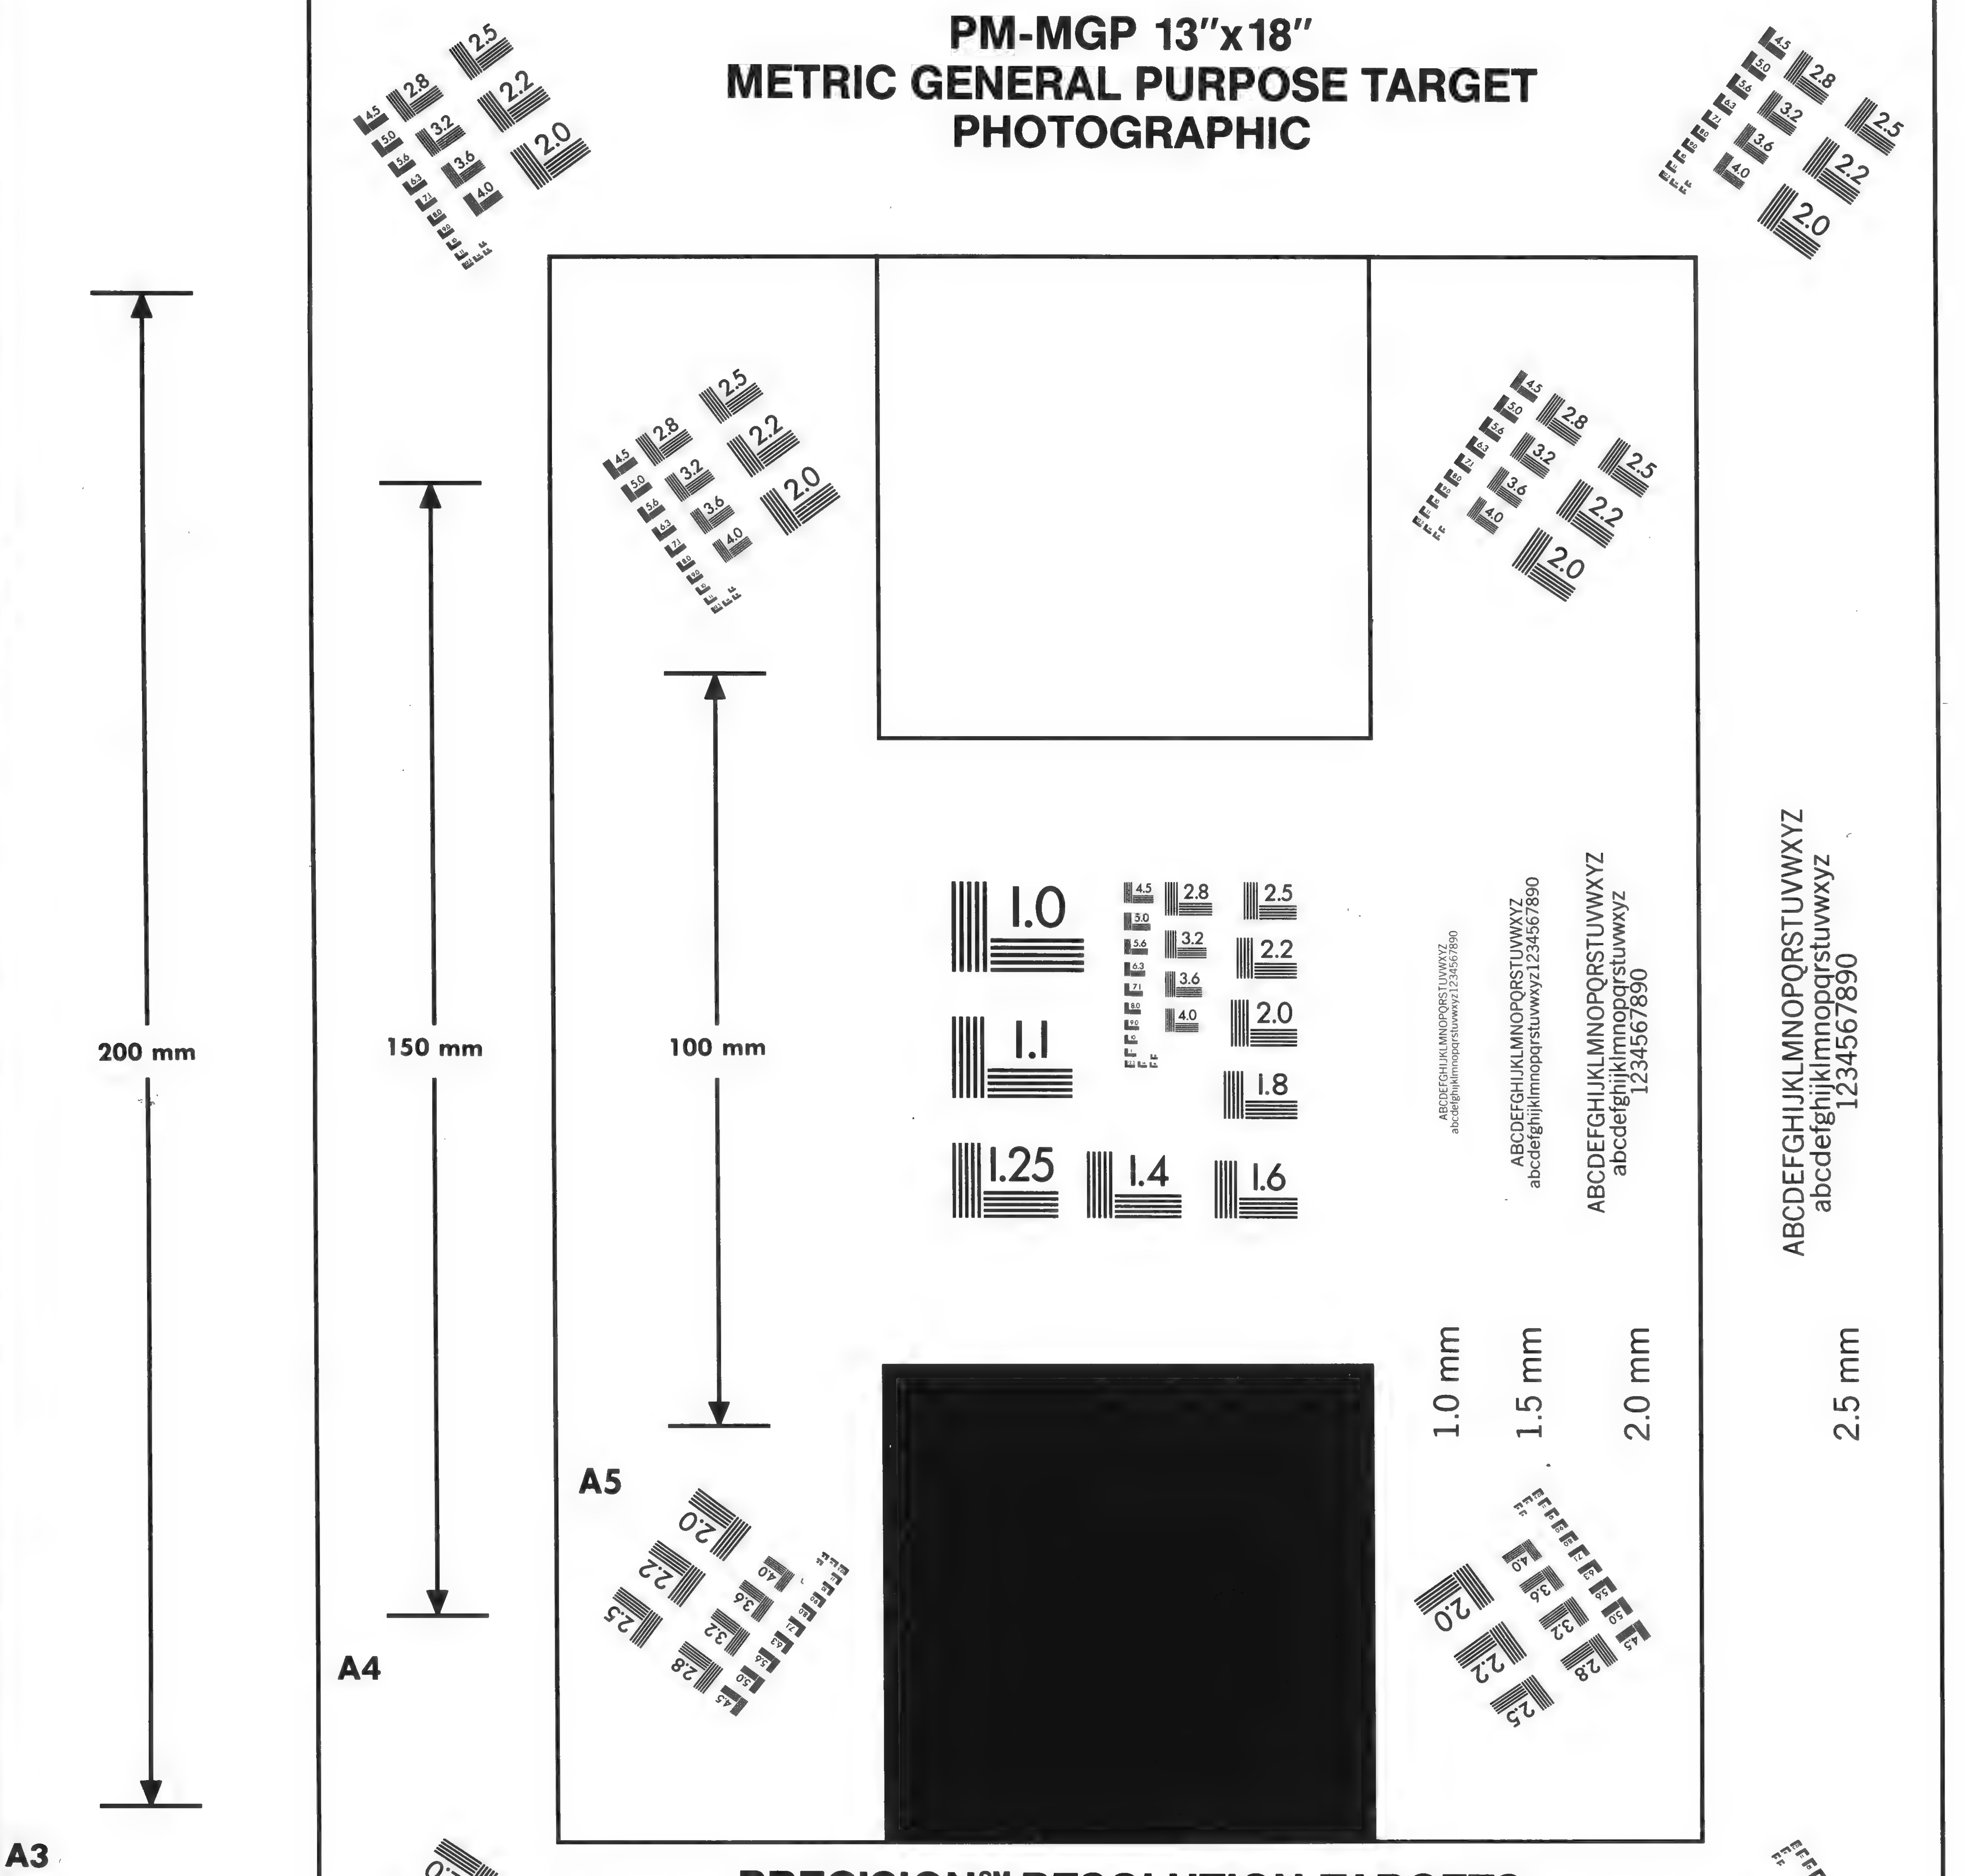
[218]

REDUCTION

RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A5
A4
A3
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

LAWRENCE
MASS.

FEB 1924

shua Hilton and Mrs. Ralph

Boston Symphony to Play

The Boston Symphony Ensemble will play the second concert in the Phillips Academy chapel at eight o'clock this evening. One of the numbers will be Haydn's "Farewell Symphony" which the ensemble will play after the manner of its original performance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

Chronicle

FEB 16 1924

Cambridge

FIFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT

The fifth in the regular series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Sanders theatre was given on Thursday evening of last week. The orchestral numbers included Brahms' third symphony in F, and the tone poem "Death and Transfiguration" by Richard Strauss. Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist of the orchestra, was the soloist and he played Saint-Saens' concerto in A minor for violoncello and orchestra.

The time was, and not so many years ago, that one felt more or less impelled to write a somewhat lengthy account when either the Brahms symphony or the Strauss tone poem was given at these concerts, for both these works were comparatively new and neither of them greatly understood or admired excepting by the few. Today, however, both these orchestral works have become standard in the modern repertory and are understood so well as to make extended comment unnecessary. Mr. Monteux gave to the Brahms symphony just the sort of interpretation to bring out the many characteristics of the work that led many at one time to consider the third, the best of the four symphonies that Brahms wrote. However this may be, no one will question that the performance at this concert was highly satisfactory in every respect. And it was so with the "Death and Transfiguration," a work that was severely criticized when first heard nearly thirty years or more ago, and even today, the work is not so well appreciated as many others of the Strauss output. It may not be his best work in the larger form, but it has its impressive moments, brought out by an especially strong performance.

Mr. Bedetti is a master of his instruments, as all fully recognize and he gave a most brilliant and authoritative performance of a work, grateful to the ear and not too long: two desirable points in a 'cello concerto, most of them being not over interesting at the best. Mr. Bedetti was loudly applauded and recalled at the close of the performance.

The sixth concert in the series will be given on Thursday evening, February 28. Vera Janacopulos, soprano, will be

H. L. STORER.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PROVIDENCE,
R. I.
NEWS

FEB 23 1924

CAROL ROBINSON TO BE SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

The fourth concert of the Providence season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in Infantry hall next Tuesday evening at 8:15. This, of course, will be the last appearance but one of Pierre Monteaux, the great French conductor, in this city.

The soloist of the occasion will be Carol Robinson, the highly talented young American pianist, who, as a virtuoso and as a composer as well, has attracted much attention in recent seasons. She has given conspicuously successful recitals in Chicago, New York and other cities. The score in which she is to appear with this orchestra is the ever-popular pianoforte concerto of Tchaikowsky in B-flat.

The symphony will be that in C-major, entitled "Jupiter," by Mozart, which is sometimes called the greatest work of this master. The closing number will be Charpentier's colorful and descriptive score "Impressions of Italy," which was composed under the direct influence of the sights and sounds of Italy during this musician's first sojourn there when enjoying his Prix de Rome scholarship. The first number, the "Serenade," is notable for a viola solo played off stage, which gives the illusion of distance. This part will be taken by George Fourel, the virtuoso of the orchestra. The other movements include "On Muleback," which is a celebrated canzone of the Italian muleteers; "On the Summits" (a far landscape) and "Naples," a particularly close characterization.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PROVIDENCE
RHODE ISLAND
BULLETIN

FEB 23 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY COMING TO PROVIDENCE TUESDAY

Programme Will be Under Direction of Pierre Monteux.

The fourth concert of the Providence season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening at 8:15 o'clock. This will be the last appearance but one of Pierre Monteux, the great French conductor, in this city.

The soloist of the occasion will be Carol Robinson, young American pianist, who, as a virtuoso and as a composer as well, has attracted much attention in recent seasons. She has given conspicuously successful recitals in Chicago, New York and other cities. The score in which she is to appear with this orchestra is the ever-popular pianoforte concerto of Tchaikovsky in B-flat.

The symphony will be that in C-major, entitled "Jupiter," by Mozart, which is sometimes called the greatest work of this master. The closing number will be Charpentier's colorful and descriptive score, "Impressions of Italy," which was composed under the direct influence of the sights and sounds of Italy during this musician's first sojourn there, when enjoying his Prix de Rome scholarship. The first number, the "Serenade," is notable for a viola solo played off stage, which gives the illusion of distance. This part will be taken by Georges Fourel, the virtuoso of the orchestra. The other movements include: "On Muleback," which is a celebrated canzone of the Italian muleteers; "On the Summits" (a far landscape), and "Naples," a particularly close characterization.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK
HERALD

FEB 24 1924

To Repeat "Rite of Spring."

It is announced in Boston that "since requests have come in number to Mr. Monteux for a repetition at the symphony concerts of Stravinsky's tone poem, "The Rite of Spring," he has definitely decided to play the piece again in both Boston and New York. In Boston it will be heard anew at a pair of concerts in April, while in New York, during the same month, it will reappear at a Saturday matinee. Of all the notable new pieces that Mr. Monteux has undertaken through five years as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, none has so stirred its public in both cities."

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK,
N. Y.
TIMES

1924

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra played Debussy's "Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian," the opinion was expressed that it lost something by its translation from the theatre to the platform. On the other hand, The Boston Transcript says that the transference was justified by its undeniable beauty.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

CLARKSBURG
W. VA.

Exponent

ISSUE OF

FEB 29 1924

Pierre Monteux, now finishing a four year term with the Boston Symphony, is a conductor of elasticity and variety. Sinclair says he has found hearings for more composers than any three of his colleagues. He has a better ear than any conductor except Mengelberg and his limitations proceed from the fact that he cares more for the music than for the performance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PROVIDENCE
RHODE ISLAND
BULLETIN

FEB 27 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HEARD BY BIG AUDIENCE

A symphony, an orchestral suite and a piano concerto were played last evening at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fourth concert in Infantry Hall. Although containing but three numbers the programme was much longer than usual, a fact not in the least disturbing to the big audience, for the concert proved one of sustained interest. Not only in the choice of compositions but in performance and in the success of an extremely talented American artist as soloist the orchestra's fourth visit may be said to measure up to the highest artistic standards attained during the present season.

M. Monteux, as usual, led his men with the musicianship, the taste and the sure control that inevitably bring artistic results. The symphony was notably smooth in technical detail and the original and brilliantly orchestrated Charpentier "Impressions of Italy," while revealing one or two slight lapses from perfect ensemble on the part of the 'cello section, as a whole made a delightful finale to the well balanced programme.

It is always pleasant to witness the success of a young American artist and Carol Robinson's appearance as soloist brought much pleasure to her hearers. Her playing of the big Tschaikowsky concerto, was, in fact, a noteworthy performance and spoke volumes for her natural musical gifts and her purely American training.

The programme follows:

Mozart......Symphony in C major, "Jupiter"
  Allegro vivace.
  Andante cantabile.
  Menuetto: Allegretto; Trio.
  Finale: Allegro molto.
Tchaikowsky...Concerto for Pianoforte No. 1, in B-flat minor, Op. 23
  Andante non troppo e molto maestoso: Allegro con spirito.
  Andantino semplice: Allegro vivace assai.
  Allegro con fuoco.
Charpentier............"Impressions of Italy," Orchestral Suite
  Serenade.
  On Muleback.
  On the Summits.
  Naples.

When one tires of modern musical fare or of that which by complexity of structure taxes the mind it is well to return to Mozart and drink from the pure spring of his genius. In the "Jubiter" symphony we find all the freshness and spontaneity so characteristic of his writings. It is music noble in its majestic sweep and freedom, music that speaks intimately of the beauty of nature, music which touches the heart. There is strength in the fine opening allegro and the andante cantabile sings of tranquillity and rest. In this latter movement one easily might visualize Mozart at his pleasant task of composition. At some point of vantage he meditates upon a summer landscape, sun bathed and beautiful. The serenity, the peace that comes with such close communion with nature is to him music. Truthfully he traces in musical language the feelings inspired by the scene outspread before him and the impressions are made permanent for the enjoyment of all.

The entire symphony, under M. Monteux's baton, was performed with fitting understanding and artistry. At the close the conductor responded several times to tremendous and deserved applause.

In his orchestra suite, "Impressions of Italy," Charpentier is successful in creating the desired atmosphere. It is descriptive music of ingenius design and color and without the aid of programme notes would stir the Italian pulse. The orchestration is admirably suggestive of the several scenes and the characteristic rythms and melodies are used in striking and effective manner. A viola solo off stage is one of the devices introduced. The last movement, "Naples," depicts the joyous life of that city. It is a very brilliant finale of considerable length.

The appearance of Carol Rohinson introduced a young player of conspicuous talent. Tall and slight but with abundant physical strength she sits at the piano and accomplishes with ease the grand effects on the Tschaikowsky concerto.

Her technique is well developed; it is clear and dependable, and to this requisite foundation she adds fine musical qualities. The concerto is a good vehicle for the display of a [illegible]'s ability both as technician and musician. The orchestra is given a part in the score of greater significance and merit than is frequently seen in concertos for pianoforte with orchestral accompaniment. M. Monteux gave an excellent performance with his assisting musicians and at the concerto's close the entire orchestra joined in the ovation accorded the young artist.

A. F. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

HERALD

FEB 2 - 1924

By Boston Symphony.

At the Thursday concert on March 13 of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux will present a Wagnerian program with Margaret Matzenauer as soloist. The program for the Saturday concert will have Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps," Shumann's Fourth Symphony and Haydn's cello concerto, with Jean Bedetti as soloist.

for his

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

BOSTON,
MASS.
Christian Science Monitor

MA

Seventeenth Program of Boston Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, gave its seventeenth concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program:

Mendelssohn, Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream."
Leginska, Two short pieces for orchestra.
Ravel, "Schéhérazade," Three Poems for Voice and Orchestra.
Scriabin, Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem."

Mme. Vera Janacopulos was the singer.

Miss Leginska's two short pieces for orchestra were played for the first time. The composer, having achieved a certain position as a virtuoso pianist, is now desirous, it would appear, of becoming a composer; and it is an indisputable fact that she possesses a gift for composition. This natural gift, slender though it may be, she has taken the trouble to cultivate carefully, and has succeeded in acquiring a respectable amount of technic. These two short pieces for orchestra show perhaps more promise than actual achievement; yet they contain here and there measures of real beauty, adroitly expressed, and withal they evidence a restrait and conciseness which are encouraging, particularly coming from Miss Leginska, who as a pianist is at times given to exaggeration and overemphasis.

For once a singer seemed an essential part of a symphony program. Too often does an operatic aria, torn from its natural surroundings, disturb the continuity of the afternoon's music, or should the singer chance to sing nonoperatic music, too often are we regaled with music originally conceived for the intimacies of a smaller concert room and an accompaniment expanded from a pianoforte version into an almost unrecognizable one for orchestra. Unfortunately, compositions for voice and orchestra, like these three poems by Ravel, are few and not to be come upon every day in the year, and unfortunately, also, singers of the quality of Mme. Janacopulos to sing them are even rarer. Set to gorgeously colorful verses of Tristan Klingsor, the music aptly reflects their character; nor does it at any time seem an unnecessary adjunct to the poetry, which is of itself so full of music that only a master hand could have successfully accomplished the task of setting it without robbing it of its beauty. No better example of the perfect union of poetry and music can perhaps be found in the whole literature.

Of the music itself (and it is difficult to consider it apart from the words) the most striking feature is undoubtedly the orchestration, which is brilliant without being obtrusive and which betrays the master's touch in every measure. A composer of lesser genius than Ravel might have over emphasized the Oriental character of the music and indulged in a riot of exoticism. Imagine a Richard Strauss, for example, turned loose in this garden of Eastern imagery. Not so Ravel, in whose music and orchestration the French sense of taste is ever present. This music interpreted by Mme. Janacopulos and Mr. Monteux with as complete an understanding as could be desired—an interpretation worthy of the music—greater praise than this may not be given.

The program ended with Scriabin's "Divine Poem," a tedious composition betraying the influence of Wagner, Liszt and Tschaikowsky in every measure. It is a symphony full of tiresome repetitions. Some musical ideas of sufficient interest to bear repetition but in vain are they to be searched for in this music of Scriabin, bombastic and inflated.

The program began with a performance of Mendelssohn's somewhat smug, "Midsummer Night's Dream" Overture. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
EAGLE

MAR 2 - 1924

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" made so deep an impression when Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra introduced it here at their last Thursday evening concert, that it will be repeated for the benefit of the Saturday subscribers in the concert to be given at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon, March 15. At the Thursday concert on March 13 of this, the last visit but one of the season by the Boston Orchestra, the organization will present a Wagnerian program with Margarete Matzenauer as soloist. The Saturday concert will include, besides Stravinsky's score, Schumann's Fourth Symphony and Haydn's 'cello concerto, with Jean Bedetti as soloist. The Thursday program will include the "Meistersinger" Prelude, Isolde's Narrative from the first act of "Tristan und Isolde," the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," and Brunnhilde's "Immolation Scene" from "Gotterdammerung."

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
EAGLE

1924

Boston Symphony.

With Margaret Matzenauer as soloist in a program consisting entirely of Wagnerian excerpts, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fourth concert of the season in the Academy of Music a week from Friday evening, March 14. It will be the last appearance but one of Pierre Monteux, the French conductor, at the head of the orchestra here.

Mme. Matzenauer is known for her Wagnerian impersonations at the Metropolitan Opera House, where she has sung continuously since she came to this country in 1911. Her Wagnerian roles include Isolde, Frangaene, Kundry, Ortrud, Brunnhilde, and Venus in "Tannhauser." Scenes from two of these roles she will sing with the orchestra, namely, Isolde's Narrative in the first act of Wagner's love drama and the final immolation scene of Brunnhilde from "The Dusk of the Gods."

Pierre Monteux and the orchestra will also play the prelude to "The Mastersingers." A "Siegfried" Idyll, The Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," the Ride of the Valkyries from "The Valkyrie," and the Forest Murmurs from the second act of "Siegfried."

ton gave h
brary

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

LAWRENCE
MASS.

FEB 1924

shua Hilton and Mrs. Ralph

Boston Symphony to Play

The Boston Symphony Ensemble will play the second concert in the Phillips Academy chapel at eight o'clock this evening. One of the numbers will be Haydn's "Farewell Symphony" which the ensemble will play after the manner of its original performance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

Chr

FEB 16 1924

Can

FIFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT

The fifth in the regular series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Sanders theatre was given on Thursday evening of last week. The orchestral numbers included Brahms' third symphony in F, and the tone poem "Death and Transfiguration" by Richard Strauss, Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist of the orchestra, was the soloist and he played Saint-Saens' concerto in A minor for violoncello and orchestra.

The time was, and not so many years ago, that one felt more or less impelled to write a somewhat lengthy account when either the Brahms symphony or the Strauss tone poem was given at these concerts, for both these works were comparatively new and neither of them greatly understood or admired excepting by the few. Today, however, both these orchestral works have become standard in the modern repertory and are understood so well as to make extended comment unnecessary. Mr. Monteux gave to the Brahms symphony just the sort of interpretation to bring out the many characteristics of the work that led many at one time to consider the third, the best of the four symphonies that Brahms wrote. However this may be, no one will question that the performance at this concert was highly satisfactory in every respect. And it was so with the "Death and Transfiguration," a work that was severely criticized when first heard nearly thirty years or more ago, and even today, the work is not so well appreciated as many others of the Strauss output. It may not be his best work in the larger form, but it has its impressive moments, brought out by an especially strong performance.

Mr. Bedetti is a master of his instruments, as all fully recognize and he gave a most brilliant and authoritative performance of a work, grateful to the ear and not too long; two desirable points in a 'cello concerto, most of them being not over interesting at the best. Mr. Bedetti was loudly applauded and recalled at the close of the performance.

The sixth concert in the series will be given on Thursday evening, February 28. Vera Janacopulos, soprano, will be

H. I. STORER.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PROVIDENCE,
R. I.
NEWS

231924

CAROL ROBINSON TO BE SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

The fourth concert of the Providence season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in Infantry hall next Tuesday evening at 8:15. This, of course, will be the last appearance but one of Pierre Monteaux, the great French conductor, in this city.

The soloist of the occasion will be Carol Robinson, the highly talented young American pianist, who, as a virtuoso and as a composer as well, has attracted much attention in recent seasons. She has given conspicuously successful recitals in Chicago, New York and other cities. The score in which she is to appear with this orchestra is the ever-popular pianoforte concerto of Tchaikowsky is B-flat.

The symphony will be that in C-major, entitled "Jupiter," by Mozart, which is sometimes called the greatest work of this master. The closing number will be Charpentier's colorful and descriptive score "Impressions of Italy," which was composed under the direct influence of the sights and sounds of Italy during this musician's first sojourn there when enjoying his Prix de Rome scholarship. The first number, the "Serenade," is notable for a viola solo played off stage, which gives the illusion of distance. This part will be taken by George Fourel, the virtuoso of the orchestra. The other movements include "On Muleback," which is a celebrated canzone of the Italian muleteers; "On the Summits" (a far landscape) and "Naples," a particularly close characterization.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PROVIDENCE
RHODE ISLAND
BULLETIN

FEB 23 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY COMING TO PROVIDENCE TUESDAY

Programme Will be Under Direction of Pierre Monteux.

The fourth concert of the Providence season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening at 8:15 o'clock. This will be the last appearance but one of Pierre Monteux, the great French conductor, in this city.

The soloist of the occasion will be Carol Robinson, young American pianist, who, as a virtuoso and as a composer as well, has attracted much attention in recent seasons. She has given conspicuously successful recitals in Chicago, New York and other cities. The score in which she is to appear with this orchestra is the ever-popular pianoforte concerto of Tchaikovsky in B-flat.

The symphony will be that in C-major, entitled "Jupiter," by Mozart, which is sometimes called the greatest work of this master. The closing number will be Charpentier's colorful and descriptive score, "Impressions of Italy," which was composed under the direct influence of the sights and sounds of Italy during this musician's first sojourn there, when enjoying his Prix de Rome scholarship. The first number, the "Serenade," is notable for a viola solo played off stage, which gives the illusion of distance. This part will be taken by Georges Fourel, the virtuoso of the orchestra. The other movements include: "On Muleback," which is a celebrated canzone of the Italian muleteers; "On the Summits" (a far landscape), and "Naples," a particularly close characterization.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK
HERALD

FEB 24 1924

To Repeat "Rite of Spring."

It is announced in Boston that "since requests have come in number to Mr. Monteux for a repetition at the symphony concerts of Stravinsky's tone poem, "The Rite of Spring," he has definitely decided to play the piece again in both Boston and New York. In Boston it will be heard anew at a pair of concerts in April, while in New York, during the same month, it will reappear at a Saturday matinee. Of all the notable new pieces that Mr. Monteux has undertaken through five years as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, none has so stirred its public in both cities."

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK,
N. Y.
TIMES

1924

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra played Debussy's "Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian," the opinion was expressed that it lost something by its translation from the theatre to the platform. On the other hand, The Boston Transcript says that the transference was justified by its undeniable beauty.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

CLARKSBURG
W. VA.

Exponent

ISSUE OF

FEB 29 1924

Pierre Monteux, now finishing a four year term with the Boston Symphony, is a conductor of elasticity and variety. Sinclair says he has found hearings for more composers than any three of his colleagues. He has a better ear than any conductor except Mengelberg and his limitations proceed from the fact that he cares more for the music than for the performance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PROVIDENCE
RHODE ISLAND
BULLETIN

FEB 27 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HEARD BY BIG AUDIENCE

A symphony, an orchestral suite and a piano concerto were played last evening at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fourth concert in Infantry Hall. Although containing but three numbers the programme was much longer than usual, a fact not in the least disturbing to the big audience, for the concert proved one of sustained interest. Not only in the choice of compositions but in performance and in the success of an extremely talented American artist as soloist the orchestra's fourth visit may be said to measure up to the highest artistic standards attained during the present season.

M. Monteux, as usual, led his men with the musicianship, the taste and the sure control that inevitably bring artistic results. The symphony was notably smooth in technical detail and the original and brilliantly orchestrated Charpentier "Impressions of Italy," while revealing one or two slight lapses from perfect ensemble on the part of the 'cello section, as a whole made a delightful finale to the well balanced programme.

It is always pleasant to witness the success of a young American artist and Carol Robinson's appearance as soloist brought much pleasure to her hearers. Her playing of the big Tschaikowsky concerto, was, in fact, a noteworthy performance and spoke volumes for her natural musical gifts and her purely American training.

The programme follows:

Mozart......Symphony in C major, "Jupiter"
  Allegro vivace.
  Andante cantabile.
  Menuetto: Allegretto; Trio.
  Finale: Allegro molto.
Tchaikowsky...Concerto for Pianoforte No. 1, in B-flat minor, Op. 23
  Andante non troppo e molto maestoso: Allegro con spirito.
  Andantino semplice: Allegro vivace assai.
  Allegro con fuoco.
Charpentier............"Impressions of Italy," Orchestral Suite
  Serenade.
  On Muleback.
  On the Summits.
  Naples.

When one tires of modern musical fare or of that which by complexity of structure taxes the mind it is well to return to Mozart and drink from the pure spring of his genius. In the "Jubiter" symphony we find all the freshness and spontaneity so characteristic of his writings. It is music noble in its majestic sweep and freedom, music that speaks intimately of the beauty of nature, music which touches the heart. There is strength in the fine opening allegro and the andante cantabile sings of tranquillity and rest. In this latter movement one easily might visualize Mozart at his pleasant task of composition. At some point of vantage he meditates upon a summer landscape, sun bathed and beautiful. The serenity, the peace that comes with such close communion with nature is to him music. Truthfully he traces in musical language the feelings inspired by the scene outspread before him and the impressions are made permanent for the enjoyment of all.

The entire symphony, under M. Monteux's baton, was performed with fitting understanding and artistry. At the close the conductor responded several times to tremendous and deserved applause.

In his orchestra suite, "Impressions of Italy," Charpentier is successful in creating the desired atmosphere. It is descriptive music of ingenius design and color and without the aid of programme notes would stir the Italian pulse. The orchestration is admirably suggestive of the several scenes and the characteristic rythms and melodies are used in striking and effective manner. A viola solo off stage is one of the devices introduced. The last movement, "Naples," depicts the joyous life of that city. It is a very brilliant finale of considerable length.

The appearance of Carol Rohinson introduced a young player of conspicuous talent. Tall and slight but with abundant physical strength she sits at the piano and accomplishes with ease the grand effects on the Tschaikowsky concerto.

Her technique is well developed; it is clear and dependable, and to this requisite foundation she adds fine musical qualities. The concerto is a good vehicle for the display of a 's ability both as technician and musician. The orchestra is given a part in the score of greater significance and merit than is frequently seen in concertos for pianoforte with orchestral accompaniment. M. Monteux gave an excellent performance with his assisting musicians and at the concerto's close the entire orchestra joined in the ovation accorded the young artist.

A. F. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

HERALD

FEB 2 - 1924

By Boston Symphony.

At the Thursday concert on March 13 of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux will present a Wagnerian program with Margaret Matzenauer as soloist. The program for the Saturday concert will have Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps," Shumann's Fourth Symphony and Haydn's cello concerto, with Jean Bedetti as soloist.

for his

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

BOSTON,
MASS.

Christian Science Monitor

MA

Seventeenth Program of Boston Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, gave its seventeenth concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program:

Mendelssohn, Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream."
Leginska, Two short pieces for orchestra.
Ravel, "Schéhérazade," Three Poems for Voice and Orchestra.
Scriabin, Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem."

Mme. Vera Janacopulos was the singer.

Miss Leginska's two short pieces for orchestra were played for the first time. The composer, having achieved a certain position as a virtuoso pianist, is now desirous, it would appear, of becoming a composer; and it is an indisputable fact that she possesses a gift for composition. This natural gift, slender though it may be, she has taken the trouble to cultivate carefully, and has succeeded in acquiring a respectable amount of technic. These two short pieces for orchestra show perhaps more promise than actual achievement; yet they contain here and there measures of real beauty, adroitly expressed, and withal they evidence a restrait and conciseness which are encouraging, particularly coming from Miss Leginska, who as a pianist is at times given to exaggeration and overemphasis.

For once a singer seemed an essential part of a symphony program. Too often does an operatic aria, torn from its natural surroundings, disturb the continuity of the afternoon's music, or should the singer chance to sing nonoperatic music, too often are we regaled with music originally conceived for the intimacies of a smaller concert room and an accompaniment expanded from a pianoforte version into an almost unrecognizable one for orchestra. Unfortunately, compositions for voice and orchestra, like these three poems by Ravel, are few and not to be come upon every day in the year, and unfortunately, also, singers of the quality of Mme. Janacopulos to sing them are even rarer. Set to gorgeously colorful verses of Tristan Klingsor, the music aptly reflects their character; nor does it at any time seem an unnecessary adjunct to the poetry, which is of itself so full of music that only a master hand could have successfully accomplished the task of setting it without robbing it of its beauty. No better example of the perfect union of poetry and music can perhaps be found in the whole literature.

Of the music itself (and it is difficult to consider it apart from the words) the most striking feature is undoubtedly the orchestration, which is brilliant without being obtrusive and which betrays the master's touch in every measure. A composer of lesser genius than Ravel might have over emphasized the Oriental character of the music and indulged in a riot of exoticism. Imagine a Richard Strauss, for example, turned loose in this garden of Eastern imagery. Not so Ravel, in whose music and orchestration the French sense of taste is ever present. This music interpreted by Mme. Janacopulos and Mr. Monteux with as complete understanding as could be desired—an interpretation worthy of the music; greater praise than this may not be given.

The program ended with Scriabin's "Divine Poem," a tedious composition betraying the influence of Wagner, Liszt and Tschaikowsky in every measure. It is a symphony full of tiresome repetitions. Some musical ideas of sufficient interest to bear repetition, but in vain are they to be searched for in this music of Scriabin, bombastic and inflated.

The program began with a performance of Mendelssohn's somewhat smug, "Midsummer Night's Dream" Overture.

S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
EAGLE

12-1924

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" made so deep an impression when Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra introduced it here at their last Thursday evening concert, that it will be repeated for the benefit of the Saturday subscribers in the concert to be given at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon, March 15. At the Thursday concert on March 13 of this, the last visit but one of the season by the Boston Orchestra, the organization will present a Wagnerian program with Margarete Matzenauer as soloist. The Saturday concert will include, besides Stravinsky's score, Schumann's Fourth Symphony and Haydn's 'cello concerto, with Jean Bedetti as soloist. The Thursday program will include the "Meistersinger" Prelude, Isolde's Narrative from the first act of "Tristan und Isolde," the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," and Brunnhilde's "Immolation Scene" from "Gotterdammerung."

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
EAGLE

1924

Boston Symphony.

With Margaret Matzenauer as soloist in a program consisting entirely of Wagnerian excerpts, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fourth concert of the season in the Academy of Music a week from Friday evening, March 14. This will be the last appearance but one of Pierre Monteux, the French conductor, at the head of the orchestra here.

Mme. Matzenauer is known for her Wagnerian impersonations at the Metropolitan Opera House, where she has sung continuously since she came to this country in 1911. Her Wagnerian roles include Isolde, Brangaene, Kundry, Ortrud, Brunnhilde, and Venus in "Tannhauser." Scenes from two of these roles she will sing with the orchestra, namely, Isolde's Narrative in the first act of Wagner's love drama, and the final immolation scene of Brunnhilde from "The Dusk of the Gods."

Pierre Monteux and the orchestra will also play the prelude to "The Mastersingers." A "Siegfried" Idyll, The Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," the Ride of the Valkyries from "The Valkyrie," and the Forest Murmurs from the second act of "Siegfried."

ton gave hi
brary

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LAWRENCE
MASS.
FEB 1924

shua Hilten and Mrs. Ralph

Boston Symphony to Play

The Boston Symphony Ensemble will play the second concert in the Phillips Academy chapel at eight o'clock this evening. One of the numbers will be Haydn's "Farewell Symphony" which the ensemble will play after the manner of its original performance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
FEB 16 1924

FIFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT

The fifth in the regular series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestr in Sanders theatre was given on Thursday evening of last week. The orchestral numbers included Brahms' third symphony in F, and the tone poem "Death and Transfiguration" by Richard Strauss, Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist of the orchestra, was the soloist and he played Saint-Saens' concerto in A minor for violoncello and orchestra.

The time was, and not so many year ago, that one felt more or less impelled to write a somewhat lengthy account when either the Brahms symphony or the Strauss tone poem was given at these concerts, for both these works were comparatively new and neither of them greatly understood or admired excepting by the few. Today, however, both these orchestral works have become standard in the modern repertory and are understood so well as to make extended comment unnecessary. Mr. Monteux gave to the Brahms symphony just the sort of interpretation to bring out the many characteristics of the work that led many at one time to consider the third, the best of the four symphonies that Brahms wrote. However this may be, no one will question that the performance at this concert was highly satisfactory in every respect. And it was so with the "Death and Transfiguration," a work that was severely criticized when first heard nearly thirty years or more ago, and even today, the work is not so well appreciated as many others of the Strauss output. It may not be his best work in the larger form, but it has its impressive moments, brought out by an especially strong performance.

Mr. Bedetti is a master of his instruments, as all fully recognize and he gave a most brilliant and authoritative performance of a work, grateful to the ear and not too long; two desirable points in a 'cello concerto, most of them being not over interesting at the best. Mr. Bedetti was loudly applauded and recalled at the close of the performance.

The sixth concert in the series wil be given on Thursday evening, Februar 28. Vera Janacopulos, soprano, will b [illegible] H. L. STORER.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE,
R. I.
NEWS
FEB 23 1924

CAROL ROBINSON TO BE SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

The fourth concert of the Providence season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in Infantry hall next Tuesday evening at 8:15. This, of course, will be the last appearance but one of Pierre Monteaux, the great French conductor, in this city.

The soloist of the occasion will be Carol Robinson, the highly talented young American pianist, who, as a virtuoso and as a composer as well, has attracted much attention in recent seasons. She has given conspicuously successful recitals in Chicago, New York and other cities. The score in which she is to appear with this orchestra is the ever-popular pianoforte concerto of Tchaikowsky in B-flat.

The symphony will be that in C-major, entitled "Jupiter," by Mozart, which is sometimes called the greatest work of this master. The closing number will be Charpentier's colorful and descriptive score "Impressions of Italy," which was composed under the direct influence of the sights and sounds of Italy during this musician's first sojourn there when enjoying his Prix de Rome scholarship. The first number, the "Serenade," is notable for a viola solo played off stage, which gives the illusion of distance. This part will be taken by George Fourel, the virtuoso of the orchestra. The other movements include "On Muleback," which is a celebrated canzone of the Italian muleteers: "On the Summits" (a far landscape) and "Naples," a particularly close characterization.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE
RHODE ISLAND
BULLETIN
FEB 23 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY COMING TO PROVIDENCE TUESDAY

Programme Will be Under Direction of Pierre Monteux.

The fourth concert of the Providence season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening at 8:15 o'clock. This will be the last appearance but one of Pierre Monteux, the great French conductor, in this city.

The soloist of the occasion will be Carol Robinson, young American pianist, who, as a virtuoso and as a composer as well, has attracted much attention in recent seasons. She has given conspicuously successful recitals in Chicago, New York and other cities. The score in which she is to appear with this orchestra is the ever-popular pianoforte concerto of Tchaikovsky in B-flat.

The symphony will be that in C-major, entitled "Jupiter," by Mozart, which is sometimes called the greatest work of this master. The closing number will be Charpentier's colorful and descriptive score, "Impressions of Italy," which was composed under the direct influence of the sights and sounds of Italy during this musician's first sojourn there, when enjoying his Prix de Rome scholarship. The first number, the "Serenade," is notable for a viola solo played off stage, which gives the illusion of distance. This part will be taken by Georges Fourel, the virtuoso of the orchestra. The other movements include: "On Muleback," which is a celebrated canzone of the Italian muleteers; "On the Summits" (a far landscape), and "Naples," a particularly close characterization.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD
FEB 24 1924

To Repeat "Rite of Spring."

It is announced in Boston that "since requests have come in number to Mr. Monteux for a repetition at the symphony concerts of Stravinsky's tone poem, "The Rite of Spring," he has definitely decided to play the piece again in both Boston and New York. In Boston it will be heard anew at a pair of concerts in April, while in New York, during the same month, it will reappear at a Saturday matinee. Of all the notable new pieces that Mr. Monteux has undertaken through five years as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, none has so stirred its public in both cities."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK,
N. Y.
TIMES
FEB 24 1924

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra played Debussy's "Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian," the opinion was expressed that it lost something by its translation from the theatre to the platform. On the other hand, The Boston Transcript says that the transference was justified by its undeniable beauty.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE CLARKSBURG
W. VA.
ISSUE OF
FEB 29 1924

Pierre Monteux, now finishing a four year term with the Boston Symphony, is a conductor of elasticity and variety. Sinclair says he has found hearings for more composers than any three of his colleagues. He has a better ear than any conductor except Mengelberg and his limitations proceed from the fact that he cares more for the music than for the performance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE
RHODE ISLAND
BULLETIN
FEB 27 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HEARD BY BIG AUDIENCE

A symphony, an orchestral suite and a piano concerto were played last evening at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fourth concert in Infantry Hall. Although containing but three numbers the programme was much longer than usual, a fact not in the least disturbing to the big audience, for the concert proved one of sustained interest. Not only in the choice of compositions but in performance and in the success of an extremely talented American artist as soloist the orchestra's fourth visit may be said to measure up to the highest artistic standards attained during the present season.

M. Monteux, as usual, led his men with the musicianship, the taste and the sure control that inevitably bring artistic results. The symphony was notably smooth in technical detail and the original and brilliantly orchestrated Charpentier "Impressions of Italy," while revealing one or two slight lapses from perfect ensemble on the part of the 'cello section, as a whole made a delightful finale to the well balanced programme.

It is always pleasant to witness the success of a young American artist and Carol Robinson's appearance as soloist brought much pleasure to her hearers. Her playing of the big Tschaikowsky concerto, was, in fact, a noteworthy performance and spoke volumes for her natural musical gifts and her purely American training.

The programme follows:

Mozart......Symphony in C major, "Jupiter"
  Allegro vivace.
  Andante cantabile.
  Menuetto: Allegretto; Trio.
  Finale: Allegro molto.
Tchaikowsky...Concerto for Pianoforte No. 1, in B-flat minor, Op. 23
  Andante non troppo e molto maestoso: Allegro con spirito.
  Andantino semplice: Allegro vivace assai.
  Allegro con fuoco.
Charpentier............"Impressions of Italy," Orchestral Suite
  Serenade.
  On Muleback.
  On the Summits.
  Naples.

When one tires of modern musical fare or of that which by complexity of structure taxes the mind it is well to return to Mozart and drink from the pure spring of his genius. In the "Jubiter" symphony we find all the freshness and spontaneity so characteristic of his writings. It is music noble in its majestic sweep and freedom, music that speaks intimately of the beauty of nature, music which touches the heart. There is strength in the fine opening allegro and the andante cantabile sings of tranquillity and rest. In this latter movement one easily might visualize Mozart at his pleasant task of composition. At some point of vantage he meditates upon a summer landscape, sun bathed and beautiful. The serenity, the peace that comes with such close communion with nature is to him music. Truthfully he traces in musical language the feelings inspired by the scene outspread before him and the impressions are made permanent for the enjoyment of all.

The entire symphony, under M. Monteux's baton, was performed with fitting understanding and artistry. At the close the conductor responded several times to tremendous and deserved applause.

In his orchestra suite, "Impressions of Italy," Charpentier is successful in creating the desired atmosphere. It is descriptive music of ingenius design and color and without the aid of programme notes would stir the Italian pulse. The orchestration is admirably suggestive of the several scenes and the characteristic rythms and melodies are used in striking and effective manner. A viola solo off stage is one of the devices introduced. The last movement, "Naples," depicts the joyous life of that city. It is a very brilliant finale of considerable length.

The appearance of Carol Rohinson introduced a young player of conspicuous talent. Tall and slight but with abundant physical strength she sits at the piano and accomplishes with ease the grand effects on the Tschaikowsky concerto.

Her technique is well developed; it is clear and dependable, and to this requisite foundation she adds fine musical qualities. The concerto is a good vehicle for the display of a [illegible]'s ability both as technician and musician. The orchestra is given a part in the score of greater significance and merit than is frequently seen in concertos for pianoforte with orchestral accompaniment. M. Monteux gave an excellent performance with his assisting musicians and at the concerto's close the entire orchestra joined in the ovation accorded the young artist.

A. F. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
HERALD
FEB 2 - 1924

By Boston Symphony.

At the Thursday concert on March 13 of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux will present a Wagnerian program with Margaret Matzenauer as soloist. The program for the Saturday concert will have Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps," Shumann's Fourth Symphony and Haydn's cello concerto, with Jean Bedetti as soloist.

for his

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BOSTON,
MASS.
Christian Science Monitor
MA

Seventeenth Program of Boston Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, gave its seventeenth concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program:

Mendelssohn, Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream."
Leginska, Two short pieces for orchestra.
Ravel, "Schéhérazade," Three Poems for Voice and Orchestra.
Scriabin, Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem."

Mme. Vera Janacopulos was the singer.

Miss Leginska's two short pieces for orchestra were played for the first time. The composer, having achieved a certain position as a virtuoso pianist, is now desirous, it would appear, of becoming a composer; and it is an indisputable fact that she possesses a gift for composition. This natural gift, slender though it may be, she has taken the trouble to cultivate carefully, and has succeeded in acquiring a respectable amount of technic. These two short pieces for orchestra show perhaps more promise than actual achievement; yet they contain here and there measures of real beauty, adroitly expressed, and withal they evidence a restrait and conciseness which are encouraging, particularly coming from Miss Leginska, who as a pianist is at times given to exaggeration and overemphasis.

For once a singer seemed an essential part of a symphony program. Too often does an operatic aria, torn from its natural surroundings, disturb the continuity of the afternoon's music, or should the singer chance to sing non-operatic music, too often are we regaled with music originally conceived for the intimacies of a smaller concert room and an accompaniment expanded from a pianoforte version into an almost unrecognizable one for orchestra. Unfortunately, compositions for voice and orchestra, like these three poems by Ravel, are few and not to be come upon every day in the year, and unfortunately, also, singers of the quality of Mme. Janacopulos to sing them are even rarer. Set to gorgeously colorful verses of Tristan Klingsor, the music aptly reflects their character; nor does it at any time seem an unnecessary adjunct to the poetry, which is of itself so full of music that only a master hand could have successfully accomplished the task of setting it without robbing it of its beauty. No better example of the perfect union of poetry and music can perhaps be found in the whole literature.

Of the music itself (and it is difficult to consider it apart from the words) the most striking feature is undoubtedly the orchestration, which is brilliant without being obtrusive and which betrays the master's touch in every measure. A composer of lesser genius than Ravel might have over emphasized the Oriental character of the music and indulged in a riot of exoticism. Imagine a Richard Strauss, for example, turned loose in this garden of Eastern imagery. Not so Ravel, in whose music and orchestration the French sense of taste is ever present. This music interpreted by Mme. Janacopulos Mr. Monteux with as complete an derstanding as could be desired—a terpretation worthy of the music, greater praise than this may n given.

The program ended with Scria "Divine Poem," a tedious compos betraying the influence of Wa Liszt and Tschaikowsky in every m ure. It is a symphony full of tires repetitions. Some musical ideas of sufficient interest to bear repeti but in vain are they to be searched in this music of Scriabin, bombastic inflated.

The program began with a performance of Mendelssohn's somewhat smug, "Midsummer Nig Dream" Overture.

S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
EAGLE
MAR 2 - 1924

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" made so deep an impression when Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra introduced it here at their last Thursday evening concert, that it will be repeated f the benefit of the Saturday su scribers in the concert to be give at Carnegie Hall on Saturday after noon, March 15. At the Thursda concert on March 13 of this, the la visit but one of the season by t Boston Orchestra, the organizati will present a Wagnerian progra with Margarete Matzenauer soloist. The Saturday concert include, besides Stravinsky's so Schumann's Fourth Symphony Haydn's 'cello concerto, with J Bedetti as soloist. The Thurs program will include the "Meist singer" Prelude, Isolde's Narra tive from the first act of "Tr und Isolde," the Bacchanale "Tannhauser," and Brunnhil "Immolation Scene" from "Got dammerung."

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
EAGLE 1924

Boston Symphony.

With Margaret Matzenauer soloist in a program consisting tirely of Wagnerian excerpts, Boston Symphony Orchestra give its fourth concert of the sea in the Academy of Music a w from Friday evening, March 14. is will be the last appearance but e of Pierre Monteux, the French ductor, at the head of the orchea here.

Mme. Matzenauer is known her Wagnerian impersonations the Metropolitan Opera Hous where she has sung continuou since she came to this country 1911. Her Wagnerian roles includ Isolde, Brangaene, Kundry, Ortru Brunnhilde, and Venus in "Tannhauser." Scenes from two of these roles she will sing with the orchestra, namely, Isolde's Narrative in the first act of Wagner's love drama, and the final immolation scene of Brunnhilde from "The Dusk of the Gods."

Pierre Monteux and the orchestra will also play the prelude to "The Mastersingers," A "Siegfried" Idyll, Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," te of the Valkyries from "The ave," and the Forest Murmurs second act of "Siegfried."

NEW YORK,
N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 2 - 1924

LOCAL CONCERT HORIZON.

The Smetana Centennial Committee will hold a concert of the Czech composer's music next Sunday at the Town Hall.

Ernest Schelling is next Sunday's soloist with the Philharmonic in Carnegie Hall. Mengelberg will conduct Beethoven's fifth symphony.

Bruno Walter takes his leave of the New York Symphony Society at Aeolian Hall next Sunday in the "Scotch" symphony of Mendelssohn.

Gabrilowitsch plays a Mozart concerto and Bodanzky leads Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony next Sunday for the Friends of Music.

Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" is reannounced here by Monteux and the Boston Orchestra on Saturday, March 15.

DETROIT
MICHIGAN
FREE PRESS
MAR 2 1924

A Worried Musician.

Professor Schneevoight, of Stockholm, who came to this country recently as a guest conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is somewhat distressed by a fear that the radio will make serious inroads on the incomes of musical artists. If one artist can sing to everybody, he inquires, what need will there be for many artists singing to separate audiences?

Time will show whether the radio should be a cause for worry in the breasts of musicians, but while they are waiting for the verdict of experience, they can reassure themselves by recallng the fact that the phonograph once perturbed their souls in a similar way. What will becom eof us, said the vocalists, the pianists and the violinists when anybody can hear the very best in our line while sitting in his own parlor? The time has come when all of the great living musical artists and some of the immortal dead will play or sing anywhere for anybody who is willing to wind up the machine, but the concert halls still overflow. The phonograph has been an advertisement for artists rather than a rival and the radio may work the same way.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN
MAR 2 - 1924

Matzenauer to Appear With Boston Orchestra

With Margaret Matzenauer as soloist in a program consisting entirely of Warnerian excerpts, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fourth concert of the season in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, March 14. In two of her roles she will sing with the orchestra, namely, in the scene of Isolde's Narrative in the first act of Wargner's great love drama, and the final immolation scene of Brunhilde from "The Duck of the Gods."

Pierre Monteux and the orchestra will also perform the Prelude to "The Mastersingers," a Siegfried idylle, The Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," the Ride of the Valkyries from "The Valkyries," and the Forest Murmurs from the second act of "Siegfried."

OTTAWA
CANADA
Citizen
ISSUE OF Mar 1 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA COMING.

It is announced that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the unique musical product of New England which is ranked with the very finest of the world's orchestras is to visit Canada in April and give a concert here. The musicians of the orchestra which exceeds 100 in number, will make the long journey for this and two other concerts, in Montreal and Quebec. The Ottawa concert will be given in the new Auditorium on Monday evening, April 21st.

The event will have especial interest in that the present season of the orchestra is the last under Pierre Monteux, the great French conductor. This celebrity is now completing his five-year period at its head and, since he is expected to return to France in the spring, this may be the last opportunity of t' is city to observe his remarkable conducting.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is now in its forty-third year and behind it lies a long history of supreme achievement and numerous honors. In his fifth season, Pierre Monteux has added a new chapter to this history which challenges comparison with the best of seasons in the past. He has won new glories in the matter of ensemble, beauty of tone, and eloquence of interpretation. The departure of this genius will be much regretted.

JASCHA HEIFETZ COMING.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

HENRY ROMEIKE,
106 110 Seventh Ave., N. Y. City
CABLE ADDRESS
"ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
NEW Y
The First Established and Most Complet
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the Wor

From TRIBUNE
Address New York City
Date MAR 2 - 1924

State Symphony Ends First Season; Orchestral Events

Mme. Jeritza Soloist With Stransky; Philharmonic Announces New Work by Gallico; Visits of Philadelphia and Boston Bands

The State Symphony Orchestra will close its first subscription season with this afternoon's concert at the Metropolitan Opera House, which will also mark the first concert appearance here of Mme. Maria Jeritza. She will sing an aria from Catalani's "La Wally" and songs by Duparc, Grieg and Strauss, with the orchestra under Josef Stransky, who will open his program with the Tchaikovsky Fifth Symphony.

The State Symphony will make a post-season appearance to-morrow night at the New Montauk Theater, in Passaic, N. J., under the auspices of the local Chamber of Commerce. Its first season, counting this afternoon's concert, included nine performances at Carnegie Hall, six at the Metropolitan Opera House, special appearances for soloists at the Century Theater and Aeolian Hall, and five concerts in Brooklyn. Satisfaction with the results of the season has been expressed by the executive of the orchestra, Jacob Altschuler, who has been connected with orchestras here for thirty years.

A new work by a New York composer, Paolo Gallico, whose oratorio "The Apocalypse" was given here in November, 1922, is announced by the Philharmonic Society for its Carnegie Hall concerts next Thursday evening and Friday afternoon. This is "Euphorion," a "Symphonic Episode," based on the Euphorion episode in the second part of Goethe's "Faust." It was composed in 1921 and played for the first time last April, by the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra. Thursday's performance will be the first in New York. The symphony will be the Dvorak "New World," which will also be the principal number on Mr. Mengelberg's Brooklyn program this afternoon, with Dusolina Giannini as soloist in a Weber aria. Percy Grainger will be the soloist Tuesday night at the Metropolitan Opera House in the Grieg concerto, with the Tchaikovsky "Pathetic" as the symphony of the evening.

Ernest Schelling will be the soloist with the Philharmonic next Sunday afternoon, in a program including the Beethoven Fifth Symphony.

Richard Strauss's suite from his incidental music to Moliere's "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" (Der Burger als Edelmann) will open Bruno Walter's program for the New York Symphony Orchestra this afternoon at Aeolian Hall, with Gustave Tinlot, the concertmaster, as soloist in Rimsky-Korsakoff's concert fantasy on Russian Themes for violin and orchestra. Mr. Walter will give his last pair of Carnegie Hall concerts this season next Thursday afternoon and Friday evening, with Moriz Rosenthal as soloist in the Liszt E flat major piano concerto, and the Brahms second symphony as the principal purely orchestral number. Mr. Walter's last appearance of the season here with the New York Symphony will be next Sunday afternoon at Aeolian Hall, with a program including Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony.

The Philadelphia Orchestra and Mendelssohn Choir of Toronto will be heard here next Tuesday and Wednesday at Carnegie Hall. On Tuesday three à cappella numbers by the choir, under H. A. Fricker, will precede Beethoven's Ninth Symphony under the baton of Leopold Stokowski. Mr. Fricker will conduct on Wednesday with four excerpts from Bach's B minor Mass as the principal feature. There will also be numbers by Palestrina, Purcell, Benet, Stanford, O'Hara, Borodin; choruses by Holst for women's voices alone and by Fletcher and Dvorak for men's voices.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, will give its fourth pair of Carnegie Hall concerts next week. A Wagner program, with Margaret Matzenauer as soloist in Isolde's Narrative from Act I of "Tristan und Isolde" and the finals of "Götterdämmerung" will be given at Carnegie Hall on Thursday, March 13, and the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Friday evening, with the Siegfried Idyll and excerpts from "Die Meistersinger," "Tannhäuser," "Die Walküre" and "Siegfried."

Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps," owing to the impression it made at the Boston Symphony's last Thursday night concert at Carnegie Hall, will be repeated Saturday afternoon, March 15, for the benefit of the Saturday subscribers. It will be preceded by the Fourth Symphony of Schumann and Haydn's cello concerto, with Jean Bedetti, the orchestra's solo cellist, as soloist.

MUSICAL INSTRUCTION MUSICAL INSTRUCTION

Trans March 7

ents and Prospects

er its concert in Symphony Hall next ay evening, the Symphony Orchestra eys southward. Not until Friday and rday, March 21 and 22 will it again eard in Boston. For these concerts Monteux announces a long overlooked phony of Haydn in C major; Beethoven's Concerto for Violin with Mr. Flesch to play the solo-part; a second and novel Suite of "Stevensoniana" by Mr. Edward Burlingame Hill; the Ride of Wagner's Valkyrs.

Not a few will recall agreeably Mr. Hill's first Suite suggested by verses of Stevenson in "A Child's Garden"—music bright with humor and fancy, invented lightly, put to paper aptly and freshly. The second Suite becomingly companions it, with "Armies in the Fire," "The Dumb Soldier" and the "Pirate Song" for background and text. And an American composer who can write light music seriously is among the rarest of singing birds.

Even so, that composer is no favored child of fortune. Where has Mr. Hill's first "Stevensoniana" been played since it originally went a round of orchestras and audiences to manifold plaudits? Nowhere, unless it is his pleasure to correct a memory that may be faulty. In like case stands Mr. Carpenter's "Adventures in a Perambulator," a kindred music unheard in Boston since its first heyday. By this time the earlier "Stevensoniana" should have been a repertory piece; while before he departs Mr. Monteux owes the public the long-promised revival of Mr. Carpenter's music. Light freight is no small need of symphony concerts "from coast to coast"—light freight and, so far as may be an American repertory. H. T. P.

Trans March 5

MONTEUX MEASURED, MODERNISTS MASSED, ROUND OF CONCERTS

THE CONDUCTOR IN THE EARS OF A PLAYER

His Qualities from a Fresh Point of View—Carol Robinson, Pianist, Musters the Bold Bad Composers—Three of the Six, Stravinsky and de Falla in One Fell Swoop—Programmes in Prospect

THE current number of The American Mercury—Mr. Knopf's new magazine, edited by Messrs. Menken and Nathan—contains an article, "Six Orchestral Conducters," signed D. W. Sinclair. According to The Mercury, Mr. Sinclair "is an American musician who has been playing for years in orchestras in New York and elsewhere." As others say, he is in truth such an experienced person writing at first hand; but his true name happens not to be Sinclair. The six conductors traversed are Messrs. Stransky, Hadley and Mengelberg of the Philharmonic Society in New York; Mr. Damrosch of the New York Symphony Orchestra; Mr. Bodanzky in the concert-hall, but not the Metropolitan Opera House; Mr. Monteux of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Among them Mr. Sinclair extols but one—Mr. Mengelberg. With the others he balances merits and defects. Here, for example, are his sayings about Mr. Monteux:

> Pierre Monteux, who is now finishing a four (sic) years' engagement as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, though not an outstanding personage, nevertheless merits the best that can be said of him. And that best may be immediately summarized by stating that Monteux is of that rare type: a conductor of elasticity and variety.
>
> Nothing is more needed in America, where a limited symphonic repertory is being run into the ground year after year. To be sure, the Boston position offers its incumbent carte blanche in the choice of programmes; but even this apparent advantage can be misappropriated, as it was by Henri Rabaud, who, in 1918-1919, produced a nauseating succession of Gallic inconsequentialities. Monteux, however, has not abused his power. For four (sic) years he has given programmes which have put his colleagues to shame and incidentally he has found hearings for more composers than any three of them. He has done this, moreover, in spite of the handicap of having to build up practically a new orchestra. The Boston programme-books of 1918 and 1924 show at least sixty changes from the personnel that existed before the trustees disrupted Dr. Muck's orchestra by expelling its unnaturalized German members in deference to the hysteria of wartime. The trustees were equally purblind in paying such wretched salaries that voluntary resignations and the strike of 1920 took away at least forty more. Monteux, therefore, deserves high credit for his reconstruction of the orchestra.
>
> He is no gilded personage. In fact, he is so quiet and unasuming that he gives an impression of far less ability than he possesses. He has a better ear than any other conductor save

Twice in a Day

A Second Performance of Beethoven's Choral Symphony on March 30

THE expected has happened; but it will lead to the unexpected. Every seat is already taken for the concert in Symphony Hall, on Sunday afternoon, March 30, at which Mr. Monteux and the Symphony Orchestra; a quartet of solo-singers; Dr. Davison, the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society will join voices in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. The call for tickets is still urgent. Accordingly there will be a repetition of the concert in Symphony Hall, on the evening of that same Sunday, March 30. That is to say: Twice in one city, within one day, Beethoven's Choral Symphony will be heard from the same forces. In a hundred years, has it ever anywhere been so repeated?

Amusements

NEW YORK,
N. Y.
TIMES
R 2 - 1924

LOCAL CONCERT HORIZON.

The Smetana Centennial Committee will hold a concert of the Czech composer's music next Sunday at the Town Hall.

Ernest Schelling is next Sunday's soloist with the Philharmonic in Carnegie Hall. Mengelberg will conduct Beethoven's fifth symphony.

Bruno Walter takes his leave of the New York Symphony Society at Aeolian Hall next Sunday in the "Scotch" symphony of Mendelssohn.

Gabrilowitsch plays a Mozart concerto and Bodanzky leads Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony next Sunday for the Friends of Music.

Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" is reannounced here by Monteux and the Boston Orchestra on Saturday, March 15.

DETROIT
MICHIGAN
FREE PRESS
MAR 2 1924

A Worried Musician.

Professor Schneevoight, of Stockholm, who came to this country recently as a guest conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is somewhat distressed by a fear that the radio will make serious inroads on the incomes of musical artists. If one artist can sing to everybody, he inquires, what need will there be for many artists singing to separate audiences?

Time will show whether the radio should be a cause for worry in the breasts of musicians, but while they are waiting for the verdict of experience, they can reassure themselves by recallng the fact that the phonograph once perturbed their souls in a similar way. What will becom eof us, said the vocalists, the pianists and the violinists when anybody can hear the very best in our line while sitting in his own parlor? The time has come when all of the great living musical artists and some of the immortal dead will play or sing anywhere for anybody who is willing to wind up the machine, but the concert halls still overflow. The phonograph has been an advertisement for artists rather than a rival and the radio may work the same way.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN
MAR 2 - 1924

Matzenauer to Appear With Boston Orchestra

With Margaret Matzenauer as soloist in a program consisting entirely of Warnerian excerpts, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fourth concert of the season in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, March 14. In two of her roles she will sing with the orchestra, namely, in the scene of Isolde's Narrative in the first act of Wargner's great love drama, and the final immolation scene of Brunhilde from "The Duck of the Gods."

Pierre Monteux and the orchestra will also perform the Prelude to "The Mastersingers," a Siegfried idylle, The Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," the Ride of the Valkyries from "The Valkyries," and the Forest Murmurs from the second act of "Siegfried."

OTTAWA
CANADA
Citizen
ISSUE OF
Mar
1. 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA COMING.

It is announced that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the unique musical product of New England which is ranked with the very finest of the world's orchestras is to visit Canada in April and give a concert here. The musicians of the orchestra which exceeds 100 in number, will make the long journey for this and two other concerts, in Montreal and Quebec. The Ottawa concert will be given in the new Auditorium on Monday evening, April 21st.

The event will have especial interest in that the present season of the orchestra is the last under Pierre Monteux, the great French conductor. This celebrity is now completing his five-year period at its head and, since he is expected to return to France in the spring, this may be the last opportunity of t' is city to observe his remarkable conducting.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is now in its forty-third year and behind it lies a long history of supreme achievement and numerous honors. In his fifth season, Pierre Monteux has added a new chapter to this history which challenges comparison with the best of seasons in the past. He has won new glories in the matter of ensemble, beauty of tone, and eloquence of interpretation. The departure of this genius will be much regretted.

JASCHA HEIFETZ COMING.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

HENRY ROMEIKE,
106 110 Seventh Ave., N. Y. City
CABLE ADDRESS "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
NEW Y
The First Established and Most Complet
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the Wor

From TRIBUNE
Address New York City
Date MAR 2 - 1924

State Symphony Ends First Season; Orchestral Events

Mme. Jeritza Soloist With Stransky; Philharmonic Announces New Work by Gallico; Visits of Philadelphia and Boston Bands

The State Symphony Orchestra will close its first subscription season with this afternoon's concert at the Metropolitan Opera House, which will also mark the first concert appearance here of Mme. Maria Jeritza. She will sing an aria from Catalani's "La Wally" and songs by Duparc, Grieg and Strauss, with the orchestra under Josef Stransky, who will open his program with the Tchaikovsky Fifth Symphony.

The State Symphony will make a post-season appearance to-morrow night at the New Montauk Theater, in Passaic, N. J., under the auspices of the local Chamber of Commerce. Its first season, counting this afternoon's concert, included nine performances at Carnegie Hall, six at the Metropolitan Opera House, special appearances for soloists at the Century Theater and Aeolian Hall, and five concerts in Brooklyn. Satisfaction with the results of the season has been expressed by the executive of the orchestra, Jacob Altschuler, who has been connected with orchestras here for thirty years.

A new work by a New York composer, Paolo Gallico, whose oratorio "The Apocalypse" was given here in November, 1922, is announced by the Philharmonic Society for its Carnegie Hall concerts next Thursday evening and Friday afternoon. This is "Euphorion," a "Symphonic Episode," based on the Euphorion episode in the second part of Goethe's "Faust." It was composed in 1921 and played for the first time last April, by the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra. Thursday's performance will be the first in New York. The symphony will be the Dvorak "New World," which will also be the principal number on Mr. Mengelberg's Brooklyn program this afternoon, with Dusolina Giannini as soloist in a Weber aria. Percy Grainger will be the soloist Tuesday night at the Metropolitan Opera House in the Grieg concerto, with the Tchaikovsky "Pathetic" as the symphony of the evening.

Ernest Schelling will be the soloist with the Philharmonic next Sunday afternoon, in a program including the Beethoven Fifth Symphony.

Richard Strauss's suite from his incidental music to Moliere's "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" (Der Burger als Edelmann) will open Bruno Walter's program for the New York Symphony Orchestra this afternoon at Aeolian Hall, with Gustave Tinlot, the concertmaster, as soloist in Rimsky-Korsakoff's concert fantasy on Russian Themes for violin and orchestra. Mr. Walter will give his last pair of Carnegie Hall concerts this season next Thursday afternoon and Friday evening, with Moriz Rosenthal as soloist in the Liszt E flat major piano concerto, and the Brahms second symphony as the principal purely orchestral number. Mr. Walter's last appearance of the season here with the New York Symphony will be next Sunday afternoon at Aeolian Hall, with a program including Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony.

The Philadelphia Orchestra and Mendelssohn Choir of Toronto will be heard here next Tuesday and Wednesday at Carnegie Hall. On Tuesday three a cappella numbers by the choir, under H. A. Fricker, will precede Beethoven's Ninth Symphony under the baton of Leopold Stokowski. Mr. Fricker will conduct on Wednesday with four excerpts from Bach's B minor Mass as the principal feature. There will also be numbers by Palestrina, Purcell, Benet, Stanford, O'Hara, Borodin; choruses by Holst for women's voices alone and by Fletcher and Dvorak for men's voices.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, will give its fourth pair of Carnegie Hall concerts next week. A Wagner program, with Margaret Matzenauer as soloist in Isolde's Narrative from Act I of "Tristan und Isolde" and the finals of "Götterdämmerung" will be given at Carnegie Hall on Thursday, March 13, and the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Friday evening, with the Siegfried Idyll and excerpts from "Die Meistersinger," "Tannhäuser," "Die Walküre" and "Siegfried."

Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps," owing to the impression it made at the Boston Symphony's last Thursday night concert at Carnegie Hall, will be repeated Saturday afternoon, March 15, for the benefit of the Saturday subscribers. It will be preceded by the Fourth Symphony of Schumann and Haydn's cello concerto, with Jean Bedetti, the orchestra's solo cellist, as soloist.

MUSICAL INSTRUCTION MUSICAL INSTRUCTION

Trans March 7

ents and Prospects

er its concert in Symphony Hall next ay evening, the Symphony Orchestra eys southward. Not until Friday and rday, March 21 and 22 will it again heard in Boston. For these concerts Monteux announces a long overlooked phony of Haydn in C major; Beethoven's Concerto for Violin with Mr. Flesch to play the solo-part; a second and novel Suite of "Stevensoniana" by Mr. Edward Burlingame Hill; the Ride of Wagner's Valkyrs.

Not a few will recall agreeably Mr. Hill's first Suite suggested by verses of Stevenson in "A Child's Garden"—music bright with humor and fancy, invented lightly, put to paper aptly and freshly. The second Suite becomingly companions it, with "Armies in the Fire," "The Dumb Soldier" and the "Pirate Song" for background and text. And an American composer who can write light music seriously is among the rarest of singing birds.

Even so, that composer is no favored child of fortune. Where has Mr. Hill's first "Stevensoniana" been played since it originally went a round of orchestras and audiences to manifold plaudits? Nowhere, unless it is his pleasure to correct a memory that may be faulty. In like case stands Mr. Carpenter's "Adventures in a Perambulator," a kindred music unheard in Boston since its first heyday. By this time the earlier "Stevensoniana" should have been a repertory piece; while before he departs Mr. Monteux owes the public the long-promised revival of Mr. Carpenter's music. Light freight is no small need of symphony concerts "from coast to coast"—light freight and, so far as may be an American repertory. H. T. P.

Trans March 5

MONTEUX MEASURED, MODERNISTS MASSED, ROUND OF CONCERTS

THE CONDUCTOR IN THE EARS OF A PLAYER

His Qualities from a Fresh Point of View—Carol Robinson, Pianist, Musters the Bold Bad Composers—Three of the Six, Stravinsky and de Falla in One Fell Swoop—Programmes in Prospect

THE current number of The American Mercury—Mr. Knopf's new magazine, edited by Messrs. Menken and Nathan—contains an article, "Six Orchestral Conductors," signed D. W. Sinclair. According to The Mercury, Mr. Sinclair "is an American musician who has been playing for years in orchestras in New York and elsewhere." As others say, he is in truth such an experienced person, writing at first hand; but his true name happens not to be Sinclair. The six conductors traversed are Messrs. Stransky, Hadley and Mengelberg of the Philharmonic Society in New York; Mr. Damrosch of the New York Symphony Orchestra; Mr. Bodanzky in the concert-hall, but not the Metropolitan Opera House; Mr. Monteux of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Among them Mr. Sinclair extols but one—Mr. Mengelberg. With the others he balances merits and defects. Here, for example, are his sayings about Mr. Monteux:

> Pierre Monteux, who is now finishing a four (sic) years' engagement as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, though not an outstanding personage, nevertheless merits the best that can be said of him. And that best may be immediately summarized by stating that Monteux is of that rare type: a conductor of elasticity and variety.
>
> Nothing is more needed in America, where a limited symphonic repertory is being run into the ground year after year. To be sure, the Boston position offers its incumbent carte blanche in the choice of programmes; but even this apparent advantage can be misappropriated, as it was by Henri Rabaud, who, in 1918-1919, produced a nauseating succession of Gallic inconsequentialities. Monteux, however, has not abused his power. For four (sic) years he has given programmes which have put his colleagues to shame and incidentally he has found hearings for more composers than any three of them. He has done this, moreover, in spite of the handicap of having to build up practically a new orchestra. The Boston programme-books of 1918 and 1924 show at least sixty changes from the personnel that existed before the trustees disrupted Dr. Muck's orchestra by expelling its unnaturalized German members in deference to the hysteria of wartime. The trustees were equally purblind in paying such wretched salaries that voluntary resignations and the strike of 1920 took away at least forty more. Monteux, therefore, deserves high credit for his reconstruction of the orchestra.
>
> He is no gilded personage. In fact, he is so quiet and unasuming that he gives an impression of far less ability than he possesses. He has a better ear than any other conductor save

Twice in a Day

A Second Performance of Beethoven's Choral Symphony on March 30

THE expected has happened; but it will lead to the unexpected. Every seat is already taken for the concert in Symphony Hall, on Sunday afternoon, March 30, at which Mr. Monteux and the Symphony Orchestra; a quartet of solo-singers; Dr. Davison, the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society will join voices in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. The call for tickets is still urgent. Accordingly there will be a repetition of the concert in Symphony Hall, on the evening of that same Sunday, March 30. That is to say: Twice in one city, within one day, Beethoven's Choral Symphony will be heard from the same forces. In a hundred years, has it ever anywhere been so repeated?

Amusements

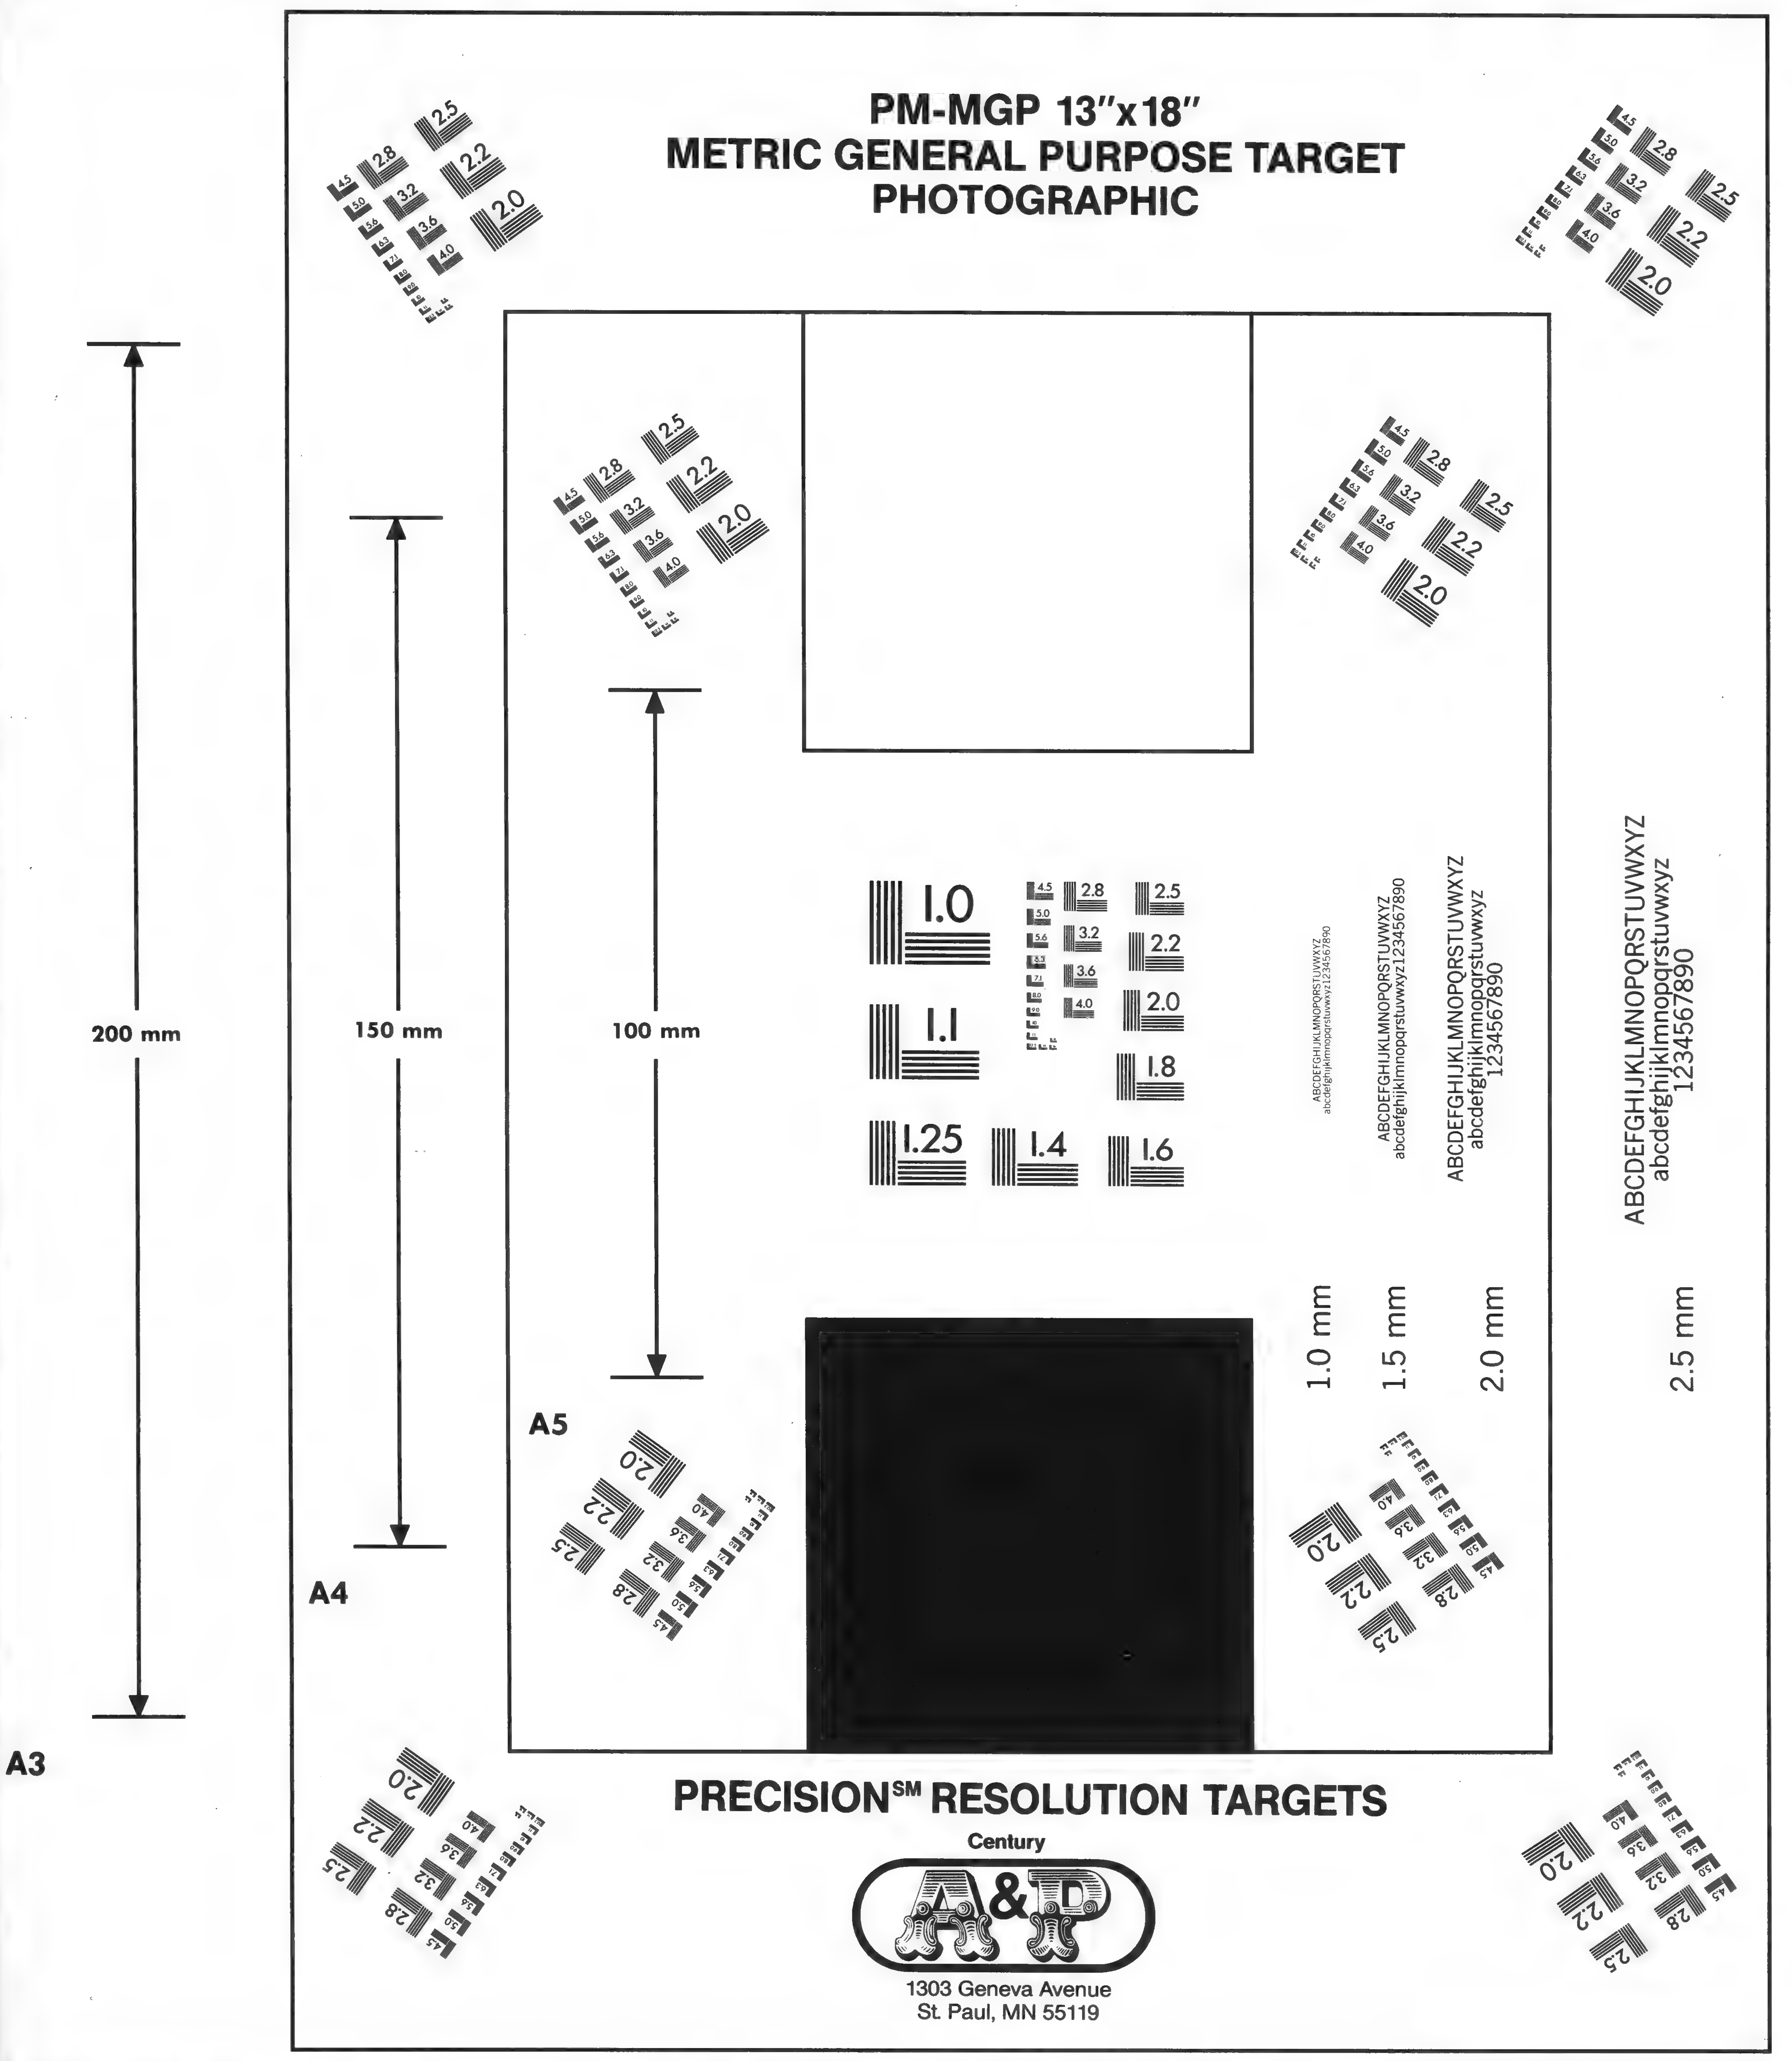
[220]

REDUCTION

RATIO

13x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A3
A4
A5
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

Post March 6

WILL PLAY SIBELIUS AS WRITTEN

Schneevoight, Classmate of Composer, to Lead Symphony

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Georg Schneevoigt, who as guest-conductor leads the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concerts of this week, is by birth and residence a Finn. And from his early youth Mr. Schneevoigt has been an intimate of Jan Sibelius, greatest of Finnish composers.

At the Conservatory in Helsingfors the two were fellow-pupils, and throughout his long career as orchestral conductor, which has taken him into practically every European country, Mr. Schneevoigt has acted as ardent propagandist for his friend's music.

IMPARTS POWER TO PLAYERS

In Boston where for 20 years it has been known and admired the music of Sibelius needs perhaps neither introduction nor endorsement. Yet it is an altogether welcome and fortunate circumstance that Mr. Schneevoigt will conduct for us Sibelius's Second Symphony, for of this remarkable score he knows the innermost significance as does perhaps no other conductor. Already from the rehearsal room have come rumors that Mr. Schneevoigt's interpretation of the piece will be nothing short of revelation. A pity, then, that he may not reveal to us the other four symphonies as well!

A modest, genial and kindly gentleman, Mr. Schneevoigt when first you meet him gives little hint of the fire and power that by credible report he can impart to an orchestra.

Recommended Mr. Burgin

But of our Boston orchestra he was warm in his praise and, after hearing the Young People's concert of Monday afternoon, he likewise waxed eloquent in his praise of Mr. Monteux as conductor. In his present brief connection with our orchestra, by the way, Mr. Schneevoigt is renewing an old friendship since Richard Burgin, the band's concert-master, for eight years played at Helsingfors and elsewhere under the baton of Mr. Schneevoigt. And furthermore it was Mr. Schneevoigt who recommended Mr. Burgin for the post which he now fills so capably.

But all that is in passing. It is of Sibelius that Mr. Schneevoigt would talk, and once he is started upon the topic of that composer, whom he devoutly believes to be the greatest genius among living makers of music, the Finnish conductor bares that temperamental warmth which lurks behind his quiet and calm exterior.

Depicts Conquest by Russia

In the first movement of this Second Symphony, which Mr. Schneevoigt deems Sibelius' finest, most individual creation, comes an idyllic tonal picture of Finland in those happy days of Swedish rule before the Russian rule. The pastoral opening of the second movement continues this picturing of serenity and contentment; but suddenly there descends the mailed fist of Russia and the dream is shattered. Yet though oppressed, Finland is still beautiful and a suave melody proclaims this enduring beauty.

The so-called Scherzo of this Symphony is music of a people harassed and troubled. Into the seething tonal tumult steals, however, in one of the loveliest of Sibelius' melodies, the voice of consolation. But if the Finns are to be freed from oppression there must arise among them a savior and deliverer, and it is this imaginery hero that the martial, triumphant Finale of the Symphony sets forth.

Mutilated by Dr. Muck

To his horror Mr. Schneevoigt found that Dr. Muck, and after him Mr. Monteux, had performed this symphony with certain cuts. Worse than that, in Mr. Schneevoigt's eyes, Dr. Muck had had the temerity, the audacity, here and there to alter Sibelius' instrumentation. These acts of profanation Mr. Schneevoigt will set aright. From him we shall hear the Symphony exactly as Sibelius wrote it, and, it is possible to believe, exactly as Sibelius intended that it should be played.

Hearken well, then, all subscribers and occasional visitors to the Symphony Concerts. A vivid and authentic interpretation of a modern musical masterpiece awaits you!

Trans March 6

PRECIOUS FREIGHT FROM MANY LANDS AND MANY MUSICS

GEORG SCHNEEVOIGT, ITINERANT CONDUCTOR

As Guest He Visits Boston and the Symphony Orchestra—His Background and His Manner—Interpreting Sibelius and Finland

SO far as one can guess from his conversational presence, Mr. Schneevoigt who has come all the way from Stockholm to be lord of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the present week, is no austere and fearsome conductor. Straight and rather tall, he is nevertheless amiable, jocular, apt at anecdote, smilingly ready to venture into our language, which is by him very newly and as yet imperfectly acquired. German becomes the only common ground for one whose native language is like nothing in particular except Hungarian. His alertness most directly bespeaks the conductor. As he warms to his subject one can imagine him warming, with infinitely more command, to his music.

Georg Schneevoigt, or Professor Georg Schneevoigt (his title is not academic, but an honor from the Finnish Parliament, otherwise bestowed only upon their composer, Sibelius, and their late poet, Merikanto) is immensely enjoying his visit to America. He considers us fortunate in the influx of musicians from Europe. To come here was to him something like coming home, for in each of our orchestras (and he has heard most of them) he finds several musicians who have previously played under him; there are six such in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He delights in the fine instrument which Mr. Monteux has cordially yielded to him for a week to play upon, and is particularly impressed by its discipline and artistic response.

Probably neither the length of the journey nor the strangeness of the orchestra have bothered him, for Mr. Schneevoigt is very likely the most travelled conductor in Europe—the continent of endless "guest conducting." His own orchestra, that of Stockholm, must share him with many others. Orchestras from Moscow to London, and from Trondhjem to Naples claim his services and make his life largely one of railway coaches. In recent seasons he has been particularly identified with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, and the orchestra at Scheveningen, which is that of The Hague in summer guise.

A glance at Mr. Schneevoigt's repertory shows him no ringmaster driving half a dozen showy steeds in endless rotation, but a true cosmopolitan, with a friendly eye to the composer of today and tomorrow. He has conducted a number of American scores, including Loeffler's "La Mort de Tintagiles" in Berlin and Stockholm, and in Stockholm Carpenter's "Perambulator" Suite, a number of Bloch's works (America seems to claim this composer), and music of Gilbert, Gardiner and Hadley.

Mr. Schneevoigt does not wish to be looked upon as particularly a prophet of Sibelius. He is neither omniscient, nor a propogandist. Admitting his countryman's music as something of an acquired taste and not readily taken by all palates. He does not spread the symphonies over Europe. Indeed, other countries are rather tepid towards Sibelius in comparison to the enthusiasm found in Scandinavia, England and America. If his reading is authoritative, it is because he has worked with the composer over the production of his scores, and because, Finns being very much alike and their music like them, we behold two Finns hand in hand.

Asked whether the melancholy prevading Sibelius's music is attributable to the composer as an individual, to the national temperament, or to the landscape, the conductor answered, "All three, because all three are one." To understand fully this melancholy, one must know at first hand the true nature of Finland. It is not, generally speaking, bleak and sterile, but largely covered with fine forests, dotted with fair lakes, and laced with torrential streams and their falls. It is an immense country of impressive scenic beauty. But, first of all, it is immense. And silent. There would be room for thirty millions—and there are scarcely three. Emptiness and silence abound. It is not a rigorous, snow-locked, cruelly wintry climate as some (who have never been there) would have us believe. Indeed, Canada is far colder. There is a gray and dreaded period of autumn rain, a comparatively short winter, and an entirely wonderful spring and summer. Over all is the mystery of the northern sun. The land seems in a perpetual virgin sleep. One is mh 1

Continued on Following Page

SCHNEEVOIGT AND SIBELIUS

Continued from Preceding Page

always aware of the silence. It is a silence which seems to brood and to dream. Down to the dumbest peasant, the people are philosophers and dreamers. Hence their wonderful Saga—and their music.

They are a humble, God-fearing, straight-living people. Their simplicity is unspoiled, uninvaded by continental complexities, and sophistications. The old Russian oppression has strengthened their racial integrity, and made them still more closely a part of their weirdly beautiful land. Through this whole people runs a susceptibility to music. Figuratively, they [illegible] to the lightest intonation. They sing [illegible] and at play, and the gayest of their songs and dances are in the minor mode.

The music of Sibelius is entirely at one with these people and their surrounding. Although his melodies are thematically his own, their characteristic plaint is quite Finnish. This is the Sibelius of the first two symphonies. The composer has always persisted in attaching no programme to them. But when the Second Symphony was first played, all Finland found in it their country, their suffering, and, in the Finale, their resounding and triumphant deliverance. The composer might protest in vain; his Nation took the Second Symphony in this way, and perhaps always will. Once Runeberg, the Finnish Goethe (who nevertheless wrote in Swedish) was the national idol. Now it is Sibelius. President, Prime Minister, are nothing beside him. Although his music is growing ever less nationalistic and more personal, the name of Sibelius over a score assures adoration. Yet, naturally, the First and Second Symphonies are closest to their hearts.

With the Quartet "Voci Intimae," says Mr. Schneevoigt, Sibelius's creative activity took this altered course of introspection. It is becoming ever more so. The newest Sixth Symphony which he has conducted in Stockholm not long since, is smaller in form, more Mozartean, more confined in color, more intimate than any which preceded. It is very unmistakably Sibelius, but to understand it almost requires sympathetic acquaintance with the previous Sibelius from which it developed. N. N.

Globe March 8

GUEST CONDUCTOR AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Georg Schneevoight Wins Cordial Reception

Georg Scheevoight, a native of Finland, now conductor of an orchestra in Stockholm, Sweden, conducted yesterday's Symphony concert as a guest. Mr Monteux from a seat in the first balcony watched the proceedings with apparent interest.

The trustees of the orchestra have not made public their motive in asking Mr Schneevoight to come here and conduct a pair of concerts. It is currently believed, but without any official warrant, that he is being considered as a possible conductor to succeed Monteux. This is to assume what there is no apparent reason for assuming: namely, that Kusevitsky, whose appointment as Mr Monteux' successor was announced last September, to take effect at the close of the present season, is not coming here after all.

Only once before in the entire history of the Boston Symphony has a guest conductor not also a composer led a pair of concerts. And it is probable that Bruno Walter, who set the precedent last year, was seriously considered, as he well might be, as a desirable successor for Monteux.

Whatever the facts may be about the next conductor of the Symphony it was obvious that the hall yesterday afternoon had taken on the atmosphere of a church where a possible new pastor is preaching "on trial." It should be added that the audience and the orchestra plainly were favorably impressed with Mr Schneevoight's conducting of a program which included Mozart's "Kleine Nacht Musik," Beethoven's "Leonore No. 3" overture, Strauss' "Don Juan" and Sibelius' Second Symphony, all standard repertory pieces.

His Platform Manner

Mr Schneevoight's vehement platform manner is a cross between that of a popular evangelist and that of a cheer leader. Yet it would be manifestly unfair to call him a mere prima donna conductor. He does not gesticulate to attract the attention of the audience; what he wants is to rouse the rank and file of the players from routine apathy. His repeated insistence that the orchestra share the prolonged applause which greeted their joint efforts seemed like genuine and not stage modesty.

It is plainly impossible to pass final judgment on Mr Schneevoight's conducting at a single hearing, when he has had the orchestra under his baton only for a limited number of rehearsals. Yesterday he secured some effects, crescendos, pianissimos, triple fortissimos, and so on, which seemed exaggerated. Yet he may have had to exaggerate in order to get them at all. His Beethoven was distinctly in what passes for the romantic tradition, but it had some effective nuances as well as an often tempestuous energy which was not alien to the spirit of the composer.

His Mozart lacked finesse and elegance, though it was tuneful and sprightly without the mechanical studio practice atmosphere which has killed Mozart for so many of the present generation. Despite some brilliant moments, his Strauss seemed forced and a bit muddled in interpretation.

Opportunity Not of Best

The symphony he chose, the second by his countryman and friend Sibelius, did not offer him a chance to show whether he can lead the working out section of a great classic symphony or not. His tendency to confuse crescendo with accelerando throughout the concert, and his short-breathed style in general, would indicate that he could not. This power to reveal the broad outlines, to follow the sweep and soar of a thing like the first movement of Beethoven's "Eroica," is the greatest attribute of a conductor.

Mr Schneevoight, judged by standards formed in listening in the past to more than one of the world's greatest conductors, did not impress one yesterday as their equal. He lacks the superlative qualities of Toscanini, Muck, and Walter. But his abilities are such as to qualify him to lead any orchestra not fortunate enough to secure one of the very few absolutely first-rate conductors. No American orchestra today has a better man as its permanent conductor.

There are no Symphony concerts next Friday and Saturday. P. R.

Post March 8

VISITANT CONDUCTS SYMPHONY

Schneevoight Displays New Beauties of Scores

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

So much had been said regarding Georg Schneevoight's intimate knowledge of Sibelius' Second Symphony and his feats with that piece in rehearsal, that in advance of the concert the interest in his conducting of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon quite naturally centred in his interpretation of that music.

MASTER OF ORCHESTRA

Last on the programme stood the Symphony, and when the performance of it came to pass the keen expectations and anticipations were amply fulfilled. But long before this music of Finnish struggles and Finnish triumphs was reached, indeed in the first bars of Beethoven's Third "Leonora" Overture, which began the concert, Mrs. Schneevoight's hearers were made aware that as conductor, he is no mere specialist in the music of his countrymen.

Remarkable as was his interpretation of the Symphony, his "readings" of the Overture of Strauss's "Don Juan" and, within its narrower scope, of Mozart's charming "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," were no less compelling, no less significant.

Makes Hearers "Feel" Music

It were inaccurate to call Mr. Schneevoight a "prima donna" conductor, resorting to fulsome flourishes and grandiloquent gestures. But no more is he one, who, as the phrase goes, wholly submerges his own individuality in that of the composer. In the fullest sense of the word, Mr. Schneevoight is a conductor, as he leads the orchestra never may the listener feel that the music is going of itself, and would go in much the same way were the director to lay aside his stick or even to step off the podium.

Seemingly Mr. Schneevoight moulds every phrase, sings every melody, grades every crescendo and decrescendo, marshals every climax. To his lightest wish, the orchestra is sensitive and eagerly responsive. Distinctly an emotional, a dramatizing leader, Mr. Schneevoight unmistakably "feels" the music in hand, and with him orchestra and audience must needs feel it too.

Bares Unexpected Beauties

Those who prefer their classics played with care for flowing line rather than with emphasis upon detail, might perhaps complain that Mr. Schneevoight's interpretation of Beethoven's Overture tended to be episodic, that his pianissimos were a shade too breathless, that certain effects were stressed at the expense of musical continuity.

Yet it was possible to sit before such performance of this music entranced and spell-bound, finding in it [illegible]ed beauties, depths hitherto un[illegible] and heights never before scale[illegible] blinding flash [illegible] came the [illegible] triumphant outburst, [illegible] held tense throughout the piece [illegible] release in long-continued [illegible]

And surely [illegible] heard [illegible] a performance [illegible] Strauss' tone-poem. The brilliant [illegible]ordium flamed with power [illegible] "love scenes" were [illegible] sensuousness, the episodes of satiety and revulsion had an almost physical graphicness. And following a climax of unexampled power, never had the [illegible] so seemed the music of exhaustion, of the cup of life drunk to the bitterest dregs.

Sibelius Revealed

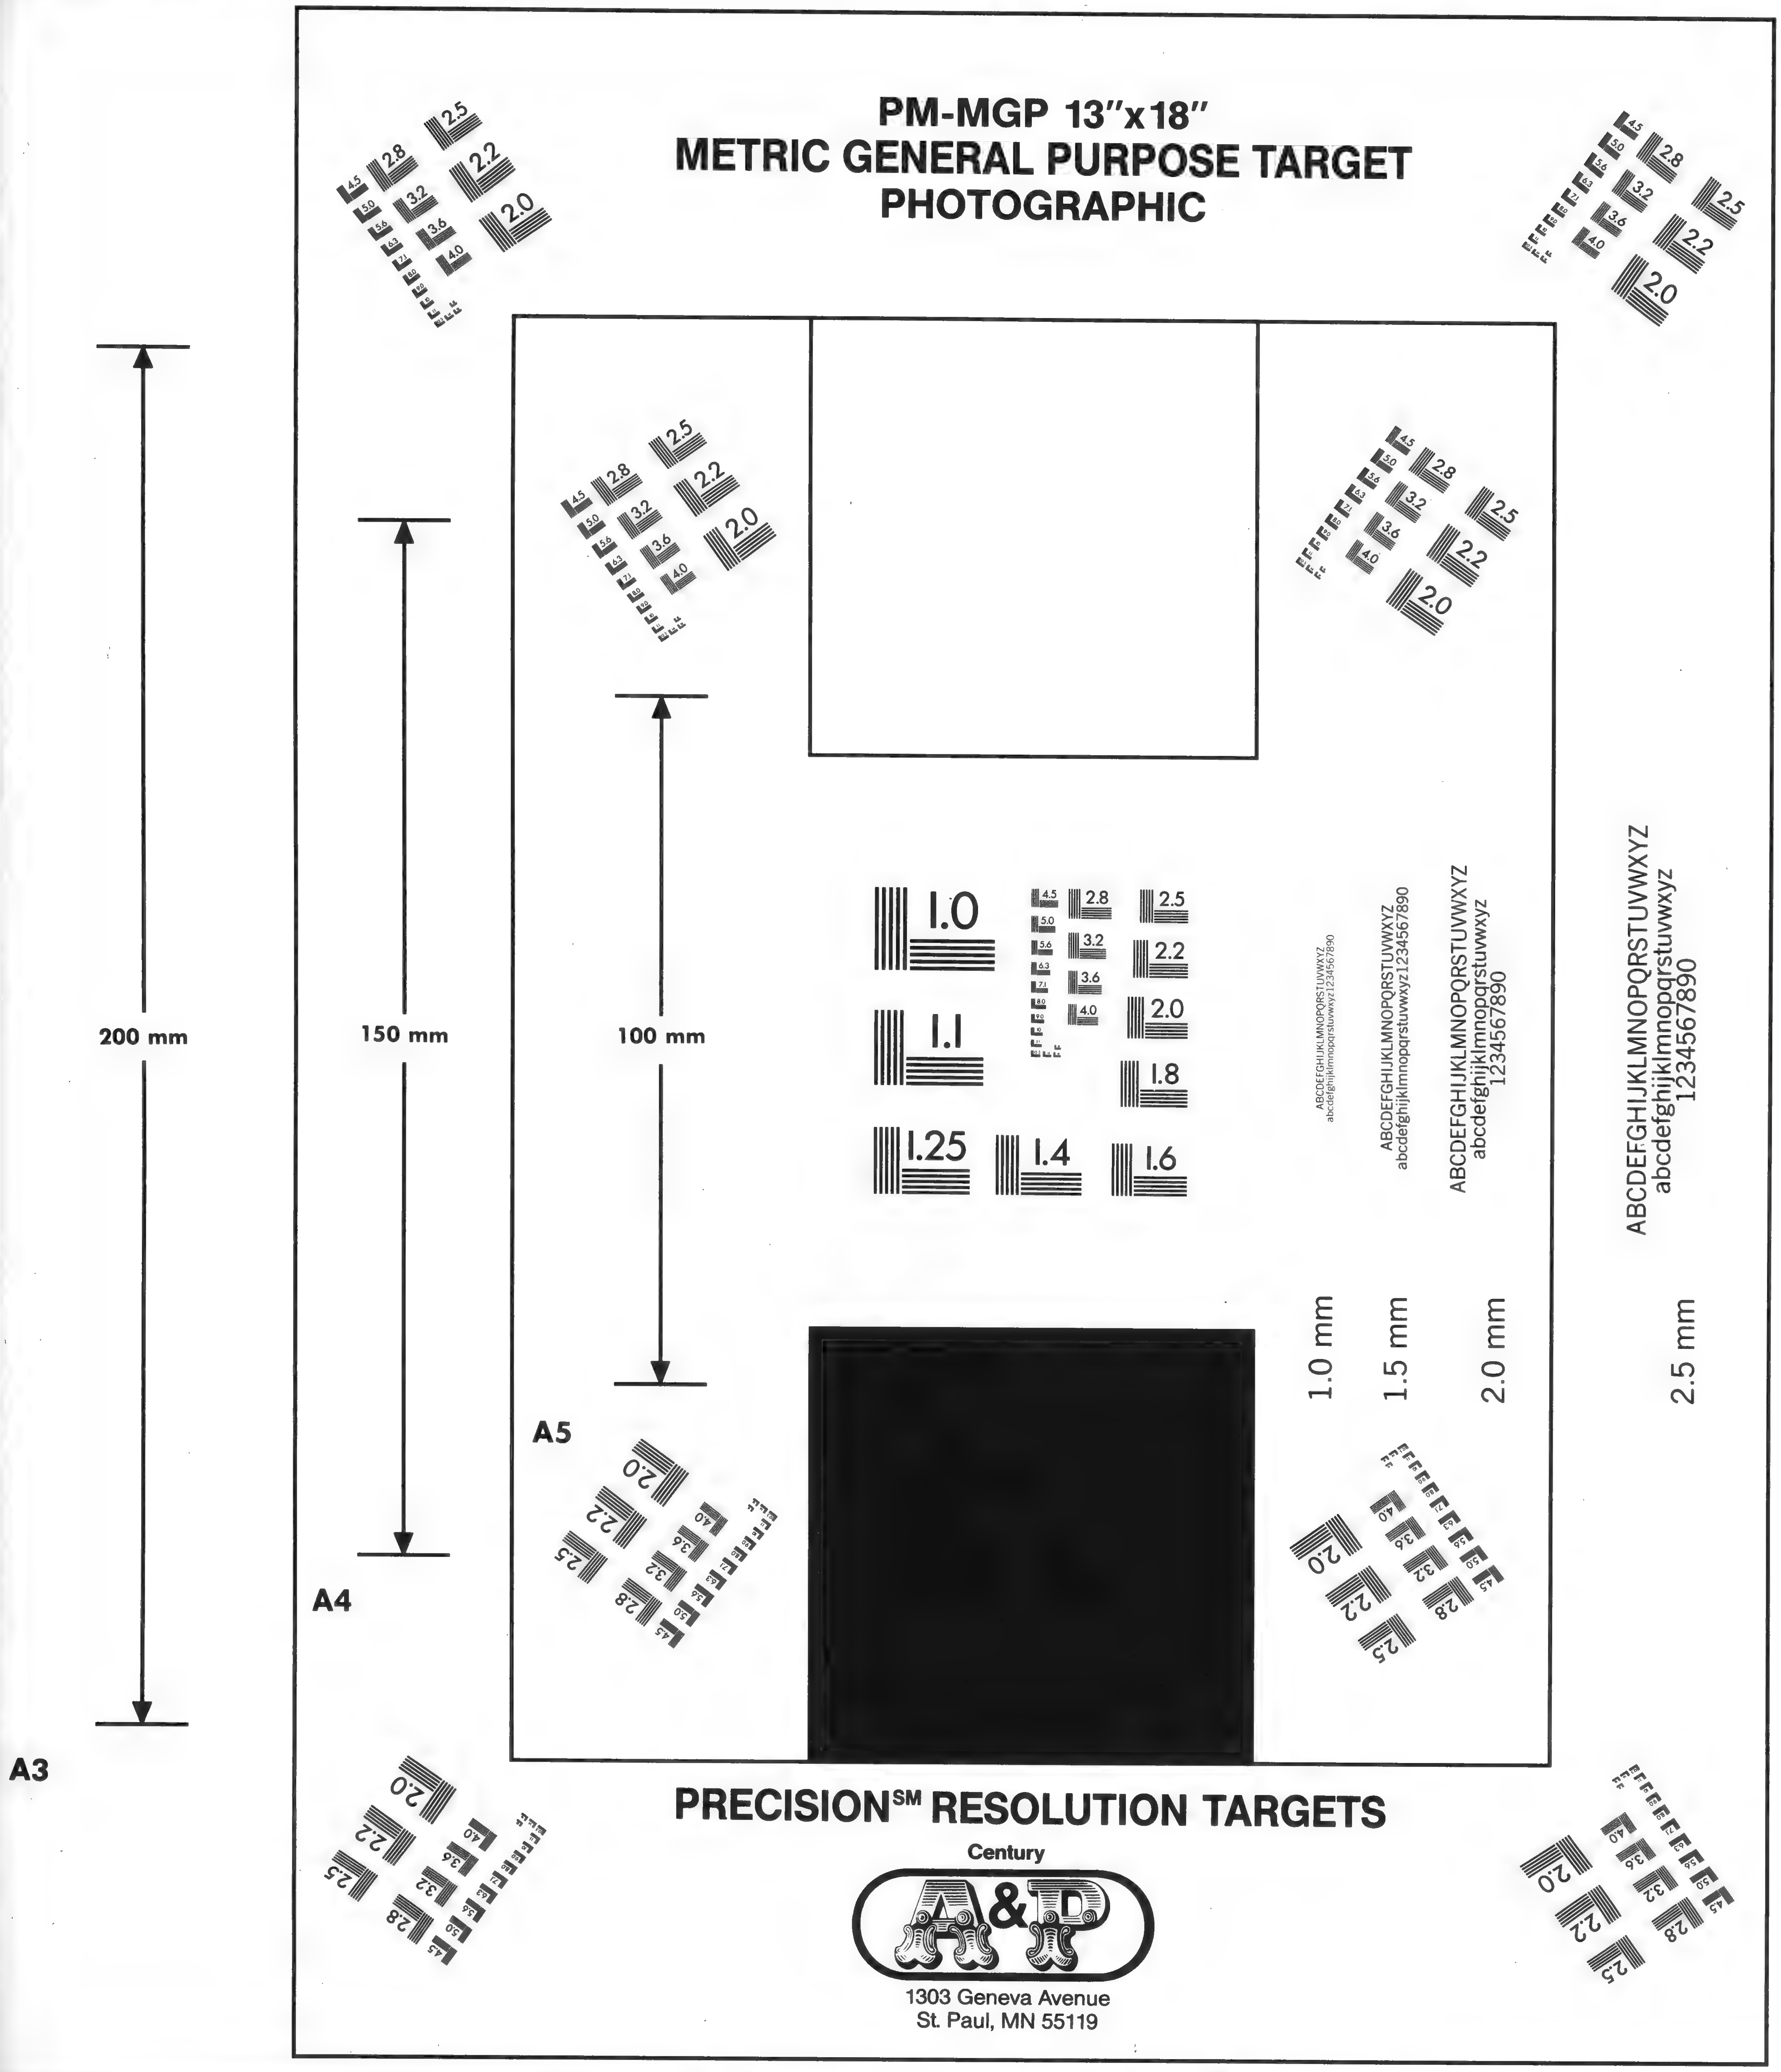
To Strauss' passion and tumult the pastoral opening of Sibelius' Symphony made admirable foil. This music, so Mr. Schneevoight would have us know, is the music of Finland happy and contented, and thus he played it. As vivid was the impression, in the two succeeding movements, of Finland crushed by Russia, while the episodes of consolation were beautifully eloquent. Finally, truly heroic is the chief theme of the concluding movement, in which is limned the figure of the hero who is to save and deliver his country, and on each recurrence Mr. Schneevoight brought to this melody an ever greater power till at the end it became a veritable blaze of tonal splendor.

Here, then, was the music of Sibelius' imaginings set before us with no measure omitted, no meaning lost. The looked-for revelation had indeed been brought to pass.

[221]

REDUCTION
RATIO
12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
5.0
3.2
2.0
5.6
3.6
6.3
4.0
7.1
8.0
200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
A5
A4
A3

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Herlad march 6

SYMPHONY LED BY A GUEST

Georg Schneevoight, Stockholm Director, Conducts Eighteenth Concert

INTERPRETATIONS ARE INTERESTING

By PHILIP HALE

The 18th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place in Symphony hall yesterday afternoon, was conducted by Georg Schneevoight, a guest, born in Finland, whose home now is Stockholm. The program was as follows:

Beethoven, Overture to "Leonore" No. 3; Mozart, Eine Kleine Nachtmusik; Strauss, Tone Poem, "Don Juan" (after Lenau); Sibelius, Symphony No. 2, D-major.

Mr. Schneevoight evidently enjoyed playing on the superb instrument constructed and brought to its present state of perfection by Mr. Monteux. The guest is as evidently a conductor of much experience and indisputable authority. As the program, with the exception of Mozart's charming little Serenade, was composed of familiar pieces, the interest was in the interpretation of them. Mr. Schneevoight had been quoted as saying that the symphony in the past had been cut; that one conductor, Dr. Muck, had had the temerity to make some changes in the instrumentation. Our guest would, therefore, present to us the Simon pure article. Hearing the symphony yesterday, one was inclined to applaud the wisdom of the former conductors.

Mr. Schneevoight found delight in violent contrasts; from an almost inaudible pianissimo to a stentorian fortissimo. Too often it was as if he had said to his men:

"Masters, spread yourselves.
This is Ercles' vein."

No doubt these stormy effects pleased many in the audience, who believe that such manifestations of "temperament" are greatly to be desired. They wish to be excited, and a raging orchestra gives them this excitement. Mr. Schneevoight also strove to gain expression by choosing occasionally a tempo so slow that it was sluggish, and the melodic line was not easily maintained. This was especially noticeable in the beautiful episode in "Don Juan" where the oboe sings a ravishing melody over an accompaniment that yesterday was hardly heard. The whole performance of "Don Juan" was garishly theatrical rather than poetically dramatic.

On the other hand there were many admirable features in Mr. Schneevoight's conducting; his phrasing, his building up a climax, his blocking out his scheme. Perhaps in Beethoven's overture his planning was too apparent. His interpretation of Mozart's music pleased us more.

He belongs to a school of conductors who anxiously strive after broad and overwhelming effects. They are interesting, they conduct with gusto; but after all, infinite care for detail that is indispensable to the continuity and beauty of the musical flow is more to the purpose. This care gives breadth, emphasis and grandeur to the great effects desired by the composers.

Mr. Schneevoight was warmly welcomed and enthusiastically applauded.

The concert will be repeated tonight. There will be no concerts next week. The program for March 21 and 22 will be as follows: Haydn, Symphony, G major (B. & H., No. 7); Hill, "Stevensonia" suite No. 2 (after poems from Stevenson's "Child's Garden of Verses"); Beethoven, Violin Concerto (Carl Flesch, violinist); Wagner, Ride of the Valkyries.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

KALAMAZOO,
MICH.
GAZETTE

MAR 7 1924

Pierre Monteux, now finishing a four-year term with the Boston Symphony, is a conductor of elasticity and variety. Sinclair says he has found hearings for more composers than three of his colleagues. He has a better ear than any conductor except Mengelberg and his limitations proceed from the fact that he cares more for the music than for the performance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

BOSTON
MASS.
TELEGRAM

Post

ISSUE OF

MAR 6 1924

WILL PLAY SIBELIUS AS WRITTEN

Schneevoight, Classmate of Composer, to Lead Symphony

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Georg Schneevoigt, who as guest-conductor leads the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concerts of this week, is by birth and residence a Finn. And from his early youth Mr. Schneevoigt has been an intimate of Jan Sibelius, greatest of Finnish composers.

At the Conservatory in Helsingfors the two were fellow-pupils, and throughout his long career as orchestral conductor, which has taken him into practically every European country, Mr. Schneevoigt has acted as ardent propagandist for his friend's music.

IMPARTS POWER TO PLAYERS

In Boston where for 20 years it has been known and admired the music of Sibelius needs perhaps neither introduction nor endorsement. Yet it is an altogether welcome and fortunate circumstance that Mr. Schneevoigt will conduct for us Sibelius's Second Symphony, for of this remarkable score he knows the innermost significance as does perhaps no other conductor. Already from the rehearsal room have come rumors that Mr. Schneevoigt's interpretation of the piece will be nothing short of revelation. A pity, then, that he may not reveal to us the other four symphonies as well.

A modest, genial and kindly gentleman, Mr. Schneevoigt when first you meet him gives little hint of the fire and power that by credible report he can impart to an orchestra.

Recommended Mr. Burgin

But of our Boston orchestra he was warm in his praise and, after hearing the Young People's concert of Monday afternoon, he likewise waxed eloquent in his praise of Mr. Monteux as conductor. In his present brief connection with our orchestra, by the way, Mr. Schneevoigt is renewing an old friendship since Richard Burgin, the band's concert-master, for eight years played at Helsingfors and elsewhere under the baton of Mr. Schneevoigt. And furthermore it was Mr. Schneevoigt who recommended Mr. Burgin for the post which he now fills so capably.

But all that is in passing. It is of Sibelius that Mr. Schneevoigt would talk, and once he is started upon the topic of that composer, whom he devoutly believes to be the greatest genius among living makers of music, the Finnish conductor bares that temperamental warmth which lurks behind his quiet and calm exterior.

Depicts Conquest by Russia

In the first movement of this Second Symphony, which Mr. Schneevoigt deems Sibelius' finest, most individual creation, comes an idyllic tonal picture of Finland in those happy days of Swedish rule before the Russian rule. The pastoral opening of the second movement continues this picturing of serenity and contentment; but suddenly there descends the mailed fist of Russia and the dream is shattered. Yet though oppressed, Finland is still beautiful and a suave melody proclaims this enduring beauty.

The so-called Scherzo of this Symphony is music of a people harassed and troubled. Into the seething tonal tumult steals, however, in one of the loveliest of Sibelius' melodies, the voice of consolation. But if the Finns are to be freed from oppression there must arise among them a savior and deliverer, and it is this imaginery hero that the martial, triumphant Finale of the Symphony sets forth.

Mutilated by Dr. Muck

To his horror Mr. Schneevoigt found that Dr. Muck, and after him Mr. Monteux, had performed this symphony with certain cuts. Worse than that, in Mr. Schneevoigt's eyes, Dr. Muck had had the temerity, the audacity, here and there to alter Sibelius' instrumentation. These acts of profanation Mr. Schneevoigt will set aright. From him we shall hear the Symphony exactly as Sibelius wrote it, and, it is possible to believe, exactly as Sibelius intended that it should be played.

Hearken well, then, all subscribers and occasional visitors to the Symphony Concerts. A vivid and authentic [illegible] modern musical [illegible] awaits you!

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BOSTON,
MASS.
HERALD

7 1924

CUTTINGS

"The Eaglet of Seventy"

Birthday Encomiums from Carl Engel to Philip Hale in the Musical Quarterly

The championing of progress does not exclusively belong to youth. In the council of the ancients the oldest in years and youngest in spirit is Mr. Philip Hale. He is also the soundest critic America has had. On March 5, 1924, Mr. Hale will be three-score-years-and-ten. The dean of music critics in this country, he is still its keenest discoverer of new or unusual beauty. . . . We are so used to Mr. Hale's terse and unerring judgments that we accept them without sufficiently appreciating the wealth of learning, common sense and art from which they spring. What it would take the rest of us to say laboriously and incompletely in several pages he often crystallizes aptly in one sentence. His culture is wide. He has forgotten—if he does forget—more books and music than most people ever read and hear. That his encyclopedal knowledge comprises all the delightful things which ordinary wisdom rates as not worth knowing is the real secret of his charm. Seldom partisan, he is never unjust. He can be caustic, which is healthy. More often he is gently humorous. Never is he flippant. If in a Boston paper he conducts a witty and informative department which runs the vertical length of the page, it is because the space that properly belongs to him, below the horizontal double rule, does not exist in American journals.

Mr. Hale is of the brilliant family of old-world feuilletonistes and chroniqueurs, the Scholls, Clareties and Wolffs. It is regrettable that, so far, Mr. Hale's fugitive articles and essays have not been collected in book form. Other critics are known to be more intent upon the preservation of their less important products. A lasting monument, however, Mr. Hale has set himself in the program books of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. They have become a model. Also, they remain unrivalled. As a critic, as an educator of public taste in music, Mr. Hale has exercised a sway which is not merely local, but national in scope. Did the facetious Mr. de Pachmann have him in mind when he included Boston among the only three cities (Berlin and Rome were the other two) which, in his opinion, may boast of holding within their walls a musical critic? Surely neither in Europe nor in America the bird is so rare. But here, at least, Mr. Hale flies as one apart and in advance. May the eaglet of 70 soar on for many a year to come.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BAY CITY,
MICH.
TIMES

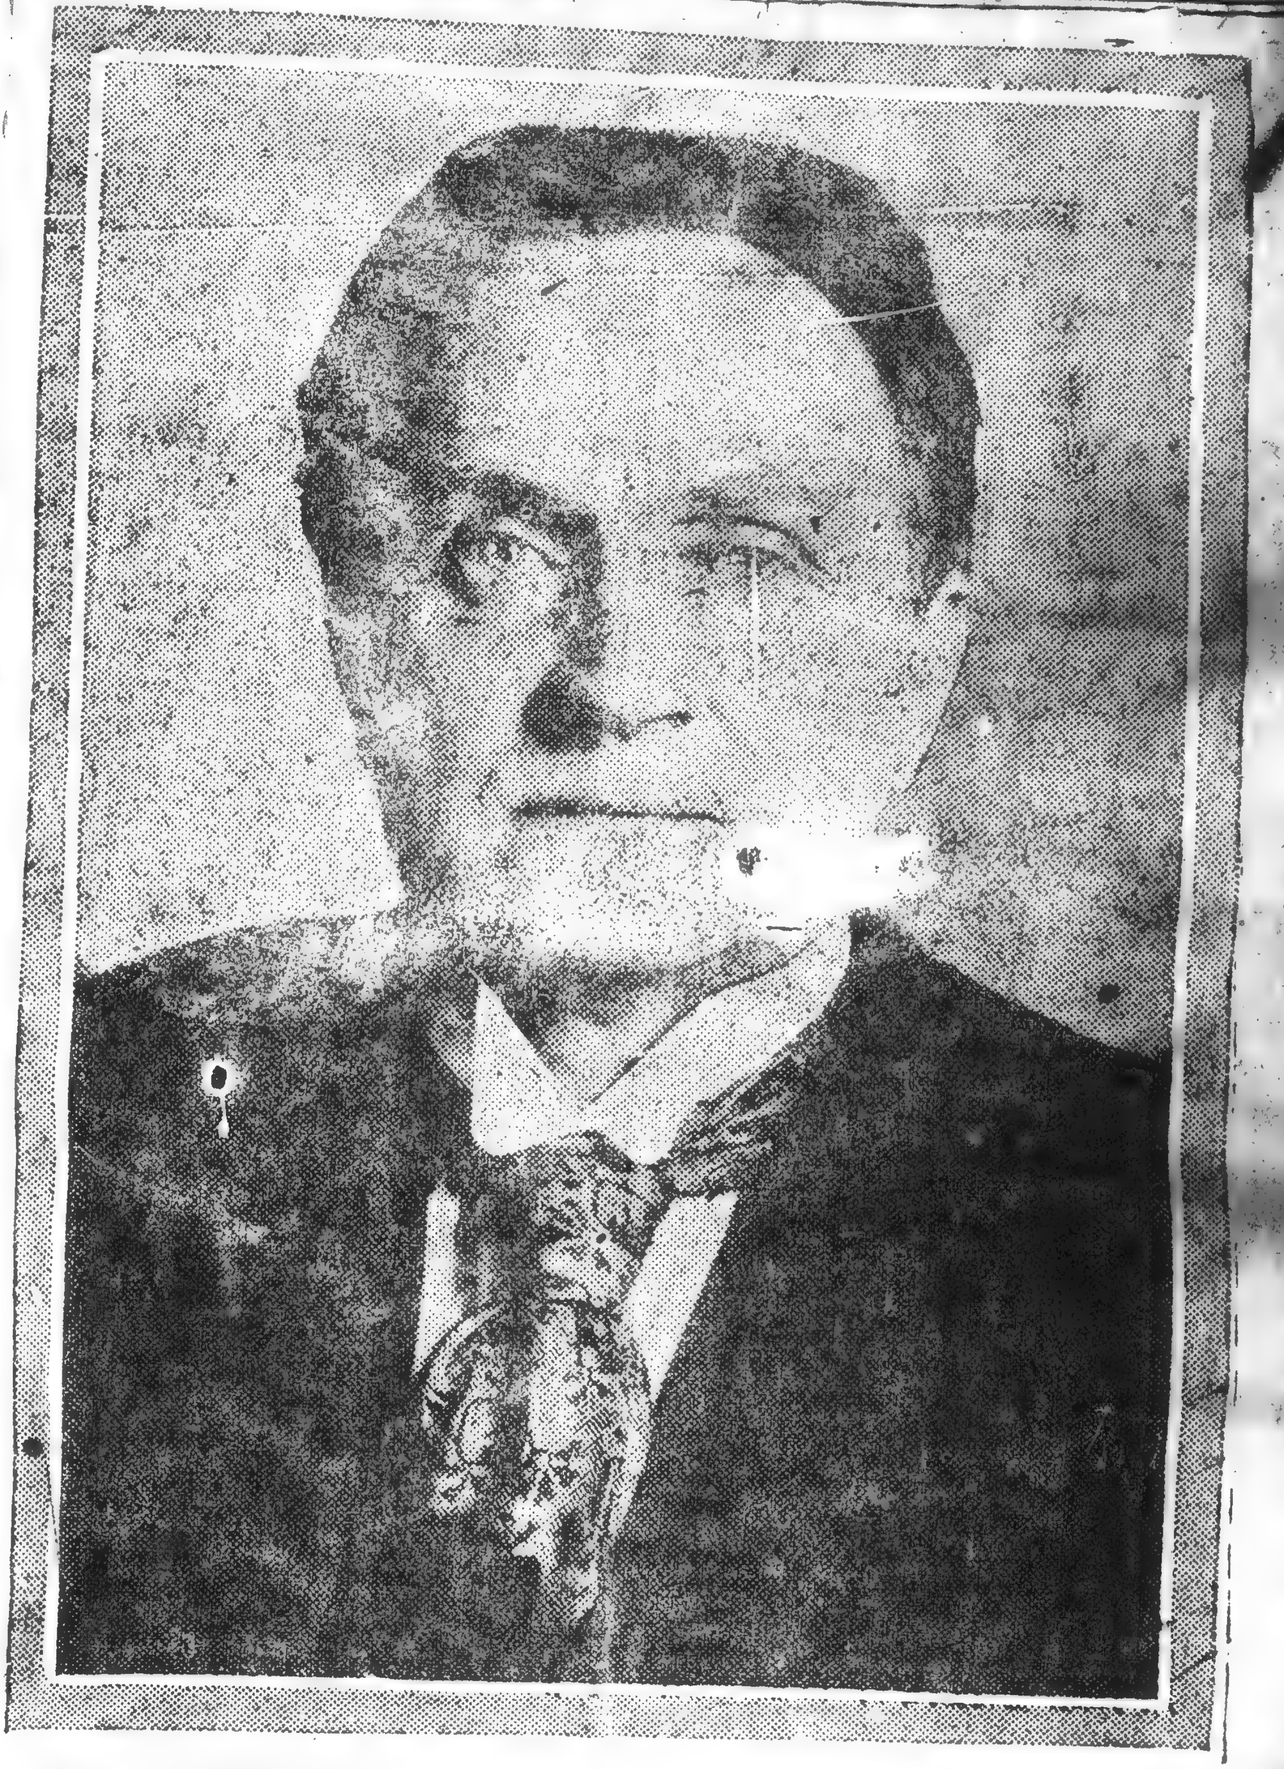
MAR 7 1924

Pierre Monteux, now finishing a four-year term with the Boston Symphony, is a conductor of elasticity and variety. Sinclair says he has found hearings for more composers than any three of his colleagues. He has a better ear than any conductor except Mengelberg and his limitations proceed from the fact that he cares more for the music than for the performance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

BANGOR
ME.
COMMERCIAL

Mar 7



WILL CONDUCT BOSTON SYMPHONY—George Schneevoight of Helsingfors, Finland, well known European conductor, will make his first appearance in the United States in March when he will conduct some of the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in that city. He is one of the best of continental leaders, having received engagements all over Europe.

MAR 6 1924
ADVERTISER,
Boston, Mass.

FINNISH STAR AT SYMPHONY

Finland's most famous orchestral conductor, Georg Schneevoight, made his first appearance in Boston yesterday as guest director at the Symphony concert. A man of unmistakable talent, vigor and artistic feeling, he made a very favorable impression.

Georg Schneevoight

First place on his program for this week's concerts is the D major symphony written by his compatriot, Jean Sibelius, a work of pastoral character, a tone painting of a rather gloomy landscape, typically Finnish, lit by pale, far Northern sunlight; a work poetical, emotional and, within bounds, intensely dramatic. The visiting conductor gave a crystal-clear reading of it, and the audience was almost giddily demonstrative.

There was also frenzied enthusiasm after the distinguished Finn's dynamic interpretation of "Don Juan," one of the Richard Strauss tone poems. In the hearty applause joined the modest Pierre Monteux, whose tenure as Symphony conductor is soon to end.

Mozart's serenade for string orchestra and Beethoven's third "Lenora" overture are the other numbers on the program. In the performance of these works, too, the great leader gave proof of his sound musicianship and lively temperament.

[222]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Herlad march 6

SYMPHONY LED BY A GUEST

Georg Schneevoight, Stockholm Director, Conducts Eighteenth Concert

INTERPRETATIONS ARE INTERESTING

By PHILIP HALE

The 18th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place in Symphony hall yesterday afternoon, was conducted by Georg Schneevoight, a guest, born in Finland, whose home now is Stockholm. The program was as follows:

Beethoven, Overture to "Leonore" No. 3; Mozart, Eine Kleine Nachtmusik; Strauss, Tone Poem, "Don Juan" (after Lenau); Sibelius, Symphony No. 2, D-major.

Mr. Schneevoight evidently enjoyed playing on the superb instrument constructed and brought to its present state of perfection by Mr. Monteux. The guest is as evidently a conductor of much experience and indisputable authority. As the program, with the exception of Mozart's charming little Serenade, was composed of familiar pieces, the interest was in the interpretation of them. Mr. Schneevoight had been quoted as saying that the symphony in the past had been cut; that one conductor, Dr. Muck, had had the temerity to make some changes in the instrumentation. Our guest would, therefore, present to us the Simon pure article. Hearing the symphony yesterday, one was inclined to applaud the wisdom of the former conductors.

Mr. Schneevoight found delight in violent contrasts; from an almost inaudible pianissimo to a stentorian fortissimo. Too often it was as if he had said to his men:

"Masters, spread yourselves.
This is Ercles' vein."

No doubt these stormy effects pleased many in the audience, who believe that such manifestations of "temperament" are greatly to be desired. They wish to be excited, and a raging orchestra gives them this excitement. Mr. Schneevoight also strove to gain expression by choosing occasionally a tempo so slow that it was sluggish, and the melodic line was not easily maintained. This was especially noticeable in the beautiful episode in "Don Juan" where the oboe sings a ravishing melody over an accompaniment that yesterday was hardly heard. The whole performance of "Don Juan" was garishly theatrical rather than poetically dramatic.

On the other hand there were many admirable features in Mr. Schneevoight's conducting; his phrasing, his building up a climax, his blocking out his scheme. Perhaps in Beethoven's overture his planning was too apparent. His interpretation of Mozart's music pleased us more.

He belongs to a school of conductors who anxiously strive after broad and overwhelming effects. They are interesting, they conduct with gusto; but after all, infinite care for detail that is indispensable to the continuity and beauty of the musical flow is more to the purpose. This care gives breadth, emphasis and grandeur to the great effects desired by the composers.

Mr. Schneevoight was warmly welcomed and enthusiastically applauded.

The concert will be repeated tonight. There will be no concerts next week. The program for March 21 and 22 will be as follows: Haydn, Symphony, C major (B. & H., No. 7); Hill, "Stevensonia" suite No. 2 (after poems from Stevenson's "Child's Garden of Verses"); Beethoven, Violin Concerto (Carl Flesch, violinist); Wagner, Ride of the Valkyries

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BOSTON
MASS.
TELEGRAM
ISSUE OF
MAR 6 1924

Post

WILL PLAY SIBELIUS AS WRITTEN

Schneevoight, Classmate of Composer, to Lead Symphony

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Georg Schneevoigt, who as guest-conductor leads the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concerts of this week, is by birth and residence a Finn. And from his early youth Mr. Schneevoigt has been an intimate of Jan Sibelius, greatest of Finnish composers.

At the Conservatory in Helsingfors the two were fellow-pupils, and throughout his long career as orchestral conductor, which has taken him into practically every European country, Mr. Schneevoigt has acted as ardent propagandist for his friend's music.

IMPARTS POWER TO PLAYERS

In Boston where for 20 years it has been known and admired the music of Sibelius needs perhaps neither introduction nor endorsement. Yet it is an altogether welcome and fortunate circumstance that Mr. Schneevoigt will conduct for us Sibelius's Second Symphony, for of this remarkable score he knows the innermost significance as does perhaps no other conductor. Already from the rehearsal room have come rumors that Mr. Schneevoigt's interpretation of the piece will be nothing short of revelation. A pity, then, that he may not reveal to us the other four symphonies as well!

A modest, genial and kindly gentleman, Mr. Schneevoigt when first you meet him gives little hint of the fire and power that by credible report he can impart to an orchestra.

Recommended Mr. Burgin

But of our Boston orchestra he was warm in his praise and, after hearing the Young People's concert of Monday afternoon, he likewise waxed eloquent in his praise of Mr. Monteux as conductor. In his present brief connection with our orchestra, by the way, Mr. Schneevoigt is renewing an old friendship since Richard Burgin, the band's concert-master, for eight years played at Helsingfors and elsewhere under the baton of Mr. Schneevoigt. And furthermore it was Mr. Schneevoigt who recommended Mr. Burgin for the post which he now fills so capably.

But all that is in passing. It is of Sibelius that Mr. Schneevoigt would talk, and once he is started upon the topic of that composer, whom he devoutly believes to be the greatest genius among living makers of music, the Finnish conductor bares that temperamental warmth which lurks behind his quiet and calm exterior.

Depicts Conquest by Russia

In the first movement of this Second Symphony, which Mr. Schneevoigt deems Sibelius' finest, most individual creation, comes an idyllic tonal picture of Finland in those happy days of Swedish rule before the Russian rule. The pastoral opening of the second movement continues this picturing of serenity and contentment; but suddenly there descends the mailed fist of Russia and the dream is shattered. Yet though oppressed, Finland is still beautiful and a suave melody proclaims this enduring beauty.

The so-called Scherzo of this Symphony is music of a people harassed and troubled. Into the seething tonal tumult steals, however, in one of the loveliest of Sibelius' melodies, the voice of consolation. But if the Finns are to be freed from oppression there must arise among them a savior and deliverer, and it is this imaginery hero that the martial, triumphant Finale of the Symphony sets forth.

Mutilated by Dr. Muck

To his horror Mr. Schneevoigt found that Dr. Muck, and after him Mr. Monteux, had performed this symphony with certain cuts. Worse than that, in Mr. Schneevoigt's eyes, Dr. Muck had had the temerity, the audacity, here and there to alter Sibelius' instrumentation. These acts of profanation Mr. Schneevoigt will set aright. From him we shall hear the Symphony exactly as Sibelius wrote it, and, it is possible to believe, exactly as Sibelius intended that it should be played.

Hearken well, then, all subscribers and occasional visitors to the Symphony Concerts. A vivid and authentic [illegible] a modern musical [illegible] awaits you!

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON,
MASS.
HERALD

7 1924

CUTTINGS

"The Eaglet of Seventy"

Birthday Encomiums from Carl Engel to Philip Hale in the Musical Quarterly

The championing of progress does not exclusively belong to youth. In the council of the ancients the oldest in years and youngest in spirit is Mr. Philip Hale. He is also the soundest critic America has had. On March 5, 1924, Mr. Hale will be three-score-years-and-ten. The dean of music critics in this country, he is still its keenest discoverer of new or unusual beauty. . . . We are so used to Mr. Hale's terse and unerring judgments that we accept them without sufficiently appreciating the wealth of learning, common sense and art from which they spring. What it would take the rest of us to say laboriously and incompletely in several pages he often crystallizes aptly in one sentence. His culture is wide. He has forgotten—if he does forget—more books and music than most people ever read and hear. That his encyclopedal knowledge comprises all the delightful things which ordinary wisdom rates as not worth knowing is the real secret of his charm. Seldom partisan, he is never unjust. He can be caustic, which is healthy. More often he is gently humorous. Never is he flippant. If in a Boston paper he conducts a witty and informative department which runs the vertical length of the page, it is because the space that properly belongs to him, below the horizontal double rule, does not exist in American journals.

Mr. Hale is of the brilliant family of old-world feuilletonistes and chroniqueurs, the Scholls, Clareties and Wolffs. It is regrettable that, so far, Mr. Hale's fugitive articles and essays have not been collected in book form. Other critics are known to be more intent upon the preservation of their less important products. A lasting monument, however, Mr. Hale has set himself in the program books of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. They have become a model. Also, they remain unrivalled. As a critic, as an educator of public taste in music, Mr. Hale has exercised a sway which is not merely local, but national in scope. Did the facetious Mr. de Pachmann have him in mind when he included Boston among the only three cities (Berlin and Rome were the other two) which, in his opinion, may boast of holding within their walls a musical critic? Surely neither in Europe nor in America the bird is so rare. But here, at least, Mr. Hale flies as one apart and in advance. May the eaglet of 70 soar on for many a year to come.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BANGOR
ME.
COMMERCIAL

Mar 7

UCT BOSTON SYMPHONY—George Schnee-ingfors, Finland, well known European conductor, rst appearance in the United States in March when t some of the concerts of the Boston Symphony hat city. He is one of the best ~~of continental lead-~~ eived engagements all over Europe.

MAR 6 1924
ADVERTISER,
Boston, Mass.

FINNISH STAR AT SYMPHONY

Finland's most famous orchestral conductor, Georg Schneevoight, made his first appearance in Boston yesterday as guest director at the Symphony concert. A man of unmistakable talent, vigor and artistic feeling, he made a very favorable impression.

Georg Schneevoight

First place on his program for this week's concerts is the D major symphony written by his compatriot, Jean Sibelius, a work of pastoral character, a tone painting of a rather gloomy landscape, typically Finnish, lit by pale, far Northern sunlight; a work poetical, emotional and, within bounds, intensely dramatic. The visiting conductor gave a crystal-clear reading of it, and the audience was almost giddily demonstrative.

There was also frenzied enthusiasm after the distinguished Finn's dynamic interpretation of "Don Juan," one of the Richard Strauss tone poems. In the hearty applause joined the modest Pierre Monteux, whose tenure as Symphony conductor is soon to end.

Mozart's serenade for string orchestra and Beethoven's third "Lenora" overture are the other numbers on the program. In the performance of these works, too, the great leader gave proof of his sound musicianship and lively temperament.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BAY CITY,
MICH.
TIMES
MAR 7 1924

Pierre Monteux, now finishing a four-year term with the Boston Symphony, is a conductor of elasticity and variety. Sinclair says he has found hearings for more composers than any three of his colleagues. He has a better ear than any conductor except Mengelberg and his limitations proceed from the fact that he cares more for the music than for the performance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM KALAMAZOO,
MICH.
GAZETTE

MAR 7 1924

Pierre Monteux, now finishing a four-year term with the Boston Symphony, is a conductor of elasticity and variety. Sinclair says he has found hearings for more composers than three of his colleagues. He has a better ear than any conductor except Mengelberg and his limitations proceed from the fact that he cares more for the music than for the performance.

[222]

BOSTON, MASS.
Christian Science Monitor
MAR 8 1924

Mr. Schneevoigt Conducts Boston Symphony Concert

The eighteenth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Georg Schneevoigt as guest conductor, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was:

Beethoven—Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, op. 72.
Mozart—"Eine Kleine Nachtmusik."
Strauss—"Don Juan."
Sibelius—Symphony No. 2 in D major, op. 43.

Of course, the main interest of the afternoon centered about the personality of the conductor. Although generally the guest conductor system, so prevalent in certain parts of Europe for the last few years, is hardly conducive to the highest state of perfection in orchestral playing, yet now and again an exception serves a good purpose. The exception of yesterday, if it served no other purpose, must have brought home to the audience of these Friday afternoon concerts how fortunate they have been in Mr. Monteux as a conductor, for it was he and he alone who formed the orchestra as it now is, and without his years of painstaking labor the magnificent instrument upon which Mr. Schneevoigt wrought his will would not now have been in existence

Judging Mr. Schneevoigt's conducting by a single hearing it would be difficult to over-praise it. Playing music which has long been familiar, he nevertheless succeeded in arousing and maintaining interest in his reading of it. And this was never done through the spectacular means so often resorted to by a visiting conductor. Mr. Schneevoigt quite evidently is more deeply concerned with bringing about an adequate interpretation of the music than with using it for personal display. Hence we were favored yesterday with a performance of Beethoven's "Leonore" which was distinguished for its imaginative beauty and for a keen appreciation of its dramatic import; a performance of Strauss' bombastic tone poem no less effective but above all for a rendering of Sibelius' second symphony that revealed unsuspected beauties in a work which, in spite of its comparative familiarity, has to a certain extent been enigmatic.

There is nothing of the virtuoso, nothing spectacular, about either Mr. Schneevoigt or his conducting. He plays upon the orchestra with the skill of a master, yet never seeks to make an effect for its own sake alone. To him the music itself is of supreme importance and to its proper interpretation he brings a truly remarkable wealth of imagination and poetic feeling. He is one of those few artists whom it is a real privilege to hear. Would that his stay among us might be prolonged.

S. M.

ESTABLISHED
From MAR 8 -1924
TRAVELER
Boston, Mass.

MONTEUX TO LEAD 'PEOPLE'S' CONCERT

Symphony Leader to Conduct at St. James

Mrs. Charles M. Cabot, Mrs. T. Russell Sullivan, Miss Mary Cabot Wheelwright and Mrs. Charles Bruen Perkins, who, with other well known Bostonians, are interested in providing good music for the people, and who have been busy, under the chairmanship of Miss Rose Lamb, in the effort to raise $10,000 with which to underwrite the People's Symphony orchestra for the current season, feel themselves particularly fortunate in having secured M. Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, as guest conductor of tomorrow afternoon's People's orchestra concert in the St. James Theatre. This is the 17th concert this year.

The varied program, which includs Saint Saens and Debussy, as interpreted by this gifted leader, will afford opportunity, the members of the committee feel, to demonstrate how valuable to good music in Boston the work of this organization is and should go far to stimulate further contributions. Early announcement is promised of a unique musical and social project to be undertaken by this committee for the further benefit of their fund.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN
N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 9 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The fourth and last concert but one of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in the Academy of Music Friday evening.

Pierre Monteux has arranged for this concert an entirely Wagnerian program, with Margaret Matzenauer, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, as soloist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW BEDFORD
MASS.
MAR 8 1924

(Birthday Encomiums from Carl Engel to Philip Hale in the Musical Quarterly.)

The championing of progress does not exclusively belong to youth. In the council of the ancients the oldest in years and youngest in spirit is Mr. Philip Hale. He is also the soundest critic America has had. On March 5, 1924, Mr. Hale will be three-score-years-and-ten. The dean of music critics in this country, he is still its keenest discoverer of new or unusual beauty. . . . We are so used to Mr. Hale's terse and unerring judgments that we accept them without sufficiently appreciating the wealth of learning, common sense and art from which they spring. What it would take the rest of us to say laboriously and incompletely in several pages he often crystallizes aptly in one sentence. His culture is wide. He has forgotten—if he does forget—more books and music than most people ever read and hear. That his encyclopedal knowledge comprises all the delightful things which ordinary wisdom rates as not worth knowing is the real secret of his charm. Seldom partisan, he is never unjust. He can be caustic, which is healthy. More often he is gently humorous. Never is he flippant. If in a Boston paper he conducts a witty and informative department which runs the vertical length of the page, it is because the space that properly belongs to him, below the horizontal double rule, does not exist in American journals.

Mr. Hale is of the brilliant family of old-world feuilletonistes and chroniqueurs, the Scholls, Clareties and Wolffs. It is regrettable that, so far, Mr. Hale's fugitive articles and essays have not been collected in book form. Other critics are known to be more intent upon the preservation of their less important products. A lasting monument, however, Mr. Hale has set himself in the programme books of the Boston Symphony orchestra. They have become a model. Also, they remain unrivalled. As a critic, as an educator of public taste in music, Mr. Hale has exercised a sway which is not merely local but national in scope. Did the facetious Mr. de Pachmann have him in mind when he included Boston among the only three cities (Berlin and Rome were the other two) which, in his opinion, may boast of holding within their walls a musical critic? Surely neither in Europe nor in America the bird is so rare. But here, at least, Mr. Hale flies as one apart and in advance. May the eaglet of 70 soar on for many a year to come.

NEW YORK
N. Y.
EVENING JOURNAL
MAR 8 -1924

PHILADELPHIA AND BOSTON BANDS HERE

Stokowski and Monteux Play Next Week—Other Concerts and the Opera.

The visiting orchestras from both Philadelphia and Boston will be heard in Carnegie Hall next week. On Tuesday evening Leopold Stokowski will bring his players here in a programme devoted wholly to Russian music and with a Russian singer as soloist. This concert will open with the overture to Glinka's opera, "Rousland and Ludmilla," and will include Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony and the dance from Rimsky-Korsakov's "The Snow Maiden." The soloist will be Nina Koshetz, who is to be heard in songs of Moussorgsky and Rimsky.

Stravinsky's "Consecration to Spring," which made so much of an impression at the Thursday evening concert of the Boston Orchestra a month ago, will be repeated by Mr. Monteux at the Saturday afternoon concert next week at Carnegie Hall. Also on this programme will be Schumann's Fourth Symphony and a violoncello concerto by Haydn with Jean Bedetti, of the orchestra, as soloist.

Next Thursday evening the programme offered by Mr. Monteux will consist wholly of music by Wagner—the "Meistersinger" prelude, the "Siegfried Idyll," the bac[illegible] from "Tannhaeuser," the [illegible] Ritt from "Die Walkueren [illegible] from kuere" and the Waldweben [illegible] "Siegfried." Margarete Matzenauer will be the soloist in excerpts from "Tristan" and "Die Gotterdaemmerung."

NEW YORK,
N. Y.
EVENING POST
MAR 8 1924

STRAVINSKY ONCE MORE

Boston Orchestra Will Repeat His Sensational Work, "The Rites of Spring"

Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" made such an unusual impression when performed here at the last Thursday concert of the Boston Symphony series that Pierre Monteux will repeat the performance for the benefit of the Saturday subscribers at the fourth visit of the orchestra on Saturday afternoon, March 15, in Carnegie Hall.

The Thursday evening concert of this pair will have a Wagnerian program, with Margaret Matzenauer as soloist.

The Saturday concert will include, besides Stavinsky's score, Schumann's Fourth Symphony and Haydn's 'cello concerto, with Jean Bedetti as soloist. The Thursday program will include the prelude to "The Mastersingers," a Siegfried Idyll, Isolde's narrative from the first act of "Tristan and Isolde," the Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser," the Ride of the Valkyries, "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," and Bruennhilde's culminating immolation scene from "The Dusk of the Gods."

1924

SIXTH SYMPHONY CONCERT

The sixth in the regular series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Sanders theatre was given on Thursday evening of last week. The orchestral numbers included Mendelssohn's overture in his "Midsummer Night's Dream" incidental music; the C major symphony "Jupiter" of Mozart, and Charpentier's suite, "Impressions of Italy." Miss Vera Janacopulos, soprano, was the soloist and her numbers included Three Poems for voice and orchestra, "Sheherazade" by Ravel.

It goes without saying that all the orchestral numbers were superbly played. Mendelssohn's overture to his incidental music for Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream" although written when the composer was hardly more than 17 years old, must be ranked as among his best work, for in his youth, he wrote more like himself before the time came when he was spoiled by adulation, and everything had to be strictly "proper" and anything out of the conventional shocked him greatly. No doubt, if Mendelssohn had been blessed with less of this world's goods he would have been a different and far greater composer than was the case.

Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony that followed on the program illustrates this point. The composer had but little in worldly possessions; life was a struggle, but in a few weeks he had written three symphonies that will stand so long as the art of music exists. The "Jupiter" is a well-named symphony, and is always welcome.

Another case of youthful excellence is the "Impressions" that Charpentier put to music when he was finishing his music study in Italy when about 30 years old. It is interesting music all through and as descriptive music, among the best of the latter day output. In five sections, it describes various phases of Italian life and the musical picture is most vivid. The performance was much enjoyed.

Miss Janacopulos has sung here before if memory serves, but the "Sheherazade" pieces of Ravel were heard for the first time at these concerts. These pieces are among Ravel's earlier works, and while strongly impressionistic, are not so vague and uncertain in their meaning as many of Ravel's later work: The sentiment is Oriental, not too much of Paris, truly poetical and dreamy music, all three numbers of the set seemed to be, and the singer well pictured both the thoughts of the poet and the composer.

The seventh concert in the series will be on Thursday evening, March 20. Carl Flesch, violinist, will be the soloist.

H. J. STORER

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK,
N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 9 1924

The Boston Symphony with Mme. Matzenauer will reappear Friday [illegible] in a Wagner program.

(ORIGINAL)
106-110 SEVENTH AVE.
NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From
Evening Sun MAR 8 1924
New York City

The Symphonies.

Next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, March 13 and 15, in Carnegie Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its last visit but one to New York this season. Pierre Monteux will present on Thursday a Wagnerian program with Margaret Matzenauer as soloist. She will sing Isolde's narrative from "Tristan," and Brunnehilde's immolation scene, which is the culmination of "Gutterdammerung." Pierre Monteux will also conduct "The Maestersingers" prelude, a Siegfried idyll, the "Tannhauser" Bacchanale, "The Ride of the Valkyries" and "Waldweben" from "Siegfried."

A feature of the matinee program will be the repetition of Stravinsky's "Sacre de Printemps" score, which aroused such considerable interest when introduced at the Thursday evening concert of the orchestra's last visit here. The soloist of the afternoon will be Jean Bedetti, the virtuoso of the orchestra, in Haydn's violoncello concerto. The introductory symphony will be the fourth of Schu-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N Y
MAR 9 1924

Local Orchestras on Tour; Two Visitors This Week

Philharmonic Away for a Week, New York Symphony, Under Damrosch, for Two; Stokowski and Monteux at Carnegie Hall

Both of our senior orchestras, after their concerts here this afternoon, are going on tour. Mr. Mengelberg and the Philharmonic Orchestra will be away a week, giving concerts in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Lancaster and two in Pittsburgh. Ernest Schelling will be the soloist on the tour, playing his own "Impressions of an Artist's Life" for piano and orchestra, which he will also give this afternoon at Carnegie Hall. Returning, the Philharmonic will be heard at the Metropolitan Opera House next Sunday afternoon, when Mr. Mengelberg will conduct the Mendelssohn Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," the Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan" and the Tchaikovsky Fifth Symphony.

There will be two soloists at the next students' concert at Carnegie Hall on Wednesday evening, March 19—Mr. Schelling and John Amans, flautist.

Bruno Walter will make his last appearance of the season with the New York Symphony Orchestra this afternoon at Aeolian Hall, with a program including Volkmar Andreae's Little Suite, postponed from February 28 and 29, and the Mendelssohn Scotch Symphony. Walter Damrosch will resume the New York Symphony baton on the two weeks' tour beginning to-morrow, with concerts in Poughkeepsie, Schenectady, Toronto, Battle Creek, Milwaukee and Chicago. Mr. Damrosch will give two concerts in Dayton, including one young people's program, and appearances in Akron, Buffalo, Wilkes-Barre, Scranton and Easton will complete the second week.

The New York Symphony's next home concert will be at Aeolian Hall on the 23d, when Nadia Reisenberg will play the Rimsky-Korsakoff piano concerto, which, apparently, has never been played in New York. Marcel Grandjany, harpist, will also appear as soloist. Paul Kochanski and Felix Salmud will be soloists in the Brahms Double Concerto for violin and 'cello at this season's final pair of Carnegie Hall concerts on March 27 and 28, when Mr. Damrosch, in answer to numerous requests, will repeat Stravinsky's "Le Chant du Rossignol." This is also listed for a Mengelberg program in the near future.

We shall not, however, be left without orchestral music during the week. Mr. Stokowski will lead the seventh subscription concert of the Philadelphia Orchestra on Tuesday evening at Carnegie Hall in an all-Russian program, with the Tchaikovsky Fifth Symphony as his principal number, and Nina Koshetz as soloist. The Boston Symphony will give an all-Wagner program, with Mme. Matzenauer as soloist, at Carnegie Hall on Thursday and in Brooklyn on Friday, and end its Saturday afternoon program with a repetition of Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps."

The American-National Orchestra will also be heard this week on Wednesday evening at Aeolian Hall, playing W. H. Humiston's "Southern Fantasie" in memory of its composer, and other American works by Nathan Novick, B. Sherman Fowler and William Schroeder.

MUSICAL DISTINCTION

THIS CLIPPING
NEW YORK
AMERICAN
MAR 9 1924

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will play an all-Wagner programme Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall. The list includes excerpts from "Die Meistersinger," "Tristan and Isolde," "Walkuere," "Siegfried," "Gotterdaemmerung," "Tannhauser" and the Siegfried Idyl. Margarete Matzenauer is soloist. The programme for Saturday afternoon consists of Schumann's symphony No. 4; Haydn's 'cello concerto, Jean Bedetti, soloist; Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps."

(Other Romeikes May Disappo
THIS CLIPPING FROM TH
BOSTON
MASS.
GLOBE
ISSUE OF 1924

Stravinsky's "Sacre de Printemps" made so deep an pression when Pierre Monteux and e Boston Symphony Orchestra intr uced it in New York at their concert at it will be repeated for the benef of the Saturday subscribers in the con rt to be given in Carnegie Hall on Sa rday faternoon.

---

have been F. Redmond in

BOSTON,
MASS.
Christian Science Monitor
MAR 8 1924

Mr. Schneevoigt Conducts Boston Symphony Concert

The eighteenth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Georg Schneevoigt as guest conductor, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was:

Beethoven—Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, op. 72.
Mozart—"Eine Kleine Nachtmusik."
Strauss—"Don Juan."
Sibelius—Symphony No. 2 in D major, op. 43.

Of course, the main interest of the afternoon centered about the personality of the conductor. Although generally the guest conductor system, so prevalent in certain parts of Europe for the last few years, is hardly conducive to the highest state of perfection in orchestral playing, yet now and again an exception serves a good purpose. The exception of yesterday, if it served no other purpose, must have brought home to the audience of these Friday afternoon concerts how fortunate they have been in Mr. Monteux as a conductor, for it was he and he alone who formed the orchestra as it now is, and without his years of painstaking labor the magnificent instrument upon which Mr. Schneevoigt wrought his will would not now have been in existence.

Judging Mr. Schneevoigt's conducting by a single hearing it would be difficult to over-praise it. Playing music which has long been familiar, he nevertheless succeeded in arousing and maintaining interest in his reading of it. And this was never done through the spectacular means so often resorted to by a visiting conductor. Mr. Schneevoigt quite evidently is more deeply concerned with bringing about an adequate interpretation of the music than with using it for personal display. Hence we were favored yesterday with a performance of Beethoven's "Leonore" which was distinguished for its imaginative beauty and for a keen appreciation of its dramatic import; a performance of Strauss' bombastic tone poem no less effective but above all for a rendering of Sibelius' second symphony that revealed unsuspected beauties in a work which, in spite of its comparative familiarity, has to a certain extent been enigmatic.

There is nothing of the virtuoso, nothing spectacular, about either Mr. Schneevoigt or his conducting. He plays upon the orchestra with the skill of a master, yet never seeks to make an effect for its own sake alone. To him the music itself is of supreme importance and to its proper interpretation he brings a truly remarkable wealth of imagination and poetic feeling. He is one of those few artists whom it is a real privilege to hear. Would that his stay among us might be prolonged.

S. M.

ESTABLISHED
From TRAVELER
Boston, Mass.
MAR 8 - 1924

MONTEUX TO LEAD 'PEOPLE'S' CONCERT

Symphony Leader to Conduct at St. James

Mrs. Charles M. Cabot, Mrs. T. Russell Sullivan, Miss Mary Cabot Wheelwright and Mrs. Charles Bruen Perkins, who, with other well known Bostonians, are interested in providing good music for the people, and who have been busy, under the chairmanship of Miss Rose Lamb, in the effort to raise $10,000 with which to underwrite the People's Symphony orchestra for the current season, feel themselves particularly fortunate in having secured M. Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, as guest conductor of tomorrow afternoon's People's orchestra concert in the St. James Theatre. This is the 17th concert this year.

The varied program, which includs Saint Saens and Debussy, as interpreted by this gifted leader, will afford opportunity, the members of the committee feel, to demonstrate how valuable to good music in Boston the work of this organization is and should go far to stimulate further contributions. Early announcement is promised of a unique musical and social project to be undertaken by this committee for the further benefit of their fund.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN
N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 9 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The fourth and last concert but one of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in the Academy of Music Friday evening. Pierre Monteux has arranged for this concert an entirely Wagner program, with Margaret Matzenauer, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, as soloist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW BEDFORD
MASS.
MAR 5 1924

(Birthday Encomiums from Carl Engel to Philip Hale in the Musical Quarterly.)

The championing of progress does not exclusively belong to youth. In the council of the ancients the oldest in years and youngest in spirit is Mr. Philip Hale. He is also the soundest critic America has had. On March 5, 1924, Mr. Hale will be three-score-years-and-ten. The dean of music critics in this country, he is still its keenest discoverer of new or unusual beauty. . . . We are so used to Mr. Hale's terse and unerring judgments that we accept them without sufficiently appreciating the wealth of learning, common sense and art from which they spring. What it would take the rest of us to say laboriously and incompletely in several pages he often crystallizes aptly in one sentence. His culture is wide. He has forgotten—if he does forget—more books and music than most people ever read and hear. That his encyclopedal knowledge comprises all the delightful things which ordinary wisdom rates as not worth knowing is the real secret of his charm. Seldom partisan, he is never unjust. He can be caustic, which is healthy. More often he is gently humorous. Never is he flippant. If in a Boston paper he conducts a witty and informative department which runs the vertical length of the page, it is because the space that properly belongs to him, below the horizontal double rule, does not exist in American journals.

Mr. Hale is of the brilliant family of old-world feuilletonistes and chroniqueurs, the Scholls, Claretics and Wolffs. It is regrettable that, so far, Mr. Hale's fugitive articles and essays have not been collected in book form. Other critics are known to be more intent upon the preservation of their less important products. A lasting monument, however, Mr. Hale has set himself in the programme books of the Boston Symphony orchestra. They have become a model. Also, they remain unrivalled. As a critic and educator of public taste in music Mr. Hale has exercised a sway which is not merely local but national in scope. Did the facetious Mr. de Pachmann have him in mind when he included Boston among the only three cities (Berlin and Rome were the other two) which, in his opinion, may boast of holding within their walls a musical critic? Surely neither in Europe nor in America the bird is so rare. But here, at least, Mr. Hale flies as one apart and in advance. May the eagle of 70 soar on for many a year to come.

NEW YORK
N. Y.
EVENING JOURNAL
MAR 8 - 1924

PHILADELPHIA AND BOSTON BANDS HERE

Stokowski and Monteux Play Next Week—Other Concerts and the Opera.

The visiting orchestras from both Philadelphia and Boston will be heard in Carnegie Hall next week. On Tuesday evening Leopold Stokowski will bring his players here in a programme devoted wholly to Russian music and with a Russian singer as soloist. This concert will open with the overture to Glinka's opera, "Rousland and Ludmilla," and will include Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony and the dance from Rimsky-Korsakov's "The Snow Maiden." The soloist will be Nina Koshetz, who is to be heard in songs of Moussorgsky and Rimsky.

Stravinsky's "Consecration to Spring," which made so much of an impression at the Thursday evening concert of the Boston Orchestra a month ago, will be repeated by Mr. Monteux at the Saturday afternoon concert next week at Carnegie Hall. Also on this programme will be Schumann's Fourth Symphony and a violoncello concerto by Haydn with Jean Bedetti, of the orchestra, as soloist.

Next Thursday evening the programme offered by Mr. Monteux will consist wholly of music by Wagner—the "Meistersinger" prelude, the "Siegfried Idyl," the bacchanale from "Tannhauser," the [illegible] from "Die Walkueren," [illegible] and the Waldweben from "Siegfried." Margarete Matzenauer will be the soloist in excerpts from "Tristan" and "Die Gotterdaemmerung."

NEW YORK,
N. Y.
EVENING POST
MAR 8 1924

STRAVINSKY ONCE MORE

Boston Orchestra Will Repeat His Sensational Work, "The Rites of Spring"

Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" made such an unusual impression when performed here at the last Thursday concert of the Boston Symphony series that Pierre Monteux will repeat the performance for the benefit of the Saturday subscribers at the fourth visit of the orchestra on Saturday afternoon, March 15, in Carnegie Hall.

The Thursday evening concert of this pair will have a Wagnerian program, with Margaret Matzenauer as soloist.

The Saturday concert will include, besides Stavinsky's score, Schumann's Fourth Symphony and Haydn's 'cello concerto, with Jean Bedetti as soloist. The Thursday program will include the prelude to "The Mastersingers," a Siegfried Idyll, Isolde's narrative from the first act of "Tristan and Isolde," the Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser," the Ride of the Valkyries, "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," and Bruennhilde's culminating immolation scene from "The Dusk of the Gods."

SIXTH SYMPHONY CONCERT

The sixth in the regular series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Sanders theatre was given on Thursday evening of last week. The orchestral numbers included Mendelssohn's overture in his "Midsummer Night's Dream" incidental music; the C major symphony "Jupiter" of Mozart, and Charpentier's suite, "Impressions of Italy." Miss Vera Janacopulos, soprano, was the soloist and her numbers included Three Poems for voice and orchestra, "Sheherazade" by Ravel.

It goes without saying that all the orchestral numbers were superbly played. Mendelssohn's overture to his incidental music for Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream" although written when the composer was hardly more than 17 years old, must be ranked as among his best work, for in his youth, he wrote more like himself before the time came when he was spoiled by adulation, and everything had to be strictly "proper" and anything out of the conventional shocked him greatly. No doubt, if Mendelssohn had been blessed with less of this world's goods he would have been a different and far greater composer than was the case.

Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony that followed on the program illustrates this point. The composer had but little in worldly possessions; life was a struggle, but in a few weeks he had written three symphonies that will stand so long as the art of music exists. The "Jupiter" is a well-named symphony, and is always welcome.

Another case of youthful excellence is the "Impressions" that Charpentier put to music when he was finishing his music study in Italy when about 30 years old. It is interesting music all through and as descriptive music, among the best of the latter day output. In five sections, it describes various phases of Italian life and the musical picture is most vivid. The performance was much enjoyed.

Miss Janacopulos has sung here before if memory serves, but the "Sheherazade" pieces of Ravel were heard for the first time at these concerts. These pieces are among Ravel's earlier works, and while strongly impressionistic, are not so vague and uncertain in their meaning as many of Ravel's later work. The sentiment is Oriental, not too much of Paris, truly poetical and dreamy music, all three numbers of the set seemed to be, and the singer well pictured both the thoughts of the poet and the composer.

The seventh concert in the series will be on Thursday evening, March 20. Carl Flesch, violinist, will be the soloist.

H. J. STORER

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK,
N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 9 1924

The Boston Symphony with Mme. Matzenauer will reappear Friday [illegible] in a Wagner program.

(ORIGINAL)
106-110 SEVENTH AVE.
NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From
Evening Sun
New York City
MAR 8 1924

The Symphonies.

Next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, March 13 and 15, in Carnegie Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its last visit but one to New York this season. Pierre Monteux will present on Thursday a Wagnerian program with Margaret Matzenauer as soloist. She will sing Isolde's narrative from "Tristan," and Brunnehilde's immolation scene, which is the culmination of "Gutterdammerung." Pierre Monteux will also conduct "The Maestersingers" prelude, a Siegfried idyll, the "Tannhauser" Bacchanale, "The Ride of the Valkyries" and "Waldweben" from "Siegfried."

A feature of the matinee program will be the repetition of Stravinsky's "Sacre de Printemps" score, which aroused such considerable interest when introduced at the Thursday evening concert of the orchestra's last visit here. The soloist of the afternoon will be Jean Bedetti, the virtuoso of the orchestra, in Haydn's violoncello concerto. The introductory symphony will be the fourth of Schu-

---

(Other Romeikes May Disappo
THIS CLIPPING FROM TH
BOSTON
MASS.
GLOBE
ISSUE OF 1924

Stravinsky's "Sacre de Printemps" made so deep an impression when Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra introduced it in New York at their concert that it will be repeated for the benefit of the Saturday subscribers in the concert to be given in Carnegie Hall on Saturday faternoon.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MAR 9 1924

Local Orchestras on Tour; Two Visitors This Week

Philharmonic Away for a Week, New York Symphony, Under Damrosch, for Two; Stokowski and Monteux at Carnegie Hall

Both of our senior orchestras, after their concerts here this afternoon, are going on tour. Mr. Mengelberg and the Philharmonic Orchestra will be away a week, giving concerts in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Lancaster and two in Pittsburgh. Ernest Schelling will be the soloist of the tour, playing his own "Impressions of an Artist's Life" for piano and orchestra, which he will also give this afternoon at Carnegie Hall. Returning, the Philharmonic will be heard at the Metropolitan Opera House next Sunday afternoon, when Mr. Mengelberg will conduct the Mendelssohn Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," the Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan" and the Tchaikovsky Fifth Symphony.

There will be two soloists at the next students' concert at Carnegie Hall on Wednesday evening, March 19: Mr. Schelling and John Amans, flautist.

Bruno Walter will make his last appearance of the season with the New York Symphony Orchestra this afternoon at Aeolian Hall, with a program including Volkmar Andreae's Little Suite, postponed from February 28 and 29, and the Mendelssohn Scotch Symphony. Walter Damrosch will resume the New York Symphony baton on the two weeks' tour beginning to-morrow, with concerts in Poughkeepsie, Schenectady, Toronto, Battle Creek, Milwaukee and Chicago. Mr. Damrosch will give two concerts in Dayton, including one young people's program, and appearances in Akron, Buffalo, Wilkes-Barre, Scranton and Easton will complete the second week.

The New York Symphony's next home concert will be at Aeolian Hall on the 23d, when Nadia Reisenberg will play the Rimsky-Korsakoff piano concerto, which, apparently, has never been played in New York. Marcel Grandjany, harpist, will also appear as soloist. Paul Kochanski and Felix Salmond will be soloists in the Brahms Double Concerto for violin and 'cello at this season's final pair of Carnegie Hall concerts on March 27 and 28, when Mr. Damrosch, in answer to numerous requests, will repeat Stravinsky's "Le Chant du Rossignol." This is also listed for a Mengelberg program in the near future.

We shall not, however, be left without orchestral music during the week. Mr. Stokowski will lead the seventh subscription concert of the Philadelphia Orchestra on Tuesday evening at Carnegie Hall in an all-Russian program, with the Tchaikovsky Fifth Symphony as his principal number, and Nina Koshetz as soloist. The Boston Symphony will give an all-Wagner program, with Mme. Matzenauer as soloist, at Carnegie Hall on Thursday and in Brooklyn on Friday, and end its Saturday afternoon program with a repetition of Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps."

The American National Orchestra will also be heard this week on Wednesday evening at Aeolian Hall, playing W. H. Humiston's "Southern Fantasie" in memory of its composer, and other American works by Nathan Novick, B. Sherman Fowler and William Schroeder.

MUSICAL INSTRUCTION
THIS CLIPPING
NEW YORK
AMERICAN
MAR 9 1924

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will play an all-Wagner programme Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall. The list includes excerpts from "Die Meistersinger," "Tristan and Isolde," "Walkuere," "Siegfried," "Gotterdaemmerung," "Tannhauser" and the Siegfried Idyl. Margarete Matzenauer is soloist. The programme for Saturday afternoon consists of Schumann's symphony No. 4; Haydn's 'cello concerto, Jean Bedetti, soloist; Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps."

INFORMATION OBSCURED

(Other Romeikes May Dis
THIS CLIPPING FROM TH
BOSTON
MASS.
GLOBE
ISSUE OF
R 9-1924

6 P M—Children's
6:30 P M—Dinne
Orchestra.
P M—Harvard U
Schenectad
A M—Time si
P M—Stock m
M—Produce
M—Weather.
Produce and

Tour; This Week

ek, New York for Two; rnegie Hall

in New York. Marcel pist will also appear as Kochanski and Felix soloists in the Brahms for violin and 'cello final pair of Carnegie on March 27 and 28, in answer to nu
will repeat Stravindu Rossignol." This a Mengelberg pre uture.
however be left with-sic during the week,
ll lead the seventh rt of the Philadel-Tuesday evening at an all-Russian pro-aikovsky Fifth Sym
ncipal number, and oloist. The Boston
ve an all Wagner
Matzenauer as so-
Hall on Thursday Friday, and end its program with a insky's "Le Sacre
ational Orchestra
d this week on
at Aeolian Hall, iston's "Southern of its composer, works by Nathan Fowler and Wil-

ESTABLISHED 1881
from TELEGRAM MAR 9 1924
New York City

ORCHESTRAS OFFER NOVEL PROGRAMS

The seventh concert in the Philadelphia Orchestra's series of ten here will be given on Tuesday evening next at Carnegie Hall, when an all-Russian program will be presented. The symphony will be the fifth of Tschaikowsky and the opening and closing numbers, the overture to Glinka's opera, "Rouslane et Ludmila," and the dance from Rimsky-Korsakow's opera, "The Snow Maiden." Mme. Nina Koshetz, Russian soprano, will be the soloist, singing songs by Moussorgsky and Rimsky-Korsakow.

In a program of music by Mozart and Mendelssohn the Society of the Friends of Music will give its next to last concert of the season this afternoon in Town Hall. Artur Bodanzky will conduct and the orchestra will be that of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Ossip Gabrilowitsch will be the soloist. His offering will be Mozart's concerto in A major (Kochel 4 8) for pianoforte and orchestra. Preceding the concerto Mr. Bodanzky will direct the orchestra in the overture to Mozart's opera, "La Clemenza di Tito." Following the concerto will be played Mendelssohn's "Italian Symphony."

Ernest Schelling will be soloist with the Philharmonic Orchestra at Carnegie Hall this afternoon, playing his own "Impressions of an Artist's Life." The Fifth Symphony of Beethoven and Liszt's "Les Preludes" complete the program, which will be under Mr. Mengelberg's direction.

Next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, in Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its last visit but one to New York this season.

Pierre Monteux will present on Thursday a Wagnerian program with Margaret Matzenauer as soloist. She will sing Isolde's Narrative from "Tristan and Brunnehilde's Immolation Scene which is the culmination of "Gotterdammerung." Pierre Monteux will also conduct "The Mastersingers" Prelude, Siegfried Idyll, the "Tannhauser" Bacchanale, "The Ride of the Vlkyries" and "Waldweben," from "Siegfried."

A feature of the matinee program will be the repetition of Stravinsky's "Sacre de Printemps" score. The soloist of the afternoon will be Jean Bedetti, the virtuoso of the orchestra, in Haydn's violoncello concerto. The introductory symphony will be the fourth of Schumann D minor.

Bruno Walter will direct the Symphony Society this afternoon at Aeolian Hall in a program containing Smetana's "Bartered Bride" overture, Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, Andreae's Little Suite, Strauss' "Don Juan," two excerpts from Schubert's "Rosamunde" music, and Weber's "Oberon" overture.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
EAGLE

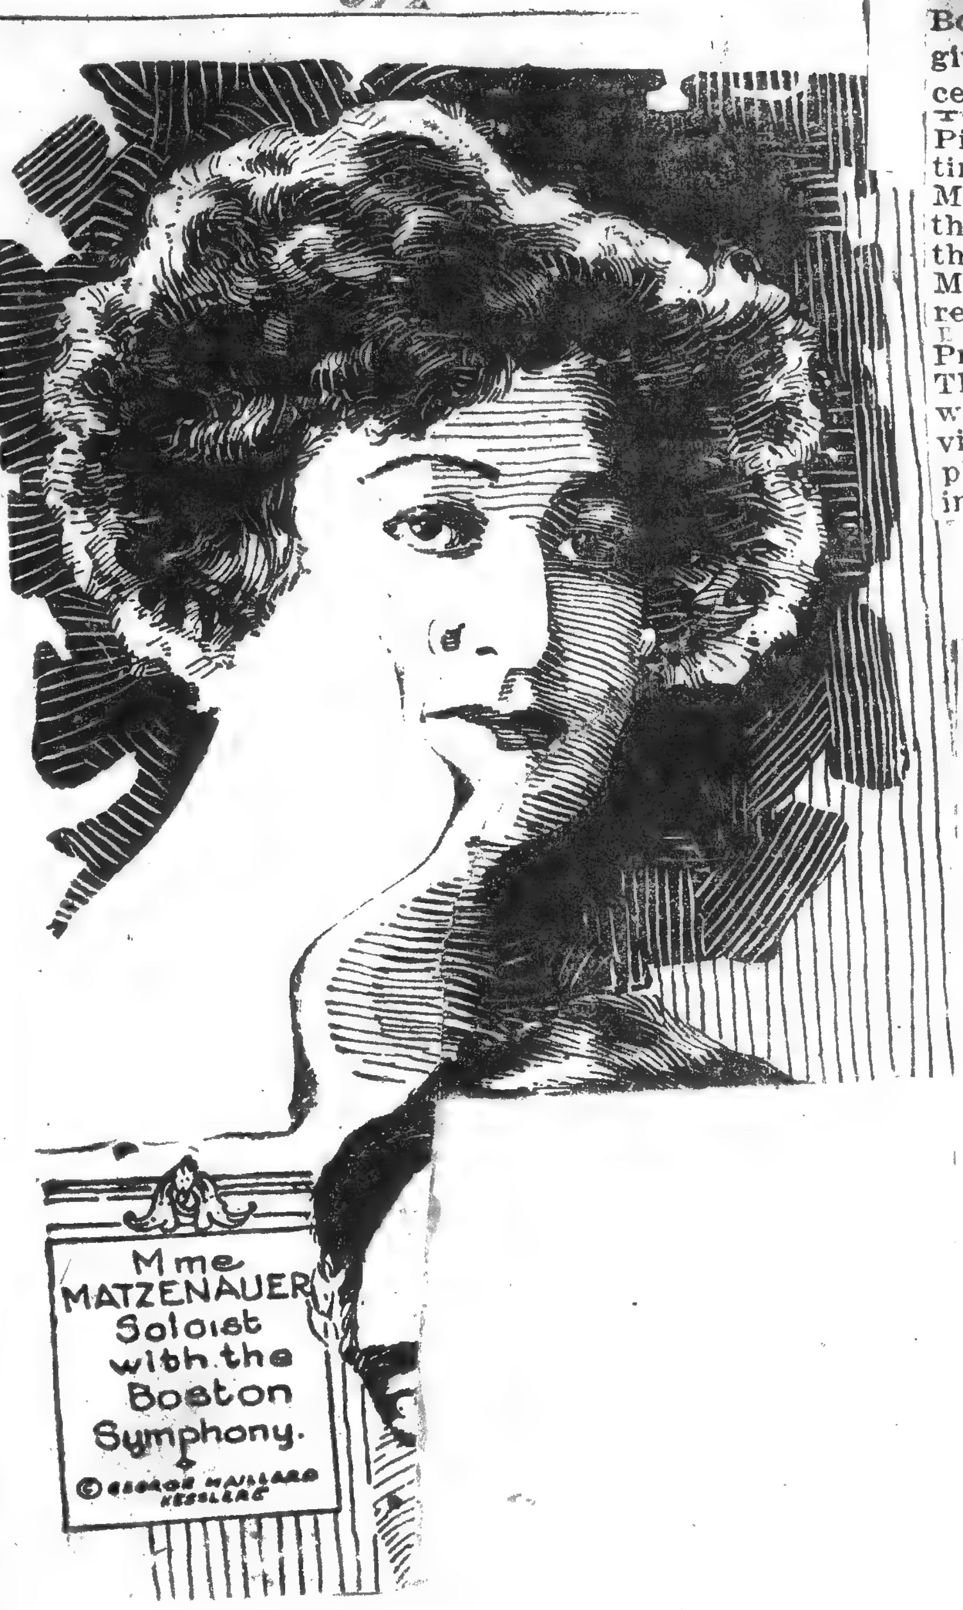
MAR9 1924

Boston Symphony.

The fourth Brooklyn concert of the Boston Symphony, Pierre Monteux, conductor, will be an event of Friday, in the Opera House of the Academy. At this concert an all-Wagner program will be offered, a repetition of that to be presented on Thursday evening at Carnegie Hall. Mme. Margaret Matzenauer, leading contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company, will be the soloist, singing Isolde's Narrative from the first act of "Tristan and Isolde" and Bruennhilde's Immolation Scene, the finale of "Die Goetterdaemmerung." It is more or less of a novelty to have a soloist on a Wagnerian program, though Monteux and others occasionally break the convention of all orchestral programs on such occasions. The orchestral numbers will include the "Siegfried Idyll," "The Ride of the Valkyries" and other excerpts from the greater music dramas.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD

MAR 9 1924



Mme MATZENAUER Soloist with the Boston Symphony.

© George Maillard Kesslere

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

MAR 9 1924

Wagnerian Program B yBoston Orchestra

The fourth and last concert but one of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra wil ltake place in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, March 14.

Pierre Monteux has arranged for this concert an entirely Wagnerian program, with Margaret Matzenauer, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, as soloist. This prima donna will appear in two great scenes from "Triston and Isolde" and "The Dusk of the Gods"—namely, the narrative of Isolde from the love drama and the glorious immolation scene of Brunnehilde, which is the culmination of the ring.

The other numbers will be "A Siegfried Idyll" (which bears particular interest at this time in that Wagner's son, Siegfried, for whom it was written on his first birthday, is now in this country), likewise the prelude to "The Meastersingers of Nuremberg," the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," "The "Ride of the Valkyries" and "Forest Murmurs" from the second act of "Siegfried."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
HERALD

MAR 9 1924

Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's programs for the week at Carnegie Hall are: Thursday Evening—Wagner, "Die Meistersinger" Prelude, "A Siegfried Idyll," "Tristan and Isolde," Isolde's Narrative, Act I., Mme. Margaret Matzenauer, soloist; "Tannhaeuser" Bacchanale, Act I., Scene 1; "Die Walkuere," Act III., "Ride of the Valkyries;" "Siegfried," Act II., "Forest Murmurs;" "Gotterdaemmerung," Bruenhilde's Immolation, Scene and Close, Mme. Matzenauer. Saturday Afternoon—Schumann, Symphony, No. 4, D minor; Haydn, cello concerto; Stravinsky, "Le Sacre de Printemps," "The Rite of Spring," A Picture of Pagan Russia, (a) The Adoration of the Earth; (b) The Sacrifice. Cello soloist, Jean Bedetti. The Stravinsky piece is being repeated at the Saturday concert on account of the unusual enthusiasm which it aroused when played on Thursday evening, January 31.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
EAGLE

MAR9 1924

Boston Symphony.

Next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, in Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fourth and last pair of concerts but one of the season in New York. At the Thursday concert Pierre Monteux will present an entirely Wagnerian program, with Madame Margaret Matzenauer of the Metropolitan Opera Company as the soloist. On Saturday afternoon Mr. Monteux will repeat Stravinsky's remarkable score, "Le Sacre de Printemps" (The Rites of Spring). The soloist of the matinee concert will be Jean Bedetti, the 'cello virtuoso of the orchestra, who will play Haydn's concerto for that instrument.

Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
EAGLE

MAR9 1924

Apropos, the final concert of the Boston Orchestra series will be given on April 4, with Moriz Rosenthal, pianist, as soloist. This concert will mark the last Brooklyn appearance of Pierre Monteux with the baton of the Boston band, which next year passes into the hands of Serge Koussivitsky, the eminent Russian conductor.

Heifetz and

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE
RHODE ISLAND
TRIBUNE

MAR 9 1924

To Broadcast Symphony

This afternoon at 3:30 o'clock the Boston Herald-Traveler Westinghouse station WBZ will broadcast the concert of the People's Symphony Orchestra of Boston, directed by the guest conductor, Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Monteux is considered as one of the best orchestral conductors in the country, and this afternoon's concert is quite an event.

This concert will be broadcast directly from the St. James Theatre, Boston, through the Hotel Brunswick studio.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TELEGRAPH

MAR ~~10~~ 9 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY NEXT SATURDAY

Much Mozart in Town Hall To-day. Bruno Walters's Final Concert in Aeolian Hall.

WALTER DAMROSCH'S TOUR

Stravinski's "Sacre du Printemps" made so deep an impression when Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra introduced it here at their last Thursday evening concert that it will be repeated for the benefit of the Saturday subscribers in the concert to be given at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon, March 15.

At the Thursday concert on March 13 of this the last visit but one of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux will present a Wagnerian program with Margaret Matzenauer as soloist.

The Saturday concert will include, besides Stravinski's score, Schumann's Fourth Symphony and Haydn's 'cello concerto, with Jean Bodetti as soloist. The Thursday program wil include the prelude to "The Mastersingers," a Siegfried Idyll, Isolde's Narrative from the first act of "Tristan and Isolde," the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," the Ride of the Valkyries, "Forest Murmurs" from Siegfried, and Brunnhilde's culminating

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BROOKLYN
N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

MAR9 1924

Mme. Matzenauer Soloist With Boston Orchestra in All-Wagner Programme Friday Night

The fourth and last concert but one of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in the Academy of Music next Friday evening.

Pierre Monteux has arranged for this concert an entirely Wagnerian programme, with Margaret Matzenauer, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, as soloist. This prima donna will appear in two great scenes from "Tristan and Isolde" and "The Dusk of the Gods," namely, the narrative of Isolde from the love drama, and the glorious Immolation Scene of Brunnehilde, which is the culmination of the Ring. The other numbers will be "A Siegfried Idyll" (bearing particular interest at this time in that Wagner's son, Siegfried, for whom it was written on his first birthday, is now in this country), likewise the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," "The Ride of the Valkyries," and "Forest Murmurs" from the second act of "Siegfried."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK,
N. Y.
TIMES

MAR 9 1924

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Thursday evening, Carnegie Hall; conductor, Monteux; soloist, Margaret Matzenauer:

WAGNER PROGRAM.

Prelude "Meistersinger."
"Siegfried Idyll."
Isolde's air, Act. I. "Tristan."
Bachanale, "Tannhauser."
"Ride of the Valkyries."
Forest Music, "Siegfried."
Air and finale, "Gotterdammerung."

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Saturday afternoon, Carnegie Hall; conductor, Monteux, and soloist, Jean Bedetti:

Fourth Symphony, D minor	Schum
'Cello concerto, D major	Hayd
"Sacre du Printemps"	St

(Other Romeikes May Disappoint)

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BOSTON
MASS.
GLOBE
ISSUE OF

9-1924

Mr Monteux, with the consent of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as required by his contract, has generously undertaken to conduct this afternoon's concert of the People's Symphony Orchestra, at the St James Theatre, for which he has very properly chosen a program of French music, hitherto scantily represented on the programs of this orchestra. This ought finally to scotch all rumors to the effect that there is on either side any real rivalry or bitterness of feeling between the Boston Symphony and the People's Symphony. Any one who has read the programs of the two orchestras with care, must have observed that one of the trustees of the Boston Symphony, Mr E. Sohier Welch, is also a member of the advisory committee of the People's Symphony, something which would not happen if the People's Symphony were hostile to the great and famous orchestra. As a matter of fact, each organization is doing useful and invaluable work for music in Boston, without any perceptible overlapping of their different fields of endeavor.

Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE PROVIDENCE
R. I.
JOURNAL

9 1924

For Easier Access to Students' Tickets for Concerts

To the Editor of the Sunday Journal:

It is very good of the Federation of Music Clubs and the Boston Symphony Orchestra to give out students tickets, but why make it so hard and cubersome to get these tickets?

The tickets for the John Powel concert were to be given out by a teacher in one of the down-town buildings. Unfortunately the teacher is not there all the time and nobody can expect it. Would it not be much more convenient for all concerned if these tickets could be had at the store where the tickets are to be exchanged. It would save one trip up the street and one would be always sure to find somebody present to give out the tickets. I sent six times for tickets without success.

It is worse with the Boston Symphony concert. The one who handles this matter in a down-town store requires applicants to appear personally. Now the students' tickets are not on sale until the day of the concert. Their number is limited, and unless one comes early in the morning, one may get left. To an out-of-town person this would mean two trips to town or to come in the morning and stay all day until the evening. Why tie a string to a gift and why not make it as easy and convenient as possible?

TEACHER.

Providence, March 6.

[224]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

(Other Romeikes May Disappoint)

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

BOSTON
MASS.
GLOBE
ISSUE OF

R 9-1924

8 P M—Children's
6:30 P M—Dinner
Orchestra.
P M—Harvard U
Schenectady
A M—Time si
P M—Stock m
P M—Produce
M—Weather.
Produce and

Tour; This Week

New York for Two; Carnegie Hall

in New York. Marcel pist will also appear as Kochanski and Felix soloists in the Brahms o for violin and 'cello final pair of Carnegie on March 27 and 28, in answer to nu will repeat Stravin- du Rossignol." This a Mengelberg pro- future.

however, be left with- sic during the week, ll lead the seventh rt of the Philadel- Tuesday evening at an all-Russian pro- aikovsky Fifth Sym- ncipal number, and oloist. The Boston ve an all-Wagner Matzenauer as so- Hall on Thursday Friday, and end its program with a insky's "Le Sacre ational Orchestra d this week on at Aeolian Hall, iston's "Southern of its composer, works by Nathan Fowler and Wil-

---

ESTABLISHED 1881
from TELEGRAM MAR 9 1924
New York City

ORCHESTRAS OFFER NOVEL PROGRAMS

The seventh concert in the Philadelphia Orchestra's series of ten here will be given on Tuesday evening next at Carnegie Hall, when an all-Russian program will be presented. The symphony will be the fifth of Tschaikowsky and the opening and closing numbers, the overture to Glinka's opera, "Rouslane et Ludmila," and the dance from Rimsky-Korsakow's opera, "The Snow Maiden." Mme. Nina Koshetz, Russian soprano, will be the soloist, singing songs by Moussorgsky and Rimsky-Korsakow.

In a program of music by Mozart and Mendelssohn the Society of the Friends of Music will give its next to last concert of the season this afternoon in Town Hall. Artur Bodanzky will conduct and the orchestra will be that of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Ossip Gabrilowitsch will be the soloist. His offering will be Mozart's concerto in A major (Kochel 488) for pianoforte and orchestra. Preceding the concerto Mr. Bodanzky will direct the orchestra in the overture to Mozart's opera, "La Clemenza di Tito." Following the concerto will be played Mendelssohn's "Italian Symphony."

Ernest Schelling will be soloist with the Philharmonic Orchestra at Carnegie Hall this afternoon, playing his own "Impressions of an Artist's Life." The Fifth Symphony of Beethoven and Liszt's "Les Preludes" complete the program, which will be under Mr. Mengelberg's direction.

Next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, in Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its last visit but one to New York this season. Pierre Monteux will present on Thursday a Wagnerian program with Margaret Matzenauer as soloist. She will sing Isolde's Narrative from "Tristan and Brunnehilde's Immolation Scene which is the culmination of "Gotterdammerung." Pierre Monteux will also conduct "The Mastersingers" Prelude, Siegfried Idyll, the "Tannhauser" Bacchanale, "The Ride of the Vlkyries" and "Waldweben," from "Siegfried."

A feature of the matinee program will be the repetition of Stravinsky's "Sacre de Printemps" score. The soloist of the afternoon will be Jean Bedetti, the virtuoso of the orchestra, in Haydn's violoncello concerto. The introductory symphony will be the fourth of Schumann D minor.

Bruno Walter will direct the Symphony Society this afternoon at Aeolian Hall in a program containing Smetana's "Bartered Bride" overture, Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, Andreae's Little Suite, Strauss' "Don Juan," two excerpts from Schubert's "Rosamunde" music, and Weber's "Oberon" overture.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
EAGLE

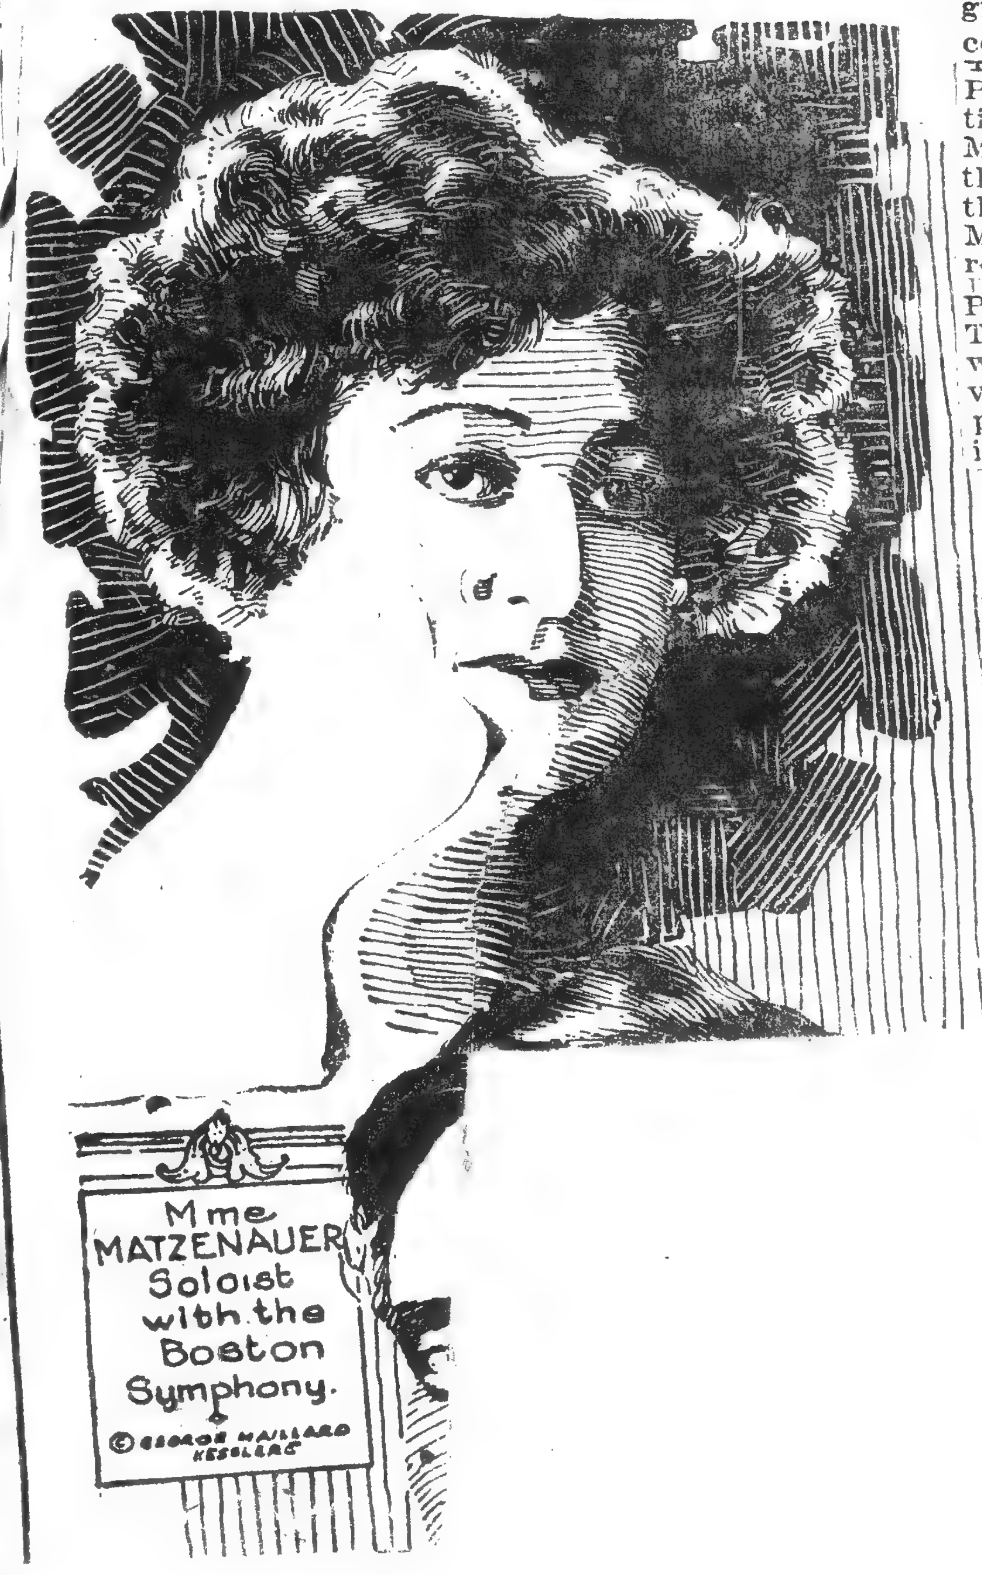
MAR9 1924

Boston Symphony.

The fourth Brooklyn concert of the Boston Symphony, Pierre Monteux, conductor, will be an event of Friday, in the Opera House of the Academy. At this concert an all-Wagner program will be offered, a repetition of that to be presented on Thursday evening at Carnegie Hall. Mme. Margaret Matzenauer, leading contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company, will be the soloist, singing Isolde's Narrative from the first act of "Tristan and Isolde" and Bruennhilde's Immolation Scene, the finale of "Die Goetterdaemmerung." It is more or less of a novelty to have a soloist on a Wagnerian program, though Monteux and others occasionally break the convention of all orchestral programs on such occasions. The orchestral numbers will include the "Siegfried Idyll," "The Ride of the Valkyries" and other excerpts from the greater music dramas.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD

MAR 9 1924



Mme MATZENAUER Soloist with the Boston Symphony.
© GEORGE MAILLARD KESSLERE

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

9 1924

Wagnerian Program B yBoston Orchestra

The fourth and last concert but one of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra wil ltake place in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, March 14.

Pierre Monteux has arranged for this concert an entirely Wagnerian program, with Margaret Matzenauer, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, as soloist. This prima donna will appear in two great scenes from "Triston and Isolde" and "The Dusk of the Gods"—namely, the narrative of Isolde from the love drama and the glorious immolation scene of Brunnehilde, which is the culmination of the ring.

The other numbers will be "A Siegfried Idyll" (which bears particular interest at this time in that Wagner's son, Siegfried, for whom it was written on his first birthday, is now in this country), likewise the prelude to "The Meastersingers of Nuremberg," the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," "The "Ride of the Valkyries" and "Forest Murmurs" from the second act of "Siegfried."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
HERALD

MAR 9 1924

Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's programs for the week at Carnegie Hall are: Thursday Evening—Wagner, "Die Meistersinger" Prelude, "A Siegfried Idyll," "Tristan and Isolde," Isolde's Narrative, Act I., Mme. Margaret Matzenauer, soloist; "Tannhaeuser" Bacchanale, Act I., Scene 1; "Die Walkuere," Act III., "Ride of the Valkyries;" "Siegfried," Act II., "Forest Murmurs;" "Gotterdaemmerung," Bruenhilde's Immolation, Scene and Close, Mme. Matzenauer. Saturday Afternoon—Schumann, Symphony, No. 4, D minor; Haydn, cello concerto; Stravinsky, "Le Sacre de Printemps," "The Rite of Spring," A Picture of Pagan Russia, (a) The Adoration of the Earth, (b) The Sacrifice. Cello soloist, Jean Bedetti. The Stravinsky piece is being repeated at the Saturday concert on account of the unusual enthusiasm which it aroused when played on Thursday evening, January 31.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
EAGLE

MAR9 1924

Boston Symphony.

Next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, in Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fourth and last pair of concerts but one of the season in New York. At the Thursday concert Pierre Monteux will present an entirely Wagnerian program, with Madame Margaret Matzenauer of the Metropolitan Opera Company as the soloist. On Saturday afternoon Mr. Monteux will repeat Stravinsky's remarkable score, "Le Sacre de Printemps" (The Rites of Spring). The soloist of the matinee concert will be Jean Bedetti, the 'cello virtuoso of the orchestra, who will play Haydn's concerto for that instrument.

Tel. Chelsea 8800

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
EAGLE

MAR9 1924

Apropos, the final concert of the Boston Orchestra series will be given on April 4, with Moriz Rosenthal, pianist, as soloist. This concert will mark the last Brooklyn appearance of Pierre Monteux with the baton of the Boston band, which next year passes into the hands of Serge Koussivitsky, the eminent Russian conductor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE
RHODE ISLAND
TRIBUNE

9 1924

To Broadcast Symphony

This afternoon at 3:30 o'clock the Boston Herald-Traveler Westinghouse station WBZ will broadcast the concert of the People's Symphony Orchestra of Boston, directed by the guest conductor, Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Monteux is considered as one of the best orchestral conductors in the country, and this afternoon's concert is quite an event.

This concert will be broadcast directly from the St. James Theatre, Boston, through the Hotel Brunswick studio.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TELEGRAPH

MAR ~~10~~ 9

BOSTON SYMPHONY NEXT SATURDAY

Much Mozart in Town Hall To-day.
Bruno Walters's Final Concert in Aeolian Hall.

WALTER DAMROSCH'S TOUR

Stravinski's "Sacre du Printemps" made so deep an impression when Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra introduced it here at their last Thursday evening concert that it will be repeated for the benefit of the Saturday subscribers in the concert to be given at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon, March 15.

At the Thursday concert on March 13 of this the last visit but one of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux will present a Wagnerian program with Margaret Matzenauer as soloist.

The Saturday concert will include, besides Stravinski's score, Schumann's Fourth Symphony and Haydn's 'cello concerto, with Jean Bodetti as soloist. The Thursday program wil include the prelude to "The Mastersingers," a Siegfried Idyll, Isolde's Narrative from the first act of "Tristan and Isolde," the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," the Ride of the Valkyries, "Forest Murmurs" from Siegfried, and Brunnhilde's culminating

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BROOKLYN
N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

MAR 9 1924

Mme. Matzenauer Soloist With Boston Orchestra in All-Wagner Programme Friday Night

The fourth and last concert but one of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in the Academy of Music next Friday evening.

Pierre Monteux has arranged for this concert an entirely Wagnerian programme, with Margaret Matzenauer, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, as soloist. This prima donna will appear in two great scenes from "Tristan and Isolde" and "The Dusk of the Gods," namely, the narrative of Isolde from the love drama, and the glorious Immolation Scene of Brunnehilde, which is the culmination of the Ring. The other numbers will be "A Siegfried Idyll" (bearing particular interest at this time in that Wagner's son, Siegfried, for whom it was written on his first birthday, is now in this country), likewise the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," "The Ride of the Valkyries," and "Forest Murmurs" from the second act of "Siegfried."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK,
N. Y.
TIMES

MAR 9 1924

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Thursday evening, Carnegie Hall; conductor, Monteux; soloist, Margaret Matzenauer:

WAGNER PROGRAM.

Prelude "Meistersinger."
"Siegfried Idyll."
Isolde's air, Act. I. "Tristan."
Bachanale, "Tannhauser."
"Ride of the Valkyries."
Forest Music, "Siegfried."
Air and finale, "Gotterdammerung."

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Saturday afternoon, Carnegie Hall; conductor, Monteux, and soloist, Jean Bedetti:

Fourth Symphony, D minor.......Schumann
'Cello concerto, D major...........Haydn
"Sacre du Printemps"...........Stravinsky

(Other Romeikes May Disappoint)
THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BOSTON
MASS.
GLOBE
ISSUE OF

9-1924

Mr Monteux, with the consent of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as required by his contract, has generously undertaken to conduct this afternoon's concert of the People's Symphony Orchestra, at the St James Theatre, for which he has very properly chosen a program of French music, hitherto scantily represented on the programs of this orchestra. This ought finally to scotch all rumors to the effect that there is on either side any real rivalry or bitterness of feeling between the Boston Symphony and the People's Symphony. Any one who has read the programs of the two orchestras with care, must have observed that one of the trustees of the Boston Symphony, Mr E. Sohier Welch, is also a member of the advisory committee of the People's Symphony, something which would not happen if the People's Symphony were hostile to the great and famous orchestra. As a matter of fact, each organization is doing useful and invaluable work for music in Boston, without any perceptible overlapping of their different fields of endeavor.

Tel. Chelsea 8800

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE PROVIDENCE
R. I.
JOURNAL

9 1924

For Easier Access to Students' Tickets for Concerts

To the Editor of the Sunday Journal:

It is very good of the Federation of Music Clubs and the Boston Symphony Orchestra to give out students tickets, but why make it so hard and cubersome to get these tickets?

The tickets for the John Powel concert were to be given out by a teacher in one of the down-town buildings. Unfortunately the teacher is not there all the time and nobody can expect it. Would it not be much more convenient for all concerned if these tickets could be had at the store where the tickets are to be exchanged. It would save one trip up the street and one would be always sure to find somebody present to give out the tickets. I sent six times for tickets without success.

It is worse with the Boston Symphony concert. The one who handles this matter in a down-town store requires applicants to appear personally. Now the students' tickets are not on sale until the day of the concert. Their number is limited, and unless one comes early in the morning, one may get left. To an out-of-town person this would mean two trips to town or to come in the morning and stay all day utnil the evening. Why tie a string to a gift and why not make it as easy and convenient as possible? TEACHER.

Providence, March 6.

[224]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

(Other Romeikes May Disappoint)

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

BOSTON
MASS.
GLOBE
ISSUE OF

9-1924

6 P M—Children's
6:30 P M—Dinne
Orchestra.
8 P M—Harvard U
WGY, Schenectad
11:55 A M—Time si
12:30 P M—Stock m
12:40 P M—Produce
12:45 P M—Weather,
3 P M—Produce and

Tour; This Week

New York for Two; Carnegie Hall

in New York. Marcel will also appear as Kochanski and Felix soloists in the Brahms for violin and 'cello final pair of Carnegie on March 27 and 28, in answer to nu will repeat Stravin "du Rossignol." This a Mengelberg pre future.

however, be left with during the week, will lead the seventh of the Philadel Tuesday evening at an all-Russian pro Tschaikovsky Fifth Sym principal number, and soloist. The Boston give an all-Wagner Matzenauer as so- Hall on Thursday Friday, and end its program with a Stravinsky's "Le Sacre National Orchestra this week on at Aeolian Hall, Boston's "Southern of its composer, works by Nathan Fowler and Wil-

---

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
TELEGRAM MAR 9 1924
New York City

ORCHESTRAS OFFER NOVEL PROGRAMS

The seventh concert in the Philadelphia Orchestra's series of ten here will be given on Tuesday evening next at Carnegie Hall, when an all-Russian program will be presented. The symphony will be the fifth of Tschaikowsky and the opening and closing numbers, the overture to Glinka's opera, "Rouslane et Ludmila," and the dance from Rimsky-Korsakow's opera, "The Snow Maiden." Mme. Nina Koshetz, Russian soprano, will be the soloist, singing songs by Moussorgsky and Rimsky-Korsakow.

In a program of music by Mozart and Mendelssohn the Society of the Friends of Music will give its next to last concert of the season this afternoon in Town Hall. Artur Bodanzky will conduct and the orchestra will be that of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Ossip Gabrilowitsch will be the soloist. His offering will be Mozart's concerto in A major (Kochel 488) for pianoforte and orchestra. Preceding the concerto Mr. Bodanzky will direct the orchestra in the overture to Mozart's opera, "La Clemenza di Tito." Following the concerto will be played Mendelssohn's "Italian Symphony."

Ernest Schelling will be soloist with the Philharmonic Orchestra at Carnegie Hall this afternoon, playing his own "Impressions of an Artist's Life." The Fifth Symphony of Beethoven and Liszt's "Les Preludes" complete the program, which will be under Mr. Mengelberg's direction.

Next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, in Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its last visit but one to New York this season.

Pierre Monteux will present on Thursday a Wagnerian program with Margaret Matzenauer as soloist. She will sing Isolde's Narrative from "Tristan and Brunnehilde's Immolation Scene which is the culmination of "Gotterdammerung." Pierre Monteux will also conduct "The Mastersingers" Prelude, Siegfried Idyll, the "Tannhauser" Bacchanale, "The Ride of the Vlkyries" and "Waldweben," from "Siegfried."

A feature of the matinee program will be the repetition of Stravinsky's "Sacre de Printemps" score. The soloist of the afternoon will be Jean Bedetti, the virtuoso of the orchestra, in Haydn's violoncello concerto. The introductory symphony will be the fourth of Schumann D minor.

Bruno Walter will direct the Symphony Society this afternoon at Aeolian Hall in a program containing Smetana's "Bartered Bride" overture, Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, Andreae's Little Suite, Strauss' "Don Juan," two excerpts from Schubert's "Rosamunde" music, and Weber's "Oberon" overture.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
EAGLE

MAR9 1924

Boston Symphony.

The fourth Brooklyn concert of the Boston Symphony, Pierre Monteux, conductor, will be an event of Friday, in the Opera House of the Academy. At this concert an all-Wagner program will be offered, a repetition of that to be presented on Thursday evening at Carnegie Hall. Mme. Margaret Matzenauer, leading contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company, will be the soloist, singing Isolde's Narrative from the first act of "Tristan and Isolde" and Bruennhilde's Immolation Scene, the finale of "Die Goetterdaemmerung." It is more novelty to have a nerian program and others occas convention of al grams on such oc chestral numbers "Siegfried Idyll," Valkyries" and ot the greater music

William Van Anden
an Advertising Me Class in the U that if any
This paper served of speci lished
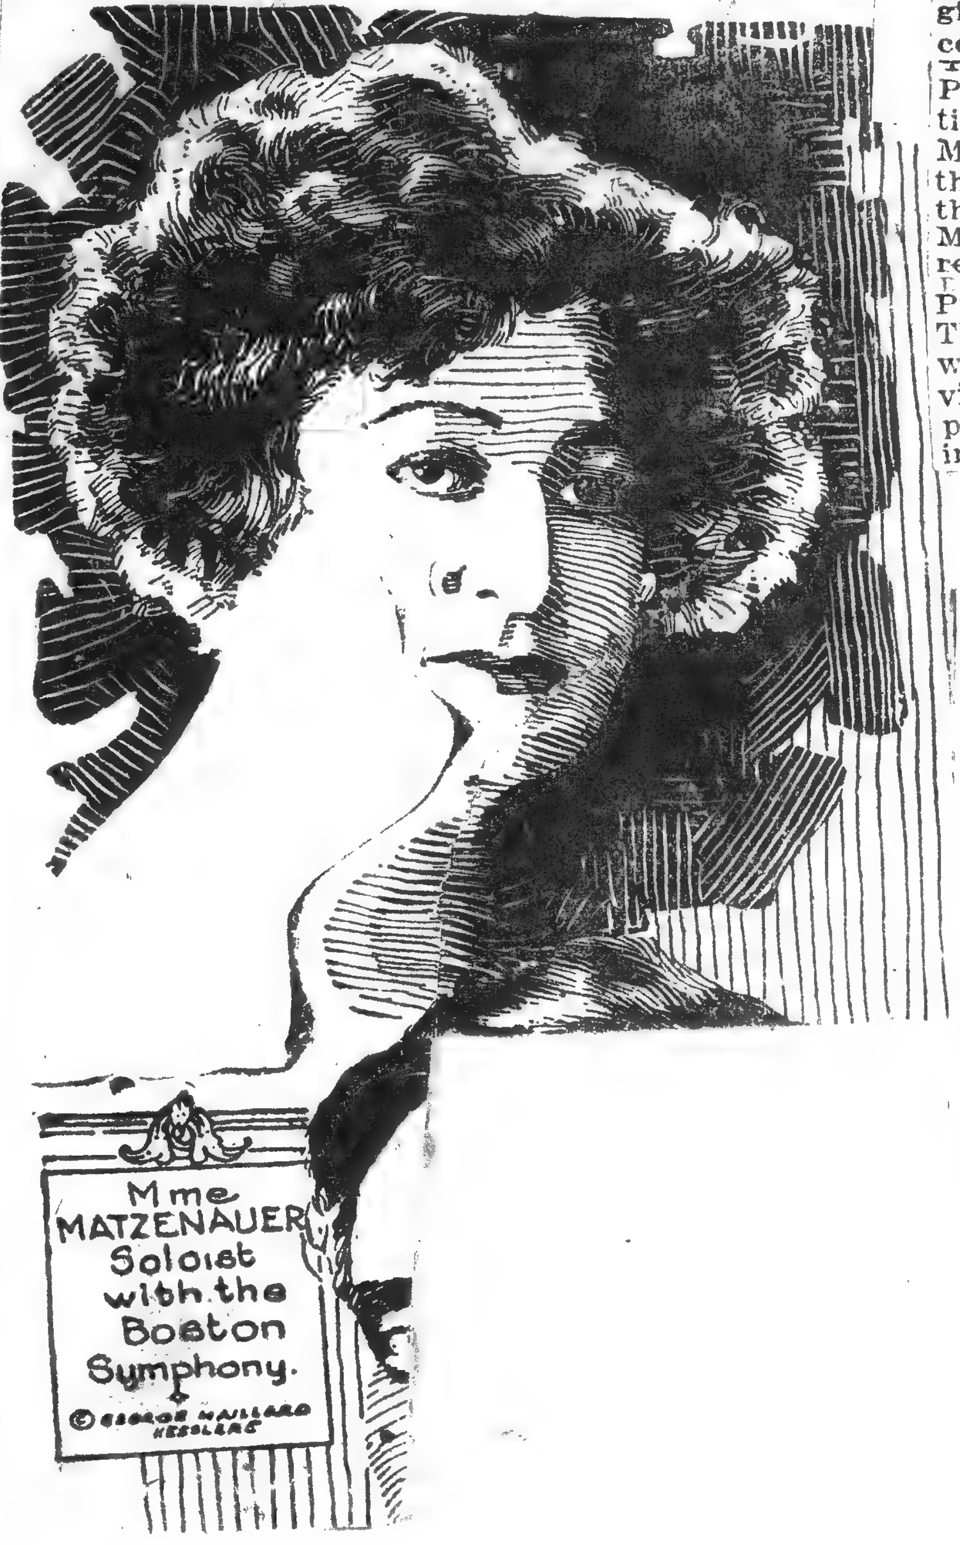
the

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD

MAR 9 1924



Mme MATZENAUER Soloist with the Boston Symphony.
© GEORGE MAILLARD KESSLERE

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

9 1924

Wagnerian Program By Boston Orchestra

The fourth and last concert but one of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, March 14.

Pierre Monteux has arranged for this concert an entirely Wagnerian program, with Margaret Matzenauer, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, as soloist. This prima donna will appear in two great scenes from "Triston and Isolde" and "The Dusk of the Gods"—namely, the narrative of Isolde from the love drama and the glorious immolation scene of Brunnehilde, which is the culmination of the ring.

The other numbers will be "A Siegfried Idyll" (which bears particular interest at this time in that Wagner's son, Siegfried, for whom it was written on his first birthday, is now in this country), likewise the prelude to "The Meastersingers of Nuremberg," the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," "The "Ride of the Valkyries" and "Forest Murmurs" from the second act of "Siegfried."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
HERALD

MAR 9 1924

Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's programs for the week at Carnegie Hall are: Thursday Evening—Wagner, "Die Meistersinger" Prelude, "A Siegfried Idyll," "Tristan and Isolde," Isolde's Narrative, Act I., Mme. Margaret Matzenauer, soloist; "Tannhaeuser" Bacchanale, Act I., Scene 1; "Die Walkuere," Act III., "Ride of the Valkyries;" "Siegfried," Act II., "Forest Murmurs;" "Gotterdaemmerung," Bruenhilde's Immolation, Scene and Close, Mme. Matzenauer. Saturday Afternoon—Schumann, Symphony, No. 4, D minor; Haydn, cello concerto; Stravinsky, "Le Sacre de Printemps," "The Rite of Spring," A Picture of Pagan Russia, (a) The Adoration of the Earth; (b) The Sacrifice. Cello soloist, Jean Bedetti. The Stravinsky piece is being repeated at the Saturday concert on account of the unusual enthusiasm which it aroused when played on Thursday evening, January 31.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
EAGLE

MAR9 1924

Boston Symphony.

Next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, in Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fourth and last pair of concerts but one of the season in New York. At the Thursday concert Pierre Monteux will present an entirely Wagnerian program, with Madame Margaret Matzenauer of the Metropolitan Opera Company as the soloist. On Saturday afternoon Mr. Monteux will repeat Stravinsky's remarkable score, "Le Sacre de Printemps" (The Rites of Spring). The soloist of the matinee concert will be Jean Bedetti, the 'cello virtuoso of the orchestra, who will play Haydn's concerto for that instrument.

Tel. Chelsea 8800

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
EAGLE

MAR9 1924

Apropos, the final concert of the Boston Orchestra series will be given on April 4, with Moriz Rosenthal, pianist, as soloist. This concert will mark the last Brooklyn appearance of Pierre Monteux with the baton of the Boston band, which next year passes into the hands of Serge Koussivitsky, the eminent Russian conductor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE
RHODE ISLAND
TRIBUNE

MAR 9 1924

To Broadcast Symphony

This afternoon at 3:30 o'clock the Boston Herald-Traveler Westinghouse station WBZ will broadcast the concert of the People's Symphony Orchestra of Boston, directed by the guest conductor, Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Monteux is considered as one of the best orchestral conductors in the country, and this afternoon's concert is quite an event.

This concert will be broadcast directly from the St. James Theatre, Boston, through the Hotel Brunswick studio.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TELEGRAPH

MAR ~~10~~ 9 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY NEXT SATURDAY

Much Mozart in Town Hall To-day. Bruno Walters's Final Concert in Aeolian Hall.

WALTER DAMROSCH'S TOUR

Stravinski's "Sacre du Printemps" made so deep an impression when Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra introduced it here at their last Thursday evening concert that it will be repeated for the benefit of the Saturday subscribers in the concert to be given at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon, March 15.

At the Thursday concert on March 13 of this the last visit but one of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux will present a Wagnerian program with Margaret Matzenauer as soloist.

The Saturday concert will include, besides Stravinski's score, Schumann's Fourth Symphony and Haydn's 'cello concerto, with Jean Bodetti as soloist. The Thursday program wil include the prelude to "The Mastersingers," a Siegfried Idyll, Isolde's Narrative from the first act of "Tristan and Isolde," the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," the Ride of the Valkyries, "Forest Murmurs" from Siegfried, and Brunnhilde's culminating

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BROOKLYN
N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

MAR9 1924

Mme. Matzenauer Soloist With Boston Orchestra in All-Wagner Programme Friday Night

The fourth and last concert but one of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in the Academy of Music next Friday evening.

Pierre Monteux has arranged for this concert an entirely Wagnerian programme, with Margaret Matzenauer, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, as soloist. This prima donna will appear in two great scenes from "Tristan and Isolde" and "The Dusk of the Gods," namely, the narrative of Isolde from the love drama, and the glorious Immolation Scene of Brunnehilde, which is the culmination of the Ring. The other numbers will be "A Siegfried Idyll" (bearing particular interest at this time in that Wagner's son, Siegfried, for whom it was written on his first birthday, is now in this country), likewise the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," "The Ride of the Valkyries," and "Forest Murmurs" from the second act of "Siegfried."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK,
N. Y.
TIMES

MAR 9 1924

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Thursday evening, Carnegie Hall; conductor, Monteux; soloist, Margaret Matzenauer:

WAGNER PROGRAM.
Prelude "Meistersinger."
"Siegfried Idyll."
Isolde's air, Act. I. "Tristan."
Bachanale, "Tannhauser."
"Ride of the Valkyries."
Forest Music, "Siegfried."
Air and finale, "Gotterdammerung."

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Saturday afternoon, Carnegie Hall; conductor, Monteux, and soloist, Jean Bedetti:
Fourth Symphony, D minor.......Schumann
'Cello concerto, D major..........Haydn
"Sacre du Printemps"...........Stravinsky

(Other Romeikes May Disappoint)

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BOSTON
MASS.
GLOBE
ISSUE OF

9-1924

Mr Monteux, with the consent of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as required by his contract, has generously undertaken to conduct this afternoon's concert of the People's Symphony Orchestra, at the St James Theatre, for which he has very properly chosen a program of French music, hitherto scantily represented on the programs of this orchestra. This ought finally to scotch all rumors to the effect that there is on either side any real rivalry or bitterness of feeling between the Boston Symphony and the People's Symphony. Any one who has read the programs of the two orchestras with care, must have observed that one of the trustees of the Boston Symphony, Mr E. Sohier Welch, is also a member of the advisory committee of the People's Symphony, something which would not happen if the People's Symphony were hostile to the great and famous orchestra. As a matter of fact, each organization is doing useful and invaluable work for music in Boston, without any perceptible overlapping of their different fields of endeavor.

Tel. Chelsea 8800

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE PROVIDENCE
R. I.
JOURNAL

9 1924

For Easier Access to Students' Tickets for Concerts

To the Editor of the Sunday Journal:

It is very good of the Federation of Music Clubs and the Boston Symphony Orchestra to give out students tickets, but why make it so hard and cubersome to get these tickets?

The tickets for the John Powel concert were to be given out by a teacher in one of the down-town buildings. Unfortunately the teacher is not there all the time and nobody can expect it. Would it not be much more convenient for all concerned if these tickets could be had at the store where the tickets are to be exchanged. It would save one trip up the street and one would be always sure to find somebody present to give out the tickets. I sent six times for tickets without success.

It is worse with the Boston Symphony concert. The one who handles this matter in a down-town store requires applicants to appear personally. Now the students' tickets are not on sale until the day of the concert. Their number is limited, and unless one comes early in the morning, one may get left. To an out-of-town person this would mean two trips to town or to come in the morning and stay all day until the evening. Why tie a string to a gift and why not make it as easy and convenient as possible?

TEACHER.

Providence, March 6.

[224]

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BOSTON

MASSACHUSETTS

~~AMERICAN~~ Post

MAR 10 1924

MONTEUX DIRECTS PEOPLE'S

Orchestra Under Him Displays Unexpected Virtuosity

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Yesterday was the reddest of all red-letter days in the history of the People's Symphony Orchestra.

At its concert in the St. James Theatre it played with a degree of interpretive eloquence and with an abundance of technical and tonal virtues heretofore unknown to it. And small wonder, since it was led on this notable occasion by no less able and distinguished a conductor than Pierre Monteux.

A FRENCH PROGRAMME

When George Schneevoight came to direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concerts of last week, Mr. Monteux might justly have considered himself entitled to a well-earned holiday. Instead, he assumed the burden of leading another and less highly trained band than his own: an act of gracious generosity as typical of his unfailing kindness and courtesy as the skill with which he discharged this self-imposed task was characteristic of his fine qualities as musician and conductor.

It was altogether fitting that the greatest of French conductors should be heard yesterday in a programme made wholly of French music. For beginning came the monumental Symphony of Cesar Franck, and in order the other pieces were Saint-Saens' picturesque and colorful "Suite Algerienne"; that miracle of musical device, Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun"; and the brilliant "Fete Polonaise" from Chabrier's opera "Le Roi Malgre Lui."

When last season the Symphony Orchestra commemorated Franck's Centenary his Symphony headed the programme, and at that time it was felt in many quarters that Mr. Monteux had brought that noble music to more completely eloquent performance than it had ever before received in this city. Yesterday he had at his command a less numerous, less practiced orchestra, yet so far as Mr. Monteux was concerned the performance stood on the high level of its predecessor.

And in this Symphony, perhaps more than in any other piece of the afternoon, the People's Symphony responded with a warmth, a fervor, a euphony and even a virtuosity that was hardly to be anticipated. Thus in a single concert, and with no great number of rehearsals, Mr. Monteux gave further evidence of the prowess which enabled him to make from a disorganized and depleted band the superb instrument that is today the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

106-110 SEVENTH AVE.
NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From MAR 10 1924
ADVERTISER,
Boston, Mass.

MONTEUX IS CONDUCTOR AT PEOPLE'S SYMPHONY

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday led the People's Symphony Orchestra at the St. James in a concert of the most beautiful modern French music.

Monteux's gave exquisite shadings to Franck's D Minor symphony and Debussy's "L'Apres Midi d'un Faun" prelude. Saint-Saens' exotic Algerian Suite was also handled with delightful imagination.

BE SURE ITS HENRY
(Other Romeikes May Disappoint)

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

BOSTO
MASS.
GLOBE
ISSUE OF
MAR 10 1924

MONTEUX CONDUCTS PEOPLE'S SYMPHONY

Fine Performance of French Program

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted yesterday's concert of the People's Symphony as a guest conductor. This is the first time in the history of the Boston Symphony that its conductor has led a concert by another other organization during the season. The permission of the Boston Symphony trustees was necessary under the terms of Mr Monteux' contract, and was willingly granted.

The People's Symphony surpassed itself under its distinguished leader in playing an exacting program of French music. There were repeated ovations for Mr Monteux, which he invariably tried to share with the players. In the intermission he was presented a large laurel wreath. The St James Theatre was sold out, and hundreds were turned away.

This concert marks the end of any enmity that might have existed in past years between the two local orchestras, and proves that the position of the People's Symphony as a popular and valuable Boston organization is now firmly established. Its present campaign for a fund to meet its deficit will be aided by the striking success of yesterday's concert.

Mr Monteux' program began with Cesar Franck's symphony, and included another great modern classic, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun." He balanced these exacting numbers with two pieces demanding less from players and audience, Saint-Saens' "Algerian Suite" and an excerpt from Chabrier's opera, "King in Spite of Himself."

Each piece seemed to please those in the theatre, although somebody was heard remarking that probably many of the radio fans who were listening in as the program was broadcast thought that they were having trouble with static when they got the first measures of Debussy's distinctly modern music.

To one accustomed to hearing both Mr Monteux' conducting and the People's Symphony, but not in combination, the conjunction threw interesting sidelights on both. No further proof of Monteux' skill and taste as a whipper into shape of orchestras than yesterday's performance is needed. He has had plenty of practice in dealing with new and not always superlative material in rebuilding the Boston Symphony after the double calamities of war and strike. With only three rehearsals he managed to make the People's Symphony play much better than it has ever yet played, and in a difficult program.

The euphony, the quality and flexibility of tone, and the skill of most of the principal players to whom incidental solos fell yesterday spoke volumes in favor of the personnel of the People's Symphony. One doubts if any orchestra in America not put beyond comparison with this one by great endowment and control of the players' entire time can equal it.

There were, of course, weak points here and there, occasional slips by individual players and defects in separate sections of the band which it would be unfair and unkind to pillory here.

But the general average of the performance was astonishingly high. The men played with a zest, an eagerness to do their best, which would hearten any conductor. Mr Monteux in return did his best for them, and that best is very good indeed.

The simplest thing on the program, the "Fete Polonais," went the worst, because the men found it difficult to play such apparently simple dance music with the subtlety Mr Monteux rightly demanded. The best thing about the concert was the obvious wholehearted pleasure the audience took in it all.

P. R.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PORTLAND,
ME.
PRESS-HERALD

MAR 11 1924

Interest High Over Symphony Concert

Boston Orchestra Will Appear Here March 26; Last Year For Conductor Monteux

There is already great interest in the coming of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Wednesday, March 26, when the famous organization will give a concert in City Hall auditorium under the auspices of the Portland Music Commission. The present season of the Boston Symphony orchestra is the most brilliant in its history and of noteworthy interest is the fact that it is the farewell season of Pierre Monteux, the illustrious French conductor, whose fifth year will end his term.

The seat sale for this concert will not be held until Tuesday and Wednesday, March 25 and 26, but owing to the widespread interest, orders for reserved seats are already being received by mail and the Music Commission will give careful attention to such applications in the order of their receipt at Room 59, Portland City Hall. Checks should be made payable to the Music Commission.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

PORTLAND
ME.
Express and Advertiser

MAR 11 1924

MUSIC LOVERS OF PORTLAND EAGER TO HEAR SYMPHONY

Big Demand For Seats At City Hall

It is evident that Portland residents and music lovers elsewhere in Maine keep well informed regarding musical matters, despite their remoteness from musical centers, for they are keenly alert to the fact that the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season are considered the most brilliant in the history of that orchestra since Arthur Nikisch first stepped on the platform of old Music Hall.

This is shown in the eagerness of concert goers to secure seats for the tenth muncipal concert in City Hall auditorium, Wednesday, aMrch 26, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 100 performers, under Pierre Monteux, conductor, will be t sole attraction on the occasion o what will be its only appearance in aine this season.

As a museum brings visual works of art before the people; the Boston Symphony Orchestra does its great service to the art of music. It was endowed and supported for the inestimable public benefit it might bring, and through 40 years of concerts in Boston, New York, and other principal cities, this world-famous organization has splendidly fulfilled its purpose.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has brought to the light of ide f r- formance the great wealth w r- chestral music. The music in composers, both American a a eign, which might otherwise is silent and unknown, has f presentation and recognition way.

A glance at the lives of th dred members, reveals the orchestra as a great organic main source of musical activity. The musicians are the best of their kind, and have been brought from every corner of the old world, where musical life flowers from traditional roots centuries old. These virtuosos make America their country. Their sons grow up to be American citizens and often become fine musicians, taking their place in the Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony players naturally give their first genius to the matchless performances of the Orchestra, and yet this is but part of their service to the community. They instill their talent by teaching. They form among themselves Quartettes and other small ensembles such as the Kneisel Quartette and the new Burgin Quartette. The individual virtuosos give concerts of their own. Thus the message of music in smaller forms is spread throughout the country.

Some former members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who have left its ranks to carry music into other parts are: Franz Kneisel and his Quartette, Nicolai Sokoloff and Gustav Strube, the present conductors of the Cleveland and Baltimore Symphony Orchestras respectively, Max Zach, until his recent death conductor of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra, Modeste Alloo, Assistant conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, Emil Mollenhauer, conductor of the Handel and Haydn Choral Society, the oldest musical organization in America, C. M. Loeffler, now named as the foremost American composer, and many others.

The seat sale for the local concert will not be held until Tuesday and Wednesday, March 25 and 26, but owing to the widespread interest, orders for reserved seats are already being received by mail and the Music Commission will give careful attention to such applications in the order of their receipt at Room 59, Portland City Hall. Checks should be made payable to the Music Commission.

ONCERT AT FRYE

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

BOSTON
MASS.
TELEGRAM
ISSUE OF
MAR 11 1924

FELIX FOX PLAYS WIT SYMPHON

Heard in Schuma Piano Concerto a Soloist

The Boston Symphony Orch gave the fourth concert of its day evening series last nigh Symphony Hall. Felix Fox, pi was the soloist. The progra comprised of Brahms Symphon D major, the Schumann piano co certo and the Lalo Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys."

MR. FOX'S PLAYING

The symphony is not "popula the sense that Beethoven's Fi Schubert's "Unfinished" are po The melodic lines are quite dif nd at times difficult, yet the per nce last night was so smooth hrasing so neatly turned as to e y merit the generous applause ac d both orchestra and conductor.

One of the outstanding charm Mr. Fox's playing lies in his re for his instrument. He does no deavor to compete with the orche but rather to make himself a pa it. His tone is never superficial at no time does he appear to for If occasionally one felt the lack o timental value, one simultaneous came aware of the absolute sin of the man. The enthusiasm o audience belied the words of th adage concerning the honor o prophet in his own country.

A vivid performance of the Overture, with its beautiful violoncello solo, brought to a close a concert for which Mr. Monteux has reason to be proud.

From MAR 11 1924
TRAVELER
Boston, Mass.

AT SYMI

Another large audience assem last evening for the fourth extra co cert by the Boston Symphony orche tra. This series of Monday evening concerts, once each month, has proved particularly enjoyable this winter. The programs have been carefully selected and each concert has brought forward something of special interest. Last evening was memorable for two rea sons—the brilliant performance of th Brahms Symphony No. 2 in D majo and the appearance of Felix Fox, pianist, as guest soloist of the evening.

The first hour of the program was occupied by the Brahms symphony. The orchestra, under Mr. Monteux, conductor, gave a spirited rendering of this too seldom heard composition. The character of the music is pastoral and springlike. The themes are simple bu brilliantly developed. The air see filled with sunshine and the laugh of children. Nor is it lacking in co trast. Like an April day it has flying cloud shadows, its quick pas storms that leave the sky bluer more serene—but through it all golden sunshine sparkles and fla The third movement is wonder beautiful.

Mr. Fox played Robert Schum certo in A minor for the pian full orchestra. It was nd a noteworthy perfo ty and beauty; it quality of an ori a dramatic Fox handled the long a superb eling and ancy of t he prog number lo's

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BOSTON,
MASS.
HERALD

11 1924

LARGE AUDIENCE GREETS SYMPHONY

Fourth Monday Concert Well Applauded

For the fourth Monday concert, given last night in Symphony hall, Mr. Monteux set forth the Brahms D major symphony, the Schumann piano concerto (Felix Fox, soloist), and Lalo's overture to "Le Roi d'Y's." The audience was both large and enthusiastic.

Mr. Monteux showed a daring approaching rashness when he made fully three-quarters of his program last night from music by composers who scholars have sworn these 50 and 75 years, were pitifully ignorant of the proper way to write for an orchestra. Or is it possible that Mr. Monteux, a man of practical experience, fails to share the views of the theorists? His accompaniment to the concerto, at all events, set one to marvelling afresh at the well-sounding music Schumann, in his awkwardness and ignorance, could contrive—and also at the folly folk will still be talking.

And as for the unfortunate Brahms th his lack of feeling for timbres of struments, let us on our knees thank for that lack which led him to e the D major symphony precisely wrote it. His lack of sensitive- to color! Because he did not choose ake his music sound like that of ikovsky does it follow, pray, that he knew not the principles that govern choice? n the brilliant and poetic performance of last night, especially of the last two movements, it is hard to guess who would complain of the sound. sound of the concerto's solo part Mr. Fox in his turn made very beautiful. Putting virtuosity, like temptation, steadfastly behind him, he chose to play in modest vein, as though the piano stood not much more to the fore than the oboe, say, or the horn. In the intermezzo his method made for a performance singularly exquisite. The result seemed less successful, however, in the first movement and the last where, after all, warmth and brilliancy on the part of the soloist are needful if the concerto is to make its effect. Mr. Fox was cordially applauded.

At the next Monday concert, April 7, the last, unfortunately, which Mr. Monteux will conduct, the soloist will va Gauthier, mezzo-soprano.

R. R. G.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NORTHAMPTON
MASSACHUSETTS
GAZETTE

MAR 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS HERE TOMORROW NIGHT

Jean Bedetti Will Be Soloist at Symphony Concert in Smith Concert Course

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Pierre Monteux, will give a concert in John M. reene hall Wednesday evening at eight o'clock. Jean Bedetti will be the soloist. The program is as follows:

Symphony No. 1 in C Minor, Op. 68 Brahms
Un poco sostenuto; Allegro.
Andante sostenuto.
Un poco ellegretto e grazio so.
Adagio; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.
Suite from Daphnis and Chloe Ravel
Concerto in D major for Violincello Haydn derato
from "Prince Borodin

INFORMATION OBSCURED

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON
MASSACHUSETTS
~~AMERICAN~~ Post

MAR 10 1924

MONTEUX DIRECTS PEOPLE'S

Orchestra Under Him Displays Unexpected Virtuosity

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Yesterday was the reddest of all red-letter days in the history of the People's Symphony Orchestra.

At its concert in the St. James Theatre it played with a degree of interpretive eloquence and with an abundance of technical and tonal virtues heretofore unknown to it. And small wonder, since it was led on this notable occasion by no less able and distinguished a conductor than Pierre Monteux.

A FRENCH PROGRAMME

When George Schneevoight came to direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concerts of last week, Mr. Monteux might justly have considered himself entitled to a well-earned holiday. Instead, he assumed the burden of leading another and less highly trained band than his own: an act of gracious generosity as typical of his unfailing kindness and courtesy as the skill with which he discharged this self-imposed task was characteristic of his fine qualities as musician and conductor.

It was altogether fitting that the greatest of French conductors should be heard yesterday in a programme made wholly of French music. For beginning came the monumental Symphony of Cesar Franck, and in order the other pieces were Saint-Saens' picturesque and colorful "Suite Algerienne"; that miracle of musical device, Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun"; and the brilliant "Fete Polonaise" from Chabrier's opera "Le Roi Malgre Lui."

When last season the Symphony Orchestra commemorated Franck's Centenary his Symphony headed the programme, and at that time it was felt in many quarters that Mr. Monteux had brought that noble music to more completely eloquent performance than it had ever before received in this city. Yesterday he had at his command a less numerous, less practiced orchestra, yet so far as Mr. Monteux was concerned the performance stood on the high level of its predecessor.

And in this Symphony, perhaps more than in any other piece of the afternoon, the People's Symphony responded with a warmth, a fervor, a euphony and even a virtuosity that was hardly to be anticipated. Thus in a single concert, and with no great number of rehearsals, Mr. Monteux gave further evidence of the prowess which enabled him to make from a disorganized and depleted band the superb instrument that is today the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

106-110 SEVENTH AVE.
NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From MAR 10 1924
ADVERTISER,
Boston, Mass.

MONTEUX IS CONDUCTOR AT PEOPLE'S SYMPHONY

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday led the People's Symphony Orchestra at the St. James in a concert of the most beautiful modern French music.

[illegible] of Monteux's baton gave exquisite shadings to Franck's D Minor symphony and Debussy's "L'Apres Midi d'un Faun" prelude. Saint-Saens' exotic Algerian Suite was also handled with delightful imagination.

BE SURE ITS HENRY
(Other Romeikes May Disappoint)
THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BOSTO
MASS.
GLOBE
ISSUE OF
MAR 10 1924

MONTEUX CONDUCTS PEOPLE'S SYMPHONY

Fine Performance of French Program

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted yesterday's concert of the People's Symphony as a guest conductor. This is the first time in the history of the Boston Symphony that its conductor has led a concert by another other organization during the season. The permission of the Boston Symphony trustees was necessary under the terms of Mr Monteux' contract, and was willingly granted.

The People's Symphony surpassed itself under its distinguished leader in playing an exacting program of French music. There were repeated ovations for Mr Monteux, which he invariably tried to share with the players. In the intermission he was presented a large laurel wreath. The St James Theatre was sold out, and hundreds were turned away.

This concert marks the end of any enmity that might have existed in past years between the two local orchestras, and proves that the position of the People's Symphony as a popular and valuable Boston organization is now firmly established. Its present campaign for a fund to meet its deficit will be aided by the striking success of yesterday's concert.

Mr Monteux' program began with Cesar Franck's symphony, and included another great modern classic, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun." He balanced these exacting numbers with two pieces demanding less from players and audience, Saint-Saens' "Algerian Suite" and an excerpt from Chabrier's opera, "King in Spite of Himself."

Each piece seemed to please those in the theatre, although somebody was heard remarking that probably many of the radio fans who were listening in as the program was broadcast thought that they were having trouble with static when they got the first measures of Debussy's distinctly modern music.

To one accustomed to hearing both Mr Monteux' conducting and the People's Symphony, but not in combination, the conjunction threw interesting sidelights on both. No further proof of Monteux' skill and taste as a whipper into shape of orchestras than yesterday's performance is needed. He has had plenty of practice in dealing with new and not always superlative material in rebuilding the Boston Symphony after the double calamities of war and strike. With only three rehearsals he managed to make the People's Symphony play much better than it has ever yet played, and in a difficult program.

The euphony, the quality and flexibility of tone, and the skill of most of the principal players to whom incidental solos fell yesterday spoke volumes in favor of the personnel of the People's Symphony. One doubts if any orchestra in America not put beyond comparison with this one by great endowment and control of the players' entire time can equal it.

There were, of course, weak points here and there, occasional slips by individual players and defects in separate sections of the band which it would be unfair and unkind to pillory here.

But the general average of the performance was astonishingly high. The men played with a zest, an eagerness to do their best, which would hearten any conductor. Mr Monteux in return did his best for them, and that best is very good indeed.

The simplest thing on the program, the "Fete Polonais," went the worst, because the men found it difficult to play such apparently simple dance music with the subtlety Mr Monteux rightly demanded. The best thing about the concert was the obvious wholehearted pleasure the audience took in it all.

P. R.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND,
ME.
PRESS-HERALD
MAR 11 1924

Interest High Over Symphony Concert

Boston Orchestra Will Appear Here March 26; Last Year For Conductor Monteux

There is already great interest in the coming of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Wednesday, March 26, when the famous organization will give a concert in City Hall auditorium under the auspices of the Portland Music Commission. The present season of the Boston Symphony orchestra is the most brilliant in its history and of noteworthy interest is the fact that it is the farewell season of Pierre Monteux, the illustrious French conductor, whose fifth year will end his term.

The seat sale for this concert will not be held until Tuesday and Wednesday, March 25 and 26, but owing to the widespread interest, orders for reserved seats are already being received by mail and the Music Commission will give careful attention to such applications in the order of their receipt at Room 59, Portland City Hall. Checks should be made payable to the Music Commission.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE PORTLAND
ME.
Express and Advertiser
MAR 11 1924

MUSIC LOVERS OF PORTLAND EAGER TO HEAR SYMPHONY

Big Demand For Seats At City Hall

It is evident that Portland residents and music lovers elsewhere in Maine keep well informed regarding musical matters, despite their remoteness from musical centers, for they are keenly alert to the fact that the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season are considered the most brilliant in the history of that orchestra since Arthur Nikisch first stepped on the platform of old Music Hall.

This is shown in the eagerness of concert goers to secure seats for the tenth muncipal concert in City Hall auditorium, Wednesday, aMrch 26, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 100 performers, under Pierre Monteux, conductor, will be t[illegible] sole attraction on the occasion o[illegible] what will be its only appearance in [illegible]aine this season.

As a museum brings visual works of art before the people; the Boston Symphony Orchestra does its great service to the art of music. It was endowed and supported for the inestimable public benefit it might bring, and through 40 years of concerts in Boston, New York, and other principal cities, this world-famous organization has splendidly fulfilled its purpose.

The Boston Symphony Orches[illegible] has brought to the light of ide[illegible] formance the great wealth [illegible]f [illegible]r-chestral music. The music [illegible] w composers, both American a[illegible] r eign, which might otherwise [illegible] in silent and unknown, has f[illegible] a presentation and recognition [illegible]is way.

A glance at the lives of th[illegible] dred members, reveals the orchestra as a great organic main source of musical activity. The musicians are the best of their kind, and have been brought from every corner of the old world, where musical life flowers from traditional roots centuries old. These virtuosos make America their country. Their sons grow up to be American citizens and often become fine musicians, taking their place in the Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony players naturally give their first genius to the matchless performances of the Orchestra, and yet this is but part of their service to the community. They instill their talent by teaching. They form among themselves Quartettes and other small ensembles such as the Kneisel Quartette and the new Burgin Quartette. The individual virtuosos give concerts of their own. Thus the message of music in smaller forms is spread throughout the country.

Some former members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who have left its ranks to carry music into other parts are: Franz Kneisel and his Quartette, Nicolai Sokoloff and Gustav Strube, the present conductors of the Cleveland and Baltimore Symphony Orchestras respectively, Max Zach, until his recent death conductor of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra, Modeste Alloo, Assistant conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, Emil Mollenhauer, conductor of the Handel and Haydn Choral Society, the oldest musical organization in America, C. M. Loeffler, now named as the foremost American composer, and many others.

The seat sale for the local concert will not be held until Tuesday and Wednesday, March 25 and 26, but owing to the widespread interest, orders for reserved seats are already being received by mail and the Music Commission will give careful attention to such applications in the order of their receipt at Room 59, Portland City Hall. Checks should be made payable to the Music Commission.

ONCERT AT ERVF

(Other Romeikes May Disappoint)
THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BOSTON
MASS.
TELEGRAM
ISSUE OF
MAR 11 1924

FELIX FOX PLAYS WIT SYMPHON

Heard in Schuma Piano Concerto a Soloist

The Boston Symphony Orch gave the fourth concert of its day evening series last nigh Symphony Hall. Felix Fox, pi was the soloist. The progra comprised of Brahms Sympho D major, the Schumann piano c certo and the Lalo Overture to "L Roi d'Ys."

MR. FOX'S PLAYING

The symphony is not "popula the sense that Beethoven's Fi Schubert's "Unfinished" are po The melodic lines are quite diff nd at times difficult, yet the per nce last night was so smo hrasing so neatly turned as to e y merit the generous applause ac d both orchestra and conductor. One of the outstanding charm Mr. Fox's playing lies in his re for his instrument. He does not deavor to compete with the orche but rather to make himself a pa it. His tone is never superficial at no time does he appear to for If occasionally one felt the lack of timental value, one simultaneousl came aware of the absolute sinc of the man. The enthusiasm o audience belied the words of th adage concerning the honor of prophet in his own country.

A vivid performance of the Overture, with its beautiful violoncello solo, brought to a close a concert for which Mr. Monteux has reason to be proud.

From MAR 11 1924
TRAVELER
Boston, Mass.

SYMI

Another large audience assemb last evening for the fourth extra co cert by the Boston Symphony orche tra. This series of Monday evening concerts, once each month, has proved particularly enjoyable this winter. The programs have been carefully selected and each concert has brought forward something of special interest. Last evening was memorable for two rea sons—the brilliant performance of th Brahms Symphony No. 2 in D majo and the appearance of Felix Fox, pianist, as guest soloist of the evening.

The first hour of the program was occupied by the Brahms symphony. The orchestra, under Mr. Monteux, conductor, gave a spirited rendering of this too seldom heard composition. The character of the music is pastoral and springlike. The themes are simple bu brilliantly developed. The air see filled with sunshine and the laugh of children. Nor is it lacking in co trast. Like an April day it has flying cloud shadows, its quick pas storms that leave the sky bluer more serene—but through it all golden sunshine sparkles and fla The third movement is wonder beautiful.

Mr. Fox played Robert Schum certo in A minor for the pian full orchestra. It was nd a noteworthy perfor ty and beauty; it quality of an ori a dramatic Fox handled the long a superb eling and ancy of t he prog number- alo's opera

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON,
MASS.
HERALD

LARGE AUDIENCE GREETS SYMPHONY

Fourth Monday Concert Well Applauded

For the fourth Monday concert, given last night in Symphony hall, Mr. Monteux set forth the Brahms D major symphony, the Schumann piano concerto (Felix Fox, soloist), and Lalo's overture to "Le Roi d'Ys." The audience was both large and enthusiastic.

Mr. Monteux showed a daring approaching rashness when he made fully three-quarters of his program last night from music by composers who scholars have sworn these 50 and 75 years, were pitifully ignorant of the proper way to write for an orchestra. Or is it possible that Mr. Monteux, a man of practical experience, fails to share the views of the theorists? His accompaniment to the concerto, at all events, set one to marvelling afresh at the well-sounding music Schumann, in his awkwardness and ignorance, could contrive—and also at the folly folk will still be talking.

And as for the unfortunate Brahms th his lack of feeling for timbres of struments, let us on our knees thank for that lack which led him to e the D major symphony precisely a wrote it. His lack of sensitive to color! Because he did not choose ake his music sound like that of ikovsky does it follow, pray, that e knew not the principles that govern choice? n the brilliant and poetic performance of last night, especially of the last two movements, it is hard to guess who would complain of the sound. The sound of the concerto's solo part Mr. Fox in his turn made very beautiful. Putting virtuosity, like temptation, steadfastly behind him, he chose to play in modest vein, as though the piano stood not much more to the fore than the oboe, say, or the horn. In the intermezzo his method made for a performance singularly exquisite. The result seemed less successful, however, in the first movement and the last where, after all, warmth and brilliancy on the part of the soloist are needful if the concerto is to make its effect. Mr. Fox was cordially applauded.

At the next Monday concert, April 7, the last, unfortunately, which Mr. Monteux will conduct, the soloist will va Gauthier, mezzo-soprano.

R. R. G.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NORTHAMPTON
MASSACHUSETTS
GAZETTE
MAR 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS HERE TOMORROW NIGHT

Jean Bedetti Will Be Soloist at Symphony Concert in Smith Concert Course

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Pierre Monteux, will give a concert in John M. Greene hall Wednesday evening at eight o'clock. Jean Bedetti will be the soloist. The program is as follows:

Symphony No. 1 in C Minor, Op. 68 — Brahms
Un poco sostenuto; Allegro.
Andante sostenuto.
Un poco ellegretto e grazio so.
Adagio; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.
Suite from Daphnis and Chloe — Ravel
Concerto in D major for Violincello — Haydn
[illegible]oderato
[illegible]
[illegible] from "Prince [illegible]" — Borodin

[225]

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BOSTON,
MASS.
HERALD

11 1924

AUDIENCE
EETS SYMPHONY

h Monday Concert Wel Applauded

the fourth Monday concert, given night in Symphony hall, Mr. Mon- set forth the Brahms D major ony, the Schumann piano con- (Felix Fox, soloist), and Lalo's rs to "Le Roi d'Y's." The audience was both large and enthusiastic. Monteux showed a daring ap- ing rashness when he made ful- ee-quarters of his program last from music by composers who s have sworn these 50 and 75 were pitifully ignorant of the way to write for an orchestra it possible that Mr. Monteux, a f practical experience, fails to the views of the theorists? His pointment to the concerto, at all set one to marvelling afresh at ll-sounding music Schumann, in kwardness and ignorance, could ve—and also at the folly folk will e talking.

as for the unfortunate Brahms his lack of feeling for timbres of ments, let us on our knees thank or that lack which led him to the D major symphony precisely w e it. His lack of sensitive- ! Because he did not choose is music sound like that of ky does it follow, pray, that not the principles that govern in the brilliant and poetic per- e of last night, especially of t two movements, it is hard to who would complain of the sound. sound of the concerto's solo part t in his turn made very beautiful rutting virtuosity, like tempta- eadfastly behind him. he chose in modest vein, as though the ood not much more to the fore oboe, say, or the horn. In mezzo his method made for a ance singularly exquisite. The eemed less successful, however, first movement and the last fter all, warmth and brilliancy art of the soloist are needful if erto is to make its effect. Mr. cordially applauded.

next Monday concert, April ast, unfortunately, which Mr. will conduct, the soloist will Gauthier, mezzo-soprano.

B. R. G.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NORTHAMPTON
MASSACHUSETTS
GAZETTE

MAR 11 1924

N SYMPHONY PLAYS ERE TOMORROW NIG

edetti Will Be Soloist a hony Concert in Smith Concert Course

oston Symphony orchestra, e direction of Pierre Mon- a concert in John M. all Wednesday evening at ock. Jean Bedetti will be t. The program is as fol-

No. 1 in C Minor, Op. 68 Brahms ostenuto; Allegro.
sostenuto.
co allegretto e grazio so.
gio; Allegro non troppo,
con brio.
Daphnis and Chloe Ravel
D major for Violincello Haydn erato
from "Prince Borodin

BOSTON,
MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

MAR 11 1924

FROM BRAHMS TO LALO

ely and Pleasurably the Symphony anges—Mr. Fox as Supple Pianist—he Choirs Excelling

A LARGE audience clapped its enthusiastic approval of Brahms's Second Symphony, played last night at Symphony Hall. The first offering on the programme of the fourth of the Monday evening concerts, it led to two other works equally well received: Lalo's overture to his opera, "Le Roi d'Ys," and Schumann's pianoforte concerto in A-minor. In the performance of the latter, Mr. Félix Fox, Boston pianist, assisted the orchestra. This programme made up of varied works, offering contrast, one to the other, emphasized again Mr. Monteux's abilities as programme-maker. Here he had represented three very different composers, Brahms, the staunch ally of the Classicists, who yet absorbed the very best of modern influences, Schumann, Romanticist, and Lalo, the champion of exotic impressionism, strong influence on French musicians, especially on the important Vincent d'Indy and Claude Debussy. A well-rounded programme, it displayed the works presented to good advantage.

Brahms turned melodist, leaving on a high shelf his involved polyphonies and colliding rhythms; Brahms, a colorist, a writer of exquisite simplicity and comprehension greets the hearer in this work, his second Symphony in D major. The orchestration is excellent. The structure classical, familiar, yet imbued with new life and spirit of the moderns, pr easy to follow. The orchestral co seems always appropriate, in one with the content, avoiding exagger The melodies, valuable inherently, oped masterfully, with new facets ing in the orchestral lights, never h the listener. Rather with repetition the beauty grows. In the reading of the Symphony, Mr. Monteux followed the score faithfully, altering but very little and producing a most satisfactory result.

Followed Schumann's work, the pianoforte concerto, with Félix Fox playing the solo part in pleasing style. Again conductor, and now pianist, respected the composer's wishes, following the score closely, yet interestingly. The demands on the pianist, almost continuous from the opening to the close did not seem to trouble Mr. Fox. His skilful technique, light, yet sure, and the thoughtful interpretation he gave the work drew praise. Especially commendable is the attitude he maintained in refraining from over-emphasis of his instrument. At his hands last night the piano was merely another instrument added to the orchestra, an important instr t to be sure, but nevertheless of the or s, sometimes heard alone, sometime semble. He subordinated himself to Mr. Monteux in the necessary passages. He manoeuvred most skilfully the sectio s where melodies flow from the pianoforte to the other instruments, and back once more. The cadenza he played adequately, d with delicate expressiveness. Mr. Fo n able pianist, musicianly, conscientio n interpretations, is by no means startlingly original in style. The work he played is so romantic in flavor that more abandon in performance might have been permitted. Yet in favor of an interpretation like that of last night, given throughout with rare sincerity, much must be said. The light delicacy, the shadings, the searching, keenness of insight—all these were delightful.

Totally different in style and performance from the two works preceding it was Lalo's overture to his opera, "Le Roi d'Ys." Here, this composer of Spanish origins, the advocate of exotic music, poured forth his wealth of inspiration. He drew upon the coloristic possibilities of the instruments, grouped them in unusual combinations, summoned riotous fortissimi to do his bidding. He invested with a strange glamour the characters and situations briefly suggested. The story of the opera itself—a prosperous town submerged by the opening of the flood gates and the consequent death of all within its walls expiate the sins of the king's young daughter—would seem briefly traversed by the overture. The passion the unhappiness, the war song, make for brilliance of effect. The climax Mr. Monteux worked up in excellent fashion, throwing restraint by the board, and pouring forth, in this work, the power and resources which lie within him and his orchestra, waiting only to be called into display.

Several times during the evening the chestra played in exceptionally fine sty In the Schumann the violins, given prominence, played brilliantly, lending fine expressiveness and clarity of tone. Brahms in his symphony, gives opportunity to the woodwind many times in the course of his work, and as played last night some of the selections entranced. The melodies seemed never so beautiful as when the wood gave them forth. The parts lie in good register for the instruments, for Brahms was a careful workman. They never sound strained or unnatural. In the last work played, Lalo's Overture, the glamour of the orchestration made virtuosi of many of the instruments. To the wood winds the themes went at first. The trumpets in their resounding repetitions gave dazzling color to the piece. The 'cello solo, played by Mr. Bedetti, was lovely indeed, passioned and haunting. The kettle drums, enforced by bass and side drums, rose to importance in the atmospheric reproduction of the work.

Altogether thoroughly pleasing was this Monday evening concert, happy in choice of works, of soloist and of rendition, and a credit to conductor and orchestra.

C. S. S.

FROM THE

BOSTON
MASS.
GLOBE
ISSUE OF
MAR 11 1924

FELIX FOX SOLOIST WITH SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, gave the fourth of its Monday evening concerts in Symphony Hall last evening. The program contained Brahms's Second Symphony, the Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys," by Lalo, and Schumann's piano concerto in A minor. Felix Fox, Boston pianist, was the assisting soloist.

The merits of Mr Fox are well know in this city. He is a competent pianist, but certainly not an inspired one. Last evening his phrasing seemed perilously angular, his tone for the most part more brittle than usual and even his technique not always crystal clear. To be sure, he played the lovely intermezzo with its rich string accompaniment with a deal of delicacy and feeling. When he came to the forceful final allegro, however, his performance did not impart more than noise to what is a powerful and pregnant movement. The orchestra gave him excellent support.

The second symphony of Brahms is probably the most loved by amateurs of any of his orchestral works. For the nonce the composer has forgotten the abstruse scholarliness which so often pervades his major orchestral pieces. He is the Brahms of the lied and the waltzes, the Brahms of melo verging on the sweet, but withal full real charm. The orchestra played t first allegro with a fine sense of it beautiful melody.

The interpretation given to the adagio did little to illumine its difficulty. This movement has puzzled many and it requires more than good workmanship to make it persuasive. Difficulties also beset the final allegro. The attack was not good and Mr Monteux worked long and vigorously before almost at the close he succeeded in whipping the orchestra to the jubilant frenzy that the coda demands throughout. The final bars, however, were triumphant as they should be.

Lalo's overture makes one wi more of the lesser known operas er included in repertoire. An occas performance of such an opera overture gives so much promise w be more than welcome.

The final concert of the series be given on Monday, April 7. Eva thier, soprano will be the soloist

MUSIC AND

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK,
N. Y.
TIMES

5 1924

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Mme. Matzenauer, will repeat at the Brooklyn Academy tomorrow its special Wagner program, which Mr. Monteux conducts tonight in Carnegie Hall.

---

abl- Sets
Pu

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

CINCINNATI, OHIO
BILLBOARD

15 1924

I. M. McHENRY.

BOSTONIANS HAVE SUBSCRIBED

Over $79,000 Toward Deficit of Boston Orchestra

According to a recent announcement in the program book of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Bostonians have pledged more than $79,000 toward the 1923-'24 deficit of the Symphony Orchestra. This sum, according to the report of the Trustees, has been pledged thru subscriptions of large and small amounts by people of Boston and vicinity who appreciate the value of the orchestra. The subscription books are still open and it is hoped the total will reach the amount set as the goal by the trustees.

A Ma
doz
Jong Cover and Card

NORTHAMPTON
MASSACHUSETTS
GAZETTE

R/3 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT SUCCESS

Great Orchestra Is Heard at Smith Under the Direction of Monteux

LEADER RECEIVES ENCORES

The concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra last evening in John M. Greene hall, with Pierre Monteux conducting, was successful. By that we mean that the music went straight to the mark, stirring the large audience to an enthusiasm we have not felt before this season. The program was widely varied and, if we may say so, strongly characterized.Every one must have found in the course of it his favorite style of orchestral music.

For those who like especially seriousness and dignity in music there was the Brahms C-minor symphony; those who respond to the daring spirit of innovation in modern music had a chance to hear modern music at its best in the suite of selections from Ravel's ballet, Daphnis and Chloe. The pre-Beethoven classicism was represented by a Haydn concerto for violoncello, most effectively set between the Ravel music and vigorous Russion dance music by Borodin. And these Russian dances, brilliantly scored for the orchestra, were direct in their appeal to everyone. The orchestra played as few orchestras in the world can play. What it owes to Mr. Monteux, who, in the six years he has had charge of it, has brought it through many a crisis, we begin suddenly to realize now that we know he is soon to return to France and that we shall not hear him conduct it again in Northampton. The audience seemed to welcome him with unusual enthusiasm, he was recalled again and again.

Certain features in the performance were outsanding: The oboe solos in the andante of the Brahms symphony, and the spirited climaxes in the finale; the trumpet off stage in the Ravel music (and of course the wind machine, too, which we imagine would attract less attention if we saw the scene and the dance for which the music was conceived); the serenity of the adagio of the Haydn concerto, with Jean Bedetti playing the solo cello; the rhythms of the Borodin dances, full of life and action. But while these, and certain other features may have been outstanding, it was the concert as a whole which was most impressive: The virtuosity of orchestra, its technical perfection; and Mr. Monteux's understanding of music of many sorts. If we stop to think, we remember how hard is the work of the composer, and how nerve-wraking; how thoroughly tired orchestra players get of the routine; how laborious and unromantic are the days of the conductor, and how quite un-American the discipline he must enforce. Is it not one of the world's marvels that when a great orchestra plays under a great leader, as the Boston orchestra played last night under Mr. Monteux, nothing creaks, but ll is music? Of course we pay our noney and we take such things for granted. But none the less, there is omething in them that is wonderul.

L. H.

CLIPPING FROM

Trans Mar 8

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Symphony Orchestra

NOT on Friday and Saturday, but on Monday evening of next week will the Symphony Orchestra be heard at home—in the fourth of its supplementary concerts for the pleasure of a public now firmly won. This audience prefers standard pieces; likes soloists; is disinclined toward too lengthy or exacting concerts; yet is content with no inferior music or performance. It will take pleasure, accordingly, in Mr. Monteux's programme for next Monday: Brahms's second and songful Symphony of gracious moods; Schumann's flowing concerto for piano and orchestra; Lalo's Overture to his opera, "The King of Ys." Mr. Félix Fox, who needs no heralding in his own town, will be the assisting pianist.

Mr. Monteux as Guest

For unusual occasion Mr. Monteux will lead the People's Symphony Orchestra through its concert tomorrow afternoon in the St. James Theatre. The invitation to him was happy thought of the directors of the lesser band. His speedy and hearty acceptance was evidence of his good will. All the week, since Mr. Schnéevoigt replaced him at Symphony Hall, he has been busy with rehearsals. For his programme will be no small tax upon his new forces. It traverses: Franck's Symphony; Saint-Saens's "Algerian Suite"; Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun"; the music to the Polish fete in Chabrier's opera, "Le Roi Malgré Lui."

Globe Mar 11

MONTEUX CONDUCTS PEOPLE'S SYMPHONY

Fine Performance of French Program

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted yesterday's concert of the People's Symphony as a guest conductor. This is the first time in the history of the Boston Symphony that its conductor has led a concert by another other organization during the season. The permission of the Boston Symphony trustees was necessary under the terms of Mr Monteux' contract, and was willingly granted.

The People's Symphony surpassed itself under its distinguished leader in playing an exacting program of French music. There were repeated ovations for Mr Monteux, which he invariably tried to share with the players. In the intermission he was presented a large laurel wreath. The St James Theatre was sold out, and hundreds were turned away.

This concert marks the end of any enmity that might have existed in past years between the two local orchestras, and proves that the position of the People's Symphony as a popular and valuable Boston organization is now firmly established. Its present campaign for a fund to meet its deficit will be aided by the striking success of yesterday's concert.

Mr Monteux' program began with Cesar Franck's symphony, and included another great modern classic, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun." He balanced these exacting numbers with two pieces demanding less from players and audience, Saint-Saens' "Algerian Suite" and an excerpt from Chabrier's opera, "King in Spite of Himself."

Each piece seemed to please those in the theatre, although somebody was heard remarking that probably many of the radio fans who were listening in as the program was broadcast thought that they were having trouble with static when they got the first measures of Debussy's distinctly modern music.

To one accustomed to hearing both Mr Monteux' conducting and the People's Symphony, but not in combination, the conjunction threw interesting sidelights on both. No further proof of Monteux' skill and taste as a whipper into shape of orchestras than yesterday's performance is needed. He has had plenty of practice in dealing with new and not always superlative material in rebuilding the Boston Symphony after the double calamities of war and strike. With only three rehearsals he managed to make the People's Symphony play much better than it has ever yet played, and in a difficult program.

The euphony, the quality and flexibility of tone, and the skill of most of the principal players to whom incidental solos fell yesterday spoke volumes in favor of the personnel of the People's Symphony. One doubts if any orchestra in America not put beyond comparison with this one by great endowment and control of the players' entire time can equal it.

There were, of course, weak points here and there, occasional slips by individual players and defects in separate sections of the band which it would be unfair and unkind to pillory here.

But the general average of the performance was astonishingly high. The men played with a zest, an eagerness to do their best, which would hearten any conductor. Mr Monteux in return did his best for them, and that best is very good indeed.

The simplest thing on the program, the 'Fete Polonais,' went the worst, because the men found it difficult to play such apparently simple dance music with the subtlety Mr Monteux rightly demanded. The best thing about the concert was the obvious wholehearted pleasure the audience took in it all.

P. R.

Trans Mar 11

FROM BRAHMS TO LALO

Widely and Pleasurably the Symphony Ranges—Mr. Fox as Supple Pianist—The Choirs Excelling

A LARGE audience clapped its enthusiastic approval of Brahms's Second Symphony, played last night at Symphony Hall. The first offering on the programme of the fourth of the Monday evening concerts, it led to two other works, equally well received: Lalo's overture to his opera, "Le Roi d'Ys," and Schumann's pianoforte concerto in A-minor. In the performance of the latter, Mr. Félix Fox, Boston pianist, assisted the orchestra. This programme made up of varied works, offering contrast, one to the other, emphasized again Mr. Monteux's abilities as programme-maker. Here he had represented three very different composers, Brahms, the staunch ally of the Classicists, who yet absorbad the very best of modern influences, Schumann, Romanticist, and Lalo, the champion of exotic impressionism, strong influence on French musicians, especially on the important Vincent d'Indy and Claude Debussy. A well-rounded programme, it displayed the works presented to good advantage.

Brahms turned melodist, leaving on a high shelf his involved polyphonies and colliding rhythms; Brahms, a colorist, a writer of exquisite simplicity and comprehension greets the hearer in this work, his second Symphony in D major. The orchestration is excellent. The structure, classical, familiar, yet imbued with the new life and spirit of the moderns, proves easy to follow. The orchestral coloring seems always appropriate, in one spirit with the content, avoiding exaggeration. The melodies, valuable inherently, developed masterfully, with new facets gleaming in the orchestral lights, never pall on the listener. Rather with repetition the beauty grows. In the reading of the Symphony, Mr. Monteux followed the score faithfully, altering but very little and producing a most satisfactory result.

Followed Schumann's work, the pianoforte concerto, with Félix Fox playing the solo part in pleasing style. Again conductor, and now pianist, respected the composer's wishes, following the score closely, yet interestingly. The demands on the pianist, almost continuous from the opening to the close did not seem to trouble Mr. Fox. His skilful technique, light, yet sure, and the thoughtful interpretation he gave the work drew praise. Especially commendable is the attitude he maintained in refraining from over-emphasis of his instrument. At his hands last night the piano was merely another instrument added to the orchestra, an important instrument, to be sure, but nevertheless of the orchestra, sometimes heard alone, sometimes in ensemble. He subordinated himself to Mr. Monteux in the necessary passages. He manoeuvred most skilfully the sections where melodies flow from the pianoforte to the other instruments, and back once more. The cadenza he played adequately, and with delicate expressiveness. Mr. Fox, an able pianist, musicianly, conscientious in interpretations, is by no means startlingly original in style. The work he played is so romantic in flavor that more abandon in performance might have been permitted. Yet in favor of an interpretation like that of last night, given throughout with rare sincerity, much must be said. The light delicacy, the shadings, the searching, keenness of insight—all these were delightful.

Totally different in style and performance from the two works preceding it was Lalo's overture to his opera, "Le Roi d'Ys." Here, this composer of Spanish origins, the advocate of exotic music, poured forth his wealth of inspiration. He drew upon the coloristic possibilities of the instruments, grouped them in unusual combinations, summoned riotous fortissimi to do his bidding. He invested with a strange glamour the characters and situations briefly suggested. The story of the opera itself—a prosperous town submerged by the opening of the flood gates and the consequent death of all within its walls to expiate the sins of the king's young daughter—would seem briefly traversed by the overture. The passion the unhappiness, the war song, make for brilliance of effect. The climax Mr. Monteux worked up in excellent fashion, throwing restraint by the board, and pouring forth, in this work, the power and resources which lie within him and his orchestra, waiting only to be called into display.

Several times during the evening the orchestra played in exceptionally fine style. In the Schumann the violins, given prominence, played brilliantly, lending fine expressiveness and clarity of tone. Brahms in his symphony, gives opportunity to the woodwind many times in the course of his work, and as played last night some of the selections entranced. The melodies seemed never so beautiful as when the wood gave them forth. The parts lie in good register for the instruments, for Brahms was a careful workman. They never sound strained or unnatural. In the last work played, Lalo's Overture, the glamour of the orchestration made virtuosi of many of the instruments. To the wood winds the theme went at first. The trumpets in their resounding repetitions gave dazzling color to the piece. The 'cello solo, played by Mr. Bedetti, was lovely indeed, passioned and haunting. The kettle drums, enforced by bass and side drums, rose to importance in the atmospheric reproduction of the work.

Altogether thoroughly pleasing was this Monday evening concert, happy in choice of works, of soloist and of rendition, and a fine conductor and orchestra.

C. S. S.

Her Mar 11

MONTEUX DIRECTS IN ROLE OF GUEST

Leads Popular Symphony Orchestra at St. James

An enthusiastic audience which filled the St. James Theatre welcomed Pierre Monteux of the Boston Symphony Orchestra when he appeared as guest conductor of the People's Symphony Orchestra at its 17th concert of the season yesterday afternoon.

Every seat was taken by 3 o'clock, a half hour before the concert was due to begin, and when Mr. Monteux raised his baton the promenade at the rear of the parquet was packed with music lovers. The orchestra, which was largely augmented for the occasion, rose as the distinguished visitor entered the stage, and joined in the hearty applause accorded him by the audience.

Mr. Monteux presented a program confined entirely to French composers. He opened the concert with Cesar Franck's remarkable Symphony in D minor and that his selection and execution were appreciated by his audience was evidenced by round after round of applause which followed.

The first number after the intermission was the Suite Algerienne by Saint-Saens. This was succeeded by Debussy's "Prelude A L'Apres Midi d'un Faune" and by Chabrier's "Fete Polonaise" from "Le Roi Malgre Lui," which was the final selection played. Mr. Monteux received another ovation before he was permitted to leave the stage.

Her Mar 11

LARGE AUDIENCE GREETS SYMPHONY

Fourth Monday Concert Well Applauded

For the fourth Monday concert, given last night in Symphony hall, Mr. Monteux set forth the Brahms D major symphony, the Schumann piano concerto (Felix Fox, soloist), and Lalo's overture to "Le Roi d'Y's." The audience was both large and enthusiastic.

Mr. Monteux showed a daring approaching rashness when he made fully three-quarters of his program last night from music by composers who, scholars have sworn these 50 and 75 years, were pitifully ignorant of the proper way to write for an orchestra. Or is it possible that Mr. Monteux, a man of practical experience, fails to share the views of the theorists? His accompaniment to the concerto, at all events, set one to marvelling afresh at the well-sounding music Schumann, in his awkwardness and ignorance, could contrive—and also at the folly folk will still be talking.

And as for the unfortunate Brahms with his lack of feeling for timbres of instruments, let us on our knees thank God for that lack which led him to write the D major symphony precisely as he wrote it. His lack of sensitiveness to color! Because he did not choose to make his music sound like that of Tchaikovsky does it follow, pray, that he knew not the principles that govern choice? In the brilliant and poetic performance of last night, especially of the last two movements, it is hard to guess who would complain of the sound.

The sound of the concerto's solo part Mr. Fox in his turn made very beautiful. Putting virtuosity, like temptation, steadfastly behind him, he chose to play in modest vein, as though the piano stood not much more to the fore than the oboe, say, or the horn. In the intermezzo his method made for a performance singularly exquisite. The result seemed less successful, however, in the first movement and the last where, after all, warmth and brilliancy on the part of the soloist are needful if the concerto is to make its effect. Mr. Fox was cordially applauded.

At the next Monday concert, April 7, the last, unfortunately, which Mr. Monteux will conduct, the soloist will be Eva Gauthier, mezzo-soprano.

R. R. G.

Trans Mar 11

Sunday afternoon and evening in Symphony Hall, two performances of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony by the Symphony Orchestra; a chorus, schooled by Dr. Davison, from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society; a quartet of able singers—all with Mr. Monteux conducting. Since 1917 the Choral Symphony has not been heard in Boston. Now it returns to mark the hundredth anniversary of the first performance of the music in Vienna, May 9, 1824. Once more an overflowing public rises to a festal occasion and sets this final Symphony of Beethoven above all the rest. For the concert in the afternoon the house is already sold. For the concert in the evening, tickets are still plentiful.

Sunday afternoon, March 30, at the St.

Globe Mar 11

FELIX FOX SOLOIST WITH SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, gave the fourth of its Monday evening concerts in Symphony Hall last evening. The program contained Brahms Second Symphony, the Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys," by Lalo, and Schumann's piano concerto in A minor. Felix Fox, Boston pianist, was the assisting soloist.

The merits of Mr Fox are well known in this city. He is a competent pianist, but certainly not an inspired one. Last evening his phrasing seemed perilously angular, his tone for the most part more brittle than usual and even his technique not always crystal clear. To be sure, he played the lovely intermezzo with its rich string accompaniment with a deal of delicacy and feeling. When he came to the forceful final allegro, however, his performance did not impart more than noise to what is a powerful and pregnant movement. The orchestra gave him excellent support.

The second symphony of Brahms is probably the most loved by amateurs of any of his orchestral works. For the nonce the composer has forgotten the abstruse scholarliness which so often pervades his major orchestral pieces. He is the Brahms of the lieder and the waltzes, the Brahms of melody verging on the sweet, but withal full of real charm. The orchestra played the first allegro with a fine sense of its beautiful melody.

The interpretation given to the adagio did little to illumine its difficulty. This movement has puzzled many and it requires more than good workmanship to make it persuasive. Difficulties also beset the final allegro. The attack was not good and Mr Monteux worked long and vigorously before almost at the close he succeeded in whipping the orchestra to the jubilant frenzy that the coda demands throughout. The final bars, however, were triumphant as they should be Lalo's overture makes one wish that more of the lesser known operas were included in repertoire. An occasional performance of such an opera whose overture gives so much promise would be more than welcome.

The final concert of the series will be given on Monday, April 7. Eva Gauthier, soprano will be the soloist

---

Globe Mar 16

The Boston Symphony continues its campaign for funds to meet the deficit for this season, which will amount to $95,000. An official statement from the trustees in a recent program is worth noting. The endowment fund, to which small contributions are also welcome, amounts to about $160,000 in all. The statement reads in part as follows:

"The list of subscribers to the operating deficit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc, for 1923-24 was first printed in the program books of Nov 16 and 17. Two weeks later, with the names of many new subscribers added in the interval, the pledged amount of $58,706 was published. Since then the total has been increased to $79,803.34.

"This has come about through a greatly extended cooperation in the support of the orchestra on the part of its patrons. The trustees, with much appreciation of what has already been done, would be glad to have it generally understood that subscriptions of small and moderate amounts are warmly welcomed from those who cannot make such contributions as they would like to offer. The widest possible distribution of support is as much to be desired as the support itself.

"Subscriptions to annual deficit and to the endowment fund should be sent to E. B. Dane, treasurer, 6 Beacon st, Boston, Mass."

Does any cause better deserve the money of Bostonians who care for music than the Boston Symphony? The desired amount should have been promptly oversubscribed.

Her Mar 16

Mme. Bourskaya

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

With Carl Flesch as the soloist the Boston Symphony orchestra will be heard in the 19th pair of Symphony concerts in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, March 2, and 22. The noted violinist will appear with the orchestra in Beethoven's Concerto. Pierre Monteaux will also conduct Haydn's Seventh Symphony in C major, the second suite from Edward Burlington Hills "Stevensoniana" based on poems from Stevenson's "A Child's Garden of Verses," including "Armies in the Fire," "The Dumb Soldier" and "Pirate Song." The closing number will be Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries."

NINTH SYMPHONY

The quartet of soloists for the pending Pension Fund performances of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony are now announced. Mme. Sundelius, Marjorie Squires, Charles Stratton and Fred Patton.

The performances will take place in Symphony hall on Sunday afternoon, March 30, at 3:30 and again on the same evening at 8:30. To the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, will be added the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society.

[227]

CLIPPING FROM

Trans Mar 8

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Symphony Orchestra

NOT on Friday and Saturday, but on Monday evening of next week will the Symphony Orchestra be heard at home—in the fourth of its supplementary concerts for the pleasure of a public now firmly won. This audience prefers standard pieces; likes soloists; is disinclined toward too lengthy or exacting concerts; yet is content with no inferior music or performance. It will take pleasure, accordingly, in Mr. Monteux's programme for next Monday: Brahms's second and songful Symphony of gracious moods; Schumann's flowing concerto for piano and orchestra; Lalo's Overture to his opera, "The King of Ys." Mr. Félix Fox, who needs no heralding in his own town, will be the assisting pianist.

Mr. Monteux as Guest

For unusual occasion Mr. Monteux will lead the People's Symphony Orchestra through its concert tomorrow afternoon in the St. James Theatre. The invitation to him was happy thought of the directors of the lesser band. His speedy and hearty acceptance was evidence of his good will. All the week, since Mr. Schnéevoigt replaced him at Symphony Hall, he has been busy with rehearsals. For his programme will be no small tax upon his new forces. It traverses: Franck's Symphony; Saint-Saens's "Algerian Suite"; Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun"; the music to the Polish fete in Chabrier's opera, "Le Roi Malgré Lui."

Globe Mar 11

MONTEUX CONDUCTS PEOPLE'S SYMPHONY

Fine Performance of French Program

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted yesterday's concert of the People's Symphony as a guest conductor. This is the first time in the history of the Boston Symphony that its conductor has led a concert by another other organization during the season. The permission of the Boston Symphony trustees was necessary under the terms of Mr Monteux' contract, and was willingly granted.

The People's Symphony surpassed itself under its distinguished leader in playing an exacting program of French music. There were repeated ovations for Mr Monteux, which he invariably tried to share with the players. In the intermission he was presented a large laurel wreath. The St James Theatre was sold out, and hundreds were turned away.

This concert marks the end of any enmity that might have existed in past years between the two local orchestras, and proves that the position of the People's Symphony as a popular and valuable Boston organization is now firmly established. Its present campaign for a fund to meet its deficit will be aided by the striking success of yesterday's concert.

Mr Monteux' program began with Cesar Franck's symphony, and included another great modern classic, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun." He balanced these exacting numbers with two pieces demanding less from players and audience, Saint-Saens' "Algerian Suite" and an excerpt from Chabrier's opera, "King in Spite of Himself."

Each piece seemed to please those in the theatre, although somebody was heard remarking that probably many of the radio fans who were listening in as the program was broadcast thought that they were having trouble with static when they got the first measures of Debussy's distinctly modern music.

To one accustomed to hearing both Mr Monteux' conducting and the People's Symphony, but not in combination, the conjunction threw interesting sidelights on both. No further proof of Monteux' skill and taste as a whipper into shape of orchestras than yesterday's performance is needed. He has had plenty of practice in dealing with new and not always superlative material in rebuilding the Boston Symphony after the double calamities of war and strike. With only three rehearsals he managed to make the People's Symphony play much better than it has ever yet played, and in a difficult program.

The euphony, the quality and flexibility of tone, and the skill of most of the principal players to whom incidental solos fell yesterday spoke volumes in favor of the personnel of the People's Symphony. One doubts if any orchestra in America not put beyond comparison with this one by great endowment and control of the players' entire time can equal it.

There were, of course, weak points here and there, occasional slips by individual players and defects in separate sections of the band which it would be unfair and unkind to pillory here.

But the general average of the performance was astonishingly high. The men played with a zest, an eagerness to do their best, which would hearten any conductor. Mr Monteux in return did his best for them, and that best is very good indeed.

The simplest thing on the program, the "Fete Polonais," went the worst, because the men found it difficult to play such apparently simple dance music with the subtlety Mr Monteux rightly demanded. The best thing about the concert was the obvious wholehearted pleasure the audience took in it all.

P. R.

Trans Mar 11

FROM BRAHMS TO LALO

Widely and Pleasurably the Symphony Ranges—Mr. Fox as Supple Pianist—The Choirs Excelling

A LARGE audience clapped its enthusiastic approval of Brahms's Second Symphony, played last night at Symphony Hall. The first offering on the programme of the fourth of the Monday evening concerts, it led to two other works equally well received: Lalo's overture to his opera, "Le Roi d'Ys," and Schumann's pianoforte concerto in A-minor. In the performance of the latter, Mr. Félix Fox, Boston pianist, assisted the orchestra. This programme made up of varied works, offering contrast, one to the other, emphasized again Mr. Monteux's abilities as programme-maker. Here he had represented three very different composers, Brahms, the staunch ally of the Classicists, who yet absorbed the very best of modern influences, Schumann, Romanticist, and Lalo, the champion of exotic impressionism, strong influence on French musicians, especially on the important Vincent d'Indy and Claude Debussy. A well-rounded programme, it displayed the works presented to good advantage.

Brahms turned melodist, leaving on a high shelf his involved polyphonies and colliding rhythms; Brahms, a colorist, a writer of exquisite simplicity and comprehension greets the hearer in this work, his second Symphony in D major. The orchestration is excellent. The structure, classical, familiar, yet imbued with the new life and spirit of the moderns, proves easy to follow. The orchestral coloring seems always appropriate, in one spirit with the content, avoiding exaggeration. The melodies, valuable inherently, developed masterfully, with new facets gleaming in the orchestral lights, never pall on the listener. Rather with repetition the beauty grows. In the reading of the Symphony, Mr. Monteux followed the score faithfully, altering but very little and producing a most satisfactory result.

Followed Schumann's work, the pianoforte concerto, with Félix Fox playing the solo part in pleasing style. Again conductor, and now pianist, respected the composer's wishes, following the score closely, yet interestingly. The demands on the pianist, almost continuous from the opening to the close did not seem to trouble Mr. Fox. His skilful technique, light, yet sure, and the thoughtful interpretation he gave the work drew praise. Especially commendable is the attitude he maintained in refraining from over-emphasis of his instrument. At his hands last night the piano was merely another instrument added to the orchestra, an important instrument, to be sure, but nevertheless of the orchestra, sometimes heard alone, sometimes in ensemble. He subordinated himself to Mr. Monteux in the necessary passages. He manoeuvred most skilfully the sections where melodies flow from the pianoforte to the other instruments, and back once more. The cadenza he played adequately, and with delicate expressiveness. Mr. Fox, an able pianist, musicianly, conscientious in interpretations, is by no means startlingly original in style. The work he played is so romantic in flavor that more abandon in performance might have been permitted. Yet in favor of an interpretation like that of last night, given throughout with rare sincerity, much must be said. The light delicacy, the shadings, the searching, keenness of insight—all these were delightful.

Totally different in style and performance from the two works preceding it was Lalo's overture to his opera, "Le Roi d'Ys." Here, this composer of Spanish origins, the advocate of exotic music, poured forth his wealth of inspiration. He drew upon the coloristic possibilities of the instruments, grouped them in unusual combinations, summoned riotous fortissimi to do his bidding. He invested with a strange glamour the characters and situations briefly suggested. The story of the opera itself—a prosperous town submerged by the opening of the flood gates and the consequent death of all within its walls to expiate the sins of the king's young daughter—would seem briefly traversed by the overture. The passion the unhappiness, the war song, make for brilliance of effect. The climax Mr. Monteux worked up in excellent fashion, throwing restraint by the board, and pouring forth, in this work, the power and resources which lie within him and his orchestra, waiting only to be called into display.

Several times during the evening the orchestra played in exceptionally fine style. In the Schumann the violins, given prominence, played brilliantly, lending fine expressiveness and clarity of tone. Brahms in his symphony, gives opportunity to the woodwind many times in the course of his work, and as played last night some of the selections entranced. The melodies seemed never so beautiful as when the wood gave them forth. The parts lie in good register for the instruments, for Brahms was a careful workman. They never sound strained or unnatural. In the last work played, Lalo's Overture, the glamour of the orchestration made virtuosi of many of the instruments. To the wood winds the theme went at first. The trumpets in their resounding repetitions gave dazzling color to the piece. The 'cello solo, played by Mr. Bedetti, was lovely indeed, passioned and haunting. The kettle drums, enforced by bass and side drums, rose to importance in the atmospheric reproduction of the work.

Altogether thoroughly pleasing was this Monday evening concert, happy in choice of works, of soloist and of rendition, and a conductor and orchestra.

C. S. S.

Her Mar 11

MONTEUX DIRECTS IN ROLE OF GUEST

Leads Popular Symphony Orchestra at St. James

An enthusiastic audience which filled the St. James Theatre welcomed Pierre Monteux of the Boston Symphony Orchestra when he appeared as guest conductor of the People's Symphony Orchestra at its 17th concert of the season yesterday afternoon.

Every seat was taken by 3 o'clock, a half hour before the concert was due to begin, and when Mr. Monteux raised his baton the promenade at the rear of the parquet was packed with music lovers. The orchestra, which was largely augmented for the occasion, rose as the distinguished visitor entered the stage, and joined in the hearty applause accorded him by the audience.

Mr. Monteux presented a program confined entirely to French composers. He opened the concert with Cesar Franck's remarkable Symphony in D minor and that his selection and execution were appreciated by his audience was evidenced by round after round of applause which followed.

The first number after the intermission was the Suite Algerienne by Saint-Saens. This was succeeded by Debussy's "Prelude A L'Apres Midi d'un Faune" and by Chabrier's "Fete Polonaise" from "Le Roi Malgre Lui," which was the final selection played. Mr. Monteux received another ovation before he was permitted to leave the stage.

Her Mar 11

LARGE AUDIENCE GREETS SYMPHONY

Fourth Monday Concert Well Applauded

For the fourth Monday concert, given last night in Symphony hall, Mr. Monteux set forth the Brahms D major symphony, the Schumann piano concerto (Felix Fox, soloist), and Lalo's overture to "Le Roi d'Y's." The audience was both large and enthusiastic.

Mr. Monteux showed a daring approaching rashness when he made fully three-quarters of his program last night from music by composers who, scholars have sworn these 50 and 75 years, were pitifully ignorant of the proper way to write for an orchestra. Or is it possible that Mr. Monteux, a man of practical experience, fails to share the views of the theorists? His accompaniment to the concerto, at all events, set one to marvelling afresh at the well-sounding music Schumann, in his awkwardness and ignorance, could contrive—and also at the folly folk will still be talking.

And as for the unfortunate Brahms with his lack of feeling for timbres of instruments, let us on our knees thank God for that lack which led him to write the D major symphony precisely as he wrote it. His lack of sensitiveness to color! Because he did not choose to make his music sound like that of Tchaikovsky does it follow, pray, that he knew not the principles that govern choice? In the brilliant and poetic performance of last night, especially of the last two movements, it is hard to guess who would complain of the sound.

The sound of the concerto's solo part Mr. Fox in his turn made very beautiful. Putting virtuosity, like temptation, steadfastly behind him, he chose to play in modest vein, as though the piano stood not much more to the fore than the oboe, say, or the horn. In the intermezzo his method made for a performance singularly exquisite. The result seemed less successful, however, in the first movement and the last where, after all, warmth and brilliancy on the part of the soloist are needful if the concerto is to make its effect. Mr. Fox was cordially applauded.

At the next Monday concert, April 7, the last, unfortunately, which Mr. Monteux will conduct, the soloist will be Eva Gauthier, mezzo-soprano.

R. R. G.

Trans Mar 11

Sunday afternoon and evening in Symphony Hall, two performances of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony by the Symphony Orchestra; a chorus, schooled by Dr. Davison, from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society; a quartet of able singers—all with Mr. Monteux conducting. Since 1917 the Choral Symphony has not been heard in Boston. Now it returns to mark the hundredth anniversary of the first performance of the music in Vienna, May 9, 1824. Once more an overflowing public rises to a festal occasion and sets this final Symphony of Beethoven above all the rest. For the concert in the afternoon the house is already sold. For the concert in the evening, tickets are still plentiful.

Sunday afternoon, March 30, at the St.

Globe Mar 11

FELIX FOX SOLOIST WITH SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, gave the fourth of its Monday evening concerts in Symphony Hall last evening. The program contained Brahms's Second Symphony, the Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys," by Lalo, and Schumann's piano concerto in A minor. Felix Fox, Boston pianist, was the assisting soloist.

The merits of Mr Fox are well known in this city. He is a competent pianist, but certainly not an inspired one. Last evening his phrasing seemed perilously angular, his tone for the most part more brittle than usual and even his technique not always crystal clear. To be sure, he played the lovely intermezzo with its rich string accompaniment with a deal of delicacy and feeling. When he came to the forceful final allegro, however, his performance did not impart more than noise to what is a powerful and pregnant movement. The orchestra gave him excellent support.

The second symphony of Brahms is probably the most loved by amateurs of any of his orchestral works. For the nonce the composer has forgotten the abstruse scholarliness which so often pervades his major orchestral pieces. He is the Brahms of the lieder and the waltzes, the Brahms of melody verging on the sweet, but withal full of real charm. The orchestra played the first allegro with a fine sense of its beautiful melody.

The interpretation given to the adagio did little to illumine its difficulty. This movement has puzzled many and it requires more than good workmanship to make it persuasive. Difficulties also beset the final allegro. The attack was not good and Mr Monteux worked long and vigorously before almost at the close he succeeded in whipping the orchestra to the jubilant frenzy that the coda demands throughout. The final bars, however, were triumphant as they should be Lalo's overture makes one wish that more of the lesser known operas were included in repertoire. An occasional performance of such an opera whose overture gives so much promise would be more than welcome.

The final concert of the series will be given on Monday, April 7. Eva Gauthier, soprano will be the soloist

---

Globe Mar 16

The Boston Symphony continues its campaign for funds to meet the deficit for this season, which will amount to $95,000. An official statement from the trustees in a recent program is worth noting. The endowment fund, to which small contributions are also welcome, amounts to about $160,000 in all. The statement reads in part as follows:

"The list of subscribers to the operating deficit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc, for 1923-24 was first printed in the program books of Nov 16 and 17. Two weeks later, with the names of many new subscribers added in the interval, the pledged amount of $58,736 was published. Since then the total has been increased to $79,803.34.

"This has come about through a greatly extended cooperation in the support of the orchestra on the part of its patrons. The trustees, with much appreciation of what has already been done, would be glad to have it generally understood that subscriptions of small and moderate amounts are warmly welcomed from those who cannot make such contributions as they would like to offer. The widest possible distribution of support is as much to be desired as the support itself.

"Subscriptions to annual deficit and to the endowment fund should be sent to F. B. Dane, treasurer, 6 Beacon st, Boston, Mass."

Does any cause better deserve the money of Bostonians who care for music than the Boston Symphony? The desired amount should have been promptly oversubscribed.

Her Mar 16

Mme.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

With Carl Flesch as the soloist the Boston Symphony orchestra will be heard in the 19th pair of Symphony concerts in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, March 2, and 22. The noted violinist will appear with the orchestra in Beethoven's Concerto. Pierre Monteaux will also conduct Haydn's Seventh Symphony in C major, the second suite from Edward Burlington Hills "Stevensoniana" based on poems from Stevenson's "A Child's Garden of Verses," including "Armies in the Fire," "The Dumb Soldier" and "Pirate Song." The closing number will be Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries."

NINTH SYMPHONY

The quartet of soloists for the pending Pension Fund performances of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony are now announced. Mme. Sundelius, Marjorie Squires, Charles Stratton and Fred Patton.

The performances will take place in Symphony hall on Sunday afternoon, March 30, at 3:30 and again on the same evening at 8:30. To the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, will be added the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society.

N. Y. Times Mar 16

MUSIC

"Sacre du Printemps."

By OLIN DOWNES.

The second performance of Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" in New York was given yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall by Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The repetition was a response to many requests for a second hearing of one of the most important musical novelties produced this season.

The results of the first performance, so far as its quality and its reception by the public are concerned, were repeated on this occasion. In place, however, of a hall partly filled at the previous hearing the auditorium was crowded yesterday to capacity. There was an outburst of applause after the first part of the score which the conductor did not pause to acknowledge. At the end pent-up enthusiasm found vent in a demonstration wholly merited if only by the achievement of Mr. Monteux and his men. It is difficult to think of a conductor who would have interpreted the music with such fire and enthusiasm for every measure, at the same time that he kept a perfectly cool head and the most complete technical control of his forces through it all. Add to this the splendid capacities of the orchestra itself, and it is apparent that these were conditions difficult to improve for a hearing of an extremely difficult score. If anything, the performance was more authoritative and exciting than the one which introduced the work in this city.

It is not easy, even after a second hearing and some study of the music, to arrive at a conclusion about this singular creation of Stravinsky. The impulse when first hearing it was to cry out, "A masterpiece!" A majority of modern musicians, in fact, have so declared. Perhaps it is a masterpiece. So far as energy, force of harmonic writing and mastery of the orchestra are concerned, Stravinsky need fear few rivals. Nevertheless, though every moment he freshly amazes his audience, when the end is reached there is still, for one listener, at least, a sense of something wanting. That something is not mere sensuous beauty or classic "form"—the music is in a very definite series of dance movements and forms—but something that resembles less sheerly physical sensation and more the qualities of spirit as well as its substance which make a piece of music significant to generations.

Not that beauty is lacking. There is much beauty in the Russian folk music, which is now seen to permeate the score, and in some of its developments. Other developments, after suggestions found especially in Debussy and Moussorgky, are pursued to logical, highly dissonant and powerfully expressive conclusions. Then there is the shock of the rhythms. It is as if Stravinsky had discovered in certain rhythmic units a latent energy which he has hit on a means of releasing, just as it has been claimed that the day is near when the scientist will discover and release enough energy now contained in every atom to blow a battleship from its harbor to a mountain top. There is here a new extension of the dynamic possibilities of rhythm.

But there is that in this music which repulses as well as attracts. It is an orgy and an explosion of force, but very brutal and perhaps perverse. It is easy to believe it the expression of one who is fundamentally a barbarian and a primitive—tinctured with, educated in, the utmost sophistications and satieties of a worn-out civilization. To be primitive was the composer's purpose, but his own temperament, it may be, led him further afield and further astray. It has yet to be seen whether "Sacre du Printemps" with all its galvanic energy and individuality, and despite the fact that it has already strongly influenced some young composers, is a healthy or an enduring artistic manifestation.

The soloist of the afternoon was Jean Beddetti, first 'cellist of the orchestra. He played music to which his finished style and his natural beauty of tone are particularly appropriate — the Haydn 'cello concerto in D major. The concerto, however, is none too brief, for all the charm of its slow movement and the graceful thematic invention of other pages. Nor was Mr. Beddetti, admirable musician and artist that he is, heard to the best advantage at this concert.

The program opened with a suave and tonally very beautiful performance of Schumann's D minor symphony. Technically the music was a joy to hear, and the fine phrasing and shadowings that characterized it were a glory to the ear. On the other hand, the symphony has been read more youthfully, more romantically.

Adv. Mar 16

SOLOISTS CHOSEN FOR NINTH SYMPHONY

Mme. Marie Sundelius, soprano; Majorie Squires, contralto; Charles Stratton, tenor, and Fred Patton, bass, will be the soloists at the performances of Beethoven's ninth symphony next Sunday. Afternoon and evening performances will be given at Symphony Hall in aid of the Boston Symphony Orchestra pension fund. The Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society will also assist.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Carl Flesch will be soloist at the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The noted violinist will play the Beethoven's concerto. Pierre Monteux will conduct Haydn's seventh symphony, the second suite from Edward Burlingame Hill's "Stevensoniana" and Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries."

[228]

BLANK PAGE

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PLAYS ELIOT'S FAVORITE

A number played in his honor and a wreath placed at the conductor's stand while it was played were the marks of respect paid to Dr Charles W. Eliot at the Boston Symphony concert in Saunders Theatre, Cambridge, last night.

Judge Frederick P. Cabot had written to Dr Eliot expressing the desire of Mr Monteux to play one of his favorite pieces at the Cambridge concert to be given on his birthday. Dr Eliot replied in part as follows:

"My interest in the Sanders Theatre concerts by the Symphony Orchestra had two grounds: First, my gratitude to Henry L. Higginson for the many things he did to promote music at Harvard and to make it possible for the families connected with the university living in Cambridge to hear his orchestra at comparatively low prices. My other reason was that I had acquired through my wife's influence and guidance a considerable enjoyment of music myself."

The number played as one of Dr Eliot's favorites was Wagner's Overture to Tannhaeuser.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PLAYS ELIOT FAVORIT

Wreath Rest son Conductor's Stan During the Number

As a mark of respect to Dr. Eliot the Boston Symphony orchestra, at its concert last evening in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, played Wagner's Overture to Tannhauser, while a wreath rested on the conductor's stand during the number.

Previously, Judge Frederick P. Cabot had written Dr. Eliot expressing the desire of Mr. Monteux to play one of the educator's favorite pieces at the Cambridge concert on the evening of his birthday. Dr. Eliot replied, in part, as follows:

"My interest in the Sanders Theatre concerts by the Symphony orchestra had two grounds: First, my gratitude to Henry L. Higginson for the many things he did to promote music at Harvard and to make it possible for the families connected with the university living in Cambridge to hear his orchestra at comparatively low prices. My other reason was that I had acquired through my wife's influence and guidance a considerable enjoyment of music myself."

For Dr. Eliot

A Piece of His Choosing to Be Played on His Birthday by the Symphony Orchestra.

UNLESS it be Professor Palmer, there has been no more regular listener, these forty years, at the Symphony Concerts in Cambridge than President Eliot. As it happens, the Boston Orchestra plays there on Thursday next, his ninetieth birthday. It occurred to Mr Monteux, the quick-minded, to se on the programme one of D Eliot's favorite pieces, according his choice. For the Trustees of the Orchestra as well, Judge Cabot conveyed the wish and put the question. The answer was the Overture to Wagner's opera, "Tannhäuser"—a choice to which all but the supercilious will also agree. Along with it, on Thursday, go Dvorak's Symphony, "From the New World" and, with Mr. Flesc for the solo-part, Beethoven's Concerto for Violin.

End to Surmise

On Sept. 4, Mr. Kusevitzky Sets Sail for Boston

A SENTENCE may now dispel the reiterated rumors of the past three weeks, questioning the coming of Mr. Kusevitzky to Boston next autumn as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. On September 4, he embarks at Cherbourg on the Aquitania en route to New York and Boston. By the middle of that month he will be at work here.

NEW SYMPHONY LEADER TO SAIL FOR U. S. SEPT. 4

Word was received here yesterday that Serge Koussevitzky, who has been engaged as conductor for the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season of 1924-25, will sail for this country on the Aquitania Sept. 4. This information came from W. H. Brennan, manager of the orchestra, who is in London. He attended Mr. Koussevitzky's opening concert with the London Symphony Orchestra this season on March 10.

Friday afternoon, March 21, in Symphony Hall, the nineteenth of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, with Mr.
Monteux conducting and Mr. Carl Flesch for assisting violinist. The programme comprises Haydn's Symphony in C major;
a Second Suite of Mr. Edward Burlingame
Hill's "Stevensoniana" for novel piece; Beethoven's Concerto for Violin; the Ride of Wagner's Valkyrs.

---

a miscellaneous programme.

Report goes that Mr. Monteux has chosen Franck's Symphony and the overture to "Tannhäuser" as two of the pieces for his leave-taking next May at the Symphony Concerts. The four programmes that he has yet to announce will not abound in novel numbers. There will be room, however, for the promised repetition of Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring" and for three vivid dances by the Spaniard, de Falla.

In Cambridge

Thursday evening in Sanders Theatre the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the seventh of this season's series of concerts in Cambridge. Since this concert falls upon the birthday of President Emeritus Charles W. Eliot of Harvard University, who was instrumental in first establishing this annual series of Symphony concerts in Cambridge, as graceful compliment t him the orchestra will play on that occasion a piece of his choosing, the Overture to Wagner's "Tannhauser," Dvorak's "New World" Symphony and Beethoven's Violin Concerto in D major, with Carl Flesch as soloist, complete the programme.

In Boston

At the regular Symphony Concerts of the week in Boston Carl Flesch will again be soloist in this same Beethoven Concerto, and for novel number upon the programme stands the second suite from the "Stevensonia," by Edward Burlingame Hill. For the rest will come Haydn's Symphony in C major (B. & H. No. 7) and the "Ride of the Valkyries" from Wagner's opera "Die Walkure."

RECITALS OF

En

Sho

Shoe

Boylsto

AR

GLOVE

ovated house. Address E

FOR RENT

5 or 6 ROOM steam heated apartment. Call University 1902.

BEAUTIFUL PILGRIM COURT

Diningette Suite at Moderate Rentals. Agent on Premises. 114-122 Riverway.

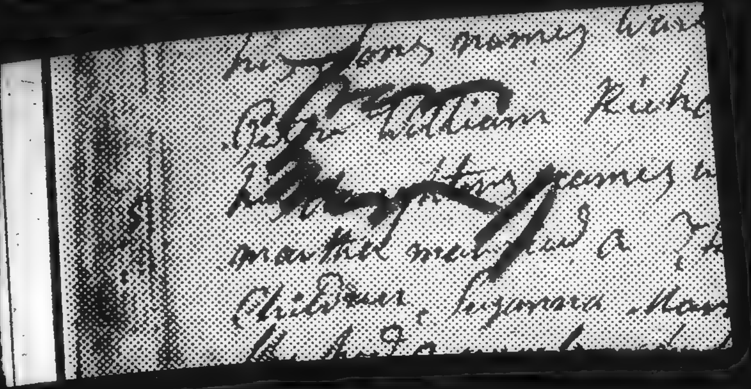
NEW AND OLD APARTMENTS

FURNISHED and unfurnished, 1 to 8 rooms, $65 to $100; suburban, 1418 Commonwealth av. Regent 5045.

7 MARLBORO ST, second floor—Sublet, large sunny room with fireplace, 2 bedrooms, kitchenette and bath. Tel Univ 927.

NEW APARTMENTS

JUST CALL REGENT 5045.



sons names wri

William Kirk

ters names w

Martha

Children, Seymour, Mar

Condone Violations of U. S. Laws

Asks Embassy at Washington for the Facts in the Orduna Case for the Use of the Foreign Office

London, March — The British Government has asked its embassy at Washington for a report of the facts concerning work, just in work. I consider why I had joy in work. I ever looked in enough to think of that ven. But joy in work has been the ource of a very large part of my life.

A GIFT OF NATURE

"Now that is just a gift of nature—from grandparents as well as from parents. Those inheritances determined my life in many respects. They determined my natural disposition towards work, towards research, towards persistent inquiry. This tendency to research came to me in Harvard College while I was the only student in Harvard College, the only graduate in Harvard College, and through the kindness of my teacher in chemistry, Prof. Josiah P. Cooke. It gave me the opportunity to learn and to find out what the process of scientific experimentation and research for truth was.

"My friends, I was the only student between 1849 and 1853, the only student of Harvard College, who had that blessing. It was a sense of this that first enlisted me when I became a teacher of Harvard College in the provision of the choice of study; it first induced me to call for volunteers in my class of mathematics to do a hard piece of surveying work—the first call for work in the field that was ever made. To go back to Cambridge as described by one of the speakers in respect to my conduct as president, I may say that I recognize the accuracy of his description, particularly when he said that I was probably, in listening to debates … in inviting my op-once considered so remarkable and unusual, has long been placed upon the back shelf as carrying no great news or advertising value.

With the Noyes-Buick Company trainload shipments are so common as to cause no comment in organization

MOTOR TRUCK RAIL HELPER

Mack Truck Manager Talks on Subject

Dec
nov 16

In speaking of the relations between the motor truck and the railroad, W. A. Maynard, local manager of the Mack Motor Truck Company, said in part: "The present day motor truck is not, in any sense, a substitute for something antiquated, but acts as the most powerful ally to railroad and commercial highway transportation that the world has ever known. It is eliminating

[By the Associated Press]

Rome, March 18—The statements by London newspaper that the Pope's heal was causing considerable uneasiness an that he was reported to be suffering fro arterio-sclerosis was received here wit surprise.

The Pope's health is of the best and h s daily undertaking an immense amoun of work. Yesterday he received numerou cardinals and prelates in private audienc and later granted a public reception to sev eral hundred pilgrims.

On Sunday the Holy Father delivered long address to 400 members of the S Vincent society.

Much of his time is occupied these day in preparing the allocution which he wi deliver at the coming secret consistor when Archbishop Hayes of New York and Mundelein of Chicago are made cardinals

Those who have seen the Pope in audi ence declare he seems to be in good health and is devoting his entire time from six o'clock in the morning until well in the evening to the affairs of the Holy See. Dr Rossi of Milan recently visited the Pope but he is a personal friend of the Pontif and the Vatican has denied in unequivoca terms that [illegible] had any professiona character.

The radio receiving set at the Vatican has been installed and Pope Pius already has been "listening in."

Trans Thur 18

CARDINALS-ELECT BUSY

---

meeting Meriden, Conn., and Manchester, N. H. The following are members of the squad:

Ruth Farnsworth, Mildred Ellis, Elizabeth Learned, Laura Frye, Priscilla Odione, captain; Frances Kehoe, Gladys Brown, Dorothy Wilson, Barbara Bent and Marjorie Rowell.

The team has scored 521 points against its opponents' 115. Ruth Farnsworth, forward, has averaged 36 points each game. The record for the year follows:

Swampscott	28	Alumni	14
Swampscott	40	Revere	17
Swampscott	86	Melrose	5
Swampscott	88	Marblehead	5
Swampscott	54	Beverly	8
Swampscott	32	Wellesley	7
Swampscott	45	Melrose	19
Swampscott	89	Beverly	3
Swampscott	17	Revere	9
Swampscott	38	Wellesley	21
Swampscott	54	Marblehead	7

TO OPEN BROWN LECTURE SERIES

Dr. Harry N. Holmes of Oberlin Colle

BLANK PAGE

TS

in
Com Yor

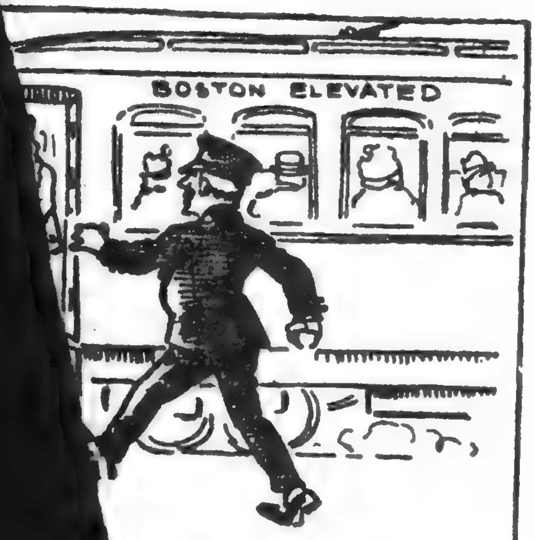
KEEP OFF THE GRASS
ME



BOSTON ELEVATED

FARES TO WORRY HIM

R
BEER ON DRAUGHT

VA

A p takin schoo demol purch be he next sider Back tion
a rea Scho
again whic cated

Mr bette than have the reve ing of ta

RE

NE of squa seco ernn
it w
W

ut

Decla

ST

tch out spa

Bo

SATURDAY

DR

N

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

HILL, SMITH & CO.
STATIONERS
AND BLANK BOOK
MANUFACTURERS
8 MILK STREET,
[illegible]
BOSTON.
Job No. 911
Duplicate this book by sending the above number.

END OF VOLUME

END OF REEL

PLEASE REWIND